ment the premises were required for a public purpose" before the power reposed by the statute in the relevant authority to requisition those premises, could at all be deemed to be available for exercise by him. It was contended that this was a condition precedent for the exercise of power and that the court could go into that question, that is, determine whether or not that condition was complied with in order to be able to further determine whether or not the power was at all validly exercised. Confining our attention to the judgment delivered by Chief Justice Kania, it is sufficient to point out that the learned Chief Justice came to the conclusion that, to the extent that the Provincial Government had to form an opinion that it was necessary or expedient to requisition any property, it was a subjectively determinable fact, but to the extent that it had to be for a public purpose, the requirement of statute could be resolved by appeal to external elements and this was not a subjectively determinable fact but an objective one. The learned Chief Justice further remarked at p. 227 :

"... If the Government erroneously decides that fact it is open to question in a Court of law in a regular suit, just as its action, on its decision on the facts mentioned in the proviso to S. 3 and in S. 4, is open to question in a similar way." And Fazl Ali J. in the same strain on page 228 observed :

"... The existence of a public purpose is the foundation of the power (or jurisdiction, if that term may appropriately be used with reference to an executive body) of the Provincial Government to requisition premises under S. 3, or, as it is sometimes said, it is a condition precedent to the exercise of that power."

In the case of State of Bombay v. Laxmidas, AIR (1952) Bom. 468, learned Chief Justice Mr. Chagla interpreted the principle of this decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court of India in Khushaldas' case (AIR (1950) S.C. 222) in relation to the power of the courts to issue prerogative writs as being confined to the pre-Constitution situation when the High Courts had no power to issue a writ against the Government. In his words (at p. 473) :

"In order to appreciate this observation of the learned Chief Justice, we must bear in mind that at the date when these observations were made the High Court had no power to issue a writ of mandamus against Government. Therefore, all that the learned Chief Justice was emphasising, with respect, was that public purpose was an objective fact to be administratively determined, that the decision of Government was not binding, and that decision could be challenged in a Court of law. At that date it could only be challenged by a suit and naturally, therefore, the learned Chief Justice could only refer to the particular remedy which was open to the subject. We refuse to look upon this observation as even a comment of the learned Chief Justice that in a case like this, a writ of mandamus would not be issued by the High Court if the High Court had the power to issue such a writ."

The moral of the foregoing analysis of the state of case law bearing on the question of the scope of the writ of certiorari in regard to the powers of superior courts to interfere with orders of inferior tribunals, where they have assumed jurisdiction without complying with, by means of a proper determination, a condition precedent laid down by statute for the due exercise of their own power, might be summed up as follows:

Where a subordinate tribunal has an absolute and unqualified power to determine the existence of 'subjective condition' requisite for it to enter upon the exercise of its power or jurisdiction to act in a particular matter, its determinations in the exercise of the authority thus conferred are sacrosanct and are not amenable to be corrected or interfered with by a superior court in the exercise of its writ jurisdiction.

"But when", to quote from the observations of Justice Mr. Chagla in the Bombay case (AIR (1952) Bom. 468 at p. 472) referred to above, "the existence of an objective fact is laid down as a condition precedent to the exercise of power, there is no question whatever of the exercise of any discretion by the authority which has got to be satisfied about the existence of that objective fact before the power is exercised. It may be, and very often it is so, that the objective fact has to be determined by a mental process. It may be that the determination of the objective fact may require not only a decision on questions of fact but even a decision on questions of law. But all the same the determination by the authority is not made final and is not made binding upon the Court. The objective fact must exist as a fact and it does not help the authority at all that it has determined that the fact exists. Its determination is entirely irrelevant because the condition precedent is made justiciable and the Court of law is entitled to go behind the determination of the authority as to that fact and come to its own conclusion whether the fact exists or not."

In the case of Shantaram D. Salvi v. M. M. Chudasama and others, AIR (1954) Bombay 361, the holding of a departmental inquiry was construed as a condition precedent for the exercise of the power of Commissioner of Police to dismiss a subordinate police officer, and this condition precedent not having been fulfilled, the exercise of pretended power was denounced as constituting an "error apparent on the face of the record". This principle is well known and was stated in R. v. Shoreditch Assessment Committee, (1910) 2 K.B. 859 by Farwell L.J. when he said that a tribunal of a limited jurisdiction cannot give jurisdiction to itself by its own decision as to jurisdictional facts: with respect to these sets of facts, it is the regular courts of law that have a final say (at page 880). Not to accept this principle, would in effect tantamount to making a tribunal of limited jurisdiction virtually a judge of its own jurisdiction and therefore a tribunal of unlimited jurisdiction.

Nakhuda Ali
Jayarante.

In this context it would be appropriate to refer to the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Nakhuda Ali v. M.F. De S. Jayarante (1951) A.C. 67, where in an appeal from the Supreme Court of Ceylon the question before their Lordships was to determine the limits within which a superior court could interfere with the exercise of a discretion vested in a public functionary who was empowered to cancel a licence "provided he had reasonable grounds to believe that any dealer was unfit to be allowed to continue as a dealer." The Privy Council held that those words must be treated as imposing a condition, that there must in fact exist such reasonable grounds known to the Controller before he could validly exercise the power of cancelling such a licence. Lord Radcliff who delivered the judgment of the Privy Council, made the following general observations with regard to the scope of interference by means of the exercise of writ jurisdiction:

"It is probably true to say that the courts have been readier to issue the writ of certiorari to established bodies whose function is primarily judicial even in respect of acts that proximate to what is purely administrative than to ministers or officials whose function is primarily administrative even in respect of acts that have some analogy to the judicial. But the basis of the jurisdiction of the court by way of certiorari has been so exhaustively analysed in recent years that individual instances are only of importance as illustrating the one principle that is beyond dispute. That principle is most precisely stated in the words of Lord Justice Atkins as he then was in Rex v. Electricity Commissioners (1924) 1 K.B. 171."

Their Lordships of the Privy Council then considered the question whether in the Ceylon Regulation 62, wherein the expression "reasonable grounds" had been used warranted the inference that the Controller was required to act judicially when deciding to cancel the licence or was it that despite these words he was exercising merely his administrative functions. Their Lordships referred to the case of Liversidge v. Anderson (1942) A.C. 206, where it would be recalled the House of Lords had interpreted the expression, "If the

Certiorari and correction of erroneous determination of jurisdictional facts

Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe any person to be of hostile association or origin" Their Lordships of the Privy Council, however, did not adopt similar construction of the words in Regulation 62 which they were called upon to interpret in Nakhuda Ali's case. The point of distinction which they emphasised was that the decision of the majority in the case of Liversidge v. Anderson, (1942) A.C. 206, was controlled by the context in which those words appeared. They observed :

"Indeed, it would be a very unfortunate thing if the decision of Liversidge's case came to be regarded as laying down any general rule as to the construction of such phrases when they appear in statutory enactments. It is an authority for the proposition that the words 'if AB has reasonable cause to believe', are capable of meaning 'if AB honestly thinks that he has reasonable cause to believe' and that in the context and surrounding circumstances of what after all was a Defence Regulation XVIII-B, they did in fact mean just that. But the elaborate consideration which the majority of the House gave to the context the circumstances before adopting that construction, itself shows that there is no general principle that such words are to be so understood; and the dissenting speech of Lord Atkin at least serves as a reminder of the many occasions when they have been treated as meaning 'if there is in fact reasonable cause for AB so to believe.'

"After all, words such as these are actually found when a Legislature or law-making authority confers powers on a minister or official. However read, they must be intended to serve in some sense as a condition limiting the exercise of an otherwise arbitrary power. But if the question whether the condition has been satisfied is to be conclusively decided by the man who wields the power, the value of the intended restraint is in effect nothing. No doubt he must not exercise the power in bad faith; but the field in which this kind of question arises is such that the reservation for the case of bad faith is hardly more than a formality. Their Lordships, therefore, treat the words in the Regulation 62, 'Where the Controller has reasonable grounds to believe that any dealer is unfit to be allowed to continue as a dealer' as imposing a condition that there must in fact exist such reasonable grounds, known to the Controller, before he can validly exercise the power of cancellation.

"But it does not seem to follow necessarily from this that the Controller must be acting judicially in exercising the power. Can one not act reasonably without acting judicially? It is not difficult to think of the circumstances in which the Controller might, in any ordinary sense of the words, have reasonable grounds of belief without having ever confronted the licence holder with the information which is the source of his belief. It is a long step in the argument to say that because a man is enjoined that he must not take action unless he has reasonable ground for believing some thing he can only arrive at that belief by a course of conduct analogous to the judicial process. And yet, unless that proposition is valid there is really no ground for holding that the Controller is acting judicially or quasi-judicially when he acts under this Regulation. If he is not under a duty so to act then it would not be according to law that his decision should be amenable to review and, if necessary, to avoidance by the procedure of certiorari."

How are we to interpret the ratio decidendi of the above case? Would it be wrong to say that the existence of reasonable ground to believe that a particular person was unfit to be allowed to be continued as a dealer, though a 'condition precedent' for the valid exercise of power is nevertheless a condition as to the existence or non-existence of which the public functionary is the sole judge—as if to say that it is not a justiciable condition. One detects inconsistency in the reasoning of their Lordships: if the 'reasonable grounds to believe' must exist before the power to cancel a licence can be exercised, would not the process of reaching that state of mind be analogous to a judicial approach to the discovery of a jurisdictional fact? If the legislature intended that the existence of 'reasonable grounds to believe' was to act as a check on the arbitrary exercise of power, did that device not also establish the existence of a legislative intent that the 'administrative discretion' conferred by the statute was to be exercised judicially? Supposing there was evidence to believe that the Controller, as a matter of fact, had no such 'reasonable grounds to believe' as were required by the enactment which gave him the power to cancel licence, would not his order have been amenable to review on the ground that there existed a defect of jurisdiction to assume the exercise of this power? Would not a mandamus have lain in such a case to command the Controller to act within the law before he could successfully deprive people of their rights to deal in a certain business or trade?

The above decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council however helps considerably in the comprehension of the scope of writ of certiorari stricto sensu. If the Rules relating to the English writ jurisdiction are at all to be a rigid guide, the principle of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council would, to a considerable extent, in parallel cases, dominate the interpretation of the scope of ART. 170 which confers writ jurisdiction upon the High Courts of this country, and would, it is submitted with respect, go a long way in delimiting it in several directions. But it cannot be forgotten that powers of our courts under ART. 22 as well as ART. 170 are not confined only to the writ of certiorari but they are available to "writs, including writs in the nature of writ of certiorari etc.", and what is more the courts can, in addition to the above power, issue orders and directions as well. The wisdom of the Constitution-makers in enlarging the scope of the powers of the courts exercising controlling jurisdiction, jurisdiction analogous to the English prerogative jurisdiction in the matter of issuing writs, can be appreciated if due regard is paid to the fact that essentially ART. 22 is designed to be an effective means for the enforcement of fundamental rights. Situations can be conceived when fundamental rights as guaranteed by Part II are abridged or taken away by either the Legislature or the executive, but the aggrieved individual would not be able to secure the enforcement of those rights by means of the conventional writs like habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, certiorari or quo warranto. It is on this account that the language of ART. 22 has been couched in fairly wide terms so that the Supreme Court may not feel handicapped in giving to an aggrieved person the relief which is his due if the English view, namely, the writs were available to it on the lines they were available to the King's Bench Division in England, were to prevail.

The procedure is to be a handmaid of justice and, in the matter of securing justice to the individual in regard to the violation of his fundamental rights, the Constitution advisedly has conferred enormous powers on the courts. If our polity is at all to be regarded as law-dominated, all manner of encroachments on the ordinary legal rights, as also the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution, should be capable of being enforced by appeal to constitutional remedies.

The only limit on the power of the High Court to make available appropriate relief under the provisions of ART. 170 is the consideration that the normal work of the ordinary subordinate civil and criminal courts that have been set-up in the country for the administration of civil and criminal justice, should not come to standstill. But in all cases where it is of the essence of the relief that it should be speedily made available and where the normal procedure would not adequately protect those rights, ART. 170 could be effectively used for the purposes of enabling the citizen or any other aggrieved person in the realm to obtain a vindication of his legal or constitutional rights.

Enough has been said to indicate why, so far as our Constitution is concerned, distinction between judicial and quasi judicial functions of inferior bodies or tribunals in several ways becomes an academic one: if there is a violation of law amounting to the invasion of people's rights, ordinary or fundamental, a violation which the court regards as being such as must be speedily annulled, the considerations of the nature and scope of the writ jurisdiction construed stricto sensu will not stand in the way of its giving adequate relief to any person applying to it under ART. 22 or 170 as the case may be. The remarks of Mukherjea J. in the case of T. C. Basappa v. T. Nagappa, reported in AIR (1954) S.C. 440 at p. 443, are opposite in this context:

"The language used in ARTs. 32 and 226 of our Constitution is very wide and the powers of the Supreme Court as well as of all the High Courts in India extend to issuing of orders, writs or directions including writs in the nature of 'habeas corpus', mandamus, quo-warranto, prohibition and certiorari', as may be considered necessary for enforcement of the fundamental rights and in the case of the High Courts, for any other purposes as well. In view of the express provisions in our Constitution we need not now look back to the early history or the procedural technicalities of these writs in English law, nor feel oppressed by any difference or change of opinion expressed in particular cases by English Judges. We can make an order or issue a writ in the nature of certiorari in all appropriate cases and in appropriate manner, so long as we keep to the broad and fundamental principles that regulate the exercise of jurisdiction in the matter of granting such writs in English Law."

It would be true to say about the scope of ART. 170, as was said of the scope of ART. 226 of the Indian Constitution by Mehrotra J. in the case of Registrar University of Allahabad v. Ishwari Prasad, AIR (1956) Allahabad, 603 at p. 606, that:

"ART. 226 of the Constitution is couched in very wide terms. It gives power to the Indian High Courts to interfere, under its supervisory jurisdiction, with the orders of inferior tribunals somewhat in the same manner as the Court of King's Bench in England. Whatever restrictions there are, they have been placed by the Courts themselves having regard to the fact that the Article gives a discretion to superior Courts which is to be exercised on well-known judicial principles."

The words of Justice Harlan uttered in Monongahela Bridge Co. v. United States (1910) 216 U.S. 177: 54 Law Ed. 435 appear to be applicable in terms to the power of our High Courts. The learned Judge there (at p. 195) said that,

"The Courts have rarely, if ever, felt themselves so restrained by technical rules that they could not find some remedy, consistent with the law, for acts, whether done by government or by individual persons, that violated natural justice or were hostile to the fundamental principles devised for the protection of the essential rights of property."

160. Grounds on which Certiorari would lie

Having considered the types of tribunals and authorities in respect of whose proceedings writ of certiorari will lie, it is now necessary to consider the grounds on which superior courts would interfere with the orders that are liable to correction by certiorari. Broadly speaking, these grounds are:

- (1) absence or excess of jurisdiction,
- (2) breach of the rules of natural justice committed by the tribunal during the course of the proceedings, and
- (3) an error of law apparent on the face of the record.

Before we consider the nature of these grounds and determine the limits within which they are available for commencing certiorari writ-proceedings, it is necessary to remember that the only result that can ensue upon a successful petition for a writ of certiorari is that the order in question would be quashed, or as the phrase goes, "put out of the way". But the superior court has no power to substitute its own decision upon the facts or law concerned in that case. (See Rex v. Northumberland Tribunal (1952), 1 All E.R. 122). Thus, as it has been observed by textbook writers, certiorari remains, and cannot be anything more than a method of review and is on that account to be distinguished from the remedy by way of appeal. In an appeal there is a re-hearing on facts and law and the court of appeal is competent itself to pass an order which could have been passed by the court from where the appeal has been lodged. But in certiorari proceedings a superior court merely exercises its powers of judicial control of administrative tribunals that have a duty cast upon them to act judicially. (For a full discussion of this topic, please see Grief and Street's Principles of Administrative Law, 1952 edition, page 161 onwards).

The next thing to remember is that in England at least it is not yet settled whether writ of certiorari would lie as a matter of course as though it were a writ of right or is it a matter which is within the discretion of the court. There are conflicting decisions in England upon this point. In the case of Rex v. Manchester & Leads Railway, (1838) 7 L.J. (Q.B.) 192; 8 Ad. & El. page 413, (the court presided over by Lord Denman, Lord Chief Justice) it was held that the issue of certiorari was a matter of discretion even though there may be fatal defects on the face of the proceedings that are sought to be brought up. Similarly, in the case of Rex v. Commissioner of Income-tax for the City of London, (1904) 91 L.T. page 94, the court did not allow certiorari to issue as all that could be pointed out was a "small mistake" that had been made by the inferior tribunal. But the court nevertheless observed that if the Commissioners had stepped outside the jurisdiction accorded to them by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1890 it would have quashed the decision. In an earlier case, however, (Arther v. Commissioner of Sewers (1784), Et Mod. 331) three of the four Judges held the issue of writ to be a matter of right, whereas the fourth one held that it was not, and that it could be denied upon consideration of the circumstances of the case in the discretion of the court. (Referred to, in R. v. Justices of Surrey, 1870, L.R. 5 Q.B. 466 at 473).

Thus if a person who is not substantially aggrieved by an order cannot be allowed to bring up the order of subordinate tribunal for being quashed in certiorari proceedings or, similarly, if a person has suppressed facts (see Rex v. The General Income-tax Commissioners, Kensington, (1917) 1 K.B. 486 and Indumati Devi v. Bengal Court of Wards 42 C.W.N. 230: AIR (1938) Calcutta 385; Ratan Chandra v. Adhar Biswas, AIR (1952) Calcutta 72 etc.) or injustice and inequity appears to a person who has not fully disclosed to the court his interest in the matter, the court would be entitled to say that it would not exercise its jurisdiction. Cockburn, Chief Justice, in the case of Foster v. Foster & Berridge (1863), 32 L.J. (Q.B.) 312, 4 B. & S. 187 at page 199 observed:

"I entirely concur in the proposition that although the court will listen to a person who is stranger, and who interferes to point out that some other court has exceeded its jurisdiction, whereby some wrong or public grievance has been sustained, yet that is not ex debito justitiae a matter upon which the court may properly exercise its discretion as distinguished from the case of a party aggrieved who is entitled to relief ex debito justitiae, if he suffers from the usurpation of jurisdiction by another court."

As to the conduct of the person applying for certiorari being taken into account by the High Court for the purpose of its exercising discretionary jurisdiction see Rex v. South Holland Drainage Committee, (1938) 8 L.J. (Q.B.) 64; 8 Ad. & El. 429, as also Rex v. Sheward, (1880) 9 Q.B.D. 741: 49 L.J. (Q.B.) 716 (C.A.). It has been authoritatively laid down in Rex. v. Kensington Incometax Commissioners ex parte Princess Edmund de Polignac, (1917) 1 K.B. 486 that the rule of the Court requiring uberrima fides on the part of the petitioner for an ex parte injunction applies equally to the case of an application for a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition and that where there has been a suppression of material facts, the court would refuse the writ without going into the merits of the case.

In England, the writ of certiorari is granted as of course when motion is made by Attorney-General on behalf of Crown, R. v. Eaton (1787) 2 Term Rep. 89.

The true distinction between expression 'as of course' and 'ex debito justitiae' has been explained by D.C.M. Yardley, as follows:

"The former probably means that the writ would issue in a given set of circumstances, the applicant being entitled to assume that the writ would issue unless some facts rebutting his right should appear. The latter expression, on the other hand, probably implies that the Court would make a positive effort to look for any such rebutting circumstances in the absence of which the applicant would be entitled to assume that the writ would issue."

(See Modern Law Review for 1955, p. 338 at 390, as also the case of R. v. The Justices of Surrey, (1870) L.R. 5 Q.B. 466).

Defect of Jurisdiction.

This ground hardly needs any elaborate discussion: if a tribunal acts in the total absence of jurisdiction or, having jurisdiction to decide a question, exceeds its jurisdiction in deciding a matter which is beyond its statutory competence, certiorari would lie. (See Bank of Australasia v. Willan, (1873) L.R. 5 P.C. 417; Rex v. Woodhouse (1906) 2 K.B. 501).

As has been indicated earlier, if a tribunal assumes jurisdiction after the determination of a question of a fact (that is, of what in America is called jurisdictional fact) the existence of which by the statute has been made a condition precedent for the exercise of its jurisdiction, the superior court would review the finding of the fact in an attempt to see whether jurisdiction has been properly acquired by the tribunal. (See (a) White & Collins v. Minister of Health, (1949) 2 K.B. 838, (b) Queen v. Justice of Surrey, (1870) 5 Q.B. 466 and (c) Rex v. Nat Bell Liquors Ltd., (1922) 2 A.C. 128). The principal object of certiorari is to confine statutory tribunals to the sphere of their allotted jurisdiction.

The defect of jurisdiction may arise from plurality of causes: (a) it may have reference to the nature of the subject matter, or (b) it may arise from considerations such as the time within which such a proceeding should have begun (see Reg. v. Wimbledon, (1953) 1 All E.R. 390) or (c) it may arise upon a mistaken view of the legal provisions upon which the existence of the jurisdiction to exercise power is itself contingent (See Reg. v. Brighton, (1954) 2 W.L.R. 441). As to the question how far the superior court would be entitled to treat total absence of evidence before the inferior tribunal as a defect of jurisdiction, the student would do well to read the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of the King v Nat Bell Liquors Ltd., referred to earlier, where a detailed analysis of the English and Canadian Authorities has been presented with the usual cogency and clarity which distinguish its judgment: references have been made to cases like Reg. v. Boulton, (1841) 1 Q.B. 66, Colonial Bank of Australasia v. Willan, (1873) L.R. 5 P.C. 417 etc. See also AIR (1955) S.C. p. 154, Dhaneshwari Cotton Mills v. Commissioner of Income-Tax, West Bengal). In all these cases the superior court exercising certiorari writ-jurisdiction is competent to quash orders passed by the inferior tribunal, and where it fails to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law it could be commanded by a mandamus to move forward in the exercise of the jurisdiction that it has declined to exercise.

It may even be that a jurisdiction validly assumed may have been afterwards lost as a result of some supervening factors. (See Ex-parte Bradlaugh, (1878) 3 Q.B.D. 509; The King v. Williams (1914) 1 K.B. 608; and Rex v. Hammersmith Profiteering Committee, (1920) 89 L.J. (K.B.) 604. As to the competence of the superior courts to enquire into the correctness of a finding of fact as to the existence of a condition precedent for the exercise of jurisdiction, see Re Bailey, (1854) 3 E & B 607).

The Supreme Court of India in the case of Ebrahim Aboobakr v. Custodian General of Evacuee Property, AIR (1952) S.C. 319 at p. 322 pointed out that :

"Want of jurisdiction may arise from the nature of the subject-matter, so that the inferior court might not have authority to enter on the inquiry or upon some part of it. It may also arise from the absence of some essential preliminary or upon the existence of some particular facts collateral to the actual matter which the Court has to try and which are conditions precedent to the assumption of jurisdiction by it." The court distinguished this class of cases from the class where a tribunal, having validly entered upon inquiry to dispose of certain questions, proceeds to exercise it, but in the course of its exercise makes mistakes and reaches incorrect decisions. The latter class of decisions cannot be denounced as being those that have been reached by the tribunal suffering from a defect of jurisdiction. But, even in respect of the former class of cases, it is wise to keep in view the observations of Lord Esher M. R. in the case of Reg. v. Income-Tax Commissioners, (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 313 at 319, namely,—

"When an inferior court or tribunal or body which has to exercise the power of deciding facts, is first established by Act of Parliament, the legislature has to consider what powers it will give that tribunal or body. It may in effect say that, if a certain state of facts exists and is shown to such tribunal or body before it proceeds to do certain things, it shall have jurisdiction to do such things but not otherwise. There it is not for them conclusively to decide whether that state of facts exists, and, if they exercise the jurisdiction without its existence, what they do may be questioned, and it will be held that they have acted without jurisdiction.

"But there is another state of things which may exist. The legislature may entrust the tribunal or body with a jurisdiction which includes the jurisdiction to determine whether the preliminary state of facts exists, as well as the jurisdiction, on finding that it does exist, to proceed further or do something more. When the legislature are establishing such a tribunal or body with limited jurisdiction, they also have to consider whatever jurisdiction they give them, whether there shall be any appeal from their decision, for otherwise there will be none. In the second of the two cases I have mentioned it is erroneous application of the formula to say that the tribunal cannot give themselves jurisdiction by wrongly deciding certain facts to exist, because the legislature gave them jurisdiction to determine all the facts, including the existence of the preliminary facts on which the further exercise of their jurisdiction depends'; and if they were given jurisdiction so to decide, without any appeal being given, there is no appeal from such exercise of their jurisdiction."

See further the case of Colonial Bank of Australasia v. Willan, (1873) L.R. 5 P.C. 417 at 442, where the Judicial Committee formulated the test of determining the absence of jurisdiction as follows :

"In order to determine the first it is necessary to have a clear apprehension of what is meant by the term 'want of jurisdiction'. There must, of course, be certain conditions on which the right of every tribunal of limited jurisdiction to exercise that jurisdiction depends. But those conditions may be founded either on the character and constitution of the tribunal, or upon the nature of the subject-matter of the inquiry, or upon certain proceedings which have been made essential preliminaries to the inquiry or upon facts or a fact to be adjudicated upon in the course of the inquiry. It is obvious that the conditions of the last differ materially from those of the three other classes. Objections founded on the personal incompetency of the Judge or on the nature of the subject-matter or on the absence of some essential preliminary, must obviously, in most cases depend upon matters which whether apparent on the face of the proceedings or brought before the superior court by affidavit, are extrinsic to the adjudication impeached. But an objection that the Judge has erroneously found a fact which though essential to the validity of his order, he was competent to try, assumes that, having general jurisdiction over the subject-matter he properly entered upon the inquiry, but miscarried in the course of it. The superior court cannot quash an adjudication upon such an objection without assuming the functions of the court of appeal and the power to re-try a question which the Judge was competent to decide."

The defect of jurisdiction may also arise from interest, or bias, that is, it might have reference to the defects in the very constitution of the tribunal. In the case of Frome United Breweries v. Bath Justices, (1926) A.C. 586, Viscount Cave L.C. held invalid a revocation of a licence by the authorities because some of the members of the Tribunal had aided the prosecution.

"If there is one principle", said his Lordship, "which forms the integral part of English Law it is that every member of a body engaged in judicial proceedings must be able to act judicially; and it has been held over and over again that, if a member of such a body is subject to a bias (whether financial or other) in favour of or against either party to a dispute, or he is in such a position that a Bias must be assumed, he ought not to take part in the decision or even sit upon the Tribunal. This rule has been asserted not only in the case of the Courts of Justice and other judicial tribunals but in the case of authorities which though in no case could be called Courts, have to act as Judges of the rights of others. From the above rule it necessarily follows that a member of such a body as I have described cannot be both a party and a judge in the same dispute and that if he has made himself a party he cannot sit or act as a judge and if he does so, the decision of the whole body would be vitiated."

It is a well known maxim of law that Nemo debet esse Judex in propria causa (no one can be a judge in his own cause), and if it can be shown that a person taking part in the decision of a judicial or quasi-judicial tribunal has a direct interest in the subject-matter of adjudication the decision being a nullity, certiorari will lie.

This is, however, not an inflexible rule and it is by now well settled that mere departmental or administrative bias in the case of a quasi-judicial tribunals will not vitiate their orders. The rigour of Rule against bias thus varies not only according to the type of tribunal set up to decide the case but also in relation to other circumstances of the case. The rule is applied strictly to regular courts of law (see Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Water, (1852) 3 H.L. Cas. 759; Regina v. Rand, (1866) L.R. 1 Q.B. 230; The Queen v. Huggins, (1895) 1 Q.B. p. 563. See also Rex v. London Justices ex parte South Metropolitan Gas Company, (1908) 72 J.P. 137; 98 L.T. p. 519; and Rex v. Farrant, (1887) 20 Q.B.D. 58).

It is difficult to discover the elements of distinction that characterise the attitude of superior courts when they are invited to consider the force and effect of challenges directed against determinations by biased inferior court Judges on the one hand, and biased presiding officers of the administrative Tribunals charged with duties of acting judicially, on the other.

In America a curious doctrine has been developed to the effect that where an administrative Tribunal has to decide controversial facts as opposed to controversial questions of law and there is no appeal provided from its determination, bias is a good ground for setting aside its decisions. In Re Segal and Smith (1937) 5 F.C.C. 3, the Court said :

"If this case were one in which the facts were not in controversy and in which the Court were not required to exercise any discretion, but only the application of the principles of law to an admitted state of facts invoked, the rights of the respondents might be adequately safeguarded by a statutory right of appeal from the decision of the Commission. This case, however, involved facts which were in dispute and the respondents were entitled to an impartial and unbiased trial of those facts. Furthermore the case involved in the exercise of discretion in the possible imposition of penalty at the conclusion of the proceedings in other words, even if the facts in this case had been conceded and if the only question before the Commission had been that of degree of punishment the respondents would have been entitled under our form of government and the law of land, to have that punishment fixed by a Tribunal, none of the members of which was actuated by personal prejudices, bias or malice."

It is submitted, with respect, that the above decision cannot be regarded as being based on any sound principle: the distinction between "controversial" questions of facts and law, and questions involving exercise of discretion by a tribunal appears to be completely irrelevant to the determination of the issue relating to bias that is raised before Superior Courts. It is possible, however, to look at this problem from another perspective: where the bias alleged is inherent in the very office created by the statute no exception can be taken to it. The Sea Customs Act, for example, makes the Collector of Customs, who is administratively interested in the collection of Revenue for the Government, as the adjudicating officer for disposing of cases relating to the commission of offences under the Sea Customs Act. It cannot be contended that such an officer, because he is suffering from administrative bias, is incapable of adjudging offences and imposing penalties—and it would be a sufficient answer to the challenge to say that Legislature itself has created the Tribunal with full knowledge of the existence of that type of bias and there is nothing that the Courts can do about it. The statute has itself created a biased body—and no one can be heard to complain against that situation. Of course, if there is some other ground of complaint, that is complaint unconnected with administrative bias, the matter would be governed by other principles. In the second place, a ground of challenge based on bias can be adequately met with by pleading the doctrine of ex-necessitate. A judge otherwise disqualified to decide a case in which he may be interested, may nevertheless be supposed to do so if his competence to decide it is exclusive and there is no legal method or procedure of having the case withdrawn from his control for being handed over to another judicial officer, as his substitute. See Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Co., (1852) 3 H.L. Cases 759. See also the Privy Council case from Canada, (1937) 2 D.L.R. 209, Judges v. Attorney-General of Saskeehnoan, where the decision in 1936, 4 D.L.R. 134 was upheld.

In the case of Anwar v. Crown, PLD (1955) Federal Court page 185, the concept of bias in relation to proceedings under the Criminal Procedure code was considered and conflicting opinions in regard to the character and effect in law of orders and judgments recorded by a biased judge were recorded: the majority view taken in that case was summed up by Chief Justice M. Munir as follows (pp. 210-211):

"(1) Every accused person has the right to a fair trial, namely, the right to be tried on the evidence by a judicially minded person.

(2) If the Judge is functioning under an influence brought about by his own act or by the act of another person, which has the effect of paralysing his judicial faculties, there is no fair trial.

(3) The fact that there was a paralysis of judicial faculties in a Judge cannot be proved by independent evidence but must appear from the manner in which he held the proceedings or arrived at his conclusions. Unless, therefore, it be shown that the proceedings held were not fair or impartial or that his conclusions were wrong, an allegation of paralysis of judicial faculties would be as much out of place as the allegation that the Judge was deaf when it appears from the record that he heard the evidence and prepared a true and faithful record of it.

(4) Bias in a Judge, is the paralysis, complete or partial, of judicial faculties and therefore the allegation of bias against a Judge would be wholly unfounded unless it be shown that the proceedings held by him were irregular and one-sided or the conclusions reached by him were wrong and reasons given in support thereof erroneous. In Khairdi Khan's case there being no finding that the judgment of Mr. Ahmad Khan who held the second trial was wrong, it could not be held that he was a biased Judge. This Court's judgment in that case was restricted to showing that Mr. Ahmad Khan's findings were in conformity with the observations of Mr. Justice Kayani in the order of retrial, and the judgments of the learned Chief Justice and of Shahabuddin and Cornelius, JJ., expressly proceeded on the assumption that Mr. Ahmad Khan was influenced in his decision by the order of retrial and not on the finding that his judgment was in fact wrong. The learned Judges did make some observations to the effect that the view of evidence taken by Mr. Inayatullah Khan was not unreasonable but this cannot be said to amount to a finding that the judgment of Mr. Ahmad Khan which had been affirmed by a Division Bench of the High Court was wrong on the evidence adduced at the retrial. In the absence of any such findings no bias could have been attributed to Mr. Ahmad Khan.

(5) Bias in judicial matters may be caused by the judgment, order or observations of a superior Court or it may spring from personal, political, religious, communal, racial commercial or economic considerations. But whatever may be the cause of it, it can never be held to be proved in the case of a Judge whose judgment is right because the fact that his decision was correct is a complete refutation of the allegation that his judicial faculties were paralysed. A biased Judge producing a correct result is a contradiction in terms.

(6) The conclusions stated above must be read subject to one important exception, and that is that there is a species of bias which vitiates judicial proceedings irrespective of the correctness or otherwise of the result, but that is not because bias, whatever form it may assume, avoids the result of judicial proceedings, but because the Judge with that kind of bias is, on grounds of public policy, disqualified to be a Judge. Thus no Judge can be a Judge in his own cause, or in a case in which he is personally interested not because his decision must invariably be in his own favour but on the principle that justice must not only be done but seem to be done, and however right the Judge deciding a cause in his own favour may be, neither the public nor the aggrieved party will be satisfied with the adjudication, and its result will be vacated by the Court of Appeal at the instance of the dissatisfied party. Instances of such bias are recognised in our law in section 556 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and will also be found in Dimes v. The Grand Junction Canal (No. 1) and others (1852, 3 H. L. Cas. 759) and Rex v. Sussex Justices (1924, I. K. B. 256)."

The minority view advanced by Cornelius, J. was that the Courts have consistently declined to take a measure of bias or to trace its effects in the proceedings or the decision. The learned judge cited with approval the following extract from the judgment in the case of Berger v. U.S.A. 65, (1921) Law Ed. 481 at p. 486.

"To commit to the judge a decision upon the truth of the facts gives chance for the evil against which the section (i.e. S. 21 of the Judicial Code) is directed. The remedy by appeal is inadequate. It comes after the trial, and if prejudice exists, it has worked its evil, and a judgment of it in a reviewing tribunal is precarious. It goes there fortified by presumptions, and nothing can be more elusive of estimate or decision than a disposition of a mind in which there is a personal ingredient."

It was assumed both by the authors of majority and minority judgment in this case that the Sessions Judge, merely by reason of the fact that a retrial had been ordered by the High Court in the exercise of its power of appeal or revision after giving an expression of opinion that the prisoner was guilty, became a 'biased judge'. It is submitted with respect, that in the situation presented by the facts of that case, or a case analogous to it, the question of bias in the Sessions Judge does not at all arise. The Superior Court offers its opinion during the course of doing its duty under law and the 'Sessions' Judge does not become and cannot be regarded as being a biased judge merely on that score. It is obvious, however, that once a judge is shown to be 'biased', in the proper legal sense of that term, his judgment is a nullity, and the further requirement of showing his judgment to be wrong on merits of the case seems to be unnecessary—for if the judgment is wrong on merits, it will anyhow be set aside, 'bias' or 'no bias'.

Some text-book writers and decided cases lay down, that the requirement as to the absence of bias flows from the overall duty of the judicial tribunals to follow the rules of natural justice. This view is based upon the somewhat controversial position in law that 'bias' does not make the determination of the tribunal necessarily void but only voidable—so that there could be a waiver by the party with respect to it. The better view, however, is to regard 'bias' as a matter affecting jurisdiction and rendering the determination void.

The right to object to the competence of a person to adjudicate on the ground of bias may be lost by waiver. (See Rex v. Williams ex parte Philip, (1914) 1 K.B. 608). In this case, by S. 15 of the Bread Act, 1836, it was provided that no person concerned in the business of a baker could act as a Justice of the Peace under the Act. Despite this, a conviction under S. 4 of that Act had been recorded by Justices, one of whom it was alleged was a person concerned in the business of a baker. The objection was not taken at the hearing. The application was rejected because:

"A party by his conduct may preclude himself from claiming the writ ex debito justitiae, no matter whether the proceedings which he seeks to quash are void or voidable. If they are void, it is true no conduct of his would validate them, but such considerations do not affect the principles on which the court acts in granting or refusing the writ of certiorari. This special remedy would not be granted to a person who fails to state in his evidence on moving for the rule nisi at the time of the proceedings impugned he was unaware of the facts on which he relies to impugn them. By failing so to do a party aggrieved precludes himself from the right to have the writ ex debito justitiae and reduces his position to that of one of the public having no particular interest in the matter. To such a one the granting of writ is discretionary."

Strictly, from the point of view of principle, it is hard to understand why the failure to raise objection, until after the hearing, be regarded as precluding the party from raising it subsequently. If the decision rendered by a Judge, who is disqualified from judging the cause because of bias, is a nullity and void, as has been ruled in cases like Regina v. Hertfordshire Justices, (1845) 6 Q.B. 753; Regina v. Rand, (1866) L.R. 1 Q.B. 230, how can failure by a person, who is aware of the facts, to raise objection could be deemed to render valid a result which anyhow is void. If the objection on the ground of bias is based on the view that the case be not heard by unbiased Judges, the failure to raise objection is not at all relevant to the determination of that issue. Probably, what is suggested by Channell J., in the foregoing extract which is taken from his judgment, is the effect of another principle viz., that the grant of relief, by way of a writ of certiorari, being a matter solely within the discretion of court, failure to raise the objection could be taken as one of the factors to be considered by the Superior Court for the purpose of determining whether or not discretion to issue the writ in favour of the petitioner be exercised. Obviously, relief by way of a regular suit, cannot be denied to a person who became unsuccessful before the High Court in such a case.

The expression 'excess of jurisdiction' should be reserved for cases where a tribunal, having competently entered upon a permissible field of enquiry, transgresses its authority and trespasses into fields that are beyond its competence. If the problem posed by such a situation be viewed from the standpoint of the result reached, the extent to which it has clutched at a jurisdiction to dispose of a subject-matter, not within its competence, could with justification be described, with reference to the part of determination which is beyond its jurisdiction, as being the result of the tribunal having acted in excess of its jurisdiction. It should be remembered that where a composite determination by a tribunal is shown to be in part valid, and in part not, the entirety of it would be quashed if the two are so inextricably blended that it is not possible to rescue one from the grip of the other. As would be appreciated, this would be the result of the application of the principle of non-severability discussed in another part of this book.

In the case of Dalchand Chittar Mal v. Commissioner, Food and Civil Supplies, Lucknow, AIR (1952) Allahabad 61, the Commissioner was competent to cancel the licence of a dealer, and to that extent it could be said that when he set out to exercise his power to cancel the licence he was really acting within the scope of his authority; but, nevertheless, the High Court of Allahabad quashed his order, because despite the requirement of the law to give reasons for cancelling a licence, the Commissioner had failed to give any reasons whatever. If he had given reasons, the court would hardly have concerned itself with the sufficiency of those reasons—but on finding that he had not given any reason, the High Court quashed the order. Now, was this excess of jurisdiction, or was this an error apparent on the face of the record, or was it an arbitrary exercise of power because, having acted contrary to the statutory mandate to furnish reasons, the Commissioner, in effect, acts in the exercise of his professed power arbitrarily and fails to observe the law in the course of the exercise of his authority to cancel licence—or again, is it a case of 'defect of jurisdiction' upon the view that the law had empowered him to cancel the licence only upon assigning reasons, and this condition not having been complied with by the Commissioner, he was really acting out-side the scope of his authority. How the situation in particular would be viewed would depend upon the approach to the "problem of jurisdiction" by the court—but the present author is not aware of any clear and comprehensive attempt made by any court or a text-book writer where any sharp and well-defined distinction between these modes of regarding the problem may have been drawn. It is difficult to draw, in several cases, the boundary-line between "absence" or "excess" of jurisdiction, or "violation of the principles of natural justice" or "the making of error in the course of the exercise of jurisdiction which is apparent from the face of the record." Even the Judges of the Allahabad High Court, in the case cited above, do not deal with this aspect of the problem.

Abuse of jurisdiction is indicated where, as a result of the exercise by the superior court of its power of control of inferior tribunals, it appears to it that the tribunal, in the course of the exercise of its jurisdiction, has acted arbitrarily. Upon analysis it would be discovered that wherever the tribunal acts (a) in daring disregard of the well known forms of procedure, or (b) with a mischievous intention as might be well reflected in its pursuit of purposes that are extraneous to the statute under which it professes to act, or (c) acts mala fide, or (d) gravely abuses the discretion given to it by law to do certain things—a case of abuse of jurisdiction would be the result. This is another way of saying that the tribunal must not only act within the law but act in good faith. If the impugned order is, in fact, not made in the exercise of the power conferred by or under the Act, or is made for a collateral purpose and is not passed bona fide, it would be struck down on the general ground that it is not an order under the Act and is therefore a nullity. As Lord Reading said in the case of Rex. v. Brixton Prison (Governor) Ex parte Sarno, (1916) 2 K.B. 742:

"If we were of the opinion that the powers were being misused, we should be able to deal with the matter. In other words, if it was clear that an act was done by the executive with the intention of misusing those powers, this court would have the jurisdiction to deal with the matter."

In such cases, English courts have viewed the abuse of jurisdiction as one of the forms of "excess of jurisdiction". As Lord Macnaughten [after referring to the remarks of Collins L. J. in the case of Southwark and Vauxhall Water Co. and Wandsworth District Board of Works, (1898) 2 Ch. 603] remarked in the Privy Council case reported in (1902) A.C. p. 213 (Mayor and Councillors of East Fremantle Corp. vs. Annois).—

"In a word the only question is, Has the power been exceeded? Abuse is only one form of excess . . ."

Similarly, it has been observed that "if the Legislature has given powers and those powers are being used for the purpose of carrying out the works authorised, and it is admitted that the mode in which they are being used is unreasonable, that is an abuse of power so given and is therefore ultra vires." (This remark is quoted by Farewell, L. J. in Roberts v. Charring Cross, Enston and Hampstead Ry. Co., (1903) 87 L.T. 732 at 734. (See further (a) Kewalram v. Collector of Madras, AIR (1944) Madras 285; (b) Prabhakar Kesheo Tare & others v. Emperor, AIR (1943) Nagpur 26 (remarks of Bose J. on the doctrine of Fraud on Power. This was a case of an application under S. 491 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. See also Jitendra Nath Ghosh v. Chief Secretary to the Bengal Government, AIR (1932) Calcutta 753.)

Similarly, certiorari may be granted in cases where it appears that there has been collusion, corruption or fraud. (See Rex v. Gillyard, (1848) 12 Q.B. 527, as also R. v. Recorder of Leicester, Ex parte Wood, (1947) 1 All E.R. 928). These cases would come under 'abuse of jurisdiction' which is the same thing as 'defect of jurisdiction' at least for the purpose of 'certiorari'.

(b) Ground of Failure to comply with principles of Natural Justice.

Arlidge's case.

In considering whether the proceedings of an inferior tribunal, in respect of which certiorari would lie, should be quashed, the principal question that arises is, whether principles of natural justice in the determination of the causes before it have been followed. Here, the superior court is not concerned so much with notions of abstract justice as to see that certain well known forms of 'Judicial' as distinguished from 'Court' procedure are followed by lower tribunals. As pointed out in the case of Rex v. Brighton Rent Tribunal, (1950) 2 K.B. 410: (1950) 1 All. E.R. 946 by Lord Goddard C. J., it is not necessary that the proceedings must be conducted in accordance with the procedure known to ordinary courts of law: if the Act itself prescribes the procedure which a tribunal is required to follow, it would be enough if those formalities prescribed by the Act are observed. The leading case on this subject, in England, is that of Local Government Board v. Arlide: (1915) A.C. 120. In this case there were three contentions put forward on behalf of Arlide before the Divisional Court where a prayer for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash the impugned order was made. They were:

- (1) That he was not informed about the composition of the Board which heard the appeal.
- (2) That he had not been allowed to present his case by means of an oral argument (and that the opportunity to make a representation in writing of which he took no advantage was argued on his behalf to be no adequate substitute for the right of audience), and
- (3) That the Inspector's report which was an important document in the enquiry was not shown to him.

The Divisional Court held (1913, 1 K.B. 463) that there was nothing wrong with the procedure adopted by the Board, but the Court of Appeal by a majority reversed the decision (See (1914) 1 K.B. 160—(Court of Appeal). Hamilton L.J., who dissented held that natural justice was an expression sadly lacking in precision and took the view that Arlide had not made out any case to the effect that principles of natural justice had not been followed in his case. His views were supported by all the four members of the House of Lords and the decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed. (see 1915, A.C. p. 120).

Lord Shaw in his speech in the House of Lords in Arlide's case attributed to the term 'natural justice' a 'vanishing and shadowy texture'.

"The words 'natural justice'", said he, "occur in arguments and sometimes in judicial pronouncements in such cases. When a central administrative board deals with an appeal from a local authority it must do its best to act justly, and to reach just ends by just means. If a statute prescribes the means it must employ them. If it is left without express guidance, it must still act honestly and by honest means. In regard to these, certain ways and methods of judicial procedure may very likely be imitated; and lawyer-like methods may find especial favour from lawyers. But that the judiciary should presume to impose its own methods on administrative or executive officers is a usurpation, and the assumption that the methods of natural justice are ex necessitate those of courts of justice is wholly unfounded. This is expressly applicable to steps of procedure or forms of pleading. In so far as the term 'natural justice' means that a result or process should be just, it is harmless though it may be a high-sounding expression; in so far as it attempts to reflect the old jus naturale it is a confused and unwarranted transfer into the ethical sphere of a term employed for other distinctions; and, in so far as it is resorted to for other purposes, it is vacuous."

The speeches of their Lordships in the above case present a dismal picture of the creeping paralysis that has overtaken the doctrine of natural justice in England.

It is not possible to offer any realistic appraisal of the effect of the decision of the House of Lords for the very simple reason that the term 'natural justice' has been used with varying degrees of emphasis, and, in fact, there is no unanimity discernible in the several speeches delivered in the case in regard to the limits within which it could be now said that this doctrine of natural justice applies to certiorari proceedings in England. Doctrine of 'natural justice' in England, like the fickle-minded Dame, the English weather, seems to be dominated by some imponderable element; its limits have been perpetually shifting and its application seems to vary not so much with the much maligned foot of Chancellor as with the inclemencies of economico-political climate that comes to surround its existence from time to time. The following statement may however, be regarded as representing the best that can be said of the doctrine of natural justice in England.

"Whether the standard be 'natural justice' or 'substantial justice'", remarks a recent writer, "or what is reasonable and fair, matters very little, so long as the courts are watchful that individual rights are not trampled upon by the unfettered and arbitrary exercise of powers, and that a man should not be deprived of his livelihood without recourse to a proceeding before an independent tribunal bearing some recognisable resemblance to the proceedings of the ordinary courts." (See Natural Justice in English Law by G. W. Keeton in Current Legal Problem 1955 at page 24; see also Wide H. W. R. on 'Twilight of Natural Justice' 1951, 67 L.Q.R. 103).

Whatever may be the scope of the doctrine relating to the exercise of judicial and quasi-judicial functions "in accordance with the principles of natural justice", one thing atleast stands out conspicuously and which for all practical purposes is a matter beyond dispute—namely, that it is the irreducible minimum requirement of the principles of natural justice that a party be heard before any order to his prejudice could be passed.

"The distinguishing feature of the judicial power", said Bentham, "is that an interested party must come to the Judge, require him to determine the matter of controversy, and the party to whom the order of the Judge may prove detrimental must have a right of audience. Both sides should be heard and no one side should be heard in the absence of the other."

Constitutional Remedies

(See Balmokand v. Parmanand, AIR (1951) Punjab 401; Ravi Pratab Narain Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR (1952) Allahabad 99; Cooper v. The Board of Works for the Wandsworth District, (1863) 14 C.B. (NS) 180).

Similarly, Lord Haldane in Local Government Board v. Arlidge, (1915) A.C. 120 at 133 laid down that the tribunal—“must deal with the question referred to them without bias and they must give to each of the parties the opportunity of adequately presenting the cases made. The decision must be come to in the spirit and with the sense of responsibility of a tribunal whose duty it is to mete out justice.” See also (a) in Rex v. Architects Registration Tribunal, (1945) 2 All E.R. 131, (b) Dhakeswari Cotton Mills Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income Tax, West Bengal, AIR (1955) S.C. 65; and (c) Sangram Singh v. Election Tribunal, Kotah, AIR (1955) S.C. 425.

In the case of Errington v. Minister of Health (1935) 1 K.B. 249, which was a case under the Housing Act of 1930, the local authority made a clearance order directing some houses to be demolished and this order was brought up in accordance with the provisions of law for confirmation before the Minister of Health. After the owners affected by the order had filed their objections, a public inquiry, which was required to be held, was held but it was resumed and continued in private. The court remarked:

“A quasi-judicial officer in the exercise of his powers must do it in accordance with the rules of natural justice, that is to say he must hear both sides and must not hear one side in the absence of the other.”

In that very case Lord Justice Maughan observed:

“I do not think it has been proved that the statements which were made to the Minister in fact affected the decision of the Minister or of his officials and certainly I have no reason to doubt that officials were acting in what they thought to be in public interest. On the other hand, it seems to me a matter of the highest possible importance that where a quasi-judicial function is being exercised, under such circumstances as it had to be exercised here with the result of depriving people of their property, especially if it is done without compensation, the person concerned should be satisfied that nothing unfair has been done in the matter and that ex parte statements have not been heard before the decision has been given any chance for the persons concerned to refute their statements. That seems to me a matter of the greatest possible public importance and if I am right in the view that I have expressed as to the functions of Minister being of a quasi-judicial character, I think it follows that in the special circumstances of this case as I understand them to be, the Court has no option but to quash the order as my brother has suggested.”

To the same effect are remarks of Sir George Jessel in the case of Russel v. Russel, (1880) 14 Ch. D. 471, where too it was observed that, the rule that no man should be condemned to consequences without having the opportunity of making his defence, are applicable not only to the strictly legal tribunals but to every tribunal or body of persons invested with authority to adjudicate upon matters involving grave consequences to individuals. Lord Parmour also observed in the case of Local Government Board v. Arlidge, (1915) A.C. 120:

“Whether the order of the local Government is to be regarded as of an administrative or of a quasi-judicial character appears to me not to be of much importance since if the order is one which affects the rights and property of the respondent, the respondent is entitled to have the matter determined in a judicial spirit in accordance with principles of substantial justice.”

Thus it is the requirement of the principles of ‘substantial justice’ that no order can be passed to the prejudice of another without that person being given an opportunity of Errington v.

Minister of Health.

Grounds on which Certiorari would lie

showing cause against the proposed order. And where it could be shown that this has not been done, certiorari would lie. (See R. v. Huntingdon Conforming Authority, (1929) 1 K.B. 698).

But where the statute that creates the tribunal and invests it with jurisdiction to deal with a situation in a certain prescribed procedural way evinces an intention on the part of legislature to give freedom to the tribunal in question to modulate its procedure in any way it likes, the argument based on failure to comply with the fundamental principles of natural justice acquires a new meaning altogether (see R. v. Brighton and Area Rent Tribunal, (1950) 1 All E.R. 946). If there is a violation of these procedural safeguards, the result arrived at by the tribunal could be attacked as being ultra vires, but the better view is to regard such procedural safeguards as have been enacted to be in the nature of a rough guide towards the ideal of conforming to the basic notions of adjudging matters according to principles of ‘natural justice’. These procedural safeguards do not supersede the well known rules of fair play which courts of law insist ought to be followed by tribunals having a duty cast upon them to act judicially. In the case of Indumari Devi v. Bengal Court of Wards, AIR (1938) Calcutta 385: ILR (1938) 1 Cal. 476, Panckridge J. issued a writ of certiorari on the ground that the Court of Wards in making an ex parte declaration under S. 6(b) of the Court of Wards Act, 1879, had not heard the petitioner:

“The obligation to give notice and to hear the party affected”, observed learned Judge, “was recognised in the case of a Board of Works in (1863) 14 C.B. (N.S.) 180 (Cooper v. The Board of Works for the Wandsworth District, (1863) 14 C.B. (N.S.) 180), which was followed in (1889) 24 Q.B.D. 712 (Hopkins v. Smethwick Local Board), Wills J. stating at page 714:

“In condemning a man to have his house pulled down, a judicial act is as much implied as in fining him £5; and as the Local Board is the only tribunal that can make such an order, its act must be a judicial act and the party to be affected should have a notice given him and there is no notice unless notice is given of time when and place at which the party may appear and shew cause”.

The learned Judge also relied on the following case in support of the same proposition (Lapointe v. L' Association de Bienfaisance et de Retraite de la Police de Montreal, (1906) A.C. 535). There was no statutory requirement as to notice before orders could be passed under S. 27 of the Court of Wards Act—but nevertheless the failure to hear the person aggrieved by the order was considered sufficient for the purpose of issuing the writ of certiorari on the view that the making of such an order constituted breach of natural justice and was outside or in excess of the jurisdiction conferred by the Act.

A decision reached as a consequence of steps taken in exercise of jurisdiction, without complying with the principles of natural justice, is no decision at all (General Medical Council v. Spackman (1943) A.C. 627 (1943) 2 All E.R. 337). (For a further discussion of the operation of the rule relating to ‘natural justice’ see Russell v. Duke of Norfolk, (1949) 1 All E.R. 109, which was however a case in which the remedy asked for was not certiorari but damages and declaration).

Certiorari also lies in the case of an apparent error, that is error appearing on the face of the record of inferior tribunals. Error need not be an error of law going to the root of jurisdiction of the tribunal but it is also true that mere formal or inconsequential errors will not afford a ground of relief in certiorari proceedings. In the case of Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad Ishaque and others, AIR (1955) S.C. 233, the question “What is error apparent on the face of the proceedings” came up for consideration. It was observed in that case that it is difficult to formulate a test by resort to which the error of law may be regarded as being apparent on the face of the record. One of the suggested tests was “that no error could be said to be apparent on the face of the record if it was not self-evident, and if it required an examination or argument to establish it". The Court, however, remarked at p. 244 :

"This test might afford a satisfactory basis for decision in the majority of cases. But there must be cases in which even this test might break down, because judicial opinions also differ, and an error that might be considered by one Judge as self-evident might not be so considered by another. The fact is that what is an error apparent on the face of the record cannot be defined precisely or exhaustively, there being an element of indefiniteness inherent in its very nature, and it must be left to be determined judicially on the facts of each case."

It is suggested, with respect, that here it is not the question so much of apparency of the error of law which is important as the question that it is indicated on the face of the record.

Rex versus Northumberland
Tribunal

In the case of Rex v. Northumberland Compensation Appeal Tribunal Ex parte Shaw, (1952) 1 All E.R. 122, the entire case-law bearing on this question in England was surveyed and the concept of error apparent on the face of the record was set-forth with remarkable forensic clarity by Denning L.J. Among other things Denning L.J. has pointed out what the meaning of the word 'record', appearing in the expression "error apparent on the face of the record", is. He has also distinguished the scope of this ground as a basis for superior courts' jurisdiction to issue writs of certiorari from the scope of appeal proceedings. "This control", says he (at p. 127),

"extends not only to seeing that the inferior tribunals keep within their jurisdiction, but also to seeing that they observe the law. The control is exercised by means of a power to quash any determination by the Tribunal which, on the face of it, offends against the law. The King's Bench does not substitute its own views for those of the Tribunal, as a Court of Appeal would do. It leaves it to the tribunal to hear the case again, and in a proper case may command it to do so."

This was a case in which under Regulation 10 the applicant had been awarded compensation for loss of employment as a clerk and the applicant appealed against the award of the tribunal on the ground that "the compensating authority had failed to take into account his service with District Council as required by the Regulation." On his appeal having been dismissed, the applicant moved the Divisional Court for an order of certiorari, to be precise "for the order of the tribunal being brought up before it and quashed on the ground that the decision was erroneous on its face." The contention was that in view of the admission made by the respondent Tribunal that their decision was erroneous, "an error of law was apparent on the face of the decision of the tribunal", and the order could be quashed. The principal contention by the respondent was that although there was an error of law such an error did not appear on the face of the record, and the court could not interfere by way of a writ of certiorari.

In the Court of first instance (see Rex v. Northumberland Compensation Appeal Tribunal Ex parte Shaw, (1951) 1 All E.R. 268), Lord Goddard dealt with the question relating to the extent of jurisdiction exercisable by King's Bench Division in certiorari by showing that the view of the law laid down in the case of Racecourse Betting Control Board v. Secretary of State for Air, (1944) 1 All E.R. 60, to which the learned Law Lord was himself a party, was reached in ignorance of the decisions of the cases in Walsall Overseers v. London and North Western Railway Co. (1878) 4 A.C. 30, and Rex v. Nat Bell Liquors Ltd., (1922) 2 A.C. 128. In that case Lord Greene, M.R. had observed :

"It was said that the jurisdiction to set aside the award of an arbitrator for error of law appearing on its face is one that exists at common law independently of the Arbitration Acts. It was also said that the jurisdiction is not confined to consensual arbitra-

tions, but extends to arbitrations under statutes. Both these propositions are unquestionably correct: see as to the former, Hodgkinson v. Fernie, (1857), 3 C.B.N.S. 189; 27 L.J.C.P. 66; 140 E.R. 712; 2 Digest 527, 1645, and as to the latter Re Jones and Carter, (1922) 2 Ch. 599; 91 L.J.Ch. 824; 127 L.T. 622; Digest Supp. The next and vital proposition is, however, one which, in my opinion cannot be supported either on principle or on authority. It was that the jurisdiction is not confined to the case of awards of arbitrators, but extends to the decisions of every form of inferior tribunal; and, accordingly, when the legislature establishes a special tribunal, whether or not it can be described as an arbitration tribunal, the court can set aside a decision given by it if an error of law appears on its face. This jurisdiction was said to exist quite independently of the old procedure by way of writ of error. No authority was quoted in support of this proposition and, in my opinion, it is wrong on principle. In the case of an inferior court, if it acts beyond its jurisdiction, the remedy is by certiorari. If, acting within its jurisdiction, it makes an error in law, the remedy is by appeal (if the decision is appealable), and that whether or not the error appears on the face of the decision. In the case of new tribunals set up under statute, no appeal will lie unless the right of appeal is conferred expressly or impliedly by statute, and accordingly where, as in the present case, no right of appeal is given, their decisions are not appealable."

The latter of the two cases mentioned, being the case decided by the Privy Council, was not technically binding upon the Court of Appeal; but the former case being the decision of the House of Lords, undoubtedly was binding on them and having regard to the principle of stare decisis laid down by the Court of Appeal itself in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co. Ltd. (1944) 2 All E.R. 293, that decision (in Race Course Betting Case) would be deemed as not binding.

In the case before the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench (1951, 1 All E.R. p. 268, at 277) his Lordship remarked:

"The tribunal has told us what they have taken into account, what they have disregarded, and the contentions which they accepted. They have told us their view of the law, and for the reasons which I gave at the beginning of my judgment this court is of opinion that the construction which they placed on this very complicated set of regulations was wrong".

His Lordship affirmed the jurisdiction to correct such an error and remarked (at p. 278) :

"I think that the decision to which we are now coming will be very beneficial because so many tribunals are now set up, all of whom, I am certain, desire to do their duty in the best possible way, but they are often given very difficult sets of regulations and statutes to construe. It must be for their benefit, and I have no doubt they will welcome it, that this court should be able to give them guidance".

In the Court of Appeal, after observing that writ of certiorari was available for correcting errors of law appearing on the face of the record, Denning, L.J. proceeded to answer the question "What, then, is 'record'? (See 1951, 1 All E.R. 122 at 130)

"It has been said to consist of all those documents which are kept by the tribunal for a permanent memorial and testimony of their proceedings: see Blackstone's Commentaries, Vol. III, p. 24. But it must be noted that, whenever there was any question as to what should, or should not, be included in the record of any tribunal, the Court of King's Bench used to determine it. It did it in this way. When the tribunal sent their record to the King's Bench in answer to the writ of certiorari, this return was examined, and, if it was defective or incomplete, it was quashed: see Apsley's case, (1671), Sty. 85; 82 E.R. 549; R.v. Levermore, (1700), 1 Salk. 146; 91 E.R. 135; 16 Digest 471, 3511; and Ashley's case (1697), 2 Salk. 479; 91 E.R. 412, 16. Digest 470, 3494. Alternatively, the tribunal might be ordered to complete it: Williams

v. Lord Bagot (1824), 4 Dow & Ry. K.B. 315; 2 L.J.O.S.K.B. 152; 16 Digest 436, 2999; and R.v. Warnford (1825), 5 Dow. & Ry. K.B. 489. It appears that the Court of King's Bench always insisted that the record should contain, or recite, the document or information which initiated the proceedings and thus gave the tribunal its jurisdiction and also the document which contained their adjudication. Thus in the old days the record sent up by the justices had, in the case of a conviction, to recite the information in its precise terms, and in the case of an order which had been decided by quarter sessions by way of appeal, the record had to set out the order appealed from: (See Anon, (1697), 2 Salk. 479; 91 E.R. 412; 33 Digest 390, 1011. The record had also to set out the adjudication, but it was never necessary to set out the reasons: See South Cadbury (Inhabitants) v. Braddon, Somerset (Inhabitans) (1710), 2 Salk. 607; 91 E.R. 515; 33 Digest 403, 1131; nor the evidence, save in the case of convictions. Following these cases, I think the record must contain at least the document which initiates the proceedings, the pleadings, if any, and the adjudication, but not the evidence, nor the reasons, unless the tribunal chooses to incorporate them. If the tribunal does state its reasons, and those reasons are wrong in law, certiorari lies to quash the decision."

The next question which was considered by Denning L. J., in the judgment was whether 'affidavit' evidence is admissible on an application for certiorari. On this question he observed as follows (at p. 131):—

"When certiorari is granted on the ground of want of jurisdiction, or bias, or fraud, affidavit evidence is not only admissible, but it is, as a rule, necessary. When it is granted on the ground of error of law on the face of the record, affidavit evidence is not, as a rule, admissible, for the simple reason that the error must appear on the record itself: See R.v. Nat Bell Liquors, Ltd. (1922) 2 A.C. 128; 91 L.J.P.C. 146; 127 L.T. 437; 16 Digest 419, 2795. Affidavits were, however, always admissible to show that the record was incomplete, as for instance, that a conviction omitted the evidence of one of the witnesses: see Chitty's General Practice of the Law Vol. II, p. 222, note (d), or did not set out the fact that the justices had refused to hear a competent witness for the defence: See R. v. Anon (1816), 2 Chit. 137, whereupon the court would either order the record to be completed, or it might quash the conviction at once."

After having considered this question, the learned Judge dealt with contentions before him as follows :—

"We have here a simple case of error of law by a tribunal, an error which they frankly acknowledge. It is an error which deprives the applicant of the compensation to which he is by law entitled. So long as the erroneous decision stands, the compensating authority dare not pay him the money to which he is entitled lest the auditor should surcharge them. It would be quite intolerable if in such a case there were no means of correcting the error. The authorities to which I have referred amply show that the King's Bench can correct it by certiorari. It is true that the record which has been sent up to the court does not distinctly disclose the error, but that is only because the record itself is incomplete. The tribunal has sent up its decision, but it has not sent up the claim lodged with the compensating authority or the order made by them on it or the notice of appeal to the tribunal. Those documents would, I think, properly be part of the record. They would, I understand, have disclosed the error. If it had been necessary, the court could have ordered the record to be completed. But that is unnecessary, having regard to the fact that it was admitted in open court by all concerned that the decision was erroneous. I am clearly of opinion that an error admitted openly in the face of the court can be corrected by certiorari as well as an error that appears on the face of the record. The decision must be quashed, and the tribunal will then be able to hear the case again and give the correct decision. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed."

The expression 'error apparent on the face of the record' has emerged as a consequence of reasons that are more of historical interest and importance than those that have reference to the principles of analytic jurisprudence. It is altogether fallacious to interpret the import of this expression by resort to decisions given by the Privy Council and the Indian courts of the identical expression occurring in Order 47, Rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It would be recalled that Order 47, Rule 1 mentions the grounds upon which application for review of judgments could be entertained by our civil courts: and among the grounds are the following :

- (1) The discovery of new and important matter or evidence which after the exercise of due diligence was not within his (petitioner's) knowledge or could not be produced by him at the time when the decree was passed or order was made; or
- (2) on account of some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, or
- (3) any other sufficient reason."

Since the jurisdiction in review proceedings is confined to agitating questions that have been previously decided by the same court, it has necessarily to be confined to a restricted category of cases. The rule which the courts have invariably applied in construing this expression is to say that it is only the evident or manifest error or omission that is the ground for review; as, for instance, failure to apply the law of limitation to the facts found by the court or failure to consider a particular section of an Act or part thereof, but in each case the point of law must be one that may admit of no controversy. It is not enough for successfully obtaining the review of a judgment delivered by court to show to that court that its determination is based on mere incorrect or untenable exposition of law (Chhajju Ram v. Neki, (1922) 49 I.A. 144).

But there are a few points that ought to be noted before the case law having a bearing on the interpretation of the Rule relating to the scope of review could be, mutis mutandis, applied in the matter of determining the scope of certiorari proceedings when confined to quashing orders that show "error apparent on the face of the record". In the first place, the application of the principles that govern review proceedings to the sphere of constitutional jurisdiction to issue writs is itself opposed to the first principles of jurisprudence in that, the two species of jurisdictions, that is, review and certiorari, exercised by the courts are of different import altogether; and in the second place, even the Crown practice in England with regard to the issue of certiorari is manifestly in the professed exercise of power inherent in the King's Bench Division to correct the course of judicial administration in the country. The court of the King's Bench Division in England, when issuing high prerogative writs like that of certiorari, exercises supervisory jurisdiction, a jurisdiction which is designed to confine inferior tribunals, having the duty to act judicially, to the sphere of the legitimate exercise of their powers and authorities. In asking for a review, one is asking for reconsideration of the case before the very court that has rendered a decision, but in invoking writ jurisdiction of the High Court one is approaching another court and a higher court. As was observed in the case of Walsall Overseers v. London and North Western Railway Co., (1878) 4 A.C. 30, the extent of this jurisdiction is measurable in two different directions :

"The supervision of the court in the exercise of writ jurisdiction goes to two points: one is the area of inferior jurisdiction and the qualifications and conditions of its exercise; the other is the observance of the law in the course of its exercise."

To say that the expression 'error apparent on the face of the record' implies that the error must necessarily be obvious in the sense that its discovery or detection does not require an elaborate argument, is, it is submitted with respect, not a correct approach; and one for which there is to be found no support either in principle or in any cogent

Historical Reasons for "Error apparent" on the face of record.

Order 47, Rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Concept of error apparent under Certiorari and Review proceedings analysed.

precedent. Once the apparency of the error is regarded as an attribute of the error itself in the sense that the error should be glaringly apparent to the percipient consciousness, the administration of law would be irretrievably handed over to the subjective attitude of the judicial mind—for what is apparent to one judicial mind at first glance may require an elaborate analysis and argument for another judicial mind to perceive. That would be committing the administration of law to the evil of judicial solipsism.

The entire system of our judicial administration is based upon the view that it is possible to rescue from the subjective approach of the judicial mind, determination of cases by constraining it to be controlled in the determination of cases by objective criteria: and there is no good reason to suppose that the "error" to be corrected by means of certiorari must be defined in terms of the perceptive power of the Judges of the High Courts.

This view of the law as to what is meant by error apparent on the face of the record, would be found stated in the case of Registrar, University of Allahabad v. Ishwari Prasad, AIR (1956) Allahabad 603 at p. 607 where it was stated :

"It was contended by the Advocate General that the words 'error apparent on the face of the record' occur in Order 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure and it may be useful to refer to cases where the courts have determined the scope and ambit of the words 'error apparent on the face of the record' in Order 47, Rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In our opinion, it is not a safe guide to rely upon the cases interpreting the words 'error apparent on the face of the record' in Order 47, Rule 1, Civil P.C., in order to determine the scope of these words in connection with the power of this Court to issue a writ of certiorari under ART. 226 of the Constitution.

"When a court is asked to review its own order, it may not be a valid ground for the court to say that, as it finds on the reconsideration of its order that it is illegal, it should be set aside as it is an error apparent on the face of the record. It may be different where a superior tribunal is called upon to decide whether any erroneous decision of an inferior tribunal is illegal on the face of it."

This view has also found favour with the Division Bench of West Pakistan High Court in the case of Muhammad Mohsin Siddiqi v. Chief Judge, Karachi, Small Causes Court, PLD (1956) Karachi 203, where M.R. Kayani J. delivering the judgment observed (at p. 210):

"The next question is whether certiorari lies in a case like the present one. In R. v. Northumberland Compensation Appeal Tribunal (1952) 1 All E.R. 122, it was held that certiorari to quash the decision of the tribunal lay, not only where the tribunal had exceeded its jurisdiction, but also where an error of law appeared on the face of the record. This seems to be the latest view in England and it has been confirmed by the Court of Appeal. It was followed by the Supreme Court of India in Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad Ishaque, AIR (1955) S.C. 233 : PLD (1956) S.C. (Ind.) 1. What is an error of law apparent on the face of the record is a matter for opinion on the facts of each case. In the English case it was observed that 'a striking instance was where the commissioners of sewers imposed an excessive fine, and it was quashed by the Court of King's Bench on the ground that in law their fines ought to be reasonable. Other instances are the numerous cases where certiorari was used to determine the validity of a sewer's rate imposed by the commissioners of sewers'."

A perusal of this case would show that the error in this case was anything but apparent and had to be discovered upon an intricate argument at the bar, after a close judicial examination of the facts of the case in the light of the principles of election law. The error was not glaringly apparent—but it was apparent from the record.

The requirement of law that error must appear from the record, stated negatively, means that no extraneous material not duly certified by the tribunal in response to the rule nisi issued to it, could be made the basis of establishing such error. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure, for instance, (see its 263rd Section) the record of cases tried summarily where no appeal lies is confined to furnishing the particulars mentioned therein, and where appeal lies, under its 264th Section, the requirement is that the magistrate before passing the sentence should record judgment embodying the substance of the evidence and also the particulars mentioned under S. 263. The Code enjoins that such judgment shall be the only record in cases coming within the Section [164(2)]. Here then we have a case of what the statute itself lays down to be the nature and extent of the record, and in such a situation before the superior court no additional evidence could be laid to controvert, or supplement this 'record'. But where the statute does not itself lay down the requirement of record, the superior court would examine the return to scrutinise whether the record that has been sent up is complete—and if it is not, it would direct the tribunal to complete it. The record thus prepared constitutes the premises upon which error must be shown to the superior court. Of course, the parties might agree to place some relevant material, in addition to the certified record, in order to obtain an order from the superior court, but then that would be a rare case indeed; and for the purpose of general statement such a situation could well be kept out of consideration.

The 'error' must be sufficiently weighty before it could be regarded a valid ground for interference. It must be shown that the error committed by the inferior tribunal has resulted in a failure of justice. In the case of Sangram Singh v. Election Tribunal, Kotah, AIR (1955) S.C. 425, the Supreme Court of India were concerned with the effect of S. 105 of the Representation of People Act, 1951, (Act 43 of 1951) which had provided that "every order of the tribunal made under this Act shall be final and conclusive" upon the jurisdiction of High Court under ART. 226 to correct errors of law apparent on the face of the record of the inferior tribunals by means of a writ of certiorari. The argument was (at p. 428).

"that the legislature intended the decision of these tribunals to be final on 'all' matters, whether of fact or of law, accordingly, they cannot be said to commit an error of law when, acting within the ambit of their jurisdiction, they decide and lay down what the law is, for in that sphere their decisions are absolute, as absolute as the decisions of the Supreme Court in its own sphere."

But this argument was repelled. The Court said,

"But this, also, is no longer open to question. The point has been decided by three Constitution Benches of this Court. In Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad Ishaque AIR (1955) S.C. 233 the effect of S. 105, Representation of the People Act was not considered but the Court laid down in general terms that the jurisdiction under ART. 226 having been conferred by the Constitution, limitations cannot be placed on it except by the Constitution, itself: see pp. 238 and 242. Section 105 was, however, considered in Durga Shankar Mehta v. Raghubaj Singh, AIR (1954) SC 520 at p. 522 and it was held that that section cannot cut down or affect the overriding powers of this Court under ART. 136. The same rule was applied to ART. 226 in Raj Krishna Bose v. Binod Kanungo, AIR (1954) SC 202 at p. 204 and it was decided that S. 105 cannot take away or whittle down the powers of the High Court under ART. 226. Following those decisions we hold that the jurisdiction of the High Court under ART. 226 is not taken away or curtailed by S. 105.

"The jurisdiction which ARTs. 226 and 136 confer entitles the High Courts and this Court to examine the decisions of all Tribunals to see whether they have acted illegally. That jurisdiction cannot be taken away by a legislative device that purports to confer power on a tribunal to act illegally by enacting a statute that its illegal acts shall become legal the moment the tribunal chooses to say they are legal. The legality of an act or conclusion is something that exists outside and apart from the decision of an inferior tribunal.

not be trivial

"It is a part of the law of the land which cannot be finally determined or altered by any tribunal of limited jurisdiction. The High Courts and the Supreme Court alone can determine what the law of the land is 'vis a vis' all other courts and tribunals and they alone can pronounce with authority and finality on what is legal and what is not. All that an inferior tribunal can do is to reach a tentative conclusion which is subject to review under ARTs. 226 and 136. Therefore, the jurisdiction of the High Courts under ART. 226 with that of the Supreme Court above them remains to its fullest extent despite S. 105."

Having made this observation, the learned Judge proceeded to say that this large and controlling jurisdiction will not be exercised merely because there is an error of law (at p. 429).

"The High Courts do not, and should not, act as Courts of appeal under ART. 226. Their powers are purely discretionary and though no limits can be placed upon that discretion it must be exercised along recognised lines and not arbitrarily; and one of the limitations imposed by the Courts on themselves is that they will not exercise jurisdiction in this class of case unless substantial injustice has ensued, or is likely to ensue. They will not allow themselves to be turned into Courts of appeal or revision to set right mere errors of law which do not occasion injustice in a broad and general sense, for, though no legislature can impose limitations on these constitutional powers it is a sound exercise of discretion to bear in mind the policy of the legislature to have disputes about these special rights decided as speedily as may be. Therefore, writ petitions should not be lightly entertained in this class of cases."

(Consult further de Smith's "Certiorari and Speaking Orders" 1951, 14 Modern Law Review pp. 207—210; Schmithoff's "Growing Ambit of the Common Law", 29 Canadian Bar Review p. 469).

Whether proceedings under the remedy of writ of certiorari are civil or criminal would depend upon the character of the proceedings out of which the order sought to be quashed before the superior court emanates. The position under the English law might be taken to be the one stated by Lord Summer in the case of In re Clloffid v. O'Sullivan, (1921) 2 A.C. 570 (House of Lords) where he said :

"An application for a writ of prohibition is in itself no more and no less criminal than it is the contrary. This quality of the matter of an application for that writ must be decided according to the subject-matter dealt with on the application. The same is true of certiorari [Reg. v. Fletcher (1876), 2 Q.B.D. 43] and habeas corpus (Ex parte Woodhall (1888) 20 Q.B.D. 832). I think the real test is the character of the proceedings themselves which are the subject-matter of the particular application whatever it be.."

Before we conclude our study of the nature and scope of the writ of certiorari, it is necessary to emphasise an important aspect of the jurisdiction of the High Court in relation to that writ: before the jurisdiction of the High Court to issue writ of certiorari could at all be affected by reason of anything contained in the statute creating the inferior tribunal, it should be clearly borne in mind that the jurisdiction having been conferred by the Constitution can only be taken away by process of constitutional amendment.

Further, to quote the words of Denning L. J. in the case of Taylor (formerly Kraupl) v. National Assistance Board, (1957) 2 W.L.R. 189: (1957) 1 All E.R. 183:

"The remedy is not excluded by the fact that the determination of the board is by statute made 'final'. Parliament gives the impress of finality to the decisions of the board only on the condition that they are reached in accordance with the law."

Are Certiorari Proceedings civil or criminal.

No implied ouster of Constitution Jurisdiction.

In England in order that certiorari be taken away, the rule is that there must exist in the statute express words to that effect.

Some of the statutes passed in England between 1680 and 1848 contained the expressions to the effect that the decision of the tribunal shall not be removed by certiorari. But despite these express words having been used, courts never allowed those statutes to be used as a cover for the wrongs done by tribunal. Despite the express words taking away certiorari, the courts intervened if it could be shown that (a) some of the members of the tribunal were disqualified from acting (Regina v. Cheltenham Commissioners (1841) 1 Q.B. 467), or that (b) the tribunal had exceeded its jurisdiction [see Ex parte Bradlaugh (1878) 3 Q.B.D. 509], or that (c) the decision was obtained by fraud [see Regina v. Gillyard, (1848) 12 Q.B. 527, and also the recent case of House of Lords in Smith v. East Elloe Rural District Council (1956) A.C. 736: (1956) 1 All E.R. 855 (H.L.) where the question related to "bad faith"]. The student is also referred to the discussion of this principle contained in the case of Regina v. Medical Appeal Tribunal Ex parte Gilmore in (1957) 2 W.L.R. page 498 where it has been ruled by Denning L. J. that the expression "any decision of a claim or question shall be final" meant only that the decisions specified could not be subject of appeal or review on facts; they did not suffice to prohibit applications for certiorari, whether on ground of error on the face of the record or excess or lack of jurisdiction. It was also observed that a long line of authority shows that the remedy by certiorari is not to be taken away save by clear and express words to that effect occurring in an Act of Parliament.

Under our Constitution, of course, neither the Parliament nor the Provincial Legislature can take away the jurisdiction of the High Court to issue writ of certiorari. Nor, again, can expressions to the effect that the decision of the tribunal shall be final, occurring in statutes creating them, be regarded anything more than an intimation by the Legislature that a decision is final only by way of appeal etc., and not that a tribunal can commit errors of law with impunity or that High Court is precluded from the exercise of its power to see that justice is done according to law.

161. Writ of Quo Warranto

Writ of quo warranto is issued upon an information which may be lodged against a person who claims or usurps "office, franchise or liberty", and upon such information being laid the court will inquire by what authority the person who claims or has usurped the office, supports his claim. The proceedings are commenced in appropriate cases to have the right to the office or franchise determined (Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd. Ed., Vol. 9, para 1373, p. 804). In the case of Hamid Hasan Nomani v. Banwarilal Roy, AIR (1947) P.C. 90 at p. 91, Sir Beaumont, delivering the judgment on behalf of Judicial Committee, observed:

"An information in the nature of quo warranto is the modern procedure replacing the obsolete High Prerogative Writ of quo warranto. It is used to try the civil right to a public office."

This case which was a decision on appeal from the judgment of Calcutta High Court (1944) (48) C.W.N. 766, contains a useful discussion of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Calcutta to issue this writ, a jurisdiction which it inherited from the personal jurisdiction of Supreme Court of Calcutta exercised on its original civil side and is an important decision for the purpose of understanding the constitutional history of the powers and jurisdictions of various High Courts in relation to the exercise of writ jurisdiction. Their Lordships felt no doubt, on the construction of S. 9, High Courts Act, 1861, and Letters Patent of 1865 (at p. 93) :

"that the Original Civil Jurisdiction which the Supreme Court of Calcutta possessed over certain classes of persons outside the territorial limits of that jurisdiction has not been inherited by the High Court, that the power to grant an information in the nature of quo warranto arises in the exercise of the Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction of the High Court, that such jurisdiction is confined to the town of Calcutta and that, as the appellant does not reside and the office which he is alleged to have usurped is not situate within those limits, the Court had no power to grant information in this case . . . "

The information in the nature of quo warranto is in the nature of civil proceeding [see Rex v. Francis (1788) 2 Term. Rep. 484; and Hamid Hasan v. Banwari Lal Roy (1947) Privy Council 90].

The leading case on the subject of quo warranto is that of Rex. v. Speyer, (1916) 1 K.B. 595, a case in which Lord Reading summed up the law relating to information in the nature of quo warranto as it obtains in England. The case was affirmed in (1916) 2 K.B. 858. Lord Reading observed :

"In early times the writ of quo warranto was in the nature of a writ of right for the King against any subject who claimed or usurped any office, franchise, or liberty, to inquire by what authority he supported his claim in order to determine the right: Blackstone's Commentaries, 8th Edn., vol. 3, p. 262. It was a civil writ at the suit of the Crown: Rex v. Marsden (1765) 3 Burr 1812. Originally the writ had to be returned before the King's justices at Westminster, but afterwards only before the justices in Eyre by virtue of the statutes of quo warranto, 6 Edw. I (Statute of Gloucester) and 18 Edw. I, Statute 2." "The writ of quo warranto, however, fell into disuse and led to the substitution of proceedings by way of information in the nature of quo warranto. Whatever the immediate cause of the change or whenever it was brought about is not ascertainable: Tancred on Quo Warranto, p. 2; but the practice of filing informations by the Attorney-General in lieu of these writs is very ancient: Darley v. Queen (1846) 12 Cl & F 520 at p. 537. At a later period the King's Coroner commenced the practice of exhibiting information of quo warranto at the instance of private persons, but this power of the King's coroner was much restrained by the Statute 4 and 5 Will. & Mar. c. 18, which was passed to prevent malicious information at the suit of private persons being filed by the King's coroner. In Rex v. Hertford Corporation, 1 Ld. Raym, 426, it was decided that informations in the nature of quo warranto were within the purview of this statute, and thereafter the King's coroner did not file informations without the order of the Court. Subsequently the statute of 9 Anne, c. 20, was passed to render informations in the nature of quo warranto more speedy and effectual and for the more easy trial of the rights of offices and franchises in corporations and boroughs. Since that time there has been a tendency to extend the remedy, subject to the discretion of the Court to grant or refuse informations to private prosecutors according to the facts and circumstances of the case, and hence it is that it becomes so difficult to reconcile many of the decisions as was pointed out by Lord Brougham in Darley v. The Queen (1846) 12 Cl & F 520: 8 E.R. 1513".

The essential thing in the words of Lord Reading is,

"Whether there has been usurpation of an office of a public nature and an office substantive in character that is an office independent of title".

The writ of quo warranto will not lie in respect of an office of a private nature. [See Amarendra Chandra v. Narendra Kumar Basu (1952) C.W.N. vol. 56, p. 449: AIR (1953) Calcutta 114; see also Rex v. Mousley, (1846) 8 Q.B. 946, where it was held that the office of a member of the Managing Committee of a private school which is constituted according to certain rules which have no statutory force but are of purely domestic character governing the internal affairs of the school, do not make the office of a public character so as to make it amenable to correction by means of quo warranto].

The mere fact that the office is held at pleasure is not by itself sufficient to regard that office as not being substantive in character [G. D. Karkare v. T. L. Shevde, AIR (1952) Nagpur 330]. To the same effect are remarks of Lord Reading in the case of Rex. v. Speyer (1916) 1 K.B. 595.

"I have found it difficult to understand", says the learned Judge, "why in principle an office held at pleasure should not equally with an office of permanent character, be subject to this remedy provided the office held at pleasure is often in effect of a permanent character. After considering the authorities since Darley v. The Queen (1846) 8 E.R. 1513, it appears to me that they rest upon the principle formulated in that case and require only the application of it to the particular facts."

Tindall, Chief Justice, when using the language under consideration, while testing the substantive office, held that it should be an office independent of title, not merely the function or employment of a deputy or servant. (Darley v. Queen (1846) 18 E.R. 1513)

Similarly, quo warranto will not issue where on the facts and circumstances of a particular case it will appear to the court to be futile. If the appointment to office which is challenged by means of quo warranto is capable of being cured by immediate re-appointment, the Court would not, in the exercise of its discretion, allow the writ to issue. This principle was established in Rex v. Speyer and was also referred to in the case of Ex parte Richard (1878) 3 Q.B.D. 368, where in the case of an application by a dismissed employee against a certain incumbent of that office, the writ was refused on the ground that even if it be held that applicant could be re-instated, the consideration that he could be legally dismissed by the same authority afterwards would be sufficient in support of the refusal to exercise a discretionary jurisdiction given to Court exercising quo warranto powers.

Under our Constitution we have in ART. 146 a prohibition which enjoins that no election to the National Assembly or Provincial Assembly shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to such authority and in such manner as may be provided by an Act of Parliament. The scope of jurisdiction in quo warranto proceedings under our Constitution will have to reckon with what is contained in ART. 146, which Article, as its wording shows, expressly excludes elections to the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly from being called in question by any other means except by election petition. Any illegality committed during the course of election can only be tested by means of an election petition, and all other forms of procedure, including the one relating to questioning the validity of elections by means of quo warranto, are necessarily excluded by the express prohibition contained in ART. 146. It is submitted that considering that quo warranto proceedings are discretionary in character, the jurisdiction to avail of this writ will be ordinarily resisted on the ground that there is another equally efficacious remedy available to question the validity of an election to the National and Provincial Assembly under the law.

Care must be taken to remember that what ART. 146 expressly provides for is the procedure by resort to which election to the National or Provincial Assembly could be called in question. It does not prohibit the determinations of the issue whether an election tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction or has acted in the absence of a jurisdiction validly conferred upon it by law. There is no ground for thinking however that the proceedings of election tribunal cannot be attacked on the ground of jurisdiction. Very different was the principle on which the Supreme Court of India dealt with a matter arising out of the findings of an election tribunal in the case of Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad Ishaque and others, AIR (1955) S.C. 233. Their Lordships interpreted the scope of the Indian Article 329(b) which corresponds to our ART. 146 in relation to a prayer before them for the issue of a writ of certiorari or other order or direction for quashing the order of the election tribunal that it was illegal and without jurisdiction. The Indian Article 329(b) is in the following terms :—

"Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution no election to either House of Parliament or either House of the Legislature of a State shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to such authority and in such manner as may be provided for by or under any law made by the appropriate Legislature."

"Now, the question", said the Supreme Court at pp. 238 and 239, "is whether a writ is a proceeding in which an election can properly be said to be called in question within the meaning of Article 329(b). On a plain reading of the Article, what is prohibited therein is the 'initiation' of proceedings for setting aside an election otherwise than by an election petition presented to such authority and in such manner as is provided therein. A suit for setting aside an election would be barred under this provision.

"In N. P. Ponnuswami v. Returning Officer, Namakkal Constituency, AIR (1952) Supreme Court 64, it was held by this Court that the word 'election' in Article 329(b) was used in a comprehensive sense as including the entire process of election commencing with the issue of a notification and terminating with the declaration of election of a candidate, and that an application under Article 226 challenging the validity of any of the acts forming part of that process would be barred. These are instances of original proceedings calling in question an election, and would be within the prohibition enacted in Article 329 (b).

"But when once proceedings have been instituted in accordance with Article 329(b) by presentation of an election petition, the requirements of that Article are fully satisfied. Thereafter, when the election petition is in due course heard by a Tribunal and decided, whether its decision is open to attack, and if so, where and to what extent, must be determined by the general law applicable to decisions of Tribunals. There being no dispute that they are subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of the High Courts under Article 226, a writ of 'cetiorari' under that Article will be competent against decisions of the Election Tribunals also".

The essential point of purpose in the interpretation of ART. 146, (as even Indian ART. 329(b)) is to give effect to the intention of the framers of the Constitution. If by presentation of a petition under ART. 170 or 226 an attempt is made to call in question any election of the kind mentioned in the two prohibitory Articles (that is under ART. 146 of our own and 329 of the Indian Constitution), would it not be said that thereby we were defying the prohibitions contained in these two Articles. These two Articles do not say that the election shall not in the first instance be called in question except by an election petition. The intention clearly is to confer finality on the determination of election disputes by the election tribunals, and this for the simple reason that elections are an important element in the democratic process and their course must be kept as much uninterfered with as it may be practicable. Election law, as has been said, is a harsh law and a hard law but nevertheless it has to be given effect to for what it is worth. And to permit in writ proceedings to re-open and resurrect the questions that have been concluded by election tribunals would be to reduce ART. 146 of our Constitution to a state of non-existence.

In the Indian Supreme Court case, referred to above, the argument that prevailed with their Lordships appears to be that if ART. 329(b) is not to be limited in its operation to the initiation of proceedings for setting aside an election, certain anomalous results would come to prevail when we consider the question of interpretation with reference to the rights of a candidate whose election has been set aside by the tribunal. In the words of the court:

"If he applies under Article 226 for a writ to set aside the order of the Tribunal, he cannot in any sense be said to call in question the election; on the other hand, he seeks to maintain it. His application could not, therefore, be barred by Article 329(b). And if the contention of the first respondent is well-founded, the result will be that proceedings under Article 226 will be competent in one event and not in another and at the instance of one party and not the other. Learned counsel for the first respondent was unable to give any reason why this differentiation should be made. We cannot accept a construction which leads to results so anomalous." (p. 239)

With all respects to the learned Judge of the Supreme Court, consideration such as the one which seems to have tilted their judgment in favour of the decision they have recorded, appears to be hardly relevant. The essential thing is to give effect to ART. 329(b) of the Constitution read with ART. 226. It is clear that the validity of the election can only be called in question by means of an election petition. After the election tribunal gives a decision, the purpose of ART. 146 is over, and if High Court proceeds thereafter to exercise its jurisdiction under ART. 226, to disturb the finding of the election tribunal, the finality of its determination is necessarily interfered with. In the case of a person whose election is set aside and who, in the case visualised by their Lordships of the Supreme Court, is approaching the High Court under ART. 226, there is an implied bar resulting from that finality which must be enforced in respect of the orders passed by the election tribunal. The person whose election has been set aside has also been heard before the election tribunal that declared the election as one which merited to be set aside and he cannot be permitted, in the total absence of any specific provision in regard to appeal etc., to approach the High Court for the reconsideration of his case under ART. 226.

We are here concerned with a constitutional prohibition, and as ART. 146 is specific as to what it prohibits, no construction on ART. 170 could be imposed which would undo the effect of that prohibition. Besides, a writ jurisdiction being discretionary, that jurisdiction cannot be made a substitute for processes like appeals, revisions and review which are ordinarily provided for in matters affecting the determinations by election tribunal.

It remains now to enquire into the question whether there is jurisdiction vested in the Supreme Court of Pakistan under ART. 160 to entertain appeals from the determinations reached by Election Tribunals constituted by an Act of Parliament within the meaning of ART. 146. In the case of Muhammad Saeed v. Election Petitions Tribunal, West Pakistan PLD (1957) S.C. 91, Supreme Court of Pakistan declared that under ART. 160 it has the jurisdiction to entertain appeals from the determinations of the Election Tribunal. The report of the Election Tribunal, according to the judgment of the learned Chief Justice (at p. 97), has

"the effect of declaring (1) an election void or not void, (2) that a person has been duly elected, and (3) that a person from the date of the Report is disqualified to be a member of the Provincial legislature or a voter for that legislature because these results follow either from the expression of the Commissioners' opinion in the Report or from the date of the Report without any Order by the Governor."

According to our Supreme Court, therefore, the Report of the Tribunal is in every sense of the term a declaratory judgment because it finally determines the validity or invalidity of the election and also the disqualification that a person may have incurred. It has been held that the Governor was not competent (at p. 98) :

"to deprive the Report of this legal effect, his duty under each of the provisions just mentioned [S. 12 of the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955; clause (3) of paragraph 8 of Part III of the Corrupt Practices Order, Article 225(5)(c)] being to pass orders in accordance with or in order to give effect to the Report."

But even "If it be assumed that the Governor in passing orders on the Report (of the Tribunal) has some discretion and thus exercises judicial functions, he himself becomes a judicial tribunal and his orders become appealable to the Supreme Court under ART. 160, even though such orders be passed as a result of an investigation conducted by the Election Petitions Tribunal' (p. 98).

Chief Justice Muhammad Munir, on this view of law, felt no difficulty in holding that the Election Petitions Tribunal and the Governor together constituted a Tribunal for the purposes of ART. 160 of the Constitution provided, of course, it be assumed that the Governor had no discretionary power to deal with the report submitted by the members of the Tribunal.

It is pointed out with respect, that the above stated conclusion even if tenable, has to encounter yet another procedural difficulty contained in the Constitution if it is to hold the field,—namely, that since "no process of a Court can reach either the Governor or the President for the exercise of powers and performances of duties of their office or for any act done or purported to be done in the exercise of those powers and performance of those duties (see ART. 213)" the order of Governor cannot be questioned in appeal by the Supreme Court. The only way out of this difficulty is to proceed by means of the writ of quo warranto and to call upon the person, who is duly elected as a result of the findings of the Tribunal, to show cause why his claim to the office stemming from the decision of the Tribunal be not annulled. But there would be no way out of the difficulty if the Tribunal records the finding that the election is void for the simple reason that such a result cannot validly be attacked in any forum without the authors of the result, namely the Governor and the members of the Tribunal being called upon to plead to any order that the Court might wish to pass contrary to their determination. Since the Governor cannot be summoned, what he does officially is sacrosanct. This difficulty appears not to have been noticed, much less considered in the judgment of the Supreme Court. Besides all this, the argument based upon the prohibition contained in ART. 146 of our Constitution received scant attention, at the hands of the Court: at page 99 Chief Justice Munir observed:

"Article 146 of the Constitution on which reliance was placed by the learned Attorney-General in a vigorous endeavour to establish the ouster of this Court's jurisdiction, has nothing to do with the matter. That Article provides that no election to the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to such authority and in such manner as may be provided by Act of Parliament. The corresponding provision in the Indian Constitution has been construed by the Supreme Court of India as having no bearing on the question of the Supreme Court's jurisdiction to interfere on appeal, by special leave, with the order of an election tribunal, and that undoubtedly is the true construction of Article 160 of our Constitution which is worded exactly as the Indian Article. The Report of the Tribunal being a judgment, in entertaining an appeal from that judgment we are not functioning otherwise than as an appellate authority in the proceedings taken on the election petition; nor is the validity of the election being called in question otherwise than by an election petition."

It is submitted with respect, that this view of the law overlooks the difficulty of having to entertain appeals by way of special leave to appeal in cases where the Election Tribunal has found the election challenged before it to be valid, and the person aggrieved by its order, seeks to renew an effort at the appellate stage before the Supreme Court to obtain the same result from the court of appeal under ART. 160. Should such a situation arise, would not the court of appeal, in effect, be made to question the validity of election and thus reach the very result which it is left exclusively to Election Tribunal to reach under ART. 146? It would be anomalous in the extreme to entertain petitions by way of appeal under ART. 160 if only a certain type of result followed from the determinations of the Election Tribunal. For that would be saying that a petitioner who challenges the election of another before the Election Tribunal, is precluded from raising the same issue in appeal whereas should he become successful his opponent can go under ART. 160 and have the result annulled by the Supreme Court.

It is true that the principle of ART. 146 is not expressly referred to in the very able and scholarly judgment delivered by Cornelius J. but it is also true, so at least it seems to the present writer, that throughout his analysis of the Privy Council practice in regard to its consistent refusal to entertain appeals from the determinations recorded by Election Tribunals, he has in fact been circumnavigating this very same principle. With respect, it is pointed out that the Privy Council refused to grant special leave to appeal from the decisions of Election Tribunals fundamentally because, to quote the words of Lord Cairns in the case of Theberge v. Laudry (1876-7) 2 A.C. 102 :

"In the opinion of their Lordships, adverting to these considerations, the 90th section which says that a judgment shall not be susceptible of appeal is an enactment which indicates clearly the intention of the legislature under this Act—an Act which is assented to on the part of Crown, and to which the Crown, therefore is a party—to create this tribunal for the purpose of trying election petitions in a manner which should make its decision final to all purposes and not annex to it the incident of its judgment being reviewed by the Crown under its prerogative."

The origin of jurisdiction to resolve "disputes and doubts" with regard to the validity of election is to be traced to the practice of Imperial Parliament in England which has exclusive jurisdiction to decide these questions. There never was, down the entire course of the history of English Law, a common law right to agitate questions affecting validity of elections which had to be decided only by the Parliament.

Before 1770 all controversies with regard to elections were determined by the whole House of Commons and treated as though they were party questions and decided in accordance with the measure of strength of contending parties. As the working of the system was found unsatisfactory, the exercise of what, after all, was its own privilege, was partially transferred by the Parliament to a tribunal constituted by law. To begin with, this tribunal used to consist of members of the House but they had to take oath to do justice according to the law of the land. But the principle of the several Acts passed upon this subject was the 'selection by lot,' of the members of the committees for the trial of election petitions. Even this system was found defective and then by a series of gradual steps, taken by means of various legislative enactments particularly the Acts of 1839 and 1860, the jurisdiction of the House in the matter of adjudicating, controverted elections was transferred to the courts of law. And now by Part II of the Representation of People Act, 1949, the trial of election disputes is confided to 'Election Court' presided over by the judges who are selected from judiciary from the appropriate parts of the United Kingdom. Reports of the "election courts" thus constituted are communicated to the House by the Speaker and are treated very much like the reports of the election committees under the former system. "They are entered in the journals; and orders are made for carrying the determinations of the judges into execution." Thus the full effect to the report by the election court is still given by the Parliament. The reports submitted by the election courts are to all intents and purposes final and the proceedings before the election courts are not treated as proceedings before the House in England. It would not be possible to question the validity of the determinations of disputes rendered by an election court by any means whatever—whether it be by way of a suit, or a writ, or by means of a further appeal to a higher forum.

The foregoing statement of the law which has been freely adopted from May's Parliamentary Practice, (pp. 184-6) would show us the emergence of the present method whereby the burden of determining these "Election Disputes" has been transferred under several Acts to judicial tribunals. But, nevertheless, despite this change, it would appear that controverted elections continued to be treated as essentially being within the competence of Parliament to settle, though to begin with, they had to be dealt with in an appropriate domestic forum specially created for the purpose, a forum which was not amenable to being in any manner interfered with by any law courts. It is this same principle which is embodied under ART. 146, and if any effect is at all to be given to that Article it must, from the nature of the case be to interdict all attempts by courts, no matter how low or how high they be, to question the validity of elections and thus assume to themselves the function which has been constitutionally delegated to the Exclusive Jurisdiction of Election Tribunal.

It would be another matter if the Act of Parliament had not provided within the scope of ART. 146 for a forum where elections to the National Assembly or Provincial Assembly shall be called in question. If there be a total absence of any legislative enactment of this type, the burden of determining the validity of election would not lie with the courts but would, it is submitted with respect, continue to rest upon the shoulders of the relevant legislature with regard to whose membership, the contentions regarding the validity of a given election is sought to be raised. After all the privileges of the National Assembly are the same as those of the Parliament of United Kingdom (see S. 4 (5) 224 of the Constitution), and the privilege of determining the disputes concerning validity of election must, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, vest in the National Assembly.

It is the force of this principle more than anything else that has constrained the present writer to respectfully differ from the view that was taken by the Supreme Court in the case referred to above. ART. 146 is, as has been pointed out earlier, a special Article dealing with the question of the validity of elections being determined in a certain way and ART. 160 must therefore be read subject to its specific content that prohibits the questioning of elections in any other way.

If, however, the logic of the Supreme Court decision is accepted, as it has anyhow to be accepted, (that Court being the sole judge of its own jurisdiction) even the High Courts would acquire jurisdiction under ART. 170 to issue writs of Quo Warranto, certiorari and prohibition, to question the validity of election—for if ART. 146 is no bar upon the jurisdiction of Supreme Court neither will it be a bar upon that of the High Court. It would however be noticed that the scope of certiorari proceedings would be limited to agitating questions of (a) either the defect of jurisdiction, (b) the excess of it, (c) violations of the principles of natural justice, (d) the mala fides of the tribunal and (e) the consideration of error apparent on the face of the proceedings. It would only be able to quash the proceedings. And the High Courts would of course not be entitled to pass any specific order of the sort which the original forum, that is the Election Tribunal, whose decisions are sought to be corrected by certiorari by it, could have passed. Supreme Court, in the enjoyment of its power under ART. 160, however becomes a full fledged Court of Appeal, that is, it becomes a judge both of fact and law and could substitute any order for the one passed by the Election Tribunal,—that is, of course, it can only pass the sort of orders that the Election Tribunal could, itself under the law, have been competent to pass.

The writ of quo warranto reaches the person who has usurped office and it is no defence on his part to say that an intermediary process as a result of which he claims to exercise office having been declared as sacrosanct by law, that factor by itself should be deemed to operate as a bar to the exercise of jurisdiction. This point arose specifically in the case of Rex v. Speyer, (1916) 1 K.B. 595 where the relator, who filed information in the nature of quo warranto in regard to the impugned appointment of a Privy Councillor that had been made by the Queen, was virtually questioning the validity of the order passed by the Sovereign. It was contended before the Court that by the issue of the writ of quo warranto virtually the Court would be passing an order upon the Sovereign, a thing which no Court can do in England. As to this argument, Lord Reading made the following reply:

"The second ground proceeds upon the assumption that if the Court were to pronounce a judgment of ouster in this case we should be making an order upon the Sovereign. If that were the true view of such a judgment I should, of course, agree, as this Court could not make an order upon the Sovereign. To use the words of Cockburn, C.J., in Reg. v. Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, 'We must start with this unquestionable principle, that when a duty has to be performed (if I may use that expression) by the Crown, this Court cannot claim even in appearance to have any power to command the Crown; the thing is out of the question. Over the Sovereign we can have no power.'

"But a judgment against the respondents would have effect against them only; it would be an order upon the subject, not upon the Crown. It is then argued that this Court would be powerless to enforce a judgment of ouster in this case, that we could not order the Clerk to the Privy Council who is the servant of the King, to remove the names from the roll of Privy Councillors, neither could we prevent the immediate reinstatement of the names if the King thought fit to alter it. It is sufficient for the present purpose to say that a judgment pronounced in favour of the relator would not involve the making by this Court of an order upon the Clerk, neither would this Court be powerless to enforce the judgment if it were disobeyed by those against whom it was made. Although it may be interesting and useful for the purpose of testing the propositions under consideration to assume the difficulties suggested by the Attorney-General, none of them would in truth occur. This is the King's Court; we sit here to administer justice and to interpret the laws of the realm in the King's name. It is respectful and proper to assume that once the law is declared by a competent judicial authority it will be followed by the Crown."

See the case of Pir Illahi Bakhsh v. M. A. Khuhro, PLD, (1956) Sind 101 and Muhammad Akbar v. Dr. Khan Sahib, Chief Minister of West Pakistan, PLD, (1957) Karachi 387 for the circumstances in which quo warranto would issue. It has been held in the last mentioned of these two cases that (p. 391):

"The Rule that no person may invoke the Court's aid in respect of a wrongful act of a public nature, not affecting prejudicially the real and special interest or a specific legal right of the relator is true only so far as the issue of writs of mandamus and certiorari are concerned. In respect of writ of quo-warranto there is no such restriction and a member of the public may challenge a public act of the state provided that he does not do so mala fide as an instrument of others."

162. Writ Jurisdiction as a means of securing an overall "Judicial Control" of Administrative Action.

We have in the preceding pages reviewed the nature of writ jurisdiction and have commented briefly upon the scope of the several writs that have been mentioned by name in ARTs. 22 and 170. We have also drawn attention to the fact that the exercise of jurisdiction by the superior courts of our country to issue these writs is of a transcendent character and is in the nature of a power which by no means is solely confined to the issuing of the kind of writs that have been specifically mentioned in these Articles. The power of the High Courts is very wide indeed and extends to the issuing of not only the writs but also "orders" and "directions" for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by Part II and for any other purpose.

It is proposed, in what follows, to look at this constitutional power of the superior courts in this country in so far as its exercise may be regarded as a means for securing the overall judicial control of administrative action. For the purpose of present argument under the term "administrative action" we ought to include all action directed by the administration to give effect to the Constitution and the law so as to cover within its fold even legislative action—but not the exercise of "judicial" function or power. We have seen that 'administrative action' thus broadly defined is of the following species, and its exercise takes the following forms :

- (a) power to make laws under the Constitution,
- (b) power of the executive to administer the Constitution and the laws made by the legislature.

We have already noticed that the power to make laws is a mode of administering the Constitution. After all it is the Constitution that gives to the legislature in this country the power to make laws within certain limits.

Two broad features of the limitations imposed on legislative power by our Constitution have been noticed by us already, and all that is required in this context is to briefly refer to them. Because our polity is federal in character, the first type of legislative restraint has reference to the exercise of legislative powers reserved to the Federation and the Provinces within the bounds prescribed by ARTs. 105, 106 and 110 of our Constitution. If any of the two rival legislatures invades the field reserved to the other, its enactment would be void. The second type of legislative restraint has reference to the competence of the legislatures, Federal and Provincial, to pass laws in such a way as not to abridge or take away the fundamental rights that have been guaranteed under Part II of our Constitution. Any trespass into the arena or the sphere of fundamental rights is a transgression beyond the permissible range of legislative power and is a usurpation, and the laws passed in this forbidden field will be struck down by judicial power on the theory that it is "unconstitutional exercise of legislative power".

After the law is validly made the question of "the administration" of the law stricto sensu arises. The Executive, Federal or Provincial, has its extent or range of power defined by the Constitution: it is, as we have seen, coextensive with the power of the relevant legislature to pass laws. We have already commented on the nature of executive power and the limits within which it can be exercised.

A person may be aggrieved if he finds that his rights, fundamental or ordinary, have been violated by public functionaries either because they have acted outside the law or acted in the absence of any law that might have covered their acts. In such a case he can appeal to the judicial power for the vindication of his rights by means of commencing appropriate proceedings. He may contend :

- (a) that the public functionary claiming to act under a law has in fact not acted under any valid law,
- (b) that although the law a public functionary has acted under, is constitutional, he has, while professing to act pursuant to it, as a matter of fact, acted in a manner that is not permitted by the general law of the country—that is, he has acted mala fide, in excess of his jurisdiction, in utter violation of the fundamental rules of judicial procedure, etc.

The power may have been exercised under a colourable excuse that it was covered by law but the court may discover that in fact it was an exercise of power that was completely outside the law: thus the judicial control of administrative action reaches not only cases where the law is unconstitutional but also where the exercise of a power under law is itself beyond it.

These principles of judicial control vis-a-vis administrative action were stated in the case of Brundaban Chandra v. State of Orissa, AIR (1953) Orissa 121 at pp. 126 and 127 by Chief Justice Jagannadha Das :

"At this stage it is well to recapitulate the well-known principles with reference to which the exercise of a discretionary power vested by the statute in an administrative authority is open to be canvassed by the Courts. To start with, it may be taken as axiomatic that when power is conferred on somebody or authority by a Statute, the validity of the exercise of the power depends on its being strictly within the limits of the statute. As stated by Lord Justice J. Turner in—Tinkler v. The Board of Works for the Wansworth District (1858), 2 De G & J 261 at p. 274, although it may not be obligatory upon persons who have obtained an Act of Parliament empowering them to do something to do it at all, still if they do proceed to exercise the powers conferred on them by the Act, it is their bounden duty to keep strictly within those powers. Similarly it has been held in R. H. Galloway v. Mayor and Commonalty of London (1866), 1 English & Ir AC 34—43 that it is a well-recognised principle that when persons have received authority from the Legislature to exercise certain extraordinary powers interfering with private rights of individuals, the persons so authorised should be kept by the Courts strictly within the limits of the power conferred by statute and the Court should not allow them to exercise the powers for any collateral purposes.

"But as laid down by the House of Lords and as stated by Lord Chancellor Halsbury in the case of Westminster Corporation v. London and North Western Rly (1905), A C 426 at p. 427.

"Assuming the thing done to be within the discretion of the local body, no Court has power to interfere with the mode in which it has exercised it. Where the Legislature has confided the power to a particular body, with a discretion how it is to be used, it is beyond the power of any Court to contest that discretion. Of course, this assumes that the thing done is the thing which the Legislature has authorised."

Lord Macnaghten has pointed out, however, at p. 430 of the report of the same case—"It is well settled that a public body invested with statutory powers such as those conferred upon the corporation must take care not to exceed or abuse its powers. It must keep within the limits of the authority committed to it. It must act in good faith. And it must act reasonably. The last proposition is involved in the second, if not in the first.'

"Later on at p. 433 His Lordship refers to the dictum of Turner L. J., in Hill v. South Staffordshire Rly Co. (1864), 46 E R 363 when he states that

"powers such as those which are given to the corporation by an Act of Parliament are at all times to be exercised bona fide and with judgment and discretion."

"See also Stuart v. Anderson and Morrison, (1941) 2 All E R 665 at p. 671, which shows that where the authority concerned has not applied its mind to one of the essential matters, the power conferred on the authority cannot be said to have been exercised honestly and bona fide. See also my judgment reported in Ratanlal Gupta v. Dist. Magistrate, Ganjam, AIR (1952) Orissa 52 to 58.

"The above principles are summarised in Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd Edition, Vol. 31, paragraph 701 at page 535, which states as follows :

"The exercise of a discretion imposed by statute upon bodies or persons for particular purposes is not a merely ministerial act, and, if in the exercise of their discretion they act erroneously, they cannot be held responsible except upon proof of mala fides or indirect motive, or of some improper conduct materially affecting such exercise. The Court will not interfere with the discretion or revise the opinion of an administrative body, if there is anything on which that body can reasonably have come to its conclusion.'

"Again, in the same volume at p. 533, paragraph 697 it is stated as follows: 'Statutory powers must be exercised bona fide, reasonably, and without negligence.' No doubt, these cases refer only to the exercise of power vested in the local authorities or statutory corporations and the like. But they are general and are applicable to the exercise of power by any statutory authority. See also The King v. Nat Bell Liquors Ltd. 1922 AC 128 and R. v. Northumberland and Compensation Appeal Tribunal; Ex parte Shaw, (1952) 1 All E R 122.

"When the validity of such exercise is questioned, it is normally open to the Court to examine, firstly, whether the statutory requirements of the requisite procedure have been complied with and whether the facts requisite for the exercise of that power exist. See—'1942 Cal W N 230' (sic). Where the procedure contemplated by the statutes has been in fact observed and the requisite facts on which the power depends are found to exist, but the power given is a discretionary power to act or not to act, the Court has no jurisdiction to sit in judgment over the exercise of that discretion, except to the limited extent of satisfying itself that the discretion has been exercised bona fide, that is, with 'judgment and discretion' as has been said in the decided cases, and not arbitrarily or for extraneous purposes.

"Thus, to restate categorically the exercise of the statutory power is open to challenge broadly on three grounds: (a) non-observance of mandatory statutory procedure, (b) non-existence of the basic facts with reference to which the power is vested, and (c) an abuse of the discretion for collateral purpose or an arbitrary exercise thereof. Now it is clear that grounds 1 and 3 are always open to examination by Courts. But so far as the second ground is concerned, a further distinction arises. In the ordinary class of cases, the question as to whether the basic facts which confer the statutory power exist is one collateral to the exercise of the power itself and hence is one subject to examination by the ordinary Courts when the legality of the exercise of the power is challenged. The Queen v. Commrs. for Special Purposes of the Income Tax, (1888) 21 QBD 313 (I & J); and Colonial Bank of Australasia v. Willan, (1874) LR 5 PC 417. But it may sometimes happen as pointed out in those cases that the decision of the collateral facts with reference to which the power is vested in the authority concerned is vested in that authority itself by the statute. In such a case, the Court will be precluded from canvassing the correctness of that decision except for the purpose of satisfying itself that there has been a fair and judicial determination of these facts. Occasionally, however, as happens in recent statutes, the statute by its very terms indicates that the existence of the basic facts which give the power is left to the subjective satisfaction of the authority concerned and not to the judicial determination thereof by the said authority. In such a case, unless there is material on which the factum or the bona fides of that subjective satisfaction can be challenged, the Court is not in a position to canvass the existence of the basic facts which give rise to the statutory power. See—Liversidge v. Anderson, (1942) 1 C 206 and Nakkuda v. Jayaranta, 54 Cal WN 883 (PC)."

The several writs that we have considered so far may therefore be regarded from the point of view of furnishing to the judicial power the apparatus by resort to which effective judicial control of administrative action is to be secured. So regarded, the writ of habeas corpus reaches the person who is the keeper of the body of the petitioner, so that he may appear and show cause why the person in his custody who has been found to be illegally deprived of his liberty by him, be not set free. All questions which arise as subordinate issues for giving effect to this dominant purpose at once become relevant and the Court is bound to enquire into the allegations and counter-allegations made in this regard to discover whether the detention of the petitioner has been properly secured under the Constitution and the law. The writ of mandamus is directed to those public authorities that have neglected to perform or have willfully omitted to perform some specific statutory duty which is clearly shown to be incumbent on them by law and the dominant purpose of the proceeding is to compel them to conform to the requirement of the law. In this regard it is necessary to remember that the writ of mandamus is of enormous range and power and reaches the delinquent public servant not only in cases where some thing is directed by law to be done by such public authority which he has failed to do, but even to interdict any exercise of power by him which is shown to be illegal. In short, he could then be commanded to proceed to do his duty strictly by conducting himself in accordance with the requirement of the law. The writ of certiorari concentrates itself upon the record of the proceedings and is directed to the end that the orders that are shown to be the result of exercise of power by judicial bodies which do not legally vest in the public functionaries, be quashed. This defect of jurisdiction may stem from the fact that the power has been exercised mala fide, in defiance of the fundamental rules of judicial procedure sanctioned by canons of natural justice, or even from the fact that the order bears an imprint of guilt upon its face which tends to show that it has been begotten of the commission of legal errors countenanced in the course of the exercise of jurisdiction. The only limitation on certiorari jurisdiction is that it is available only in respect of correcting the record of inferior tribunals that are shown to be charged with a duty of acting judicially. Whether there is such a duty to act judicially or not will be discovered by "a construction of law" based upon the appreciation of the nature of Statute which creates the power and the conditions prescribed therein for the exercise of the power conferred by it. Writ of prohibition will go in circumstances where it is shown that there is total or partial absence or excess of jurisdiction and the object of the writ is to stop judicial or quasi-judicial body from persisting further on the path of the exercise of ultra-jurisdictional power. We have seen that prohibition is not confined necessarily to stopping judicial or quasi-judicial bodies, but that it reaches even ministerial or purely administrative bodies provided it can be shown that they have clutched at a jurisdiction which is not vested in them by law or that having entered upon the enjoyment of their jurisdiction in a lawful manner, have since transgressed it. The writ of quo warranto reaches the usurper of public office or franchise and is the device for bringing up the delinquent pretender to such an office before the court so that a trial of his claim or pretence to hold such office or franchise may take place.

Thus the power to issue these writs taken in conjunction with the wide and the practically unfettered power of issuing appropriate directions or orders in their totality become a formidable weapon in the hands of the courts wherewith to smite all transgressors against law and the Constitution. It is this aspect of writ jurisdiction that makes Sir Ernest Barkar say:

"...We have had Judges, and these Judges have worked out legal processes and they have deposited them in things, which as I understand, are called writs. In my ignorance I almost worship the writs which the Judges of English Common Law have invented and also have practised day in and day out, in their Courts. I worship the writ of habeas corpus, which has, I fancy, a respectable antiquity of seven centuries. I have also a great veneration for some other writs of the same general type as habeas corpus—the writs called mandamus and certiorari and prohibition, which can all, like habeas corpus be used to ensure the doing of proper justice in the sphere of criminal law. And on the whole I put my faith not in declaration of Rights (though I see their point) but in the writs and the general procedure and the general judgment of the lawyers".

If a power is exercised mala fide, for collateral purposes, that is for purposes other than those for which the power has been conferred by the legislature upon public functionaries, the result is one which cannot at all be defended as being in any manner authorised by law. And if such a result comes in conflict with the rights of anyone in the realm, the person aggrieved would be entitled to invoke the aid of the judicial power for getting relief against the mischief caused by such an unauthorised interference with his rights.

All through our study of the constitutional scope of the several writs we were concerned with the task of comprehending the theory and practice of English law upon that subject. And we did all that advisedly for the judicial wisdom embodied in the ruling practice of the English courts, more particularly at a point of time when our Constitution came to be enacted, is of considerable assistance to us in the matter of interpreting the real scope of the judicial power that has been reserved to the superior courts of this country under ARTs. 22 and 170. But having said all that, it is wise to remember that there is one fundamental difference between the system of English jurisprudence and our own which has to be given its due effect—and this has reference to the comparative supremacy of the judicial power vested in the High Courts of our country. We have a written Constitution with guaranteed rights and this has made, in the opinion of the present writer, considerable difference to the theory and practice of the controlling jurisdiction of the superior courts in this country. English jurisprudence is based upon the constitutional theory that there are no guaranteed rights, whereas our own, after the establishment of the Constitution, is founded upon the theory that there are constitutionally guaranteed rights. The English courts have evolved rules of interpretation of statutes based on the assumptions that right to life, liberty and property cannot be thrown in jeopardy except by an express legislative decree. But whatever might be said about the sanctity or force of this rule, it cannot be forgotten that, it is a rule of interpretation, pure and simple, and not a constitutional principle that has been expressly declared as is the case with us under our Constitution. With us the foundation of our law is a written Constitution which guarantees certain rights and prohibits Executive and Legislature from abridging or taking away those rights. In view of this radical difference between the two systems of jurisprudence the exercise of controlling jurisdiction of the High Court with us is anchored in a safer soil.

In our case, when a public functionary acts outside the law he could be shown to be acting contrary to an expressly guaranteed constitutional right or a right flowing from the general law of the land, the continuance of which has been constitutionally sanctioned by ART. 224 of our Constitution. The exercise of writ jurisdiction therefore acquires an added importance in a system of a written Constitution that is crowned with the stars of guaranteed rights than it does in a system of jurisprudence where these rights are left to be inferred by appeal to the principles of the common law of the land.

The importance of this controlling jurisdiction of the High Courts cannot be overestimated. In our day, when the State has come to play the role, by reason of which it lays claim to being regarded "a welfare State" the power of the Executive has increased to an enormous extent indeed, and what is more in the words of Sir Hartley Shaw Cross, the Attorney General of England, "Administrative law has come to stay". The only way to preserve the basic rights of people is to exercise judicial control, be it even so of a limited kind, upon the conduct of these tribunals. Nor again is the exercise of this control in any sense 'interference' with the administrative functions of the officers of the State, to which any exception can be taken. Chief Justice Chagla in the case of State of Bombay v.

Laxmidas AIR (1952) Bombay 468, at p. 475, while dealing with the contention of Advocate-General of Bombay that "it is impossible for a State to function if there is a constant interference by the High Court in the executive acts performed by the officers of the State", remarked:

"It may be that interference by the High Court may result in inconvenience or difficulty in administration. But what we have to guard against is a much greater evil. When we find in the modern State wide powers entrusted to Government, powers which affect the property and person of the citizen, it is the duty of the Courts to see that those wide powers are exercised in conformity with what the Legislature has prescribed. We are not oblivious of the fact that in order that the modern State should function the Government must be armed with very large powers. But the High Court does not interfere with the exercise of those powers. The High Court only interferes when it finds that those powers are not exercised in accordance with the mandate of the Legislature. Therefore, far from interfering with the good governance of the State, the Court helps the good governance by constantly reminding Government and its officers that they should act within the four corners of the statute and not contravene any of the conditions laid down as a limitation upon their undoubtedly wide powers. Therefore, even from a practical point of view, even from the point of view of the good governance of the State, we think that the High Court should not be reluctant to issue its prerogative writ whenever it finds that the sovereign Legislature has not been obeyed and powers have been assumed which the Legislature never conferred upon the executive."

163. Comparison with the judicial review power of the United States Supreme Court.

We have reviewed the mechanism of judicial control of the administrative action as one sees it reflected in the theory and practice of the system of jurisprudence of the commonwealth countries. We have, on purpose, avoided so far making any reference to the American experience upon this subject, and that was for the reason that although the American Courts are steeped in the tradition of common law, which they have inherited from their cousins across the Atlantic, they have developed the doctrine of 'judicial review' which in its present form exhibits numerous distinguishing features when it is viewed side by side with what may be regarded as its counterpart in the system of common law jurisprudence—that is, as it is to be seen at work in England and other commonwealth countries. It is proposed, in what follows, to offer, be it even so sketchily, a comparative statement of the law on the subject, so that the student is helped to understand the peculiar logic of the American doctrine of 'judicial review' as it is applied by the United States Supreme Court to the problems of administrative law.

The judicial review of administrative decisions in America may be grounded on any one of the following considerations :

1. Is the decision based on law which is consistent with the supreme law of the land, that is the Constitution?
2. Has the administrator acted within the limits of his authority?
3. Has the administrator followed the rules of natural justice in reaching his decision?
4. Is the decision of the administrator based on evidence of "rational probative force", the test being not whether the decision is right but whether it is reasonable?

The means of enforcing or exerting judicial power of review of administrative action in this regard may be either by way of a statutory remedy, as an appeal etc., or by way of non-statutory remedies like the writs of certiorari, prohibition, habeas corpus, man- aamus, quo-warranto or equity injunction (see on this subject generally Willoughby's Constitution of the United States, 1929 Ed. pp. 1655—1660).

We will now proceed to comment on the constitutional significance of this power of judicial review of administrative action and the limits within which it is available in America.

In the first place, it is necessary to remember that considerable bulk of case-law of the United States Supreme Court vis-a-vis its controlling jurisdiction has reference to the scrupulous care with which it deals with challenges directed against the unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. The theory of separation of powers has brought about judicial recognition of the necessity of vigilantly guarding against certain questionable forms in which the exercise of delegated power by the administrative tribunals takes place, that is, forms which may be regarded as in reality the exercise of legislative power.

We have already commented in another part of this work upon the trends noticeable in the history of the development of the doctrine of unconstitutional delegation of legislative power in United States, and have observed that with the increasing complexities of governmental functions the attitude of United States Supreme Court has decidedly undergone a radical change: it no longer takes a doctrinaire approach to the theory of separation of powers which it now concedes after all is a political maxim and not a technical rule of law. The power of the judicial review exercised by the Supreme Court is now confined more or less to observing whether or not in fact the grant of power by the legislature is inordinate or excessive and with this perspective in view it endeavours to see whether or not such power as has been delegated by the Congress is regulated by some well defined standards with reference to which its exercise by administrative authorities could be adjudged as being within the permissible field. As was observed in the case of A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States of America, (1935) 295 U.S. 495: 79 Law Ed. 1570:

"So long as a policy is laid down and a standard established by a statute, no unconstitutional delegation of legislative power is involved in leaving to selected instrumentalities the making of subordinate rules within prescribed limits and the determination of facts to which the policy as declared by the legislature is to apply".

In England, of course, the question of unconstitutional delegation of legislative power does not so much as arise for the consideration of courts for the simple reason that there the parliamentary enactment is immune from judicial scrutiny on any score whatever.

Secondly, where the exercise of administrative power in America is challenged on the grounds that it offends against the 'due process' clause of the 5th and the 14th Amendments, the courts examine that ground of challenge with a view to ascertaining whether or not the minimum procedural safeguards that have been secured by the constitutional 'due process' guarantee have been complied with. Broadly considered, these procedural safeguards may be viewed as being the counterparts of the content of the doctrine of natural justice upon the premises of which determinations of inferior tribunals are corrected by the King's Bench Division in England. Despite the extreme vigilance of the American courts to insist upon the conformity of administrative processes with the procedural safeguards embodied in the 'due process' clause, of late in America, there has been a demand made by the people of that country that the power of interference by the courts of that country should be rendered more extensive than the one which is exercised by them under the aegis of 'due process' clause. A student interested in following up these highly significant developments would do well to read the case of Wong Yang Sung v. M Grath reported in (1950) 94 Lawyers Edition 616 where Mr. Justice Jackson, speaking on behalf of the majority court, has reviewed the history of those steps that have culminated in the passing of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946. By means of this Act, the Congress has laid down the minimum requirements which must be fulfilled by administrative tribunals and commissions—safeguards, as for instance, that the officer conducting the hearing shall not be responsible to or subject to the supervision of investigating and prosecuting officers and shall not have performed investigating or prosecuting function in the pending or a factually related case. In other words, this Act sets out in detail, the basic pattern to which administrative process must conform in order to meet the requirements of uniformity, impartiality and fairness, the alleged lack of which gave rise to its enactment. The Act was framed against a background of rapid expansion of the administrative process, as a measure of check upon administrators whose zeal might otherwise have carried them to excesses not contemplated by the legislatures creating their offices. It created safeguards even more stringent than the constitutional ones, against arbitrary official encroachment on private rights, (see page 632 of 94 Lawyers Edition). The importance of the legislation embodied in the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 cannot be over-estimated and one would wish that some such legislation were passed in our country where too the menace of administrative powers, the exercise of which increasingly impinges gravely upon private rights, is reaching unbearable proportions.

Thirdly, at one time the American courts allowed the "jurisdictional facts" to be re-opened with a view to seeing whether or not those facts have been correctly determined. This power of judicial review was on par with the parallel power of the superior courts in the Commonwealth countries exercised under the aegis of prerogative writs. As has been remarked earlier, inferior tribunals cannot be suffered to confer jurisdiction upon themselves by wrongly deciding those questions of facts upon the establishment of which facts the very availability of their authority to deal with certain situations is itself contingent. (See White and Collins v. Minister of Health (1939) 2 K.B. 838, as reflecting the English view upon the subject; and Crowell v. Benson (1932) 285 U.S. 22: 76 Law Ed. 598 as representing the American view. In the latter case the Supreme Court had to deal with an enactment which had provided for compensation in respect of disability or death of employees from an injury occurring upon the navigable waters of the United States and it took the view that the fact that the death should result from an injury occurring upon the navigable waters of United States was a jurisdictional and fundamental fact and it did not lie with the administrative authority to determine the facts finally so as to preclude the superior courts in appropriate proceedings to re-determine that fact for the purpose of enforcing a constitutional right that is properly asserted). In subsequent cases, however, Supreme Court has veered away from this view and in several cases has refused to re-open the decisions on jurisdictional fact rendered by administrative tribunals. See National Labor Relations Board v. Hearst Publications (1944) 322 U.S. 111: 88 Law Ed. 1170; and City of Yonkers v. United States (1944) 320 U.S. 685: 88 Law Ed. 400. In the last mentioned case the Court came to the conclusion that there were no requisite jurisdictional findings recorded by the Interstate Commerce Commission and without deciding the controversy on merits they set aside the order of the Commission. Mr. Justice Douglas observed:

"The Congress has entrusted to the Commission the initial responsibility for determining through application of the statutory standards the appropriate line between the federal and state domains. Proper regard for the rightful concern of local interests in the management of local transportation facilities makes desirable the requirement that federal power be exercised only where the statutory authority affirmatively appears. . . . The insistence that the Commission make these jurisdictional findings before it undertakes to act not only gives added assurance that the local interests for which Congress expressed its solicitude will be safeguarded, it also gives to the reviewing courts the assistance of an expert judgment on a knotty phase of a technical subject."

"We are asked to presume that the Commission, knowing the limit of its authority, considered this jurisdictional question and decided to act because of its conviction that this branch line was not exempt by reason of ART. 1(22). But that is to deal too cavalierly with the Congressional mandate and with the local interests which are pressing for recognition. Where a federal agency is authorized to invoke an overriding federal power except in certain prescribed situations and then to leave the problem to traditional state control, the existence of federal authority to act should appear affirmatively and not rest on inference alone.

"This is not to insist on formalities and to burden the administrative process with ritualistic requirements. It entails a matter of great substance. It requires the Commission to heed the mandates of the Act and to make the expert determinations which are conditions precedent to its authority to act."

Mr. Justice Frankfurter dissented and was joined in by Mr. Reed and Mr. Jackson. Mr. Justice Frankfurter viewed the problem from a different angle altogether. He felt that there was no defect in the foundation of Commission's order.

"No doubt" he remarked (at p. 694), "the Interstate Commerce Commission like other administrative agencies should keep within legal bounds and courts should keep them there, in so far as Congress has entrusted them with judicial review over administrative acts. Of course when a statute makes indispensable 'an express finding,' an express finding is imperative.....But the history of the Interstate Commerce Act and its amendments illumine the different legal functions expressed by the term findings. When Congress exacts from the Commission formal findings there is an end to the matter.

.....But courts have also spoken of the need of findings as the basis of validity of an order by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the absence of a Congressional direction for findings. The requirement of findings in such a context is merely part of the need for courts to know what it is that the Commission has really determined in order that they may know what to review."

Such findings, however, according to Mr. Justice Frankfurter should not be described as jurisdictional (at p. 695).

"Findings in this sense is a way of describing the duty of the Commission to decide issues actually in controversy before it. Analysis is not furthered by speaking of such findings as 'jurisdictional' and not even when—to adapt a famous phrase—jurisdictional is softened by a quasi. 'Jurisdiction' competes with 'right' as one of the most deceptive of legal pitfalls. The opinions in Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22 and the casuistries to which they have given rise bear unedifying testimony of the morass into which one is led in working out problems of judicial review over administrative decisions by loose talk about jurisdiction."

Mr. Justice Frankfurter thus declined to interfere holding that the non-mention of the express finding was not material in the circumstances of that case.

It would appear from the foregoing account that both in England and Commonwealth countries on the one hand, and United States on the other, the balance is sought to be struck between the vesting of administrative discretion and due regard to the legal security of the individual by means of the exercise of jurisdiction by ordinary court's power of review of the determination of inferior tribunals. Whether it is appeal to due process clause or to the Administrative Procedure Act, 1946, the American Supreme Court endeavours to reach the very results that are being attempted by King's Bench Division and other Supreme Courts working in Commonwealth countries by resort to their controlling authority over the inferior tribunals. Thus it is that the rule of law is reconciled with the necessity of giving large measure of powers to administrative tribunals by securing the control of administrative action by the ordinary courts of the country. Thus are the liberties and rights of private citizens duly safeguarded against the assaults that are increasingly being made upon them by the exercise of administrative power which, under the exigencies of highly intricate economic problems with which the Modern State is confronted, it has become absolutely necessary to vest in administrative tribunals.

We have so far stressed the need of securing an effective control of administrative action and have emphasized the supreme importance of the superior courts of our country vigilantly exercising their powers of superintendence and control of administrative tribunals. Having said that, it becomes necessary to point out to the reader the value of letting administrative tribunals function without much interference from ordinary courts. The case can best be stated in the words used by President Roosevelt in his message to Congress when he vetoed the Logan-Walter Bill, which was a piece of legislative measure passed by the Congress with a view to securing the widest possible scope for the judicial review of the work of the administrative tribunals in the United States. The present writer has no doubt that the reader would be impressed by the reasoning contained in the message. And in order to appreciate the force of the remarks made by the President the reader would do well to remember that the legislation, which the President was vetoing in this message, had the blessing of American Bar Association, and further that it was due to the very Select Committee that had been set up by the President, as mentioned in the last paragraph of the following extract from the message, that the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946, to which a reference has been made earlier, saw the light of the day.

"The objective of the bill is professedly the assurance of fairness in administrative proceedings. With that objective there will be universal agreement. The promotion of expeditious, orderly, and sensible procedure in the conduct of public affairs is a purpose which commands itself not only to the Congress and the courts, but to the executive departments and administrative agencies themselves.....

"I am convinced, however, that in reality the effect of this bill would be to reverse and, to a large extent, cancel one of the most significant and useful trends of the 20th century in legal administration.

"That movement has its origin in the recognition even by courts themselves that the conventional processes of the court are not adapted to handling controversies in the mass. Court procedure is adapted to the intensive investigation of individual controversies. But it is impossible to subject the daily routine of fact-finding in many of our agencies to court procedure. Litigation has become costly beyond the ability of the average person to bear. Its technical rules of procedure are often traps for the unwary and technical rules of evidence often prevent common sense determinations on information which would be regarded as adequate for any business decision. The increasing cost of competent legal advice and the necessity of relying upon lawyers to conduct court proceedings have made all laymen and most lawyers recognize the inappropriateness of entrusting routine processes of government to the outcome of never-ending lawsuits.

"The administrative tribunal or agency has been evolved in order to handle controversies arising under particular statutes. It is characteristic of these tribunals that simple and non-technical hearings take the place of court trials, and informal proceedings supersede rigid and formal pleadings and processes. A common-sense resort to usual and practical sources of information takes the place of archaic and technical application of rules of evidence, and an informed and expert tribunal renders its decisions with an eye that looks forward to results rather than backwards to precedent and to the leading case.

"Substantial justice remains a higher aim for our civilization than technical legalism..

"Forward-looking judges, experienced administrators, and many progressive and public-spirited lawyers have recognized that American jurisprudence must advance along two lines:

"First, the cheapening, expediting, and amplifying of the judicial process itself. This cause has been greatly advanced through the adoption by the Supreme Court of simplified rules governing civil proceedings under an authorization made upon my recommendation. Revision of the rules of criminal practice has now also been authorized, upon my recommendation.

"Secondly, the reservation of the judicial process for cases appropriate to its exercise and protection of the courts from being overwhelmed with masses of controversies, growing out of regulatory and remedial statutes. For this purpose the judicial process requires to be supplemented by the administrative tribunal wherever there is a necessity for deciding issues on a quantity production basis.

"Notwithstanding recognition of the necessity by many lawyers, jurists, educators, administrators, and the more progressive bar associations, a large part of the legal profession has never reconciled itself to the existence of the administrative tribunal. Many of them prefer the stately ritual of the courts, in which lawyers play all the speaking parts, to the simple procedure of administrative hearings which a client can understand and even participate in. Many of the lawyers prefer that decisions be influenced by a shrewd play upon technical rules of evidence in which the lawyers are the only experts, although they always disagree. Many of the lawyers still prefer to distinguish precedent and to juggle leading cases rather than to get down to the merits of the efforts in which their clients are engaged. For years, such lawyers have led a persistent fight against the administrative tribunal.

"In addition to the lawyers who see the administrative tribunal encroaching upon their exclusive prerogatives there are powerful interests which are opposed to reforms that can only be made effective through the use of the administrative tribunal. Wherever a continuing series of controversies exist between a powerful and concentrated interest on one side and a diversified mass of individuals, each of whose separate interests may be small, on the other side, the only means of obtaining equality before the law has been to place the controversy in an administrative tribunal.

"Individual shippers could not cope in the courts with great railroad corporations over excessive charges that were small in single cases but important in the aggregate. So the Interstate Commerce Commission was created. Power consumers could not deal with electric light rates, nor could individual security holders pit their strength against the concentrated power of brokerage interests, nor could individual laborers bargain on equality with the concentrated power of employers. The very heart of modern reform administration is the administrative tribunal. A 'truth in securities' act without an administrative tribunal to enforce it, or a labour relations act without an administrative tribunal to administer it, or rate regulation without a commission to supervise rates would be sterile and useless. Great interests, therefore, which desire to escape regulation rightly see that if they can strike at the heart of modern reform by sterilizing the administrative tribunal which administers them, they will have effectively destroyed the reform itself.

"The bill that is now before me is one of the repeated efforts by a combination of lawyers who desire to have all processes of government conducted through lawsuits and of interests which desire to escape regulations. The effort was made in the recent New York constitutional convention by this same combination of influences to deprive state tribunals of their authority. That effort was wisely rejected by the people at the polls.

The effort was continued on a national scale to destroy the administrative tribunals which enforce the nation's import laws. It is from this background that this bill has emerged.

"While I could not conscientiously approve any bill which would turn the clock backwards and place the entire functioning of the government at the mercy of never-ending lawsuits and subject all administrative acts and processes to the control of the judiciary, I am of course not unaware that improvement in the administrative process is as much the duty of those concerned with it as the improvement of the court procedure ought to be a duty of the legal profession.

"Recognizing this, more than a year ago I directed the Attorney-General to select a committee of eminent lawyers, jurists, scholars, and administrators to review the entire administrative process in the various departments of the executive government and to recommend improvements, including the suggestion of any needed legislation."

In conclusion, it remains to be stressed that both in England and in America the expert opinion increasingly inclines on the side of establishing "Administrative Tribunals" on the lines of the Conseil d'Etat in France so as to be able to bring in a wide range of administrative acts within the scrutiny of courts. This tribunal combines a number of distinct judicial functions: it hears the claims of the subject that a given administrative department has acted ultra vires and also hears cases where he seeks annulation of some administrative decision. It also decides contentieux de pliene jurisdiction and gives in suitable cases redress against damage caused by an administrative decision. In France as a result of the existence of separate systems of courts, Ordinary and Administrative, the subject has to seek the redress of his grievances against administrative action in administrative courts. But this is no disadvantage to him for under the Droit Administratif, virtually for every administrative wrong there is a remedy and the Judges who preside the Administrative Courts are, if at all, pro-subject. They are, on all evidence, men of vision and above all, courageous. It is true that here you have not the sentimental satisfaction of living under that Rule of Law of which Dicey speaks with such a romantic fervour and sings such idolatrous hymns of praise but even the Conservative English Jurists are now beginning to realize the limits within which they could justifiably praise their own system of living under the Rule of Law.

"We seem to have fallen between two stools: anxious to maintain a theoretically universal rule of law, we preserve merely the fiction of a formal legalism and in fact abandon the executive to its own unattractive instincts." (See Mr. C. J. Hamson's article in the Times for February 20, 1951 and February 21, 1951.)

THE NATURE, STRUCTURE AND REACH OF JUDICIAL POWER

(In four Sections)

- SECTION I : GENERAL NATURE AND SCOPE OF JUDICIAL POWER
- SECTION II : CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITS ON JUDICIAL POWER IN SPECIFIED MATTERS.
- SECTION III : JURISDICTIONAL ASPECTS OF THE SUPERIOR COURTS OF OUR COUNTRY.
- SECTION IV : OUTLINE OF THE GENERAL SYSTEM OF LAW AND COURTS OF OUR COUNTRY.

I take leave to say that I am not conscious of the vulgar desire to elevate myself or the court of which I may be member, by grasping after a pre-eminence which does not belong to me, and that I will endeavour to be valiant in preserving and handing down those powers to do justice and to maintain truth, which, for common good, the law has entrusted to the judges.

per Wiles, J. (in ex parte Fernandez) 1861, 10 C.B. (N.S.) 3, at 56.

The first submission put forward by counsel for the defendants was that a duty to be careful in making statements arose only out of a contractual duty to the plaintiff or a fiduciary relationship to him. Apart from such cases no action, he said, had ever been allowed for negligent statements, and he urged that this want of authority was a reason against it being allowed now. This argument about the novelty of the action does not appeal to me. It has been put forward in all the great cases which have been milestones of progress in our law, and it has nearly always been rejected. If one reads Ashby v. White, [(1703) 2 Ld. Baraym. 2938; 92 E.R. 126; revsd. (1704), 1 Bro. Parl. Cas. 62; 1 E.R. 417; 36 Digest 289, 376], Pasley v. Freeman, [(1789) 3 Term. Rep. 51; 100 E.R. 450; 35 Digest 25, 163], and Donoghue v. Stevenson [(1932) A.C. 562; 101 L.J.P.C. 119; 147 L.T. 281; Digest Supp.] one finds that in each of them the Judges were divided in opinion. On the one side there were the timorous souls who were fearful of allowing a new cause of action. On the other side there were the bold spirits who were ready to allow it if justice so required. It was fortunate for the common law that the progressive view prevailed. Whenever this argument of novelty is put forward I call to mind the emphatic answer given by Pratt, C. J. nearly two hundred years ago in Chapman v. Pickersgill [(1762) 2 Wils. 145; 95 E.R. 734; 1 Digest 24; 193] when he said (2 Wils. 146):

"I wish never to hear this objection again. This action is for a tort: torts are infinitely various, not limited or confined, for there is nothing in nature but may be an instrument of mischief...."

The same answer was given by Lord Macmillan in Donoghue v. Stevenson when he said:

"The criterion of judgment must adjust and adapt itself to the changing circumstances of life. The categories of negligence are never closed."

It needs only a little imagination to see how much the common law would have suffered if those decisions had gone the other way.

—per Denning, L. J. while delivering minority judgment in Candler v. Crane Christman & Co. 1951, 1 All. E. R. 426, 432.

In the same case Asquith, L. J. after reviewing the case law applicable, said:

"I am not concerned with defending the existing state of the law or contending that it is strictly logical. It clearly is not—but I am merely recording what I think it is. If this relegates me to the company of 'timorous souls', I must face the consequence with such fortitude as I can command."

SECTION—I

General Nature & Scope of Judicial Power

164. Consideration of ARTs. 148—172.

Part IX of our Constitution describes the Constitution and Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court (ARTs. 148–164), and of the High Courts (ARTs. 165–172) and mentions some general provisions which are applicable to both the Supreme Court and the High Courts (ARTs. 173–178). The provisions of this Part are to be read along with the provisions of Third Schedule, a schedule which also deals with judiciary and amplifies in several respects the provisions of Part IX of our Constitution. (See ARTs. 159 and 177).

In so far as the constitution, jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court of Pakistan are concerned, the provisions contained in our Constitution are sufficiently comprehensive and may be taken by themselves as constituting a consolidated code within the limits whereof that Court is to function; but in so far as the two High Courts (that is, the High Courts of East and West Pakistan), are concerned, the provisions contained in our Constitution set-forth matters like the appointment and the tenure of the office of the Judges of the High Courts in our country etc., but in regard to their jurisdiction, that is, their legal competence to act as High Courts, the constitution says very little indeed. Beyond ART. 170, which mentions their "writ-jurisdiction", and ART. 171 which describes their power to transfer to their own respective files cases pending in a Court subordinate to them, involving "a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, the determination of which is necessary for the disposal of the case", the scope of a High Court's general jurisdiction is left to be inferred from the state of pre-existing law, and for this reference will have to be made to ART. 227(5) and ART. 224, (1) which in general terms provide for the continuance in force of the existing laws and their adaptations. According to explanation 1 to clause (1) of ART. 224 the expression laws occurring in this Article is to be construed as including Letters Patent constituting a High Court.

There is, however, no provision in our Constitution analogous to the one which is to be found in the Indian Constitution where in Article 225 it is expressly provided:

"Subject to the provisions of this Constitution and to the provisions of any law of the appropriate Legislature made by virtue of powers conferred on that Legislature by this Constitution, the jurisdiction of, and the law administered in, any existing High Court, and the respective powers of the Judges thereof in relation to the administration of justice in the Court, including any power to make rules of Court and to regulate the sittings of the Court and of members thereof sitting alone or in Division Courts, shall be the same as immediately before the commencement of this Constitution:

"Provided that any restriction to which the exercise of original jurisdiction by any of the High Courts with respect to any matter concerning the revenue or concerning any act ordered or done in the collection thereof was subject immediately before the commencement of this Constitution shall no longer apply to the exercise of such jurisdiction".

This provision corresponds to section 223 of the Government of India Act, 1935, where too the previous jurisdiction enjoyed by, and the law administered in, any "existing High

The jurisdiction of Supreme Court completely—but of High Courts only partially set forth in our Constitution.

Court" was preserved and ostensibly the proviso to Indian ART. 225 is calculated to remove the restriction on its general jurisdiction imposed by section 226 of the Government of India Act, 1935, wherein it was provided, "Until otherwise provided by Act of the appropriate Legislature, no High Court shall have any original jurisdiction in any matter concerning the Revenue or concerning any act ordered or done in collection thereof according to the usage and practice of the country or the law for the time being in force."

165. Scope of present study of the provisions relating to Judiciary

It will be useful for the proper study of the provisions of our Constitution relating to judiciary to deal with the jurisdictional aspects of the two species of the superior Courts of Pakistan, that is the Supreme Court of Pakistan and of the High Courts, separately from the appreciation of those provisions that deal with questions like the appointment, tenure, and the guarantees and safeguards calculated to secure the independence of the Judges who constitute the personnel of these Courts. But before we proceed to deal with these constitutional questions it is necessary to state, by way of a general introduction to the study of the relevant provisions of our Constitution, some essential features of the nature and scope of judicial power that has been established under our Constitution. We will understand the provisions of the Constitution better if we could grasp the essential nature of the judicial power before we set out to analyse the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the High Courts established under the Constitution.

166. Nature and Scope of Judicial Power

"Judiciary" may be broadly defined as that organ of sovereign power which is entrusted with the duty of "administering justice according to Constitution and the law". It is, what may be called, the law-applying organ of the State.

Judicial Power—No vesting provision in our Constitution corresponding to the U.S. and Australian Constitutions.

Some definitions of Judicial Powers stated

Huddart's case

Shell Co. of Australia vs. Federal Commissioners

It is true that in our Constitution there is no Article corresponding to ART. III, S.1, of the Constitution of the U.S.A., which, as has been pointed earlier, provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. Nor again have we a provision like S.71 of the Australian Constitution which provides, "The Judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other Federal Courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other Courts as it invests with Federal jurisdiction . . ." (See analysis of the scheme of Australian Constitution Act in Attorney General of Australia v. Reginam (1957) 2 All E.R. p. 45). There is, however, in our Constitution a provision for the establishment of the Supreme Court of Pakistan, a definition of its powers and jurisdiction, and also a provision for the establishment of the two High Courts of East and West Pakistan and, in a limited way, a description of their powers and jurisdictions. But it is not possible to understand the nature and extent of the jurisdiction of these two superior Courts, as also of other subordinate Courts, established under several laws that have been continued in existence after the "constitution day" under ART. 224, without clearly grasping the nature of the judicial process itself and the role which our Courts play in the orderly working of the State machinery.

"Judicial power" as used in S.71 of the Australian Constitution, said Griffith, C.J., in Huddart's case (8. C.L.R. p. 330 at 357), "means the power which every sovereign authority must of necessity have to decide controversies between its subjects, or between itself and its subjects, whether the rights relate to life, liberty or property. The exercise of this power does not begin until some tribunal which has power to give a binding and authoritative decision (whether subject to appeal or not) is called upon to take action." This statement was approved by the Judicial Committee in Shell Co. of Australia v. Federal Com- missioners of Taxation, (1931) A.C. 275 and again in Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan v. John East Iron Works Ltd. (1949) P.C. 129. (See also New South Wales and another v. Commonwealth & others, (1915) 20 C.L.R. 54, for the statement by Isaacs, J. of the Australian High Court as to what the idea of Judicial Power connotes. The question there was whether the use of the word 'Adjudication' in S.101 of the Constitution is sufficient to empower the Commonwealth Parliament to create Inter-State Commission a Court of Justice, that is a Federal Court in strict sense and to invest it with judicial power on that basis. The learned Judge has there reviewed some leading cases on the subject.)

"Judicial power" according to the definition given by Miller J., is the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision. (See Miller, on Constitution, p. 314 New York 1891).

"The Court", says Mr. Eaton Drone, "has authority to expound the Constitution only in cases presented to it for adjudication. Its Judges may see the President usurping powers that do not belong to him, Congress exercising functions it is forbidden to exercise, a State asserting rights denied to it. The Court has no authority to interfere until its office is invoked in a case submitted to it in the manner prescribed by law." (Quoted by Marriott from Forum, February 1890, in his English Political Institutions p. 293 (1938 Edn.).

It is the hallmark of judicial power (statutory exceptions apart), that it cannot initiate anything: it decides controversies only when its authority is invoked. When invoked, by means of appropriate proceedings, Judicial Power is exercised by means of a certain process: and the best description of this 'process' is the one given by Professor William A. Robson who remarks in his book "Justice and Administrative Law at p. 36 (3rd Edition) as follows: "The process involves the application of a body of rules or principles by the technique of a particular psychological method; the whole decision taking place within a frame-work possessing recognisable institutional features. The body of rules or principles is the law; the psychological method consists in the application of what may be called the judicial mind; and the institutional frame-work is the Court system. The entire process, in which the three are used in combination, is denoted by the expression, 'justice according to law'."

166. Hierarchy of Courts

The entire realm of law presupposes for its recognition and enforcement a set-up of Courts, indeed a veritable hierarchy of Courts with the Supreme Court at the apex of the pyramid of the judicial system. These Courts reflect the structure of the judicial power, and a considerable bulk of the law of our country defines the jurisdictional aspects of the different law-applying organs of the State. Different component parts of our legal system have reference to the establishment of the different Courts in our country and the definition of their jurisdiction. The theory of our law is that every judicial authority has itself to have a foundation in law and it is the right of any party to the proceedings before it, on being advised that such a foundation is lacking or is non-existent, to challenge its authority to administer justice "according to law".

Dictum of Miller J. cited

Hierarchy of Courts.

Authority of Courts to evolve legal principles.

it to be discovered the "reason for the decision", the ratio decidendi as it is called, which in its turn acquires, within limits, a binding value as a source of law for the same, co-ordinate or subordinate courts. Thus it is that law is made in the process of reaching a judicial decision.

"The English jurisprudence", said Burke, "hath not any other sure foundation, nor consequently the lives and property of the subject any sure hold, but in the maxims, rules, and the principles, and the judicial traditionary line of decision contained in the notes taken, and from time to time published, called Reports. To give judgment privately is to put an end to Reports; and to put an end to Reports is to put an end to the law of England." The point of these remarks is not without some meaning for our system of law which has undoubtedly been greatly influenced by the Institutes of English Law. The solution of legal problems, as they arise in the course of litigation in our Courts, very largely depends upon (a) correct interpretation of the Statute Law, (b) the recognition and enforcement of such customary law as may be deemed binding upon Courts in the light of those principles which have been evolved by the Courts themselves as determining the legal validity of custom, as also upon (c) the correct analysis and application of the judicial precedents.

A judicial precedent is an important source of law and is invariably of considerable assistance in the determination of controversies that arise in our Courts.

The legal history of our country presents to us an ever-growing stream of case law, a stream, which keeps up swelling with the passage of time. It keeps up moving forward with a steadily increasing momentum. This stream has been fed, among other things, by a current of legal decisions in so far as they have evolved legal principles, defined juristic concepts and made them applicable to the problems that have been presented to the Courts during the course of day-to-day litigation. The judicial power has reference to this competence and capacity of the law-applying organs of the State to take cognizance of the law as it exists and subject to the limitations within which the exercise of that power is itself controlled by the very law that creates and defines their jurisdiction, to settle the rights of people, to fix their obligations and to impose liabilities that may have been incurred by them. Strange to say, in professing to apply the law, the Courts virtually create the law.

Courts in Pakistan are creatures of the Constitution and the Law and they are to apply law in the settlement of disputes and controversies that are brought before them. If following Sir John Salmond, we were to define law "as a body of principles recognised and applied by State in the administration of justice", then our Courts can well be described as constituting the principal forum in which this activity of administering justice is to be carried on.

167. Are our Courts, Courts of Law or Courts of Justice?

Are our Courts "Courts of Justice", or are they "Courts of Law"? The disparity between what is done by Courts in obedience to law and what may be regarded as a "just decision", has provoked a great deal of criticism from those who are sensitive to the appeal which the ideal of justice makes and is often the foundation of that oft-asserted jibe against the proverbial Judge of whom the English Doggerel has it:

"There he sits like a Jack daw

And if you cannot get justice out of him,
Be sure you'll get plenty of law."

Our Judges disavow the power to countenance "judicial legislation", and, in theory at least observe Bacon's admonition, and confine themselves to the office of claiming jus dicere but not jus dare—of declaring the law and not making it.

The Judges are often heard in our Courts of law declaring their helplessness in the face of law to be able "to do justice". How often do we not hear it said:

"We must take law as we find it. The result we have reached is one which we could not very well have avoided. We are only concerned with what law is and not with what it ought to be. If this leads to an unjust result it is a matter for the Parliament, not for us."

These and such other observations that one discovers in the judicial pronouncements of our Courts serve to point out what is really at stake.

It is undoubtedly true that a Judge has no unfettered power to do 'justice' in accordance with his notions of what a just decision in a given case before him should be. There is no power of administering justice without restraint conferred upon a Court. "That restraint", says Broomfield in his "Legal Maxims", has been imposed from the earliest times. And, although instances are constantly occurring where the courts might profitably be employed in doing simple justice between the parties, unfettered by precedent or by technical rules, the law has wisely considered it inconvenient to confer such power upon those whose duty it is to preside in courts of justice. [Barton v. Muir, L.R. 6 P.C. 134; Tooth v. Power, (1891) A.C. 284 at p. 292]. (See Broom's Legal Maxims, p. 47.)

That system of law is the best, which leaves least to the discretion of the Judge—and that Judge the best, who relies least on his own opinion. And although, in cases where discretion is by law left to a Judge, he is to a great extent unfettered in its exercise; it is ever true that "'discretion' when applied to a court of justice, means sound discretion guided by law. It must be governed by rule, not by humour; it must not be arbitrary, vague and fanciful, but legal and regular". R. v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2527 at 2539. (See Broom's Legal Maxims, pages 46-47).

A Judge is thus not free to decide as he pleases—he is bound either by the statute or by the well-known technical rules that govern the application of judicial method. He is also bound by decisions of the superior court. But having said that much it is necessary at once to add that, in each case, it is once again the Judge who gives effect to what he by the application of judicial method, considers is the meaning of the statute or the authority of the decision of a superior court.

The way in which the judicial method operates in the matter of giving effect to relevant statutes and decisions would be dealt with in the sequel, but at present it is necessary to raise the question as to what the Judge is to do in a case where there is neither legislative provision nor any judicial precedent which in his judgment furnishes an answer to the problem raised before him in the course of litigation. There are some codes that lay down specifically what the judge is required to do in such cases. For instance, the Swiss Code lays down that in the last resort the judge should apply the rule which he would have established if he were acting as a legislator. Our courts have no such mandate to obey (omitting from our consideration for the time being the statutorily conferred power that the courts are in certain cases to apply rules of equity and good conscience), and one is entitled to suppose that all they could do under the circumstances is either to turn to persuasive precedents available to them from other civilised systems of law or to turn to the feeble light that is furnished by text-book writers.

In some cases resort could be had to "Analogical Reasoning," and wisely used, this method of tackling legal problems would always be found to be a useful weapon in the matter of deciding cases that come up before the courts, for the determination of which there is neither clear statutory provision nor any guidance to be derived from the judicial precedents upon the point. The advantage of the analogical method is that it helps the Judge to deal with a new situation in terms of a principle which he finds applied in other spheres of public conduct. In the case of Reinhardt v. New Port Flying Service Corporation 232 N.Y.

Analogical
Reasoning.

115 the question before the Court of Appeal was whether a hydroplane was a vessel or not. The argument was: if the question is whether it should be subject to admiralty's judicial jurisdiction while afloat its resemblance to a vessel is more important than the fact that it can also fly. But if the question is whether the representative of a passenger, drowned while the hydroplane was afloat on the water, can claim reward under an insurance policy which accepted the peril of flying, the answer is 'No'—for the fact that it was afloat at the moment, did not lessen the risk since the hydroplane is more likely to capsize than an ordinary vessel. Hence in one case analogy was applied and in the other it was not. Similarly, a bicycle has been subsumed under the word 'Carriage' occurring in the Highway Act of 1835, though at the time the Act was passed bicycle had not even been invented. (See Taylor v. Goodwin, 1879, 4 Q.B.D. 228. (See also Attorney-General v. Edison Telephone Co. 1880, 6 Q.B.D. page 228.).

In the case Collingwood v. Home and Colonial Stores, 1936, 3 All E.R. 200, the principle that analogy can furnish only a guide and not decisive answer is amply illustrated: the Court of Appeal in the case of Musgrave v. Pandetis (1919, 2 K.B. 43) had ruled that fire spreading to the Plaintiffs' premises as a result of petrol in the carburettor of the car parked in the defendants' garage catching fire was within the rule laid down by the House of Lords in Ryland vs. Fletcher (1868), 3 H.L. 330 in that motor car was dangerous within the principle laid down in the case. But Lord Wright, M.R., in a later case, when pressed to apply the principle to the situation where fire spread to the plaintiffs' premises due to defective electric wiring on the defendants' premises refused to do so because electric wiring is something which "every body or most people, nowadays have in the houses which they occupy whether for domestic use or for purposes of trade as the defendants did. There is nothing in the installation of such wiring which to my mind, brings the case within the principle of Ryland vs. Fletcher. It is perfectly true that electricity like gas or water may be regarded from one point of view as a dangerous thing and the principle of Ryland v. Fletcher has been applied to persons who carry, in their property or in their mains gas, water or electricity... But in all these cases there was nothing comparable to the ordinary domestic installation of electric wiring for the ordinary comforts and conveniences of life. In all these cases these dangerous things were being handled in bulk and in large quantities; they were being carried in mains and constituted an extra-ordinary danger created by the appellants for their own purposes."

In drawing inferences and deductions from cases decided in other systems of law it is essential to realise that what is expedient for the community concerned is :

"The secret root from which the law draws all the juices of life . . . every important principle which is developed by litigation is in fact and at bottom the result of more or less definitely understood views of public policy; most generally, to be sure . . . the unconscious result of instinctive preferences and inarticulate convictions, but none the less traceable to views of public policy in the last analysis." (See Holme's Common Law, pp. 35-36).

It is these "instinctive preferences and inarticulate convictions" that form the "inarticulate major premise" and which ultimately control the approach of judges in the matter of deciding cases. And so Lord Macmillan says:

"In almost every case, except the plainest, it would be possible to decide the issue either way with reasonable legal justification and that in such cases ethical consideration operates and ought to operate." (Law and Other Things, p. 148).

But care should be taken to avoid going to the other extreme: Burroughs J. in 1824 in the case of Richardson v. Millish, 2 Bing. 229 at 252, remarked, "I for one protest, as my Lord has done, against arguing too strongly upon public policy—it is a very unruly horse and when once you get astride it you never know where it will carry you." So also A. L. Smith, M. R. said in Deafontion Consolidated Mines Ltd. Gaison (1901) 17 T.L.R. 604, "This public policy is a high horse to mount and is difficult to ride when you have mounted it."

That brings us to the consideration of the role that the "Unruly Horse" namely, the Doctrine of Public Policy, plays in the system of our jurisprudence and to notice the extent to which it has influenced and continues to influence the administration of justice.

According to Professor Friedmann, this "unruly horse" of public policy, may be described as the fundamental agent of legal development. It has consciously or unconsciously dominated the thinking of those who are put in charge of the duty of administering justice. According to Lord Wright (Fender v. Mildmay, 1937, 3 ALL, E. R. 402, at 424 (1938) A.C. 1, at page 38), 'public policy', as a technical term and instrument in the hand of the lawyer, must be restricted to a narrower sense:

"In one sense, every rule of law, either Common Law or Equity, which has been laid down by the courts, in that course of judicial legislation which has evolved the law of this country, has been based on considerations of public interest or policy. In that sense, Sir George Jessel, M. R., referred to the paramount public policy that people should fulfill their contracts. But public policy in the narrower sense means that there are considerations of public interest which require the courts to depart from their primary function of enforcing contracts, and exceptionally to refuse to enforce them. Public policy in this sense is disabling."

The unconscious or half-conscious influence of the public policy in the broader sense is responsible for the creative development of case law; or the application of the general policy of equity.

The two sharply contrasted attitudes to the judicial function in so far as it has a bearing upon the question of giving effect to the doctrine of public policy would be found stated in the case of Egerton v. Brownlow (Earl) (1853), 4 H.L. Cas. 1: The statement offered by Parke, B. runs thus :

"It is the province of the judge to expound the law only; the written from the statutes; the unwritten or common law from the decisions of our predecessors and of our existing courts, from text-writers of acknowledged authority, and upon the principles to be deduced from them by sound reason and just inference; not to speculate upon what is best, in his opinion, for the advantage of the community. Some of these decisions may have no doubt been founded upon the prevailing and just opinions of the public good; for instance, the illegality of covenants in restraint of marriage or trade. They have become a part of the recognised law, and we are therefore bound by them, but we are not thereby authorised to establish as law everything which we may think for the public good, and prohibit everything which we think otherwise."

And as contrasted from this is to be found the statement of Pollock, C.B., in the same case at page 151, which runs as follows :

"It may be that judges are no better able to discern what is for the public good than other experienced and enlightened members of the community; but that is no reason for their refusing to entertain the question, and declining to decide upon it."

According to Professor Friedmann the restricted scope of public policy in this professed sense as defined by Lord Wright in Fender v. Mildmay (1937), 3 All England Reports 402) is due to two paramount reasons:

"(1) The traditional reluctance of judges, and of English Judges in particular, to close or discuss openly the ideological assumptions underlying the administration of the law.

(2) The acceptance of separation of powers and the consequent reluctance to compete with the legislator in the application of legal policy."

And he adds :
 "That the danger of competing or conflicting competences is very real, is shown by the different position of the American Supreme Court which, as guardian of the Constitution, has decisively influenced American social policy for almost a century, but in a purely negative, restraining way, and without the responsibility which the Parliamentary Law-maker has towards the electorate." (See p. 334 of his Legal Theory).

Professor Friedmann has cited numerous instances which tend to show that the determination of the cases by the judges has been governed by moral, social or political principles. (See this Author's statement of law in his Legal Theory, 3rd Edition, particularly at pages 335 to 343.) Justice according to law: View of Denning, J. quoted.

In a recent book Road to Justice, Sir Alfred Denning has challenged the facile assumption—namely, that if in the administration of law an unjust result is reached it is a matter for Parliament and not for the Judges—contending that the lawyers and Judges cannot be heard to dissociate themselves from the burden of responsibility which lies heavily upon them to secure administration of justice. He commences his first lecture by recalling the words of William Temple uttered by him when he addressed the Association of Lawyers in the Inns of Courts. He had said :—

"I cannot say that I know much about the law, having been far more interested in justice."

Justice Denning, to the question, "What is justice", makes the following answer :—

"All I would suggest is that justice is not a something you can see. It is not temporal but eternal. How does man know what is justice? It is not the product of his intellect but of his spirit. The nearest we can get to defining justice is to say that it is what the right-minded members of the community—those who have the right spirit within them—believe to be fair." (See p. 4 of his book).

From this statement, Justice Denning draws the important deduction as to the responsibility which falls upon the lawyers :—

"They represent the right-minded members of the community in seeking to do what is fair between man and man and between man and the State; and they can only do this by means of just laws justly administered."

Then he exhorts the Lawyers in the manner of Socratic Discourse to be loyal to the Call of Duty:

"May I ask you also in your own progress in the law, not to rely over much on legality—on the technical rules of law—but ever to seek those things which are right and true; for there alone will you find the road to justice. When you set out on this road you must remember that there are two great objects to be achieved; one is to see that the laws are just: the other that they are justly administered. Both are important; but of the two, the more important is that the law should be justly administered. It is no use having just laws if they are administered unfairly by bad judges or corrupt lawyers. A country can put up with laws that are harsh or unjust so long as they are administered by just judges who can mitigate their harshness or alleviate their unfairness: But a country cannot long tolerate a legal system which does not give a fair trial." (See his Book, The Road to Justice, pp. 6-7).

168. Some Observations on the Development of "Judicial Method"

The judicial method has been steadily improved across these many centuries that the courts, all over the civilised world, have been administering justice, and such progress as has actually been made in this field, is ultimately due not so much to the impact of abstract ideal of justice as to the rules of judicial procedure that have been evolved with a view to leaving the least to the discretion of the judge.

If by 'law' is to be understood that which will help us to predict what the judges would say on a specific question if it goes before them, we have to emphasize the need of making the process of reaching a decision as objective as we can: and the one sure way to achieve this is to insist that the judge will conduct the proceedings publicly and will, at the end, tell us in his 'judgment' how he has reached a particular conclusion. We must insist on his letting his judgment be controlled by the operation of those factors in the total judicial process that make for, if not certainty, at least probability, so that our prediction as to what he will decide will be not a vain one.

A judge has to consider what the legislature has enacted. He is also bound to consider what other judges of Co-ordinate or Superior courts have decided on a point which comes up for his decision. The effect of both of these restraints on the mind of the judge is after all not a very appreciable one and this will be clear to anyone who reads the dissenting judgments delivered in cases decided by members who compose, the Full or Division Bench of a Court. Even the courts of appeal are in many cases found reaching diametrically opposed conclusions on the very premises of law and facts which formed the subject-matter of the decision of the lower courts. But despite all this, it cannot be gainsaid that the judicial endeavour is to render decisions on objective criteria and to state as fully as may be practicable, the reasons that have led the judges to the conclusions they have stated in their opinions. This requirement applies as much to the determinations by a court of ultimate jurisdiction as it applies to one from where an appeal lies to a higher court.

There are three important indicia that go to define the outlook of the judicial mind and these may well, in their turn, be regarded as constituting important factors in the development of the judicial method. These, according to Professor William A. Robson, are (a) the principle of consistency, (b) ideal of equality, and (c) the quest of certainty. (See Justice and Administrative Law, Chapt. 5). A few words by way of elucidation of these factors may not be out of place.

First: A Judge must be consistent in the sense that he must endeavour to abide by the rule which has been previously laid down either by himself or some one else having the authority to judge. What is suggested in this context is that the progress of law takes place by the very act of judging, and this movement is from initial elasticity to relative rigidity, precisely because of the desire to be consistent with a previous decision. When reflection upon the previously decided cases or controversies takes place, we invariably search for the principles in terms of which those decisions could be understood and explained, and this we do in order that we might consistently with those principles decide the fresh cases that actually have or might hereafter come up before us. And it is this desire for consistency, says Professor Robson, "that is at the bottom of that respect for precedent which is so marked a feature of English Law" and is itself a manifestation of a disposition "which is one of the deepest urges of human mind." (p. 367).

Three Important Factors in the Development of Judicial Method.

Principle of Consistency

Principle of Equality

Secondly, the need for equality stems from the requirement that the Judge would be impartial in the administration of justice, that he would exclude considerations based on race, religion, antecedents, physical appearance, intellect, public spirit or occupation" where any or all of these matters are not relevant, for the purpose of settling a controversy impartially. Equality before law thus becomes a decisive factor in the determination of questions that come up before the courts. Deciding a case in a judicial spirit virtually means endeavouring to exclude extraneous factors that would ordinarily be there to pre-judicially influence the decision in a case.

Thirdly, the Judges strive to give in their judgments the impression that law is certain and that the judicial decision has an element of predictability about it. Justice according to law in this sense means no more and no less than this that the Judge allows his conclusions in regard to a controversy to be controlled by some pre-existing rule which is definite, objective, ascertainable, and which in its application is such that it leads to predictable results. The Judges draw from the stock of well known principles and rules and speak about those principles and rules with reverential awe, thus giving an impression that the administration of justice is controlled not by the arbitrary fiat of someone holding judicial office but by the application of well settled rules to the facts of the case before the Judge. A judgment delivered by a Judge, as we have seen, contains the statement of reasons that have moved him to reach the conclusion that he has decreed, and it is this attempt at the reproduction of reasons responsible for a decision which inspires confidence in the system of "administration of justice according to law". Even when a discretion is conferred upon the Judge, he makes it appear that in the exercise of it he has listened to the voice of law, of reason and that, he has not allowed his personality to tilt the balance between the contending parties one way or the other. That is why we hear it so often being said by our Judges and Administrators that "the discretion must be exercised in accordance with the rules of reason and justice and not according to private opinion; according to law and not humour. It is not to be arbitrary and fanciful but legal and regular." (See Sharp v. Wakefield (1891) A.C. 173; Cassel v. Inglis (1916) 2 Chancery 211).

Abstract Notions of Justice—A disturbing factor—Max Radin quoted.

There is a sense in which, of all the elements that have moved Judges in the direction of making their judgments scientific, in the sense that they could have been predicted, the most disturbing element is that which has reference to the abstract notions of justice. That, for instance, is the view advanced by Max Radin, who in his The Permanent Problems of the Law defended the oft-quoted reproach against judicial conservatism which would have us believe that it is better that the law should be certain than that it should be just. The writer complained that the concept of "justice" is vague and mystifying:

"I do not know what justice is, nor how the moral sentiment we call by that name arose, nor when it became differentiated from the general category of virtues. I have carefully read what wise men have said about it, men who knew exactly what it was. The difficulty is that, when their statements left the Nebula of Orion and got within a few million miles of this earth so that I could partially understand them, they seemed to me either self-contradictory or to contain proposition of the form: 'Justice is the quality of being just or justice is that which produces just results.' Both statements are quite true"

"But the real difficulty of giving place to these vaguely defined notions of justice and morality in the administration of justice is precisely this that thereby we make 'law' uncertain and therefore unpredictable."

"We should", says the same writer, "far more readily apply the moral standards of general conduct to the making of legal judgments if we were quite sure that we really knew what it was we were judging. The hard creditor who demands the tenor of his bond against a needy and unfortunate debtor has from time immemorial encountered the condemnation of moralists, but there are many cases in which the demand is the last resource of a long-suffering investor against a shifty swindler. And we may be sure that the debtor will always cry 'oppression', and the creditor will always profess that he is barely maintaining his livelihood. Certainty of judgment is, therefore, better than justice, for the simple reason that justice depends on certainty about the facts and this we cannot hope to have. It would amply repay investigation to examine those numerous cases in which courts have declared themselves unable to depart from a strict and hard rule in favour of an equitable exception and to see whether at the bottom their decision is not grounded on their confessed inability to determine in every case all the relevant facts.

"But there is such a thing as justice. And not only the very wise know what it is, whether they are or are not able to state it satisfactorily, but everybody else, all men and women and most children, know what it is. 'That ain't right' is one of the earliest judgments a child will make. Similar judgments are made constantly, freely, with supreme confidence by every one, and nothing is resented so much as the suggestion that any sort of experience or information or mental training is necessary to make a person competent to render this judgment.

"It is a common place, on which I shall not insist, that the concrete results of popular and learned judgments about justice have been somewhat inconsistent. Everything that some of us regard as palpably and unmistakably unjust has at some time or place been declared to be just—slavery, torture, the killing of innocent persons for the faults of others, the wholesale massacre of entire communities, the deliberate disregard of solemn promises, the seizure of other people's goods. It is evident that if we collect and arrange the judgments about justice, we cannot rationalize them, because they often flatly negate each other.

"We shall do a little better if we limit our inquiry in time and space. But we must make the limits very narrow indeed. Most of the things I have enumerated would, one might suppose, be quite generally condemned here and now, in the United States. But we should be mistaken if we thought that judgment was universal. I have heard educated men defend slavery as a present institution. Torture is freely practised and privately defended as a means of eliciting confession and is freely advocated as a punishment for crime. There are numerous exceptions to the general rule that promises be kept and other people's property respected. A concrete criterion for surely distinguishing just things from unjust has not been devised, if we demand of justice a validity quod semper quod ubique quod ab omnibus.

"We must accordingly draw the melancholy inference that we dare not demand this of justice, that justice varies with time and place. And since time and place are constantly changing, it is impossible to state in advance what will certainly be called just, because the time and place of the event to be judged—a different time and place from the one we know—must enter into our judgment. If, therefore, we ask of a judge's judgments that they be surely predictable and also that they be just, we are asking what are strictly speaking contradictory qualities."

To the question, what is the relationship of 'Justice' with 'Law' our author makes the following answer :

"Perhaps we are now in a position to see what justice has to do with law. We judge the judge's judgments. We make a valuation of them, and justice is our standard of valuation. We may properly describe it as a sliding scale. To speak strictly, it is we who apply it just as it is we who seek to predict the judge's judgments. We not only wish them to be just, but every now and then—as in some state constitutions—we order them to be just. And without such statutory commands, we expect them to be and are very honestly shocked if they are not.

"But we are not the only ones who are shocked. The judges too are shocked. Whether they are ordered to or not, they also very much desire to render just judgments. In part they desire to do so because they know it is expected of them. We cannot suppose they wish to flout or antagonise the rest of their fellow citizens. But in an even larger part, they desire to judge justly because, in such training as they have had, they have absorbed enough of the history of their profession to know that it was the desire for justice which created them. Judges make law. Justice makes Judges."

Expression
"Equity"
Conscience".

Paragraph 19 of the Charter of High Court of Calcutta issued under the provisions of the Charter and High Courts Act of 1861, which inter alia provides that "the law to be administered by the High Court shall be the law and equity which would have been applied by the said High Court if these Letters Patent had not been issued", gives us precious little information as to what is to be understood by the term equity appearing in the context of that provision. Presumably this has reference to the 27th clause of an ancient enactment, Regulation 11 of 1772, to the effect that where no specific statutory mandate existed which would help in the disposal of a case, the Tribunals of the East India Company should apply rules based on justice, equity and good conscience. This expression "justice, equity and good conscience" trails along the path of innumerable statutes and has been the cornerstone upon which the super-structure of the application of the principles of English Common Law to the Indian situation has been supported. Some of the Common Law doctrines were absorbed in the statute law as the codification of the law relating to principal branches of our substantive and procedural law took place later on—but, by and large, it was under the aegis of "Justice, equity and good conscience" that highly fanciful, vague, pompous and fussy phrase that the Stock-in-Trade of the English Common Law Doctrines was inducted into office and action, in the Corpus Juris of India.

"Equity".

The term Equity, however, has been judicially interpreted as being synonymous with what is demanded by justice and right, and the larger and the more ponderous expression 'justice', 'equity' and 'good conscience', means exactly the same thing. The term 'equity' in this context has not reference merely to the system of rules and maxims evolved by the Court of Equity at one time presided over by the Lord Chancellor in England to mitigate the rigour and formalism of the rules of English common law, but also to that penumbra of a 'vague' jurisprudence which is often invoked by judges to enforce their nebulous notions of 'justice in the abstract'.

In fact the Charters of the Earlier High Courts established during the days of East India Company or soon thereafter, have not been construed as applying the English law in India in its entirety but only as nearly as the circumstances of the place and the inhabitants admit. [see the Advocate-General of Bengal v. Rane Surnomoyee Dosee (1863), 9 M.I.A. 387: 9 L.T. 843]. Even the English precedents and procedure which was deemed to be "against 'justice and right' or 'justice, equity and good conscience'" was not to be followed by courts in the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent.

The plea to apply rules of equity in our courts means no more and no less than an appeal to the court of law "to reduce the harsh effects of a logical application of strictum jus, to individualize the general rule, to harmonize the administration of law". (See Paton's Jurisprudence, p. 172, Oxford 1946). It is true that a Court of Law has not to be arbitrary and capricious in the matter of applying the principles of equity jurisprudence, for this would render the administration of justice continually dependent upon the length of the Chancellor's foot. And this charge even the court of equity in England was anxious to avoid. Did not Lord Eldon, Lord Chancellor, say :

"Nothing would inflict upon me greater pain, in quitting this place, than the recollection that I had done any thing to justify the reproach that the equity of this Court varies like the Chancellor's foot." [Geo v. Pritchard (1818) 2 Swans p. 402].

The development of principles of equity, both under the Roman Law as well as under the English Law, was brisk in the beginning, but later on, that development had to encounter the obstruction of the petrified rules which courts of equity themselves had evolved and applied to combat the rigours of the formalism of common law. The Romans separated the jus civile and the praetorian law, as much as did the English discriminate between the rules applied by courts of common law and courts of equity. After the amalgamation of the common law courts and the equity courts in England by the Judicature Act of 1873, it was left to the ordinary court of law to apply to the facts of each case the principles that had been evolved by the courts of equity: common injunctions were abolished and it was enacted that in the event of conflict between rules of common law and the rules of equity, the latter were to prevail. Although the Courts of law and of equity have ceased to exist as separate entities, the two streams, that is of equity and common law now, to borrow the wise words of Snell, run into the same channel but their waters do not mix. And it is this tradition that was handed over to the Indian courts when the British rule got firmly established in India and under the several Charters the various High Courts were set up "to administer law in accordance with the principles of justice, equity and good conscience". (See the Charter Act, 1861, and Ss. 19, 20, 21 of the Letters Patent issued to High Court of Judicature at Fort-William in Bengal).

To-day appeal to equity is really appeal to principles of natural law and justice.

The expressions like 'benefit of reasonable doubt', 'the standard of care required of a reasonable man', 'the exercise of discretion should be made in a just, fair and reasonable manner' etc., are reflections of the persistence of the doctrine of natural justice which continues to haunt lawyers and law courts. One can, with this background, well understand the protest of the Judge who in the case of Ba Lis v. Bishop of London (1913) 1 Ch. 127, observed, "Whatever may have been the case 146 years ago we are not now free in the twentieth century to administer that vague jurisprudence which is sometimes attractively styled, "justice as between man and man".

"The real test of legal technique", says Professor Paton, "is whether it can translate ideals into working doctrines: the theoretically perfect rule is of little use if its application leads to such uncertainty that its object is really defeated. But the eternal difficulty of law is that, while it must translate its broad purpose into rules that can be easily applied, it must never forget that rules are made to serve men and not men to serve rules—hence, on the one hand, the struggle to create definite rules, and, on the other hand, to escape from those rules of the past which have become too definite and are no longer in keeping with modern conditions. Economic conditions change, social philosophies develop, and 'an expanding society demands an expanding common law'". (See his Jurisprudence p. 171).

This orderly expansion of the common law takes place in what may be regarded as a "no man's land". Both the legislature and judicature strive, each in its own sphere, to secure mastery in this domain. But the growth of law, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Holmes must have within limits, of course, "historical continuity" about it.

"The law, so far as it depends on learning is indeed, as it has been called, the Government of the living by the dead. To a very considerable extent no doubt it is inevitable that the living should be so governed. The past gives us our vocabulary and fixes the limit of our imagination; we cannot get away from it. There is, too, a peculiar logical pleasure in making manifest the continuity between what we are doing and what has been done before. But the present has a right to govern itself so far as it can; and it ought always to be remembered that historic continuity with the past is not a duty, it is only a necessity." [Collected Legal Papers (1920) p. 138].

Society is ruled both by the forces of conservatism and change. The progress in law is made by the judge under our system when he sets out to evaluate the relative merits of contending principles that are striving to secure recognition at his hands. Whenever he is called upon to render a decision, he must choose one out of the several principles in terms of which the decision in the case could be rendered. In the matter of making choice he has a wide discretion indeed given to him by the law, and it is for him to choose out of the several rival legal principles the one which ought, in his opinion, to control his decision. Justice Cardozo illustrated the need for a judicious exercise of this discretion to choose between principles in the words that follow:

"One principle or precedent, pushed to the limit of its logic, may point to one conclusion; another principle or precedent, followed with like logic, may point with equal certainty to another. In this conflict, we must choose between the two paths, selecting one or other, or perhaps striking out upon a third, which will be the resultant of the two forces in combination, or will represent the mean between extremes. Let me take as an illustration of such conflict the famous case of Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N.Y. 506. That case decided that a legatee who had murdered his testator would not be permitted by a court of equity to enjoy the benefits of the will. Conflicting principles were there in competition for the mastery. One of them prevailed, and vanquished all the others. There was the principle of the binding force of a will . . . That principle, pushed to the limit of its logic, seemed to uphold the title of the murderer. There was the principle that civil courts may not add to the pains and penalties of crimes. That, pushed to the limit of its logic, seemed to uphold his title. But over against these was another principle, of greater generality, its roots deeply fastened in universal sentiments of justice, the principle that no man should profit from his own iniquity or take advantage of his own wrong. The logic of this principle prevailed over the logic of the others. . . One path was followed, another closed, because of the conviction in the judicial mind that the one selected led to justice . . . In the end, the principle that was thought to be most fundamental, to represent the larger and deeper social interests, put its competitors to flight." (The Nature of the Judicial Process, pp. 40-42).

Why courts of law frequently resort to legal fictions and make reference to non-existing entities such as the 'reasonable man', 'the prudent man', 'the man-in-the-street' for the purpose of deciding upon the norms in relation to which, the acts and omissions of persons litigating before them are to be judged with a view to fixing their rights and determining their obligations? The only rational answer that could be made to this problem is to say that by so doing they reduce those vague and nebulous intuitions of a moral causistry into a system of well-defined rules that have every appearance of being acclaimed and accepted as embodying impersonal tests. After all, every decision must conform to some rule that can be stated in the abstract and applied to all future cases. The search for the rule, and, where none exists, the creation of one are matters of constant pre-occupation with the judicial mind. Lord Macmillan in the case of Glasgow Corporation v. Muir (1943) 2 All E.R. p. 44: (1943) A.C. at p. 448, gives the rationale of the dogma of the reasonable man precisely from this point of view.

"The standard of foresight of the reasonable man is, in one sense, an impersonal test. It eliminates the personal equation and is independent of the idiosyncrasies of the particular person whose conduct is in question. Some persons are by nature unduly timorous and imagine every path beset with lions: others, of more robust temperament, fail to foresee or non-chalantly disregard even the most obvious dangers. The reasonable man is presumed to be free both from over-apprehension and from over-confidence."

Having said that, Lord Macmillan is cautious enough to add:

"But there is a sense in which the standard of care of the reasonable man involves in its application a subjective element. It is still left to the judge to decide what, in the circumstances of the particular case, the reasonable man would have had in contemplation and what accordingly the party sought to be made liable ought to have foreseen. Here there is room for diversity of view, as, indeed, is well illustrated in the present case. What to one judge may seem far-fetched may seem to another both natural and probable."

The conflict between 'Law' and 'Justice' has its historic origins in the hoary past of Humanity. Side by side with the Positive Law has existed the Law of Nature, of Reason, and, in fact, the former has been interpreted and applied under the sometime overt and, sometime, covert influence of the latter. With the Romans too, side by side with the Jus Civile, existed for the Roman Jurists and the Courts of Romana, Jus Naturale, which was, in the words of Ernest Barker, regarded as some sort of a 'law' imposed on mankind by common human nature; that is, by reason in response to human needs and instincts. But it was not imposed in the sense that it is an actual body of law, recognised as such and enforced as such in the Roman Courts of Law. It is a spirit rather than a letter: a spirit of humane interpretation present in the minds of Jurists and Judges, which affects the law that is actually enforced, but does so without being actual law in the strict sense of that word.

"The Romans" adds Ernest Barker, "regarded this law as universal, because it came from man's common nature and extended its range to all mankind."

But are there really two separate laws and is one of them 'against the other'? That is the question to which Sir Ernest Barker makes the following answer:

"To put the question in that way, and to attempt to think in those terms, is to run at once into heavy weather and to steer a difficult course. If the State is a legal association, it must have one law as the condition of being one legal association or State. If there were two laws, there would be two States; or at any rate every member of the State would be torn in two by the question, 'which law am I to obey?' Any theory of two separate laws is at once face to face with the possibility of a conflict between the two, and is thus confronted by the problem of finding a solution of the conflict. Theorists who gave their adhesion to the school of natural law were ready with their answer: in any case of conflict, natural law carried the day. Blackstone himself, in a passage of the Introduction to his Commentaries in which he is following, and even copying, a contemporary Swiss theorist of the School of Natural Law, can lay it down that the 'law of nature . . . is of course superior in obligation to any other . . . no human laws are of any validity if contrary to this'. The difficulty of such an answer was that there was no certain and known body of natural law; and even if there had been, there was no established system of courts to give it recognition and enforcement. In practice two things happened, which themselves conflicted with one another. In normal times it was allowed that positive law, as being known and enforceable, must necessarily prevail. In revolutionary times, as for instance during the American Revolution and the issue of the Declaration of Independence, an appeal was made from positive law to the 'evident

'truths' contained in 'the laws of Nature and of Nature's God'; and popular resistance was used to enforce the appeal to these truths. But a law (or laws) which operates only in revolutionary times, and operates then to overturn the State, can hardly be law in any real sense of the word. Real law must be constantly operative, and it must at once sustain the State and be sustained by the State.

"We may therefore put the question which confronts us in a different form. Instead of asking whether there are two laws, 'one against another', we may begin by assuming that there is only one law, in any real sense of the word, and that this is the positive law which is actually imposed upon us, as members of a State, by the definite declaration and specific recognition of the organs of that State, legislative and judicial, and by the process of continuous enforcement which they apply. But having made that assumption we may then proceed to ask whether there are not two sources of this one law—(1) the personal source of a human authority (which may, in the last analysis, be the authority of the community itself, acting through organs evolved by it for the purpose of declaring, recognizing, and enforcing its own sense of the necessary rules of its common life), and (2) the impersonal source of an inherent rightness or justice, which adds to a law proceeding from the personal source of a human authority the further strength of a sense that it is right and just in itself, apart from, and over and above, the fact of its being declared to be law. If we make this distinction, we may say that authority gives validity to law, and justice gives it value. A law has validity, and I am legally obliged to obey it, if it is declared, recognized, and enforced as law by the authority of the legally organized community, acting in its capacity of a State. A law has value, and I am bound to obey it not only legally, and not only by an outward compulsion, but also morally and by an inward force, if it has the inherent quality of justice. Ideally law ought to have both validity and value. We may even say that it is only because law, as a whole and in its general nature, possesses both attributes, that it actually operates and is actually effective. At the same time we must recognize that, for the purposes of the legal association, it is sufficient that a law has validity, and we are legally bound to obey it if only it has that attribute. Though law as a whole, and in its general nature, has both validity and value, any particular law may have only validity. But that is enough to involve an absolute legal obligation." (See his Principles of Social and Political Theory, p. 100).

Conclusion stated.

From the foregoing discussion it would be clear that our courts are charged with the duty of administering justice in accordance with the law. It is true that abstract notions of justice cannot be allowed to stand in opposition to law for even the doctrine of public policy upon which judges more properly could be said to legislate judicially, is itself a part and parcel of the common law. Public policy as a concept of our jurisprudence is related to the interest of the community rather than to the parties before the court. It does not consist of any universal or immutable body of rules, but it is something elastic and its actual configuration depends on the logic of the changing conditions of the Society.

It was precisely this approach to the problem of administering justice according to law that made Mackinnon, L. J., say in the case of Ellerman Lines Ltd. v. Read, (1928) 2 K.B. 144 at p. 152. "I freely avow that, in-as-much as in common sense and decency (the plaintiff) ought to be able to recover against some body, and in the circumstances of this case and having regard to the correspondence which has taken place, in common sense and decency he ought to recover against the defendants if law allows it, my only concern is to see whether upon the cases the Law does allow him to recover." This extract, in the present writer's opinion, shows the real nature of judicial process—a process of administering justice according to law.

It is true that the judges in the decision of the cases that come up before them apply the law but, in this context, the concept of law suggests something more than the law as it is framed by the legislature. "Take the fundamental question", says Mr. Justice Holmes in his famous essay Path of the Law (10 Harvard Law Review 467, 1897), "What constitutes the Law? You will find some text book writers telling you that it is something different from what is decided by the courts of Massachusetts, or of England, that it is a system of reason, that it is a deduction from principles of ethics, or admitted axioms or what not, which may or may not coincide with the decisions. But if we take the view of our friend, the bad man, we shall find that he does not care two straws for the axioms or deductions but he does want to know what the Massachusetts or the English Courts are likely to do in fact. I am much of his mind. The prophecies of what the courts will do in fact and nothing more pretentious, are what I mean by the law."

It would be perfectly plain from the foregoing extract, that Justice Mr. Holmes is giving full scope to the play of such factors as the pre-dispositions and prejudices of the judges who administer law in the determination of cases that come up before them. The utmost that one can claim for a conscientious judge is that as far as possible he will make himself aware of his prejudices and by that very self-knowledge nullify their effect.

"Much harm", says Judge Jerome, "is done by the myth that, merely by putting on a black robe and taking the oath of office as a judge, a man ceases to be human and strips himself of all predilections, becomes a passionless thinking machine. The concealment of the human element in the judicial process allows that element to operate in an exaggerated manner; the sunlight of awareness has an antiseptic effect on prejudices. Freely avowing that he is a human being, the judge can and should, through self-scrutiny, prevent the operation of this class of biases. This self-knowledge is needed in a judge because he is peculiarly exposed to emotional influences; the 'court room is a place of surging emotions . . . ; the parties are keyed up to the contest; often in open defiance, and the topics at issue are often calculated to stir up the sympathy, prejudice, or ridicule of the tribunal.' The judge's decision turns, often, on what he believes to be the facts of the case. As a fact-finder, he is himself a witness—a witness of the witnesses; he should, therefore, learn to avoid the errors which, because of prejudice, often affect those witnesses.

"But, just because his fact-finding is based on his estimates of the witnesses, of their reliability as reporters of what they saw and heard, it is his duty, while listening to and watching them, to form attitudes towards them. He must do his best to ascertain their motives, their biases, their dominating passions and interests, for only so can he judge of the accuracy of their narrations. He must also shrewdly observe the strategems of the opposing lawyers, perceive their efforts to sway him by appeals to his predilections. He must cannily penetrate through the surface of their remarks to their real purposes and motives. He has an official obligation to become prejudiced in that sense. Impartiality is not gullibility. Disinterestedness does not mean child like innocence. If the judge did not form judgments of the actors in those court-house dramas called trials, he could never render decisions. His findings of fact may be erroneous, for, being human, he is not infallible; indeed, a judge who purports to be super-human is likely to be dominated by improper prejudices." (See Preface to the Sixth printing of "Law and the Modern Mind", page XX, by Jerome Franks).

170. Some terms defined

Before proceeding any further it is necessary to set forth the forensic meaning of terms like 'Court' and 'Jurisdiction of Courts', and 'Law' :—

Views of
stated:

Court

(a) The word 'court' as understood in law has nowhere been precisely defined. But whatever may be the original meaning of the word 'court', there can be no dispute about the meaning that it has by now acquired in jurisprudence; it is a place where justice is administered and the word refers not only to the place but also to the person who exercises judicial functions. It is true that not all places where justice is administered are necessarily courts in law. There are many tribunals who render a final decision between the parties, after hearing witnesses on oath, and their decisions are subject-matter of an appeal to a Court. But these tribunals are not necessarily Courts of Law although they undoubtedly exert judicial power. In the case of Royal Aquarium, Etc. Ltd. v. Parkinson, (1892) 1 Q.B. 431, Fry L. J. drew the distinction between a Court and other tribunals exercising judicial or quasi judicial functions. His Lordship said:

"I do not desire to attempt any definition of a 'court'. It is obvious that, according to our law, a court may perform various functions. Parliament is a court. Its duties as a whole are deliberative and legislative: the duties of a part of it only are judicial. It is nevertheless a court. There are many other courts which, though not Courts of Justice, are nevertheless courts according to our law. There are, for instance, courts of investigation, like the coroner's court. In my judgment, therefore, the existence of the immunity claimed does not depend upon the question whether the subject-matter of consideration is a Court of justice, but whether it is a Court in law. Wherever you find a Court of law, to that the law attaches certain privileges, among which is the immunity in question."

"But this argument was used on behalf of the defendant. It was said that the existence of this immunity is based on considerations of public policy, and that, as a matter of public policy, wherever a body has to decide questions, and in so doing has to act judicially, it must be held that there is a judicial proceeding to which this immunity ought to attach. It seems to me that the sense in which the word 'judicial' is used in that argument is this: it is used as meaning that the proceedings are such as ought to be conducted with the fairness and impartiality which characterize proceedings in Courts of justice, and are proper to the functions of a judge, not that the members of the supposed body are members of a Court. Consider to what lengths the doctrine would extend, if this immunity were applied to every body which is bound to decide judicially in the sense of deciding fairly and impartially. It would apply to assessment committees, boards of guardians, to the Inns of Court when considering the conduct of one of their members, to the General Medical Council when considering questions affecting the position of a medical man, and to all arbitrators. Is it necessary, on grounds of public policy, that the doctrine of immunity should be carried as far as this? I say not."

Similarly Lord Sankey, L.C. in the case of Shell Company of Australia Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation, reported in (1931) A.C. 275 (P.C.) observed "that a tribunal is not necessarily a court in the strict sense of exercising judicial power, because:

- (1) it gives final decisions,
- (2) hears witnesses on oath,
- (3) two or more contending parties appear before it between whom it has to decide,
- (4) it gives decisions which affect the rights of subject,
- (5) there is an appeal to a court, and
- (6) it is body to which a matter is referred by another body."

Thus there are Tribunals with many of the "trappings of a court" which, nevertheless are not courts in the strict sense of exercising judicial power. The views expressed in the Shell case have been referred to in the case of Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan v John East Ironworks Ltd. (1949) A.C. p. 134 at p. 149. It was remarked in this last mentioned case that there are many positive features which are essential to the existence of judicial power, yet they are not to be regarded as being in the nature of conclusive indicia of it. "Any combination of such features will fail to establish a judicial power if, as is a common characteristic of so-called administrative tribunals, the ultimate decision may be determined not merely by the application of legal principles to ascertained facts but by considerations of policy also. Whether in the present case the power exercised by appellant Board is a judicial power their Lordships do not decide. For the elements in its constitutions and functions which at least make it doubtful whether it is in the strict sense a court exercising judicial power at all appears to lead conclusively to the opinion that it is not a superior, district or county court or a court analogous thereto."

It would be noticed that one of the hall-marks of judicial power is the requirement that it applies legal principles and excludes adjudication based on considerations of policy. It would appear that there are following basic requirements to be fulfilled before a tribunal can be considered a court of law:

(1) It should be required by law to give a public hearing to the parties to the case (subject of course to the proper exercise of power to exclude the public in proper cases); See Scott v. Scott, (1913) A.C. 417, and Re Agricultural Industries Ltd. (1952) 1 All E.R. page. 1188, where Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., observed:

"To justify this court closing its doors and thereby making an exception to what is fundamental in the administration of justice in this country, viz., that it should not be done behind closed doors, it must be shown that, as laid down by the House of Lords in Scott v. Scott, (1913) A.C. 417, the ends of justice would otherwise be liable to be defeated;"

(2) that the presiding officer of the Court shall not take part in any decision in which he is personally interested. (See Co-partnership Farms v. Harvey-Smith, (1918) 2 K.B. 495 at p. 411 etc.

(3) Every litigant has a right to be confronted with the case against him by his opponent in the presence of a Judge and to put his own case before him—Audi alterum partem is the well-known maxim of law that enshrines this right, and it is the irreducible minimum obligation of any Tribunal that claims to be a Court of law to act in accordance with this rule, that is, to determine rights and liabilities of parties after they have been heard by it in a public forum. Even a quasi-judicial body is under a duty to hear the party before it could pass any order that might adversely affect his civil rights. (See discussions of this topic under "Writ of Certiorari" in Chapter VI of this Book.)

(b) The term jurisdiction is not infrequently employed to refer to the legal competence of a Court or Tribunal to decide matters that are litigated before it or to take cognizance of matters presented to it by means of appropriate proceedings. In each case, as it would seem, it is a question of legal construction whether, and if so, within what limits, the authority to decide matters is conferred upon a Court or Tribunal. The limitation on the authority to decide a given question may have reference to :—

- (i) the subject-matter,
- (ii) territorial extent,
- (iii) pecuniary value of the claim involved,
- (iv) nature of the dispute, and
- (v) the amenability of the parties to the process of the Court etc.

It is a cardinal principle of law that jurisdiction must be acquired before judgment is given, and a judgment rendered by a Court which has not the jurisdiction to give it is a nullity. The jurisdiction cannot be conferred by consent if none exists in the Court seeking to exercise it. (See Hinde v. Hinde (1953) 1 All E. R. p. 171 C.A.; See also Re Aylmer ex-Parte Bischoffsheim (1887) 20 Q.B.D. page 258, and British Wagon Co. Ltd. v. Gray (1896) 1 Q. B. 35).

“LAW”.

(c) What precisely is to be understood by the term Law?

Commenting on the history and etymology of the term Law, Ernest Barker in his recent book, Principles of Social and Political Theory, remarks as follows:—

“The term appears to have been borrowed by the English about the year 1000 from their Scandinavian invaders, it came to them not from Latin (the Latin terms lex and legalis are not cognate in origin or connotation) but from Teutonic root, meaning to ‘lay’, to place or to set. Law is thus etymologically something positum or as we should say ‘imposed’, it is something laid down or set as one sets a task or lays down a rule and it is accordingly defined in the Oxford Dictionary as ‘a rule of conduct imposed by authority.’ (See page 92).

But we are not so much concerned with the etymology of the term here as with the meaning that can be predicated of that term under a system of analytical jurisprudence. And for our purposes it would be conducive to a better understanding of the subject of law if we, following Blackstone, were to say:

“Municipal Law is properly defined to be a rule of civil conduct prescribed by a Superior Power in the State, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong. (See p. 44 of his first book on Commentaries on the Laws of England).

This definition itself raises controversial issues. But the essential question is, “Must we define ‘Law’ in terms of the source whence it emanates, namely, the ‘legislature’, which term according to Blackstone is convertible with the word ‘sovereign’?”

So very important is this question of approach to ‘Law’ that its theoretical foundations should be clearly kept in view, for, upon the answer that we give to it, must depend our general outlook on the system of law and its practice as it obtains in the country.

It is undoubtedly true that in some sense Legislature makes the law, but it is equally true that there is a distinction between ‘law’ and ‘the sources from where it is derived’. In the opinion of the present writer, it is the judiciary that has a last say as to what is and what is not law. This is so because:

“Whoever hath an absolute authority to interpret any written or spoken laws”, says Bishop Hoadly, “it is he who is truly the law-giver to all intents and purposes, and not the person who first wrote or spoke them.”

It is for this reason that Professor Chipman Gray in his book, The Nature and Sources of the Law, candidly defines law as “being composed of the rules which the courts, that is the judicial organs (of State or any organised body of men) lay down for the determination of the legal rights and duties.” He calls attention to the distinction between the law and the sources of the law. It is the failure to keep this distinction in view that leads to anomalies: that is, on the one hand, to affirm the existence of law which courts do not follow and, on the other, to say that the law of a nation means “the opinion of half a dozen old gentlemen, some of them, conceivably, of a very limited intelligence.” In Mr. Gray’s words :—

“The truth is, each party is looking at but one side of the shield. If those half-a-dozen old gentlemen form the highest judicial tribunal of a country, then no rule or principle which they refuse to follow is Law in that country. However desirable, for instance, it may be that a man should be obliged to make gifts which he has promised to make, yet if the courts of a country will not compel him to keep his promise, it is not the Law of that country that promises to make a gift are binding. On the other hand, those six men seek the rules which they follow not in their own whims, but they derive them from sources often of the most general and permanent character, to which they are directed, by the organised body to which they belong, to apply themselves.” [See pp. 84-85 of his book]

It is true that Austin defined law as being made up of the commands of the sovereign but, as is well known, Austin was dominated in his thinking by the peculiarity of English Constitutional Jurisprudence—the legislative supremacy of the parliament—and he ranked ‘legislation’ as the superior most source of law-making. It is true that the State can by legislation restrain its courts from following this or that rule, but it often leaves them free to follow what they think right; and, according to Professor Gray, “it is certainly a forced expression to say that one commands things to be done, because he has power (which he does not exercise) to forbid their being done.” Then Professor Gray proceeds to substantiate his contention by appeal to various analogies in which the normal command of the Superior, as to the performance of certain acts and omissions, in practical parlance, borders on the vanishing point, because the agent has cast upon him the duty of deciding the methodology, the technique, nay the very result of the activity that he is formally commanded to achieve. Says he: “When an agent, servant, or official does acts as to which he has received no express orders from his principal, he may aim, or may be expected to aim, directly at the satisfaction of the principal, or he may not. Take an instance of the first,—a cook, in roasting meat or boiling eggs, has, or at any rate the ideal cook is expected to have, directly in view the wishes and tastes of her master. On the other hand, when a great painter is employed to cover a church wall with a picture, he is not expected to keep constantly in mind what will please the wardens and vestry; they are not to be in all his thoughts; if they are men of ordinary sense, they will not wish to be; he is to seek his inspiration elsewhere, and the picture when done is not the ‘creature’, of the wardens and vestry; whereas, if the painter had adopted an opposite course, and had bent his whole energies to divining what he thought would please them best, he would have been their ‘tool’, and the picture might not unfairly be described as their creature.

“Now it is clear into which of these classes a judge falls. Where he has not received direct commands from the State, he does not consider, he is not expected to consider, directly what would please the State; his thoughts are directed to the questions—What have other judges held? What does Ulpian or Lord Coke say about the matter? What decision does elegantia juris or sound morals require?

“Austin’s statement that the Law is entirely made up of commands directly or indirectly imposed by the State is correct, therefore, only on the theory that everything which the State does not forbid its judges to do, and which they in fact do, the State commands, although the judges are not animated by a direct desire to carry out the State’s wishes, but by entirely different ones.” (P. 86—of his book).

Professor Gray then invokes the authority of Sir Henry Maine and quotes him as pointing out that Austin’s theory “is founded on a mere artifice of speech, and that it assumes courts of justice to act in a way and from motives of which they are quite unconscious Let it be understood that it is quite possible to make the theory fit in with such cases, but the process is a mere straining of language. It is carried out by taking words and propositions altogether out of the sphere of the ideas habitually associated with them.” (p. 88.)

If then it be true that the hall-mark, the distinctive feature of the law, consists in its being enforced and applied by our courts, and that in the applying and enforcing of the rules of conduct that are binding on the community the courts derive their inspiration and their guidance and their mandate from legislation and judicial precedent, custom, etc.,

we are able to understand precisely the point of the remark made by Bishop Hoadly quoted above. And so Gray says, "Whoever hath an absolute authority not only to interpret law but to say what law is, is truly the law-giver." In defence of this thesis advanced by Professor Gray and which has been since supported by several jurists of repute, we have the following argument:

"There seems to be nothing gained by seeking to discover the sources, purposes, and relations of a mysterious entity called 'The Law', and then to say this Law is exactly expressed in the rules by which the courts decide cases. It is better to consider directly the sources, purposes, and relations of the rules themselves, and to call the rules 'The Law'.

"There is a feeling", says Professor Gray, "that makes one hesitate to accept the theory that the rules followed by the courts constitute the Law, in that it seems to be approaching the Law from the clinical or therapeutic side; that it is as if one were to define medicine as the science of the rules by which physicians diagnose and treat diseases; but the difference lies in this, that the physicians have not received from the ruler of the world any commission to decide what diseases are, to kill or to cure according to their opinion whether a sickness is mortal; whereas, this is exactly what the judges do with regard to the cases brought before them. If the judges of a country decide that it is Law that a man whose reservoir bursts must pay the damage, Law it is; but all the doctors in town may declare that a man has the yellow fever, and yet he may have only the German measles. If when a board of physicians pronounced that Titus had the colic, ipso facto Titus did have the colic, then I conceive the suggested definition of medicine would be unobjectionable." (p. 102-103).

The above theory which is a paraphrase of the thesis of Professor Gray has been set forth in some detail, only for the reason that it paves the way for a proper understanding of the precise role which judges play in the making of law. From this point of view we are also in a position to deal with that important branch of jurisprudence which has reference to the interpretation of the statutes by the judges.

171. Theory of Interpretation of statutes

(a) Statutes as an important source of law

Statutes are undoubtedly an important source of law, but their effectualness as law has a great deal to do with the way they are regarded by the judges of any country. The brute fact remains that the statutes do not interpret themselves. Their meaning, their import and their application to the concrete situations of life, must await the sanction of the court and, to borrow the felicitous phrase of Gray "it is with the meaning declared by the courts, and no other meaning, that they are imposed upon the community as Law."

"A statute", says the same learned writer, "is the expressed will of the legislative organ of a society; but until the dealers in psychic forces succeed in making of thought transference a working controllable force (and the psychic transference of the thought of an artificial body must stagger the most advanced of the ghost hunters), the will of the legislature has to be expressed by words, spoken or written; that is, by causing sounds to be made, or by causing black marks to be impressed on white paper . . . A judge puts before himself the printed page of the statute book; it is mirrored on the retina of his eye and from this impression he has to reproduce the thought of the law-giving body. The process is far from being merely mechanical; it is obvious how the character of the judge and the cast of his mind must affect the operation, and what a different shape the thought when reproduced in the mind of the judge may have from that which it bore in the mind of the law-giver. This is true even if the function of the judge be deemed only that of attempting to reproduce in his own mind the thought of the law-giver; but as we shall see in a moment, a judge, starting from the words of a statute, is often led to results which he applies as if they had been the thought of the legislature, while yet he does not believe, and has no reason to believe, that his present thought is the same as any thought which the legislature really had." (pp. 170-171).

When judges interpret statutes, the judicial process is confined to the professed purpose of discovering what the meaning of the legislature is but, in a vast variety of cases, it is doubtful if what the intention ultimately discovered by the courts is the intention which animated the legislature. More often than not, a problem of interpretation is no more and no less than this: what meaning to impute to a legislative provision when none is found to have animated its authors.

"The fact is", says Professor Gray, "that the difficulties of so-called interpretation arise when the Legislature has had no meaning at all; when the question which is raised on the statute never occurred to it; when what the judges have to do is, not to determine what the Legislature did mean on a point which was present to its mind, but to guess what it would have intended on a point not present to its mind, if the point had been present. If there are any lawyers among those who honour me with their attention, let them consider any dozen cases of the interpretation of statutes, as they have occurred consecutively in their reading or practice, and they will, I venture to say, find that in almost all of them it is probable, and that in most of them it is perfectly evident, that the makers of the statutes had no real intention, one way or another, on the point in question; that if they had, they would have made their meaning clear; and that when the judges are professing to declare what the Legislature meant, they are in truth, themselves legislating to fill up casus omissi." (p. 173.)

"The intent of the Legislature is sometimes little more than a useful legal fiction, save as it describes in a general way certain outstanding purposes which no one disputes, but which are frequently of little aid in dealing with the precise points presented in litigation. Moreover, legislative ambiguity may at times not be wholly unintentional. It is not to be forgotten that important legislation sometimes shows the effect of compromises which have been induced by exigencies in its progress, and phrases with a convenient vagueness are referred to the courts for appropriate definition, each group interested in the measure claiming that the language adopted embodies its views." [Mr. Justice Hughes, in 1 Mass. Law Quarterly (No. 2), pages 13 and 15.]

Now it is undoubtedly true that the 'intention' of the Legislature is, at best, a convenient metaphor and a useful fiction upon which the duty of Judges to give effect to legislative mandates, contained in the Statutes passed by that body, must be based. But when all is said and done, a little reflection would show that, in a vast majority of cases, the search for the intention of Legislature is a vain attempt to get at a thing that is not there. There are, to begin with, different members of the Legislature who, by either voting for or against a proposed measure, only indicate their preference for or against the principle of the Bill. The Bill as it comes to be voted upon is couched in general terms and no one could be said to be completely aware of the specific instances to which the general terms used in the statute are likely to be applied. All conceptual thinking proceeds upon some sort of vague imaginative symbolism and there is hardly any explicit attempt at abstraction. And although human mind feels at home in dealing with general terms by which these vague abstractions are hypostasised, it is only a pointer to an obvious aspect of our experience, when we assert that we are not often enough even aware of more than 2 or 3 specific instances of the particular cases to which the general terms with which we negotiate the thought-currency might have application. When, therefore, the legislators give their assent to a general proposition contained in a statute, they do not thereby show any awareness of the extent to which the application of those general propositions to specific instances would be available. It is a psychological monstrosity to defend the thesis, that when a Bill leaves the legislative chamber it carries any imprint of the 'combined intentions' of those who have voted upon it. The Judge whose duty it is to apply the law has not to decipher this sum-total of the often-times conflicting intentions of the several legislators, for the simple reason that he is concerned more with the meaning of the words actually used in the Statute—and not with that nebulous something called the 'legislative intent' which is said to arise phoenixwise, thanks to the miracle wrought by Judicial mind, from the ashes of the individual intentions of the Legislators.

The question herein raised is of fundamental importance. Is a judge a diviner of 'legislative intent' in the 'historical sense', that is, of the existence of Legislative intent as an event which actually occurred in history, or is he concerned merely with construing the meaning of the language used in the statute?

not a diviner of Legislative intent—His

The Judge, it is submitted, has to act as a sort of legislator within the frame-work of general statement of the law attempted by the legislature. The declaratory theory of judicial interpretative functions is plainly opposed to the principles of elementary psychology, and its persistence in forensic literature is more in the nature of a homage to the humility of judicial mind than a realistic appraisal of what actually happens. The Judge would not like to assume openly the creative role of filling in the interstices left by the Legislature in the warp and woof of the general statement of the law it has framed for his guidance. The legislative language merely fixes the outer frontiers beyond which the Judge in his decision of cases would not go—but within the amplitude of those limits the Judge is free to make law. The judicial enforcement of law is thus another species of delegated legislation. As one recent writer has put it, the Judge is in reality "a junior partner" in the legislative process. (See Douglas Payne on The Intention of Legislature in the Interpretation of Statutes, Current Legal Problems, 1956).

American jurists have exposed the fallacious character of the approach which the English Common Law has prescribed for the Judges to adopt to the statute law: so very supreme is Parliament in England that the Judges must ever in awe stand before its portals and give effect to its decrees by declaring in each case that comes before them what the pleasure of Parliament has ordained and established. But no Legislature, however omnipotent or omniscient, can overcome the natural infirmities of Human Mind, to say nothing of the peculiar difficulty of articulating its ordinances in a language which, considered as an apparatus of communication of general ideas, even according to the findings of epistemologists, is hopelessly inadequate for the purpose for which it is sought to be exploited.

The Judge, it is submitted, is not merely burdened with the responsibility of exercising discretionary powers that have been expressly conferred upon him by the legislature, but has also the discretion to create the rule of decision in those vast variety of cases where the legislature, by attempting a general statement of the law, has left it to him to exercise the power of law-making within the limits of the hard core of agreed meanings of the flexible, vague and unprecise language used by it. The view taken here of the judicial function is in accord with the one advanced by Roscoe Pound who in his "An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law", at page 51, says :

" genuine interpretation of law-making under the guise of interpretation run into one another. In other words, the Judicial Function and the Legislative Function run into the one another. It is the function of legislative organ to make laws. But from the nature of the case it cannot make laws so complete and all embracing that the Judicial organ will not be obliged to exercise a certain law-making function also. The latter will rightly consider this a subordinate function also. It would take it one of supplementing, developing and shaping given materials by means of a given technique. None-the-less it is a necessary part of Judicial Power. Pushed to the extreme that regards all judicial law-making as unconstitutional usurpation, our political theory, a philosophical classification made over by imperfect generalisation from the British Constitution as it was in the 17th Century, has served merely to intrench in the professional mind the dogma of the Historical School, that legislative law-making is a subordinate function and exists only to supplement the traditional element of the legal system here and there and to set the judicial or juristic tradition now and then in the right path as to some particular item where it has gone astray."

After explaining the historical factors that have conditioned the growth of belief in the judicial function being regarded as merely declaratory of the legislative intent, the learned Jurist goes on to point out:

"Hence it has been easy for us to assume that courts did no more than genuinely interpret legislative texts and deduce the logical content of authoritatively established traditional principles. It has been easy to accept a political theory, proceeding on the dogma of separation of powers, and to lay down that the courts only interpret and apply, that all making of law must come from the legislature, that courts must 'take the law as they find it', as if they could find it ready made for every case. It has been easy also to accept a juristic theory that law cannot be made; that it can only be found, and that the power of finding it is merely a matter of observation and logic, involving no creative element. If we really believed this pious fiction it would argue little faith in the logical power of the Bench in view of diversity of judicially asserted doctrines on the same point which so frequently exist in our case-law and the widely different opinions of our best judges with respect to them. As interpretation is difficult, when it is difficult, just because the Legislature had no actual intention to ascertain, so the finding of common law on a new point is difficult just because there is no rule of law to find. The judicial and legislative functions run together also in the judicial ascertainment of the common law by the analogical application of decided cases." (p. 52).

We might sum up the theoretical basis of the approach to the judicial function outlined above as follows :—

Judicial Function: a Summary Statement.

(a) The orthodox view of the judicial function in relation to the duty of interpreting an enactment is search for the intention of the Legislature from the words used. This absurd view is often rendered plausible by saying: the Judge is not to discover actually what the legislature intended as contradistinguished from what its words express, but what is the meaning of the words it used. There is a lot of dialectical skill shown by the protagonists of this theory in piloting the argument to its pompous and fussy formulation—to illustrate which accusation, perhaps, it is necessary to recall the following "defence of the last ditches" from Vaughan Hawkin's Preliminary Treatise on Evidence (1860):

"It is to be observed, that there may be cases where intention can and must be inferred although, in fact, there may have been none. The interpreter cannot certainly know whether the intent existed; it is the indicia of intent, the marks or signs which afford reasonable presumption of its existence, which he can alone regard, and these he is bound to regard, although, in spite of such indication, there may have been no actual intention."

How can a non-existing intention still reflect its being "in the indicia of intent the marks or signs of which afford reasonable presumption of its existence" is, to say the least of it, a kind of super-sophistry, beyond the comprehension of ordinary mortals.

(b) The better view is to candidly acknowledge the creative role that the judge admittedly plays in deciding cases by evolving a rule of decision within the limits of the language that has been used by the legislators. "The fact is", to quote Professor Gray again, "that the difficulties of so-called interpretation arise when the legislature has had no meaning at all; when the question which is raised on the statute never occurred to it, when what the Judges have to do is, not to determine what the Legislature did mean on a point which was present to its mind, but to guess what it would have intended on a point not presented to its mind, if the point had been present."

What Professor Gray calls 'guessing' is yet another mode of re-constructing legislative intent—an operation which is hardly distinguishable from 'legislating' in the sense stressed by the present writer.

(Consult further—A Better Theory of Legal Interpretation by Charles P. Curtis, in Jurisprudence in Action, p. 133, who would have the Judges regard themselves as the addressees—that is, as persons to whom Legislature has addressed a request as to what is to be done when a case comes up before them and whom it expects to act reasonably to comply with its behests. Says he, 'And meaning of words (used by the legislature) is to be sought not in the author but in the person addressed.... Words are but the delegation of the right to interpret them . . .').

What then should be the attitude of Judges to the problem of 'Judicial Interpretation'? The answer to this question has been attempted by that eminent Jurist Frederick Pollock, ". . . it is to hold a just middle way between excess of valour and excess of caution."

"A too daring expounder", continues he, "is in danger of laying down sweeping rules without attending to the probable variations in the circumstances to which they will be applied; and then the application of his rule may have to be confined within tolerable bounds by a series of qualifications which leave it, to use a classical description, well nigh eaten up by exceptions. On the other hand, the pedestrian timidity that shrinks from hazarding any general conclusion will only land us in a still less desirable state, that of having no principle at all, but a heap of unrelated instances which those who come after may or may not find to be consistent with one another. Doubtless it is very true that the more valiant Judge runs the risk of his exposition being sooner or later disapproved by superior authority; while the more cautious one avoids that risk, but at the price of falling under a censure now familiar. Those who make no mistakes, it has been said, will never make anything; and the Judge who is afraid of committing himself may be called sound and safe in his own generation, but will leave no mark on the law. Doubtless, also, caution has its proper place in resisting temptations to rash and premature definition, and especially to borrowing conceptions of foreign origin without adequately considering whether they are in harmony with the spirit of our own law. In short, discretion is very good and necessary, but without valour the law would have no vitality at all." (See Judicial Caution and Valour, an address delivered by the afore-mentioned author in the University of London in 1929).

Any student wishing to understand the recent trends in the forensic thought on this subject is advised to read the Address delivered by learned Hand on Spirit of Liberty, 1952, and the address delivered by Zechariah Chafee, Jr. of the Harvard Law School on January 27, 1940, before the Judicial Section of the New York State Bar Association on "The disorderly conduct of words" (Canadian Bar Review for 1942 at p. 752). The latter address contains a philosophical analysis of the Function of Language and reviews the contributions that have been made to that science by writers like (1) C. K. Ogden and (2) I. A. Richards (the Authors of Meaning of Meaning, 1936, and The Tyranny of Words, 1938), and the student would find in it some thought-provoking suggestions for the proper understanding of the interpretative role of the judicial mind. In England, a book of considerable importance on the subject entitled, "Jurisprudence" has appeared as recently as 1957. It is significant that the book has been dedicated by the co-authors—Dias and Hughes—to the authors of "Meaning of Meaning". The book has been based on the "semantic" analysis of the meaning of meaning and takes more or less a view of the judicial function involved in the interpretation of law which has been advocated in this study.

172. Rules of Statutory Construction

Professor Gray defines legislation as "the formal utterances of the legislative organs of the Society." It is as we have seen an important source of law and in the modern times, at any rate, legislation has become an all-prevading and a highly important state-activity.

There are some statutes which are simple and require very little of interpretation but there are certain others that are couched in a somewhat ambiguous language and their precise effect it is difficult to assess. The court will then "interpret" the statute: and by that is meant nothing more than this that it will endeavour to ascertain the meaning as it can be discovered from the words used.

The rules of interpretation of the enacted law have been evolved by the judges with a view to laying down some well designed objective standards by appeal to which certain effects could be given to the words used by the legislature. These rules of interpretation were originally designed to assist the courts in reaching correct conclusions upon questions relating to the meaning, but in effect, these judicial pronouncements, in their turn, have themselves become matters of judicial interpretation—for every rule evolved by judges to interpret a given statute has itself become a "binding precedent" for the same court as also for the courts of inferior jurisdiction.

The basic rule upon the subject of statutory interpretation is that if the words are clear, the problem of interpretation does not so much as arise: no more in such a case is necessary than to expound those words in their natural and ordinary sense, the words themselves in such case best declaring the intention of the Legislature. (See Income Tax Commissioners v. Pemsel, (1891) A.C. 531) "The object of all interpretation of a statue", says Maxwell, "is to determine what intention is conveyed, either expressly or impliedly, by the language used, so far as is necessary for determining whether the particular case or state of facts presented to the interpreter falls within it. When the intention is express, the task is one of verbal construction only; but when the statute expresses no intention on a question to which it gives rise, and yet some intention must necessarily be imputed to the Legislature regarding it, the interpreter has to determine it by inference grounded on certain legal principles." Then he goes on to say: "The subject of the interpretation of a statue seems thus to fall under two heads: What are the principles which govern the construction of the language of an Act of Parliament? And, what are those which guide the interpreter in gathering the intention on those incidental points on which the Legislature is necessarily presumed to have entertained an opinion, but on which it has not expressed any?" (Interpretation of Statutes, pp. 2 & 3, Ninth Edition). The most important rule for the judges to follow is that the words and phrases used by the legislature, if they are plain and capable of one meaning, must be given due effect, even though, that course may be found to lead to absurd or mischievous results. (Rex v. City of London Court Judge (1892) 1 Q.B. 273, 290). However, unjust, arbitrary or inconvenient the meaning conveyed may be, it must receive its full effect. It is the duty of the judge to give effect to the clear and unambiguous words of legislative enactments and leave the matter there. It is for the Legislature to rectify the enactment if it is found to be absurd. It is not the function of the judge to conjecture or guess at the meaning of the parties if he is construing an instrument like a deed or will, or of the words used by the Legislature if he is interpreting its enactments, and thereby, in effect, to replace the document under consideration with one of his own making.

The parties or the Legislature must be taken to have intended to say what they have in fact said and not what the court thinks they have said or wanted to say. (Re Meredith ex parte Chick, (1879) 11 Ch. D. 731. See also Lumsden v. Inland Revenue Commissioner (1914) A.C. 877. However irreverential it may look, the present writer cannot refrain himself from remarking upon the utter uselessness of some of the rules (such as the one referred to above) that have been laid down by Courts on statutory construction. Of course, the Judges must give effect to what the Legislature has in fact said, and not "what the Court thinks they have said", but one might legitimately ask: 'How can courts give effect to what the Legislature in fact has said without thinking what they have said or wanted to say. So long as it is the Judge who must find "what the Legislature has said", he must necessarily think about what they have in fact said. Search for meaning is not a process analogous to the one that is involved in visual perception. One does not merely have to open one's eyes to see the meaning of words used as one does to see the morning Sun! And so it is ever so true, as was observed in Ellerman Lines v. Murray, (1931) A.C. 126. "Judges may agree that the meaning is plain, but may differ as to what that plain meaning is". (See also Richards v. McBride, (1881), 8 Q.B.D. 119, remarks of Lord Blackburn in Caledonian Railway v. North British Railway, (1881) 6 App. Cases, 114.)

That statutory construction would be adopted which is in accord with the policy and object of the statute, provided, however, that the "policy and object" itself would be gathered from the statutory language without any attempt being made by court to speculate, conjecture or surmise what the objection or policy of legislation in question is. (Newman Manufacturing Co. v. Marrables, (1931) 2 K.B. 297; William v. Ellis, (1880) 49, L.J.M.C. 47:5 Q.B.D., 175. As Tindal, C.J. in the Sussex Peerage case (1844) 11 Cl. & F. 85 said at p. 143:

"The only rule for the construction of Acts of Parliament is that they should be construed according to the intent of the Parliament which passed the Act. If the words of the statute are in themselves precise and unambiguous then no more can be necessary than to expound those words in their natural and ordinary sense. The words themselves alone do, in such case, best declare the intention of the law giver."

"In a Court of Law or Equity", said Lord Watson in (1897) A.C. 22 at p. 38, "what the legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact, either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication." (The same idea is felicitously expressed in an opinion of the English Law officers, *Sir Roundell Palmer*s and Sir Robert Colker cited by Isaacs, J., in his dissenting judgment in James v. Cowan, (43, C.L.R. 386, at 409) which was ultimately upheld by the Privy Council in 1932, 47 C.L.R. 386.—"It must be presumed that a legislative body intends that which is the necessary effect of its enactments: the object, the purpose, and the intention of the enactment is the same." The same learned Judge added: "By the 'necessary effect', it needs scarcely be said, those learned jurists maintain, the legal effect, not the ulterior effect economically or socially. I think it may be accepted that the Privy Council on appeal regarded that view as correct [See (1920) A.C. p. 691. See also the remarks of Lord Doster in Commonwealth of Australia v. Bank of New South Wales, (1949) 79 C.L.R. p. 497 at p. 624: (1950) A.C. 235 at 307]

When it is said that Courts must give effect to the intention of the Legislature, it is not the intention of the Legislature, as a historical fact which is implied in the statement, but only the intention which could be gathered from the words used. But words used may take on their meanings from the context in which they are located and here, as in ordinary conversation one encounters in life, dictionary is a feeble help for finding out the meaning of those words. If the plain meaning of the words used involves a result which is absurd or inconvenient, the Golden Rule of Interpretation comes in for application—the rule which says that if the words of a statute in their ordinary sense lead to absurd or inconvenient result the Courts will depart from that meaning to avoid that result. The presumption is that such an absurd or inconvenient result was not, and could not be intended by Parliament. (See Francis Jacks Development Ltd. v. Hall, (1951) 2 K.B. 488, at 495).

With regard to the interpretation of Acts of special kind, like the penal, fiscal, or criminal statutes, one often comes across a plea that they be strictly construed and in favour of the subject. This raises the question of strict and beneficial construction of particular statutes and the present author can do no better than cite the following passage from Maxwell's celebrated work on the Interpretation of Statutes in an effort to state the accepted principles that courts apply in these days:

"The tendency of modern decisions," says the learned author, "upon the whole, is to narrow materially the difference between what is called a strict and a beneficial construction. All statutes are now construed with a more attentive regard to the language, and criminal statutes with a more rational regard to the aim and intention of the legislature, than formerly. It is unquestionably right that the distinction should not be altogether erased from the judicial mind, for it is required by the spirit of our free institutions that the interpretation of all statutes should be favourable to personal liberty and this tendency is still evinced in a certain reluctance to supply the defects of language, or eke out the meaning of an obscure passage by strained or doubtful inferences. The effect of the rule of strict construction might almost be summed up in the remark that, where an equivocal word or ambiguous sentence leaves a reasonable doubt of its meaning which the canons of interpretation fail to solve, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the subject and against the legislature which has failed to explain itself. But it yields to the paramount rule that every statute is to be expounded according to its expressed or manifest intention and that all cases within the mischief aimed at are, if the language permits, to be held to fall within its remedial influence Statutes which encroach on the rights of the subjects whether as regards person or property, are similarly subject to a strict construction in the sense before explained. It is a recognised rule that they should be interpreted, if possible, so as to respect such rights....It is presumed, where the objects of the Act do not obviously imply such an intention, that the legislature does not desire to confiscate the property, or to encroach upon the right of persons, and it is, therefore, expected that, if such be its intention, it will manifest it plainly, if not in express words, at least by clear implication and beyond reasonable doubt. (See Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes, Ninth Ed. p. 288)."

The rules that have been evolved by courts of law in the construction of deeds and wills apply to the construction of the statutes.

Some of these rules are :—

(1) The words of the statute must be construed so as to give a sensible meaning to them. If possible, they should be construed ut res magis valeat quam pereat (that is, a provision will be interpreted so as to give it a sensible effect). (See 22 Q.B.D. 513, Curtis v. Stoen of the year 1889. See also Attorney-General v. Beauchamp (1920) 1 K.B. 650; Pye v. Minister for Lands for New South Wales (1954) 3 All E.R. 514; Bagettes Ltd. v. G.P. Estates and Co. (1955) 3 All E.R. 451.)

(2) Express repeal of some statutes would be interpreted to mean that others not mentioned are not repealed. (Garnett v. Bradley (1878) 3 A.C. 944.) This is based on the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius, for which see North Central Wagon and Finance Co.

Ltd. v. Graham (1950) 1 All E.R. 780 and Marczuk v. Marczuk (1956) 1 All E.R. 657. But this maxim would not be pressed to a point where its application would cause inconsistency or injustice, as sometimes the cause of the omission might be due to thoughtlessness or accidental slip of the draftsman. [See Colquhoun v. Brooks (1887) 14 A.C. 493; 19 Q.B.D. 400]. As was observed in the case of Colquhoun v. Brooks (1888), 21 Q.B.D. 52 (65) by Lopes L.J. in respect of this maxim that "it is often a valuable servant but a dangerous master to follow in the construction of statutes and documents. The exclusio is often the result of inadvertence, accident, and the maxim ought not to be applied when its application having regard to the subject-matter to which it is applied would lead to inconsistency or injustice".

(3) The ejusdem generis rule which enjoins that the scope of general words used in the statute immediately following the enumeration of specific particular or concrete terms may be restrained by reference to the subject-matter indicated by the particular or specific expressions used. (See Powell v. Kempton Parke Racecourse Co. (1897) 2 Q.B. 242; (1899), A.C. 143; and J. H. Tucker v. Board of Trade (1955) 2 All E.R. 522. See also 1950 Chancery p. 540, as also (1953) 2 All E.R. p. 559 (CA). Regarded in the abstract, the general words like all others receive their full and natural meaning, but where these general words follow one or more less general terms, the ejusdem generis rule would be invoked by the courts to limit the generality of the full scope of the general words, as though it were confined to the universe of discourse indicated by prior less general terms. The essential consideration is to see, whether in the enumeration of less general words, followed by more general words at the end of such enumeration, there is a genus or category under which all specific terms can be subsumed. If no such genus or category is discovered, the ejusdem generis rule would not apply. [Tillmanns & Co. v. Knutsford (1908), 2 K.B. p. 385. See also Chandris v. Isbrandtsen Moller Co. Inc. (1951), 1 K.B. at 244; Municipal Corporation Rangoon v. Saw Willie (1942), Rangoon 70, and in William Lawrence Allen v. Emmerson (1944) 1 All E.R. p. 344; 1944, K.B. 362]. The ejusdem generis rule was held not to apply to a case where particular words used were, "disposition", "trusts and covenants": a disposition is a transfer, but a covenant is not. A trust and covenant both create an obligation but a disposition need not. As no common class or category or genus could be made out, the rule was not said to apply. [See Hood-Barris v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (1946) 2 All E.R. 768 at p. 773 (CA)]. The tendency of the more modern authorities is to attenuate the application of ejusdem generis rule. (See Anderson versus Anderson, (1895) 1 Q.B. 749).

(4) The words used in statute would have the meaning that could have been predicated of them contemporaneously with the passing of the statute, and any semantic development as to the meaning of the term used in the statute which has taken place later would not be given effect to. This rule is based on the maxim contemporanea expostio est optima et futissima lege. [See Gaslight & Coke Company v. Hardy (1886), 17 Q.B.D., 619 at p. 621; Sharp v. Wakefield (1889), 22 Q.B.D. p. 224, and Reid v. Lincoln (1892) A.C. 644].

(5) Statute must be read as a whole. All its component parts should be seen as being internally consistent. Attempt should be made to give that meaning to the several parts of the statute, that makes for consistency and harmony. The presumption underlying every statute is that it is free from internal contradictions and one sure way of discovering the intention of the legislature is to read the enactment as a whole, and that is best done by giving to each section a meaning which makes for consistency. (Leader v. Duffey (1888), 13 A.C. p. 294).

Rule in Heydon's case.

In the reign of Elizabeth, the Barons of the Exchequer laid down authoritative rules of interpretation in what is called Heydon's Case (1584) 3 Co. Rep. 7a: "For the sure and true interpretation of all statutes in general (be they penal, or beneficial, restrictive or enlarging of the Common Law) four things are to be discerned and considered: (1) what was the common law before the passing of the Act; (2) what was the mischief and defect for which the common law did not provide; (3) what remedy the Parliament hath resolved and appointed to cure the disease of the commonwealth, and (4) the true reason of the remedy. And then the office of all the Judges is always to make such construction as shall suppress the mischief and advance the remedy and to suppress subtle inventions and evasions for the continuance of the mischief and pro privato commodo, and to add force and life to the cure and remedy according to the true intent of the makers of the act pro bono publico."

These and some other Rules of Construction have been stated in a concise form by Sir Courtenay Ilbert in his famous book on Mechanics of Law-making as follows:

"The English draftsman has to consider not only the statutory Rules of Interpretation which are to be found in the Act of 1889, but also the general rules which are based on judicial decisions and which are to be found in a good many useful text-books on the interpretation of statutes. Among the most important of these rules are:

1. The rule that a statute must be read as a whole. Therefore the language of one section may affect the construction of another.
2. The Rule that a statute may be interpreted by reference to other Statutes dealing with the same or similar subject-matter. Hence the language of these rules must be studied. The meaning attached to a particular expression in one statute, either by definition or by judicial decision, may be attached to it in another. And variation of language may be construed as indicating change of intention.
3. The general rule that special provision will control general provision.
4. The similar rule that where particular words are followed by general words (horse, cow, or other animal), the generality of the latter will be limited by reference to the former (Ejusdem generis rule).
5. The general rule, subject to important exceptions, that a guilty mind is an essential element in a breach of a criminal or penal law. It should, therefore, be considered whether the words 'wilfully' or 'knowingly', should be inserted, and whether, if not inserted, they would be implied, unless expressly negatived.
6. The presumption that the legislature does not intend any alteration in the rules or principles of the common law beyond what it expressly declares.
7. The presumption against any intention to contravene a rule of international law.
8. The presumption against retrospective operation of a statute subject to an exception as to enactments which affect only the practice and procedure of the courts.
9. The rule that the power imposed on a public authority may be construed as a duty imposed on that authority ('may'-'shall')."

The last mentioned rule, namely that 'may' in some cases may be judicially interpreted as though it were 'shall' is liable to give the impression that the judges are competent to substitute the word 'shall' for the word 'may' occurring in the statute. Similarly, there are some cases in which 'or' has been construed as 'and', and vice versa, but this is not to say that wherever the judges do so they take liberty with the language used by the Legislature. Jessel, M.R. in the case of Morgan v. Thomas, 51 L.J.Q.B. 557; 9 Q.B.D. 643 remarked:

Summary Statement from Sir Courtenay Ilbert; book

(c) Construction—mandatory and Directive provisions.

"You will find it said in some cases that 'or' means 'and'; but 'or' never does mean 'and'." (So also 'and' never does mean 'or'.) "There is a context which shows that 'or' is used for 'and', by mistake. Suppose a man said, 'I give the black cow on which I usually ride to A.B.', and he rode on a black horse. Of course the horse would pass, but I do not think even a modern annotator of cases would put in the marginal note 'cow' means 'horse.' You correct the wrong word by the context."

Similarly, sometimes the courts construe the word 'may' as 'shall' and sometimes regard the word 'shall' itself as indicative of a directory and not a mandatory meaning. There is a great deal of confusion on this score to be found in some of the books on statutory interpretation, and also in the kind of language that is sometimes employed by the judges; for not infrequently expression is given to the view that in thus construing statutes courts are not giving effect to the meaning of the Legislature. Numerous expressions abound in our legal literature which tend to show as if the judges have a dictionary of their own with which they sometimes look at the words used by the Legislatures and give to them the meaning which is at variance with the normal meaning of those words. The essential thing to remember, however, is that, whenever this is done, it is only because the context in which the word under interpretation occurs in the opinion of the court means something other than what the word left to itself ordinarily would mean; so that it is ever so true to say that 'may', means 'may'; 'or' means 'or'; 'shall' means 'shall' unless of course the neighbourhood in which the word under interpretation is discovered, imposes upon that word a different meaning which gives full effect to the intention of the Legislature. The dominant rule then is that it is the context that controls the meaning—even as it is the environment that induces change in any biological species that finds its habitat in it.

Whether the provision of law is mandatory or directory sometimes becomes an all-important question in the interpretation of the force and effect of statutory requirements. When a power is conferred to do a certain thing in a certain way, that thing can be done only in the way prescribed or not at all. [See Nazir Ahmad v. King Emperor AIR (1936) P.C. 253 at p. 257.] But sometimes the power is prescribed to be exercised subject to compliance with certain conditions and limitations that appear to have been imposed for the due exercise of that power—some of these conditions and limitations may be such that even if all or any of them have been disregarded, non-compliance with them will not vitiate the action of the person exercising the power. Whenever, as a result of judicial investigation of the meaning and effect of a statutory provision, a conclusion is reached that the requirement of the statute as to compliance with an essential condition of the exercise of power has not been fulfilled, the result would be that no effect would be given by courts to such an exercise of power, the argument in support of that view being that there is no power to act apart from compliance with the qualification imposed by the statute for the exercise of that power. But not every requirement of law as to the mode in which or the manner in which the power is to be exercised has the same weight—there are some requirements that are only directory and non-compliance as to these does not vitiate the result. Some artificial rules have been laid down by courts by recourse to which the character of the provision being a mandatory or directory one can be determined. But care should be taken to remember that these rules do not furnish any conclusive test upon the question whether a given provision is directory or mandatory. The truth of the matter is that, here as elsewhere, the golden rule is that there is no golden rule. In the case of Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (1861), 30 L.J.Ch. 379, Lord Cambell observed:

"No universal rule can be laid down for the construction of statutes as to whether mandatory enactments shall be considered directory only or obligatory with an implied nullification for disobedience. It is the duty of Courts of justice to try and get at the real intention of the Legislature by carefully attending to the whole scope of the statute to be construed."

To the same effect are the observations of Lord Penzance in the case of Howard v. Bodington (1877), 2 P.D. 203.

Considering that it is difficult to lay down any hard and fast rule which will assist in the determination of the question as to what is and what is not a directory or mandatory provision, the important point to be borne in view is that the controversy as to whether a certain provision is mandatory or directory in each case presents itself for solution only in situations where the question relating to the validity of acts performed by agents or authorities on whom powers are conferred comes up for consideration. If there be some requirement of law which has been imposed as a condition precedent for the exercise of power, and the condition has been disregarded by the agent or authority whose act or acts are under challenge, the act or acts, as the case may be, would be regarded as having no legal effect whatever (see for instance in re Gifford (1888), 20 Q.B.D. p. 368.) But if the requirement of law is such that its non-compliance would not affect the legal character of the exercise of power, the provision would not be regarded as mandatory but only directory. (See for instance Reg. v. Ingall (1877) 2 Q.B.D. p. 199.) This distinction between mandatory and directory provision is also relevant in a controversy where the question about the competence of Court to issue a writ of mandamus to a public functionary to take the step required under law comes up for consideration, for unless the statute imposes a duty no mandamus can lie.

But the extension of this conception to cover cases where, to all intents and purposes, the doing of a thing or the exercise of power is not prescribed in any manner, as being controlled by a condition, is wholly unjustified and unwarranted. For instance, ART. 141 of the Constitution prescribes, "Whenever the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly is dissolved, a general election for the reconstitution of the Assembly shall be held not later than six months from the date of dissolution; . . ." If the question presents itself upon the construction of this Article, whether an election that has been held after six months' time of the dissolution of the Assembly is valid, the short answer to the problem would be to say that the circumstances as to the holding of that election within the space of six months after the dissolution of the Assembly is not at all a condition as to the exercise of power of holding election. The power of holding election is a requirement of the Constitution and the requirement of ART. 141, namely that election be held within six months' time has been enacted merely with a view to ensuring that election will be held within a certain time, so that if there is evidence to believe that it was not being held within that time, a writ of mandamus would lie for compelling the relevant authority to hold the said election. All argument, whether the word 'shall' appearing in ART. 141 is directory or mandatory is therefore thoroughly irrelevant to the question as to the validity of the election held after six months' time, for the simple reason that, on the face of it, the provision in question does not make the exercise of power relating to the holding of election contingent upon its being held within six months' time. It is for this reason that the observations contained in the case of Zain Noorani v. Secretary of the National Assembly of Pakistan, PLD (1957) Karachi 1 and 1957 PLD Supreme Court p. 46 to the effect that the word shall in ART. 141 is directory and not mandatory are to be read subject to this qualification. To read them otherwise is virtually to say that Election Commissioners cannot be compelled to hold election within six months' time simply because the provision is merely directory and not mandatory—which, to say the least of it, is not the law.

Similarly, words and expressions like 'it shall be lawful', 'if they shall think fit', 'reasonable cause to believe' etc. occurring in statutes require a careful analysis—for upon the precise meaning to be attached to them in the varying contexts in which they occur must depend the answer which the Court will give as to the effect which is to be predicated of acts performed in violation of these conditions. In the case of Liversidge v. Sir John Anderson and another (1942) A.C. 206 the expression to be interpreted was, "If the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe etc. . .", and the question was whether the words required that there must be an external fact as to reasonable cause for the belief, and one, therefore, capable of being challenged in a court of law; or whether the words in the context in which they are to be found, point simply to the belief of the Secretary of State founded on his view of there being reasonable cause for the belief which he entertains. Viscount Maugham was not disposed to deny that in the absence of the context such a phrase as—" 'if A.B. has reasonable cause to believe' a certain circumstance or thing, it should be construed as meaning 'if there is in fact reasonable cause for believing' that thing and if A.B. believes it. But I am quite unable to take the view that the words can only have that meaning. It seems to me reasonably clear that, if the thing to be believed is something which is essentially one within the knowledge of A.B. or one for the exercise of his exclusive discretion, the words might well mean if A.B. acting on what he thinks is reasonable cause (and of course acting in good faith) believes the thing in question."

He therefore held that there was no preliminary question of fact which could be submitted to the Courts and that, in effect, there is no appeal from the decision of the Secretary of State in these matters provided only that he acts in good faith.

Lord Atkin, on the other hand, in a strong, vigorous dissenting speech observed:

"It is surely incapable of dispute that the words 'if A has X' constitute a condition the essence of which is the existence of X and the having of it by A. If it is a condition to a right (including a power) granted to A, whenever the right comes into dispute the tribunal whatever it may be that is charged with determining the dispute must ascertain whether the condition is fulfilled. In some cases the issue is one of fact, in others of both fact and law. But in all cases the words indicate an existing something the having of which can be ascertained. And the words do not mean and cannot mean 'if A thinks that he has.' 'If A has a broken ankle' does not mean and cannot mean 'if A thinks that he has a broken ankle.' 'If A has a right of way' does not mean and cannot mean if A thinks that he has a right of way.' 'Reasonable cause' for an action or a belief is just as much a positive fact capable of determination by a third party as is a broken ankle or a legal right. If its meaning is the subject of dispute as to legal rights, then ordinarily the reasonableness of the cause, and even the existence of any cause is in our law to be determined by the judge, and not by the tribunal of fact if the functions deciding law and fact are divided. . . .

"No one doubts that the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, empowers His Majesty in Council to vest any minister with unlimited power over the person and property of the subject. The only question is whether in this regulation they have done so.

". . . It is said that it could never have been intended to substitute the decision of judges for the decision of the minister; or, as has been said, to give an appeal from the minister to the courts. But no one proposes either a substitution or an appeal. A judge's decision is not substituted for the constable's on the question of unlawful arrest; nor does he sit on appeal from the constable. He has to bear in mind that the constable's authority is limited, that he can only arrest on reasonable suspicion, and the judge has the duty to say whether the conditions of the power are fulfilled. If there are reasonable grounds, the judge has no further duty of deciding whether he would have formed the same belief, any more than if there is reasonable evidence to go to a jury the judge is concerned with whether he would have come to the same verdict. . . .

I view with apprehension the attitude of judges who, on a mere question of construction, when face to face with claims involving the liberty of the subject show themselves more executive minded than the executive. Their function is to give words their natural meaning, not, perhaps in war time leaning towards liberty, but following the dictum of Pollock, C.B., in Bowditch v. Balchin (1850) 5 Ex. 378, cited with approval by my noble and learned friend Lord Wright in Barnard v. Gorman (1941) A.C. 378. In a case in which the liberty of the subject is concerned, we cannot go beyond the natural construction of the statute. In this country, amid the clash of arms, the laws are not silent. They may be changed, but they speak the same language in war as in peace. It has always been one of the pillars of freedom, one of the principles of liberty for which on recent authority we are now fighting, that the judges are no respecters of persons and stand between the subject and any attempted encroachments on his liberty by the executive; alert to see that any coercive action is justified in law. In this case I have listened to arguments which might have been addressed acceptably to the Court of King's Bench in the time of Charles I. . . ."

The foregoing two extracts are typical of the manner in which two judicial minds trained in the same system of law, being cognizant of the demand which the law makes, namely, that the words of the statute should be given their full effect, reach divergent conclusions. It is these cases that illustrate more than anything else the utter impossibility of regarding rules of statutory interpretation or construction of constitutional instruments as being anything more than "insubstantial aids" in the way of performing judicial duties. The trouble only arises if those rules are regarded as infallible guides and consulted as though they were "invincible oracles" upon the settlement of complicated questions that are canvassed before the judges as to the meaning and effect of the statutory language. Any student wishing to make himself familiar with the mode in which some of the famous textbook writers and jurists in England have reacted to the conflicting interpretation bestowed upon Regulation 18B by the House of Lords in the above case, would do well to read Law and Orders by C.K. Allen, (1950 Ed.) Appendix 5, pages 333 to 352. The following extract therefrom would indicate the sort of criticism to which that decision has been subjected:

"The hinge of Lord Atkin's speech is that the term (reasonable cause) has, upto the date of this decision, had one clear meaning, and one plain effect, in every branch of our law, whether common or statutory. It has involved an objective test, by an independent tribunal, of the reasonableness claimed for the conduct which is impugned. Lord Atkin has supported this proposition by abundant illustration, and has stated categorically that there is no known exception to it. 'No other meaning has ever been suggested.' As to the 'subjective' meaning now contended for by the Secretary of State, it has never at any time occurred to the minds of counsel or judges that the words are even capable of meaning anything so fantastic. In the particular case of malicious prosecution, Lord Atkin observes (and we submit that the principle applies equally to any other branch of the law) that the objective test exists against any person, rich or poor, powerful or weak, including any member of the executive, whether Secretary of State or not.

"None of this is denied or even challenged, in respect of English law up to November, 1941. In all the other speeches, there is not a single instance to disprove Lord Atkin's general proposition, not a single exception from the rule on which he relies. Liversidge v. Anderson, therefore, places an entirely new interpretation on a very familiar term of art, and, by admission, opens up what Lord Atkin calls the era of 'subjective' cause.

"Why? Because, in this new interpretation (which, of course, the House of Lords is always competent to introduce into the law) a Secretary of State occupies a different position, as an executive officer, from an ordinary citizen. Surely the omnipotence and omniscience of Cabinet rank have seldom received so much deference as in this case! Thus a principal Secretary of State and a member of the Government is not, in a mere matter of the liberty of the subject, 'at all in the same position as, for example, a police constable' (per Viscount Maugham). He is one of the high officers of State, who, by reason of his position, is entitled to public confidence in his capacity and integrity, who is answerable to Parliament for his conduct in office, who has access to exclusive sources of information. . . (He has) both knowledge and responsibility which no Court can share (per Lord Macmillan). He is, says Lord Romer, not some minor official holding a subordinate position. He is the Secretary of State. The majesty of his position constrains Lord Romer, when confronted with the phrase reasonable cause, to the conclusion that sometimes even the most familiar words and expressions are used in other than their ordinary meaning, and this is the case here.

"This aspect of the decision is perturbing to those who are unable, whatever may be the exigencies of war, to divest themselves of certain old-fashioned constitutional doctrines. Generations of Englishmen have been brought up to regard it as one vital aspect of the Rule of Law (for which, among other things, this country is now fighting the most crucial war in its history) that all persons are equal before the law and that for any unjustified infringement of the liberty of the subject the liability of a Minister of State is no whit different from that of a policeman, or, indeed, from the meanest of the King's subjects. Many of the great constitutional battles in our history have been fought on this very issue. If we are to understand for the future that executive office, dignity or responsibility, whether in peace or in war, exempts the incumbent from inquiry into the reasonableness or arbitrariness of his conduct, when it affects the elementary rights of a citizen, then we must revise all our ideas. Far from sharing Professor Goodhart's enthusiasm for this vindication of executive power, we submit that Liversidge v. Anderson has put back the clock to a day when Englishmen found it necessary to declare that the power of the executive had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished. If they have not entirely lost the spirit of their ancestors, they will say so again, when the full effect of this case becomes apparent in our jurisprudence."

In the case of Magor and St. Mellons Rural District Council v. Newport Corporation, (1951) 2 All E.R. 839, Lord Simonds fixed the outer frontiers of the arena within which judicial mind must operate to discover the force and effect of the statutory provisions which come up before the Courts for interpretation and construction :

"My Lords, the criticism which I venture to make of the judgment of the learned Lord Justice is not directed at the conclusion that he reached. It is after all a trite saying that on questions of construction different minds may come to different conclusions and I am content to say that I agree with my noble and learned friend. But it is on the approach of the Lord Justice to what is a question of construction and nothing else that I think it desirable to make some comment, for at a time when so large a proportion of the cases that are brought before the courts depend on the construction of modern statutes it would not be right for this House to pass unnoticed the propositions which the learned Lord Justice lays down for the guidance of himself and, presumably, of others. He said: [(1950) 2 ALL E.R. 1236]:

"We sit here to find out the intention of Parliament and of Ministers and carry it out, and we do this better by filling in the gaps and making sense of the enactment than by opening it up to destructive analysis."

The first part of this passage appears to be an "echo of what was said in Heydon's case, (1584), 3 Co. Rep. 7a: 76 E.R. 637: 42 Digest 614, 143) three hundred years ago and, so regarded, is not objectionable. But the way in which the learned Lord Justice summarises the broad rules laid down by Sir Edward Coke in that case may well induce grave misconception of the function of the court. The part which is played in the judicial interpretation of a statute by reference to the circumstances of its passing is too well known to need re-statement. It is sufficient to say that the general proposition that it is the duty of the court to find out the intention of Parliament—and not only of Parliament but of Ministers also—cannot by any means be supported. The duty of the court is to interpret the words that the legislature has used. Those words may be ambiguous, but, even if they are, the power and duty of the court to travel outside them on a voyage of discovery are strictly limited: see, for instance, Assam Railways & Trading Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1935) A.C. 445, and particularly, the observations of Lord Wright (1935) A.C. 458."

173. Internal and External Aids—for the Construction of Statutes

There are also what are called "internal aids" for the interpretation of statutes; they are the aids that help in the unlocking of the intention of the Legislature from the title, preamble, the headings, marginal notes, schedules annexed to the Act etc. As a rule, a short title is hardly of much assistance in the unfolding of the meaning of an Act, although a long title is usually regarded as being of some assistance as it is open to discussion in a Parliament. But care should be taken to note that the title should never be allowed to affect or restrain the plain meaning of a statute—it is only to serve, if at all, the purpose of offering an aid in the resolution of difficulty. [Sage v. Eicholz (1919) 2 K.B. 171. See also Vacher v. London Society of Compositors (1913), A.C. 107, where Lord Moulton said, "the title is part of the Act itself, and it is legitimate to use it for the purpose of interpreting the Act as a whole and ascertaining its scope," and Maxwell at p. 43. See also In re Scarisbrick Resettlement Estates (1944) Ch. 229.]

The preamble is generally looked at by courts for giving effect to the intention of the Legislature when the text is ambiguous but not otherwise. [See Prince Ernest of Hanover v. Attorney-General (1955) 2 W.L.R., p. 13; 3 W.L.R., p. 868. See also Ellerman Lines Ltd. v. Murray (1931), A.C. 126; also see remarks of Sastri J., in (1950) S.C. p. 27, Gopalan's case.]

"The preamble of a statute", says the celebrated American Jurist Mr. Story, "is a key to open the minds of the makers as to the mischiefs that are to be remedied and the objects that are to be accomplished by the provisions of the statute."

Where the provisions of an organic instrument are clear, the Preamble cannot be invoked in aid of construction to extend or qualify the plain meaning of the words used. Nor is a preamble a source of substantive rights. But where there is a doubt in regard to the meaning of the terms employed by Legislature, it is not only permissible but desirable for the purposes of ascertaining the meaning of the language used by the Legislature to invoke the aid of the Preamble for it might in such a case furnish the ground and cause as to the making of such a statute. [Income Tax Commissioners v. Pemsel (1891) A.C. 531; Sussex Peerage case 3 L.T. (O.S.) 277 (1844), 11 C.L. & F. 85, Bholaparsad v. King Emperor, (1942) F.C. 17]. Similarly, in the case of Henning Jacobson v. Massachusetts (1905) 49 L.Ed. 643, Mr. Justice Harlan observed (at p. 648):

"Although that preamble indicates the general purposes for which the people ordained and established the constitution, it has never been regarded as the source of any substantive power conferred on the Government of the United States, or any of its departments. Such powers embrace only those expressly granted in the body of the Constitution, and such as may be implied from those so granted. Although, therefore, one of the declared objects of the Constitution was to secure the blessings of liberty to all under the sovereign jurisdiction and authority of the United States, no power can be exerted to that end by the United States, unless, apart from the preamble, it be found in some express delegation of power, or in some power to be properly implied therefrom."

Headings are occasionally useful to control the meaning of ambiguous expressions [Martins v. Fowler (1926) A.C. 746] but not the marginal notes—for the latter are not regarded as a part of the statute. [See R. vs. Bates and B. Russell (1952), 2 All E.R. 842 at 844]. Punctuation is not decisive of the intention of the Legislature which must be gathered from the words used (1890) 24 Q.B.D. 449.

Then there are what are called external aids; Dictionaries could be referred to for determining the meaning of words not defined in the interpretative clause of the Act. [See Re Ripon Housing Order, (1939), 2 K.B. 838 (C.A.)].

Reports of Parliamentary debates are, as a rule, inadmissible as even the statement of objects and reasons appended to the bill that ultimately became the Act. [Canadian Wheat Board vs. Manitoba (1948), 2 D.L.R. 726, and Administrator-General of Bengal vs. Premalal Malik (1895), I.A. 107]. Reports of Committees, however, stand on a different footing. They can be cited as showing the pre-existing state of law, and how it was sought to be rectified. [See Assam Railways & Trading Co. vs. I. R. C. (1935), A.C. 445].

174. The Judges and the Problem of the Interpretation of the Constitution

The rules of statutory construction that we have so far noticed, apply also to the interpretation of constitutional instruments. That, anyhow, is the legal tradition that we have inherited in this country. This is also the position in India, [See AIR (1950) S.C. 27 Gopalan v. State of Madras.] It will now be for the Supreme Court of Pakistan to give a decisive lead as to the course which the judicial interpretation of our Constitution must take in the future. There are two rival concepts that will contend for mastery in the interpretation of constitutional instrument in our country. These may be called the American theory of progressive interpretation and the British or the Commonwealth theory which insists upon a literal interpretation of constitutional instruments, that is the theory that says that intention of the Legislature is to be gathered from the words used. The rules adopted for the interpretation of Colonial and pre-independence Indian Constitutional Legislation are the same as those accepted for the interpretation of the statutes in England. It is true that there are numerous variations on the theme of constitutional interpretation and the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it is submitted, may be read with profit in an attempt to discover how constitutional instruments like the British North America Act, the Australian Constitution Act, etc. have been construed by that Tribunal.

The line of approach which has characterised the attitude of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in construing statutes was tersely stated by Rowland J. in the case of Emperor v. Benoari Lall Sharma & others, reported in A.I.R. (1943) F.C. p. 36 at page 58, and the following extract from his judgment is instructive:

"In 27 I.A. 209; (1901) 23 All. 152; Raja Bhup Indar Bahadur Singh v. Bijai Bahadur Singh, at page 213 it was said:

"We are not testing the question by general principles but by the expressions of the Code which relate to appeals. Their Lordships turn to the Code to see what it says.

"In 47 I.A. 33; AIR (1920) P.C. 56; 56 I.C. 163; 43 Mad. 550; 47 I.A. 33 (P.C.); Krishna Ayyangar v. Nallaperamal Pillai, at page 42 it was said: The construction of the explanation must depend on its terms and no theory of its purpose can be entertained unless it is to be inferred from the language used.

In 3 M.I.A. 468 (1841-46) : 5 Moo P.C. 276: 1 Sar. 305 (P.C.), The Queen v. Eduljee Byramjee, at p. 488 it was said: 'If such be the undoubted effect of the charter we must give effect to its provisions however injurious we may conceive the consequences to be.'

In 59 I.A. 283 (1932) 19 AIR (1932) (P.C.) 165 Nagendra Nath Dey v. Suresh Chandra Dey, it was said: 'In construing such provision (limitation) equitable considerations are out of place and the strict grammatical meaning of the words is the only safe guide.'

In 55 I.A. 18, 15 AIR (1928) P.C. 2: 107 I.C. 14: 7 Pat. 221 (P.C.) 221, Mt. Ramanandi Kuer v. Mt. Kalawati Kuer, at p. 23 it was said: 'It has often been pointed out by this Board that where there is a positive enactment of the Indian Legislature the proper course is to examine the language of that statute and to ascertain its proper meaning uninfluenced by any consideration derived from the previous state of the law or of the English law on which it may be founded.'

In A.I.R. (1918) P.C., 352, at p. 354 (1917) A.C. 537: 86 L.J. P.C. 151: 117 L.T. 387: 33 T.L.R. 439 (P.C.), Australian Alliance Assurance Co. v. Attorney-General of Queensland, it was said: Their Lordships are not concerned with the policy of the Act nor can they find in the novelty of the provision or in the language of other parts of the Act sufficient ground for disregarding the plain words of the enactment.'

In 18 Pat. 234, at page 248, 26 AIR (1939) P.C. 47: 180 I.C. 1: 40 Cr. L.J. 364: 1941 Rang. L.R. 789n: 18 Pat. 234: 66 I.A. 66: I.L.R. (1939) Kar. P.C. 123 (P.C.), Pakalanarayana Swami v. Emperor, it was said: 'But in truth when the meaning of words is plain, it is not the duty of Courts to busy themselves with supposed intentions.'

"It may safely be said, without citing authority, that ordinarily the Courts construing the language of a statute will assign to it that meaning which consistently with the language used, is favourable to the liberty of the subject. The function of Judges is to give words their natural meaning, not perhaps, in war time, leaning towards liberty but remembering, that in a case in which the liberty of the subject is concerned, we cannot go beyond the natural construction of the statute.

"In 5 I.A. 178: at page 193 [3 C.L.R. 197: 3 Sar. 834: 3 Suther 556: (1878) 3 A.C. 889 (P.C.), The Queen v. Burah], it was said: 'The established Courts of Justice, when a question arises whether the prescribed limits have been exceeded, must of necessity determine that question and the only way in which they can properly do so, is by looking to the terms of the instrument by which, affirmatively, the legislative powers were created, and by which negatively they are restricted. If what has been done is legislation, within the general scope of the affirmative words which give the power, and if it violates no express condition or restriction by which that power is limited (in which category would of course, be included any Act of the Imperial Parliament at variance with it) it is not for any Court of Justice to inquire further, or to enlarge constructively those conditions and restrictions.'

These rules have often been held applicable to the interpretation of written constitutions of the colonies and self-governing dominions of the Commonwealth. [See Tasmania v. Commonwealth & another, (1904) 1 C.L.R. 329; Federated Saw Mill Employees v. James Moore & Sons (1909), 8 C.L.R., 465 per Isaacs J. at pp. 519-520]. It was said as to the interpretation of words in the Constitution Act by Isaacs J., in Australian Steamships Ltd. v. Malcolm (1914), 19 C.L.R. 298 at 328, that "The test of the contents of words ('Navigation' and 'Shipping') is what they ordinarily meant in the systems of law in Australia at the time of Federation."

Constitution must be construed liberally.

For support of the proposition that the ordinary rules of statutory interpretation are applicable to the constitution interpretation, reference has frequently been made to the statement of law in Grey v. Pearson [(1857) H.L.C. 106], to the effect that in construing wills, and, indeed, statutes, as in construing all other written instruments "the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity, or some repugnancy or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified so as to avoid that absurdity and inconsistency, but no farther." (See Interpretation of Constitution by Sir John Latham in Essays on the Australian Constitution). The Constitution must however be construed liberally, for, a narrow and pedantic approach of its provisions will stultify the consummation of the purposes for which Governments are founded.

Reference in this connection should be made to the case of In the matter of Central Provinces and Berar, reported in A.I.R. (1939) Federal Court, p. 1, where the principles, in accordance with which constitutional instruments should be interpreted, have been stated by the then Chief Justice of the Federal Court of India. In this connection the following cases are also instructive.

(1) James v. Commonwealth of Australia (1936), Appeal Cases p. 578 where it was remarked. "It is true that Constitution must not be construed in a narrow and pedantic sense. The words used are necessarily general and their full import and their true meaning can often only be appreciated when considered as the years go on in relation to the vicissitudes of acts which from time to time emerge. It is not that the meaning of the words changes, but the changing circumstances illustrate the full import of that meaning".

(2) Attorney-General for New South Wales v. The Brewery Employees Union, (1908), 6 C. L. R. page 469 gives a general statement of the principles applicable to the interpretation of terms used in the constitution: "The Constitution, it must be remembered, is an instrument of government which from its nature must express its meaning in general terms. It is not only a law in itself, but an authority for making laws, and was intended by means of its broad general terms to adapt itself as far as possible to the changing conditions of trade and commerce, and to the new conceptions of legal rights and obligations which might in the ordinary course of things be expected to be evolved in the development of Australia. On the other hand it must always be remembered, . . . that the Constitution is something more than an instrument of government. It embodies the terms on which the people of the several states agreed for the sake of union to surrender their autonomy in certain respects. Keeping both these aspects of the Constitution in view, the true rule of interpretation would appear to be that there should be given to all legal and technical expressions the widest meaning that is consistent with the terms of the contract of the Union." (p. 533).

(3) British Coal Corporation v. The King, (1935), A.I.R. Privy Council, page 158.

(4) Henrietta Muir Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada (1930), Appeal Cases, page 124, where it was remarked "The provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, enacting Constitution for Canada, should not be given a narrow and technical interpretation, but a large and liberal interpretation, so that the Dominion to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, may be mistress in her own house—as the Provinces to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, are mistresses in theirs."

175. Relevance of American cases on the interpretation of U.S. Constitutions to our System of Jurisprudence.

In the case of D'Emden v. Pedder (1904), 1. C.L.R. 91, the High Court of Australia found it proper to consult and to treat as a "welcome aid", but not as "an infallible guide" the decisions of United States' Supreme Court on the ground that there were certain provisions in that constitution that were indistinguishable from the provisions of Australian Constitution Act. The argument was :

"In interpreting the Commonwealth Constitution, it is reasonable to infer that where the framers of that instrument inserted provisions indistinguishable in substance, though varied in form, from the provisions of other legislative enactments which have received judicial interpretation, they intended that such provisions should receive the like interpretation."

Reference was made to the case of McCulloch v. Maryland (1819), 4 Wheat U.S. 316, and the High Court followed Chief Justice Marshall's judgment on the fundamental relations between the Federal Union and its constituent States in America.

Griffith, C. J., remarked (at p. 112) :

"We are not, of course, bound by the decision of the Supreme Court of United States. But we all think that it would need some courage for any Judge at the present day to decline to accept the interpretation placed upon the United States Constitution by so great a Judge so long ago as 1819, and followed upto the present day by the succession of great jurists who have since adorned the Bench of the Supreme Court at Washington. So far, therefore, as the United States Constitution and the Constitution of the Commonwealth are similar, the construction put upon the former by the Supreme Court of the United States may well be regarded by us in construing the Constitution of the Commonwealth, not as an infallible guide, but as a most welcome aid and assistance."

The Privy Council, however, in the case of Bank of Toronto v. Lambe (1887), 12 A.C. 575, while admitting the relevance of the authority of McCulloch's case, considered all the same that it was impossible to argue from one case to another.

In a later Australian case Amalgamated Society of Engineers vs. the Adelaide Steamship Co. Ltd. (1920), 28 C.L.R. 129, the fundamental difference between the Constitution of the United States and that of Australia was effectively pointed out in the words that follow:

"In the words of a distinguished lawyer and statesman Lord Haldane, when a member of the House of Commons, delivered on the motion for leave to introduce the bill for the Act which we are considering—'The difference between the Constitution which this bill proposes to set up and the Constitution of the United States is enormous and fundamental. This bill is permeated through and through with the spirit of the greatest institution which exists in the Empire, and which pertains to every constitution established within the Empire—I mean the institution of responsible Government a government under which the executive is directly responsible to,—nay, is almost the creature of—the Legislature. This is not so in America, but it is so with all the constitutions we have granted to our self-governing colonies. On this occasion we establish a Constitution modelled on our own model—pregnant with the same spirit, and permeated with the principle of responsible Government. Therefore, what you have here is nothing akin to the Constitution of the United States except in its most superficial features.' With these expressions we entirely agree." (p. 147)

In the case of Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada (1912), A.C. 571, the Judicial Committee in regard to the interpretation of the British North America Act, observed:—

"If the text is explicit, the text is conclusive, alike in what it directs and what it forbids. When the text is ambiguous, as, for example, when the words establishing two mutually exclusive jurisdictions are wide enough to bring a particular power within either, recourse must be had to the context and the scheme of the Act."

Similarly, in the case of Attorney-General for New South Wales v. Brewery Employees' Union: (1908), 6 C.L.R. p., 469, Higgins J. at p. 611-612, remarked:

"Although we are to interpret the words of the Constitution on the same principles of interpretation as we apply to any ordinary law, these very principles of interpretation compel us to take into account the nature and scope of the Act that we are interpreting—to remember that it is a constitution, a mechanism under which laws are to be made, and not a mere Act which declares what the law is to be." Story pointed this out when he said in his Commentaries, 2nd Edn. Sec. 455: 'While, then, we may well resort to the meaning of single words to assist our inquiries, we should never forget, that it is an instrument of Government that we are to construe.'

Case.
In the leading Australian case Amalgamated Society of Engineers v. Adelaide Steamship Co. Ltd. (1920) 28 C.L.R. p. 129, the "settled rules of construction" which the High Court of Australia felt itself bound to apply were stated in the following words (at 148):

"What, then, are the settled rules of construction? The first, and 'golden-rule' or 'universal rule', as it has been variously termed, has been settled in Grey v. Pearson (1857) 6 H.L.C. 61, at p. 106, and the Sussex Peerage Case (1844), 11 Cl. & Fin. 85 at p. 143, in well-known passages which are quoted by Lord Macnaghten in Vacher's case (1913), A.C. at pp. 117-118. Lord Haldane, L.C., in the same case, made some observations very pertinent to the present occasion. His Lordship, after stating that speculation on the motives of the Legislature was a topic which Judges cannot profitably or properly enter upon, said: 'Their province is the very different one of construing the language in which the Legislature has finally expressed its conclusions, and if they undertake the other province which belongs to those who, in making the laws, have to endeavour to interpret the desire of the country, they are in danger of going astray in a labyrinth to the character of which they have no sufficient guide. In endeavouring to place the proper interpretation on the sections of the statute before this House sitting in its judicial capacity, I propose, therefore, to exclude consideration of everything excepting the state of the law as it was when the statute was passed, and the light to be got by reading it as a whole, before attempting to construe any particular section. Subject to this consideration, I think that the only safe course is to read the language of the statute in what seems to be its natural sense.' In the case of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Herbert [(1913) A.C. at p. 332)], Lord Haldane re-affirms the principle, with special reference to legislation of a novel kind. Other cases, of equal authority, could be cited, but it is not necessary.

"With respect to the interpretation of a written Constitution, the Privy Council has in several cases laid down principles which should be observed by Courts of Law, and these principles have been stated in the clearest terms. In R. v. Burah [(1878) 3 A.C. at pp. 904-905], Lord Selborne, in speaking of the case where a question arises as to whether any given legislation exceeds the power granted, says: 'The established Courts of Justice, when a question arises whether the prescribed limits have been exceeded, must of necessity determine that question; and the only way in which they can properly do so, is by looking to the terms of the instrument by which, affirmatively, the legislative powers were created, and by which, negatively, they are restricted. If what has been done is legislation, within the general scope of the affirmative words which give the power, and if it violates no express condition or restriction by which that power is limited (in which category would, of course, be included any Act of the Imperial Parliament at variance with it), it is not for any Court of Justice to inquire further, or to enlarge constructively those conditions and restrictions.' In Attorney General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada, (1912) A.C. 571, at p. 583 Lord Loreburn, L.C., for the Judicial Committee, said: 'In the interpretation of a completely self-governing Constitution founded upon a written organic instrument, such as the British North America Act, if the text is explicit the text is conclusive, alike in what it directs and what it forbids. When the text is ambiguous, as, for example, when the words establishing two mutually exclusive jurisdictions are wide enough to bring a particular power within either, recourse must be had to the context and scheme of the Act.'

"In two decisions the Judicial Committee has applied these principles to the interpretation of this Constitution, namely, Webb v. Outram [(1907) A.C. 81: 4 C.L.R. 356], and the Colonial Sugar Refining Co.'s case [(1914) A.C. 237: 17 C.L.R. 644]. In the first mentioned case, quite independently of any observations as to the meaning of the word 'unconstitutional', it is clear that their Lordships proceeded on the ordinary lines of statutory construction. In the second case the Judicial Committee considered the nature of the instrument itself in order to determine more satisfactorily the depository of residual powers, and having arrived at the conclusion, as to which this Court has never faltered, that the Commonwealth is a government of enumerated or selected legislative powers, their Lordships examined the language of S. 51 to ascertain from its words whether the suggested power could be deduced. The method of arriving at the conclusion is all that is relevant here. We therefore are bound to follow the course of judicial investigation which those two august tribunals of the Empire have marked out as required by law."

176. Progressive Interpretation

Having stated the fundamental view-point from which their Lordships of the Privy Council have often approached the questions concerning the construction of Colonial and Dominion Constitution Acts, we are now in a position to appreciate the somewhat distinguishable attitude which has been adopted by the United States Supreme Court to the problem of interpreting the Articles of the United States Constitution. We would call the American view-point as yielding place to "progressive interpretation"—as opposed to the English "Literal" or "grammatical" interpretation of constitutional instruments.

The rules of construction which the American Courts apply in the determination of constitutional controversies have been lucidly stated in "Corpus Juris Secundum", Vol. XVI, as follows :

"(14) Rules of Construction in General.

A constitution should be construed as fundamental law and should be interpreted in such a manner as to carry out the broad principles of Government stated therein.

A constitution should be construed with reference to, and in the light of, well recognised and fundamental principles lying back of all constitutions. It is to be resorted to as fundamental law to which all other laws must yield, and should be interpreted in such a manner as to carry out the broad general principles of Government stated therein, although the meaning or principles of a constitution remain fixed and unchanged from the time of its adoption, a constitution must be construed as it is intended to stand for a great length of time, and it is progressive and not static. Accordingly, it should not receive too narrow or literal an interpretation, but rather the meaning given it should be applied in such a manner as to meet the new or changed conditions as they arise.

"A Constitution, a provision thereof, should receive reasonable and practical interpretation in accord with common sense. Confusion, ambiguity, or contradiction should be avoided if possible. Of two alternative constructions, that which gives rise to fewer or less complicated questions should be favoured.

(15) Applicability of Rules of Statutory Construction.

"Generally speaking, principles of construction applicable to statutes are also applicable to constitutions, but not to the extent of defeating the purposes for which a constitution is drawn.

"In the main, the general principles governing the construction of statutes apply also to the construction of Constitutions; but, inasmuch as one function of a Constitution is to establish the frame work and general principles of Government, merely technical rules of construction are not to be applied so as to defeat the principles of the Government or the objects of its establishment. Constitutional provisions are presumed to have been more carefully and deliberately framed than is the case with statutes; hence, it is sometimes said that less latitude should be indulged by the courts in their construction.

(16) Intent and purpose.

A Constitution should be construed so as to ascertain and give effect to the intent and purpose of the framers and the people who adopted it.

The fundamental purpose in construing a constitutional provision is to ascertain and to give effect to the intent of the framers and of the people who adopted it. The court, therefore, should constantly keep in mind the objects sought to be accomplished by its adoption, and the evils, if any, sought to be prevented or remedied. Effect should be given to the purpose indicated by a fair interpretation of the language used. The intent may be shown by implication as well as by express provisions.

While it has been said that the construction of a constitutional provision should be neither liberal nor strict, it is quite generally held that in arriving at the intent and purpose the construction should be broad or liberal, rather than technical. However, the construction should not be so liberal as to result in nullifying a plain mandatory provision of the organic law, or as to result in a statute becoming the higher law."

of these
(a) English:

That the Privy Council, would for instance, treat British North America Act, for the purposes of interpretation, as though it were an ordinary statute, would appear to be a proposition which is endorsed by W.P.M. Kennedy in his Constitution of Canada 2nd Ed. 1938, [at p. 550], where he says :

"After a careful examination of every case, in every jurisdiction dealing with the interpretation of the Act, I venture to submit that in not one of them has ratio decidendi depended on reasons external to the Act . . . So generally uniform has been the approach of the Judicial Committee that on the basis of it, I anticipated almost all these judgments except that one on 'unemployment insurance,' before their subject matter were referred to the Supreme Court, and thence to London".

Whether the views of Kennedy are correct or not is another matter, and there are many even in Canada who do not share his views on this score but the fact remains that what he has said about the Privy Council approach as leading to "predictable results" could never be true even about the Supreme Court of the United States of America as it is working today after the famous (or infamous) Court-Revolution that took place in 1937, to say nothing of the fact that the pre-1937 Supreme Court, also called the 'old-Court', had so interpreted the Constitution that due to its judicial activism it was to all intents and purposes becoming, as remarked by a recent writer, "an essentially laissez faire organisation, for American economic and social life." (See p. 170 of Judicial Review in the English Speaking World by Edward McWhinney—1956, Toronto Press).

But the matter is sufficiently important for us in Pakistan to look at it somewhat closely.

We have already referred, in another place, to the views of Professor K. C. Wheare, as to the manner in which the United States Supreme Court has from time to time construed words like 'liberty' etc. so as to include in it varying shades of meaning. (see p. 314) All we can now do is to amplify the point of his remarks by citing some American cases so that the concept of "Progressive interpretation" is thrown into bold relief.

The Supreme Court of United States of America in the case of United States v. Patric B. Classic (1941), 313 U.S. 299; 85 Lawyers' Edition, page 1368, observed at p. 1378 that the fact that with respect to a certain subject-matter, it was difficult to believe that the framers of the constitution were familiar or that they could not have conceivably provided for it, is of very little significance in the determination of the question whether the provision of the Constitution applies thereto. It was observed in the same case that the nature of the Federal Constitution is to be read not as a legislative code subject to continuous revision with the changing course of events but rather as a revelation of the great purposes which were intended to be achieved by it as a continuing instrument of Government. In the words of Mr. Justice Stone:

"We may assume that the framers of the Constitution in adopting that section, did not have specifically in mind the selection and elimination of candidates for Congress by the direct primary any more than they contemplated the application of the commerce clause to interstate telephone, telegraph and wireless communication which are conceded within it. But in determining whether a provision of the Constitution applies to a new subject matter, it is of little significance that it is one with which the framers were not familiar. For in setting up an enduring framework of government they undertook to carry out for the indefinite future and in all the vicissitudes of the changing affairs of men, those fundamental purposes which the instrument itself discloses. Hence we read its words, not as we read legislative codes which are subject to continuous revision with the changing course of events, but as the revelation of the great purposes which were intended to be achieved by the Constitution as a continuing instrument of Government. Cf. Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U.S. 97: 24 L.Ed. 616; Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 595: 40 L.Ed. 819: 16 S.Ct. 644, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 369; Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U.S. 275, 281, 282: 41 L.Ed. 715, 717, 718, 17 S.Ct. 326. If we remember that 'it is a Constitution we are expounding', we cannot rightly prefer, of the possible meanings of its words, that which will defeat rather than effectuate the constitutional purpose."

These remarks of Mr. Justice Stone should be placed side by side with those of Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case, 19 Howard 393 (1857), to be able to appreciate the difference between the two extreme attitudes of one and the same court to the problem of judicial interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution.

"It (the Constitution) speaks not only in the same words, but with the same meaning and intent with which it spoke when it came into the hands of its framers and was voted upon and adopted by the people of the United States. Any other rule of construction would abrogate the judicial character of this court and make it the mere reflex of the popular opinion or passion of the day."

United States Constitution speaks in the same words, yes; but he would be a bold critic indeed, who would say "it speaks with the same meaning and intent with which it spoke when it came into the hands of its framers and was voted upon and adopted by the people of the United States," for you have only to read the record of what, according to the

Judges of the Supreme Court it has been made to say during the course of last 180 years to be able to appreciate the truth of this comment.

So also in the case of Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., (1878), 96 U.S. 1, at p. 9; 24 L. Ed. 708 at p. 710, which involved interpretation of the scope of the power conferred upon the National Government to establish "Post Offices and post road", the same approach was reiterated. When the Electric Telegraph came into use the objection was made that its regulation or control was outside the power conferred by the Constitution on the ground that the framers of the Constitution could not be credited with the provision that such a power would at all be needed. The objection was repelled and the answer made by Waite, C.J. provides the principle of progressive constitutional interpretation. "The powers thus granted are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce, or the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances."

It would be useful, in this context to refer to the Australian case of King v. Brisban ex parte Williams, (1935) 54 C.L.R. 262, which contains a review of some cognate cases decided by the Privy Council like (a) (1932) A.C. 304, in re Regulation & Control of Radio Communication in Canada, and (b) (1912) A.C. 333 City of Montreal v. Montreal Street Railway. In this case the validity of Wireless Telegraphs Act was questioned on the ground that the Australian Constitution provided in Sec. 51 (v) for the Parliament to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Commonwealth with respect to "postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and other like services." It was contended that "Broadcasting" did not fall within the scope of this power. A perusal of the judgment in this case as also that of Attorney-General v. Edison Telephone Co. of London, (1880) 6 Q.B. D. 244; or Postmaster-General v. National Telephone Co., (1909) A.C. 269, would show how careful are the Judges trained in the habit of English Common Law thinking to keep strictly to the analysis of language used by the Legislature and to, what might be called, the dictionary approach —the search for meaning from the words used.

This attitude would be found fully reflected in the observations of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan v. John East Iron Works Limited, AIR (1949) Privy Council, page 129, where it was ruled that the expression "Superior District or Country Courts", occurring in section 96 of the British North America Act of 1867, could not apply to a tribunal invested with jurisdiction of a type and kind which was absolutely foreign to the conception and scope of judicial power currently in vogue at the time of enactment of that Act (at p. 133):

"It is a truism that the conception of the judicial function is inseparably bound up with the idea of a suit between parties, whether between Crown and subject or between subject and subject, and that it is the duty of the Court to decide the issue between those parties, with whom alone it rests to initiate or defend or compromise the proceedings. Here at once a striking departure from the traditional conception of a Court may be seen in the functions of the appellant Board. For, as the Act contemplates and the Rules made under it prescribe, any trade union, any employer, any employers' association or any other person directly concerned may apply to the Board for an order to be made :

- (a) requiring any person to refrain from a violation of the Act or from engaging in an unfair labour practice,
- (b) requiring an employer to re-instate an employee discharged contrary to the provisions of the Act and to pay such employee the monetary loss suffered by reason of such discharge,

- (c) requiring an employer to dis-establish a company dominated organisation, or
- (d) requiring two or more of the said things to be done.

"Other rules provide for the discharge by the Board of other functions. It is sufficient to refer only to (b) supra, which clearly illustrates that, while the order relates solely to the relief to be given to an individual, yet the controversy may be raised by others without his assent and, it may be, against his will, for the solution of some far-reaching industrial conflict. It may be possible to describe an issue thus raised as a 'lis,' and to regard its determination as the exercise of judicial power. But it appears to their Lordships that such an issue is indeed remote from those which at the time of confederation occupied the superior or district or country courts of Upper Canada.

"In the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan the learned Chief Justice (in whose opinion the other Judges concurred) accepted the view that the Board exercised a judicial power analogous to that of the Courts named on the ground that such Courts always had jurisdiction in connection with the enforcement of contracts of hiring and awarding damages for the breaches thereof. But, as their Lordships think, this view ignores the wider aspects of the matter. The jurisdiction of the Board under S.5 (e) is not invoked by the employee for the enforcement of his contractual rights: those, whatever they may be, he can assert elsewhere. But his reinstatement, which the terms of his contract of employment might not by themselves justify, is the means by which labour practices regarded as unfair are frustrated and the policy or collective bargaining as a road to industrial peace is secured. It is in the light of this new conception of industrial relations that the question to be determined by the Board must be viewed, and even if the issue so raised can be regarded as a justiciable one, it finds no analogy in those issues which were familiar to the Courts of 1867".

177. Arguments based upon "Spirit of the Constitution" and the doctrine of "Political Necessity" etc.

There is often to be met with an argument, based on what is alleged to be the spirit of Constitution, in support of a particular interpretation of its constitutional provisions. All arguments that have reference to this spirit of Constitution, should be viewed with suspicion if for no other reason than at least this that this spirit is incapable of being objectively defined, with the result that the entire course of interpretation of the constitutional instrument will be governed more by the whims and caprices of a judge than by appeal to those criteria and principles which are capable of being precisely formulated. In the words of Kania C. J., uttered in the case of Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) Supreme Court page 27 at p. 42:

"The Courts are not at liberty to declare an Act void because in their opinion it is opposed to a spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution but not expressed in words."

Both the Indian and Pakistan Constitutions are ponderous documents that run into meticulous details and are rather to be regarded as comprehensive codes than merely as sketches or outlines of constitutional principles which is really what can be claimed for the United States' Constitution. In "The Government of the United States" by Munro, it has been stated about the U.S. Constitution:

"The architects of 1787 built only the basement. Their descendants have kept adding walls and windows, wings and gables, pillars and porches to make a rambling structure which is not yet finished. Or, to change the metaphor, it has a fabric which, to use the words of James Russell Lowell, is still being 'woven on the roaring loom of time.' That is what the framers of the Constitution intended it to be. Never was it in their mind to work out a final scheme for the government of the country and stereotype it for all time. They sought merely to provide a starting point."

To this might be added the additional consideration that the amending procedure in the United States' Constitution is, comparatively speaking, difficult of achievement and this in turn has brought about a radically different judicial outlook to prevail in the matter of interpretation of its provisions—so that, what cannot be done by a formal amendment, may nevertheless be achieved by a judicial interpretation of its provisions. It is obvious, for these reasons, that our Courts cannot go as far as United States Supreme Court has been in the matter of bestowing upon the provisions of the Constitution an extra-ordinarily wide, large and elastic interpretation.

But even in the United States as far back as 1819 no less a Judge than Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Sturges v. Crown in Shield, 4 L.Ed. p. 529 at 550, with regard to the argument based on the "Spirit of Constitution" observed:—

"Although the spirit of an instrument, especially of a Constitution, is to be respected not less than its letter, yet the spirit is to be collected chiefly from its words. It would be dangerous in the extreme to infer from extrinsic circumstances, that a case for which the words of an instrument expressly provide, shall be exempted from its operation. Where words conflict with each other, where the different clauses of an instrument bear upon each other, and would be inconsistent unless the natural and common import of words be varied, construction becomes necessary, and a departure from the obvious meaning of words is justifiable. But if, in any case, the plain meaning of a provision, not contradicted by any other provision in the same instrument, is to be disregarded, because we believe the framers of that instrument could not intend what they say, it must be one in which the absurdity and injustice of applying the provision to the case would be so monstrous that all mankind would, without hesitation, unite in rejecting the application."

Willoughby quoted.

Similarly, Willoughby in his Constitution on the United States, after referring to several decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court where the Judges had invoked in aid of the construction of the Constitution of America the "spirit" of the Constitution, decisions, like Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall 655); Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley (164 U.S. 112); Downes v. Bidwell (182 U.S. 244), and Dorr v. United States (195 U.S. 138), stated his opinion upon the problem as follows:

"It is the opinion of the author that the statements which have been quoted would have an unfortunate effect if generally accepted and applied as rules of construction or interpretation for determining the powers granted to, or the limitations imposed upon, Congress or to or upon the States by the Constitution,—an unfortunate effect because it would render indeterminate what those powers or limitations are. The line of distinction between conclusions which may be validly drawn from the general purpose of the Constitution and of the nature of the Union or Government intended to be provided for by that instrument and the conclusions which may not, with constitutional propriety, be drawn from the 'spirit' of the Constitution, may not always be easy to draw, but the distinction itself is a clear and logical one. The resort to the general nature and purpose of the Constitution in order to determine doubts not otherwise resolvable is a legitimate practice, sustainable by general principles governing the construction of written instruments; but the resort to the 'spirit' of the Constitution, in order either to sustain an exercise of governmental power or to impose a limitation upon it which is not provided for by the instrument itself, is not a valid practice, since it stands in essential opposition to the other rules which the Court has declared Fundamental for determining the power granted to or limitations imposed upon the Federal Government by the Constitution." (Vol. I, p. 71, 1929 Ed.).

Nor again can the doctrine of political necessity be invoked for the purpose of inferring the existence of power which on the plain construction of the language of the instrument sought to be interpreted does not appear to have been affirmed by the framers of the Constitution.

"Not only", says the High Court of Australia, in Amalgamated Society of Engineers v. Adelaide Steamship Co. Ltd., (1920), 28 C.L.R. 129 at 151, "is the judicial branch of the Government inappropriate to determine political necessities, but experience, both in Australia and America, evidenced by discordant decisions, has proved both the elusiveness and the inaccuracy of the doctrine as a legal standard. Its inaccuracy is perhaps the more thoroughly perceived when it is considered what the doctrine of 'necessity' in a political sense means. It means the necessity of protection against the aggression of some outside and possibly hostile body. It is based on distrust, lest powers, if once conceded to the least degree, might be abused to the point of destruction. But possible abuse of powers is no reason in British law for limiting the natural force of the language creating them. It may be taken into account by the parties when creating the powers, and they, by omission of suggested powers or by safeguards introduced by them into the compact, may delimit the powers created. But, once the parties have by the terms they employ defined the permitted limits, no Court has any right to narrow those limits by reason of any fear that the powers as actually circumscribed by the language naturally understood may be abused. This has been pointed out by the Privy Council on several occasions, including the case of the Bank of Toronto v. Lambe 12 App. Cas., 575 at pp. 586-587. The ordinary meaning of the terms employed in one place may be restricted by terms used elsewhere: that is pure legal construction. But, once their true meaning is so ascertained, they cannot be further limited by the fear of abuse. The non-granting of powers, the expressed qualifications of powers granted, the expressed retention of powers, are all to be taken into account by a Court. But the extravagant use of the granted powers in the actual working of the Constitution is a matter to be guarded against by the constituencies and not by the Courts. When the people of Australia, to use the words of the Constitution itself, 'united in a Federal Commonwealth,' they took power to control by ordinary constitutional means any attempt on the part of the national Parliament to misuse its powers. If it be conceivable that the representatives of the people of Australia as a whole would ever proceed to use their national powers to injure the people of Australia considered sectionally, it is certainly within the power of the people themselves to resent and reverse what may be done. No protection of this Court in such a case is necessary or proper. Therefore, the doctrine of political necessity, as means of interpretation, is indefensible on any ground. The one clear line of judicial inquiry as to the meaning of the Constitution must be to read it naturally in the light of the circumstances in which it was made, with knowledge of the combined fabric of the common law, and the statute law which preceded it, and then lucet ipsa per se." (1920) 28 C.L.R. 129 at 151, Engineers' case).

Similarly, it is inexcusable in a judge that he should sit in judgment over the wisdom of the enacted law, and, not finding it wise enough or palatable enough, so to construe it as to make it appear not what it is but as, in his view, it ought to be. In other words, there is no such thing as an excusable attempt at judicial usurpation. In the words of Chief Justice Stone:

"While unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of Government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint".

About this desire to subject judicial mind to the rule of "self-restraint" not much need be said since it is inherent in the concept of ultimate judicial power being the final judge of its own jurisdiction: it is the neglect of this self-imposed limitation on the exercise of the will instead of the judgment by the judges that provoked the protest of Justice Holmes:

"There is a tendency", wrote Justice Holmes to Harold Laski, in one of his letters, "to think of judges as if they were independent mouth-pieces of the infinity and not simply directors of a force that comes from the source that gives them their authority. I think our Court has fallen into the error at times, and it is that thought I have aimed at when I have said that the common law is not a brooding omnipresence in the sky and the U.S. is not subject to some mystic over-law that it is bound to obey."

The judicial function, in so far as it has reference to the power of interpreting the Constitution, is not necessarily superior to the similar function which is exercised by the executive or the legislative organs of the State when they proceed to exercise the power and perform the duties imposed upon them by the Constitution. Every agent must endeavour to interpret and apply the mandate of the principal, and the judiciary, like any other agent established by the Constitution, is charged with a duty of finally interpreting and applying the mandates of the Constitution. The argument in support of this view has been so succinctly stated by Hamilton in "The Federalist" (No. LXXVIII) that the present author can do no better than reproduce it:

"There is no position which depends on clearer principles, than that every act of a delegated authority, contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised, is void. No legislative act, therefore, contrary to the Constitution, can be valid. To deny this, would be to affirm, that the deputy is greater than his principal; that the servant is above his master; that the Representatives of the People are superior to the People themselves; that men acting by virtue of powers, may do not only what their powers do not authorize, but what they forbid.

"If it be said that the legislative body are themselves the constitutional judges of their own powers, and that the construction they put upon them is conclusive upon the other departments, it may be answered, that this cannot be the natural presumption, where it is not to be collected from any particular provisions in the Constitution. It is not otherwise to be supposed, that the Constitution could intend to enable the Representatives of the People to substitute their will to that of their constituents. It is far more rational to suppose, that the Courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the People and the Legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the Courts. A Constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the Judges, as a fundamental law. It therefore belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular Act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be an irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the People to the intention of their agents.

"Nor does this conclusion by any means suppose a superiority of the Judicial to the Legislative power. It only supposes that the power of the People is superior to both; and that where the will of the Legislature, declared in its statutes, stands in opposition to that of the People, declared in the Constitution, the Judges ought to be governed by the latter rather than the former. They ought to regulate their decisions by the fundamental laws, rather than by those which are not fundamental."

The sanctity that attaches to the pronouncements of the Court of ultimate jurisdiction stems not from the belief that it is infallible but is based upon the view that somewhere there must be a finality in the matter of interpretation of the Constitution. And the supremacy of the judiciary's interpretative functions comes, not from any presumed moral excellence or intellectual alertness on the part of the judges of a country but from the assumption that they have the final say in the matter of constitutional interpretation. It is the consciousness of this burdensome responsibility of delivering the last word as to the meaning of the words in the Constitution that ought to exert the greatest measure of self-restraint upon the judiciary of a country having a written Constitution and charged with the duty of interpreting the fundamental law.

178. The dominant purpose that ought to underlie the judicial approach to Constitutional interpretation.

In the interpretation of the Constitution the judges ought to be animated by a desire to give effect to its provisions on the assumption that they embody the working principles for practical Government. It is for this reason that in the case of James v. Commonwealth of Australia, (1936) Appeal Cases, page 578, Lord Wright observed:

"It is true that a Constitution must not be construed in any narrow and pedantic sense. The words used are necessarily general and their full import and true meaning can often only be appreciated when considered, as years go on, in relation to the vicissitudes of acts which from time to time emerge. It is not that the meaning of the words changes, but the changing circumstances illustrate and illuminate the full import of that meaning . . . The true test must as always be the actual language used."

In the field of constitutional law in regard to the matters affecting the judicial interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution, observations of Lord Sankey in the case of British Coal Corporation v. The King (1935) A.C. page 500, are instructive: he remarks:

"In interpreting a constituent or organic statute . . . that construction most beneficial to the widest possible amplitude of its powers must be adopted."

And the same approach characterises the outlook of Lord Jowitt L.C., in Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General of Canada, (1947) Appeal Cases, page 107, at 153, who would like to consider the effect even of the political conceptions embodied in a constitution and the circumstances in which it was enacted.

"Giving full weight to the circumstances of the Union and to the determination shown by the provinces as late as the imperial conferences, which led to the Statute of Westminster, that their rights should be unimpaired, nevertheless, it appears to their Lordships that it is not consistent with the political conception which is embodied in the British Commonwealth of Nations that one member of that Commonwealth should be precluded from setting up, if it so desires, a supreme court of appeal having a jurisdiction both ultimate and exclusive of any other member. The regulation of appeals is, to use the words of Lord Sankey in British Coal Corporation case, a 'prime element in Canadian sovereignty', which would be impaired if, at the will of its citizens, recourse could be had to a tribunal, in the constitution of which it had no voice. It is, as their Lordships think, irrelevant that the question is one that might have seemed unreal at the date of the British North America Act. To such an organic statute the flexible interpretation must be given which changing circumstances require, and it would be alien to the spirit, with which the preamble to the Statute of Westminster is instinct, to concede anything less than the widest amplitude of power to the Dominion legislature under section 101 of the British North America Act."

179. Limits on Judicial Power in relation to the judicial enforcement of our Constitution.

Our courts are enjoined to interpret and apply the Constitution and the law in the determination of the controversies of which they take cognizance, having been moved to do so by means of appropriate proceedings. If we omit from our consideration the provisions of ARTs. 22 and 170 of the Constitution, which relate to the enforcement of fundamental rights etc., there would be found no other specific provision that expressly charges the court with the duty or commits to it the power of enforcing the Constitution. But, nevertheless, it seems to be the underlying assumption of the entire Constitution that Courts are to act as the custodians and guardians of its mandates. This assumption can validly be made since interspersed throughout our Constitution are to be found express provisions prohibiting courts from taking cognizance of certain matters. There would be no need to incorporate these express prohibitions in the Constitution unless it were assumed that in their absence the Courts would inquire into and enforce breaches of constitutional provisions. These provisions, that may be characterised as provisions governing the constitutional ouster of the jurisdictions of courts, are the following:—

- (a) ART. 23 (2) The State shall be guided in the formulation of its policies by the provisions of this Part, but such provisions shall not be enforceable in any court.
- (b) ART. 32 (3) The validity of the election of the President shall not be questioned in any court.
- (c) ART. 37 (2) The question whether any, and if so, what, advice has been tendered by the Cabinet, or a Minister or Minister of State, shall not be inquired into in any court. (See ART. 71(2) for the Provincial Ministers).
- (d) ART. 56 (1) The validity of any proceedings in the National Assembly shall not be questioned in any court. (See ART. 89 for the Provincial Assembly).
- (e) ART. 58 (3) Every Money Bill, when it is presented to the President for his assent, shall bear a certificate under the hand of the Speaker that it is a Money Bill, and such certificate shall be conclusive for all purposes and shall not be questioned in any court. (See ART. 91(3) for the Provincial Money Bill).
- (f) ART. 142 (5) The validity of anything done by or under the authority of the Delimitation Commission shall not be called in question in any court.
- (g) ART. 146 No election to the National Assembly, or a Provincial Assembly shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to such authority and in such manner as may be provided by Act of Parliament.
- (h) ART. 195 (2) The validity of any Proclamation issued or Order made under this Part, i.e. Part XI, shall not be questioned in any court.
- (i) ART. 216 (2) Validity of a certificate granted by the Speaker of the National Assembly that a bill for the amendment of the Constitution has been passed in accordance with the provisions of ART. 216(1) is conclusive and cannot be questioned in any Court.
- (j) ART. 222 (5) The validity of the election of President elected under this Article shall not be questioned in any court.

One conceivable argument against this mode of regarding the effect of the provisions relating to the constitutional ouster of the jurisdiction of courts is to view them as having been enacted by the framers of the Constitution ex majeure abundante cautela. The matter is not free from difficulty and awaits the authoritative opinion of our Superior Courts. This argument, however, can have no place in the matter of interpreting a written constitution which has an express provision made in it to the effect that the Constitution is the Supreme Law of the land and is binding on all the organs and authorities set up thereunder. Neither in the Indian nor in our Constitution, however, is there any such express provision as to the supremacy of the Constitution made by the framers of the Constitution.

In the U.S. Constitution there is no provision which could be construed as authorising the Supreme Court of that country to enforce it judicially. "There is a story told", says Lord Bryce, "of an intelligent Englishman, who having heard that the Supreme Federal Court was created to protect the Constitution, and had authority given it to annul bad laws, spent two days hunting up and down the Federal Constitution for the provisions he had been told to admire. No wonder he did not find them for there is not a word in the Constitution on the subject." (See Bryce's American Commonwealth (1917 Ed) Vol. I p. 252), This authority of the American Courts has been assumed by them and is a usurpation and Harold J. Laski is of the opinion that the Supreme Court, by exercising this power of review, is, in fact, a third Chamber in the United States. (See his American Democracy (1948) p. 111). Little wonder that Lambart, a French Jurist, felt that the power of judicial review exercised by the Supreme Court virtually amounts to establishing a government by the Judges.

But the power to decide the constitutionality of Laws or administrative acts is of the essence of judicial power, at least in countries that by means of a written Constitution create non-sovereign law-making and law-executing bodies. The power of interpreting the laws involves necessarily the function to ascertain whether they are conformable to the mandates of the Constitution and if it be found that they are not, the power to declare them void and inoperative. As the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, in a conflict between that law and the laws either of the Congress or of the States, it becomes the duty of the judiciary to follow that only which is of paramount obligation. This results from the very theory of republican Constitution of Government; for, otherwise, the acts of legislature and executive would, in effect, become supreme and uncontrollable, notwithstanding any express prohibitions or limitations contained in the Constitution and "the usurpations of the most unequivocal and dangerous character might be assumed, without any remedy within the reach of a citizen." In the total absence of power to enforce judicially the constitutional mandates and limitations imposed by it upon the Legislature and the executive organs set-up by it, the Constitution would become a mere statement of pious platitudes and mere maxims of political morality which could be violated with impunity without any let or hindrance. Such a paper Constitution is not even worth the paper upon which it is written.

180. Our Supreme Court and the Constitution

The ultimate court of appeal then under our Constitution is the Supreme Court of our country. And then to the question: "What if the Judges violate the Constitution?" the only answer that could be made is that somewhere there must be finality as to the adjudication of constitutional disputes and there is no better organ than the Supreme Court to whose determinations that finality should be ascribed. The Judges are bound by their Oath of Office to "preserve, protect and defend the Constitution and laws of Pakistan." "In a representative, democratic system such as ours", writes Vinderbitt, "the power of judiciary depends very largely on its reputation for independence, integrity and wisdom."

In this context it is appropriate that the views of, to use the words of Sir Raymond Evershed "that most cultured and erudite American Judge", who is, at least in the opinion of the present writer, one of the greatest Judges of all times, Learned Hand of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, on matters affecting the sanctity, dignity, authority and the responsibility of the Supreme Court, that is, the highest tribunal of the land that renders judgments of ultimate authority, should be referred, if only because they so aptly describe the role which such a Court plays in the matter of interpreting and applying the provisions of a written constitution to the settlement of disputes concerning power-relations within the State.

"A constitution", says Learned Hand, "is primarily an instrument to distribute political power; and so far as it is, it is hard to escape the necessity of some tribunal with authority to declare when the prescribed distribution has been disturbed. Otherwise those who hold the purse will be likely in the end to dominate and absorb everything else, except as astute executives may from time to time check them by capturing and holding popular favor I do not mean that courts should approach such constitutional questions as they approach statutes, and they have never done so when they knew their business; constitutions can only map out the terrain roughly, inevitably leaving much to be filled in. The scope of the interstate commerce power of Congress is an ever present instance. It is impossible to avoid all such occasions, but it was a daring expedient to meet them with judges, deliberately put beyond the reach of popular pressure. And yet, granted the necessity of some authority, probably independent judges were the most likely to do the job well"

Having shown that it is to independent judiciary that the high, the august and the responsible task of interpreting the constitution must necessarily be assigned if the constitution is at all to work, Learned Hand turns to the distinctive feature of the American constitution that provides for "not only the distribution of powers of government" but also an enunciation of those general principles that are designed to ensure the just exercise of those powers, that is clauses like due process of law etc., (principles analogous to those mentioned by our Constitution in ARTs. 8, 9, 10, 11, & 12, as reflected in the constitutional limitations envisaged by the expression 'subject to reasonable restrictions imposed by law'), and thereafter proceeds to observe (in words which in their sheer force and effect of sublimity and grandeur are unrivalled in the whole range of forensic literature of the civilized world) the pitfalls and dangers that beset the way of those who are charged with the duty of applying and enforcing these principles.

"This is the contribution to political science of which we are proud, and especially of a judiciary of Vestal unapproachability which shall always tend the Sacred Flame of Justice. Yet here we are on less firm ground. It is true that the logic which has treated these like other provisions of a constitution seems on its face unanswerable. Are they not parts in the same document? Did they not originally have a meaning? Why should not that meaning be found in the same way as that of the rest of the instrument? Nevertheless there are vital differences. Here history is only a feeble light, for these rubrics were meant to answer future problems unimagined and unimaginable. Nothing which by the utmost liberty can be called interpretation describes the process by which they must be applied. Indeed if law be a command for specific conduct, they are not law at all; they are cautionary warnings against the intemperance of faction and the approaches of despotism. The answers to the questions which they raise demand the appraisal and balancing of human values which there are no scales to weigh. Who can say whether the contributions of one group may not justify allowing it a preference? How far should the capable, the shrewd or the strong be allowed to exploit their powers? When does utterance go beyond persuasion and become only incitement? How far are children wards of the state so as to justify its intervention in their nurture? What limits should be imposed upon the right to inherit? Where does religious freedom end and moral obliquity begin? As to such questions one can sometimes say what effect a proposal will have in fact, just as one can foretell how much money a tax will raise and who will pay it. But when that is done, one has come only to the kernel of the matter, which is the choice between what will be gained and what will be lost. The difficulty here does not come from ignorance, but from the absence of any standard, for values are incommensurable. It is true that theoretically, and sometimes practically, cases can arise where courts might properly intervene, not indeed because the Legislature has appraised the values wrongly, for it is hard to see how that can be if it has honestly tried to appraise them at all; but because that is exactly what it has failed to do, because its action has been nothing but the patent exploitation of one group whose interests it has altogether disregarded. But the dangers are always very great. What seems to the loser mere spoliation usually appears to the gainers less than a reasonable relief from manifest injustice. Moreover, even were there a hedonistic rod by which to measure loss or gain, how could we know that the judges had it; or—what is more important—would enough people think they had, to be satisfied that they should use it? So long as law remains a profession (and certainly there is no indication that its complexities are decreasing) judges must be drawn from a professional class with the special interests and the special hierarchy of values which that implies. And even if they were as detached as Rhadamanthus himself, it would not serve unless people believed that they were. But to believe that another is truly a Daniel come to judgment demands almost the detachment of a Daniel; and whatever may be properly said for judges, among them there are indeed those as detached as it is given men to be, nobody will assert that detachment is a disposition widespread in any society.

"It is not true, as you may be disposed at first blush to reply, that all this can be said with equal force of any other decision of a court. Constitutions are deliberately made difficult of amendment; mistaken readings of them cannot be readily corrected. Moreover, if they could be, constitutions must not degenerate into vade mecum or codes; when they begin to do so, it is a sign of a community unsure of itself and seeking protection against its own misgivings. And that is especially true of such parts of a constitution as I am talking about; these particularly must be left imprecise. If a court be really candid, it can only say: 'We find that this measure will have this result; it will injure this group in such and such ways, and benefit that group in these other ways. We declare it invalid, because after every conceivable allowance for differences of outlook, we cannot see how a fair person can honestly believe that the benefits balance the losses.'

"Practically it is very seldom possible to be sure of such a conclusion; practically, it is very seldom possible to say that a legislature has abdicated by surrendering to one faction; the relevant factors are too many and too incomparable.

"Nor need it surprise us that these stately admonitions refuse to subject themselves to analysis. They are the precipitates of 'old forgotten far off things and battles long ago,' originally cast as universals to enlarge the scope of the victory, to give it authority, to re-assure the very victors themselves that they have been champions in something more momentous than a passing struggle. Thrown large upon the screen of the future as eternal verities, they are emptied of the vital occasions which gave them birth, and become moral adjurations, the more imperious because inscrutable, but with only that content which each generation must pour into them anew in the light of its own experience. If an independent judiciary seeks to fill them from its own bosom, in the end it will cease to be independent. And its independence will be lost, for that bosom is not ample enough for the hopes and fears of all sorts and conditions of men, nor will its answers be theirs; it must be content to stand aside from these fateful battles. There are two ways in which the judges may forfeit their independence, if they do not abstain. If they are intransigent but honest, they will be curbed; but a worse fate will befall them, if they learn to trim their sails to the prevailing winds. A society whose judges have taught it to expect complaisance will exact complaisance; and complaisance under the pretence of interpretation is rottenness. If judges are to kill this thing they love, let them do it, not like cowards with a kiss, but, like brave men with a sword.'

The power of judiciary, therefore, no matter how very great its sweep may, in theory, be, is primarily intended to operate, under a form of government established by a written constitution as a curb on the arbitrary exercise of political power. It is in this sense that Justice Frankfurter looked at the significance of the Doctrine of Judicial Review in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, (1940) 310 U.S. 586: (1940) 84 Law Ed. 1375-1382.

"Judicial review", said he, "itself a limitation on popular government, is a fundamental part of our constitutional scheme. But to the Legislature no less than to courts is committed the guardianship of the deeply cherished liberties."

Not only to courts and Legislature, but also to the Executive, is committed the guardianship of, not only "our deeply cherished liberties, our constitutional rights" but something more—to them is entrusted a faithful, honest and earnest duty of being the guardians of the whole of our Constitution. It is for this reason that the Courts should be slow to sit in judgment over the acts of coordinate departments of Government—Legislature and Executive—and it is only in the clearest of cases involving breach of that duty which devolves on them as guardians of the Constitution that their acts, or rather their transgressions should be visited with judicial disapprobation. What our Constitution wants of our judges is not merely legal learning, not merely their adopting a positivistic, unrealistic and insular approach to administration of law: it requires of them judicial statesmanship, which consists in their taking a broader view of the judicial function than has been done by them in the past. Judges have to assume not merely the role of being the discoverers of the rules that they must apply to the decision of cases, they have also be accept the policy-making role of the Judges, that is the kind of role that Learned Hand finds it difficult for, if not beyond, them to fulfil. The power of judicial review has to be regulated by a sure instinct of judicial self-restraint. Even in America where there has been a swing away from the role which the Judges of the 'pre-1937 Court-Revolution' used to play, there are indications that the 'New Court' would ply the sword of judicial review freely in order to ensure the minimum requirements of "due process of political change"—that is, whenever that court notices that the legislature imposes restrictions on the ordinary political processes, it would not approach the case from the premises of the presumption of the constitutionality of the impugned legislation. The more so in our country, where the electorate is by far the more illiterate and the politician by far the less responsive to democratic forces, there is the need for the courts to exercise liberally their power of interference in order that the minimum requirements of the democratic processes are maintained by the executive and the legislature. [See further (1956) 65 Yal. L. Review Journal 597, Alphens Mason's article on "The Era of Free-Government, 1938-40: Mr. Justice Stone and the preferred Freedoms"].

181. Effect of Court's declaration of a law as "unconstitutional"

When our courts declare a statute as being unconstitutional the effect of the declaration is no more and no less than this that such a statute is devoid of any force as law, it is as though it has never been passed. An unconstitutional Act confers no rights, can impose no obligations, nor can any one be exposed to any liability under its provisions. No rights or obligations can accrue under an unconstitutional law.

The courts will not lightly declare administrative acts and laws passed by the Legislature as being unconstitutional. When a court is called upon to determine the constitutionality of an act by the Executive or the Legislature, there is, to begin with, a presumption of constitutionality in favour of the impugned act, and the room for caution is greater where the court is invited to interfere with acts of a co-ordinate department like the Executive and the Legislature.

What should be the attitude of a Judge who is called upon to strike down an Act of the 'Legislature' as 'Unconstitutional' was stated by Isaacs J. of the High Court of Australia, (See Federal Commissioner of Taxation v. Munro, (1926) 38 C.L.R. p. 153, at p. 180), in words that have become immortal. Said the learned Judge :

"It is always a serious and responsible duty to declare invalid, regardless of consequences, what the national Parliament, representing the whole people of Australia, has considered necessary or desirable for the public welfare. The Court charged with the guardianship of the Fundamental Law of the Constitution may find that duty inescapable. Approaching the challenged Legislation with a mind judicially clear of any doubt as to its propriety or expediency—as we must, in order that we may not ourselves transgress the constitution or obscure the issue before us—the question is: Has Parliament, on the true construction of the enactment, misunderstood and gone beyond its constitutional powers? It is a received canon of judicial construction to apply in cases of this kind with more than ordinary anxiety the maxim ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Nullification of enactments and confusion of public business are not lightly to be introduced. Unless, therefore, it becomes clear beyond reasonable doubt that the legislation in question transgresses the limits laid down by the organic law of the constitution, it must be allowed to stand as the true expression of the National Will. Construction of an enactment is ascertaining the intention of the legislature from the words it has used in the circumstances, on the occasion and in the collocation it has used them. There is always an initial presumption that Parliament did not intend to pass beyond constitutional bounds. If the language of a statute is not so intractable as to be incapable of being consistent with this presumption, the presumption should prevail. That is the principle upon which the Privy Council acted in Macleod v. Attorney-General for New South Wales, (1891) A.C. 455. It is the principle which the Supreme Court of the United States has applied, in an unbroken line of decision from Marshall C. J. to the present day. (See Adkins v. Children's Hospital, (1923), 261 U.S. 525 at 544.) It is the rule of this Court. (See, for instance, per Griffith, C.J. in Osborne v. Commonwealth, (1911), 12 C.L.R. at p. 337)".

James Bradley in his "Origin and Scope of the American Doctrine of Constitutional Law (1893)", 7 Harvard Law Review page 129, emphasised that in such cases the judicial function is "merely that of fixing the outside border of reasonable legislative action". Similarly, Thayer, differentiated the judicial function in constitutional interpretation from that which is relevant in the construction of other documents by pointing out that:

"When a Court is interpreting a writing merely in order to ascertain or apply its true meaning then indeed there is but one meaning allowable, namely, what the court adjudges to be its true meaning. But when the ultimate question is not that, but whether certain acts of other department, officer or individual are legal or permissible, then this is not true. In the class of cases which we have in consideration, the ultimate question is not what is the true meaning of the Constitution, but whether legislation is sustainable or not."

In America it has been held, for instance, that a statutory discrimination will not be set aside as the denial of equal protection of laws if the state of facts reasonably may be conceived justifying it. (See Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Co. v. Brownell, (1935) 294 U.S. 580; Rast v. Van Deman, and Lewis Co. (1916) 240 U.S. 342; O'Gorman & Young v. Hartford Fire Insurance Co. (1931) 282 U.S. 251; Williams v. Mayor of Baltimore (1933) 289 U.S. 36). Similarly, Mr. Justice Douglas in his dissenting opinion in Southern Pacific Co. v. State of Arizona (1945) 325 U.S. 761, observed (at p. 796):—

"Whether the question arises under the Commercial clause or the 14th Amendment, I think the legislation is entitled to a presumption of validity. . . . I am not persuaded that the evidence adduced by the railroads overcomes the presumption of validity to which this train limit law is entitled."

In view of the fact that grave consequences must ensue upon a declaration by the Court that the impugned law is unconstitutional, the court would not ordinarily deal with a constitutional objection if it can dispose of the controversy in the case on any other ground. (See Chicago & Grand Trunk Railway Co. v. Wellman, (1892) 143 U.S. 339.)

The theory upon which declaration as to the unconstitutionality of the impugned Acts and laws can be justified is, that in a system of written constitution, the several organs set up or established under its mandate, represent the mere agencies through which the principal, that is the Constituent Sovereign, the will of the people as manifested in the constitutional document, must act.

"Thus, when it is held that the enactments of the legislatures of the member States of the Union are of no legal force and effect, if not warranted by the provisions of the United States Constitution, there is applied a principle that is recognised and applied in the private as well as the public law of all constitutionally administered states, namely, that, to be valid, an agent must act within the authority granted him by his principal. Hence, when a law of a State of the American Union, whether embodied in an enactment of its legislature, or in the articles of its written constitution, is held void because not warranted by the United States Constitution, the rule applied is exactly similar to that which controls the courts of other countries when they have to deal with the acts of colonial or administrative bodies which have only those legislative or other ordinance-making powers which the sovereign authority has granted to them." (See Willoughby's Constitution of the United States, Vol. I, p. 2, 1929 Edition.)

Party aggrieved alone is entitled to challenge the constitutionality of law.

Only he is entitled to challenge the constitutionality of an Act or law, who is genuinely aggrieved by such an Act or law, that is one whose substantial rights have been interfered with. The court will always be watchful and on its guard not to be involved in settling spurious and collusive controversies and would refuse the exercise of its judicial power in cases where it may appear to it that an artificial controversy has been brought up by parties before it. And this reluctance on the part of our courts is due to the consideration that in matters that arise out of pre-arranged or fabricated cases, there will be no real contest, but that a view favourable to the party responsible for the artificially contrived litigation will have been ultimately procured on the basis of one-sided presentation of the case. (See the case of Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Co. v. Wellman 143 U.S. 339, as also Fairchild v. Hughes, (1922) 258 U.S. page 126.)

This is also the view of the Indian Supreme Court. (See remarks in Charanjit Lal's case, (1951) S.C. p. 41).

Conclusion

A study of the constitutional decisions rendered by the United States Supreme Court, as also those of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the Supreme Court of Canada and the High Court of Australia shows that they constantly keep two guiding principles before them while setting out to determine constitutional questions. They express a preference for avoiding a decision on constitutional grounds if the case can be otherwise disposed of. They purport to refrain from entering into any extended discussion of constitutional doctrine save as this may be necessary for deciding the case at hand. (See Canadian Constitutional Law by Laskin, p. 70, and the cases referred to therein. In particular see the cases of A. G. Manitoba v. Manitoba Licence-holders Association (1902), A.C. 73, where Privy Council observed with respect to the second principle that it was in the nature of an advice often quoted but perhaps not always followed. See also Citizens Insurance Co. v. Parsons, (1881) 7 Appeal Cases 96, etc. etc.).

Similarly, Mr. Justice Frankfurter, in the case of Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. v. Sawyer, (1952) 343 U.S. 579 at p. 593, set forth the attitude which ought to be adopted by Courts while they are engaged in settling constitutional controversies. On the one hand, the court should be conscious that since:

"The accretion of dangerous power does not come in a day. It does come, however slowly, from the generative force of unchecked disregard of the restrictions that fence in even the most disinterested assertion of authority," it ought to be vigilant and jealously guard against any move in the direction of autocracy that must result from power being allowed to go unchecked and unregulated—and, on the other, the Court should realise that:

"Judicial power can be exercised only as to matters that were the traditional concern of the courts at Westminster, and only if they arise in ways that to the expert feel of lawyers constitute 'cases' or 'controversies'."

And he goes on further to add:

"Even as to questions that were the staple of judicial business, it is not for the courts to pass upon them unless they are indispensably involved in a conventional litigation.... Rigorous adherence to the narrow scope of the judicial function is specially demanded in controversies that arouse appeals to the constitution. The attitude with which this court must approach its duty when confronted with such issues is precisely the opposite of that normally manifested by the general public. So-called constitutional questions seem to exercise a mesmeric influence over the popular mind. This eagerness to settle—preferably for ever—a specific problem on the basis of the broadest possible constitutional pronouncements may not unfairly be called one of our minor national traits..... Due regard for the implications of the distribution of powers in our Constitution and for the nature of judicial process as the ultimate authority in interpreting the constitution, has not only confined the court within the narrow domain of appropriate adjudication: it has also led to 'a series of rules under which it has avoided passing upon a large part of all the constitutional questions pressed upon it for decision.' (Brandeis, J. in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U.S. 288). A basic rule is the duty of the Court not to pass on a constitutional issue at all, however narrowly it may be confined, if the case may, as a matter of intellectual honesty, be decided without even considering delicate problems of power under the Constitution." (Consult further Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law, Chapt. XV, Sec. 4 Judicial Restraints on Legislative Encroachments, pp. 190-201).

182. Courts and the Judicial Precedents

When a court of law decides a case presented to it, it disposes of the conflicting claims advanced before it by the parties to the cause and renders what is called "judgment" in this country and "opinion" in America: the judgment or opinion rendered by the court concludes the controversy between parties to the cause and is binding on them subject, of course, to the decision being upset by a higher court. But, in the process of reaching a conclusion upon a controversy, the court itself evolves a rule which it follows in the decision of the case, and it is this rule, or what may be called as "reason for deciding the case", which is also known as ratio decidendi, to which some measure of authority gets attached, and it becomes in its turn, a creative source of law for the purpose of settling cognate controversies that may arise during the course of subsequent litigation. Before we understand how to disentangle this ratio decidendi or 'the legal reason for deciding the case' and observe the limits within which it operates as a source of law, it is necessary that we should advert, be it even so briefly, to the history of the doctrine regarding the binding value of a judicial precedent.

The emergence of the doctrine of the binding value of judicial precedents, in England at least, could be traced back to the theory of the common law which regards it as representing the general custom of the land and views judicial decisions as being the principal and the most authoritative evidence that can be given of the existence of such a custom. And so we have in Blackstone's Commentaries the following statement on the subject:

"For it is an established rule to abide by former precedents, where the same points come again in litigation: as well to keep the scale of justice even and steady, and not liable to waver with every new judge's opinion; as also because the law in that case being solemnly declared and determined, what before was uncertain, and perhaps indifferent, is now become a permanent rule, which it is not in the breast of any subsequent judge to alter or vary from, according to his private sentiments: he being sworn to determine, not according to his own private judgment, but according to the known laws and customs of the land: not delegated to pronounce a new law, but to maintain and expound the old one. Yet this rule admits of exception, where the former determination is most evidently contrary to reason; much more if it be clearly contrary to the divine law. But even in such cases the subsequent judges do not pretend to make a new law, but to vindicate the old one from misrepresentation. For if it be found that the former decision is manifestly absurd or unjust, it is declared not that such a sentence was bad law, but that it was not law, that is, that it is not the established custom of the realm, as has been erroneously determined . . . The doctrine of the law then is this: that precedents and rules must be followed, unless flatly absurd or unjust: for though their reason be not obvious at first view, yet we owe such a deference to former times as not to suppose that they acted wholly without consideration." (p. 69 Vol. I).

It would be apparent that Blackstone grounds his thesis upon the desirability of preserving historic continuity which he insists ought to be maintained in the administration of justice and upholds the 'declaratory' theory of the precedent which says that it is evidence of what the common law of England is. The subsequent development of the juristic thought in England has departed from this theory of the precedent advanced by Blackstone, who would have the force and effect of precedent based upon the general custom of the land and to make the decision given by courts only as evidence of that custom. The more generally accepted view now is the one advanced by Austin, who it would be recalled denounced this declaratory theory of the judicial precedent as "the childish fiction employed by our judges that judiciary or common law is not made by them but is a miraculous something made by nobody, existing I suppose from eternity, and merely declared from time to time by the judges."

Austin quotes with approval Sir James Parke's observations made in a decision rendered by the House of Lords, in Mirehouse v. Rennel (1833) 1 Cl. & F. page 527 at p. 546, as best expressing the justification of "our system of ascribing positive authority to precedent for deciding the cases":

"Our Common Law system consists in the applying to new combination of circumstances those rules of law which we derive from legal principles and judicial precedents; and for the sake of attaining uniformity, consistency and certainty, we must apply those rules, where they are not plainly unreasonable and inconvenient, to all cases which arise; and we are not at liberty to reject them, and to abandon all analogy to them, in those to which they have not yet been judicially applied, because we think that the rules are not as convenient and reasonable as we ourselves could have devised. It appears to me to be of great importance to keep this principle of decision steadily in view, not merely for the determination of the particular case, but for the interests of law as a science."

In the same strain are the observations of Lord Halsbury in London Street Tramways Co. v. London County Council, (1898) A.C. 375 :—

"It is wholly impossible, as it appears to me, to disregard the whole current of authority upon this subject, and to suppose that what some people call an 'extraordinary case', an 'unusual case', a case somewhat different from the common, in the opinion of each litigant in turn, is sufficient to justify the re-hearing and re-arguing before the final Court of Appeal of a question which has been already decided. Of course, I do not deny that cases of individual hardship may arise, and there may be a current of opinion in the profession that such a judgment was erroneous; but what is that occasional interference with what is, perhaps, abstract justice, as compared with the inconvenience—the disastrous inconvenience—of having each question subject to be re-argued, and the dealings of mankind rendered doubtful by reason of different decisions, so that in truth and in fact there would be no real final Court of Appeal. Interest rei publicae that there should be finis litium at some time, and there could be no finis litium if it were possible to suggest in each case that it might be re-argued because it is not 'an ordinary case', whatever that may mean."

This and such other observations that are to be discovered in the judicial pronouncements of the English Courts have reference to that essential conservatism of the English mind which would rather, unless there are good and sufficient reasons to the contrary, have the law rest in a state of undisturbed existence than have it changed to the prejudice of those who have founded contracts, incurred obligations or entered into other dealings upon the footing of a rational expectation that law would continue to be the same.

But even in England 'the doctrine of Judicial Precedent', in the words of G. W. Keeton (Elementary Principles of Jurisprudence, p. 108):

"is by no means a mechanical process and, moreover, the process of reasoning by analogy extends to it only with important limitations, which preserve the flexibility of the system, and which permit the judges continuously to adapt the Common Law to changing social needs. Indeed, it has been suggested that the fabric of the Common Law changes completely in the course of a century and a half, as completely and as imperceptibly as an individual changes his skin. This process of change can perhaps be best studied to-day in the Law of Torts, which presents a fascinating spectacle of judicial re-interpretation of individual responsibility for fault in the light of changed social conditions. Because this process of judicial re-interpretation is not as yet complete, the Law of Torts shares with the Law of Property the doubtful honour of being one of the most difficult branches of English law to understand. It is all too frequently the despair of the law student, though its labyrinthine by-ways invite the legal scholar to wander at will in contemplation and criticism. Until the late nineteenth century this branch of the law was still dominated by influences derived from its history from the Middle Ages onwards . . . Nevertheless, for five centuries, the development of the law of civil liability was conditioned by the necessity for bringing all claims for redress within the orbit of one or other form of action; and even when they were abolished, they still continued to influence legal thought and legal development. Indeed, it is only at the present time that we are finally emancipating ourselves from the tyranny of the forms of action, and that we are cautiously feeling our way towards some general theory of civil liability for wrongful harm. It will be apparent that this process has also been hastened by changing conceptions of social responsibility."

Sir James Parke's view in Mirehouse vs. Rennel, quoted.

Lord Halsbury's observations in London Street Tramways' Case.

Rationale of the Binding Value of a Judicial Precedent.

G.W. Keeton's views cited.

The continental jurisprudence, more particularly that of France and Germany, does not assign much importance to the decisions of the courts as constituting a source of law and does not give to them any binding value. This may be traced to the influence of the Roman Law which as students of legal History know, has had a greater impact on the system of continental jurisprudence than it has had in England. There is not much to be found in the writings of Roman lawyers to show that Roman Law ever regarded judicial precedent as a source of law in the sense in which we do in our country. During the time of Republic the rules of Pontifical College were considered although the extent to which they controlled the judgments of the Roman Praetors, is not known. It was the frequent practice of the judicial tribunals to invite opinions of jurisconsults, that is the men who were learned in law, but even then what they said in response to such an invitation was not supposed to be binding on magistrates and judges. On the continent of Europe the decision rendered by a court has no binding force for a judicial tribunal as a precedent, nay not even upon the tribunal from where an appeal lies to the court rendering the decision. But in England and in United States, as has been stated earlier, the position is entirely different.

183. Factors on which the Authority of the Precedent depends

The authority of the precedent in our system of law is commensurate with the status of the tribunal that renders the judgment. The rule is that every Court binds the lower courts, and that some courts even bind themselves. When a higher court upsets or reverses a case decided by a lower court, the case that is reversed loses all authority as a precedent. Over-ruling takes place when a case decided in a lower court is considered in a different case taken to the appeal court and held to be wrongly decided.

Decisions of superior tribunals are thus binding on the inferior ones, and invariably the decision even binds the court that renders it in relation to the course of future litigation. Thus the House of Lords in England is bound by its decisions, so also is the Court of Appeal in England.

In the leading case of Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Company (1944), K.B. p. 718, equivalent to 1944 2 All E.R. p. 293, Lord Greene M.R., after declaring that the Court of Appeal was bound by its previous decisions, made the following three reservations to the rule (p. 300):

- (1) The Court is entitled to choose between two conflicting decisions of its own;
- (2) the Court must refuse to follow a decision of its own which, though not expressly over-ruled is inconsistent with a decision of the House of Lords; and
- (3) it is not bound to follow a decision of its own given per incuriam.

As to (3) above, he went on to observe:

"Where the court has construed a statute or a rule having the force of a statute, its decision stands on the same footing as any other decision on a question of law. But where the court is satisfied that an earlier decision was given in ignorance of the terms of a statute or a rule having the force of a statute the position is very different. It cannot, in our opinion, be right to say that in such a case the court is entitled to disregard the statutory provision and is bound to follow a decision of its own given when that provision was not present to its mind. Cases of this description are examples of decisions given per incuriam. We do not think that it would be right to say that there may not be other cases of decisions given per incuriam in which this court might properly consider itself entitled not to follow an earlier decision of its own. Such cases would obviously be of the rarest occurrence and must be dealt with in accordance with their special facts."

184. Rule of "Stare Decisis"

In an article contributed to the Modern Law Review (Vol. 19, No. 2, March 1956, p. 136) by Peter Mason, we have a discussion of the rule relating to stare decisis as it is followed by the English Court of Appeal and as it has been applied in the course of eleven years after the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Young's case referred to above:

"It seems clear beyond doubt", says this learned author, "that Master of the Rolls envisaged, and has been taken by later courts to have envisaged, that there was a duty on later courts to examine and analyse the reasoning by which the earlier court arrived at its decision. The gap in the decision in Young's case, which it has taken the efforts of the courts during the succeeding years to fill, was that the court in Young's case did not make it clear that a decision might be held to have been given per incuriam if given in ignorance of some binding authority apart from statute. The Court of Appeal itself had the danger that in the absence of some such warning as is indicated in the words of Greene M.R. (—"would obviously be of the rarest occurrence and must be dealt with in accordance with their special facts"—) it would be difficult to preclude the advocate from using per incuriam principle 'as a perpetual platform on which to take the last ditch stand.'

There is, however, a presumption that an earlier court did not act per incuriam and the burden of showing that it did so act, falls on the party making the submission. [See Gibson v. South American Stores case (1949) 2 All E.R. page 985]. Nor again is it a valid argument for not following an earlier decision merely because it should appear that there was a lack of argument per se in the earlier decision. [See Grower v. Grower, (1950), 1 All E.R. page 104]. The lack of reasoning per se is also no argument for declining to follow a previous precedent unless the reasoning of the Court was faulty to the extent and degree mentioned below:

- (a) it was so faulty because of ignorance or forgetfulness of a statute or statutory rule, or
- (b) it was so faulty because of ignorance or forgetfulness of a binding authority apart from statute, and
- (c) it is certain or at the very least highly probable that such faulty reasoning affected the court's conclusion.

(See A. & J. Mucklow Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1954), 2 All E.R. p. 508, particularly the remarks of Evershed, M. R.; see also Morelle Ltd. v. Waterworth (1954) 2 All E.R. p. 673.)

In a recent decision R. v. Taylor, (1950) 2 All E.R. p. 170: 1950, 2 K.B. 368, the court of criminal appeal overruled an earlier decision of its own rendered in R. vs. Treanor (or McAvoy) (1939) 1 All E.R. 330 on the question of bigamy and laid down rules relating to the principle of stare decisis in criminal matters. Lord Goddard, C. J. observed:

"But this court has to deal with the liberty of the subject and if on reconsideration, in the opinion of a Full Court that the law has been either misapplied or misunderstood and a man has been sentenced for an offence, it will be the duty of the Court to consider whether he has been properly convicted. The practice observed in civil cases ought not to be applied in such a case."

This decision has been regarded as constituting the most open attack on stare decisis yet made by a modern English Court. (See Friedman's Legal Theory, page 332). [See also the case of Rex v. Northumberland Compensation Appeal Tribunal, ex parte Show: (1951)

185. Doctrine of Stare Decisis and Constitutional Adjudications

In the matter of constitutional adjudications the rule of stare decisis has, if at all, limited application. Our Constitution gives power to the Supreme Court to review its decisions 'subject to the provisions of any Act of Parliament and of any rules made by the Supreme Court'. (See ART. 161). And it must follow from this constitutional provision that should reason and propriety demand it, the Supreme Court will not only be entitled but, it is submitted with respect, would be bound to reconsider a previously pronounced decision. But the rule of stare decisis has reference to the impropriety of declining to follow a prior decision in the determination of a case before the same court: departure from the rule of stare decisis in this sense means the competence of the Court to over-rule its previous decisions in the light of what judicial experience might teach it to do in the wake of new circumstances that may have supervened after the decision under review was rendered by it.

The position of the Supreme Court of our country in this wise may thus be alikened to the practice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which, as is well-known, is not bound by its own decisions. Thus the decision that the Colonial Legislature had, at common law, power to punish contempts given in Beaumont v. Barrett, (1836) 1 Moore P.C. 59 was over-ruled by the Privy Council in Kielly v. Carson, (1842) 4 Moore P.C. 63. The House of Lords, of course, as has been remarked earlier, is absolutely bound by its previous decisions and has no power to review the same. (See London Street Tramways Company versus L.C.C. (1898) A.C. 375). If the result of what the House of Lords decides is felt to be undesirable the remedy lies with the Parliament to promote legislation to undo or alter it. (For a full discussion on this topic see Stuart v. Bank of Montreal, (1909) 41 Can. S.C.R. p. 516; Professor A.L. Goodhart's "Case Law in England and America", 15 Cornell L. Quart. 173, 188, 193; E.K. Williams, Stare Decisis 4 Canadian Bar Review, 289).

Council Practice—

A. G.
Ontario vs.
Canada Temperance Federation.

Strangely enough, the practice of the Privy Council not to be bound by its previous decisions appears to have been overridden by one qualification in the sense that in matters affecting constitutional decisions the Board is most reluctant to depart from its previous decisions. In fact there is no instance in which the Privy Council have over-ruled a previous decision in a constitutional case, although there have been cases in which it has dissociated itself from particular views expressed in earlier cases. In the case of Attorney-General of Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation, (1946) A.C. p. 193, Viscount Simond delivering the decision of the Board observed:

"In constitutional questions it must be seldom indeed that the Board would depart from a previous decision which it may be assumed will have been acted upon by the Governments and subjects."

In this case the argument before the Privy Council was that Russell v. Reg., (1882) 7 Appeal Cases 829, be reconsidered: the Judicial Committee, however, declined to do so on the ground that that case established a principle which was deeply embedded in the constitutional law of Canada. But despite this refusal to review the case the Privy Council remarked as if to emphasize the reservation :

"Their Lordships do not doubt that in tendering humble advice to His Majesty they are not absolutely bound by previous decisions of the Board, as is the House of Lords by its own judgments."

186. Argument ab inconvenienti—Federation of Pakistan vs. Tamizuddin Khan.

In the case of Federation of Pakistan v. Tamizuddin Khan, reported in P.L.D. 1955 F.C. p. 240, (equivalent to VII Dacca Law Reports, F.C. p. 291,) the question was whether the Governor-General under the Indian Independence Act, 1947, had to give his assent to the legislation passed by the Constituent Assembly in the exercise of its constituent powers, before its Acts could be constitutionally considered as binding and valid legislation. It was realised that if the answer to this question be in the affirmative all the constitutional legislation that had been passed by the Constituent Assembly ever since 1947, right upto the date of the decision of the case which was in April 1955, would en bloc have to be declared, for want of such an assent, as of no legal effect, and the submission at the bar was based on the plea that doctrine of stare decisis applied. It was contended that the question raised prejudicially affected the interpretation of the provisions of the Indian Independence Act which had been consistently followed in Pakistan, and that it would not be in order for the Court to give effect to the view that assent of Governor-General was necessary in order to make the constitutional laws, passed by the Constituent Assembly, valid—for to do that would virtually upset a consistent course of public conduct and thus disturb the entire constitutional legislation of the country. Chief Justice Muhammad Munir was not impressed by this argument and he observed (at p. 299):

"I am quite clear in my mind that we are not concerned with the consequences, however beneficial or disastrous they may be, if the undoubted legal position was that all legislation by the Legislature of the Dominion under sub-section (3), S.6., needed the assent of the Governor-General. If the result is disaster, it will merely be another instance of how thoughtlessly the Constituent Assembly proceeded with its business and by assuming for itself the position of an irremovable legislature to what straits it has brought the country. Unless any rule of estoppel requires us to pronounce merely purported legislation as complete and valid legislation, we have no option but to pronounce it to be void and to leave it to the relevant authorities under the Constitution or to the country to set right the position in any way it may be open to them. The question raised involves the rights of every citizen in Pakistan, and neither any rule of construction nor any rule of estoppel stands in the way of a clear pronouncement."

These observations become all the more significant of the emphasis with which the argument ab inconvenienti was repelled if regard be had to the fact that the former Sind Chief Court that had the constitutional status of a High Court under the Govt. of India Act, 1935, in the case of M. A. Khuhro v. The Federation of Pakistan, reported in P.L.D. (1950) Sind p. 49, had held that upon the proper construction of the provisions of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, the assent of the Governor-General was not required and further that the Federation of Pakistan, who were a party to the contest, had acquiesced in that interpretation and had not preferred any appeal against its determination to the Federal Court. [See also the Indian case of State of Seraikella v. The Union of India AIR (1951) S.C. 253, at 257, where the question of assent of Governor-General to constitutional laws has been considered and it has been held that it is not within the province of courts to question the laws passed by sovereign law-making bodies, like the Constituent Assembly set up by the British Parliament to frame the Constitution for India].

Very different, however, was the attitude of Mr. Justice Cornelius, who in a vigorously worded dissenting judgment, after holding that there was a "complete unanimity in regard to the point this Court was called upon to decide", dealt with the argument ab inconvenienti in words that deserve being quoted in full (p. 364):

"It is permissible, perhaps, at this stage, to refer to the argument ab inconvenienti, which arises naturally enough whenever a long course of legislative, administrative and judicial action has been based upon a certain view of law which is sought to be upset. Certain events have followed the pronouncement of the orders in this case, which necessitate the exercise of great caution in making these comments, lest they may influence and perhaps confuse the decision of matters already pending before other Courts. I will content myself with citing a few extracts from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, and from Crawford's Statutory Construction (Thomas Law Book Co., St. Louis, 1940)."

"Indeed, where a particular construction has been generally accepted as correct, and especially when this has occurred contemporaneously with the adoption of the constitution, and by those who had the opportunity to understand the intention of the instrument, it is not to be denied that a strong presumption exists that the construction rightly interprets the intention."

"Three passages from Crawford's book are relevant. At page 381, he says :—

"Where the meaning of a statute is in doubt, the Court may resort to contemporaneous construction—that is, the construction placed upon the statute by its contemporaries, at the time of its enactment and soon thereafter—for assistance in removing any doubts. Similarly, resort may also be had to the usage or course of conduct based upon a certain construction of the statute soon after its enactment, and acquiesced in by the Courts and the legislature for a long period of time."

"And, speaking of 'departmental construction', which means 'construction by the Executive Department', the learned author says at pages 395 and 399—

"And where vested rights have grown up under the departmental construction, the Courts are justified in being more reluctant than in ordinary cases in adopting a construction which will destroy or disturb such rights."

"... Where the executive construction has been for a long time, an element of estoppel seems to be involved. Naturally, many rights will grow up in reliance upon the interpretation placed upon a statute by those whose duty it is to execute it."

"The kind of case to which these observations, in their terms apply, is however of importance far below that of the present case. The present is not a case where a mere 'departmental construction', or even a judicial or legislative construction is put forward, as a caution against lightly disturbing that which has been accepted and acted upon as settled law for a period, leading to development of vested rights. The rule of stare decisis is altogether too small in its content to fit the case. Here, the greatest organs and agencies of the State have been consciously and unanimously holding a certain belief, and have been acting upon it in numerous respects affecting the most fundamental rights of the entire people. It is difficult to imagine a law which affects so large a proportion of the public as does a law designed to grant adult suffrage, and to determine the composition of Provincial Legislatures on that basis. The Delimitation of Constituencies (Adult Franchise) Act, 1951, was procured by the Federal Government, was passed by the Constituent Assembly, was put into operation by the combined labours of the Federal and Provincial Governments, and has borne fruit in the shape of new Legislative Assemblies, which have been busy ever since passing new laws and in other ways, regulating the lives of the people. It is beyond conception to tabulate all the vested rights and interests which have developed in consequence of this law. And there are many other laws which have produced extensive effects, which cannot possibly be ascertained with exactness. These circumstances should, in my opinion, furnish an argument of almost insuperable character, in favour of upholding what has been the practice hitherto in regard to assent to constitutional laws."

It is submitted with respect, that the views of Cornelius J., have a great deal of merit in them and deserve a more serious study and attention than would normally be accorded to the opinion of a Judge who found himself in the minority of one as against four others who took a different view of the problem posed in the case referred to above. The view taken by the learned Judge is in accord with the settled principles of rules relating to contemporanea exposito as applied to constitutional adjudications. In a recent case, Attorney General of Commonwealth of Australia v. Reginam, & others (1957) 2 All E. R. p. 45, one of the considerations pressed upon their Lordships was to give recognition to the undeniable fact that for over a quarter of century no litigant had attacked the validity of a law under which the Australian Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Court had been set up and that the Act, it was submitted, should not, at least on that score, be lightly denounced as unconstitutional. Their Lordships observed (at p. 58):—

"It is clear from the majority judgment (of the High Court of Australia) that the learned Chief Justice and the Judges who shared his opinion were heavily pressed by this consideration. It could not be otherwise. Yet they were impelled to their conclusion by the clear conviction that consistently with the constitution the validity of the impugned provisions could not be sustained. Whether the result would have been different if their validity had previously been judicially determined after full argument directed to the precise question and had not rested on judicial dicta and common assumption it is not for their Lordships to say. On a question of the applicability of the doctrine of stare decisis to matters of far-reaching constitutional importance they would imperatively require the assistance of the High Court itself. But here no such question arises."

It is apparent that their Lordships would have taken a different view of the matter if the conditions to which they made a reference had been in existence. It is clear that the doctrine of stare decisis was deemed relevant by their Lordships of the Privy Council in cases involving a constitutional question.

As to the effect of a decision which has been followed for a long time and has been acted upon in the general conduct of public affairs, there are authorities that tend to show that those decisions will be followed even by courts of higher authority. (See paragraph 557 in Halsbury's Laws of England. Vol. 19, Second Ed.).

We might next cite a few extracts from the opinions of some of the American Jurists in regard to the limits within which this rule of interpretation is allowed to control their determinations.

(a) In its application to constitutional statutes, the rule is stated thus by Cooley:

"Contemporaneous interpretation may indicate merely the understanding with which the people received it at the time, or it may be accompanied by acts done in putting the instrument in operation, and which necessarily assume that it is to be construed in a particular way. In the first case it can have very little force, because the evidences of the public understanding, when nothing has been done under the provision in question, must always of necessity be vague and indecisive. But where there has been a practical construction, which has been acquiesced in for a considerable period, considerations in favour of adhering to this construction sometimes present themselves to the Courts with a plausibility and force which it is not easy to resist. Indeed, where a particular construction has been generally accepted as correct and especially when this has occurred contemporaneously with the adoption of the constitution, and by those who had opportunity to understand the intention of the instrument, it is not to be denied that a strong presumption exists that the construction rightly interprets the intention.

"Contemporary construction . . . can never abrogate the text; it can never fritter away its obvious sense; it can never narrow down its true limitations; it can never enlarge its natural boundaries. While we conceive this to be the true and only safe rule, we shall be obliged to confess that some of the cases appear, on first reading, not to have observed these limitations . . .

"It is believed, however, that in each of these cases an examination of the Constitution left in the minds of the Judges sufficient doubt upon the question of its violation to warrant their looking elsewhere for aids in interpretation, and that the cases are not in conflict with the general rule as above laid down. Acquiescence for no length of time can legalize a clear usurpation of power, where the people have plainly expressed their will in the Constitution, and appointed judicial tribunals to enforce it. A power is frequently yielded to merely because it is claimed, and it may be exercised for a long period, in violation of the constitutional prohibition, without the mischief which the Constitution was designed to guard against appearing or without anyone being sufficiently interested in the subject to raise the question; but these circumstances cannot be allowed to sanction an infraction of the Constitution. We think we allow to contemporary and practical construction its full legitimate force when we suffer it, where it is clear and uniform, to solve in its own favour the doubts which arise on reading the instrument to be construed." (See his 'Constitutional Limitations' p. 144)

The question whether or not there is doubt upon the question of interpretation of the provisions to which Mr. Cooley is obviously referring is a question of fact; the issue then is, whether or not, as a matter of fact, doubt has existed in the mind of those who have been interpreting the provision in question and surely it has no reference to the doubt in the mind of the Judge who is called upon to interpret the provision. Once the question as to the existence of doubt is relegated to the subjective judgment of a given Judge who is called upon to adjudicate those provisions, the doctrine relating to contemporanea expositio ceases to have any practical force and effect whatever, because when Judges decide anything they decide only when they have no doubt left in their mind in regard to what to decide. The 'doubt' has ultimately to be settled in the mind of the Judge, but the basis for the determination of that question is a factual appraisal of the consistent course of interpretation which has been adhered to by those who have been called upon to interpret a certain provision of the Constitution. This view appears to be endorsed by the following extracts from the judgments of some of the well-known Judges of America.

(b) In the famous case of United States v. State Bank, (1832) 6 Pet. 29, Justice Story delivering the opinion of the United States Supreme Court observed in relation to the construction of a statute as follows at p. 39:—

"It is not unimportant to state that the construction which we have given to the terms of the act, is that which is understood to have been practically acted upon by the government, as well as by individuals, ever since its enactment. Many estates, as well of deceased persons as of persons insolvent who have made general assignments, have been settled upon the footing of its correctness. A practice so long and so general, would of itself furnish strong grounds for a liberal construction, and could not now be disturbed without introducing a train of serious mischiefs. We think the practice was founded in the true exposition of the terms and intent of the act; but if it were susceptible of some doubt, so long an acquiescence in it would justify us in yielding to it as a safe and reasonable exposition."

(c) In the case of Lithographic Company v. Sarony, (1884) 111 U.S. 53, the court declared:

"The construction placed upon the Constitution by the first Act of 1790, and the Act of 1802, by the men who were contemporary with its formation, many of whom were members of the Convention which framed it, is of itself entitled to very great weight; and when it is remembered that the rights thus established have not been disputed during a period of nearly a century, it is almost conclusive."

(d) Similarly in yet another case of United States v. Midwest Oil Co., (1915) 236 U.S. 459 the court said at p. 472:—

"It may be argued that while these facts and rulings prove a usage, they do not establish its validity. But government is a practical affair, intended for practical men. Both officers, law-makers, and citizens naturally adjust themselves to any long-continued action of the Executive Department, on the presumption that unauthorised acts would not have been allowed to be so often repeated as to crystallize into a regular practice. That presumption is not reasoning in a circle, but the basis of a wise and quieting rule that, in determining the meaning of a statute or the existence of a power, weight shall be given to the usage itself,—even when the validity of the practice is the subject of investigation."

187. Limits of the Rule of Stare Decisis

Stare decisis is a doctrine of considerable pragmatic utility because it is in the interest of orderly working of the system of administration of justice that the rule of law may be allowed to rest settled rather than it be continually settled right by appeal to abstract notions of justice. See also Ghulam Mohiuddin v. Crown, PLD (1953) F.C. 1 where the Federal Court observed at p. 10:

"The rule of stare decisis is fully applicable to the present case. During the last 28 years the Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court, and later on the Chief Court, have conducted all trials in the exercise of their Original Criminal Jurisdiction in accordance with the procedure applicable to the High Courts. If we now hold that the Sind Court had no jurisdiction to follow the procedure applicable to the High Courts, we would be disturbing a practice which has been followed in numerous cases."

The American courts, however, take a different view of the applicability of the rule relating to stare decisis in the matters affecting constitutional interpretation. Willoughby in his Constitution of United States at p. 74, is of the view that the doctrine of stare decisis should not be so rigidly applied to the constitutional as to other laws: Says he,

"In cases of purely private import, the chief desideratum is that the law remain certain, and, therefore, where a rule has been judicially declared and private rights created thereunder, the courts will not, except in the clearest cases of error, depart from the doctrine of stare decisis. When, however, public interests are involved and specially when the question is one of constitutional construction, the matter is otherwise. An error in the construction of a statute may easily be corrected by a legislative act, but a constitution and particularly the Federal Constitution, may be changed only with great difficulty. Hence an error in its interpretation may for all practical purposes be corrected only by the Court's repudiating or modifying its former decision."

In the case of St. Joseph Stock Yards Co. v. The United States of America, (1936) 298 U.S. 38: (1936) 80 L.Ed. 1033, Mr. Justice Stone and Mr. Justice Cardozo approved the rule followed by Brandeis J., in his dissenting opinion in Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Company, (1932) 285 U.S. 393: (1932) 76 L.Ed. 815, observed at p. 94:

"The doctrine of stare decisis, however appropriate and even necessary at times, has only a limited application in the field of constitutional law."

The remarks of Brandeis J. (at 406) approved by these two learned Judges are to the following effect :—

"Stare decisis is not, like the rule of res judicata, a universal, inexorable command. The rule of stare decisis, though one tending to consistency and uniformity of decision, is not inflexible. Whether it shall be followed or departed from is a question entirely within the discretion of the court, which is again called upon to consider a question once decided.' (Hertz v. Woodman, 54 Lawyers Edition 1001). Stare decisis is usually the wise policy, because in most matters it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right. (Compare National Bank v. Whitney, 26 Lawyers Edition 443). This is commonly true even where the error is a matter of serious concern, provided correction can be had by legislation. But in cases involving the Federal Constitution, where correction through legislative action is practically impossible, this Court has often overruled its earlier decisions. The Court bows to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning, recognizing that the process of trial and error, so fruitful in the physical sciences, is appropriate also in the judicial function . . . In cases involving the Federal Constitution the position of this Court is unlike that of the highest court of England, where the policy of stare decisis was formulated and is strictly applied to all classes of cases. Parliament is free to correct any judicial error; and the remedy may be promptly invoked.

"The reasons why this Court should refuse to follow an earlier constitutional decision which it deems erroneous are particularly strong where the question presented is one of applying, as distinguished from what may accurately be called interpreting, the Constitution. In the cases which now come before us there is seldom any dispute as to the interpretation of any provision. The controversy is usually over the application to existing conditions of some well-recognized constitutional limitations. This is strikingly true of cases under the due process clause when the question is whether a statute is unreasonable, arbitrary or capricious; of cases under the equal protection clause when the question is whether there is any reasonable basis for the classification made by a statute; and of cases under the commerce clause when the question is whether an admitted burden laid by a statute upon interstate commerce is so substantial as to be deemed direct. These issues resemble, fundamentally, that of reasonable care in negligence cases, the determination of which is ordinarily left to the verdict of the jury. In every such case the decision, in the first instance, is dependent upon the determination of what in legal parlance is called a fact, as distinguished from the declaration of a rule of law. When the underlying fact has been found, the legal result follows inevitably. The circumstance that the decision of that fact is made by a court, instead of by a jury, should not be allowed to obscure its real character."

188. Our Supreme Court and the Rule relating to stare decisis

It is submitted with respect that the foregoing extract represents a correct approach to the application of the rule relating to stare decisis in matters affecting constitutional determinations by our Supreme Court, more particularly in the sphere of the enforcement of those fundamental rights which have been guaranteed subject to reasonable restrictions imposed by law.

The law declared by the Supreme Court of Pakistan is, it is submitted with respect, only in a limited or qualified sense binding upon itself. But the law declared by it is absolutely and unconditionally binding on all other courts in Pakistan including the High Court. This has been constitutionally provided for. [See ART. 163(1)] which is in following terms: "The law declared by the Supreme Court shall be binding on all courts in Pakistan." In the expression 'law declared', all that is sought to be subsumed, is not merely the formal declaration of the constitutionality or otherwise of laws passed by legislatures or the maintenance or annulment of administrative decrees made and promulgated by the executive Branch of our Government but also the ratio decidendi or the legal reason on the basis of which a decision is reached by the Supreme Court. As to the question whether the Supreme Court is bound by its own decisions, considerable assistance could be derived by the student if the case of Anwar v. the Crown reported in PLD (1955) F.C. 185, be carefully read by him. Cornelius J. in a vigorous dissenting judgment has taken the view that the late Federal Court was bound by the previous decisions rendered by it. His view was based on the construction of S. 212 of the Government of India Act, 1935—which corresponds to ART. 163(1) of our Constitution. His argument was, (p. 225) "Giving the words (of S. 212, Government of India Act, 1935,) their full force. the Federal Court, being a court established in Pakistan, must be regarded as bound by its own decisions, in so far as they declare the law". This result was reached by the learned Judge by regarding Federal Court to be, or what was included in the term 'court' appearing in the latter part of S. 212 of the Government of India Act. The majority view in the case under reference was that Federal Court was entitled to change its view of the law, but there is no reference much less an answer to the argument upon which Cornelius J. reached the conclusion that it could not: the majority view, be it noted, was based on the practice of the Privy Council which, as has been indicated earlier, unlike the House of Lords does not consider itself bound to follow its previous enunciation of law. Reliance was placed by Chief Justice M. Munir, who spoke on behalf of the majority, on the two well known cases of the Privy Council on this subject—Attorney-General of Ontario & others v. Canada Temperance Federation & others AIR (1946) P.C. 88, and In re Payment of Compention to Civil Servants etc. (1929) A.C. 242. (See p. 209 of (1955) PLD Federal Court, Anwar versus the Crown). It is submitted with respect, that ART. 163 does not fetter the hands of the Supreme Court to consider itself bound by a prior decision rendered by it. The word 'Court' appearing in that Article does not include "Supreme" Court for the simple reason that would tantamount to assuming that the draftsman did not find enough words to express himself cogently. Nor again the argument based upon the practice of the Privy Council not to be bound by its own decision, which found favour with the majority of Judges who decided Anwar's case referred to above, assuming it to be sound in principle, is any longer relevant now that our Supreme Court finds itself not so much as the inheritor of the Privy Council Jurisdiction as did its predecessor, the Federal Court of Pakistan, as the Highest Court established by the sovereign people who have established, under a written constitution, the framework of a Republican polity for themselves. The House of Lords can afford to be bound by its own decisions since it realizes that its determinations can be easily upset by a legislative decree passed by the Parliament by means of a simple majority vote. Under our Constitution, amendment of the Constitution is not so simple as all that—and our Supreme Court must assume the responsibility of sitting in judgment over its own decision and in suitable cases of having the judicial valour of upsetting its own decisions. The powers of our Supreme Court are much wider than those enjoyed by the House of Lords sitting as Final Court in England—and it is respectfully suggested that it has more in common with the Supreme Court of United States whose example in these matters it would do well to follow.

Before the coming into force of our Constitution all courts in our country were bound by the decisions of the Federal Court and the Privy Council. (See S. 212 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and the cases of Laxmibai v. the State of Madhya Pradesh, A.I.R. (1951) Nagpur 94; and Harkishan Das, A.I.R. (1944) Lahore 33 (F.B.). Even obiter dictum by the Privy Council enshrined in considered decisions delivered by it was of considerable weight and authority if not absolutely binding. (See Hakam Khuda Yar's case in (1940) Lahore, 129). It is submitted that even the obiter dicta in the judgments of the Supreme Court are to be accorded that much weight and authority as was done by the various High Courts in pre-partition India with respect to the obiter dicta of the Privy Council. (See (1940) Allahabad, 544 the Full Bench case of Shri Nath Shah).

It is however essential to remember, in the words of Lord Halsbury, in the case of Quinn v. Leathem (1901), A.C. page 495, that :—

"Every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved . . . since the generality of expressions which may be found there are not entitled to be the expositions of the whole law but govern and qualify particular case in which such expressions are to be found. A case is only an authority for what it actually decides. I entirely deny that it can be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it."

It is the duty of every court before which any judicial precedent is cited to grapple with the problem of determining :

- (a) What were the facts ascertained in the case, and
- (b) the legal reason by appeal to which the adjudication was reached by the Court.

If a decision of the superior court is based upon more than one ground and a case is presented to the inferior court in which only one of the grounds is available but not the other, it is not open to the latter court to treat either of the reasons given as obiter upon the view that none of the two or more grounds taken by it is shown to be legally sufficient for the determination of the case. (See Laxmibai v. State of M.P. (F.B.) A.I.R. (1951) Nagpur page 94).

A Judge of a High Court sitting singly is not bound by the judgment upon questions of law rendered by another judge sitting alone. (See 1945 Bombay page 173). One High Court Judge may thus refuse to follow another High Court Judge and the result of this will be that there would be a conflict of authority—which can be settled by the matter being referred to a larger Bench of the same Court or by the Court of Appeal. A High Court Judge in declining to follow his brother Judge is said to "disapprove" his decision and "not follow" him. But this is not the same thing as "over-ruling." One Judge of High Court cannot over-rule his colleague on the Bench. But even the phenomenon of "not following" is very rare indeed! (See (1948) 64 L.Q.R. 40). But such a single judge is bound by a decision of a Bench of two or more judges and in the event of his disagreement with such a decision he must refer the case to a Division Bench. (See Khodadat Bibi v. Kamala Ranjan A.I.R. (1940) Calcutta, page 584). A Division Bench of a High Court is bound by decision of a Full Bench until it be over-ruled by the Supreme Court of Pakistan.

The Indian decisions as also the decisions of the Dominions of the Commonwealth and England as even those of the American courts are not judicial precedents in the sense that they are binding as authority upon our courts. But they can, in appropriate cases, have what the lawyers call persuasive value and could usefully be referred to in the enunciation of a principle of law, which the court, while dealing with a situation for which there is no binding precedent available to it, might find it worthwhile to apply. The authority of the judges to make law by means of the reasons given by them for the decision of controversies that come up to them is nowhere laid down in any law. The rule, however, has prevailed if only because it has been tacitly acquiesced in by the Legislature. The ultimate reason which explains the prevalence of the doctrine of the binding value of the judicial precedents, as the Lord Chancellor of England recently put it, is the belief that "our ancestors were not necessarily more stupid than ourselves."

189. Relative merits of the law declared by the Legislature and the Courts

In several ways the law declared by means of a judicial precedent is superior to even that enacted by the legislature. The judicial precedent shows the actual administration of justice at work, whereas legislative enactments can only deal with the enunciation of general provisions leaving to the courts the application of those provisions to the facts and circumstances of each particular case. In the words of Sir John Salmond :

"Legislation is the making of law by the formal and express declaration of new rules by some authority in the body politic which is recognised by the court of law as adequate for that purpose. A precedent, on the other hand, is the making of law by the recognition and application of new rules by the courts themselves in the administration of justice. Enacted law comes into courts ab extra; case law is developed within the courts themselves." (See his "Jurisprudence" p. 153).

There are some writers again who do not accord to the authority of the judicial precedent the value which has been often claimed for it. They contend that the precedent is a hindrance in the way of the logical development of the science of jurisprudence. "Indeed", says Professor Paton, "the doctrine of precedent may mean that unfortunate cases remain to mar logical symmetry". (See his Jurisprudence" p. 163). One fundamental difference between the effect of changes in law secured through legislation and judicial precedent is that whereas a statute may change the law for the future but leave the vested rights untouched, a court can change the law only in the very act of applying it to a case. It is for this reason that in America some courts while following the precedent in the case before them announce that they will not follow it in future.

As a matter of generalisation it would not be wrong to adopt the oft-quoted words of Lord Mansfield as a furnishing a rule of practice upon the question relating to the authority of a precedent to control the course of future adjudications :—"The reason and spirit of cases make law, not the letter of particular precedents", says Lord Mansfield in the case of Fisher v. Prince, (1762), 3 Burr, 1363. A little later the same Judge in Jones v. Randall (1774), —Cwyp. p. 37, said :

"Precedents serve to illustrate principles and to give them a fixed certainty. But the law of England, which is exclusive of positive law, enacted by statute, depends upon principles, and these principles run through all the cases according as the particular circumstances of each have been found to fall within the one or the other of them."

It is wise never to forget that there is no particular virtue in overwhelming a court that is concerned with the practical business of administering justice with a long list of citations; the craze for quoting cases indiscriminately can soon become a snare and not infrequently has been responsible for obstructing the orderly growth of law itself. Every precedent is valuable provided it can be shown to be an illustration of some principle. The case is of value as a precedent only for what it means: according to C. K. Allen,

"In and of itself, it means nothing; before it can have any relevance to the matter in hand, it must be interpreted; the principle which it embodies, or which it is said to embody, must be brought into logical correlation with the principle on which the decision of the instant case is to depend." (See his "Law in the Making," 5th Edition, page 211).

On the one hand, we have to secure consistency of the present determination with the past (and we have to this end realise that men living in a society ruled by law enter into contracts, acquire rights, incur obligations upon the rational expectation that the law would continue to be what it has been declared to be by Courts of competent jurisdiction) and, on the other hand, we have to accommodate the growth of law itself within the framework of a fast changing society.

These conflicting attitudes, namely that of the essential conservatism which distrusts all novelty and change on the one hand and the progressive outlook that is prepared to accept the logic of a changing society as necessitating consequential changes in law on the other are reflected in the remarks of the two judges (Denning and Asquith) quoted below.

(a) In the case of Candler v. Crane, Christmas & Co. (1951) 1 K.B. 164: (1951) 1 All E.R. 426 Denning L.J. in his dissenting judgment disposed of the contention that no action had ever been allowed for negligent statements and he urged that this want of authority was a reason against it for being allowed now. "This argument about the novelty of the action", said the learned Judge, (p. 432) "does not appeal to me. It has been put forward in all the great cases which have been milestones of progress in our law, and it has nearly always been rejected. If one reads Ashby v. White, (1703) 2 Ld. Raymond 938; Pasley v. Freeman (1789), 3 Term. Rep. 51, and Donoghue v. Stevenson (1932) A.C. 562, one finds that in each of them the Judges were divided in opinion. On the one side there were the timorous souls who were fearful of allowing a new cause of action. On the other side there were the bold spirits who were ready to allow it if justice so required. It was fortunate for the Common Law that the progressive view prevailed."

(b) Different, however, was the attitude of Asquith L.J., who observed in the same case, "I am not concerned with defending the existing state of the law or contending that it is strictly logical. It clearly is not—but I am merely recording what I think it is. If this relegates me to the company of 'timorous souls', I must face that consequence with such fortitude as I can command."

Judicial loyalty no doubt demands devotion to 'precedent,' but this is not the same thing as saying that there should be a slavish submission to the authority of precedent to such an extent that it may throttle and completely paralyse the prospect of our law ever keeping pace with the changing conditions of society. "The object of Common Law is to solve difficulties", says McCardie J., "and adjust relations in social and commercial life. It must meet, so far as it can, sets of facts abnormal as well as usual. It must grow with the development of Nation. It must face and deal with changing or novel circumstances; unless it can do that it fails in its functions and declines in its dignity and value. An expanding society demands an expanding common law." [Prager v. Blatspiel, Stamp & Heacock Ltd. (1924), 1 K.B. 566].

Any relevant judgment of any superior court cited at the Bar is a strong argument in favour of the view which could be seen reflected in that judgment, and the Court of law before which such a judgment is cited is duty bound to see if it could extract "the timber of principle from the forest of its facts." It must scrutinise the total scheme of the argument upon which the conclusion reached in the case cited appears to be grounded. The legal reason for deciding the case can emerge only from a careful consideration of the facts found in the case and the circumstances in which its enunciation has taken place. Dove-tailed with the central core of the legal reasoning would be found what are called obiter dicta, i.e. judicial opinions, opinions the expression of which was not strictly necessary for the determination of the controversy before the Court. These dictas are of varying degrees of persuasive force, and no hard and fast rule as to the controlling efficaciousness of the assertions contained in them can be laid down. In the case of Slack v. Leeds Industrial Co-operative Society (1923), 1 Ch. 431, Sterndale M.R. observed:

"Dicta are of different kinds and of varying degrees of weight. Sometimes they may be called almost casual expressions of opinion upon a point which has not been raised in the case, and is not really present to the judge's mind. Such dicta, though entitled to the respect due to the speaker, may fairly be disregarded by judges before whom the point has been raised and argued in a way to bring it under much fuller consideration. Some dicta, however, are of a different kind; they are, although not necessary for the decision of the case, deliberate expressions of opinion given after consideration upon a point clearly brought and argued before the Court. It is open, no doubt, to other judges to give decisions contrary to such dicta, but much greater weight attaches to them than to the former class."

The comment of C. K. Allen on the value of the foregoing statement is instructive and represents in the opinion of the present writer the best that has been said upon the pragmatic utility of drawing academic distinctions between these diverse aspects of the meaning of obiter dicta:

"These distinctions sound admirably clear-cut in the abstract; but how apply a qualitative standard in the concrete? How distinguish between 'deliberate expressions of opinion given after consideration' and mere 'statements by the way'? By what test is an expression of judicial opinion a mere 'aside' or 'one of the links in the chain of reasoning'? A judgment, especially in higher courts where there is more time and opportunity for consideration—and sometimes for prolixity—is not always a chain; it is more like a fabric woven out of all kinds of different materials, and it is frequently difficult to determine exactly what ingredients were essential to its warp and woof. Whoever is called on to make the analysis must exercise his individual faculty of discrimination and no stereotyped rules can dispense him from that delicate task."

190. How to Determine the Ratio Decidendi of a Case

We would, to begin with, notice some of the important definitions that have been offered by prominent English Jurists, of terms like Ratio Decidendi and Obiter Dicta with a view to discovering the rules by resort to which the binding authority of a judicial precedent and its application to the facts of a given case could be determined:

(a) Stephen.

(1) "The underlying principles of a judicial decision", says Stephen in his Commentaries on the Laws of England, Vol. I, p. 11, "which forms its authoritative element for the future, is termed Ratio Decidendi. It is contrasted with an Obiter Dictum, or that part of a judgment which consists of the expression of the Judge's opinion on a point of law which is not directly raised by the issue between the litigants. Obiter Dicta are often valuable, though not binding, statements of the law."

(b) Salmond.

(2) Sir John Salmond in his Jurisprudence says (at p. 191) :

"A precedent, therefore, is a judicial decision which contains in itself a principle. The underlying principle which thus forms its authoritative element is often termed the ratio decidendi. The concrete decision is binding between the parties to it, but it is the abstract ratio decidendi which alone has the force of law as regards the world at large."

(c) Professor Gray.

(3) So also Professor Chipman Gray says in his book 'Nature and the Sources of Law', about a judicial precedent (p. 261) :

"It must be observed that at common law not every opinion expressed by a judge forms a judicial precedent. In order that an opinion may have the weight of a precedent, two things must concur: it must be, in the first place, an opinion given by a judge, and, in the second place, it must be an opinion the formation of which is necessary for the decision of a particular case; in other words, it must not be obiter dictum."

(d) C. K. Allen.

(4) Similarly, Professor C. K. Allen, in his 'Law in the Making' says (at 241) :

"Any judgment of any court is authoritative only as to that part of it, called the ratio decidendi, which is considered to have been necessary to the decision of the actual issue between the litigants. It is for the Court, of whatever degree, which is called upon to consider the precedent, to determine what the true ratio decidendi was."

From Halsbury's Laws of England.

- (5) In Halsbury's Laws of England (Volume 19, Second Ed., para 556), the rule is stated as follows :

"It may be laid down as a general rule that that part alone of a decision of a court of law is binding upon courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction and inferior courts which consists of the enunciation of the reason or principle upon which the question before the court has really been determined. This underlying principle which forms the only authoritative element of a precedent is often termed the ratio decidendi."

Lord
observations

Although from the foregoing statements of what ratio decidendi of a case is, the general idea as to what that term means in jurisprudence can easily be gathered, the fact remains that in the actual process of extracting the legal reason responsible for the decision of a given case from a judgment, a great deal of legal sagacity is required. In the case of Great Western Railway Co. v. Owners of S. S. Mostyn, (1928) A.C. 57 at 73, Lord Dunedin in his dissenting speech in the House of Lords remarked upon the unsatisfactory manner in which the court of appeal had attempted to re-construct the ratio decidendi from a previous decision of the House of Lords: "If from the opinions delivered it is clear—as is the case in most instances—what the ratio decidendi was which led to the judgment, then that ratio decidendi is also binding. But if it is not clear, then I do not think it is part of the Tribunal's duty to spell out with great difficulty a ratio decidendi in order to be bound by it. That is what the Court of Appeal has done here. With great hesitation they have added the opinion of Lord Heatherley to that of Lord Cairns, and then, with still greater difficulty to that of Lord Blackburn, and so have secured what they think was a majority in favour of Lord Cairn's very clear view. I do not think that the respect which they hold and have expressed for the judgments of your Lordships' House compelled them to go through this difficult and most unsatisfactory performance."

In a Lecture delivered before the University of London, in 1930, entitled "Determining the Ratio Decidendi of a Case", Professor A. L. Goodhart surveyed the entire range of the law on the subject and summarised the principles in his concluding part of that lecture as follows:

"Before summarising the rules suggested above, two possible criticisms must be considered. It may be said that a doctrine which finds the principle of a case in its material facts leaves us with hardly any general legal principles, for facts are infinitely various. It is true that facts are infinitely various, but the material facts which are usually found in a particular legal relationship are strictly limited. Thus the fact that there must be consideration in a simple contract is a single material fact although the kinds of consideration are unlimited. Again, if 'A' builds a reservoir on Blackacre, and 'B' builds one on Whiteacre, the owners, buildres, reservoirs, and fields are different. But the material fact that a person has built a reservoir on his land is in each case the same. Of course a court can always avoid a precedent by finding that an additional fact is material, but if it does so without reason the result leads to confusion in the law. Such an argument assumes, moreover, that courts are disingenuous and arbitrary. Whatever may have been true in the past, it is clear that at the present day English courts do not attempt to circumvent the law in this way."

"The second criticism may be stated as follows: If we are bound by the facts as seen by the Judge, may not this enable him deliberately or by inadvertance to decide a case which was not before him by basing his decision upon facts stated by him as real and material but actually non-existent? Can his conclusion in such a case be anything more than a dictum? Can a judge, by making a mistake, give himself authority to decide what is in effect a hypothetical case? The answer to this interesting question is that the whole doctrine of precedent is based on the theory that as a general rule judges do not make mistakes either of fact or of law. In an exceptional case a judge may in error base his conclusion on a non-existent fact, but it is better to suffer this mistake, which may prove of benefit to the law as a whole, however painful its results may have been to the individual litigant, than to throw doubt on every precedent on which our law is based.

"The rules for finding the principle of a case can, therefore, be summarised as follows :—

- (1) The principle of a case is not found in the reasons given in the opinion.
- (2) The principle is not found in the rule of law set forth in the opinion.
- (3) The principle is not necessarily found by a consideration of all the ascertainable facts of the case, and the judge's decision.
- (4) The principle of the case is found by taking account: (a) of the facts treated by the judge as material, and (b) his decision as based on them.
- (5) In finding the principle it is also necessary to establish what facts were held to be immaterial by the judge, for the principle may depend as much on exclusion as it does on inclusion.

"The rules for finding what facts are material and what facts are immaterial as seen by the Judge, are as follows :—

- (1) All facts of person, time, place, kind and amount are immaterial unless stated to be material.
- (2) If there is no opinion, or the opinion gives no facts, then all other facts in the record must be treated as material.
- (3) If there is an opinion, then the facts as stated in the opinion are conclusive and cannot be contradicted from the record.
- (4) If the opinion omits a fact which appears in the record this may be due either to (a) oversight, or (b) an implied finding that the fact is immaterial. The second will be assumed to be the case in the absence of other evidence.
- (5) All facts which the judge specifically states are immaterial, must be considered immaterial.
- (6) All facts which the judge impliedly treats as immaterial must be considered immaterial.
- (7) All facts which the judge specifically states to be material must be considered material.
- (8) If the opinion does not distinguish between material and immaterial facts then all the facts set forth must be considered material.
- (9) If in a case there are several opinions which agree as to the result but differ as to the material facts, then the principle of the case is limited so as to fit the sum of all the facts held material by the various judges.
- (10) A conclusion based on a hypothetical fact is a dictum. By hypothetical fact is meant any fact the existence of which has not been determined or accepted by the judge."

The first step then is to determine the material facts on which the judge has based his opinion. Having found the material facts, the ratio decidendi would be easy of discernment—it would be the conclusion reached by the Judges on the basis of the material facts and the exclusion of immaterial facts. Professor Paton is, therefore, right when he points out that "no court has the power to lay down a binding rule of law on facts which are not before it. To discover whether the ratio is binding in a subsequent case we must see if the material facts are identical. If they are not, then the first decision is not binding on the court that deals with the second. This close emphasis on material facts distinguishes the English attitude to decided cases from that of continental jurists who in general regard a judgment as a theoretical answer to a rather abstract question of law. English law is thus averse to pre-mature generalization—it prefers to go cautiously forward step by step." (See his Jurisprudence pp. 159-160). The doctrine of the binding value of a judicial precedent is one of the distinguishing features of the common law of England, which as a system of law has been built up by the Judges from case to case. "The life of law", said Holmes, "has not been Logic: it has been experience. (The Common Law—1938 Ed. p. 1 cited by Lord Macmillan in Read v. J. Lyons & Co. Ltd. (1947) A.C. 156.) The foregoing views of Professor Goodhart have been commented upon in 20 Modern Law Review (1957) at p. 124 by Professor J. L. Montrose who is Professor of Law in the Queen's University Belfast and there is a criticism of Mr. Montrose's views offered by Simpson to be found in 20 Modern Law Review at p. 413 as also a reply thereto by Professor Montrose in 20 Modern Law Review at p. 587. A study of these recent articles would show that the thesis of Professor Goodhart has not till this day, been successfully controverted and may therefore be taken as the one which still dominates the growth of Commonwealth Jurisprudence on this subject.

Conclusion.

SECTION — II

Constitutional Limits on Judicial Power in Specified Matters

(A)—JUDICIAL POWER AND ACTIONS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT

191. A comment on ART. 136

Part VIII of our Constitution, in ART. 136, provides:

"The Federal Government may sue and be sued by the name of Pakistan, and the Government of a Province may sue and be sued by the name of the Province."

This Article sets forth not only the form in which suits concerning actions against Government are to be brought, but it also affirms the principle that the subject is entitled to have redress in the ordinary courts of law against Government. This Article corresponds to S. 176 of the Government of India Act 1935, and with some minor differences to ART. 300 of the Indian Constitution.

The words "sue and be sued", appearing in ART. 136, are not used in any technical or narrow sense of a civil proceedings which is instituted by the presentation of a plaint, but include all proceedings which may be deemed appropriate, either under the Constitution or law, for enforcing rights which an individual may have against Government, and the term "sue" in the context of this Article means the enforcement of any claim or civil right by means of legal proceedings. That anyhow was the view that was taken by the Supreme Court of India in the case of Province of Bombay v. Khushal Das (1950), Supreme Court page 222, of the meaning of that term used in ART. 300.

"When a right is in jeopardy", said Mahajan J. in Khushal Das's case (1950), S.C. p. 222, "then any proceedings that can be adopted to put it out of jeopardy would fall within the expression 'sue'. Any remedy that can be taken to vindicate the right is included within the expression." (p. 236)

Ordinarily, the sovereign power of the state, in the strict theory of constitutional law could not be visualised as being amenable to the jurisdiction and authority of the courts set up by it to administer justice. But the same sovereign power, by means of a constitutional declaration, can surrender itself at the altar of the Courts for the purpose of conferring rights on the subjects to enforce any of their claims and rights whenever they are thrown in jeopardy by the Government—which term, in this context is to be regarded as meaning a political organization through which the sovereign will of the State finds its expression.

The courts of law derive their jurisdiction and authority from the State itself, and in the total absence of a declaration by the sovereign power enabling them so to do, they cannot claim any authority to pronounce any judgment that may be binding upon the State. ART. 136 thus contains an intimation by the sovereign power to the courts that Government agencies and other administrative authorities will be amenable to its jurisdiction and control in matters arising out of any litigation validly commenced by any aggrieved person. And true to the federal principle, the Article mentions not only the competence of the individuals to sue the Federal Government, that is Pakistan, but also the Government of a Province. Each of these two Governments has independent powers under the constitution within the system of federal polity established by our Constitution and each one of them has an independent juristic existence.

In England before the passing of the Crown Proceeding Act of the year 1947 (10 and 11 George VI, C. 44) the constitutional position, in relation to proceedings against the Crown, was that these could not be initiated in the ordinary courts of law by means of a suit but only by means of what is called a petition of right, and the proceedings thus initiated were regulated by special forms of procedure.

Position

The evolution of our procedural law on this subject takes its start from the doctrine of common law which says that "the King can do no wrong", and that, as a matter of procedure, no action can lie in the King's Courts against the Crown. The statement of this common law doctrine as appearing in Ridg's Constitutional Law, 8th Edition, at page 295 is in the following terms:

"The Crown, therefore, at common law enjoyed a very wide immunity. No action could be brought against it. Nor was it liable in tort and though liability might exist on a Crown contract, it could only be enforced indirectly by a petition of right. The Crown also was immune from liability in respect of any property it owned; nor could proceedings be taken if the Crown committed a breach of a statutory duty. This immunity extended not only to the King personally but to the Crown in its widest sense; i.e. to any part of the central government departments. It did not apply to local government authorities or to independent statutory bodies like the Assistance Board, the London Passenger Transport Board or the Wheat Commission. It did not extend to Crown servants personally; they were always liable and it was no defence to plead that they were acting on the Crown's orders, but the Crown itself was not liable for its servants' torts in circumstances that would have made a private employer liable. Nor was a superior Crown servant liable for the acts of his inferiors; both in law were fellow servants of the Crown, though in fact the former controlled the latter just as if the private relationship of employer and employee existed."

Crown Proceedings Act.

Under the Crown Proceedings Act, which came in force on January 1, 1948, this common law position has undergone revolutionary changes and now, not only the procedural rule, which demanded the commencement of proceedings by means of a petition of right, has been abrogated but under section 2 it has been provided that:

"the Crown shall be subject to all those liabilities in tort to which, if it were a private person of full age and capacity, it would be subject in respect of torts committed by its servants or agents or for any breach of those duties which a master owes to his servants or agents at common law or in respect of any breach of the duties attaching at common law to the ownership, occupation, possession or control of property."

Historical account of the growth of prevailing constitutional position.

On the transfer of the sovereign power from the East India Company to the Crown, in S. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1858, the liability of the Secretary of State in Council was stated in the following terms:

"The Secretary of State in Council shall and may sue and be sued as well in India as in England by the name of the Secretary of State in Council as a body corporate; and all persons and bodies politic shall and may have and take the same suits, remedies and proceedings, legal and equitable, against the Secretary of State in Council of India as they could have done against the said Company; and the property and effects thereby vested in Her Majesty for the purposes of the Government of India, or acquired for the said purposes, shall be subject and liable to the same judgments and executions as they would, while vested in the said Company, have been liable to in respect of debts and liabilities lawfully contracted and incurred by the said Company."

In order to find out whether a suit of a particular kind would lie against the Government under the authority of S. 65, resort must be had to answering another question first: namely, whether the given suit is of such a character as would have been successfully instituted against the East India Company prior to the Government of India Act of 1858. This principle of S. 65 of the Act of 1858 was reiterated in subsequent Acts by the British Parliament. (See S.32 of the Act of 1919, and S.176 of the Government of India Act, 1935). An authoritative statement of the constitutional position concerning the nature of causes in respect of which suits would have been validly instituted against the East India Company prior to the Government of India Act, 1858 is to be found in the case of Secretary of State in Council of India v. Kamachee Boye Sahaba (1859), 7 Moo Ind. App. 476, where Lord Kingsdown observed (at p. 530):

"The careful and able review of the several Charters and Acts of Parliament bearing upon the subject which they had the advantage of hearing at the Bar, has satisfied them that the law, as it stood in the year 1839, is accurately stated in the following passage in the judgment of Chief Justice Tindal in the case of Gibson v. The East India Company. (5 Bingh, N.C. 273 (1839), 132 E.R. 1105) 'in which, after referring to various legislative enactments, he observed that from these it is manifest that the East India Company have been invested with powers and privileges of a two-fold nature, perfectly distinct from each other; namely, powers to carry on trade as merchants, and (subject only to the prerogative of the Crown, to be exercised by the Board of Commissioners for the affairs of India), power to acquire and retain and govern territory, to raise and maintain armed forces by sea and land, and to make peace or war with the Native powers of India.'

It is this dual character of the powers of the East India Company that have introduced an element of uncertainty in the interpretation of the law and such of the judicial precedents as have been considered applicable by the courts from time to time. One of the oft-quoted cases on the subject is that wherein Sir Barnes Peacock, Chief Justice, set forth the law on the subject: See the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Secretary of State for India (1861), 5 Bombay High Court Reports (App.-A) page 1. The conclusion reached was (p. 15-16):

"We are of opinion that the East India Company were not sovereign, and, therefore, could not claim all the exemptions of a sovereign; and that they were not the public servants of Government, and, therefore, did not fall under the purview of the cases with regard to the liabilities of such persons; but they were a company to whom sovereign powers were delegated, and who traded on their own account and for their own benefit and were engaged in transactions partly for the purpose of Government and partly on their own account, which, without any delegation of sovereign rights, might be carried on by private individuals. There is a great and clear distinction between acts done in the exercise of what are usually termed sovereign powers, and acts done in the conduct of undertaking which might be carried on by private individuals without having such powers delegated to them."

"But where an act is done, or a contract is entered into, in the exercise of powers usually called sovereign powers, by which we mean powers which cannot be lawfully exercised except by a sovereign, or private individual delegated by a Sovereign to exercise them, no action will lie."

In each case, therefore, the question was whether what was done by Government was such that if it had been done by the East India Company before 1858 an action would have lain against it. In the case of Venkata Rao v. Secretary of State, (1937) Privy Council p. 31, their Lordships observed that S. 32 of the Government of India Act, 1915, was merely procedural and "it did not take any right simply because an identical right of action was not available against the East India Company." Following this dictum, in all the later cases that have a bearing on the interpretation of S. 176 of the Government of India Act, 1935, one finds that it has been consistently held that that section was merely procedural and did not confer upon the Government any absolute immunity from illegal acts. It was observed in the case of

Secretary of State vs. Kamachee Boye Sahaba's case.

Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas, (1950) Supreme Court, p. 222 by way of a comment on the observations of Sir Barnes Peacock in the Peninsular case referred to above:

"In that case the only point for consideration was whether in the case of a tort committed in the conduct of a business the Secretary of State for India could be sued. The question was answered in the affirmative. Whether he could be sued in cases not connected with the conduct of a business or commercial undertaking was not really a question for the Court to decide." (p. 249)

Difference between Indian Art. 300 and our Art. 136.

If the foregoing appreciation of the decision is correct, it must follow that our ART. 136 is also merely procedural in content and the nature of the right to sue must be deduced from the state of pre-existing law on the subject. There is, however, one important difference between the Indian ART. 300 and our ART. 136 and this should not be lost sight of: our Article, by way of contrast with the Indian ART. 300, is worded in such a way as to practically annul the old limitations on the right of the subjects to sue the Government. It is interesting to contrast the language of ART. 300 of the Indian Constitution with our own : "ART. 300 (1) The Government of India may sue or be sued by the name of the Union of India and the Government of a State may sue or be sued by the name of the State and may, subject to any provisions which may be made by Act of Parliament or of the Legislature of such State enacted by virtue of powers conferred by this Constitution, sue or be sued in relation to their respective affairs in the like cases as the Dominion of India and the corresponding Provinces or the corresponding Indian States might have sued or been sued if this Constitution had not been enacted."

(2) If at the commencement of this Constitution—

- any legal proceedings are pending to which the Dominion of India is a party, the Union of India shall be deemed to be substituted for the Dominion in those proceedings; and
- any legal proceedings are pending to which a Province or an Indian State is a party, the corresponding State shall be deemed to be substituted for the Province or the Indian State in those proceedings.

Thus it would appear that the pre-existing state of the law in regard to actions against Government has been preserved in a constitutional form in ART. 300 itself, whereas these words of limitations are not reflected in our ART. 136. But, nevertheless, under our constitution, the pre-Constitution limitations imposed by the state of pre-existing law on the character and qualifications of the right to sue the Government have been perpetuated in our Constitution by ART. 224, and the history of the evolution of the law appearing on the subject of the right to sue is therefore equally relevant, except in so far as that pre-existing law was conditioned by the limitations imposed upon the right to sue government by the language of various Government Acts (like S. 65 of 1858, S. 32 of 1919 and S. 76 of 1935). Anyhow that pre-existing state of law is now, having regard to the unfettered language of ART. 136, to be re-interpreted by our courts. In India the pre-existing limitations on the nature of right to sue in this respect are removable only by Acts of appropriate legislature.

It would be conducive to the clarity of exposition of this aspect of the constitutional problem if we were to take up the liability of the Government to be sued ex contractu separately, from its liability to be sued in respect of torts committed by its servants.

Liability of Government Ex Contractu

In view of the fact that ART. 134 confers on the Federal and the Provincial Government the right to acquire and dispose of property and to make contracts (as even ART. 135, which prescribes the forms in which those contracts by the two Governments have to be entered into) it must follow that the liability of the Government to be sued in respect of breaches of contract committed by it is absolute and unqualified. No doubt, Sir Barnes Peacock had referred to the non-suability of Government in respect of breaches of contracts entered into in the exercise of Government's sovereign powers, but this legal position has not been accepted in later decisions in India. (See the remarks of Mukherjea J. in Khushaldas Advani's case 1950 S.C. 222 and also State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid. A.I.R. (1954) S.C. (India), 245, See also Venkata Rao v. Secretary of State, (1937) P.C. 31, and High Commissioner for India v. I. M. Lall, (1948) P.C. 121).

Of course, there may be some statutory conditions or limitations that may be imposed in respect of a particular contract, in which case, however, those conditions and limitations have to be given their due effect, but, in so far as the Constitution is concerned, the contractual liability of the State appears to be placed on par with that of an ordinary individual under the ordinary law of contract. (See Comment on ART. 135).

In so far as the liability of the State for actionable wrongs committed by its servants (that is wrongs independent of contract) is concerned, the legal position does not appear to be so clear: the difficulties do arise while effecting a proper division between the acts of Government that may be regarded as sovereign acts and other acts. Since there is no clear definition of what are sovereign acts, beyond, of course, a somewhat negative definition offered by Sir Barnes Peacock quoted earlier, it becomes difficult in each case to determine this issue. The law, however, is that in respect of its sovereign acts a Government is immune from being sued in a court of law. The reasons in support of this immunity are historical in character and they are to be traced back to the provisions of S. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1858, whereunder, for an action to lie against Government, the test laid down was that the person aggrieved must satisfy the court that a suit in respect of that act could have been competently instituted against the East India Company. Some specific instances of what are sovereign acts can be gathered from the following decisions:

- Kessoram v. Secretary of State*, 54 Calcutta, page 969: AIR (1928) Cal. 74;
- Secretary of State v. Cockraft*, 39 Madras, page 351: AIR (1915) Mad. 993;
- Mata Prasad v. Secretary of State*, 5 Lucknow, page 157: AIR (1931) Oudh, 29;
- Kader Zailany v. Secretary of State*, (1931) 9 Rangoon page 375: AIR (1931) Rangoon 294; etc.;

Where, however, Government engages itself through its public servants into transactions which could be entered into by private individuals, any legal injury arising out of those transactions would give rise to an action in tort in favour of the party aggrieved and the Government can be successfully sued in respect of such wrongs committed by its servants. It was on this principle that the Government was held liable in the Peninsular case in the judgment of Sir Barnes Peacock referred to above. Similarly, trespass upon or damage done to private property in the course of a dispute as to a right to land between Government and the private owner is actionable. See Secretary of State v. Moment, (1912) 40 Indian Appeal, page 48. This was a case decided by the Privy Council upon an appeal from the Chief Court of Lower Burma in which the Peninsular case decided by Sir Barnes Peacock was approved. In this case, it should be noted, S.41(b) of Act IV of 1898 of Burma was the subject matter of their Lordship's interpretation. The Section enacted that no Civil Court was to have jurisdiction to determine a claim to any right over land as against the Government, and the proceedings out of which the appeal arose related to an ordinary dispute about the title to the land in the course of which there emerged a claim to damages for wrongful interference with the plaintiffs' property. Their Lordships addressed themselves to the question, whether a suit of this character would have lain against the Company, and the reasons for holding that such a suit would have lain were in their Lordships opinion "fully explained in the judgment of Sir Barnes Peacock C.J. in the Peninsular case", (1861) 5

Secretary of State vs. Moment 40 I.A. 48.

Bombay H.C. Reports (App.-A) p. 1. Their Lordships, however, observed with regard to the effect of S.65 as follows :—

"Their Lordships are of opinion that the effect of S.65 of the Act of 1858 was to debar the Government of India from passing any Act which could prevent a subject from suing the Secretary of State in Council in a Civil Court in any case in which he could have similarly sued the East India Company. They think that the words cannot be construed in any different sense without reading into them a qualification which is not there, and which may well have been deliberately omitted. The section is not, like the two which follow it, a merely transitory section. It appears, judging from the language employed, to have been inserted for the purpose of making it clear that the subject was to have the right of so suing and was to retain that right in the future, or at least until the British Parliament should take it away. It may well be that the Indian Government can legislate validly about the formalities of procedure so long as they preserve the substantial right of the subject to sue the Government in the Civil Courts like any other defendant, and do not violate the fundamental principle that the Secretary of State, even as representing the Crown, is to be in no position different from that of the old East India Company. But the question before their Lordships is not one of procedure. It is whether the Government of India can by legislation take away the right to proceed against it in a Civil Court in a case involving a right over land. Their Lordships have come to the clear conclusion that the language of S.65 of the Act of 1858 renders such legislation ultra vires."

In a later Indian case, the legal position was stated somewhat comprehensively by Chakravarti J., in the case of Uday Chand v. Province of Bengal, I.L.R. (1947) 2 Calcutta page 141; and the student is referred to a careful study of that decision since it illustrates forcefully the distinction between the acts done in the discharge of sovereign and non-sovereign functions.

With regard to the nature of the non-sovereign functions it was stated that they:

"are mercantile operations or operations of like kind in which the East India Company actually engaged itself before and even after it had acquired sovereignty. The reason why an action lies against the Crown with reference to acts of this type is, on the one hand, a historical reason, because, actions could in fact be brought against the East India Company at the relevant time, and on the other hand, a statutory reason, because a specific provision, saying the right of action in such cases, has been made in all the successive Government of India Acts."

And as to the acts performed in the exercise of sovereign powers, it was observed that they:

"are acts of State, properly so called, such as making a treaty, commandeering private property for war purposes, or quelling civil disturbances. Such acts are never justiciable in Courts of Law, and since the Crown itself is not answerable for such acts in Courts, there is no principle upon which it could be made liable for the acts of its officers or subordinates. The immunity is absolute."

"The other class of acts are those which are done under the sanction of some municipal law or statute and in exercise of powers thereby conferred."

The question for consideration is whether this distinction between "sovereign" and "non-sovereign" functions for the purpose of deciding upon the maintainability of certain forms of actions against Government can any longer be acknowledged as flowing from any of the provisions embodied in our Constitution. In view of the fact that the concept of social welfare state is visualised by our Constitution, and the Government is continually engaged in expanding the sphere of its activities in directions in which it increasingly encroaches upon the sphere of individual's rights, can it any longer be said that the age-old distinction between the sovereign acts performed by the State and the acts of a mere trading or mercantile character countenanced by it should still be maintained. There would be undoubtedly a class of actions which cannot be judicially entertained, as, for example:

- (a) anything done or omitted by a person exercising judicial function, (see S. 1 of Act XVIII of 1950—An Act for the protection of Judicial Officers). The basis of this immunity of Judges from action at the instance of private individuals is that the State interest in justice being done is best furthered if all the participants are able to speak freely without fear of consequences. The rule, as Holdsworth has shown (See Immunity for Judicial Acts in J.S.P.T.L. (1924) p. 17) was first applied to the Judges of the Courts of record and would seem now to apply even to the Judges of inferior Courts if there is an error of law committed by them in the exercise of jurisdiction validly assumed by them—in other words, the excess of jurisdiction is not within the rule of judicial immunity. The question, whether the rule has any application to the Judges of administrative tribunal, cannot be answered satisfactorily for the simple reason that from the decided cases in England and America no clear-cut principle can be deduced. (See Co-partnership Farms v. Harvey Smith (1918) 2 K.B. 405; Attwood v. Chapman (1914) 3 K.B. 275; Collins v. Henry Whiteway (1927) 2 K.B. 378 at 383 for the credentials that the administrative tribunal must present before it can be within the rule.) The test in each case would appear to be this: Does the presiding officer of the judicial tribunal perform or purport to perform or discharge the duties or responsibilities of a judicial nature vested in them? (See S.2(5) of the Crown Proceedings Act as also the American Federal Statute of the year 1938 (52 Stat. 338).
- (b) acts of the State; (see the discussion of this principle at pp. 621-623)
- (c) injury sustained by a member of Armed Forces while on duty; (The theory of law which seems to account for this immunity seems to be that there is no contract of service between the Crown and the soldier. But it is suggested that existence of contract is not necessary to establish the basis of liability which can also arise from the common law relationship of master and servant, for admittedly the Crown has control over the services of the soldier. (See The Commonwealth v. Quince (1944) 68 C.L.R. 227; Shaw Savill & Albion Co. Ltd., v. The Commonwealth (1940) 66 C.L.R. 344; Rex v. Anthony (1946) 3 D.L.R. 577.
- (d) anything properly done or omitted to be done in pursuance of statutory powers conferred on public servants. (Immunity in this class of cases is often statutorily provided).

These exceptions are visualised even by the Crown Proceedings Act of 1947, to which reference has been made earlier. Under the changing conditions of society the extent of the liability of the State must continue to change too.

Even in America, where there is no provision corresponding to the one contained in our Article 136, legislation has been sponsored by the Congress to permit the individual to sue the State. Federal Tort Claims Act of 1946 among other things provides that "The United States shall be liable, respecting the provisions of its title relating to tort claims, in the same manner and to the same extent as a private individual under the like circumstances." The nature of the liability and its extent is also determined by the said Act. (In the 1st, 3rd, 4th, 6th Articles of the Federal Tort Claims Act 1946, the liability is confined to "damage to or loss of property or on account of personal injury or death caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of an employee of the Government while acting in the scope of his employment, under circumstances where the United States, if a private person, would be liable to a claimant for such damage etc.”)

In the United States suits ordinarily cannot be brought against the Federal Government except where consent has been given, and there the Federal Government enjoys the additional immunity against suits by any State unless a consent has been given for the institution of such proceedings by the Federal Government itself. The Federal Government itself is, however, competent to sue any State without the latter's consent. (See Cf. Georgia v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., (1945) 324 U.S. p. 439: 89 Law. Ed. 1051.)

But even in United States the opinion seems increasingly to be leaning in favour of permitting citizens to sue the Government without any let or hindrance.

The American law has, to a considerable extent, been influenced in this regard by the English common law doctrine which enjoins that the King can do no wrong, and this principle appears to have been adhered to even after the United States became a sovereign democratic republic. In a recent case the unsatisfactory character of this sort of legal position has been commented upon by Frankfurter J. in a dissenting opinion (see the case of Great Northern Life Insurance Co. v. Read, (1944) 322 U.S. 47: 88 Law. Ed. 1121, at 1129) which deserves being quoted in full.

“The Eleventh Amendment has put state immunity from suit into the Constitution. Therefore, it is not in the power of individuals to bring any State into court—the State's or that of the United States—except with its consent. But consent does not depend on some ritualistic formula. Nor are any words needed to indicate submission to the law of the land. The readiness or reluctance with which courts find such consent has naturally been influenced by prevailing views regarding the moral sanction to be attributed to a State's freedom from suability. Whether this immunity is an absolute survival of the monarchial privilege, or is a manifestation merely of power, or rests on abstract logical grounds, (see Kawanakanakoa v. Polyblank, 205 U.S. 349: 51 L.Ed. 834: 27 S.Ct. 526,) it undoubtedly runs counter to modern democratic notions of the moral responsibility of the State. Accordingly, courts reflect a strong legislative momentum in their tendency to extend the legal responsibility of Government and to confirm Maitland's belief, expressed nearly fifty years ago, that ‘it is a wholesome sight to see ‘the Crown' sued and answering for its torts. 3 Maitland, Collected Papers, 263’.

It is submitted that the distinction between the sovereign and non-sovereign acts of the Government has lost much of its meaning and now that there is no constitutional impediment which can be invoked as standing in the way of its elimination, it must not be given any judicial recognition or effect whatever. The position in India and our country, as reflected in the two Articles, (300 of the Indian Constitution, and 136 of our Constitution) has already been adverted to above and it would appear that the liability of the Government to be sued under our Constitution is more extensive in its scope than under the Indian Constitution till at least such time as by means of appropriate legislation it is interfered with and altered.

192. A comment on ART. 135

Formal requirements in a valid contract with Government.

ART. 135 of our Constitution prescribes the formal requirements of contracts which are to be entered into by a person with the Federation or Province when made in the exercise of the executive authority reserved to them under the Constitution. S. 175 of the Government of India Act, 1935, was the Constitutional predecessor of the present Article and the decisions of the courts that have interpreted that section, as even S.30(2) of the (Repealed) Government of India Act, 1919 which in turn was based upon the Government of India Act, 1858 (22 & 23 Victoria Chapter XLII), would be of assistance in the interpretation of the present Article. On analysis, the requirements of a valid contract with the Government are the following:

- (a) That it should be expressed to be made by the President or the Governor (according as it is done by the Federation or the Province);
- (b) that it should be executed on behalf of the President or the Governor;
- (c) that it should be executed by such person and in such manner as it may be authorised by the President or the Governor.

The language of the Article is mandatory: in other words any failure to comply with these requirements would affect the validity of the contract. (See City of Bombay v. Secretary of State for India-in-Council, I.L.R. 29 Bombay 580; Kessaram Podder & Co. v. Secretary of State for India, I.L.R. 54 Calcutta 969; Secretary of State v. The Chettyar Firm of S.R.M.M. R.M. & others, I.L.R. 4 Rangoon 291; Secretary of State v. G.T. Sarin & Co., I.L.R. 11 Lahore 375; and Devi Prasad v. Secretary of State, A.I.R. (1941) Allahabad 377.) These decisions were under the previous Acts of Parliament noticed earlier, and on the view of Lord Blackburn, namely that where the Act of Parliament has received a certain Judicial interpretation putting a certain meaning on its words and the legislature in subsequent Act in para materia has the same words, it would be presumed that the legislature expresses the same meaning which it knew had been put upon the words before, (See Mersey Docks v. Cameron, 1865, 11 H.L. case 443 at 480. See also Webb v. Outram 1907, A.C. 81, and Barras v. Aberdeen Trawling & Fishing Co. 1933 A.C. 402), and the decision would be considered relevant and binding for the interpretation of such a statutory language.

If a contract is unenforceable because it does not comply with the requirements of ART. 135, the result would not be that it is void but only that Government cannot be sued and there is nothing which would prevent the Government from ratifying the contract. [See Chatturbuj v. Moreshwar Parashram, (1954) S.C. 236]. Under the general law no form of a contract is prescribed, but under the present Article it would appear that a contract with the Government to be valid must be in writing, and must be expressed to be made by the President or Governor, etc. In Secretary of State v. Bhagwandas reported in AIR (1938) Bom. 168 Beaumont C.J. said that an agreement made by correspondence can comply with the section; this observation was obiter, but, it is pointed out, with respect, the same is in accord with the principle and may well be accepted. It would appear that each of the documents which taken in their totality furnish evidence of the existence of a contract must make it clear that the President or the Governor, as the case may be, is the principal with whom the other party is dealing, and the officer actually dealing is acting on behalf of the President or the Governor, as the case may be,

(B) THE JUDICIAL POWER AND THE ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION

193. The Concept of Rule of law & the Act of State

The rule of law demands that before, by means of an administrative decree, people's rights could be interfered with, the authority to issue the decree must be shown as flowing from the will of the Legislature as manifested in its enactments. In England, as also in India and in this country, this view of the rule of law is the foundation on which the authority of the courts to control administrative actions and to undertake a judicial review of them is based. There are several aspects of this highly intricate conception of the relation of the judicial power to the executive acts of administrative authorities and agencies which need at least a passing reference. The problem can be studied by considering it as an application of the principle of the rule of law. The authority of the courts to deal with complaints brought before it by means of appropriate proceedings in regard to either an abuse or excessive exercise of administrative action flows from its obligation to enforce the constitution and the law.

Effect of non-compliance with the requirements of Art. 135.

What is
"Act of the State."

As a general proposition of law, the act of the State, as technically understood in the system of our jurisprudence, is not amenable to judicial review by our courts and forms an exception to the power of the courts to review administrative actions. An act of the State is defined by Sir Fitzjames Stephen in his History of Criminal Law as :

"An act injurious to the person or to the property of some person who is not at the time of that act 'a subject of His Majesty; which act is done by any representative of His Majesty's authority, civil or military, and is either previously sanctioned or subsequently ratified by His Majesty.'

And Professor E.C.S. Wade defines it as follows:

"An act of the Executive as a matter of policy performed in the course of its relations with another state, including its relations with the subjects of that state, unless they are temporarily within the allegiance of the Crown." (See his essay on "Act of State in English Law : Its relation with International Law in British Year Book on International Law" (1934) p. 98).

Whenever the executive in pursuit of a policy performs any acts in the course of its relations with another State, including its relation with the subjects of a latter state, its acts cannot be questioned in a court of law. In the leading case of Rustomjee v. The Queen, 1 Q.B.D. page 487, Justice Mr. Blackburn in dealing with a claim arising out of hostilities between Great Britain and China in which a certain guild owned by a claimant in China was abolished, observed:

"I do not think it can possibly be said that when the Queen has, as a high act of State, made a treaty, and received money in consequence of an act of State, the mode of distribution of it is in any way enforceable by a court of law, or subject to the findings of juries, I think there is a moral claim that it be given to the right person, which must be investigated in the manner in which Her Majesty is pleased to direct, and the ministers who direct it would probably be responsible in Parliament if they did it unjustly." (Affirmed in 2 Q.B.D. p. 69, C.A.).

To the same effect are the principles laid down in the case of Secretary of State in Council of India v. Kamatchee Boye Sahaba, (1859) 13 Moor's Priy Council 22: 7 M.I.A. 476 Forester v. Secretary of State for India in Council, (1872), I.A. Sup. 10, as also in Buron v. Denman (1848) 2 Ex. 167 and Johnstone v. Pedlar (1921) 2 A.C. 262. In the case of P.V. Rao v. Khushaldas S. Advani, AIR. (1949) Bombay 277 at p. 287, Justice Chagla repelled the contention that an order for requisitioning of property issued by an officer of Government was in the nature of an act of the state on the plea that it had been done by Government in the exercise of its sovereign authority. His Lordships observed:

"An act of State is different fundamentally from an act of a sovereign authority. An act of State operates extra-territorially. Its legal title is not any municipal law but the over-riding sovereignty of the State. It does not deal with the subjects of the State but deals with aliens or foreigners who cannot seek the protection of the municipal law. It is difficult to conceive of an act of State as between a sovereign and his subjects. If Government justifies its act under colour of title and that title arises from a municipal law, that act can never be an act of State. Its legality and validity must be tested by the municipal law and in municipal courts."

The best statement on the topic of an act of State is contained in a case reported in (1906) 1 K.B. 613, at p. 639 Salaman v. Secretary of State for India:

"An act of State is essentially an exercise of sovereign power, and hence cannot be challenged, controlled, or interfered with by municipal Courts. Its sanction is not that of law, but that of sovereign power, and, whatever it be, municipal Courts must accept it, as it is, without question. But it may, and often must, be part of their duty to take cognizance of it. For instance, if an act is relied upon as being an act of State, and as

v. The Queen.

thus affording an answer to claims made by a subject, the Courts must decide whether it was in truth an act of State, and what was its nature and extent. An example of this is to be found in the case of Forester v. Secretary of State for India in Council, (1872), L.R. Ind. Ap. Supp. Vol. 10. But in such an inquiry the Court must confine itself to ascertaining what the act of State in fact was, and not what in its opinion it ought to have been. In like manner municipal Courts may have to consider the results of acts of State, i.e., their effects on the rights of individuals, and even of the Government itself. Acts of State are not all of one kind; their nature and consequences may differ in an infinite variety of ways, and these differences may profoundly affect the position of municipal Courts with regard to them. For instance, an act of State may fix the relations between two States, each of which continues to possess an independent existence. The consequences of such an act of State are entirely beyond the cognizance of municipal Courts, because they do not administer treaty obligations between independent States. An example of such an act of State may be found in the case of Nabob of Carnatic v. East India Co., (1793), 2 Ves. 56. But the object and effect of an act of State are not necessarily of this kind. Its intention and effect may be to modify and create rights as between the Government and individuals, who are, or who are about to become, subjects of the Government. In such cases the rights accruing therefrom may have to be adjudicated upon by municipal Courts. Let me take a simple example. Let us suppose that a Government by an act of State annexes a neighbouring country, and formally takes over all the property and liabilities of the former ruler, and that a part of such property consists of debts due to him. The Government is not compelled to collect such debts vi et armis; it may avail itself of the assistance of its Courts of law for the purpose, in the same way as though the debts had accrued due to it otherwise than by an act of State. But in deciding on such a claim the Courts must loyally accept the act of State as effective. Evidence that the debt was due to the former ruler would thereby become evidence of its being due to the existing Government; and I see no reason why in such a case a claim of a converse character might not equally be entertained by municipal Courts, and a subject recover from the existing Government by the processes of law applicable to such a case any debts due from the former ruler. The judgments in the case of Frith v. Reg., (1872), L.R. 7 Ex. 365, seem to me to give support to this view.

"The true view of an act of State appears to me to be that it is a catastrophic change, constituting a new departure. Municipal law has nothing to do with the act of change by which this new departure is effected. Its duty simply to accept the new departure; and its power and its duty to adjudicate upon, and enforce rights of individuals, or of the Government, in the future, appear to me to be precisely the same whether the origin of such rights be an act of State or not."

The foregoing statement represents the rule of English Common Law. But in many foreign countries it is lawful to take action against the State in Contract or Tort. (See American Journal of International Law, 1931, Vol. XXV, p. 50.)

For a detailed discussion of the powers of the Superior Courts in our country to exercise judicial control over Administrative Authorities within their jurisdiction by means of the issue of appropriate "writs", "orders" or "directions" see the Chapter relating to Fundamental Rights (Section dealing with Constitutional Remedies and chapter VI).

(C) THE JUDICIAL POWER AND THE PROTECTION OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

194. Comment on ART. 181

Part IX of our Constitution deals with Services of Pakistan and Article 181 is of particular importance to the constitutional lawyer because in it is contained the guarantee, that any person who is a member of the Civil Service of the Federation or of a Province or

of an All Pakistan Service, or holds a civil post in connection with the affairs of the Federation or of a Province, shall not be dismissed or removed from service or reduced by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed, nor again such a person shall be dismissed or removed from service or reduced in rank unless he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him. The provision relating to the giving of reasonable opportunity for showing cause are subject to three important exceptions contained in ART. 181 itself, but of these exceptions it is not necessary to say anything at this stage. ART. 181 may well be regarded as an important provision of law in that it confers upon the public servants a qualified immunity against certain types of arbitrary governmental acts. It is a constitutional right, in many ways superior in status to even a fundamental right since whereas the former can, the latter cannot, be suspended during an emergency.

The conditions of service of persons in the Service of Pakistan are mentioned in ART. 182 and their tenure in ART. 180. Service of Pakistan means any service or post in connection with the affairs of Federation or of a Province, and includes any defence service, and any other service declared as a service of Pakistan by or under an Act of Parliament or of a Provincial Legislature, but does not include service specifically mentioned under the definition clause of Service of Pakistan in ART. 218 like Governor-General, President, Governor, Speaker, Minister, Parliamentary Secretaries, Judges of High or Supreme Court etc. Every person, before he can hold office in the Service of Pakistan must, subject to the power of President or, in relation to a Province, the power of the Governor to authorise temporary employment of non-citizens, be a citizen (ART. 179(1)), and when he is so employed, he holds the office in question during the pleasure of the President, if he is a member of the Defence Service, or of a Civil Service of the Federation or of an All Pakistan Service, or holds any post connected with the Defence or a Civil post in connection with the affairs of the Federation, or he holds it during the pleasure of the Governor, if he is a person who is a member of a Civil Service of a Province or holds any Civil post in connection with the affairs of a Province (See ART. 180). Except as expressly provided by the Constitution, the appointment and conditions of service of persons serving in Pakistan Services are to be regulated by Act of the appropriate legislature. [ART. 179 (2)].

The relationship between the Government and the Civil Service, be it noted, rests on a contract to which the Constitution attaches some incidents, and further, that the essence of that relationship is the rendering of service by the servant to or for the use of or on behalf of the master; (See Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q.B.D., 333 C.A., of the year 1881). See also the case of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Hambrook, (1956) 1 All E.R. 807; (1956) 2 W.L.R. 919; (affirmed in (1956) 3 W.L.R. 644, C.A.), where the nature of relationship between the Crown and the officer (A Tax Officer, an established Civil Servant) in England was commented upon. Lord Goddard, C.J. at the trial held that there was no contractual relationship of the sort that exists between a master and servant, although the Court of appeal dismissed the action on an entirely different ground, viz., that the action for the loss of services lay only in respect of menial servants. The facts of the case were that a tax officer who was riding a motor-cycle, whilst off duty, collided with a motor-car driven by the defendant: it was admitted that he was $\frac{1}{3}$ rd and the respondent was $\frac{2}{3}$ rd to blame for the accident. The officer in consequence of the injuries was absent from employment and had to be paid his salary: Crown brought action against the defendant and claimed damages for loss of services of the officer).

In order to ensure the establishment of an able, talented, and properly equipped Civil Service of Pakistan, in the Chapter II of Part X, of our Constitution, we have several Articles that deal with the constitutional status, powers and authority of the Public Service Commissions for the Federation of Pakistan and for the two Provinces of East and West Pakistan. In order to ensure that the Public Service Commission are manned by upright and independent officers, power has been given to the President and the Governors of the two Provinces to make appointments to the Federal and Provincial Public Service Commissions respectively—and this power is to be exercised not on ministerial ‘advice’ but ‘in their discretion’—and what is more, under clause (5) of ART. 186, it is provided, by way of an additional precaution that :

- (5) On ceasing to hold office—
 - (a) the Chairman of the Federal Public Service Commission shall not be eligible for further employment in the service of Pakistan;
 - (b) the Chairman of Provincial Public Service Commission shall be eligible for appointment as Chairman or other member of the Federal Public Service Commission or as Chairman of another Provincial Public Service Commission, but shall not be eligible for any other employment in the service of Pakistan; . . .”

Similar restrictions apply to other members of the Provincial Public Service Commission, for which see ART. 186(5)(c).

The functions of the Public Service Commission are mentioned in ART. 188, and it would appear that, subject to such regulations specifying matters in which generally or in any particular class of cases or in any particular Service it may not be necessary for the Public Service Commission to be consulted, the Public Service Commission has to be consulted:

- (a) on all matters relating to methods of recruitment and upon qualifications of candidates for Civil services and posts;
- (b) as to the principles to be followed in the making of appointments to Civil Services and posts and in making promotions and transfers from one Service to another, and on the suitability of candidates for such appointments, promotions or transfers;
- (c) on all disciplinary matters affecting any person in the service of the Federal or a Provincial Government in a civil capacity including compulsory retirement, whether for disciplinary reason or otherwise, and memorials or petitions relating to such matters;
- (d) on any claim by or in respect of a person who is serving or has served in a civil capacity that any costs incurred by him in defending legal proceedings instituted against him in respect of any acts done or purported to be done by him in the execution of his duty should be paid out of the Federal or the Provincial Consolidated Fund;
- (e) on any proposal to withhold a special or additional pension or to reduce any ordinary pension; and
- (f) on any claim involving compensation by way of Award or Pension arising out of injuries sustained while serving the Government etc., and the Public Service Commission is charged with the duty of advising on any matter so referred to them, and on any other matter which the President or the Governor may refer to it.

It would appear that the Government is charged with the constitutional duty of obtaining, and the Public Service Commission are charged with the corresponding duty of giving, advice in respect of matters mentioned under ART. 188, and a writ of mandamus in appropriate cases can lie at the instance of the party interested to secure compliance with these duties.

The secret of good government lies in the manner in, and the extent to, which it is able to provide for efficient administration in the country, and this in its turn can be secured by the impartial, upright and well-disciplined public servants it is able to employ for the purposes of carrying on the day-to-day administration of the country. The political parties have their rise and fall, the politicians come and go—but it is the civil service that goes on for ever. Under a system of parliamentary democracy, the entrance and exit of politicians on the stage of public affairs is a matter of ordinary occurrence, and in a country where there are, as yet no strong, well-knit and disciplined political parties, the changes of government are apt to be more frequent than one would wish for. The too many changes in the government must necessarily entail the weakening of administrative grip over the management of the affairs of a country and the only way to ensure that the administrative efficiency will not suffer a serious set-back is to make, by means of providing constitutional safeguards and guarantees, the public services independent and strong so that they are able to withstand the shocks that the too frequent political changes in the government must inevitably bring in their wake. It cannot be forgotten that it is this body of civil servants, who provide a continuing apparatus of administration and often a wholesale check upon the maintenance of rule by their temporary superiors.

Our Constitution has afforded considerable measure of protection to the public servants although that measure of protection can be no proof against the machinations of a scheming politician who when in office might like to retaliate against any honest and upright public servant who may have, when the politician was outside the magic-circle of office, while doing his duty incurred his odium or displeasure.

The protection afforded is of three kinds, (a) against indiscriminate and arbitrary punishment, (b) an affirmative guarantee that rules shall be so framed under clause (2) of ART. 182 as to secure.

(a) that the tenure and conditions of service of any person to whom that Article applies shall not be varied to his disadvantage; and

- (b) that every such person shall have at least one appeal against any order which—
 - (i) punishes or formally censures him; or
 - (ii) alters or interprets to his disadvantage any rule affecting his conditions of service; or
 - (iii) terminates his employment otherwise than upon his reaching the age of superannuation;

and finally—

- (c) in respect of the public servants who are members of "All-Pakistan Services", that is, services common to the Federation and the Provinces (which were the All Pakistan Services immediately before the Constitution Day) the protection extended by ART. 183 which inter alia includes the following :
- (i) Parliament shall have exclusive power to legislate in respect of such service.
- (ii) No member of such service shall be transferred to a Province or from a Province to the service of Federal Government except by order of the President made after consultation with Governor of that Province; and
- (c) while in service in a Province, his promotion and transfer within that Province and initiation (as opposed to the consummation) of any disciplinary proceedings against him in relation to his conduct in that Province, shall take place by order of the Governor of that Province.

This is not the place where any elaborate statements of the relationship which, according to the theory of sound public administration, ought to exist between the political chiefs and civil servants, could be presented—but a few general remarks upon this subject may not be out of place in this context. Modern democratic governments all over the civilised world bring about a confluence between the outlook of the lay-politician and the opinion of the expert so that correct political decisions could be taken. Ministers in the Cabinet have to have expert advice before them—but in directing what the governmental course of conduct in relation to a particular administrative problem should be, they have further to assess the impact of the decision proposed by the expert upon the public mind. The Minister, after weighing the pros and cons of the decision which the experts have advised him to take, can and should, in appropriate cases, say to the experts: "Gentlemen, I am grateful for the advice tendered—but I should like to tell you that people of my country, whom I know more than you do, will not stand this decision." Scientific study of the economic problems is essential for anyone who means to handle the affairs of his country and the perception of this truth would entail the need for the politician to recognise the technical difficulties of his task and warrant an unusually resolute attempt on his part to train himself accordingly. The theory of the institution of Cabinet Government, as it is propounded by those who have seen it at work in the country of its origin, is that each department should have a lay chief with expert subordinates—the expert advises but the layman has the last word.

"There are", says Michael Stewart in his recent book 'The British Approach to Politics', "parallels to this in other spheres of public life: in criminal trials, lawyers will state case, the Judge will explain the questions at issue, but twelve laymen will decide the verdict. This system has been satirised, as in W.S. Gilbert's picture of the First Lord of the Admiralty who had never been to sea, and in the story of the Chancellor of the Exchequer being instructed in the mysteries of decimal points. On the other side, the expert, acting always according to rule, has also been satirised, and some of the most striking improvements in public departments have come from people new to the work, approaching it with a fresh mind. Florence Nightingale instructed the War-Office in the obvious principle that when hospital stores are at hand, and needed, they should be used—there is no need to wait till next month for permission to open them. Common sense, it is argued, acts as a corrective to routine."

"There is a real distinction between the work of a political chief and that of a civil servant. The former decides what the objects of government policy are; the latter advises how they can be attained This distinction, however, must not be over-emphasised. No one can say what the Government ought to do unless he has some idea how it can be done. Ministers, therefore, do make an attempt to understand the technicalities of their Departments . . ." (p. 53-54).

The progressive evolution of the system of our administration has been from Bureaucracy to Democracy—from the rule by the red tape to the rule by the lay representatives of the people. This phenomenon is in part accountable for the occasional atavistic relapses of our 'administrative style' into the still but nevertheless the deep waters of Bureaucratic nitwitism. This is practically true of all the new democracies in Asia and the extent to which Brown Bureaucracies invade the art of taking decisions by the application of democratic approach is, in the last resort, the result of pro-rata lack of expert knowledge in the responsible Ministers who take their place in the Cabinet. The Secretary begins his career with the new Minister by being his mentor and guide in the beginning—but steadily the Minister finds himself in his clutches. The inevitable result of this is that the Minister develops an inferiority complex and fails to humanise the already heartless administrative apparatus. This evil has its roots in the fact that the Minister is by and large ignorant of the art of Government—an art which he can learn only by becoming the trainee of the bureaucrats who, as would be natural, are out to exploit the situation to their own advantage and to the disadvantage of the people. Once the Ministers have shown signs of dependence on them, the bureaucrats start working at cross purposes with democracy itself, priding themselves on being unhelpful to the contemptible creature known as the man-in-the-street and with that finesse which is traditionally associated with those who exercise power without owing responsibility to any one, the members of this caste succeed in inducting "New Despotism" into the saddle as if from the back door.

The solution of the problem presented by this encounter between the forces of Bureaucracy and Democracy lies in educating the politician in the art of governance. It is enough to be an adult, according to the computation of years based on calendar, to be elected to the Parliament, but it is not enough to be merely an adult in this sense to be able to govern—an appreciable degree of psychological maturity and some background information as to how the operations of modern Governments are to be conducted would seem to be the indispensable preliminary qualifications for any one being safely entrusted with the judicious and efficient exercise of administrative power.

The rigidity of mind and the canker of professional jealousy—those twin pillars upon which the arch of red-tape is reared—inevitably come to infest the outlook of a civil servant, not because he is no patriot, but because of the highly important position he occupies in the matter of administering the country. For instance, when he is called upon to administer the law—and the more so when he is enlisted on the side of law-making—he perforce must think of advising the making of the kind of law which is workable from the point of view of those who have to administer it and not necessarily palatable from the point of view of those whose who have to endure it in the sense that it is their lives that are going to be affected by it.

But when all is said and done, the power of the official class is not something that is grabbed by its votaries due to the love of mischief but in the words of Michael Stewart:

"The bureaucracy becomes powerful in proportion to the incompetence of other parts of Government. When there are ignorant Ministers, careless Parliaments, and over-burdened law-courts, the Civil Service does what it can to carry on the government in spite of these draw-backs. There is no real evidence which justifies the picture of Civil Servants as despots, hungering for power. They are, rather, pickers up of unconsidered trifles and they pick them up because of a professional love of tidiness. If not only trifles, but the Rule of Law and the rights of citizens are left unconsidered, the fault does not lie with the Civil Service." (pp. 61-62).

The only effective political method of rendering the civil servant innocuous in this country is to agitate for and achieve amendment of the Constitution and provide for a perpetual disqualification of at least the higher class of public servants from filling in political appointments. In fact, the public service should be dis-enfranchised. The only way to make right to vote effective in this country is to deny it to the civil servant.

To encourage the assumption of political power by a person who is incapable of having a clear perception of what is the popular need at a given moment in the life of a nation, is to hand over the whole country to what Walter Lippmann aptly calls the rule by the routinists. In his words:

"The man who will follow precedent, but never create one, is merely an obvious example of the routinist. You find him desperately numerous in the civil service, in the official bureaus. To him government is something given as unconditionally, as absolutely as ocean or hill. He goes on winding the tape that he finds. His imagination has rarely extricated itself from under the administrative machine to gain any sense of what a human, temporary contraption the whole affair is. What he thinks is the heavens above him is nothing but the roof." (See his 'Preface to Politics' p. 4).

Besides, if the secret of Constitutional Government consists in the progressive elimination of the arbitrary rule, if its superiority over other rival methods of governance is to be traced to the emphasis it lays upon equal laws and justice for all, the Bureancrat must be kept at bay or else authoritarian rule would, thanks to his ubiquitous powers, become the order of the day, and instead of having the arbitrary rule by one King in the realm, we will have several hundred petty Ceasars masquerading as the servants of the people but ruling them all the same as irresponsible autocrats.

195. Tenure during pleasure

The doctrine of the English Law, namely that a servant of the Crown holds his office during the pleasure of the Crown, has dominated the development of the law relating to public servants in this country. The leading case on the subject is Shenton v. Smith, (1895) A.C. p. 229 (P.C.). This was a case in which an action was brought by one Dr. Smith who held an office in the Government Medical Service in Western Australia, for questioning order of his dismissal on the ground that such an order amounted to a contravention of certain rules and regulations of the service which constituted an essential part of the conditions of his contract of service. Lord Hobhouse repelled this contention and held that the plaintiff had no right to damages, observing (at p. 235):

"... Unless in special cases where it is otherwise provided, servants of the Crown hold their offices during the pleasure of the Crown, not by virtue of any special prerogative of the Crown, but because such are the terms of their engagement, as is well understood throughout the public service. If any public servant considers that he has been dismissed unjustly, his remedy is not by a law-suit, but by an appeal of an official or political kind As for the regulations (their Lordships agreed with Stone J.) . . . they are merely directions given by the Crown to the Governments of Crown Colonies for general guidance, and they do not constitute a contract between the Crown and its servants."

The principle of this case was affirmed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Rangachari's case, AIR (1937) P.C. p. 27, and in the case of Venkata Rao v. Secretary of State, AIR (1937) P.C. p. 31). These cases involved interpretation of the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1919 (Section 96-B, and the rules made thereunder). Section 96-B was in the following terms:

- (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act and of rules made thereunder, every person in the Civil Service of the Crown in India holds office during His Majesty's pleasure, and may be employed in any manner required by a proper authority within the scope of his duty, but no person in that service may be dismissed by any authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed, and the Secretary of State in Council may (except so far as he may provide by rules to the contrary) reinstate any person in that service who has been dismissed. If any such person appointed by the Secretary of State in Council thinks himself wronged by an order of an official superior in a Governor's Province, and on due application made to that superior does not receive the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, he may, without prejudice to any other right of redress, complain to the Governor of the Province in order to obtain justice, and the Governor is hereby directed to examine such complaint and require such action to be taken thereon as may appear to him to be just and equitable.
- (2) The Secretary of State in Council may make rules for regulating the classification of the Civil Services in India, the methods of their recruitment, their conditions of service, pay and allowances, and discipline and conduct. Such rules may, to such extent and in respect of such matters as may be prescribed, delegate the power of making rules to the Governor-General in Council or to Local Governments, or authorise the Indian Legislature or Local Legislatures to make laws regulating the public services: Provided that every person appointed before the commencement of the Government of India Act, 1919, by the Secretary of State in Council to the Civil Service of the Crown in India shall retain all his existing or accruing rights, or shall receive such compensation for the loss of any of them as the Secretary of State in Council may consider just and equitable.
- (3) The right to pensions and the scale and conditions of pensions of all persons in the Civil Service of the Crown in India appointed by the Secretary of State in Council shall be regulated in accordance with the rules in force at the time of the passing of the Government of India Act, 1919. Any such rules may be varied or added to by the Secretary of State in Council and shall have effect as so varied or added to, but any such variation or addition shall not adversely affect the pension of any member of the service appointed before the date thereof. Nothing in this section or in any rule thereunder shall prejudice the rights to which any person may, or may have, become entitled under the provisions in relation to pensions contained in the East India Annuity Funds Act, 1874.

- (4) For the removal of doubts, it is hereby declared that all rules or other provisions in operation at the time of passing of the Government of India Act, 1919, whether made by the Secretary of State in Council or by any other authority, relating to the Civil Service of the Crown in India, were duly made in accordance with the powers in that behalf, and are confirmed, but any such rules or provisions may be revoked, varied or added to by rules or laws made under this section.
- (5) No rules or other provisions made or confirmed under this section shall be construed to limit or abridge the power of the Secretary of State in Council to deal with the case of any person in the Civil Service of the Crown in India in such manner as may appear to him to be just and equitable, and any rules made by the Secretary of State in Council under sub-section (2) of this section delegating the power of making rules may provide for dispensing with or relaxing the requirements of such rules to such extent and in such manner as may be prescribed: Provided that where any such rule or provision is applicable to the case of any person, the case shall not be dealt with in any manner less favourable to him than that provided by the rule or provision."

And amongst the rules made or confirmed under the above section the following were relied upon in the argument submitted at the Bar of their Lordships:

"XIII.—Without prejudice to the provisions of any law for the time being in force, the Local Government may, for good and sufficient reasons—(1) censure, (2) withhold promotion from, (3) reduce to a lower post, (4) suspend, (5) remove, or (6) dismiss any officer holding a post in a provincial or subordinate service or a special appointment.

XIV.—Without prejudice to the provisions of the Public Servants Inquiries Act, 1850, in all cases in which the dismissal, removal or reduction of any officer is ordered, the order shall, except when it is based on facts or conclusions established at a judicial trial, or when the officer concerned has absconded with the accusation hanging over him, be preceded by a properly recorded departmental enquiry. At such an enquiry a definite charge in writing shall be framed in respect of each offence and explained to the accused, the evidence in support of it, and any evidence which he may adduce in his defence shall be recorded in his presence and his defence shall be taken down in writing. Each of the charges framed shall be discussed and a finding shall be recorded on each charge.

XV.—A Local Government may delegate to any subordinate authority, subject to such conditions, if any, as it may prescribe, any of the powers conferred by R.13 in regard to officers of the subordinate services.

XVI.—Every officer against whom an order may be passed under Rules 10, 13 and 15, and who thinks himself wronged thereby shall be entitled to prefer at least one appeal against such order.

XXVIII.—The Secretary of State may call for any appeal withheld by the Local Government or the Government of India which under the rules may be made to him and may pass such orders as he considers fit; the Governor-General in Council may send for an appeal withheld by the Local Government which under the rules may be made to him, and may pass such orders as he considers fit."

The contention on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant before the Privy Council in the case of Venkata Rao [(1937) P.C. 31] was :

"that the statute gives him a right enforceable by action to hold his office in accordance with the rules and that he could only be dismissed as provided by the rules and in accordance with the procedure prescribed thereby."

As opposed to this it was contended by the respondent Government that "there is no such actionable right conferred by the statute." Their Lordships referred to earlier cases decided by the Board in (1895) Appeal Cases, 229, (Shenton v. Smith), and (2) in (1896) A.C. 575 (Gould v. Stuart), but before dealing with the contentions noticed the conflict in the decisions of the Indian High Court. (Satish Chandra Das v. Secretary of State 54 Calcutta 44 :A.I.R. (1927) Cal. 311 and Baroni v. Secretary of State, 8 Rangoon 215: A.I.R. (1929) Rangoon 207 being decisions in favour of the appellants' contention). Their Lordships dismissed the appeal holding that there was no such actionable right in favour of the plaintiff as had been claimed on his behalf and gave their reasons as follows(at p. 34):—

"The reasons which have led their Lordships to this conclusion may be shortly stated. S. 96-B, in express terms, states that office is held during the pleasure. There is, therefore, no need for the implication of this term and no room for its exclusion. The argument for a limited and special kind of employment during pleasure but with an added contractual term that the rules are to be observed is at once too artificial and too far-reaching to commend itself for acceptance. The rules are manifold in number and most minute in particularity and are all capable of change."

Their Lordships, in effect, held that as a matter of law there was no redress to be had in respect of wrongful dismissal in courts of law and they held that the remedy lay by means of a representation or memorial etc., with the executive Government. They regarded the terms of the Section as containing a statutory and solemn assurance that the tenure of office though at pleasure will not be subjected to capricious or arbitrary action but will be regulated by rules. This assurance, however, is not of a kind which may be regarded as constituting a contract between the Crown and the civil servant so as to give rise to relief in a court of law in the event of its terms being contravened.

Under the Government of India Act, 1935, some of the rules that had been framed under Section 96-B of the Government of India Act, 1919, were given constitutional status in section 240 of that Act. That section, as adapted in Pakistan, was in the following terms :

- "240—(1) Except as expressly provided by this Act, every person who is a member of a Civil Service of the Crown in Pakistan or holds any civil post under the Crown in Pakistan, holds office during His Majesty's pleasure.
- (2) No such person as aforesaid who having been appointed by the Secretary of State or the Secretary of State-in-Council continues after the establishment of the Federation to serve under the Crown in Pakistan shall be dismissed from the service of His Majesty by any authority subordinate to the Governor-General or the Governor according as that person is serving in connection with the affairs of the Federation or a Province, and no other such person as aforesaid shall be dismissed from the service of His Majesty by any authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed.
- (3) No such person as aforesaid shall be dismissed or reduced in rank until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him:
Provided that this sub-section shall not apply—
(a) where a person is dismissed or reduced in rank on the ground of conduct which has led to his conviction on a criminal charge; or
(b) where an authority empowered to dismiss a person or reduce him in rank is satisfied that for some reason, to be recorded by that authority in writing, it is not reasonably practicable to give to that person an opportunity of showing cause.

- (4) Notwithstanding that a person holding a civil post under the Crown in Pakistan holds office during His Majesty's pleasure, any contract under which a person, not being a member of a civil service of the Crown in Pakistan, is appointed under this Act to hold such a post may, if the Governor-General, or, as the case may be, the Governor, deems it necessary in order to secure the services of a person having special qualifications, provide for the payment to him of compensation, if before the expiration of an agreed period that post is abolished or he is, for reasons not connected with any misconduct on his part, required to vacate that post."

It would be noticed that the main part of Rule 14 quoted earlier (corresponding roughly to rule 55 of the Secretary of State's Classification and Discipline Rules) has been re-enacted in this section. In view of this change in the constitutional position the principle of the decision in Venkata Rao's case demanded that in respect of contravention of the constitutional guarantees contained in S. 240, there would be a valid cause of action for a person aggrieved for obtaining declaratory relief in the same manner in which he could obtain relief in respect of a breach of Section 96-B of the old Government of India Act, 1919. And, in fact, in the case of High Commissioner for India and High Commissioner for Pakistan vs. I. M. Lall, AIR (1948) Privy Council 121, the Privy Council decided the matter accordingly. This was a case in which Mr. I. M. Lall, a Member of the Indian Civil Service, had challenged the legality of the order of the Secretary of State to remove him from the service. The case was initially heard and determined by the High Court of Judicature at Lahore [reported in AIR (1944) Lahore 240]. The suit was decreed to the extent of granting a declaration to the effect that the order removing the plaintiff Mr. I. M. Lall, was illegal and inoperative, and further that he was still a member of the Indian Civil Service. From this decision the Government appealed to the Federal Court of India, which Court by a majority judgment, varied the decree of the High Court ordering that:

"in place of the declaration (that the order removing the plaintiff from office was wrongful and void, illegal and inoperative and that plaintiff is still a member of the Indian Civil Service,) shall be substituted a declaration that the plaintiff, Mr. I.M. Lall, was wrongfully dismissed from Indian Civil Service." [See AIR (1945) Federal Court 47].

It was from this decision again that an appeal was lodged before their Lordships of the Privy Council and Lord Thankerton, who delivered the judgment on behalf of the Board, after examining the provisions of Section 96-B of the Government of India Act of 1919, and of Section 240 of the Act of 1935, agreed with both the High Court and the Federal Court in holding (at p. 226):

"that the provision as to a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed is now put on the same footing as the provision now in sub-section (2) of Section 240, which was the subject of decision in 64 Indian Appeals, page 40 (Rangachari v. Secretary of State) and that it is no longer resting on rules alterable from time to time, but is mandatory, and necessarily qualifies the right of the Crown recognised in sub-section (1) of Section 240 of the Act of 1935. The provisions of Section 96-B (1), now reproduced as sub-section (2) of Section 240 of Act of 1935, and of sub-sections (2) and (3) of Section 240 are prohibitory in form, which is inconsistent with their being merely permissive."

As to the declaration made by the Federal Court, namely that the plaintiff was wrongfully dismissed from the Indian Civil Service, the Privy Council altered the same so as to say that the purported dismissal of the respondent was void and inoperative and that respondent remained a member of the Indian Civil Service at the date of the institution of the present suit.

Relying on a Scottish case, Mulvenna v. The Admiralty (1926), Supreme Court 842, the Privy Council pointed out that it is an implied term of a contract of service with the Crown that the right to remuneration cannot be enforced in a civil court of justice and that the only remedy of the aggrieved servant is an appeal of an Official or political kind by way of petition, memorial or remonstrance. [But as to the tenability of this view of law see remarks of Mahajan, C. J. referred to in infra AIR (1954) S.C. 245, State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid.)

196. S. 243 of the Govt. of India Act and Suraj Narain's case

The scheme of the old Government of India Act, 1935, was such that the conditions of service of the subordinate ranks of the various Police Forces, despite what was contained in Sections 240 to 242, were to be such "as may be determined by or under the Acts relating to those Forces respectively." The important questions that presented themselves for solution, upon the appreciation of the combined effect of Section 243 and other preceding provisions of the Chapter relating to Civil Services were:

(a) whether in the total absence of any conditions of service contrary to those mentioned in the Chapter relating to "Civil Services", (that is, Chapter II of Part X), the provisions of Section 240 were nevertheless to be applicable even in the case of officers of the subordinate ranks of Police Service;

(b) whether the right of dismissal was a "condition of service" within the meaning of Section 243, so that if there was a valid Police rule in operation which authorised the dismissal of a Police Officer, such a dismissal would be valid although the person making the order of dismissal was subordinate in rank to the officer by whom he had been appointed.

Suraj Narain's case, P.L.D. (1949) P.C. 1, N.W.F. Province v. Suraj Narain Anand, is important precisely upon the point that the Privy Council answered the second of the two aforementioned questions in the affirmative thereby holding that the right of dismissal was a condition of service within the meaning of S. 243 and that a valid Police rule on that subject could upon the authority of Section 243 prevail as against constitutional guarantee contained in Section 240.

In the case of Noorul Hassan and others v. The Federation of Pakistan reported in P.L.D. (1956) Supreme Court, page 331, these provisions were appreciated and Chief Justice Muhammad Munir felt that the Privy Council decision in Suraj Narain's case "is clearly indicative of the view that the constitutional safeguards in sub-sections (2) and (3) of Section 240 are available to police officers of the subordinate ranks unless those safeguards have been taken away by or under a Police Act."

The other conclusions reached were :—

The constitutional safeguards in sub-sections (2) and (3) of Section 240 of the Government of India Act, 1935, are available to police officers of subordinate ranks, unless those safeguards have been taken away by or under a Police Act. This result is consistent with the words of Section 243 because if the intention had been that Sections 240 and 241 were not at all to apply to subordinate police, nothing would have been easier than plainly to say so.

The language of Section 243 is designed to operate on the basis of repugnancy between sub-sections (2) and (3) of Section 240, on the one hand, and the Rules under the Police Acts, on the other.

The provisions of Sections 240 and 241 have no application where there is in existence a contrary.

In the minority judgment delivered by Chief Justice Munir, the following nine propositions were considered as being such "as could admit of no dispute" :—

- (1) that unless otherwise provided by law, the Crown has the right to dismiss its servants at pleasure;
- (2) that all persons who held civil posts under the Crown before the Constitution Day and were governed by section 240 of the Government of India Act, 1935, held their office during the pleasure of the Crown;
- (3) that no such servant could maintain a suit for compensation or arrears of salary on the ground that some provision of the Government of India Act had not been complied with in dismissing him, though he could bring a suit for a declaration that some constitutional provision not having been complied with in dismissing him, the dismissal was inoperative and that despite such dismissal he continued to be in the service of the Crown;
- (4) that no person holding a civil post under the Crown could be dismissed by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed and that he could only be dismissed or reduced in rank if he were given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken against him;
- (5) that unless the order was by the Governor-General or by the Governor, as the case may be, such person had at least one right of appeal from the order terminating his services;
- (6) that an order of removal was tantamount to an order of dismissal;
- (7) that as regards constitutional limitations on the dismissing authority's powers, there was no difference between a permanent and a temporary servant;
- (8) that, subject to a qualification to be mentioned later, other restrictions on the dismissing authority's powers, including the procedure which such authority was required to follow, that were imposed by the rules made under the Government of India Act were not a part of the contract of service in the sense that a breach of them could furnish cause of action to the dismissed servant; and
- (9) that so far as police officers of the subordinate rank were concerned, their conditions of service were determined by or under the various Police Acts which could authorise an authority subordinate to that which appointed a police officer to dismiss him, and could also vary the rule in sub-section (3) of section 240 of the Government of India Act that a servant of the Crown, before he was dismissed, was entitled to a reasonable opportunity to show cause against his intended dismissal."

The above statement of the law, if we omit the ninth proposition from consideration, represents concisely the constitutional position concerning the remedies available to public servants in the matter of wrongful dismissals etc.

In the case of State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid reported in AIR (1954) Supreme Court of India 245, Chief Justice Mahajan too reviewed the constitutional position and in regard to the meaning of concept of "Office at pleasure", pointed out that (at p. 250):

"The expression concerns itself with the tenure of office of the civil servant and it is not implicit in it that a civil servant serves the Crown ex-gratia, or that his salary is in the nature of a bounty. It has again no relation or connection with the question whether an action can be filed to recover arrears of salary against the Crown. The origin of the two rules is different and they operate on two different fields."

As to the right of a civil servant to recover the arrears of his salary the learned Chief Justice stated his conclusions in words that follow :—

"the rule of English law (that civil servants held office at pleasure of the Crown) has not been fully adopted in Section 240. Section 240 itself places restrictions and limitations on the exercise of that pleasure and those restrictions must be given effect to. They are imperative and mandatory. It follows therefore that whenever there is a breach of restrictions imposed by the statute by the Government or the Crown the matter is justiciable and the party aggrieved is entitled to suitable relief at the hands of the court. As pointed out earlier in this judgment, there is no warrant for the proposition that the relief must be limited to the declaration and cannot go beyond it. To the extent that the rule that Government servants hold office during pleasure has been departed from by the statute, the Government servants are entitled to relief like any other person under the ordinary law, and that relief therefore must be regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure." (Further see Makkena Sambayya vs. Makkena Tirupatayya, (1952) Madras 865, and the judgment of Mookerjee, J., in the case of Ramdas Hajra v. Secretary of State, 17 Calcutta Law Journal, page 75).

*State of Bihar

There is no provision in our Constitution corresponding to Section 243 of Government of India Act, 1935, and this presumably because ART. 181, which deals with dismissal, disciplinary matters etc., and extends to members of the Civil Service of the Federation or of a Province or of an All-Pakistan Service, or to any one who holds any civil post in connection with the affairs of the Federation or of a Province, the following two guarantees, namely :—

- (a) that his dismissal or removal from service or reduction in rank shall not take place by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed, nor again,
- (b) shall he be dismissed or removed from service or reduced in rank until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him, by itself contains two over-riding provisions which say that no such opportunity of showing cause need be given in cases :—

- (i) "Where an authority empowered to dismiss or remove from service a person, or to reduce him in rank, is satisfied that for some reason, to be recorded by that authority, it is not reasonably practicable to give that person an opportunity of showing cause; or
- (ii) where the President or the Governor, as the case may be, is satisfied, for reasons to be recorded by him, that in the interest of the security of Pakistan or any part thereof, it is not expedient to give to that person such an opportunity."

These provisions are of a far-reaching character and constitute by themselves a sufficient safeguard in favour of administrative action which is calculated to deal with a public servant in disciplinary matters without having to give that reasonable opportunity of showing cause which has been provided for by the Article. In each case, therefore, if the authority empowered to take disciplinary action is satisfied that no opportunity of the kind mentioned in ART. 181 should be extended, it should proceed so to act, but in that case it is required to make a record of the reason responsible for its decision not to afford any such opportunity. The fact that Constitution requires the authority denying a reasonable opportunity to the public servant concerned to set forth its reasons in support of such refusal would seem to suggest that the exercise of this abnormal power will not be suffered to be countenanced in a capricious or an arbitrary manner. The question whether a court of law would, in appropriate proceedings, issue a direction or a writ in the nature of mandamus commanding the relevant authority, who is proved to have acted mala fide or has denied opportunity of showing cause for a reason which is insufficient in law, cannot be answered in the abstract but, on general principles, this much at least is clear that, in any case in which the order denying opportunity to a public servant to show cause against punishment inflicted on him is bereft of reasons, a court of law would be justified in law to command the authority concerned to state its reasons. But it is also true that a court of law would not lightly interfere with the exercise of this power by the executive which has

No provision in our present Constitution corresponding to S.243, of the Government of India Act, 1935.

Is breach of

been reserved to the executive to deal with cases in which the giving of an opportunity would be prejudicial to the public interest. It must be remembered that from the nature of the case it would be extremely difficult to make out a cogent case before a court of law for it to intervene, particularly in a case where the grievance is that the executive has not extended proper opportunity to the public servant or that in denying such an opportunity it has acted from improper motives or for insufficient reasons. The very fact that there is no clear provision forbidding the court to enquire into the sufficiency of the reasons, on the footing of which reasons the authority concerned has denied opportunity to a public servant, would tend to show that the jurisdiction of the court can be invoked, but, for reasons that have been suggested earlier, such a jurisdiction can be invoked successfully only in a very restricted category of cases.

The question which has hitherto formed the subject-matter of considerable legal discussion and even conflict of views, namely, whether or not the breach of a rule framed by the executive pursuant to a constitutional provision concerning matters relating to discipline and other rights of public servants, is enforceable in a court of law, in the same way in which the breach of the constitutional guarantee itself is enforceable, has lost much of its relevance in view of the fact that we have no provision in our Constitution corresponding to S. 243 of the Government of India Act, and ART. 181 completely dispenses with the necessity of any rules being framed concerning the disciplinary matters and contents itself by giving only two constitutional guarantees to all the civil servants serving our State. Any invasion of these two constitutionally guaranteed rights would be actionable, subject, of course, to the over-riding limitations contained in the provisos to that Article. Under ART. 182(2) and (3), with respect to the making of provision about "conditions of service" of a member of Public Service, it has been provided as follows :

- "182(2) Except as expressly provided by the Constitution, or an Act of the appropriate legislature, the conditions of service of persons serving in a civil capacity shall, subject to the provisions of this Article, be such as may be prescribed—
 - (a) in the case of persons serving in connection with the affairs of the Federation, by rules made by the President, or by some person authorized by the President to make rules for the purpose;
 - (b) in the case of persons serving in connection with the affairs of a Province, by rules made by the Governor of the Province, or by some person authorized by the Governor to make rules for the purpose:

Provided....

- "182(3) The rules under clause (2) shall be so framed as to secure—
 - (a) that the tenure and conditions of service of any person to whom this Article applies shall not be varied to his disadvantage; and
 - (b) that every such person shall have at least one appeal against any order which—
 - (i) punishes or formally censures him; or
 - (ii) alters or interprets to his disadvantage any rule affecting his conditions of service; or
 - (iii) terminates his employment otherwise than upon his reaching the age fixed for superannuation . . ."

(For the parallel provision in the Indian Constitution, see ART. 309 thereof.)

Would the breach of the terms relating to conditions of service provided for by rules framed under ART. 182(2) give rise to a cause of action in a Court of law? In the first place, if the 'conditions of service' provided for by rules, are violated, the aggrieved public servant would have a departmental remedy in that the rules to be framed under ART. 182(2) must, as a matter of constitutional necessity, provide for a right of appeal or review and, if they do not, a mandamus will lie to compel the appropriate authority to frame the rules accordingly. In the second place, would not the question with respect to redress in respect of the breach of rules—as opposed to a breach of direct constitutional guarantee—come within the rule laid down by the Privy Council and affirmed by the remarks of Supreme Court Judges in Noorul Hassan's case referred to above [PLD (1956) S.C. 331] viz., that the mere breach of rule made pursuant to a constitutional provision is not actionable.

In the opinion of the present writer, the breach of rules prescribing the conditions of service of a public servant, unless they amount to causing his reduction in rank or removal from service, or dismissal within the meaning of ART. 181, are not actionable and the aggrieved public servant must be content to seek the redress of his grievances by means of departmental and domestic procedure.

It is for this reason that no attempt has been made in the present analysis to set forth a resume of the very scholarly statement of the law on that question offered by Chief Justice Muhammad Munir in the case of Noorul Hassan v. The Federation of Pakistan, PLD (1956) S.C. 331; as also a somewhat different although equally weighty opinion advanced in a majority judgment by his companion Judges. In the view of the present writer, however, the correct rule on this point is as was laid down by the Privy Council in the Venkata Rao's case referred to earlier and the principle of which has been supported by Chief Justice Muhammad Munir in his judgment.

Before taking leave of this topic, it is necessary to refer to certain observations made in the case of Muhammad Ayyub v. Government of West Pakistan, PLD (1957) Lahore 487 where atleast one of the learned Judges of the Division Bench appears to take a contrary view of the problem presented by the foregoing analysis of ART. 182(2). The principle of Venkata Rao's case [AIR (1937) P.C. 31] has ben distinguished by the learned Judge Akhlaque Husain J. who wrote the leading judgment and his argument is as follows (p. 490):

"It is a question whether the rules framed under Article 182(2) of the Constitution are in law at par with those made by the Secretary of State under the Government of India Act, 1919. The language employed in the two provisions is significantly different. Two considerations weighed considerably with the Privy Council in Venkata Rao's case. The first was that 'the rules are manifold in number and most minute in particularity and are all capable of change.' But statutory law dealing with the terms and conditions of Government servants, which would be unquestionably binding under the Constitution and was so under the Government of India Act, is also capable of change. And there does not appear to be any legal or rational principle for holding statutory rules as not legally binding simply because they happen to be 'manifold in number and most minute in particularity.' The real test of their binding character is the intention of the legislature.

"The second, and by far the more important, consideration which led their Lordships to the conclusion arrived at by them was: 'There is another consideration which seems to their Lordships to be of the utmost weight. Section 96-B and the rules make careful provision for redress of grievances by administrative process and it is to be observed that sub-section (5) in conclusion reaffirms the supreme authority of the Secretary of State in Council over the Civil Service' there is no provision in our Constitution Corresponding to sub-section (5) of section 96-B which read: 'No rules or other provisions made or confirmed under this section shall be construed to limit or abridge the power of the Secretary of State in Council to deal with the case of any person in the Civil Service of the Crown in India in such manner as may appear to him to be just and equitable . . .'. This, unlike any provision in Article 182, expressly made the authority of the Secretary of State supreme over the rules framed by him under sub-section (2) which provided: 'The Secretary of State in Council may make rules for regulating the classification of the Civil Services in India, the methods of their recruitment, their conditions of service, pay and allowances, and discipline and conduct.' Article 182 (2), unlike

West Pakistan.

"sub-section (2) of section 96-B, does not leave it to the Authority to make or not to make rules. Nor does it merely say that the rules are only to 'regulate' the conditions of service etc. It says: 'Except as expressly provided by the Constitution, or an Act of the appropriate legislature, the conditions of service of persons serving in a civil capacity shall, subject to the provisions of this Article, be such as may be prescribed'.—

Article 180 of the Constitution provides:—

"Except as expressly provided by the Constitution—

(b) every person who is a member of a Civil Service of a Province or holds any civil post in connection with the affairs of a Province, other than a person mentioned in paragraph (a) of this Article, shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor."

It will be noticed that the pleasure of the Governor is, by this Article, limited by express provisions of the Constitution. Article 181 expressly provided certain safeguards against unauthorised or arbitrary dismissal or removal from service or reduction in rank. Article 182(1) specifies the authority which alone can make appointments. Article 182(2) expressly provides that the conditions of service shall be governed by such rules as may be made by the appropriate authority. The first proviso lays down: 'It shall not be necessary to make rules regulating the conditions of service of persons employed temporarily on the condition that their employment may be terminated on one month's notice or less; and nothing in this clause shall be construed as requiring the rules regulating the conditions of service of any class of persons to extend to any matter which appears to the rule-making authority to be a matter not suitable for regulation by rule in the case of that class'. Can it be said (1) that it has been left to the discretion of the authority not to make any rules at all regarding the conditions of service and (2) that such rules when made do not possess a binding character? As regards the second question the language of the second clause seems to clearly indicate that the rules are binding. It is true that a discretion is given to the authority not to extend the rules to any matter which appears to it not suitable for regulation by rule in the case of that class; but the discretion does not extend to not making the rules at all. Again, the expression 'shall not be necessary' and 'nothing in this clause shall be construed as requiring' also seem to indicate that the making of the rules is necessary and is required by the clause. The second proviso places certain statutory restrictions and obligations upon the authority in making the rules. It does not seem possible to hold that Article 182 does not 'expressly provide', within the meaning of Article 180, for the making of the rules and for conferring upon them a binding character in law. If that be so, it would necessarily follow that the pleasure of the Governor has been expressly made by the Constitution subject to the rules which he is required to make under Article 182 and that ultimately his 'pleasure' would be operative only to such extent as the rules, which have to be made in accordance with the directions contained in the Article, may permit or in the cases specified in the first proviso. Again, it would hardly be possible to argue that an Act of the appropriate legislature dealing with the conditions of service would not, under Article 182, be binding on the Government; and apparently the intention of the Article is to place the rules on the same level as such an Act."

"In the present cases, however, we are asked to exercise our extraordinary jurisdiction under Article 170 of the Constitution and it is not, therefore, necessary to decide whether the rights secured to the petitioners by the rules made under Article 182(2) are enforceable in a Court of law by action. It is now a firmly established principle that a High Court may, under Article 170, grant redress in an appropriate case even when none is available by way of any usual action or proceedings; and that a manifest wrong or injustice to a citizen shall be relieved. Even if the rules were of the same nature as those in Venkata Rao's case, the High Court will take notice of them while exercising its jurisdiction under Article 170 because the Constitutional provision under which they were made must at least be regarded, in the words of their Lordships of the Privy Council, 'as containing a statutory and solemn assurance that the tenure of office, though at pleasure, will not be subject to capricious or arbitrary action but will be regulated by rule.' Moreover, the pleasure of the President or of the Governor cannot, under our Constitution, be regarded as inclusive of capriciousness or arbitrariness."

It is submitted, with respect, however, that the effect of ART. 182(2) in the foregoing case has not been assessed in the light of clause (3) of ART. 182 which seems to lay down the minimum guarantee in regard to the tenure and conditions of service in two directions,

- (1) that they shall not be varied to his disadvantage, and
- (2) that the person in respect of whom rules would be framed under ART. 182 shall have at least one appeal against any order which punishes or formally censures him; or alters or interprets to his disadvantage any rule affecting his conditions of service; or terminate his employment otherwise than upon his reaching the age fixed for superannuation.

It would thus appear that the mode of redress itself having been provided in ART. 182(3), the dominant intention of the framers of the Constitution seems to be to confine constitutional guarantees to those mentioned in ART. 181 and to the securing of the framing of rules in conformity with the pattern provided in ART. 182. The mode of redress however having been under clause (3) confined to departmental representation, the question of the same being made a subject of action in law, mala fides apart, atleast in the present writer's opinion, does not so much as arise. To read the requirement of ART. 182 otherwise so as to make the breach of any rule framed thereunder actionable, is to rob ART. 181 of its meaning. For, why provide specifically for two constitutional guarantees in ART. 181, if every rule framed under ART. 182 (2) regarding the conditions of the service by itself forms a constitutional guarantee which is to be enforceable in courts? The logic of the Venkata Rao's case is inescapable. (But the student should carefully note that the ruling view of our courts that holds the field is contrary to the one that has been advocated by the writer).

The learned Judge, it is submitted with respect, is right when he holds that ART. 182 is a further fetter on the concept of "tenure during pleasure" in that the terms and conditions of the civil servants can now be imposed only by means of Rules to be made by appropriate authorities. And in fact so very all-embracing is this requirement of the Constitution that care had to be taken to exclude, by means of a carefully worded proviso to clause (2) of ART. 182, which visualise certain cases in which such rules need not be made by the rule-making authorities. But this requirement of the Constitution (viz conformity of Administrative action to Rules), in the nature of things, cannot be made enforceable by courts for the simple reason that the rules are bound to be too many to be rendered amenable to being effectively enforced by means of actions in court. Bindes a rule which is unreasonable could be quashed by courts. There seems to be thus no escape from the requirement of this rule as laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the aforementioned case—no, not even by recourse to ART. 170 of our Constitution. (See further chapter VI.)

32. Tenure during good behaviour and other allied matters

The opening words of ART. 180, (which begins with the expression, "except as expressly provided by the Constitution, every person holds office") during the pleasure of the authorities mentioned in that Article,) by themselves suggest that there are some types of offices under the Constitution where the tenure of office is not the one held at pleasure. This exception has reference to the office which is held "during good behaviour". An instance of this kind is to be seen, for example, in the appointment of the Judges of the High Courts and the Supreme Court of Pakistan. (See Articles 150 and 151 for the Supreme Court Judges, and Articles 166 and 169 for the case of High Court Judges). This type of office can be terminated only on the ground of proved misbehaviour or infirmity of mind or body. These provisions relating to the tenure of office during good behaviour are extended to apply to the cases of "Controller" and "Auditor-General", and "Members of the Public Service Commission" etc. Where a person, who holds office under the Government, during "good behaviour", is dismissed without any misconduct being proved on his part in the manner directed by the Constitution, he can recover damages against the Government. (See Gould v. Stuart, 1896, A.C. p. 575). The principle affirmed in this case was that while the common law doctrine that Crown servants can hold office during the pleasure of the sovereign, was of general application, there could be cases where statute may prescribe terms of service and mode of dismissal at variance with the requirements of the common law, in which case the statute would prevail. An office of good behaviour is an office held under conditions expressly enacted by a statute which departs from the concept of tenure of office being held at pleasure. [See the case of AIR (1952) Madras 865, Makkenna Sambaya v. Makkenna Tirupatayya, where this principle has been enunciated and applied.]

The term 'Misbehaviour' has not been defined in the Constitution, but it goes without saying that it means and includes any improper exercise by the holder of such office of the functions appertaining to the office he holds, such as non-attendance, neglect or refusal to perform the duties thereof [Shrewsbury's case (1610) 9 Co. Rep 42 a]. If the holder of such an office has been proved to be guilty of any infamous conduct, or has been convicted of such an offence as would amount to rendering him unfit to hold the office with a sense of that much dignity and self-respect associated with that office he would be liable to be removed.

Our Constitution does not seem to contemplate the specific kind of tenure regulated by contract of the kind visualised by ART. 310(2) of the Indian Constitution which reads:—

"Notwithstanding that a person holding a civil post under the Union or a State holds office during the pleasure of the President or, as the case may be, of the Governor of the State, any contract under which a person, not being a member of a Defence Service or of an All India Service or of a Civil Service of the Union or a State, is appointed under this Constitution to hold such a post may, if the President or the Governor, as the case may be, deems it necessary in order to secure the services of a person having special qualifications, provide for the payment to him of compensation, if before the expiration of an agreed period that post is abolished or he is, for reasons not connected with any misconduct on his part, required to vacate that post."

Under the English Law, however, even if there is a contract of employment for a stated period, which is terminated before the conclusion of that period without notice or proof of any just cause, no action for damages will lie. [See Dunn v. Queen, (1896) 1 Q.B. 116 (C.A.). See also Denning v. Secretary of State for India-in-Council (1920) 37 TLR 138].

The words, 'dismissal', 'removal', or 'reduction in rank', appearing in our Article 181, and in Article 311(2) of the Indian Constitution, have been interpreted by different courts of India, in different ways. The Allahabad High Court, for instance, in the case of Jayanti Prasad v. State of U.P. AIR (1951) Allahabad, p. 793, said that these words were technical words, indicative of the situations in which a person's services are terminated for misconduct. But other courts have observed that these words indicate various modes in which termination of service could be brought about regardless of the idea of mis-

of dismissal, removal or reduction in

conduct being imputed to the public servant concerned and they are words that are to be taken in their ordinary sense. [See Ishar Dass v. State of Pepsu, A.I.R. (1952) Pepsu, 148, at. p. 151].

So far as the title of our ART. 181 is concerned, it tends to suggest that the protection is in respect of "dismissal, removal from service or reduction in rank" in respect of matters involving disciplinary action. The case of removal of a man from service may be for reasons completely unconnected with any fault on his part and such a removal does not disqualify him from future employment with the Government. But if removal could be shown to be the result of misconduct suspected by the authority responsible for the action, the public servant aggrieved would be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of ART. 181. Besides, it is the action proposed to be taken against the servant which necessitates the giving of notice. Where there is no punitive action to be taken, the principle of ART. 181(2) would not be attracted.

The constitutional safeguards mentioned in ART. 181, are available to every civil servant in the service of the State despite the fact that he holds a temporary post. The Government is authorised to appoint persons on a temporary basis. The contract of service may provide, for instance, that the service of such servant will be terminable by giving to him one month's notice etc., or it may provide that his service will be terminable without any previous notice. In each case it would become necessary to scrutinise the terms of the contract actually entered into if they are not sufficiently indicated in the letter of appointment itself. [See AIR (1955) Allahabad 496, the case of Sharda Prasad Srivastava v. Accountant General, Uttar Pradesh, Allahabad.] But if the giving of notice is not a bona fide move, but is gone through as a matter of form for the purpose of using it as a cloak or pretext for getting rid of a person who has made himself undesirable for some reason, then the object is to remove him from service and the case falls under ART. 181. This is the only way in which assumption as to the existence of a temporary service subject to one month's notice, contained in the proviso to ART. 182 can be reconciled with ART. 181. [See the case of Moed Afzal Khan v. The Federation of Pakistan in PLD (1957) Lahore 17 per Kayani & Sharif JJ.]

Similarly, suspension of a Government servant does not amount to reduction of rank within the meaning of ART. 181. This principle appears to be well settled in India. (See the cases of Provincial Government C.P. and Berar v. Shamsul Hussain, AIR (1949) Nagpur 118; Kali Prosanna Roy v. State of West Bengal AIR (1952) Calcutta 769; Pulin Behari Chakrabarty v. The Divisional Superintendent, Sealdah East Indian Rly and others AIR (1953) Calcutta 45; Dandapani Gouda v. The State of Orissa AIR (1953) Orissa 329). But there may be a case in which suspension is ordered as a substantive punishment under departmental regulations, in which case, however, the principle of ART. 181 would be attracted and the public servant affected would be entitled to be heard before a punishment of that kind could be validly inflicted upon him. But suspension in the sense of mere interruption of work, pending final disposal of the allegations in regard to misconduct made against a public servant, is not within the rule.

The expression 'reduction in rank' has been subject matter of judicial consideration and several High Courts have taken different views in regard to reduction in rank. In a Nagpur case [M. V. Vichoray vs. State of M. P., AIR (1952) Nag. 288], it was held that in the case of a person officiating in a higher post, if he is reverted to his original post in the normal course, there is no question of a punishment or penalty being imposed and the application of the provisions of ART. 311 of the Indian Constitution, which corresponds to our ART. 181, does not arise, but it would be entirely a different thing if such a servant is degraded or reverted to his original rank as a measure of punishment for having committed some offence or for indiscipline or insubordination or misconduct. Such a reversion is in the nature of punishment and is reduction in rank within the meaning of the Constitution. [See also Jatindra Nath v. R. Gupta, AIR (1954) Calcutta 383].

In the case of Muhammad Afzal Khan v. The Federation of Pakistan PLD (1957) Lahore 17, Mr. Justice Kayani, while dealing with the argument that 'removal' within the meaning of ART. 181 'necessarily results from misconduct' and where no misconduct is alleged, principle of ART. 181 is not attracted, observed (at pp. 22-23) :

"For my part, I am not inclined to confine these terms (removal, dismissal and reduction) to cases of misconduct. We shall see later in this judgment that judicial authority has included within the scope of these terms cases of inefficiency and incapacity or unwillingness to work also. And in our own departmental sphere we have sometimes reduced persons in rank because, notwithstanding the best intention on their part, they were not found equal to the rank they were holding. But if this Article is intended to be a check on arbitrary conduct—as it certainly is—then I have no doubt that the context to which these terms apply should not be confined in meaning in any direction for it is not unlikely, in the jungle of arbitrariness that envelops our affairs, that a person, should be removed from service for reasons unconnected with his official duties."

It is submitted with respect, that this is taking too wide a view of the nature of protection extended by ART. 181 to a public servant. Where inefficiency, and incapacity or unwillingness to work are not cases of misconduct—but result, let us say from some dispositions and defects inherent in the person sought to be dealt with—the question of issuing notice to show cause would be meaningless indeed. The situation in such cases would be governed by rules applicable to such persons who have found themselves unequal to the task. Removal for inefficiency or neglect of duty could be conceived as falling within the purposes of protection under ART. 181 only where they are considered to be aspects of misconduct—but not otherwise. [See however for a contrary view in (a) Qazi Hikmat Hussain v. The State of Pakistan, (1958) P.L.D. Karachi, p. 1; (b) Moazzam Husain Khan v. The State of Pakistan, (1958) P.L.D. Karachi, p. 35; see also the case of Parshotam Lal Dhingra v. The Union of India (1958) Supreme Court of India, A.I.R. p. 36 for the statement of the ruling Indian view upon the interpretation of ART. 311(2) of their Constitution.]

The limits within which the principle of Article 181(2) is applicable may be set forth in a summary from as follows :—

- (1) The opportunity to show cause is available only when a civil servant is 'dismissed or removed from service or reduced in rank'. It should be remembered that 'reduction in rank' involves the idea of some sort of action to be taken, or a punishment being inflicted. (See Satish Chandra v. Union of India AIR (1953) S.C. 250: (1953) Supreme Court Report 655). In the case of Shyamal v. State of U.P. AIR (1954) Supreme Court 369, the question was whether compulsory retirement was removal or dismissal within the meaning of ART. 311(2) of the Indian Constitution. The Court said (at p. 374):

"There can be no doubt that the removal—I am using the term synonymously with dismissal—generally implies that the officer is regarded as 'in some manner blemeworthy or deficient, that is to say, that he has been guilty of some misconduct or is lacking in ability or capacity or the will to discharge his duties as he should do. The action of removal taken against him in such circumstances is thus founded and justified on some ground personal to the officer. Such grounds, therefore, involved the levelling of some imputation or charge against the officer which may conceivably be controverted or explained by the officer.'

- (2) There could be cases of punishment which could be departmentally inflicted (as being authorised by rules and regulations) to which the principle of ART. 181 is not attracted. Thus, for instance, penalties like censure, withholding of increment or promotion, reduction to a lower post in a time-scale, recovery from pay of a part or whole of a pecuniary loss caused to Government by negligence or breach of orders, suspension, removal from service and dismissal could be inflicted under Rule 49 of the (Civil Services Classification, Control and Appeal Rules). But it is only in cases where there is dismissal or removal from service or reduction in rank that the opportunity to show cause would be extended. In such cases, therefore, whether or not reasonable opportunity to show cause should be given involves the determination of a question of fact, namely, whether what has actually been done in the case of public servant amounts to his being penalised. This question of fact can only be resolved upon the evidence made available to Court and care should be taken to remember that the form of words used in the order passed against the public servant is not by itself sufficient to determine the nature of the action that has been taken against the public servant. [See the cases of C. Sambandam v. The General Manager, South Indian Railway, Tiruchirapalli, AIR (1953) Madras 54: (1952) 1 Madras Law Journal 540, and Ramesh Chandra v. State of West Bengal AIR (1953) Calcutta 188.]

- (3) The reasonable opportunity of showing cause against proposed punishment may arise at more than one stage—as, for instance, under the Civil Services Conduct Rules, the first opportunity to show cause has to be given at the time when the truth of the allegations is being enquired into, and the second, after the findings have been returned by the Enquiry Officer and it is proposed to take action against the defaulter public servant on the basis of those findings. In the words of the Privy Council in the case of High Commissioners of India and Pakistan v. I.M. Lall, AIR (1948) Privy Council, 121 at p. 126:

"No action is proposed within the meaning of sub-section until a definite conclusion has been come to on the charges, and the actual punishment to follow provisionally determined on. Prior to that stage, the charges are unproved and the suggested punishments are merely hypothetical. It is on that stage being reached that the statute gives the civil servant the opportunity for which sub-section (3) makes provision. Their Lordships . . . see no difficulty in the statutory opportunity being reasonably afforded at more than one stage. If the civil servant has been through an enquiry . . . it would not be reasonable that he should ask for a repetition of that stage, if duly carried out, but that would not exhaust his statutory right, and he would still be entitled to represent against the punishment proposed as the result of the findings of the enquiry."

- (4) In order to give 'adequate' opportunity or 'reasonable opportunity', to show cause, it is necessary that the grounds on which the authority is proposing that penal action should be taken, should be set forth in the notice. In some cases, as has been pointed out by the Privy Council in the case of I. M. Lall referred to above, it would be sufficient to indicate the charges, the evidence on which those charges are put forward and to make it clear that unless the person can on that information show good cause against being dismissed or reduced in rank if all or any of the charges are proved—dismissal or reduction in rank will follow. But no universal rule in this regard could be laid down and each case will have to turn on its own facts. It is of the essence of ART. 181, that the person to be dismissed, reduced in rank must know that punishment is proposed as the punishment for certain acts or omissions on his part and he must be told in the clearest terms possible the grounds on which it is proposed that the penal action be taken. Every servant should be given reasonable opportunity of showing cause why such punishment shall not be imposed.

- (5) It has been held that reasonable opportunity to show cause does not include any idea of a right on the part of a public servant to be heard orally in support of his case. In each case upon an issue being raised it is for the Court to say on the facts and circumstances of a given case whether or not, in fact, the reasonable opportunity to show cause has been extended to a public servant before the penal action was taken against him.
- (6) Provisions of ART. 181 being mandatory, if a dismissal, removal or reduction in rank takes place contrary to its clauses, the public servant aggrieved by the order is entitled to have the orders declared as void and inoperative, and further that he can have a declaration in his favour that he continues to be a member of the service at the date of the institution of the proceedings. [See (1948) P.C. p. 121, Lall's case. Such a servant is also entitled to recover the arrears of his salary. [State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid, AIR (1954), S.C. 245].
- (7) Any attempt to by-pass the requirements of ART. 181 would not be encouraged by our courts. There are bound to be cases in which the authority reducing a public servant in rank, would like to take shelter behind the plea that the action taken by it is due to the logic of administrative policy—when, in fact, it is born only out of a desire to punish, to degrade or to humiliate a public servant. Any colourable contrivance of this kind to circumvent the requirements of ART. 181 would be denounced by our courts and declared as “unconstitutional”. Any attempt to avoid the duty of obeying the mandates of the Constitution is a fraud on power and would be condemned as such by our courts.

(D) JUDICIAL POWER AND THE MARTIAL LAW

198. Concept of Martial Law and our Constitution

The constitutional position in regard to the status of Martial Law in the scheme of our legal order cannot be deciphered merely by making a reference to any actual provisions of our Constitution, and it is legitimate to suppose that the concept of the Martial Law, as known to the pre-Constitution state of the law of our country, continues to prevail under the authority of ART. 224, even after the coming into force of our Constitution.

There are, however, a few significant features of the text of our Constitution, to which reference must be made in an attempt to clarify the constitutional position in regard to “Martial Law” qua the sovereign concept of the Rule of Law as it obtains in our country. Throughout the text of our Constitution no reference has been made to Martial Law as such, except in ART. 196, where, it is provided that notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, the Parliament shall have the power to make any law indemnifying any person in the service of the Federal or a Provincial Government, or any other person, in respect of any act done in connection with the maintenance or restoration of order in any area in Pakistan where martial law was in force, or validate any sentence passed, punishment inflicted, forfeiture ordered or any other act done under martial law in such area”. It would thus appear that imposition of martial law is within the power of the appropriate administrative authorities and the Parliament has the power to pass what are called Acts of Indemnity. ART. 196 of our Constitution corresponds to ART. 34 of the Indian Constitution which is appropriately located in the 3rd part of the Constitution dealing with Fundamental Rights. (See the Appendix)

The other references to martial or military law in our constitution are the following:

In the Fifth Schedule, in Entry No. 1 of List III (the Provincial List), we have an exception of the following kind mentioned: Public order (but not including the use of Naval, Military or Air Force or any other Armed Forces of the Federation in aid of the civil power). In the Federal List, the first two paragraphs of Entry 1 deal with (a) Defence of Pakistan . . . (b) the Naval, Military and Air Forces of the Federation and any other armed forces raised or maintained by the Government of the Federation; armed forces which are not forces of the Federation but are attached to or operating with any of the armed forces of the Federation; any other armed forces of the Federation, including Civil armed forces. In the Chapter relating to fundamental rights, in the 3rd clause of Article 4, we have a clear exception stated in regard to the non-availability of the fundamental rights to members of “the Armed Forces or the Forces charged with the maintenance of public order, for the purpose of ensuring the proper discharge of their duties or the maintenance of discipline among them.” We have also in Article 40 a provision to the effect that the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces shall vest in the President, and the exercise thereof shall be regulated by law.” In the Chapter relating to Services of Pakistan, in Article 180, we have the tenure of office of a member of Defence Service maintained at the same level as that of any person in the Civil Service of Pakistan. It is clear that the constitutional safeguards enacted in ART. 181, are not available in the case of a member of the Defence Service.

199. Some definitions of Martial Law considered

“Martial Law in the proper sense of that term”, so runs the statement as to the meaning of that phrase in Wharton's Law Lexicon ‘means the suspension of ordinary law and the government of a country or part of it by the Military Tribunals.’ It must be clearly distinguished (i) from military law and (ii) from that Martial Law which forms part of the laws and usages of war. The term ‘martial law’ is also sometimes used as meaning the common law right of the Crown to repel force by force in the case of insurrection, invasion or riot and to take such exceptional measures as may be necessary for the purpose of restoring peace and order.

As to the constitutional foundations of the existence of Martial Law, as it is known to the English Common Law, it was observed in Blackstone's Commentaries, Vol. I, p. 413, “For Martial Law, which is built upon no settled principles, but is entirely arbitrary in its decisions, is, as Sir Matthew Hale observes, (in his History of Common Law) in truth and reality no law, but something indulged rather than allowed as law. The necessity of order and discipline in an army is the only thing which can give it countenance; and therefore it ought not to be permitted in time of peace, when the King's Courts are open for all persons to receive justice according to the laws of the land.” [See also Grant v. Gould (1792) 2 H. Bl. 69].

The meaning and scope of Martial Law were set forth with admirable lucidity by Justice Muhammad Munir in a Full Bench case decided by the Lahore High Court reported in P.L.D. (1953) Lahore 528 at 533 (Muhammad Umar Khan v. The Crown), and the present writer can do no better than reproduce some extracts from that decision in an attempt to present in a concise form the statement of law in regard to the true character of Martial Law.

“In constitutional jurisprudence”, said Muhammad Munir, C.J., ‘Martial Law is used at least in four different senses. In the first sense, it is used with reference to the law relating to discipline in the armed forces of the State which is administered by tribunals, called Courts Martial. These courts are constituted for the purpose of regulating the government of the military and their jurisdiction in no circumstances extends to the civilians. In our country, martial law in this sense means the law administered by Courts Martial constituted under the Army Act, the Naval Discipline Act and the Air Force Act.

"In the second sense, the word martial law means 'military Government in occupied territory', and is used to describe the powers of a military commander in times of war in the enemy territory. In this sense, martial law is recognised by Public International Law as a part of the jus belli. The Duke of Wellington had this kind of martial law in mind when in a debate in the House of Lords he said:

'Martial Law is neither more nor less than the will of the general who commands the army. In fact martial law means no law at all.'

"In the third sense in which it is a part of English Constitutional Law, martial law means the rights and obligations of the military under the common and statute law of the country to repel force by force while assisting the civil authorities to suppress riots, insurrections or other disorders in the land. In American Constitutional Law, martial law in this sense is a form of the police power of the State and means law which has application when the military arm does not supersede civil authority but is merely called upon to aid such authority in the execution of its civil functions." (See Rex v. Kenneth, 5 Car. & P. 282; Rex v. Pinney, 5 Car. & P. 254; Phillips v. Eyre, (1870). 6 Q. B. 1.)

After quoting a passage from Chief Justice Tindal's charge to the Bristol Grand Jury (172 English Reports page 966 of the year 1832,) the Chief Justice proceeded to observe: (at p. 536)

"It will be noticed that the justification of this form of martial law, if it can at all be so called, is the common law of England and several statutes which create rights in and impose obligations on citizens and servants of the Crown in the matter of suppression of riots The Privy Council observed in Marais v. G.O.C. Lines of Communications (1902 A.C. 109), that where war prevails the ordinary courts have no jurisdiction over the action of the Military but that it is for the Civil Courts to decide whether a state of war exists or not.

"In seeking to discover the source and reason of Martial Law, the best course to adopt is to find an answer to a few simple questions. In case of war or invasion do the military have a right to act suo motu? If so, do they have the same right where there is a riot, insurrection, revolt or rebellion which, if not suppressed immediately, may become a successful revolution? If the answer to both these questions be in the affirmative, a third question, and that is the most important question, immediately presents itself, namely, what are the powers of the military when called upon to act in any such contingency? Can they for the purpose of suppressing the riot or rebellion, make their own Rules and Regulations, set up their own courts to enforce such Rules and Regulations and thus infringe the right of freedom of person and of enjoyment of property to which citizen are entitled under the ordinary law in peace time? If constitutional jurisprudence furnishes an answer to these questions, that is martial law sui generis."

The foregoing extracts from the judgment of Justice Muhammad Munir represent the condensed essence of what the Courts in England and in our country have held to be the true scope and character of martial law.

It would be noticed that the right to administer force against force is a common law right and the martial law, if it is law at all, is a law of necessity which must surrender to the rule of law as recognised and enforced by ordinary civil courts of the country when the conditions that led to its enforcement have ceased to prevail and society returns to state of normalcy. To the same effect were the observations of Lord Halsbury in the case of Tilonko v. Attorney-General of Natal in (1907) A.C. page 93, (P.C.) where his Lordship observed as follows:—

Martial Law—as law of necessity

"The notion that 'martial law' exists by reason of the proclamation—an expression which the learned counsel has more than once used—is an entire delusion. The right to administer force against force in actual war does not depend upon the proclamation of martial law at all. It depends upon the question whether there is war or not. If there is war, there is the right to repel force by force."

And then his Lordships proceeded to observe :—

"But it is found convenient and decorous, from time to time, to authorise what are called 'courts' to administer punishments, and to restrain by acts of repression the violence that is committed in time of war, instead of leaving such punishment and repression to the casual action of persons acting without sufficient consultation, or without sufficient order or regularity in the procedure in which things alleged to have been done are proved. But to attempt to make these proceedings of so-called 'courts-martial' administering summary justice under the supervision of a military commander analogous to the regular proceedings of courts of justice is quite illusory".

The Acts of Indemnity are usually passed after the conclusion of the period of martial law. The purpose of such legislation is to deprive the civil courts of their jurisdiction to undertake a judicial review of the acts committed during the martial regime by the military officers and others acting in their aid. Such, for instance, was the legislation passed by means of a pre-Constitution Ordinance by the Governor-General acting under S. 42 of the Government of India Act, 1935, being Ordinance No. II of 1953, indemnifying the servants of the Crown and other persons in respect of acts done by them in good faith under martial law and validate sentences passed by special military courts. It would be useful to reproduce some of the provisions of that Ordinance to show the extent to which the jurisdiction of courts to enquire into acts committed by the servants of the Crown had been curtailed :—

"S. 3 (1)—No suit, prosecution or other legal proceeding shall lie in any court against any servant of the Crown for or on account of or in respect of any act ordered or done by him or purporting to have been ordered or done by him in the martial law area during the martial law period for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order or of carrying into effect any regulation, order or direction issued by any authority responsible for the administration of martial law in the said area to which he was subordinate; and no suit, prosecution or other legal proceedings shall lie in any court against any other person for or on account of or in respect of any act done or purporting to have been done by him under any order of a servant of the Crown given for any such purpose as aforesaid:

Provided that the act was done in good faith and in a reasonable belief that it was necessary for the purpose intended to be served thereby."

"S. 6—All sentences passed during the martial law period by a court or other authority constituted or appointed under martial law and acting in a judicial capacity shall be deemed to have been lawfully passed, and all sentences executed according to the tenor thereof shall be deemed to have been lawfully executed."

"S. 7 (1)—Every person confined under and by virtue of a sentence passed by a court or other authority constituted or appointed under martial law and acting in a judicial capacity shall continue liable to confinement until the sentence, reduced by remissions, if any, earned under the rules applicable to the serving of such sentence, is served, or until he is released by order of the Central Government."

This legislation was declared intra vires in the case of Muhammad Umar Khan v. The Crown (PLD. 1953, Lah. 528) referred to above.

Tilonko vs.
A.G. of Natal.

The purpose of an Act of Indemnity

As to the legal import and character of Indemnity Act, Chief Justice Cockburn in the case of Phillips v. Eyre, reported in 1869 4 Q.B. page 225, made some observations which are instructive in this context as they help the comprehension of the reason why such a legislation is passed:

"There can be no doubt that every so-called Indemnity Act involves a manifest violation of justice, inasmuch as it deprives those who have suffered wrongs of their vested right to the redress which the law would otherwise afford them, and gives immunity to those who have inflicted those wrongs, not at the expense of the community for whose alleged advantage the wrongful acts were done, but at the expense of individual who, innocent possibly of all offence, have been subjected to injury and outrage often of the most aggravated character. It is equally true, as was forcibly urged on us, that such legislation may be used to cover acts of most tyrannical, arbitrary and merciless character, acts not capable of being justified or palliated even by the plea of necessity, but prompted by local passions, prejudices, or fears—acts not done with the temper and judgment which those in authority are bound to bring to the exercise of so fearful a power, but characterised by reckless indifference to human suffering and an utter disregard of the dictates of common humanity. On the other hand, however, it must not be forgotten that against any abuse of local legislative authority in such a case protection is provided by the necessity of the assent of the Sovereign, acting under the advice of Ministers, themselves responsible to Parliament. We may rest assured that no such enactment would receive the royal assent unless it were confined to acts honestly done in the suppression of existing rebellion, and under the pressure of the most urgent necessity. The present indemnity is confined to acts done in order to suppress the insurrection and rebellion, and the plea contains consequently the necessary averments that the grievances complained of were committed during the continuance of the rebellion, and were used for its suppression, and were reasonably and in good faith considered by the defendant to be necessary for the purpose; and it will, therefore, be incumbent on the defendant to make good these averments in order to support his plea."

Martial Law
and the U.S.
Constitution.

With regard to the concept of Martial Law as it is known to Constitutional Law of America, a few words needs must be said. Section 4 of Article IV of the U.S. Constitution is usually invoked for the purpose of justifying the imposition of martial law. That provision is in the following terms:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence."

Further it should not be forgotten that it is the President who under the United States Constitution is the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. (See Section 2 of ART. II of the United States Constitution.)

The President under our Constitution too has nevertheless vested in him the Supreme Command of the Armed Forces but there is a fundamental difference in regard to this Constitutional conception as it is known to the two systems of jurisprudence: under our Constitution the power to declare war and peace lies with the Prime Minister and his Cabinet and the exercise of the Supreme Command by the President "shall be regulated by law". The American President has unqualified power to act as the executive of the U.S. Government but our President is constitutionally bound to act under advice in this field. The United States President, in his capacity as the chief executive, has his duty limited not merely to enforcing the rights, duties and obligations growing out of the Constitution but his power also extends to these matters as they stem from the Constitution, the international relations of the United States and to all the protection implied by the nature of Government. The Congress under the United States Constitution has the power to declare war but should the situation, resulting from acts of external aggression confront the country, the President, as the chief executive, has all the authority to take steps to meet the challenge—for then the country would be deemed to be actually at war. The war can only be declared by the Congress, that is, it alone can put the country into a state of war ab initio. (See Cunningham v. David Neagle (1890) 135 U.S. 1 at p. 64: 34 Law. Ed. 55).

The two theories of martial law as reflected in the decisions of the Supreme Court have been stated by way of a summary statement in the Senate Edition of the Constitution of the United States of America, 1952 Edition, at page 398, as follows:

"By one, which stems from the Petition of Rights, 1628, the common law knows no such thing as martial law; at any rate martial law is not established by official authority of any sort, but arises from the nature of things, being the law of paramount necessity, of which necessity the civil courts are the final judges. By the other theory, martial law can be validly and constitutionally established by supreme political authority in war time."

(The student is referred to Charles Fairman's The Law of Martial Rule, Chicago 1930, and the case of Ex Parte Milligan of the year 1866, 18 Lawyers Edition, page 281, for a detailed study of the constitutional position as it obtains in the United States on the question relating to martial law).

The limits within which martial law (if it be called law at all), being a law of necessity is available as a defence in the ordinary civil courts, were stated by Chief Justice Muhammad Munir in the case of Muhammad Umar Khan v. Crown, PLD (1953) Lahore 528, referred to above:

"Whether where the defence of necessity and good faith cannot be founded on civil law, e.g. right of private defence or the use of force to disperse unlawful assemblies and there is no indemnity bill, it will be recognised by civil courts is an open question though observations occur in several cases clearly indicating that such necessity will be recognised as a good defence. (Phillips v. Eyre 1870 6 Q.B. 1, and Tilonko v. Attorney-General of Natal 1907 A.C. page 93). If martial law is law and its limits are prescribed by necessity, then :

- (1) Not only the Crown has the prerogative to proclaim martial law but without any such proclamation the military can take over where by war, insurrection, rebellion or tumult civil authority is deposed, suspended or paralysed;
- (2) all acts done by the military which are either justified by the civil law or were dictated by necessity and done in good faith will be protected, even if there be no bill of indemnity;
- (3) while preventive action for the duration of the martial law will be valid, punitive action will generally be invalid;
- (4) martial law will cease ipso facto with the cessation of the necessity for it; and
- (5) sentences of confinement by military courts will expire with the expiry of the martial law." (P. 539)

If any or all of the above consequences that would ordinarily ensue upon the cessation of the period of martial law, are to be prevented from taking effect, it is for the Legislature to pass an Act of Indemnity and make suitable provisions defining the extent to which the consequences emanating from the enforcement of martial law, after the cessation of its period of enforcement, should not be given judicial effect by the ordinary Civil Courts in this country. And this legislative power is conferred only on the Parliament. (See ART. 196 of our Constitution.)

Martial Law fourthly and finally as a concept of international law enters as an aspect of jus belli. In that sense Martial Law is 'incidental to the state of solemn war and appertains to the law of the nations.' The municipal laws have nothing to do and therefore cannot provide for Martial Law in this sense: it is the province of international law to determine the precise implication of this term.

200. Canadian Governor-General's Right to Proclaim Martial Law

On January 16th, 1838, the Attorney and Solicitor General, Sir John Campbell and Sir R. M. Rolfe in their joint opinion tendered advice to the Governor-General of Canada on the question relating to his right to proclaim Martial Law: after remarking that such a right flowed, as a necessary consequence of the 'undoubted prerogative of His Majesty for the public safety to resort to the exercise of Martial Law against open enemies or traitors', the authors of the opinions emphasised that it is not essential for Martial Law Regime to be validly imposed that it should be preceded by a proclamation to that effect. Proclamation in such cases merely constituted a notice to the public generally as to the existence of conditions that had compelled the sovereign power to resort to the imposition of the Martial Law. In the 'opinion' it was further observed:

"The right of resorting to such an extremity is a right arising from and limited by the necessity of the case—quod necessitas cogit, defendit. For this reason we are of opinion that the prerogative does not extend beyond the case of persons taken in open resistance, and with whom, by reason of the suspension of the ordinary tribunals, it is impossible to deal according to the regular course of justice. When the regular courts are open, so that criminals might be delivered over to them to be dealt with according to law, there is not, as we conceive, any right in the Crown to adopt any other course of proceeding. Such power can only be conferred by the Legislature, as was done by the Acts passed in consequence of the Irish rebellions of 1798 and 1803, and also of the Irish Coercion Act of 1833.

"From the foregoing observations, your Lordship will perceive that the question, how far Martial Law, when in force, supersedes the ordinary Tribunals, can never in our view of the case, arise. Martial Law is stated by Lord Hale to be in truth no law, but something rather indulged than allowed as a law, and it can only be tolerated because, by reason of open rebellion, the enforcing of any other law has become impossible. It cannot be said in strictness to supersede the ordinary tribunals, inasmuch as it only exists by reason of those tribunals having been already practically superseded."

201. The concept of Military Law

Before concluding our consideration of this topic of martial law we might add a few observations to clarify the concept of martial law in the sense in which it more appropriately is described Military Law. Military Law in this context is distinguishable from civil law and is that branch of law which regulates the Constitution, Powers and Jurisdiction of Courts-Martial to punish persons subject to that law. Military Courts are to be distinguished from courts-martial; generally speaking a military court in occupied territory is, as its name suggests, a court which is set up by the Military Commander to try persons who commit offences in the territories which are under military occupation, whereas a military court for Prisoners of War is a Tribunal, which is convened by a detaining power pursuant to the International Convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war to try cases of alleged offences committed by Prisoners of War in captivity. Generally speaking, military courts enforce martial law whereas Courts-Martial enforce Military Law. (See Military Courts Manual by Treadwell, London, 1945). Certain pieces of legislation exist on the statute book of Pakistan like the Army Act, 1952, the Naval Discipline Act, 1934, the Air Force Act, 1953, which more appropriately may be described as Military Law in this sense. Under the Army Act, for example, General, Field-General, and District, and Summary Courts-Martial are set up (see S. 80 of the Pakistan Army Act, 1952): these Courts-Martial are thus, in effect, statutory courts and their procedure and jurisdiction are controlled by the provisions contained in these Acts. Their main function is to enforce military law in respect of soldiers and such civilians, mentioned therein, as have, by reason of their employment or occupation, rendered themselves subject to military law. When a person joins the armed forces of our Country he becomes subject to military law, a law which regulates the whole of his life and prescribes detailed rules as to his rights, liabilities and obligations as an officer who is amenable to the jurisdiction of Courts-Martial established under these Acts. (See Military Courts Manual by G. W. Treadwell, London, 1945, pp. 12-13).

In England, as far back as in 1689, by the first Mutiny Act, the law relating to the maintenance of discipline in the standing army was put on a statutory basis and since then the law has to be re-enacted by Parliament annually. This is also true of the Air Force Act, but not of the Naval Discipline Act. In our country, however, all these Acts are perpetual Acts in the sense that they have not to be renewed periodically. The student of the historical development of English constitutional law will recall the bitter experience with its Stuart Kings that led the British Parliament to insist on an annual re-enactment of the Army Act; this was the constitutional device evolved by Parliament to be able to exercise an annual control over the maintenance of King's Armed Forces. Each year the Army Act had to be re-enacted and of course if Parliament did not re-enact it the maintenance of standing Army (and the expenditure involved in maintaining it) would become unconstitutional.

202. Personnel of the Armed Forces and their relationship with General Law of the Land.

To the student of constitutional law the actual content of these three Acts that govern the Armed Forces of our country is not so important: what is important for him is to grasp the legal relationship which the personnel of the Armed Forces sustain to the general system of the civil law.

Certain propositions in this behalf are well established and we will proceed to expound them in as brief a measure as possible.

(1) A soldier who is liable to be dealt with under the Army Act, Naval Discipline Act or Air Force Act, continues to be liable under the ordinary civil law. By becoming a soldier, a person does not cease to be a citizen. He continues to be subject to the ordinary law of this country. Most of the offences punishable under the Penal Code of Pakistan are also punishable under the Army Act. No doubt, a special procedure for the trial of offences by courts-martial is prescribed but the overall liability to being proceeded against under the ordinary civil law of the land is not thereby abrogated.

We will illustrate this by making a reference to the Army Act: Section 94 of the Pakistan Army Act (XXXIX of 1952) consigns the actual choice of the kind of court, whether civil or court-martial, where an offender is liable to be tried in respect of a civil offence, to the discretion of a prescribed officer, and if that officer decides that the proceedings in respect of a given offender shall be taken before a court-martial such a person shall be detained in Military custody. Under S. 95, power has been given to the ordinary criminal court, having jurisdiction in the matter, to require, if it is of the opinion that proceedings against an offender ought to be instituted before itself, the prescribed officer at his option either to deliver the offender to the nearest magistrate to be proceeded against according to law or to postpone further proceedings pending a reference to the Central Government, and under S. 96 is preserved the superiority of the civil court in respect of trial of a person who has been convicted or acquitted by a court martial. The Section provides :

- "96.—(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in section 26 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, or in section 403 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, a person who has been convicted or acquitted by a court martial, or whose case has been summarily disposed of under this Act or the rules framed under this Act, may be afterwards tried by a criminal court for the same offence or on the same facts.
- (2) If a person, who has been awarded a punishment for an offence by a court martial or otherwise in pursuance of this Act, is afterwards tried by a criminal court for the same offence or on the same facts, that court shall, in awarding punishment, have regard to any punishment he may already have undergone in respect of that offence."

It should be noticed that this section is to prevail over S. 26 of the General Clauses Act or S. 403 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

These sections are as follows:—

(a) S. 26 of the General Clauses Act:

"Where an act or omission constitutes an offence under two or more enactments, then the offender shall be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of those enactments, but shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same offence."

(b) S. 403 of Criminal Procedure Code:

"403 (1)—A person who has been once tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction for an offence and convicted or acquitted of such offence shall, while such conviction or acquittal remains in force, not be liable to be tried again for the same offence, nor on the same facts for any other offence for which a different charge from the one made against him might have been made under S. 236, or for which he might have been convicted under S. 237.

(2) A person acquitted or convicted of any offence may be afterwards tried for any distinct offence for which a separate charge might have been made against him on the former trial under section 235, sub-section (1).

(3) A person convicted of any offence constituted by any act causing consequences which, together with such act, constituted a different offence from that of which he was convicted may be afterwards tried for such last-mentioned offence, if the consequences had not happened, or were not known to the Court to have happened, at the time when he was convicted.

(4) A person acquitted or convicted of any offence constituted by any acts may, notwithstanding such acquittal or conviction, be subsequently charged with, and tried for, any other offence constituted by the same acts which he may have committed if the court by which he was first tried was not competent to try the offence with which he is subsequently charged.

- (5) Nothing in this Section shall affect the provisions of S. 26 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, or S. 188 of this Code."

It should be noticed that S. 26 of the General Clauses Act prohibits a second punishment being inflicted in respect of the same offence for which under one of the two or more enactments a man has already been prosecuted and punished. S. 403, however, prevents an ordinary criminal court from trying an offence which has been dealt with by a court of competent jurisdiction for an offence and convicted or acquitted of such offence while such conviction or acquittal remains in force.

This principle of the paramountcy of the ordinary civil courts would also be found preserved in the Naval Discipline Act of 1934 (See S. 101), and the Air Force Act of 1953 (See S. 125).

(2) "When a soldier is put on trial on a charge of crime", says Dicey, "obedience to the superior's order is not of itself a defence. He is bound to obey any lawful order which he receives from his military superior, but a soldier cannot any more than a civilian avoid responsibility for breach of the law by pleading that he broke the law in bona fide obedience of the order (say) of the Commander-in-Chief. Hence the position of a soldier in theory and may be in practice, is a difficult one. He may, as it has been well said, be liable to be shot by a court martial if he disobeys an order, and to be hanged by a Judge and Jury if he obeys it." (See his Law of the Constitution IX Ed. pp. 302-3). In the case of Reg. v. Smith, decided by the Cape of Good Hope Supreme Court (17 Cape of Good Hope Supreme Court Reports 561 of the year 1900) Solomon J. adopted the rule laid down in Manual of Military Law as a reasonable and proper rule to apply in cases where a soldier has obeyed unlawful orders of his superior. That rule states "that if the Commands are obviously illegal, an inferior would be justified in questioning or even in refusing to execute such commands, but as long as the orders of the superior are not obviously and decidedly in opposition to the Law of Land, or to the well known established custom of the Army, so long must they meet with complete and unhesitating obedience. There is an opinion of Mr. Justice Willes to the effect that an officer or soldier, acting under orders from his superior which are not necessarily or manifestly illegal, would be justified." [See Keighly v. Bell (1866), 4 F & F, 763 at p. 790].

(3) The civil courts have the power by their process to undo the effect of what the courts-martial have done provided that it can be shown that they have acted in excess of their jurisdiction. Thus if courts-martial assume jurisdiction in respect of persons not liable to be tried by them, a writ of habeas corpus will issue directing the detenu to be released forthwith. (See M. S. K. Ibrat v. The Commanding Officer, H.M.P.S. "Dilawar" and others in P.L.D. (1956), Karachi 324).

203. Controlling Jurisdiction of the High Court and the Courts-Martial

The controlling jurisdiction of the High Courts under ART. 170 would also reach the determinations of Courts-Martial convened under the Naval Discipline Act, 1934, Pakistan Army Act, 1952, and the Pakistan Air Force Act of the year 1953, provided it could be shown that these Courts-Martial have acted without jurisdiction. The earliest case of considerable relevance upon the subject is the one already referred to, namely Grant v. Gould, (1792) 2 H. Bl. 69, where it was observed with respect to the jurisdiction of the power of the Supreme Court (at p. 100):

"This court being established in this country by positive law, the proceedings of it, and the relation in which it will stand to the Courts of Westminster Hall, must depend upon the same rules, with all other courts which are instituted, and have particular powers given them, and whose acts, therefore, may become the subject of application to the Courts of Westminster Hall for a prohibition. Naval Courts Martial, Military Courts Martial, Courts of Admiralty, Courts of Prize, are all liable to the controlling authority, which the Courts of Westminster Hall have from time to time exercised, for the purpose of preventing them from exceeding the jurisdiction given to them."

In later cases, however, the scope of the power of interference of Civil Courts with the determinations of Courts-Martial has been considerably narrowed down and it would appear from as recent a case as Rex v. Secretary of State for War ex parte Martyn (1949) 1 All E.R. 242, that the principle to be deduced is that when the finding of a Court-Martial is challenged in a Civil Court, all that need to be determined is whether the Court-Martial had jurisdiction to try a particular person. This question being answered in the affirmative, the further issue, whether proper rules of procedure had or had not been followed, will not be a matter for the King's Bench to determine. That Court can only interfere with Military Courts and matters of Military Law in so far as the civil rights of the soldier or other person with whom they deal may be affected. The provision which formed the subject matter of debate in that case was Rule 34(c) of the Rules of Procedure, 1926, framed under S. 70 of the Army Act, 1881, which had provided that "If the Court allow the special plea, they shall record their decision and the reasons for it, and report it to the convening authority and adjourn; such a decision shall not require any confirmation, and the convening authority shall either forthwith convene another Court for the trial of the accused, or order the accused to be released". The question before the Court was whether, in the event of a convening authority not forthwith convening another Court-Martial, the second belated Court-Martial will have jurisdiction to try the offender. Lord Goddard in that very case remarked : to allow this contention would amount to deciding that the members of the Court-Martial were wrong in holding that they had been convened in accordance with the Rules of Procedure. That, according to the learned Judge, was a question essentially within their competence to decide, it being a matter "of Military procedure" and consequently it would be one to interfere with which, the Court of King's Bench would have no jurisdiction.

It is submitted with respect, that this is taking too narrow a view of the extent and reach of the controlling power of the High Court with respect to the determinations of Courts-Martial. The case cited, prima facie would certainly be establishing a departure from the wide range of power which according to the rule laid down in Grant v. Gould vests in the High Court. To allege that all questions of defect of jurisdiction must emerge from sources external to and apart from the breaches of the provisions of Military Law, would be tantamount to taking too narrow a view of the situation. It is submitted that, in the last resort, it is immaterial whether the breach of either the provisions of statute or rules made thereunder are regarded as furnishing the basis for holding that the Courts-Martial have acted in either total absence or excess of their jurisdiction. In each case, it remains to be seen whether the breach or violation of the provision of law or rules is one that affects jurisdiction or is again one which may be viewed as being something incidental to the exercise of jurisdiction lawfully assumed by the Court-Martial.

In yet another case Rex. v. Officer-Commanding Depot Battalion etc. ex parte Elliott, (1949) 1 All E.R. 373, the ground of attack against the validity of Court Martial's determination was based on the alleged infringement of certain rules which had provided for the bringing up of offenders for trial before Court-Martial within certain time-limit. The Court of King's Bench Division presided over by Lord Goddard refused the writ (it is submitted, rightly), remarking that the contravention of a provision of that kind would be no ground for the exercise of controlling jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division.

In both of these cases it would appear that the only reason that the Court gave for declining jurisdiction was the fact that the persons complaining against the determinations of Courts-Martial were found to be subject to Military Law.

It is submitted that the issue whether or not a person is subject to Military Law is not decisive of the question whether the Court-Martial had or had not the jurisdiction to deal with him in the way it did. The mere finding of the subject-hood to Military Law does not conclude the issue of jurisdiction of the Court-Martial ; in fact, cases could be conceived where the Court-Martial may be said to be acting in the absence or excess of its jurisdiction, merely because it had violated the mandatory provisions of law that defined its jurisdiction. In such cases it would hardly be disputed that the Court-Martial would be acting without any jurisdiction, and that its determination would be a nullity. The defect of jurisdiction of Courts-Martial would arise, and it is submitted can only arise, when there is contravention of some provision of military law—and a non-compliance with the provisions of military law that deal with the question of a person being liable under the Military Law is only one form of defect of jurisdiction. How could it then be said that if only a person is proved to be subject to Military Law he cannot be heard to say that in his case Court-Martial acted without jurisdiction in dealing with him? Similarly, the consideration that Civil Courts would interfere with the determinations of Courts-Martial only when civil rights of the person aggrieved are thereby affected, does not do justice to, much less clearly present, the principle involved in the maintenance of so rigid an attitude towards the scope of the controlling jurisdiction of the High Court. For any writ to issue to an inferior tribunal, the person approaching the High Court must show that he is aggrieved by the determination of that inferior tribunal—in other words, that his rights have been adversely affected. If by the expression 'civil rights' is meant the aggregate of a person's rights to life, liberty and property, there is no harm in using that expression—for it is undoubtedly true that, unless there is actual or threatened invasion of some well defined right to life, liberty and property, the Courts will not entertain petitions for the issue of writs.

In this context, it is instructive to consider the case of Rex v. Mansergh (1861), 1 B & S 400, where the question was whether a writ of certiorari to quash an order of petitioner's dismissal passed by the Court-Martial could issue even on the ground that the Court-Martial had no jurisdiction to try the petitioner. It was alleged in that case that at or about the time of the offence the petitioner was not in the Indian Service but in the 15th Regiment of Foot stationed in England and the Chief of the Indian Army had no jurisdiction to convene a Court-Martial for his trial.

It should be remembered that the sentence awarded to the petitioner was one of dismissal and not that of, either sentence of imprisonment, or of death. The prayer for the issue of writ was rightly refused upon the view that a person who enters in Military Service virtually surrenders himself at the will and pleasure of the Sovereign in so far as the term of his office is concerned and that, such a person cannot be heard afterwards to complain that he has been wrongfully dismissed. If the Sovereign can terminate his service at its will and pleasure then the question that this was done by a Court-Martial that did not have jurisdiction to do so ceases to be relevant.

It is no doubt true that the judgment of the Court proceeded upon the basis of a distinction between infringement of civil rights and the rights affecting Military status of the petitioner, and any one reading the judgments of the three Judges who presided the Court, will gain the impression that according to their Lordships, Civil Courts will interfere only if, as a result of what the Court-Martial does, the civil rights of a person subject to Military discipline are affected. The expression 'civil right' has not been defined in any of the judgments that were delivered in the case but from the facts of that case it would appear that the right to be retained in Service was not considered such a civil right so that an invasion of that right could give rise to a cause of action with respect to which controlling jurisdiction of the superior court could be validly exercised.

It is submitted that the decisions cited above are no reliable guide for the purpose of determining the extent of the power of the High Court under our Constitution to interfere with the determinations of the Court Martial. If the authority of Grant v. Gould is given its full effect, the jurisdiction of High Court in certiorari and prohibition (as also in habeas corpus) proceedings would be as broad as it would be in any other case where determinations of other inferior tribunals are involved.

It is important to remember that in England the question of the efficaciousness of the controlling jurisdiction of the High Court has lost much of its importance in view of the passing of Court Martial (Appeals) Act of 1951 (14 and 15 Geo. VI c. 46), whereunder a person convicted by Court-Martial may, with the leave of Court-Martial, lodge an appeal against his conviction.

204. A Comment on ART. 160—Ouster of the Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of our country, which could have conceivably been exercised under ART. 160 to examine the proceedings of Courts-Martial, has been expressly taken away by that Article itself, and a person aggrieved by the determinations of Court-Martial can only invoke the jurisdiction of High Court under ART. 170. Although, the High Court would give due weight to the principle that a person subject to Military Law has by his own free will engaged himself to submit to that law for what it is worth, yet despite this consideration, but consistently with another principle, namely that Courts-Martial themselves being creatures of statute must move within the well defined area of their authority described therein and that they are, therefore, under a statutory obligation to conduct themselves in accordance with the procedure described therein, the High Court will vigilantly guard against any transgression of their jurisdictional powers and would see to it that they are effectively confined within the area of authority reserved to them under the law. (E) THE JUDICIARY AND THE ELECTION LAW

205. A comment on ART. 146

Article 146 of our Constitution provides:

"No election to the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to such authority and in such manner as may be provided by Act of Parliament."

The adjudication of disputes with regard to the validity of election is thus taken out from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts and a special procedure has been prescribed by recourse to which alone the elections, in the first instance, can be called in question under the Article in question. An election petition has to be presented to such authority and in such manner as may be directed by Act of Parliament: it would appear, therefore, that special legislation is necessary before effect can be given to the provisions of ART. 146. Until provision is made by an Act of Parliament, the making of election petition will continue to be covered by pre-existing legislation on the subject which has been preserved and perpetuated by ART. 224 of our Constitution. Hitherto, the law covering the presentation of election petitions arising out of Provincial Elections and settlement of disputes concerning them has been regulated by Corrupt Practices Order of 1936 and the rules made by the Provincial Legislatures in that behalf. The Corrupt Practices Order in its Third Part, Para 2, lays down as follows :—

"No election shall be called in question except by election petition presented in accordance with the provisions of this Part of this order."

The procedure is provided in Part III, and in para 4 thereof provision is made for the Governor to appoint:

"Commissioners for the trial of petition three persons who are or have been, or are eligible to be appointed Judges of a "High Court, and shall appoint one of them to be the President."

The corrupt practices like bribery, undue influence, personation, etc., have been mentioned in the First Schedule of the said Corrupt Practices Order of 1936.

It is essential to remember that what ART. 146 prevents ordinary courts from doing is to call in question the election of the candidate. But it has been judicially determined that this Article cannot be interpreted to mean that in no conceivable case can an ordinary court enquire into the validity of the proceedings conducted by the Election Tribunal itself and thus indirectly interfere with its conclusions. [See the discussion under the Writ of Quo Warranto, in the Chapter relating to Constitutional Remedies and the case of Hari Vishnu Kamath vs. Ahmad Ishaque & others AIR (1955), S.C. p. 233, which involved interpretation of the Indian Article 329-B, which corresponds to our ART. 146 and the Case of Md. Saeed vs. Election Tribunal, PLD (1957), S.C. 91.]

Can the Supreme Court grant special leave to appeal under the powers reserved to it under ART. 160, in a case where a person has been unseated by the Order of Governor of a Province consequent upon a report made to him by an Election Tribunal appointed by him to inquire into and adjudicate election disputes under the Corrupt Practices Order of 1936? Could the order passed by the Governor in such a case be regarded as Judgment, Decree, Order or Sentence of a Tribunal, within the meaning of ART. 160? Or, in the alternative, could the report of the Tribunal to the Governor be described as falling under the expression Judgment, Decree, Order or Sentence? The answer to these questions must depend on the view that the Courts might take of the legal character of the Order passed by the Governor consequent upon report made to him by the Tribunal. If the Governor has no discretion but to accept the report and give effect to it, his order may well be regarded as an order of the Tribunal and thus rendered subject to the appellate power of the Supreme Court. (See further discussion on this topic under the "Writ of Quo-Warranto", in Chapter VI).

The validity of election of the President of Pakistan under ART. 32(3) shall not be questioned in any Court. Does this injunction cover the case of a person who does not fulfil the qualifications described by ART. 32(2) as being in the nature of conditions precedent for a person being deemed as duly qualified to contest election to the office of the President? What happens if a non-Muslim gets elected, or the person who is not a citizen of Pakistan or one who is less than forty years of age, gets declared duly elected as President. Can his election be questioned in a Court of law? The provisions of the First Schedule confer upon the Chief Election Commissioner the power to scrutinise the nomination papers of the various candidates and pronounce upon the validity of these nomination papers: it would seem to follow from this that should he decide to accept the nomination paper of a person in whose case the qualifications prescribed by ART. 32(2) are not fulfilled, there is no means of rectifying the error, if ART. 32(3) is construed as throwing a mantle of protection over even the misdeeds of the Election Commissioner so glaring as the one supposed in this case.

It is suggested that the way out of these difficulties is to confine the question of the immunity given by ART. 32 (3) with regard to the competence of courts to question the validity of President's election to the inviolability of all requirements regarding the electioneering process—except the questions relating to compliance with the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution. The argument in support of this view is that when a person does not fulfil the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution he cannot even offer himself as a candidate for election—and as that is a matter which is external to the total electioneering process and constitutes a defect in the holder of the office it is amenable to being inquired into by means of a writ of quo-warranto. The Election Commissioner has no jurisdiction to abrogate the requirements of ART. 32(2) in the case of a candidate who contests the Presidential election and he cannot be suffered to do so by giving a perverse finding of fact in favour of holding a given nomination paper to be valid. Paragraph 4 of Schedule I enjoins that any member of National or Provincial Assembly may nominate for election a person qualified for election as President, and under paragraph 5, the scrutiny into the validity of the nomination paper is to be held by the Chief Election Commissioner and it is after this determination has been made, namely that the nomination paper is valid, that the person whose nomination paper is valid is put on path to being elected—he will be forthwith elected if there is no other rival candidate having a valid nomination in his favour, or he will be duly elected after the contest at the poll. Is determination of the question relating to the validity of nomination paper not a condition precedent to the commencement of the electioneering process—so as to take it out of the sphere of immunity afforded by ART. 32 (3) to the validity of the election of the President from being called into question by Court?

In other elections, the question as to the validity of nomination papers is normally regarded as being a matter inquirable by means of an election petition—but this is so, not because nomination is a step in the electioneering process but because statutes like Corrupt Practices Order etc. by artificiality of construction have expressly declared these questions as being within the competence of Election Commissioners to inquire into and adjudicate.

SECTION—III

Jurisdictional Aspects of the Superior Courts

206. Constitutional limit on the number of Supreme Court Judges

ARTS. 148 to 164 deal with the Establishment, Constitution and Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The number of Judges who are to preside the Supreme Court has been determined under the Constitution: Chief Justice and "not more than six other Judges". The Parliament may, however, by an Act increase the number of other Judges. This constitutional limitation on the number of Judges is an important safeguard that ensures the autonomy and independence of the Supreme Court as a legal institution and precludes the possibility of the executive "packing" the court in the manner in which at least one of the American Presidents had threatened to do in the case of the U.S. Supreme Court merely because in his opinion the Supreme Court of the U.S. did not act properly in the discharge of its judicial functions.

Number of Supreme Court Judges fixed under the Constitution to avoid the Executive "Packing the Court".

It would be recalled that the judicial invalidation of a great deal of New Deal Legislation sponsored by Roosevelt regime led to the formulation of that President's specific programme for securing the re-organization of the inferior federal courts to attain greater efficiency and the appointment of one New Justice, up to six in number, for every justice of the Supreme Court who, having passed the age of 70 years and served for 10 years, failed to retire. The proposal shocked many who felt that this step, if taken, would threaten the independence of judiciary. The President, in his radio report, to the people, of March 9, 1937, supported the proposed legislation. "In the last 4 years", said he, "the sound rule of giving statutes the benefit of all reasonable doubt has been cast aside. The Court has been acting not as a judicial body, but as a policy-making body . . . The Court in addition to the proper use of its judicial functions has improperly set itself up as a third House of the Congress—a Super-Legislature, as one of the Justices has called it—reading into the constitution words and implications which are not there, and which were never intended to be there. We have, therefore, reached the point as a Nation where we must take action to save the Constitution from the Court and the Court from itself. We must find a way to take an appeal from the Supreme Court to the Constitution itself. We want a Supreme Court which will do justice under the Constitution—not over it. In our Court we want a Government of Laws and not of men . . ." He then outlined his proposed legislation as follows:

"What is my proposal? It is simply this: whenever a Judge or Justice of any Federal Court has reached the age of 70 and does not avail himself of the opportunity to retire on a pension, a new member shall be appointed by the President then in office, with the approval, as required by the Constitution, of the Senate of the United States. That plan has two chief purposes. By bringing into the judicial system a steady and continuing stream of new and younger blood, I hope, first, to make the administration of all Federal Justice speedier and therefore less costly; secondly to bring, to the decision of social and economic problems younger men who have had personal experience and contact with modern facts and circumstances under which average men have to live and work. This plan will save our Constitution from hardening of the judicial arteries."

Example from U.S. History.

The proposed legislation was heavily amended by the Judicial Committee of the Senate and emerged in an emasculated form—practically bereft of the substance of the proposal to reform the Judiciary as the President had outlined it in his Radio Report. Thus the President lost the battle but, as events have shown, judging from the opinions since rendered by the Supreme Court, not the Campaign. (See 51 Harvard Law Review 397).

The number of Judges who could be appointed to the Supreme Court of U.S. is not fixed under the Constitution. The Judiciary Act of 1789 established the Supreme Court with "a Chief Justice and five Associate Justice." In 1869 the number of Judges had been raised to nine, including the Chief Justice.

The Indian Constitution, in its 124th Article, establishes Supreme Court "consisting of a Chief Justice of India and, until Parliament by law prescribes a larger number, of not more than seven other Judges."

207. Constitutional Status of our Supreme Court

Our Constitution places the Supreme Court at the apex of the judicial system of our country. It is a court of ultimate appeal in matters civil and criminal, and has original jurisdiction not only in its capacity as the Federal Court, but also in its capacity as the guardian of Constitution, more particularly for the due enforcement of the fundamental rights guaranteed to the citizens and non-citizens by our Constitution. The law declared by the Supreme Court is binding on all the courts in Pakistan, and all the executive and judicial authorities throughout Pakistan are directed to act in aid of its process.

We will presently study in some detail the jurisdictional aspects of the authority of the Supreme Court, but at the outset it is necessary to make a few general observations about the role which the Supreme Court plays in a federal polity as an interpreter of its written constitution.

The remarks of Henry Sidgwick on the importance of judiciary in a system of constitutional governments are apposite in this context:

"The importance of the judiciary in political construction is rather profound than prominent. On the one hand, in popular discussion of forms and changes of Government, the judicial organ often drops out of sight; on the other hand, in determining the nation's rank in political civilization; no test is more decisive than the degree in which justice, as defined by the law, is actually realised in its judicial administration, both as between one private citizen and another, and as between private citizens and members of the Government." (See his 'Elements of Politics' p. 481).

To the same effect are the words of Harold Laski in his Book 'A Grammar of Politics' 1948 Ed. p. 542:—

"When we know", says he, "how a nation-State dispenses justice, we know with some exactness the moral character to which it can pretend."

The Supreme Court is not just one court amongst other courts in the judicial system of this country, but it is an institution that by the example of independence and impartiality that it is expected to provide in its decisions and declarations, is likely to set the pace for not only the High Courts and Courts subordinate to it in the matter of administering justice, but it is also to provide for other coordinate organs of Government, like the Executive and the Legislature, guidance as to the manner in which the Constitution is to be worked by them. As has been remarked earlier, being the court of ultimate jurisdiction, it is left to its sagacity and wisdom to determine the limits of its own authority. It is for this reason that those responsible for the final judicial interpretation of our constitution must always be careful lest they exaggerate their own power and authority. They must be eager to discover what exactly is the scope of the judicial power which the framers of the Constitution have reserved to them. It is true that even the Judges are human beings made up of flesh and blood, and, in their endeavour to see things objectively, they cannot but see truth with any eyes except their own. We have already seen that a judge will decide the controversies before him by his conception of what the law upon the point before him is, and even when he is applying a statute or a precedent, it cannot be forgotten that it is he who has to determine what precisely is directed to be done by the statute or what the binding value of a precedent in relation to the controversy before him is to be.

The conferment of this enormous power upon the Judges of the Supreme Court must carry with it a high sense of responsibility: for, after all, it is the self-restraint of the Judges that is the only limit on the powers of the Supreme Court.

About this desire to subject the judicial mind to the rule of "self-restraint", not much need be said since it is inherent in the concept of Supreme Court, as the repository of ultimate judicial power, as being the final judge of the limits of its own jurisdiction. It is the neglect of this self-imposed limitation on the exercise of the will as opposed to the judgment by the Judges that provoked the protest of Justice Holmes:

"There is a tendency", wrote Justice Holmes to Harold Laski, in one of his letters, "to think of judges as if they were independent mouth-pieces of the infinity and not simply directors of a force that comes from the source that gives them their authority. I think our Court has fallen into the error at times, and it is that thought I have aimed at when I have said that the common law is not a brooding omnipresence in the sky and the U.S. is not subject to some mystic over-law that it is bound to obey."

The judicial function, in so far as it has reference to the power of interpreting the Constitution, is not necessarily superior to the similar function which is exercised by the executive or the legislative organs of the State, when they proceed to exercise the power and perform the duties imposed upon them by the Constitution. Every agent must endeavour to interpret and apply the mandate of his principal and the Legislative, Executive and Judiciary, like any other agent established by the Constitution, are all charged with the duty of interpreting and applying the mandate of the Constitution. The power of the Judiciary to interpret the Constitution is distinguishable only in one respect from the power of other agents—its interpretation is final and binding on all other coordinate organs of the sovereign power. The argument in support of this view has been so succinctly stated by Hamilton in "The Federalist" (No. 78) that the present writer can do no better than reproduce it :

"There is no position which depends on clearer principles, than that every act of a delegated authority, contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised, is void. No legislative act, therefore, contrary to the Constitution, can be valid. To deny this, would be to affirm, that the deputy is greater than his principal; that the servant is above his master; that the representatives of the people are superior to the people themselves; that men acting by virtue of powers, may do not only what their powers do not authorize, but what they forbid.

"If it be said that the legislative body are themselves the constitutional judges of their own powers, and that the construction they put upon them is conclusive upon the other departments, it may be answered, that this cannot be the natural presumption, where it is not to be collected from any particular provisions in the Constitution. It is not otherwise to be supposed, that the Constitution could intend to enable the representatives of the people to substitute their will to that of their constituents. It is far more rational to suppose, that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges, as a fundamental law. It, therefore, belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be an irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents.

"Nor does this conclusion by any means suppose a superiority of the judicial to the legislative power. It only supposes that the power of the people is superior to both; and that where the will of the legislature, declared in its statutes, stands in opposition to that of the people, declared in the Constitution, the judges ought to be governed by the latter rather than the former. They ought to regulate their decisions by the fundamental laws, rather than by those which are not fundamental."

Thus the sanctity that attaches to the pronouncements of Judiciary in regard to the interpretation of Constitution stems not from the belief that it is infallible, but its authority to control all operations under the constitution is based upon the view that somewhere there must be finality in the matter of constitutional and legal adjudication. And the supremacy of the Judiciary's interpretative functions comes, not from any presumed moral excellence or intellectual alertness on the part of the judges of a country having a written Constitution but from the assumption that they have the final say in the matter of constitutional and legal interpretation.

It is the consciousness of this burdensome responsibility of delivering the last word as to the meaning of the words used in the Constitution that ought to exert the greatest measure of wise and tardy self-restraint upon the judiciary of a country having a written Constitution and charged with the duty of interpreting the fundamental law.

208. The Method of Securing appointment of Supreme Court Judges

It is these considerations that bring home to a student of politics and law the importance of ensuring that the Judges who preside the Court of ultimate jurisdiction are chosen with special care. The question of judicial appointment is a vexed one and it lies beyond the scope of present study to embark upon an examination of the rival methods that have been suggested by the political theorists for the purpose of securing appointment to the high office of judgeship of the highest court within a country. Broadly speaking, there are two rival methods for recruiting personnel of the Judiciary—election and nomination. Apart from several experiments that have been tried in various countries in the matter of securing appointment of Judges, the two distinct examples of the adoption of the method of election could be seen in:

- (a) the Swiss Constitution where 14 members of the Federal Court are elected by the Legislative Assembly, and
- (b) in the Constitutions of some of the American States where selection to the Supreme Court of the State takes place by election.

But even the apologists of the system of recruiting Judges by means of election are beginning to realise that, having regard to what experience has taught them, it cannot any longer be defended as being the best method. The argument against the method of election is that a Judge should not be selected for purely political reasons but for his legal fitness, his impartiality and for his independence. It is difficult to believe that a candidate who has been returned successful in a system of election to the office of Judgeship will not be swayed by extra-judicial considerations in the determination of cases that come up before him, and the temptation to do so would be all the greater if the Judge is to successfully run for an additional term. Even election by a legislature, though comparatively speaking a much better method than the one in which election takes place by the adult members of a community, is not a successful method of recruiting Judges, and in Switzerland if the system has not worked as unsatisfactorily as was to have been expected, it is only because the

Nomination

Swiss Federal Court has not the power to declare the Federal Legislation unconstitutional.

By and large students of contemporary political affairs are agreed that appointment of Judges by the system of nominations is the most satisfactory method of securing appointments to the judgeship of the Supreme Court. And that is precisely the method that our Constitution has adopted. Under ART. 149 the appointment of the Chief Justice of Pakistan is to be made by the President, and of other Judges by the President "after consultation with the Chief Justice". Thus the executive makes the appointment in the case of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and of other Judges after consultation with the Chief Justice. In ART. 149 qualifications for being appointed to the judgeship of the Supreme Court have been laid down, and these are calculated to further restrict the free choice of the executive in the matter of making appointment.

In ART. 150, the person holding office of a Judge of a Supreme Court can continue doing so only until he attains the age of 65 years, and in ART. 151, we have provisions relating to the removal of the Judges of the Supreme Court. A Judge of the Supreme Court shall not be removed from his office except by an order of the President made after an address by the National Assembly supported by the majority of the total number of members of the Assembly and by the votes of not less than 2/3rd of the members present and voting. The grounds of the removal are:

"proved misbehaviour or infirmity of mind or body." (ART. 151).

A person who has held office as a permanent Judge of the Supreme Court shall not, as provided by ART. 150(2), "plead or act before any court or authority in Pakistan." Similarly, a Judge of the High Court shall not plead or act before that court or any court or authority within the jurisdiction of that court (ART. 166(3)). Similarly, under ART. 174, a person who is, or has been a Judge of the Supreme Court or of a High Court "shall not be eligible for appointment as Governor of a Province." These provisions were incorporated in the Constitution to ensure that a Judge while in office may not look forward to being the recipient of any patronage after his retirement at the hands of the Government or anyone else. It is often felt that in the absence of these constitutional provisions that preclude the possibility of a Judge becoming an employee of the Government as a Governor of a Province or his competence to practise, the Judge is exposed to the temptation of having so to conduct himself in the performance of his judicial duties as to curry favour with outside elements. It is therefore felt that the existence of these provisions is likely to ensure the independence of judiciary.

and 151.

ARTS. 150(2)
174.

Similarly, under ART. 175, the conduct of a Judge of Supreme Court or of a Judge of a High Court shall not be discussed in the National or a Provincial Assembly. This provision is of course subject to the provisions of ART. 151 which lays down the procedure which must be gone through before a Judge of the Supreme Court could be removed from office. From the nature of the case, the conduct of such a Judge would be discussed in the National Assembly before a resolution would be passed by it directing the presentation of an address to the President "for the removal of the Judge on the ground of proved misbehaviour or infirmity of mind or body." Subject to this almost inevitable exception, the normal power of the Parliament or Provincial Assembly to discuss freely any and every conceivable question has been restricted in cases where such a discussion involves reflection on the conduct of a Judge of the Supreme Court or of a High Court. Such a right has been denied by the Constitution to the members of the Legislatures. The provisions of this Article are designed to render immune Judges of the superior courts in Pakistan from any manner of attack being made against them on the floor of the Legislature. It is submitted that a disregard of this provision by any member of the National or Provincial Assembly will expose him to the risk of being proceeded against in contempt proceedings, should of course the Supreme Court or the High Court feel advised to commence such proceedings against him.

ART. 175

A Judge of a High Court in Pakistan cannot be removed except by an order of the President made on the ground of misbehaviour or infirmity of mind or body if the Supreme Court on reference being made to it by the President, reports that the Judge ought to be removed on any of those grounds (see ART. 169). This provision ensures that a High Court Judge will not, during the performance of his duties, be lightly exposed to the possibility of removal from office. Before any such removal can take place, not only must there be a reference by the Federal Executive to the Supreme Court but there must also be recorded a finding to that effect by the Supreme Court upon such reference: of course, such a finding could only be reached after due enquiry into the allegations of misbehaviour etc. and in any such proceedings the Judge concerned will have the opportunity of showing cause against the proposed punishment. It is only where the Supreme Court finds a Judge guilty that the President can pass an order removing him. It would be noticed that the Supreme Court by itself cannot initiate any proceedings against a Judge of a High Court, no matter what its own view in relation to his judicial conduct be: the making of a reference is a condition precedent before the assumption of its jurisdiction to enquire into the conduct of a Judge—and such a reference, it should be realized, can only be made to the President upon advice by his Cabinet. It is to be presumed that a reference would not be made unless there are serious allegations against a particular Judge and there is reliable evidence tending to show that he is prima facie guilty of misbehaviour etc.

A judge of a High Court cannot be transferred without his consent (ART. 172).

A Judge of a High Court cannot be transferred from one High Court to another except with his consent and after consultation with the Chief Justice of Pakistan and the Chief Justice of the High Court of which he is a Judge. And even when after the necessary consent and consultation is procured such a Judge is entitled to receive, upon transfer, such compensatory allowance in addition to his salary as the President may by order determine. This provision which is contained in ART. 172, is once again a pointer to the intention of the framers of the Constitution to secure complete independence of the Judges of the High Courts in Pakistan. It should be noted that should such a transfer take place in the manner provided for by ART. 172, the provisions of ART. 166(3) would be at once attracted to the case of a Judge who is so transferred, with the result that, such a Judge will not thereafter, on his retirement, be able to practice before the court to which he has been transferred or before any court or authority within its jurisdiction.

Resignation of Judges (ART. 173).

The Judges of the Supreme Court as well as of the High Court may "resign their office by writing under their hand addressed to the President." This voluntary withdrawal from judicial duties seems to be their constitutional right and nobody can compel them to serve as Judges if they do not feel inclined to do so. (See ART. 173).

All these safeguards are calculated to secure the independence of the Judges who compose the Bench of the Supreme Court and the two High Courts of our country. In the absence of these safeguards a Judge may feel insecure and this feeling of insecurity is bound consciously or unconsciously to vitiate that objectivity of approach to the consideration of judicial questions which is after all an essential pre-requisite for the due performance of judicial duties.

209. Position of English Judiciary

The position of an English Judge and the immunities he enjoys in the legal system of England have been succinctly stated by C.K. Allen in the words that follow:

"... it is implicit in the function of the Judge as the interpreter that he is not confined within any prescribed limits, but is a wholly free agent in the performance of his office. The only boundaries which limit him are those of the law itself, but he alone decides what they are, and although he is said to be 'bound' by authority nothing can take from him the responsibility of determining for himself whether, why and how far he is 'bound'. Thus unlike the executive functionary, he imposes his own fetters upon himself, and this is of the very substance of his office. Hence comes, in our system of government at least, one manifest practical difference between these two kinds of servants of the State—if, indeed, a judge is a 'servant' at all (which is disputed). The civil servant is dismissible at the pleasure of the Crown. Though it is rare in practice to dismiss him arbitrarily, theoretically he is subject to the good pleasure of his masters and to 'giving satisfaction' in the execution of their will. The immunity of the High Court judge, on the other hand, is carried to a very singular degree in our society. Not only is he, subject to good conduct, secure in his office for life, but he is immune from legal imputability for anything which he does or says ex cathedra, and he is exempt from public censure of any kind, even in Parliament itself. The misconduct for which he may be removed, by a solemn Parliamentary process, is rare and improbable; and certainly in nearly two and a half centuries no responsible person has suggested that a judge should be removed because he was a thorn in the side of a government (as some judges have been). Probably on no constitutional question would there be greater unanimity throughout the country than upon the independence of the Judiciary, and, so far as I am aware, no modern constitutional theorist, of any school of thought in this country, has yet suggested that it is anything but desirable or, indeed, vital." (Law and Orders, 1956 Ed. p. 4).

In England, as would appear from the foregoing extracts cited from C. K. Allen's book Law and Orders, the Judges hold office during good behaviour and no limitation as to their retirement at a particular age is fixed at which they retire. But even the current thinking and expert opinion in England is that there should be a retiring age, and Harold Laski is of the opinion that it should be fixed at 70. (See his 'A Grammar of Politics', page 550, Fifth Edition). The argument in support of this view of Mr. Laski may be set-forth as follows. He, to begin with, quotes Holmes as saying:

"Judges commonly are elderly men, and are more likely to hate at sight any analysis to which they are not accustomed, and which disturbs repose of mind, than to fall in love with novelties."

And Mr. Harold Laski's comment on this statement is :

"That perception is important because, as I have already argued, it is the judge's experience of life that determines his attitude to the problems of law. Most people's philosophy both in its conscious assumption and its much more significant unconscious prejudices is fairly fixed at 40; and 30 years later the average Judge will belong to a generation of which the general outlook is very different from his own. Nor is that all. A Judge, I imagine, is in the first 5 years of service fairly convinced that most of his opinions are wrong in critical cases; in the second 5 years he will be equally convinced that they are right, and afterwards he will bear himself with serenity whether they be right or wrong. When that serenity becomes habitual it is time for him to retire."

It is submitted that the age of retirement at 65 fixed by our Constitution in the case of Supreme Court Judges, and at 60 in the case of High Court Judges, creates numerous difficulties for those who are charged with the duty of making appointments to these superior courts in our country. Considering that after his retirement, a Judge is debarred from practice, very few talented Advocates feel persuaded to offer themselves for appointment to Judgeship, if only because they know that they will be made to retire at 60 if they accept Judgeship of the High Court, or at 65 if they accept Judgeship of the Supreme Court. Both in the case of a High Court Judge and a Judge of the Supreme Court, the age limit ought to be 70 at the very least. The benefit of judicial experience is an invaluable asset and if a Judge is made to retire after 5 to 10 years of sitting on the Bench he will have hardly any opportunity of putting his experience into any practical effect. Besides, such Judges invariably look up to ad hoc appointments after their retirement and are more likely than not to have an eye on them even while they are sitting on the Bench. And as to the pernicious consequences of this, very little need be said here.

In 1928, Mr. Hughes who later became the Chief Justice of United States Supreme Court, in his well known study entitled "The Supreme Court of the United States" at pages 76 and 77, made the following observation :

"Under present conditions of living, and in view of the increased facility of maintaining health and vigour, the age of seventy may well be thought too early for compulsory retirement. Such retirement is too often the community's loss. A compulsory retirement at seventy-five could more easily be defended. I agree that the importance in the Supreme Court of avoiding the risk of having judges who are unable properly to do their work and yet insist on remaining on the bench, is too great to permit chances to be taken, and any age selected must be somewhat arbitrary as the time of the failing in mental power differs widely. The exigency to be thought of is not illness but decrepitude."

In the United States, opinion seems to be sharply divided on the question of fixing any time-limit for the judges to continue on the Bench of the United States Supreme Court, but those who hold the view that some such time-limit is necessary appear to be of the opinion that it should be placed somewhere at 75. In the United States, under the statute, it has been made possible for a judge to voluntarily retire at 70 when compensation would be paid to him, provided by that period he has put in at least ten years of service on the Bench. In Australia, too, there is no provision for compulsory retirement, but the Royal Commission recommended in 1929 that a compulsory retiring age for federal justices be placed at 72 years. (See the report of the Royal Commission on the Constitution at pages 251-252). It is suggested by the present writer that the age of retirement of the Supreme Court Judges at 65 is impolitic and ought to be enhanced by at least 5 years. The same age limit should apply to the case of judges of the High Court.

210. Jurisdiction of Supreme Court—Plan of Present Study

We will study the jurisdictional aspects of the Supreme Court under the following heads :—

- (1) Supreme Court and the exercise of its federal jurisdiction, (ART. 156);
- (2) Supreme Court as a Court of Appeal in matters involving interpretation of the Constitution, (ART. 157);
- (3) Supreme Court as a Court of Appeal in civil matters, (ARTs. 158 and 160);
- (4) Supreme Court as a Court of Appeal in criminal matters, (ARTs. 159 and 160);
- (5) Supreme Court and its general jurisdiction to grant special leave to appeal, (ART. 160);
- (6) Supreme Court and its authority to tender advice upon questions of law, consequent upon reference made to it by the President, (ART. 162);
- (7) Supreme Court and its jurisdiction to enforce by means of appropriate writs, directions etc., fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution, (ART. 22 See chapter VI); and
- (8) Supreme Court and the power of its review, (ART. 161)

211. Federal Jurisdiction of Supreme Court (ART. 156)

The federal jurisdiction of our Supreme Court in substance may be described as its exclusive competence to adjudicate disputes between (1) the Federal Government and the Governments of one or both Provinces, or (2) the Federal Government and the Government of a Province on one side and the Government of the other Province on the other, or (3) between the Governments of the Provinces in and so far as the dispute involves any question whether of law or fact on which the existence or extent of a legal right depends on any question as to the interpretation of the Constitution. Under ART. 156, it is provided that the Supreme Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction under that Article shall not pronounce any judgment other than a declaratory judgment.

The constitutional provision on this subject of federal jurisdiction in the Government of India Act of 1935, was contained in its 204th Section, which, as adapted in Pakistan, was in the following terms :—

"204 (1)—Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Federal Court shall, to the exclusion of any other court, have an original jurisdiction in any dispute between any two or more of the following parties, that is to say, the Federation, any of the Provinces if and in so far as the dispute involves any question (whether of law or fact) on which the existence or extent of a legal right depends:

Provided that the said jurisdiction shall not extend to :

- (a) a dispute to which a State is a party, unless the dispute—
 - (i) concerns the interpretation of this Act or of an Order in Council made thereunder, before the date of the establishment of the Federation, or of an order made thereunder on or after the date, for the interpretation of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, or of any order made thereunder, or the extent of the legislative or executive authority vested in the Federation by virtue of the Instrument of Accession of that State; or
 - (ii) arises under an agreement made under Part VI of this Act in relation to the administration in that State of a law of the Federal Legislature, or otherwise concerns some matter with respect to which the Federal Legislature has power to make laws for that State; or
 - (iii) arises under an agreement made after the establishment of the Federation, between that State and the Federation or a Province, being an agreement which expressly provides that the said jurisdiction shall extend to such a dispute;
 - (b) a dispute arising under any agreement which expressly provides that the said jurisdiction shall not extend to such a dispute.
- (2) The Federal Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction shall not pronounce any judgment other than a declaratory judgment."

The original Federal Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is provided for by the Indian Constitution in Article 131, and the only difference between that Article and our Article would seem to lie in the fact that the clause relating to Supreme Court pronouncing only declaratory judgments in the exercise of its original jurisdiction is not to be found in the Indian Article.

In every federal constitution, provision has to be made for the determination of disputes between the federal units either inter se or with the federation. In the Constitution of the United States, in ART. 3, S.2., this jurisdiction has been affirmed in that it is provided that the judicial power inter alia extends to controversies to which United States shall be a party, to controversies between two or more States, etc. To the same effect under S.75 of the Australian Constitution, the High Court of Australia has been inter alia given original jurisdiction in all matters "between States", or in which Commonwealth is a party. It must be noted that the terminology of the Australian Constitution is somewhat misleading in that the Australian Constitution calls the Supreme Court of Australia as High Court, and the "High Court" of the Province or the State as the "Supreme Court" of those Provinces or States respectively.

In order to be able to invoke successfully the original jurisdiction of our Supreme Court in federal disputes the conditions laid down by ART. 156 must be strictly complied with. The Supreme Court is not a court of ordinary civil jurisdiction so that it could be deemed competent to entertain a claim in the exercise of its original jurisdiction merely on the ground that there is no other court in the country which has the jurisdiction to decide the kind of question raised in the suit. In the case of Ramgarh State v. Province of Bihar, reported in AIR 1949 F.C. 55, it was observed in regard to the scope of the jurisdiction conferred on the Federal Court under S. 204 of the Government of India Act that:

"Federal Court of India is not a court of ordinary original civil jurisdiction in all matters and between all parties. Its original jurisdiction is derived from and is limited by S.204. This section imposes two limitations: (i) as to the parties, and (ii) as to the subject matter."

In that case it was held that the plaint instituted on behalf of a State which was not an "Acceding State", could not be entertained, as it related to a party not covered by the terms of S.204 of the Government of India Act.

Two cases decided by the Federal Court of undivided India in regard to the nature and extent of "Federal Jurisdiction" as defined by S. 204 of the Government of India Act are instructive as they have a bearing on the interpretation of the present Article, and these are:—

- (1) United Provinces v. Governor-General-in-Council, AIR 1939, Federal Court 58, and
- (2) Governor-General-in-Council v. The Province of Madras, AIR 1943, Federal Court 11.

In the former case the United Provinces filed an action against the Governor-General-in-Council challenging the constitutionality of S. 106 of the Cantonment Act, and claimed that all fines imposed and realised by criminal courts arising out of the enforcement of the impugned Act and wrongly credited to Cantonment Fund be made over to it by the defendant. Although the Cantonment Board was a corporation with statutory powers and duties of its own, it was not an independent body. But as the defendant exercised considerable measure of control over it, this interest which the Governor-General-in-Council had was sufficient to make it possible for the Federal Court to take cognizance of an action brought by a Province for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that the enactment was ultra vires. With regard to the relief sought for by the United Provinces to recover the fines from Cantonment Board it was held that the Board could have been directly sued by the plaintiff and as S.204 did not contemplate any suits against any party other than Government the relief could not be awarded.

With regard to the meaning of the expression 'legal right' appearing in S.204, after referring to the definition of that concept as given by various eminent jurists like Dr. Holland, Austin and Salmon, Justice Sulaiman observed (at p. 66):

"The term 'legal right' used in Section 204 obviously means right recognised by law and capable of being enforced by the power of a State but not necessarily in a court of law. It is a right of a party recognised and protected by a rule of law, the violation of which would be a legal wrong done to his interest and respect for which is a legal duty, even though no action may actually lie. The only ingredient seems to be a legal recognition and a legal protection. The mere fact that under the previous Act the Provincial Governments were subordinate administrations under the control of the Central Government and could only have made a representation to the Governor-General-in- Council or the Secretary of State, would not be sufficient in itself for holding that the former could not possibly possess any 'legal rights' at all against the Central Government even in respect of rights conferred upon them by the provisions of the Act or the rules made thereunder."

In the second case, it was the Governor-General-in-Council who brought a suit against the Province of Madras for the declaration that Madras General Sales Tax Act (IX of 1939) was ultra vires. The suit was dismissed as a result of the finding that the impugned Act was not unconstitutional and from this decision of the Federal Court appeal was lodged before the Privy Council who too dismissed the same (see Governor-General in Council v. Province of Madras, AIR 1945 Privy Council page 98). The validity of the Act was sustained by the Federal Court upon the principle decided by the Federal Court in Province of Madras v. Boddu Paidanna & Sons, AIR, 1942 Federal Court p.33. The Privy Council, while dismissing the appeal, following 'the usual practice' made no order as to costs. Their Lordships of the Privy Council referred, in support of this practice, to the case of Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Attorney-General for Canada (1925 Appeal Cases p. 561), where it had been said:

"In accordance with the usual practice there will be no costs."

Although it was realised that the position was not exactly the same as in Canada, but Lord Russell of Killowen observed that it was 'very analogous' to it.

Some of the American decisions that bear on the interpretation of Section 2 of Article III of the United States Constitution are instructive, particularly the decisions that interpret the clause appearing in the said section 'between two or more States'. The principles laid down in some of these decisions may be briefly referred to:

- (a) It has been held in (1921) 65 Lawyers Edition 937 at 943 (New York v. New Jersey) that a very heavy burden lies on the party moving the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to sustain the allegations in the plaint. It was observed:

"Before the Federal Supreme Court can be moved to exercise its extraordinary power under the Constitution to control the conduct of one State at the suit of another, the threatened invasion of rights must be of serious magnitude and it must be established by clear and convincing evidence."

- (b) Similarly, the case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, (1838) 12 Pet. 657: 9 Law Ed. 1233, is instructive upon the question of the law which is to be applied in the decision of inter-statal disputes. Considering that the two States, parties to the dispute, may not be having identical legal provisions known to their domestic law upon the situation giving rise to the dispute, it does become a matter of difficulty to decide what principles to apply in the determination of these disputes. This case involved adjudication of a boundary dispute and the question being a justiciable one and not a political question, it was held that a 'prescribed rule' of decision was unnecessary in such a case. Mr. Justice Baldwin observed :

"The submission by the sovereigns, or states, to a court of law or equity, of a controversy between them, without prescribing any rule of decision, gives power to decide according to the appropriate law of the case (11 Ves. 294), which depends on the subject-matter, the source and nature of the claims of the parties, and the law which governs them. From the time of such submission, the question ceases to be a political one, to be decided by the sic volo, sic jubeo, of political power; it comes to the court, to be decided by its judgment, legal discretion, and solemn consideration of the rules of law appropriate to its nature as a judicial question, depending on the exercise of judicial power; as it is bound to act by known and settled principles of national or municipal jurisprudence, as the case requires." (p. 737).

Some American cases reviewed.

The Nature, Structure and Reach of Judicial Power

This difficulty of settling inter-provincial disputes, when there is no settled legal principle or rule by appeal to which the controversy between contending parties would be settled, has also been referred to in the case of Dominion of Canada v. The Attorney-General of Ontario, 1910 Appeal Cases 637 at 645, in which Lord Loreburn observed:

"It may be that, in questions between a dominion comprising various provinces of which the laws are not in all respects identical, on the one hand, and a particular province with laws of its own, on the other hand, difficulty will arise as to the legal principle which is to be applied. Such conflicts may always arise in the case of States and Provinces within a Union. But the conflict is between one set of legal principles and another. In the present case, it does not appear to their Lordships that the claim of the Dominion can be sustained on any principle of the law that can be invoked as applicable."

The moral of the foregoing observation is that unless a controversy can be resolved by the application of legal principles or provisions it cannot be treated as justiciable.

The aforementioned cases, the American and the Canadian, it would appear tend to establish two radically different and conflicting approaches to the question relating to the law applicable in the settlement of Federal disputes.

(c) Finally, reference may be made to another practice of the American Supreme Court: It ordinarily refuses, in suits instituted by one State against another, to entertain mere technical pleas such as objection to multifariousness, of leaches and the like except in so far as they affect the merits of the controversy. That court approaches the consideration of the controversy in an untechnical spirit. (See Virginia v. West Virginia, (1911) 55 Lawyers Edition page 353. This was a suit between the Commonwealth of Virginia and the States of West Virginia to determine the amount due to the former by the latter as the equitable proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia which was assumed by West Virginia at the time of its creation as a separate State. The Supreme Court considered that such a controversy should be settled in an untechnical spirit proper for dealing with a quasi-international controversy.)

The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court has been declared in ART. 156 to be 'subject to the provisions of the Constitution.' The question that arises for determination is: What are the provisions of the Constitution which could conceivably over-ride the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court? There are the following provisions to be considered in this context :—

- (1) Article 118 contemplates the establishment of a National Finance Commission "as soon as may be after the Constitution Day, and thereafter at intervals not exceeding five years", and the duty of this Commission thus established is to make recommendations to the President as to—
 - (a) the distribution between the Federation and the Provinces of the net proceeds of the taxes mentioned in clause (3) of Article 118;
 - (b) the making of grants-in-aid by the Federal Government to the Governments of the Provinces;
 - (c) the exercise by the Federal Government and Provincial Governments of the borrowing powers conferred by the Constitution; and
 - (d) any other matter relating to finance referred to the Commission by the President.

Upon the receipt of the recommendations of the Commission, the President "shall by Order specify, in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission under sub-clause (a) of clause (2), the share of the net proceeds of the taxes mentioned in clause (3) which is to be allocated to each Province, and that share shall be paid to the Province concerned, and shall not form part of the Federal Consolidated Fund."

ART. 156

Under clause (5) of ART. 118, the recommendations of the National Finance Commission, together with an explanatory memorandum as to the action taken thereon, shall be laid before the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies. Obviously, the determination of the disputes between the Federation and the Provinces that have reference to the distribution of the net proceeds of the taxes mentioned in clause (3) of ART. 118, cannot validly be made into a subject-matter of adjudication by the Supreme Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction. Although ART. 118 does not in terms preserve the finality of the recommendation made by the National Finance Commission and the action of the President taken thereupon, in the sense that it does not expressly bar the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to take cognizance of these disputes, the fact remains that the whole text of the Article appears to be indicative of the intention of the framers of the Constitution to take the questions relating to distribution of the net proceeds of taxes mentioned in clause (3) of ART. 118 outside the scope of the Original Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court prescribed by ART. 156.

(2) ART. 129 hardly seems to be an exception to the exclusive competence of the Supreme Court to enquire into Federal disputes since that Article itself postulates that before the machinery improvised by it as to the settlement of disputes "between Federal Government and one or both Provincial Governments, or between the two Provincial Governments" can be given effect to, the dispute must be one "which under the law or the Constitution is not within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court."

The combined operation of ART. 129 and ART. 156 raises the following question: What is the nature or kind of dispute for the settlement of which ART. 129 has been designed, since that dispute ex hypothesi has to be one which under the law of the Constitution is not within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It is difficult to answer this question satisfactorily since ART. 156 is cast in very wide terms and appears to yield place only to ART. 118 in the manner indicated earlier and that too for the limited purpose of taking controversies relating to distribution of taxes of the kind mentioned in that Article outside the orbit of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

212. Supreme Court as the Court of Appeal in matters involving Interpretation of the Constitution. (ART. 157)

Article 157 of our Constitution provides that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in civil, criminal or other proceedings, provided :

- (1) the High Court certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution;
- (2) in the event of High Court refusing to give such a certificate, the Supreme Court may, upon being satisfied that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, grant special leave to appeal from such judgment, decree or final order.

Where either the certificate is given or the leave is granted, any party in the case may appeal to the Supreme Court on the ground that any such question as aforesaid (i.e. a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution) has been wrongly decided. But if any other ground is sought to be raised in such an appeal, leave of the Supreme Court will have to be obtained specifically in relation to such a ground before it could validly be raised in argument in appeal.

The expression 'interpretation of the Constitution' has itself been interpreted by the Constitution in ART. 164, which in terms provides "In this part, references to any substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution shall include references to any substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act, 1935, or the Indian Independence Act, 1947 including any enactment amending or supplementing the said Acts or any Order made under the said Acts". The effect of this interpretation provided by the Constitution itself is to enlarge, by artificiality of construction, the content of the expression "interpretation of the Constitution", which in the absence of such an interpretation would have been confined only to the interpretation of questions arising only under the present Constitution.

It is interesting to compare the effect of ART. 157 of our Constitution, read with ART. 164, on the one hand, and ART. 132 of the Indian Constitution read with its interpretative Article, namely ART. 147. These sets of Articles are practically couched in the same language except, of course, the explanation which has been appended to the ART. 132 of the Indian Constitution regarding the construction of expression 'final order', as including 'an order deciding an issue which, if decided in favour of the appellant, would be sufficient for the final disposal of the case.'

This explanation has been designed by the framers of the Indian Constitution to undo the effect of a pre-Constitution construction of the expression 'final order' appearing in S.205 of the Government of India Act, 1935, that was offered by the Federal Court, for instance, in the case of Kuppuswami Rao v. The King, (AIR 1949 Federal Court page 1), wherein it was ruled that the order of a High Court over-ruling objection of the criminal prosecution based on the contention that there was no proper sanction warranting such a prosecution, and remanding the case for trial before a lower court, was not to be regarded as a final order for the purpose of S.205 of the Government of India Act. The effect of the present explanation is practically to over-rule this view of the law and upon the facts of the case presented by Kuppuswami Rao v. The King, the Indian Courts would now treat the order complained of as being final order for the reason that it decides an issue which, if determined in favour of the appellant, would be sufficient for the final disposal of the case. It is a strange feature of the Indian Constitution that although it has expressly interpreted the word 'final order' in the manner stated above in ART. 132, it does not give to the same expression appearing in ART. 133 the same meaning: presumably the effect of this omission in ART. 133 of the Indian Constitution would be that the Indian courts would accept the pre-Constitution judicial interpretation of that expression. (See Election Commission v. Venkata Rao, AIR 1953 Supreme Court, page 210).

The scheme of ART. 157 of our Constitution is to place questions relating to the interpretation of the Constitution on higher pedestal, regardless of the nature of the proceedings in which they may arise, and to confer the widest amplitude of power in regard to the adjudication of these questions upon the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court is primarily a Constitution Court, and constitutional questions ought therefore to engage its attention far more than any other question of legal import. The old Section 205 of the Government of India Act, which was the constitutional predecessor of the present Article, in one essential particular, was cast in a somewhat narrower mould in that there was no provision in it for special leave being obtained from the Federal Court in case the High Court had refused to grant the certificate. In the case of Kishori Lal v. Governor-in-Council (1940) Federal Court page 4, it was held that the Federal Court had no power to grant special leave if the High Court had refused to grant a certificate under S.205 of the Act. In an earlier case, Lakhpatriam v. Behari Lal & others, AIR (1939) Federal Court page 42, it had been ruled that Federal Court, being a statutory court, its jurisdiction must be construed from the terms of the Statute which created it, and further it was impossible to point to anything in the statute which gives the Federal Court an inherent power to entertain an application for special leave to appeal in cases where the High Court has refused a certificate. (See Pashupati Bharti v. Secretary of State, AIR (1938) Federal Court page 1). Both the Indian and our Constitution have now removed this difficulty by expressly providing for the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to grant special leave in cases where the High Court has refused to give a certificate. It should be noticed that the power to grant certificate is reserved to a High Court and if, under the domestic procedure warranted by the constitution of a High Court, a Judge sitting alone functions as a High Court he would be entitled to give a certificate, and it would be immaterial for the purpose of lodging an appeal before the Supreme Court in such a case whether an appeal from his decision is taken to the Letters Patent Bench or Division Bench or not. There is nothing that debars a direct constitutional appeal being taken to the Supreme Court either upon a certificate being given by a single Judge or upon special leave having been obtained from his decision. And this position may be contrasted from the position outlined in ART. 158 which forbids any appeal against any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in civil proceedings being taken to the Supreme Court from the judgment, decree or final order of a Judge of a High Court sitting alone. Thus, although under Article 158 of our Constitution there is an express prohibition against the entertainment of appeal by the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order recorded by a Judge of a High Court sitting alone, if such a decision involves a substantial question relating to the interpretation of the Constitution, a direct appeal will lie therefrom under the provisions of ART. 157. The principle as to the combined effect of Indian ARTs. 133 and 132 has been discussed in the case of Election Commission v. Venkata Rao, (1953) S.C. 210, and it is submitted that the decision is helpful in the interpretation of the combined effect and scope of ART. 157 and 164 of our Constitution.

Finally, it should be noticed that for an appeal to lie the requirement of ART. 157 is that there should be "a judgment, decree or final order of a High Court involving a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution." Thus the question involved in the determination of the appeal must be one not only of law but it should be a substantial question and then it should relate to the interpretation of the Constitution and not of any other law. Once of course a certificate is granted on the premises of the existence of some such question and special leave is also obtained to raise other grounds it is not an insuperable bar in the way of entertaining an appeal at the time of hearing if the substantial question as to the interpretation of the Constitution is abandoned at the Bar. "The substantial question of law" within the meaning of this Article has been construed as being one in regard to which there can be a difference of opinion but it must be of such a general importance that it would be proper that it be settled by a declaration from the Supreme Court.

Section 205 of the Government of India Act, 1935, had provided for the certificate being given suo moto. The language of that Section was: "... and it shall be the duty of every High Court in British India to consider in every case whether or not any such question is involved and of its own motion to give or to withhold a certificate accordingly." Thus the duty was primarily cast upon the High Court to give the certificate. It was not necessary for a certificate to be granted under Section 205 that any formal application be made to the High Court. Upon the language of S.205, controversy, however, did arise with regard to the question whether an application for a certificate could be made after the High Court had pronounced its judgment. (See Sri Ram v. Emperor, AIR 1948 Allahabad p. 106; as also Jagdam Sahai v. Emperor, AIR 1948 Allahabad p. 12; Kondo Tukaram v. Emperor, AIR 1946 Nagpur p. 144). These cases raised questions which have lost their importance in view of the language employed in ART. 157, and it would now appear that an application could be made to the High Court inviting it to give a certificate within such time as may be prescribed under the rule-making power given to the superior courts.

In this context it is appropriate to notice that in ART. 171 the High Court has been given the power to transfer cases to itself from subordinate courts if it is satisfied that the case in question involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution the determination of which it considers necessary for the disposal of the case. It also has the power in such a case either to dispose of a case itself or determine the said question of law and return the case to the Court from which the case has been so withdrawn together with a copy of its judgment on such question, and the said Court on receipt of such a determination would then proceed to dispose of the case in conformity with its judgment. The provisions of this section are calculated to cut short the long and dilatory procedure which ordinarily would involve the taking of the various steps by way of presenting appeals from the Courts of first instance to the District Courts and then finally to the High Court. The Constitution thus gives to "substantial questions of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution" a high priority and confers an abnormal power on the High Court to withdraw such cases and deal with them in the manner indicated in the Article.

The provisions of ART. 171, as also of 157, have to be liberally interpreted and the High Court and the Supreme Court are expected to consider the substantial questions of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution as a matter of top priority and fundamental importance.

213. Supreme Court as a Court of Appeal in Civil Matters (ART. 158)

ART. 158 provides for an appeal from any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in civil proceedings in the following three cases:

- If the amount or value of the subject-matter of the dispute in the Court of first instance was, and also in dispute on appeal is, not less than Rs. 15,000, or such other sum as may be specified in that behalf by Act of Parliament.
- If the judgment, decree or final order involves directly or indirectly some claim or question respecting property of the like amount.
- That the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court.

In respect of all the above conditions, it is High Court that is charged with the duty of certifying whether or not the conditions (a), (b) or (c) reproduced above are fulfilled in a given case. The additional limitation upon the right to take appeal mentioned by clause (2) of ART. 158 is, ". . . no appeal shall, unless an Act of Parliament otherwise provides, lie to the Supreme Court from the judgment, decree or final order of a Judge of a High Court sitting alone." Clause (2) of our Article corresponds to clause (3) of the Indian Article 133.

The following points of distinction between the scope of the Indian ART. 133, and ART. 158 of our Constitution, which provides for the appellate jurisdiction of our Supreme Court in appeals from High Courts in regard to civil matters, should be noted:

- In cases where the judgment, decree or a final order appealed from affirms the decision of a Court immediately below in cases visualised by clauses (a) and (b) of the Indian Article no appeal shall lie in India unless the High Court further certifies that the appeal involves some substantial question of law. There is no such limitation under our Constitution as to the existence of a substantial question of law as being a condition precedent before the right to appeal in cases where High Court has affirmed in its judgment, decree or final order the decision of the Court immediately below it.

"Civil Appellate" Jurisdiction of Supreme Court (ART. 158)

- The value of the claim involved in India has been fixed at Rs. 20,000: as against this our Constitution has prescribed the sum of Rs. 15,000 for an appeal to be taken to the Supreme Court.
- Out of abundant caution in clause (2) of ART. 133, the framers of the Indian Constitution have provided "Notwithstanding anything in ART. 132, (which talks of the Constitution appeals) any party appealing to the Supreme Court under clause (1) may urge as one of the grounds in such appeal that a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of this Constitution has been wrongly decided." In other words, the right to raise a ground in an appeal that is brought under ART. 133 necessarily carries with it the right to be able to raise the ground that a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution has been wrongly decided. This provision takes care of a possible argument that unless a certificate is granted under ART. 132 by a High Court or a special leave is granted by the Supreme Court, no ground as to a substantial question of law with regard to the interpretation of the Constitution can be raised. There is, however, no such provision in our Article. It is, however, difficult to believe that the framers of our Constitution in omitting this clause from Article 158, were giving effect to any intention on their part of preventing the party appealing under ART. 158 to raise a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution merely because under ART. 157 neither a certificate had been given by the High Court nor special leave had been obtained in respect thereof.

It remains now to consider the effect of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure contained in Sections 109 and 110 that have reference to the appeals being brought to the Supreme Court.

In ART. 227(4), it has been provided, "without prejudice to the other provisions of the Constitution, the Supreme Court shall have the same jurisdiction and powers as were, immediately before the Constitution Day, exercisable by the Federal Court, and references in any law to the Federal Court shall be deemed to be references to the Supreme Court." And in the ART. 218, "Federal Court" has been defined as meaning "the Federal Court established under the Government of India Act, 1935, and functioning as such immediately before the Constitution Day." Consequently, Sections 109 to 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which in the pre-Constitution era had reference to appeals to the Federal Court, will now be construed as involving a reference to the Supreme Court. Sections 109 to 112 in the pre-Constitution period as modified up to 1st of August, 1953, were in the following terms:

"109.—Subject to such rules as may, from time to time be made by His Majesty in Council regarding appeals from the Courts of the Provinces and the Capital of the Federation, and to the provisions hereinafter contained, an appeal shall lie to His Majesty in Council—

- from any decree or final order passed on appeal by a High Court or by any other Court of final appellate jurisdiction;
- from any decree or final order passed by a High Court in the exercise of original civil jurisdiction; and
- from any decree or order, when the case, as hereinafter provided, is certified to be a fit one for appeal to His Majesty in Council.

"110.—In each of the cases mentioned in clauses (a) and (b) of section 109, the amount or value of the subject-matter of the suit in the Court of first instance must be ten thousand rupees or upwards, and the amount or value of the subject-matter in dispute on appeal to His Majesty in Council must be the same sum or upwards, or the decree or final order must involve, directly or indirectly, some claim or question to or respecting property of like amount or value, and where the decree or final order appealed from affirms the decision of the Court immediately below the Court passing such decree or final order, the appeal must involve some substantial question of law.

"111.—Notwithstanding anything contained in section 109, no appeal shall lie to His Majesty-in-Council—

- (a) from the decree or order of one Judge of a High Court constituted by His Majesty by Letters Patent, or of one Judge of a Division Court, or of two or more Judges of such High Court, or of a Division Court constituted by two or more Judges of such High Court, where such Judges are equally divided in opinion and do not amount in number to a majority of the whole of the Judges of the High Court at the time being; or
- (b) from any decree from which under S. 102 no second appeal lies.

"112.—(1) Nothing contained in this Code shall be deemed—

- (a) to bar the full and unqualified exercise of His Majesty's pleasure in receiving or rejecting appeals to His Majesty in Council, or otherwise howsoever, or
- (b) to interfere with any rules made by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and for the time being in force, for the presentation of appeals to His Majesty-in-Council, or their conduct before the said Judicial Committee.
- (2) Nothing herein contained applies to any matter of criminal or admiralty or vice-admiralty jurisdiction, or to appeals from orders and decrees of Prize Courts."

These provisions have to be read in the light of the provisions of Federal Court Enlargement of Jurisdiction Act 1949 (I of 1950), S.6, and the Privy Council Abolition of Jurisdiction Act, 1950, modified the 1950, S.9. Section 9 of the Privy Council Abolition of Jurisdiction Act, 1950, modified the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure and any other law in force on the appointed day relating to Pakistan Appeals and Petitions in such a way that a reference in the said provisions to His Majesty in Council there assigned substituted references to Federal Court. The question that arises for consideration in this context is to determine the combined effect of the provisions of Civil Procedure Code as in force immediately before the Constitution Day and the provisions of the Constitution in regard to appeals to the Supreme Court arising out of civil proceedings. The principle of construction is obvious: to the extent that the provisions of Civil Procedure Code come in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution they stand abrogated. Substantially, Article 158 embodies the provisions of Ss. 109 and 110 of the Civil Procedure Code.

The important thing to bear in mind is that ART. 158 contains conditions upon the fulfilment whereof appeals would lie to the Supreme Court and any legislation which derogates from this constitutional right to appeal to the Supreme Court would, to the extent of such derogation, be void and inoperative. For instance, the right of appeal conferred under ART. 158 will over-ride those provisions of Civil Procedure Code under its 104th section which expressly provide that no appeal shall lie against any order passed in appeal against an appealable order under the Civil Procedure Code. Thus the Code of Civil Procedure prohibits the hearing of second appeal against appealable orders. But this provision, if it should come in conflict with the right to take an appeal under ART. 158 to the Supreme Court, would be deemed as inoperative. Even in the pre-constitution period the Privy Council held that Section 104 (2) of the Civil Procedure Code only dealt with the problem of internal appeals in British India but could not validly affect the maintainability of appeals to the Privy Council. (See AIR 1924 Privy Council, page 95, Ramlal versus Kishanchandra). It will anyhow be obvious that S.104.(2) of the Civil Procedure Code cannot now be given an effect which may cut down the scope of the right of appeal conferred by the Constitution under ART. 158.

The expression, 'judgment', 'decree', or 'final order', will have the same meaning which was accorded by the judicial interpretation of that expression in the pre-constitution period. Any final declaration of the rights of parties reached during the course of civil proceedings by the High Court would be within the scope of the expression, "any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court," and the decisions of various courts that have interpreted this expression, as it appears in S. 109 of the Civil Procedure Code, would, therefore, be of assistance and would be relevant. Under the Civil Procedure Code the word 'judgment' has been defined in S. 2 (9), as "a statement given by the Judge of the grounds of a decree or order." It is obvious that this meaning cannot be predicated of the term 'judgment' as it pre-figures in the context of ART. 158, and must be taken to include not merely the grounds given by a civil court for reaching the final result, but the final decision itself, which in effect will be the decree or final order passed by it. In substance, the word 'judgment' is really a surplusage, and the words, "decree or final order" are sufficiently comprehensive to indicate the types of final results reached in civil proceedings against which appeals can be taken under Article 158.

Similarly, when a High Court deals with a reference under S. 166 of the Income-Tax Act, it is not giving a judgment, but only offers an opinion upon the facts stated in the reference made to it, and cannot be construed as a judgment against which an appeal can be taken. (See 1923 Privy Council page 148, Tata Iron & Steel Co. v. Chief Revenue Authority). The word 'decree' as defined by the Civil Procedure Code, under S. 2(2), as "the formal expression of an adjudication which, so far as regards the court expressing it, conclusively determines the rights of the parties with regard to all or any of the matters in controversy in the suit" may be taken as a valuable guide in the comprehension of the meaning of the term as used in ART. 158. The final order is any order which finally disposes of a matter in dispute. If for any reason after the order complained of, a suit is still alive and has yet to be disposed of, the order in question would not be deemed to be the final order. (See AIR 1933 Privy Council page 58, Abdul Rahman v. Cassim & Sons. Further see AIR 1949 F. C. page 1, Kappuswami Rao v. King, and AIR 1950 F. C. 83, Moolji Jaitha & Co. v. K. S. & W. Mills & Co).

ART. 158 uses the words 'civil proceedings', and ART. 159 the expression 'criminal proceedings'. The question that arises is what is to be understood by these expressions. Can there be proceeding that is not civil proceeding within the meaning of ART. 158, and also not a criminal proceeding within the meaning of ART. 159? It is submitted that there may be proceedings going on before a criminal court which are really proceedings of a civil nature, as for instance, if during the pendency of proceedings of a criminal nature the High Court is called upon to decide whether or not the Advocate seeking to appear is entitled to appear under some provisions of the law, such a determination would be regarded as arising out of civil proceedings and cannot be considered by itself as criminal proceedings. In fact in AIR (1950) Allahabad, page 162 Iqbal Ahmad v. Rex, the learned Judge was called upon to consider whether a certain Advocate was entitled to appear on behalf of certain accused persons, and when the matter went in appeal from the order recorded by the High Court Judge to the Supreme Court, the question whether the proceedings were civil or criminal, was dealt with as follows:—

"A preliminary point was debated before us as to whether the learned Judge of the High Court was right in treating the application of the applicant as a criminal matter and disposing it of as such? The application was connected, no doubt, with the criminal case in the sense that it concerned the rights of the Advocate to appear and plead the case of his clients who were parties to the criminal appeal, but the matter in controversy which was presented for consideration of the court, was certainly not a criminal matter in any sense of the expression. In our opinion the case should have been treated as a civil proceeding. In the view that we have taken we direct that the appeal before us should be regarded as a civil appeal and the learned counsel appearing for the appellant gave an undertaking that his clients would pay the court fees in civil appeals under the Rules of this Court." [See Iqbal Ahmed v. Allahabad Bench, (1950) page 162].

Similarly, proceedings under Taxing Statutes are not civil proceedings (Raleigh Investment Company v. Governor-General-in-Council, AIR 1947 Privy Council, page 78).

The High Court while dealing with the question of issue of certificate under ART. 158, has to consider under clauses (a) and (b) the question of valuation of the claim involved or the property in dispute, and grant or withhold the grant of certificate in accordance with its findings in that behalf; but so far as clause (c) is concerned the High Court is called upon to certify that :

"the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court."

In other words, where other conditions are fulfilled but the pecuniary conditions contemplated by (a) and (b) are not available, it is for the High Court to say whether the matter is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court. Under clause (c), the grant of certificate has no relevance to the pecuniary value of the subject-matter at all, and the view of the law on the question of determining the fitness for appeal would be analogous, if not the same, as taken by the Privy Council of S.109(c) of the Civil Procedure Code. It must show that there is something so special about the case that regardless of a low pecuniary value involved it may be deemed as a fit case for appeal being taken from it to the Supreme Court. Lord Buckmaster delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Radhakrishna Aiyar v. Swaminatha Aiyar AIR (1921) Privy Council p. 25, in respect of clause (c) of S. 109 of Civil Procedure Code, observed that questions:

"as for example, those relating to religious rites and ceremonies, to caste and family rights, or such matters as the reduction of the capital of Companies as well as questions of wide public importance in which the subject-matter in dispute cannot be reduced into actual terms of money", are relevant for determining the fitness of a case for appeal to the Privy Council.

His Lordships further remarked:

"when any certificate is granted under that order (R.3 of O.45), it is, in their Lordships' opinion, of the utmost importance that the certificate should show clearly upon which ground it is based... Their Lordships think it should be brought to the attention of the Indian Courts that these certificates are of great consequence, that they seriously affect the rights of litigant parties and that they ought to be given in such a form that it is impossible to mistake their meaning upon their face."

High Court should give reason why it has refused to give the Certificate.

In view of the fact that under ART. 160 the Supreme Court is empowered to grant special leave to appeal "from any judgment, decree, order or sentence of any court or tribunal in Pakistan other than a court or tribunal constituted by or under any law relating to the Armed Forces", it is desirable that where a certificate is refused the High Court should give concisely the reasons why it considers that the certificate should not be granted. This would enable the Supreme Court to appreciate those reasons while determining whether or not the power of granting special leave under ART. 160 should be exercised by it. Considering that the main burden of administering justice lies upon the High Courts in the country, the Supreme Court will not lightly disregard the reasons that the High Court gives in support of its refusal to issue a certificate either under Ss. 158 or 159 of our Constitution.

The practice of the Privy Council on this point as reflected in their decisions as also in the judgments of the civil High Courts will be of considerable assistance in the discovery of the principles which have guided these tribunals in applying the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code Ss. 109 and 110. Ordinarily, the concurrent findings of facts given by two courts would not be disturbed by the Supreme Court and normally neither a certificate would be granted by the High Court in those situations nor again would the special leave to appeal be granted by the Supreme Court. This would be in keeping with the practice of the Privy Council, but it is wise never to forget the words of Lord Thaneke in Bibhabati v. Ramendra Narayan, AIR 1947 P. C. p. 19, to the effect :

"It is not by any means a cast iron practice; there may occur cases of unusual nature which might constrain us to interfere with the concurrent finding of facts to avoid miscarriage of justice."

As a rule no new point would be allowed to be raised before the Supreme Court. This too was the rule that the Privy Council followed: if a point had not been raised before the Court below the Judicial Committee was extremely reluctant to allow it to be raised in appeal. [See (1) Raja of Ramnagar v. Sundara, (1918) L.R. 46 I.A. 64 P.C.); (2) Ghanshamdas Jaynarain v. Rammasayam Ganesh Narayan (1935) 53 R.P.C. 160 P.C. See also Grey v. Manitoba & North Western Rail Co. of Canada, 1897 A.C. 254.]

214. Supreme Court as a Court of Criminal Appeal

ART. 159 mentions four categories of cases in respect of which appeal to the Supreme Court will lie from "any judgment, final order or sentence of a High Court in Criminal Proceedings". These are :—

- (1) if the High Court has on appeal reversed an order of acquittal of an accused person and sentenced him to death or to transportation for life;
- (2) if the High Court has withdrawn for trial before itself any case from any Court subordinate to its authority, and has in such trial convicted the accused person and sentenced him as aforesaid;
- (3) if the High Court certifies that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court; and
- (4) if the High Court has imposed any punishment on any person for contempt of itself as a High Court.

It would appear that the scope of the criminal appellate jurisdiction of our Supreme Court is wider than that of the Indian Supreme Court in that :

- (a) the Indian Supreme Court acquires jurisdiction if the High Court has on appeal reversed an order of acquittal of an accused person and sentenced him to death. (In other words, if sentence of transportation for life is imposed by the High Court no appeal will lie to the Supreme Court).
- (b) This is also true in respect of cases where High Court withdraws for trial before itself any case from any Court subordinate to its authority and convicts the accused person and sentences him to death. Unlike the provision of our Constitution if it inflicts a punishment like transportation, no appeal will lie.
- (c) In the matter of punishments for contempt of itself, unless the matter is certified by the Indian High Court to be a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court no appeal would lie. But in Pakistan it would lie as a matter of right under ART. 159(d), and the question of a certificate by the High Court does not arise.

The proviso to our ART. 159, as even to the Indian Article, makes the right of appeal subject to such rules as may be made in that behalf by the Supreme Court and to such other Concurrent findings of facts.

No new point to be allowed to be raised.

rules not inconsistent with the aforesaid rules as may be made in that behalf by the High Court.

The Indian Article, however, provides for the power of the Parliament to confer on the Indian Supreme Court any further powers to entertain and hear appeals from any judgments, final order or sentence in a criminal proceeding of a High Court in the territory of India subject to such conditions and limitations as may be specified in such law. There is no such enabling power vested in our Parliament.

The criminal appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is also to be spelled out from provisions of the next succeeding ART. 160, which confers upon the Supreme Court the power of granting special leave to appeal from "any judgment, decree or order or sentence of any Court or tribunal in Pakistan other than a Court or tribunal constituted by or under any law relating to the Armed Forces." It would thus appear that in the event of any certificate being refused by the High Court under ART. 159(c), an application could validly be made to the Supreme Court for the grant of special leave to appeal and the Supreme Court in appropriate cases would allow such an application granting leave to appeal.

The expression "criminal proceedings" is not capable of precise definition but it would appear that, by and large, if a person is charged with the commission of a crime which is being enquired into or tried, and the tribunal enquiring into or trying the same, has power to punish such an offence, the tribunal would be described as being engaged in conducting "criminal proceedings". There are some jurists who seem to consider that the object of civil proceedings is to enforce rights while the object of criminal proceedings is to punish wrongs. Although there is a great deal of truth in this mode of drawing a distinction between criminal and civil proceedings, it is essential to remember that punishment is not necessarily present in criminal proceedings, nor always absent in civil proceedings. Security proceedings under S. 107 of Criminal Procedure Code to bind a person for keeping the peace are criminal proceedings though their primary object is not to imprison the individual proceeded against, and in civil proceedings a defiance of an order of injunction issued by a Court of competent jurisdiction would entail imprisonment for the person committing the breach.

It is a useful test for the purpose of discriminating between civil and criminal proceedings to find out whether a given wrong, which is the subject matter of adjudication, is being regarded in its public or private aspect; all criminal proceedings are instituted against an offender on behalf of the State upon the view that the wrong committed by an offender is regarded as wrong done to the community at large. But the same wrong can also be regarded as a private wrong committed against a private individual, in which case, however, proceedings of a civil nature can be commenced against the delinquent at the instance of the individual so injured. "Thus a thief may be criminally prosecuted by the State for the purpose of being punished but a trespasser may only be civilly sued by him whose rights he has violated." This is further illustrated in criminal proceedings commenced at the instance of the Crown for offences of "rash and negligent driving" resulting in injuries to a person. The offender may also be civilly dealt with, at the instance of the person injured, by way of an action in damages.

between 'public'
and
'private'
wrongs.

We might next consider the distinction drawn by Blackstone between private and public wrongs, which, it is submitted, is of considerable assistance in the determination of the question whether the nature of the judicial process involved is civil or criminal: according to him private wrongs are those that result from infringement or deprivation of the private or civil rights belonging to individuals considered as individuals and are therefore frequently termed civil injuries, whereas public wrongs are a breach and violation of public rights and duties which affect the whole community considered as a community and are distinguished by harsher appellation of crimes and misdemeanours.

It is true that offences like enticing a married woman (S. 498 P.P.C.), or adultery (S. 494 P.P.C.), or defamation (S. 500 P.P.C.), cannot be prosecuted in our courts without the complaint of the husband aggrieved in the first two offences and the person defamed in the third offence, but the fact remains that, that is a procedural bar created by the statute and has nothing to do with the nature of the proceedings in which these complaints when instituted come to be enquired into or tried. Civil justice is administered according to one set of forms and criminal justice according to another, and it is the nature of the forms employed which will be decisive in the matter of determining whether or not a given proceedings is civil or criminal.

The distinction between civil and criminal proceedings is important for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of "proceedings in contempt." There is a great deal of controversy going on in the Indian Courts upon the question whether the proceedings in contempt are civil or criminal. In the case of Zikar v. State, AIR (1952), Nagpur page 130, it was held that the proceedings in contempt cannot be regarded as criminal proceedings:

"A proceedings for contempt", said the Court, "cannot be regarded as a criminal proceeding merely because it ends in imposing a punishment on the contemner. Contempts have been divided broadly into two classes according to the purpose which is subserved by the proceeding. Contempt which is punished for disobedience of an order of the Court with a view to enforcing the rights of private parties is distinguished from contempt which is punished for vindicating the dignity of the Court. The latter is regarded as criminal and punitive while the former is regarded as civil and remedial. Whatever be the purpose of the proceeding, a proceeding for punishing contempt has been regarded as sui generis and of an anomalous nature. A proceeding for contempt is not regulated by the ordinary law of criminal procedure."

Under our Constitution, if the contempt partakes of the character of criminal proceedings under provisions of ART. 159, the High Court that imposes any punishment on any person for contempt of itself would thereby enable the person so punished as of right to appeal to the Supreme Court. But if the contempt partakes the character of civil proceedings it has to certify the matter to be a fit one for appeal under ART. 158 before an appeal can be taken. In the case of Sukhdev Singh v. Teja Singh AIR (1954), Supreme Court page 186, the Supreme Court of India has ruled that proceedings before a High Court under ART. 215 of the Constitution can be regarded as being in the nature of special jurisdiction. Bose J. reviewed the entire history of the development of law relating to contempt and came to the conclusion that the Criminal Procedure Code did not apply to matters of contempt triable by the High Court. The learned Judge was concerned with the contention raised on behalf of the petitioner that certain contempt proceedings be transferred under S. 527 of the Indian Criminal Procedure Code from Pepsu High Court to any other High Court. The Court declined jurisdiction to transfer the case holding that the power reserved under S. 527 was not available for effecting such a transfer since the power of the High Court to institute proceedings for contempt and punish offenders under ART. 215 was in the nature of "a special jurisdiction", which is inherent in all the Courts of record and S. 1 (2) of the Criminal Procedure Code expressly excludes Courts of special jurisdiction from its scope. It is submitted that this authority cannot be invoked for the purpose of establishing that the punishments imposed by High Courts against contemners, who are adjudged as guilty of having committed contempt of the High Court, are not in the nature of criminal proceedings. Our ART. 159 contemplates that such proceedings can be criminal proceedings. To hold otherwise would be to rob clause (c) of ART. 159 of all its content.

The nature of
proceedings.

"When is a case fit case for appeal to the Supreme Court within the meaning of ART. 159?", is a question which is incapable of being answered with any degree of precision. The Privy Council practice upon this subject is instructive and would continue to guide the determination of applications that may be filed before the High Court for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of fitness for lodging an appeal under ART. 159, or for obtaining special leave to appeal under ART. 160. The several decisions of the Privy Council upon the subject have been reviewed by the Federal Court of Pakistan in the case of Sarfraz Ali v. The Crown, PLD (1951) F.C. 41 p. 75, and the student is referred to that case for a study of the relevant pre-constitution case-law. The most important case upon the subject, however, is the one reported in 12 Appeal Cases 459, known as Dillet's Case where Lord Watson observed (at p. 467):

"The rule has been repeatedly laid down and has been invariably followed that Her Majesty will not review or interfere with the course of criminal proceedings, unless it is shown that, by a disregard of the forms of legal process, or by some violation of the principles of natural justice, or otherwise, substantial and grave injustice has been done."

In the case of Bibhabati Devi v. Ramendra Narayan A.I.R. 1947 Privy Council p. 19, Lord Thankerton, after reviewing the various cases referred to in the judgment, crystallised the essence of the Privy Council Practice in the matter of special leave to appeal in the exercise of the prerogative jurisdiction as follows (at p. 26):—

- (1) That the practice applies in the case of all the various judicatures whose final tribunal is the Board.
- (2) That it applies to the concurrent findings of fact of two Courts and not to concurrent findings of the Judges who compose such Courts. Therefore a dissent by a member of the appellate court does not obviate the practice.
- (3) That a difference in the reasons which bring the Judges to the same finding of fact will not obviate the practice.
- (4) That, in order to obviate the practice there must be some miscarriage of justice or violation of some principle of law or procedure. That miscarriage of justice means such a departure from the rules which permeate all judicial procedure as to make that which happened not in the proper sense of the word 'judicial' procedure at all. That the violation of some principle of law or procedure must be such an erroneous proposition of law that if that proposition be corrected the finding cannot stand; or it may be the neglect of some principle of law or procedure, whose application will have the same effect. The question whether there is evidence on which the Courts could arrive at their finding is such a question of law.
- (5) That the question of admissibility of evidence is a proposition of law, but it must be such as to affect materially the finding. The question of the value of evidence is not a sufficient reason for departure from the practice.
- (6) That the practice is not a cast iron one and the foregoing statement as to reasons which will justify departure is illustrative only, and there may occur cases of such an unusual nature as will constrain the Board to depart from the practice.
- (7) That the Board will always be reluctant to depart from the practice in cases, which involve questions of manners, customs or sentiments peculiar to the country or locality from which the case comes, whose significance is specially within the knowledge of the Courts of that country.

- (8) That the practice relates to the findings of the Courts below, which are generally stated in the order of the Court but may be stated as findings on the issues before the Court in the judgments, provided that they are directly related to the final decision of the Court."

The Supreme Court of India in the case of Pritam Singh v. The State, AIR 1950 Supreme Court p. 169, has stated the rule it would follow in the matter of granting special leave in criminal matters. Fazl Ali J., delivering the judgment of the Court, observed (at p. 171):

"On a careful examination of ART. 136, along with the preceding Article, it seems clear that the wide discretionary power with which the Supreme Court is invested under it, is to be exercised sparingly and in exceptional cases only, and as far as possible, a more or less uniform standard should be adopted in granting special leave in the wide range of matters which can come up before it under this Article. By virtue of this Article, Supreme Court can grant special leave to appeal in civil cases; in criminal cases; in Income-Tax cases; in cases which come up before different kinds of Tribunals and in a variety of other cases.

The only uniform standard which in our opinion can be laid down in the circumstances is that court should grant special leave to appeal only in those cases where special circumstances are shown to exist."

(See also the recent case of Andreas Charilaou Zakos v. Queen, in P.L.D. 1956, Privy Council p. 43, wherein the principle of Mohinder Singh v. King Emperor 59, I.A. 233, and Muhammad Nawaz v. King Emperor (1941) 68 I.A. 126, have been referred to and affirmed.)

With regard to the relevance of the Privy Council practice in respect of the principles controlling the judgment of the Supreme Court when deciding to grant or to withhold special leave the learned Judge remarked:

"Though the Supreme Court is not bound to follow the decisions of the Privy Council too rigidly since the reasons, constitutional and administrative, which sometimes weighed with the Privy Council, need not weigh with the Supreme Court, yet some of those principles are useful as furnishing in many cases a sound basis for invoking the discretion of this court in granting special leave."

The learned Judge then referred to the case of Kapildeo Singh v. King, decided by the Federal Court of India, reported in AIR 1950 F. C. p. 80, as containing a review of the Privy Council Practice, as it can be gathered from the several decisions rendered by it.

The learned Judge also referred to the scope of the appeal once a special leave had been granted (at p. 171):

"(The) assumption", remarked the learned Judge, "that once an appeal had been admitted by special leave, the entire case was at large and the appellant was free to contest all the findings of facts and raise every point which could be raised in the High Court or the trial court, is exceptionally unwarranted . . . Only those points can be urged in the final hearing of the appeal (before the Supreme Court) which are fit to be urged at the preliminary stage when leave to appeal is asked for, and it would be illogical to adopt different standards at two different stages of the same case."

Even the Privy Council had to dispel this misconception which Mr Fazl Ali J. was exposing, in 1914 Appeal Cases p. 599, in the case of Ibrahim v. Rex. The Privy Council observed in that case as follows:

"The Board has repeatedly treated applications for leave to appeal and the hearing of criminal appeals as being upon the same footing. (See Riel's case 1885; 10 Appeal cases p. 675; Ex Parte Deeming 1892 A.C. p. 442)."

"The Board cannot give leave to appeal where the grounds suggested could not sustain the appeal itself, and, conversely, it could not allow an appeal on grounds that would not have sufficed for the grant of permission to bring it."

See also Attorney-General for Ontario v. Daly, (1924) A.C. 1011, (P.C.)

The question that arises for consideration in regard to the power of the High Court to certify that a certain case is a fit case for appeal to the Supreme Court is, whether such a power is wider than the power of the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal against the decision of the High Court in criminal proceedings. Prima facie, Supreme Court will give great weight to the view of the case taken by the High Court as reflected in the reasons it gives for its refusal to grant a certificate to appeal to the Supreme Court. The High Court would weigh every conceivable aspect of the case in an attempt to determine whether or not the case presents any special features which make it a fit case for appeal being taken to the Supreme Court, and it is only where it would come to the conclusion that the case does not present any such special or extraordinary features upon which the Supreme Court may be invited to pronounce its judgment that it will refuse to give the certificate. The primary burden of the administration of justice lies upon the High Courts and it is only in extraordinary cases which involve points of considerable public importance or points that affect the growth of law in this country that the High Courts will certify a case to be a fit case for appeal to the Supreme Court. After giving due weight to the opinion of the High Court that has refused to give a certificate, the Supreme Court would decide whether or not special leave to appeal should be given.

215. Supreme Court and its general jurisdiction to grant special leave to appeal (Art. 160).

ART. 160 of our Constitution provides for what may be described as residual jurisdiction of the Supreme Court: the Supreme Court under this Article may grant special leave to appeal from any judgment, decree, order or sentence of any court or tribunal in Pakistan other than a court or tribunal constituted by or under any law relating to the armed forces. This article corresponds to ART. 136 of the Indian Constitution, with the sole difference that in the Indian formulation the word 'determination' has been used in the context of the expression, "any judgment, decree, order or sentence of any court". The language used in both the articles leaves no manner of doubt but that Supreme Courts in both the countries are competent to entertain appeal from any judgment, decree, order or sentence of any court or tribunal and the only category of tribunals excepted from the sweep of this general power are the tribunals constituted by or under any law relating to the armed forces.

It would thus appear that in all cases determined by the High Courts or any other Judicial Tribunals, whether in the exercise of their civil or criminal jurisdiction or any other "miscellaneous" jurisdiction, the Supreme Court can under this Article by special leave allow an appeal to be brought before it. In the case of Bharat Bank v. The Employees of Bharat Bank, AIR (1950) S.C. 188, the determination by the Tribunal constituted under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, was allowed to be questioned in appeal before the Indian Supreme Court in the exercise of its power under ART. 136. The majority judgment considered that the adjudication by the Industrial Tribunals fell within the category of matters with respect to which the appeal under ART. 136 was competent. They overruled the objection to the Court's jurisdiction based on the contention that the Industrial Tribunal in question could not in law be said to be performing judicial or quasi-judicial functions in view of the fact that it was not required to be guided or controlled by any settled rules of substantive law in the matters before it for its adjudication, as also because the adjudications of the Industrial Tribunals were not binding on the Government under S.15 of the Industrial Disputes Act unless declared to be so by the Government. The minority judgment, to which Mukherjea and Patanjali Sastri were parties, declined jurisdiction holding that the adjudications made by the Industrial Tribunal could not be the subject-matter of appeal under ART. 136 of the Indian Constitution. They interpreted the word 'determination' occurring in ART. 136 to imply 'determination by judicial tribunal' and were impressed by the argument that the adjudication by the Industrial Tribunal does not become complete and binding unless and until it was declared to be so under S. 15 of the Act by the appropriate Government and further that the decision on appeal rendered by the Supreme Court not only affected the adjudication by the Tribunal but also the order of the Government—a thing which could not be validly done by the Court.

The Supreme Court of our country has, however, interfered with the determination of the findings of the Industrial Tribunal in the case of Remington Rand of Pakistan Limited v. Pakistan, PLD (1957) S.C. 170.

We have already dealt with the question of the exercise of appellate jurisdiction by the Supreme Court of Pakistan under the powers reserved to it under this Article in relation to adjudications by Election Tribunals despite the existence of ART. 146 of the Constitution and no useful purpose will be served in reiterating the same argument in the context of present consideration of the scope of ART. 160. (See the statement of law in that respect attempted under the title 'Writ of Quo Warranto, in Chapter VI.).

If the view advanced elsewhere by the present writer to the effect that "writ-jurisdiction" is for the purpose of certification neither 'civil' nor 'criminal' so as to be covered by ARTs. 157 and 158 be considered as correct, the only mode in which appeals from orders passed by High Courts on the writ petitions made to them could be taken to the Supreme Court would be to invoke its jurisdiction under ART. 160. (See 'Nature of Writ Jurisdiction' discussed under "Constitutional Remedies" in Chapter VI.)

216. Supreme Court and its Advisory Jurisdiction (Art 162)

ART. 162 enables the President when a question of law has arisen or is likely to arise "which is of such a nature and of such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court upon it" to refer it to that court for consideration and the court may after such hearing as it thinks fit, report its opinion thereon to the President. This Article (as did its legislative predecessor S.213 of the Government of India Act, 1935), confers what is called advisory jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court in relation to matters referred to it for its opinion by the President. ART. 143 of the Indian Constitution corresponds to our ART. 162, and in fact both of them are couched in identical language. S.4 of the Judicial Committee Act of 1833, (3 and 4 William IV, Chapter 41), too confers advisory jurisdiction on the Judicial Committee for it provides for His Majesty to refer to the Privy Council "any such other matters whatsoever as His Majesty shall think fit." Similarly, the House of Lords has the power of summoning Judges to answer questions necessary for the decision of a particular case. It has also the power, in its capacity as the Legislature, to ask the Judges what the law on a given subject is, so that upon having better information it should be in a position to have the law altered. Advisory opinion can be sought in Canada not only by the Governor-General on the validity or interpretation of Dominion or Provincial Legislation, but the Senate or the House of Commons may also refer to the Supreme Court questions concerning private bills presented in Parliament (see further Laskin's Canadian Constitutional Law p. 98 (1951). See also Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada, (1912) Appeal Cases p. 571).

The United States Supreme Court, however, has no advisory jurisdiction conferred upon it. In the case of Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346 (1911) 55 Lawyers Edition 246 at p. 252, the United States Supreme Court speaking through Mr. Justice Day referred to the incompetence of the Congress to expand the scope of the judicial power of the

Jurisdiction.

Supreme Court beyond its scope as contemplated by the Constitution. "That judicial power", the learned Judge went on to say:

"is the right to determine actual controversies arising between adverse litigants, duly instituted in courts of proper jurisdiction. The right to declare a law unconstitutional arises because an act of Congress relied upon by one or the other of such parties in determining their rights is in conflict with the fundamental law. The exercise of this, the most-important and delicate duty of this court, is not given to it as a body with revisory power over the action of Congress, but because the rights of the litigants in justiciable controversies require the court to choose between the fundamental law and the law purporting to be enacted within constitutional authority, but in fact beyond the power delegated to the legislative branch of the government."

It was accordingly ruled that any legislative attempt to confer power on the Supreme Court to be able to obtain a judicial declaration from it of the validity of the act of Congress not having been presented in a case or controversy, was not constitutional legislation since it was beyond the scope of "judicial power" conferred upon it by the Constitution. Following this decision the Supreme Court of America refuses to give merely advisory opinions.

Rationale of the refusal by the U.S. Supreme Court to exercise Advisory Jurisdiction.

In the United States the Supreme Court of that country would decline to answer constitutional questions unless such a decision is necessary for the adjudication of legal rights. It would appear that among the factors that have inclined the Supreme Court to decline the exercise of advisory jurisdiction is the one which has reference to its reluctance to adjudicate upon constitutional questions "not growing out of a case before it". Justice Hughes in his The Supreme Court of the United States, at page 27, expounded the idea underlying the foregoing observation by remarking that the foundations of the policy by reason of which the Supreme Court declines the tendering of advisory opinion, are the following:

"The policy's ultimate foundations, some if not all of which also sustain the jurisdictional limitation, lie in all that goes to make up the unique place and character, in our scheme, of judicial review of governmental action for constitutionality. They are found in the delicacy of that function, particularly in view of possible consequences for others stemming also from constitutional roots; the comparative finality of those consequences; the consideration due to the judgment of other repositories of constitutional power concerning the scope of their authority; the necessity, if government is to function constitutionally, for each to keep within its power, including the courts; the inherent limitations of the judicial process, arising especially from its largely negative character and limited resources of enforcement; with all in the paramount importance of constitutional adjudication in our system.

"All these considerations and perhaps others, transcending specific procedures, have united to form and sustain the policy. Its execution has involved a continuous choice between the obvious advantages it produces for the functioning of government in all its coordinate parts and the very real disadvantages, for the assurance of rights, which differing decision very often entails. On the other hand it is not altogether speculative that a contrary policy, of accelerated decision, might do equal or greater harm for the security of private rights, without attaining any of the benefits of tolerance and harmony for the functioning of the various authorities in our scheme. For premature and relatively abstract decisions, which such a policy would be most likely to promote, have their part too in rendering rights uncertain and insecure."

The fundamental difficulty, which is really one of principle, in the matter of defending the constitutional propriety of the exercise of this advisory jurisdiction, has been stated in several cases decided in America and in the Commonwealth countries, but the most clear and comprehensive statement of it would be found in the dissenting opinion of Justice Zafrullah Khan who, when a Judge of the Federal Court of the undivided India, declined to give such an opinion on the ground that any opinion given by him was bound to raise ghosts far more troublesome than any it might serve to slay. (See AIR 1944 Federal Court page 73, in the matter of a reference made under S. 213 of the Government of India Act). A reference to the Federal Court in this case involved the question of a legislative proposal and included questions such as :

- (1) Whether the Federal Legislature had the power to pass a law "that upon the death of any person there shall be levied any duty in respect of the property other than agricultural land passing upon the death";
- (2) If the Federal Legislature had such a power, had it also the power to make the law providing that for the purpose of the aforesaid duty—
(a) property passing upon the death shall be deemed to include—and then followed by way of enumeration five items of property).
- (3) If the Federal Legislature had not the power referred to in questions (1) and (2), was the levy of such duties a matter not included in any of the Lists in Schedule 7, Government of India Act, 1935 ?
- (4) If the Federal Legislature had the power referred to in question (2), was the levy of a duty on those classes of property mentioned in question (2) in respect of which it had not such powers a matter not included in any of the Lists in Schedule 7, Government of India Act, 1935 ?

The opinion on these questions was tendered only by Chief Justice Spens and Varadarajiar J., and Justice Zafrullah Khan declined to tender any advice whatever. He traced the history of the advisory jurisdiction from the days of the First Stuart Kings of England, and showed how the consensus of opinion of the text-book writers was against the propriety of the conferment of this extraordinary jurisdiction upon courts of law. He quoted with approval the following extract from Professor Felix Frankfurter, as he then was (37 Harvard Law Review, page 1005);

"The whole milieu of advisory opinions on proposed bills is inevitably different from that of litigation contesting legislation. However much provision may be made on paper for adequate arguments (and experience justifies little reliance) advisory opinions are bound to move in an unreal atmosphere. The impact of actuality and the intensities of immediacy are wanting. In the attitude of Court and counsel, in the vigour of adequate representation of the facts behind legislation (lamentably inadequate even in contested litigation) there is thus a wide gulf of difference, partly rooted in psychologic factors, between opinions in advance of legislation and decisions in litigation after such proposals are embodied into law. Advisory opinions are rendered upon sterilized and mutilated issues. Let any one, for instance, compare the adverse opinion of the Massachusetts Supreme Court upon the constitutionality of municipal coal and wood-yards with the opinion of the Supreme Court sustaining such legislation; the adverse opinion of the Massachusetts Court on prohibition of trading stamps with the opinion of the Supreme Court sustaining such legislation; the adverse opinion of the Massachusetts Court on the State's power to provide for dwelling houses with the opinion of the Supreme Court sustaining such legislation. These are samples taken from the Court in which, presumably, advisory opinions have been rendered under the most favourable circumstances."

He also quoted the following extract from Professor C. K. Allen from Volume 47, The Law Quarterly Review pages 48-49;

"The whole notion of 'consultation' of the judiciary is, by hypothesis, a contradiction which requires exceptional justification. The Judge does not sit in the seat of justice in order to be consulted, but in order to decide an issue. If, then, he is to be 'consulted', his advice must be one of two things. Either it is mere opinion, subject to the same limitations as any other opinion—namely, that the person advised may or may not, at his option, follow the advice; in this case it is not easy to see the advantage of imposing this additional duty on Judges . . . Or, in the alternative, it is (like the fictitious ‘advice’ of the Judicial Committee) opinion of such a peculiarly authoritative nature that it is not, and is not intended to be, really opinion at all, but judgment disguised as opinion. There seems to be no cogent motive for extracting opinions from the Bench except to give them an authority which cannot belong to any lesser opinion. If, then, this opinion is really judgment, it is open to the extremely serious objection that it is anticipatory of actual facts, which are of infinite complexity, and upon which all judgment, in the sense of the application of principle to circumstances, must depend . . . No abstract principle of interpretation laid down in advance by the Courts could be, or at all events ought to be, more than a guide for the decision of subsequent cases. It is therefore either superfluous, or else it is a signpost with a pointing finger in which we may read a gesture, not of direction, but of command or of threat.”

And the learned Judge summed up his conclusions by remarking that “an advisory opinion is not in the nature of a judicial pronouncement, nor was it appealable to His Majesty in Council, nor again is it binding upon the authority seeking it.” He also doubted whether such an advisory opinion could be regarded as “law declared by the Federal Court” within the meaning of S.212, Constitution Act so as to be binding on courts in the country. One of the important considerations that inclined the learned Judge to hold that it was not a law declared by the Federal Court was, that in the Government of India Act, the subject of advisory opinion was dealt with in a section later than S.212, which dealt with the binding value of the law declared by the Federal Court. It may be remembered, however, that in our Constitution the ART. 163, which provides for law declared by the Supreme Court being binding on all courts of Pakistan, does not precede but follows the Article that confers advisory jurisdiction on the Supreme Court. But of this something will be said later.

The difficulties to which Zafrullah Khan J. referred, were also noticed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada, (1914) Appeal Cases, p. 153 where Lord Haldane observed (at p. 162)

“Under this procedure questions may be put of a kind which it is impossible to answer satisfactorily. Not only may the question of future litigants be prejudiced by the Court laying down principles in abstract form without any reference or relation to actual facts, but it may turn out to be practically impossible to define a principle adequately and safely without previous ascertainment of the exact facts to which it is to be applied.”

In that case their Lordships found themselves unable to answer all the questions put to them and in offering such opinion as they did, they found it “advisable to limit and guard their replies.” (See also the case of Attorney-General of Canada v. The Attorney-General of Ontario, AIR (1932) P.C. 36; and Attorney-General for Ontario v. Hamilton Street Railway Company, (1903) Appeal Cases p. 524).

In a recent case reported in P.L.D. 1955, Federal Court p. 435, we have the case of a reference made by the then Governor-General for the opinion of the Federal Court under S.213 of the Government of India Act. The questions that were referred to the Federal Court, in the first instance, were the following :—

- “(1) What are the powers and responsibilities of the Governor-General in respect of the Government of the country before the new Constituent Convention passes the necessary legislation ?
- “(2) The Federal Court having held in Usif Patel’s case that the laws listed in the Schedule to the Emergency Powers Ordinance could not be validated under S.42 of the Government of India Act, 1935, nor retrospective effect given to them, and no legislature competent to validate such laws being in existence, is there any provision in the constitution or any rule of law applicable to the situation by which the Governor-General can by order or otherwise declare that all orders made, decisions taken and other acts done under those laws shall be valid and enforceable and those laws which cannot without danger to the State be removed from the existing legal system shall be treated as part of the law of the land until the question of their validation is determined by the new Constituent Convention?..

And pursuant to a suggestion made in the course of Federal Court’s order, dated the 18th April, 1935, the following further questions were also referred for its opinion :

- “(3) Whether the Constituent Assembly was rightly dissolved by the Governor-General?
- “(4) Whether the Constitution Convention proposed to be set up by the Governor-General will be competent to exercise the powers conferred by sub-section (1) of S.8 of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, on the Constituent Assembly?”

Chief Justice Muhammad Munir, while answering the reference, noted “that the answers have to be given in the context in which and on the assumptions on which the questions have been formulated.” The reference incorporated the following averments :

- “(1) that though the Constituent Assembly functioned for more than seven years, it was unable to carry out the duty of providing a constitution, and for all practical purposes assumed the form of a perpetual legislature;
- “(2) that the Constituent Assembly was dissolved by the Governor-General because by reason of repeated representations from the resolutions passed by representative public bodies throughout the country, he formed the opinion that the Assembly had become wholly unrepresentative of the people, and,
- “(3) that the Constituent Assembly from the very beginning asserted the claim that the laws passed by it under sub-section (1) of S.8 of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, did not require the assent of the Governor-General. Thus the assumptions of fact on the basis of which this Court’s opinion is asked are :—
 - (a) the Constituent Assembly’s inability to provide a constitution and its assumption of the powers of a perpetual legislature;
 - (b) its wholly unrepresentative character which it had gradually acquired during the seven years of its existence; and
 - (c) its claim that it was itself competent to make provisions as to the constitution of the Dominion without obtaining to those provisions the assent of the Governor-General.”

As to the contention that the Court should go into the facts on which the propriety or impropriety of the dissolution may be determined, the learned Judge remarked (p. 461)

“We cannot, on this Reference, undertake this enquiry or record any findings on the disputed questions of facts because any such course would convert us into a fact finding tribunal which is not the function of this Court when its advice is asked on certain questions of law. The answer to a legal question always depends on facts found or assumed and since we cannot try issues of fact the Reference has to be answered on the assumption of fact on which it has been made. The Privy Council also has, under S.4 of the Act of 1833 (3 and 4 Williams IV, Chapter 41), similar advisory jurisdiction but no precedent from that Board or from the Federal Court has been shown to us where a reference was ever made to ascertain a legal position after a trial of facts by the advisory Court. We consider that there is nothing improper or peculiar about the manner in which the Reference has been made. The Governor-General has taken the responsibility of asserting certain facts and has merely asked us to report to him what the legal position is if those facts are true."

It is submitted with respect that, having regard to the reference of the type that was made by the Governor-General, the Federal Court should have declined jurisdiction to advise. In the first place, S. 213 of the Government of India Act, as even ART. 162 of our Constitution, refer to a situation in which "a question of law has arisen or is likely to arise, which is of such a nature and of such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court upon it", and admittedly as to the question, whether Constituent Assembly could or could not legally be dissolved, no such question was, before dissolving the said Constituent Assembly, in the first instance, referred to the Federal Court, and instead an action was taken by the Governor-General in a matter which, to say the least, was not free from constitutional difficulty. It was a matter of Public History that the same Governor-General had allowed the Constituent Assembly to carry on its work for nearly four years or so for the whole length of time when he himself was the Governor-General and the majority in the Constituent Assembly was responsible for providing him with the Cabinet whose advice was binding on him.

In the second place, what can be referred to the Federal or Supreme Court is a pure question of law, a question which is capable of being stated in the abstract, and not a question of law which is made to arise from certain assumptions and pre-suppositions. It is submitted with respect that this aspect of the matter, having regard to the text of the opinion rendered by the Federal Court, does not appear to have been specifically or energetically urged in argument. No serious argument seems to have been raised that the opinion sought for by the Governor-General upon a reference made by him to that Court was more or less, in the nature of things, likely to secure a declaration as to the constitutional validity of his own act in regard to the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly. All the facts, on which these assumptions could have been defended, were before the Chief Court of Sind when it decided the writ petition in the case of Maulvi Tamizuddin Khan v. The Federation of Pakistan & Others (See P.L.D. 1955 Karachi p.96) and it was not possible to state the questions in the abstract before the Federal Court without reference to those ex parte assumptions and presuppositions. The advisory jurisdiction is an extraordinary jurisdiction and cannot be suffered to be invoked in situations in which adjudication of disputes could have been more appropriately gone in for. Upon proper evidence, during the course of appropriate proceedings, the substantial question which was in reality involved in the reference, could have been litigated in ordinary courts.

Care should be taken to remember that the opinion given by a Court in the exercise of its advisory jurisdiction is really no more and no less than the opinion of some sort of law officers for the benefit of the Executive. That opinion does not bind anybody and is not the law declared by the Court in any conceivable sense of that term. Such an opinion is not even required to be given in an open court by the Privy Council.

"The report or recommendation of the Judicial Committee to the Sovereign-in-Council with reference to matters of appeal from any Court or Judicial Officer is a distinct category from the advice to be given in any such matter as he may think fit to refer to them. The manner in which the advice is to be tendered is the same, that is to say, in the same manner as has been heretofore the custom with respect to matters referred by His Majesty to the whole of his Privy Council or a Committee thereof, but in the case of a judicial matter the nature of the report or recommendation must always be stated in open court. No such restriction appears to be placed upon the advice which the sovereign may think fit to seek in other matters. It accordingly is not the practice for the Judicial Committee to make a pronouncement in the nature of a formal judgment showing the decision to which they have come before making their report on special reference for the Sovereign in Council." (See Privy Council Practice by Norman Bentwich 1912 Ed. p. 241).

Under paragraph 3(2), of the First Part of Third Schedule, however, the "Supreme Court is charged with the duty of delivering judgment and of making reports in open court." Assuming the opinion which under ART. 162 the Supreme Court is to report is itself a report, within the meaning of the paragraph just cited, by the Supreme Court, even that would not make the opinion a "law declared" within the meaning of ART. 163(1).

It is true, as has been pointed out earlier, that in our Constitution, ART. 163, regarding law declared being possessed of a binding value, follows ART. 162 which mentions the advisory jurisdiction of the Supreme Court [unlike the Indian Constitution in which Article dealing with the advisory jurisdiction of the Supreme Court (ART. 143) follows ART. 141 which enjoins that the law declared by the Supreme Court shall be binding on all Courts within the territory of India], but nothing in reality turns upon this scheme or the arrangement of the Articles, and this sequence in which Articles occur cannot by itself be regarded as a crucial consideration in favour of holding that opinions given by our Supreme Court have the status of "a law declared" within the meaning of ART. 163.

In the case of Umayal Achi v. Lakshmi Achi, AIR (1945) F.C. 25, at p. 36, it was remarked by Spens, C.J., that "The High Court contented itself with adopting without discussion the views in favour of validity expressed by this Court in the said opinion. That opinion is not technically binding on the High Court. Any opinion of this Court given upon a reference under S. 213 can properly be reconsidered at any time by this Court in any litigation coming before it and should be so reconsidered on the proper request of any party, however much respect for the learned Judges responsible for an opinion and a desire to secure continuity and certainty in the pronouncements of this Court may make a member of this Court hesitate to differ."

To accept the view that the referring authority by making some assumptions in a reference is to be in a position to obtain a certain type of opinion from the Supreme Court is to make the Supreme Court helpless in the matter of criticising those assumptions or to doubt its competence to determine whether or not those assumptions are validly grounded on facts: it is virtually to convert what prima facie is merely advisory jurisdiction into a jurisdiction in the nature of a protective shield which the Executive can any time hold up against the rights of the subjects, which it may have itself violated. It is submitted with respect, that a Court that is called upon to exercise advisory jurisdiction is the sole judge of the situation whether or not it should at all tender an opinion and it ought to do so only in the clearest of cases conceivable, that is, cases where a bona fide question of law has been referred to it for its opinion.

It is doubtful if during the consideration of a reference under Art 162 the Supreme Court can pass any interim order or restrain any public authorities from doing anything one way or the other, for an interim order is only calculated to restore status quo till such time as effective judgment can be given one way or the other. Since no judgment which is binding can at all be rendered by any Court that is giving an advisory opinion, it is not possible for it at any stage earlier than the delivery of its opinion to prohibit, by means of an interim order, any public authority from doing anything or directing it to do a particular thing in a particular way. Such a direction if given during the pendency of a reference cannot be regarded as a law declared so as to be binding on any subordinate Courts within the meaning of ART. 163.

217. The Supreme Court and the Power of Review (Art. 161)

ART. 161 of our Constitution provides for the Supreme Court's power "subject to the provisions of any Act of Parliament and of any Rules made by the Supreme Court" to review any judgment pronounced, or order made by it. This provision corresponds to ART. 137 of the Indian Article. The Supreme Court of Pakistan under paragraph 3 of Third Schedule has the rule-making power of regulating the practice and procedure of the court inter alia, including the power of making rules as to "the conditions subject to which any judgment pronounced or order made by the Court may be reviewed and the procedure for such review including the time within which applications for such review are to be made or entertained." Any rules made under this paragraph will control the terms and conditions upon which an application for review could be entertained by the Supreme Court.

R.1, C.P.C.

The term 'review' apparently has the same meaning as is ascribed to it by Order 47, Rule 1, Civil Procedure Code, which is as follows :—

"Any person considering himself aggrieved—

- (a) by a decree or order from which an appeal is allowed, but from which no appeal has been preferred,
- (b) by a decree or order from which no appeal is allowed, or
- (c) by a decision on a reference from a court of small causes, and who, from the discovery of new and important matter of evidence which, after the exercise of due diligence, was not within his knowledge or could not be produced by him at the time when the decree was passed or order made, or on account of some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, or for any other sufficient reason, desires to obtain a review of the decree passed or order made against him, may apply for a review of judgment to the court which passed the decree or made the order."

The jurisdiction of an ordinary civil court to review is provided for by S. 114 of the Civil Procedure Code, and Order 47, Rule 1, only illustrates the grounds upon which review of judgment or order is competent to a civil court.

The Federal Court of Pakistan, however, had no such express constitutional provision upon which to ground its power for review and it, in fact, adopted precisely the same approach to the review jurisdiction as has been characteristic of the practice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council or the House of Lords. Ordinarily, it regarded its own determinations as final and could be persuaded to exercise its power of review only for the restricted purpose of correcting the misprints and obvious mistakes that had crept in its judgments or orders.

In the case reported in AIR 1941 F. C. p. 1 Raja Prithwi Chand Lal Chowdhury & others v. Sukhraj Rai & others, the Federal Court reviewed the law on the subject concerning its jurisdiction to review its own decisions and ruled that:

"The Federal Court will not sit as a court of appeal from its own decisions, nor will it entertain applications to review on the ground only that one of the parties in the case conceived himself to be aggrieved by the decision. The rules which govern the practice of the Judicial Committee and of the House of Lords in matters of review govern the practice of the Federal Court as well in India. Consequently no case in the Federal Court can be re-heard and an order once made is final and cannot be altered. Nevertheless, in exceptional circumstances, an application for review can be entertained. The Federal Court will exercise its power of review for the purpose of rectifying mistakes which have crept in by misprint in embodying the judgments, or have been introduced through inadvertence in the details of judgments. It can also supply manifest defects in order to enable the decrees to be in force, or add explanatory matter, or reconcile inconsistencies. The indulgence by way of review is granted mainly owing to the natural desire to prevent irremediable injustice being done by a court of last resort as where by some accident, without any blame, the party has not been heard and an order has been inadvertently made as if the party had been heard. But in no case, however, can a re-hearing be allowed upon the merits or even on the ground that new matter has been discovered, which, if it had been produced at the hearing of the appeal, might materially have affected the judgment of the court."

Their Lordships relied on the maxim which is of considerable importance and which in their opinion ought to be observed by all courts of the last resort—interest reipublicae ut sit finis litium. As remarked in the case of Venkata Narasimha Apparao versus Court of Wards, (1886) 11 A.C. page 660; 13 Indian Appeals page 155:

"Its strict observance may occasionally entail hardship upon individual litigants, but the mischief arising from that source must be small in comparison with the great mischief which would necessarily result from doubt being thrown upon the finality of the decisions of such a tribunal as this."

(As to the practice in England as well as in the Privy Council, see further 1 Moor P.C. page 117, (1836) Rajender Narain Rae v. Bijai Govind Singh).

The Indian Supreme Court in the exercise of the powers of rule-making reserved to it under ART. 145, has in the 38th Order of the Supreme Court Rules, 1950, limited the scope of application for review to the grounds mentioned in Order 47, Rule 1 of the C.P.C. All the decisions that have interpreted the scope of expressions, like "the discovery of new and important matters, or evidence," or "mistake or misprint on the face of the record," or "any sufficient reason" given by the courts in regard to the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code contained in Order 47, Rule 1, are, therefore, applicable in so far as the practice before the Indian Supreme Court is concerned.

The rule in Pakistan upon the subject is as follows :—

"Applications for Review shall be filed with the Registrar within 30 days after judgment is delivered in the cause, appeal or matter, and shall distinctly state the grounds for Review and be accompanied by a certificate of counsel that the petitioner has reasonable and proper grounds for Review." (See Order XXVI, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1956).

It would be seen that the "grounds" on which review is competent have not been indicated in the Rule. The Rules of the Indian Supreme Court on this subject provide, "The Court may review its own judgment or order, but no application for review will be entertained except on grounds mentioned in Order 47, Rule 1 of the Civil Procedure Code (See Order 38, Supreme Court Rules, 1950). The precise scope of the Review Jurisdiction of our Supreme Court has yet to be described by that Court and the following comments offered by the present writer as to the Nature of Review Jurisdiction are based on the belief that the Court would adopt the concept of Review as it is known to the Civil Procedure Code:

(1) Discovery of New and Important Evidence. In the case of Kessowji v. G.I.P. Railway, 11 C.W.N. 721 P.C., their Lordships of the Privy Council with regard to the requirement that the Review applications could be entertained on the ground of discovery of new and important matter of evidence emphasized the duty of the Judge in review proceedings to require the facts, as to the absence of negligence, to be strictly proved. If we have no such evidence forthcoming the review application is incompetent. In a later case Shivalingappa v. Revappa, (1915 P.C. 78) the Privy Council refused to allow the admission of fresh evidence on the ground that valid reasons for so doing were not available. There was no explanation why such new evidence was not made available during the trial. The application for summoning additional evidence had been made after a final judgment in a suit, which had already lasted over a period of three years and the affidavits failed to disclose to their Lordships any sufficient reason why the proposed new evidence was not timely submitted.

(2) Mistake or error apparent on the face of the record.

With regard to the ground that error must be one apparent on the face of the record, it is necessary to emphasise the fact that although the error can be both of law or fact, in each case it is the requirement of the law that the error must be capable of ascertainment from the record itself. To merely allege that the error of law has taken place because a wrong exposition of the law has taken place, or that the law has been wrongly applied, is not sufficient. It is the apparency of error that seems to be the leading feature in the situation to which the exercise of the review jurisdiction could be said to be attracted. (See AIR 1952 Allahabad p. 318 Keshodass v. Murtaza Ali Khan, and the observations of the Supreme Court in the Kamatha's case AIR 1955 S.C. page 233, See also the discussion on Error apparent on the face of the Record, in Chapter VI relating to Writ Jurisdiction in Certiorari proceedings.)

(3) Any other sufficient reason :

As to the expression "any other sufficient reason" occurring in Order 47, Rule 1, their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Chhajju Ram v. Neki, in AIR 1922 P.C. p. 112, after examining the relevant case law have remarked:

"The expression has reference to those species of grounds that are analogous to those specified immediately previously before that expression in Rule 1, of Order 47".

It must be carefully borne in view that there is a fundamental difference between the scope of interference in a review as contrasted from that which is countenanced in an appeal.

An appeal is a re-hearing of the case and at the stage when the court of appeal is re-hearing the case, it is bound to take notice of the law as it has come to be between the date on which the judgment appealed from was delivered and the date on which the appeal happens to be considered by the court of appeal. A review of the judgment cannot take notice of the law as it has come to prevail after the judgment sought to be reviewed has been rendered. In fact, the happening of any subsequent event in the circumstances is entirely irrelevant to the fate of review proceedings. (See AIR 1944 Madras p. 238 in re K. Vasudevan). As soon as an appeal is admitted, the case for re-hearing has been thrown open before the court of appeal. "The hearing of an appeal", it was remarked in the case of Lachmeshwar Prasad Shukul & others v. Kameshwar Lal Chaudhuri & others AIR (1941) F.C. 5, "under the procedural law of India is in the nature of re-hearing and therefore in moulding the relief to be granted in a case on appeal, the appellate court is entitled to take into account even facts and events which have come into existence after the decree appealed against. Consequently, the appellate court is competent to take into account legislative changes since the decision in appeal was given and its powers are not confined only to see whether the lower court's decision was correct according to the law as it stood at the time when its decision was given."

In this case Varadachariar J., referred to numerous English, Indian and American cases, as also to an earlier judgment rendered by Federal Court in the case of Shyamakant v. Rambajan AIR (1939) F.C. 74: 1939 F.C.R. p. 193. (See 1912 A.C. p. 788 Attorney General v. Birmingham, Tame & Rea District Drainage Board; 1882 9 Q.B.D. 672 (Quilter v. Mapleson); 36 Madras p. 439 (1910) Kanakayya v. Janardhana Padhi; Mukerjee v. Mt. Ramratan AIR (1936) P.C. 49: 63 Indian Appeals page 47. Lord Thankerton in the last mentioned case remarked that the duty of the court is to administer the law of the land on the date when the court is administering it.)

218. Constitution and the Jurisdiction of the High Courts in Pakistan

There are two High Courts in Pakistan, one for each of the two Provinces of Pakistan, that is the West and East Pakistan Provinces. This is the requirement of ART. 165(1) of the Constitution, which lays down that "there shall be a High Court for each Province." In clause (2) of the said Article, by a constitutional mandate the High Courts for the Provinces of East Bengal and West Pakistan functioning immediately before the Constitution Day are to be deemed to be the High Courts under the Constitution for the Provinces of East Pakistan and West Pakistan respectively.

The High Court for the Province of East Pakistan was constituted immediately after the creation of Pakistan and its jurisdiction and authority was described in the Order creating it as being the same as that of the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta. [See High Courts (Bengal) Order, 1947, dated 11-8-1947]. The High Court for West Pakistan was established immediately after the creation of the Province of West Pakistan, by the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, read with the Establishment of West Pakistan High Court Order of 1955. The West Pakistan High Court created under these pre-constitutional instruments is now to be deemed as the High Court of West Pakistan under the Constitution.

In order to be able to appreciate the jurisdictional aspects of the two High Courts, it is necessary to make a reference to the pre-existing law upon the subject, for it is this pre-existing law which includes "Letters Patent" of a High Court, and which, under the authority of Article 224 is still alive and continues to furnish the legal basis for the exercise of the judicial power by these High Courts. It should be remembered that as far as our Constitution is concerned, in Chapter II of Part IX, it confers only two additional powers on the High Courts in our country :

- (a) power of the High Courts to issue certain writs under ART. 170, and
- (b) the power of High Court to transfer cases to itself from subordinate Courts involving "a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, the determination of which is necessary for the disposal of the case." (ART. 171).

These two Articles supplement the jurisdiction and power of the High Courts as defined by the state of the pre-existing law.

In the Third Schedule to our Constitution, in Part II, are mentioned the administrative functions of the High Court. It is provided that :

"Each High Court shall have superintendence and control over all courts subject to its appellate or revisional jurisdiction," and under clause (2) of paragraph 5, are mentioned the powers of the High Court to :

- (a) call for returns;
- (b) make and issue general rules, and prescribe forms for regulating the practice and procedure of such Courts;
- (c) prescribe forms in which books, entries and accounts shall be kept by the officers of any such Courts; and
- (d) settle tables of fees to be allowed to the sheriffs, attorneys, and all clerks and officers of such Courts."

The High Court in the exercise of these powers virtually becomes a Court of fundamental importance not only as constituting the principal forum in which the major burden of the administration of justice in each Province is to be undertaken and discharged but also as a Court invested with powers of general superintendence and control over all the Courts situated within the Province.

The High Courts are superior courts of general jurisdiction and they have far-reaching judicial and administrative powers indeed. The Supreme Court is a Court of a defined jurisdiction and except that the constitution requires its interference in specified matters it has not the general authority to interfere with the course of administration of justice which is primarily entrusted to the High Courts in our country to pilot and negotiate.

In order to appreciate this legal position it is necessary to recapitulate some salient features of the judicial history touching and concerning the development and evolution of the powers of the various High Courts ever since the establishment of British power in the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent. The statement that 'the roots of the present lie deep in the past', is nowhere more true than it is in the case of the orderly development of the jurisdictional aspects of Courts of superior jurisdiction in our country. In the unfolding of the history of the progressive development of judiciary in the country it is not necessary for us to begin earlier than the Regulating Act of 1773, (13 Geo. III, C. 63), which Act, as its title and Preamble indicate, was passed "for establishing certain regulations for the better management of the affairs of East India Company, as well in India as in Europe". Quite apart from the far-reaching changes of a political nature, which this Act made in the matter of regulating the affairs of East India Company (such as the establishment of the Government of Bengal which was to consist of Governor-General and four Councillors, and making that Government a superior Government over the administrations of Madras and Bombay, subject of course to the ultimate authority and control of the Court of Directors in England) the importance of that legislative measure lies in its emphasis on the establishment of the Supreme Court, which was to be a King's Court having jurisdiction over "His Majesty's subjects", a Court the Judges whereof were to be appointed by the Crown. It is in this Act that the ambition of the East India Company to establish a system of Courts from the lowest to the highest under its own authority met with its Waterloo. It was in pursuance of this Act that by means of the issue of a Royal Charter, dated March 26, 1774, Supreme Court at Calcutta was established. For the course of next eighty eight years or so this Court at Calcutta carried on the work of administering justice. It had jurisdiction of a Common Law Court as also the powers of the Court of Equity analogous to those exercised at one time by the Court of Chancery in England. It was constituted also as "the Court of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery for Calcutta and Fort William and the factories subordinate thereto, with power to summon grand and petit juries to administer criminal justice." It also had the powers of the Court of Admiralty. It was to function as Ecclesiastical Court too. In matters 'civil' an appeal lay from its decisions to the Privy Council but in criminal cases the right to appeal was made subject to numerous restrictions. Under ART. 4 of the Charter, the Judges of the Supreme Court became invested "with such jurisdiction and authority as our Justices of our Court of King's Bench, may lawfully exercise within that part of Great Britain called England by the Common Law thereof". Similarly ART. 21 gave powers of general control and superintendence to the Supreme Court in such sort, manner and form "as the inferior courts and magistrates of that part of Great Britain called England are, by law, subject to the order and control of our Court of King's Bench to which end the said Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal is hereby empowered and authorised to award and issue a writ or writs of mandamus, certiorari, procedendo or error to be reflected in the manner above-mentioned and directed to such courts and magistrates, as the case may require, and to punish any contempt of wilful disobedience thereto, by fine or imprisonment." This power was expressly made available to Supreme Court to be exercised by it over Courts of Request and Quarter Sessions at Calcutta, and Justices, Sheriffs and Magistrates appointed in the Districts.

The Company's judicial system as it was organised by Warren Hastings, was known as Adawlut system with "Sudder Dewanny Adawlut" at the apex. The Charter that created the Supreme Court was silent as to the relation between that court and the courts established under the authority of the Company. The difficulties arose because the Supreme Court claimed to have jurisdiction over the servants of the Company and the Judges of the Company's Courts, who in the system of administration of justice established under the aegis of the Company, were, of course, the servants of the Company.

The law which was to be applied by the Supreme Court was also not precisely defined in the Charter under which it came to be established. The Supreme Court was the successor of Mayor's Court which was established in each of the Presidency Towns like Calcutta, Bombay and Madras under the Charters granted by George I. in 1726. It was not clear whether the English Law which was being applied by the Mayor's Court continued to be applicable when that Court was replaced by the Supreme Court in 1774. The question whether any statute passed in England after 1726 had to be made especially applicable to India before it could apply, could be studied from the case reported in 77 E.R. 377, in which it was answered in the negative.

The story of the conflict between the two principal organs of political and judicial power in India, that is, between the Supreme Council and the Supreme Court is well known to the students of early judicial history of the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent and any student wishing to pursue these studies upon the subject further is advised to read Mill's History of India, as also to study the Early Decisions rendered by Supreme Court, in which these clashes of authority are fully reflected.

Herbert Cowell Tagore Law Professor, in his book, on "History and Constitution of the Courts and Legislative Authorities in India", has expatiated upon this conflict of authority and jurisdiction at considerable length and in the following extract, which is taken from that book, the student can witness the extent to which the warfare went on till the Act of 1781 was passed to curtail the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court:

"For seven years the conflict between them (i.e. Supreme Council and the Supreme Court) raged. The Court issued its writs extensively throughout the country, arrested and brought to Calcutta all persons against whom complaints were lodged, zamindars, farmers, and occupiers of land, whatever their rank or consequence in the country. Defaulters to the revenue were set at liberty on habeas corpus; the government of the Nabob, which still remained in the hands of the Company, the effectual instrument for the administration of Criminal Justice, was declared by the Court to be 'an empty name, without any legal right, or the exercise of any power whatsoever'; and the production in Court of papers containing the most secret transactions of Government was insisted upon. The Court was charged with stopping the wheels of Government by the technicalities of English law, and of effecting a total dissolution of social order." (pp. 41—42)

The comment of the author on the situation and his analysis of the factors responsible for the unsatisfactory state of affairs resulting from this conflict are as follows:—

"Although it is impossible to defend the acts of the Judges, it must be remembered that their position was from the first antagonistic to the Council; and that they carried out in India a scheme which had been prepared in England without adequate information or competent skill for the purpose of checking the excesses of administration and of re-establishing order on principles totally strange to the inhabitants. The essential character and object of that scheme were to weaken the power of the Government by vesting it in the hands of a majority, and to plant in its neighbourhood a Court, framed after the fashion of the existing Courts in England, with jurisdiction over all its executive acts and a veto on all its legislation. This tribunal, vested with such extraordinary powers, and so ludicrously unsuited to the social and political condition of Bengal, was not merely to exercise a civil and criminal jurisdiction wholly strange and repugnant to the Indian people; it might sit one day on its common law side and give judgment to a suitor, and on the next day might sit on its equity side and restrain that suitor from proceeding to execution. It might on one side adjudge a man to be the absolute owner of property, and on the other side consign him to perpetual imprisonment if he did not, in his character of trustee, forthwith give it up to those beneficially entitled. In short, the whole system of English law and equity, with its rules and customs and process, handed down from feudal times, moulded during struggles between secular and ecclesiastical powers, between church and commonalty, between common law and civil jurisprudence, which time alone had rendered endurable to the people amongst whom it had grown up, a people widely different in habits, character, and form of civilization from any to be found in the East, was introduced into India, not intentionally as a burden, but for its benefit and salvation." (Pp. 42—43)

The next phase which may be regarded as the milestone in the history of the growth of judicial power is the Act of Settlement of year 1781 (21 George III, Chapter 70), which, as, has been hinted earlier, was in reality an amending Act—an Act which, to a considerable extent, curtailed the powers of the Supreme Court: in particular, its jurisdiction "in any matter concerning the revenue or concerning any acts ordered or done in collection thereof according to the practice of the country" was taken away. Similarly, Governor-General and his Council were rendered immune against the process of the Supreme Court in respect of "any act or order, or any other matter or thing whatsoever, counselled, ordered, or done by them in their public capacity only and acting as the Governor-General-in-Council." By S. 17 of the Act, the Court was directed to apply to matters like succession, inheritance of lands and goods and all matters of contract the laws and usages of Mahomedans in the case of Mahomedan litigants and in the case of Gentoos by the laws and usages applicable to Gentoos. In cases where there was only one party as Mahomedan or Gentoo, the laws and usages governing the defendant were directed to be applicable. Another important feature of this Act was the recognition which Parliament showed in its 21st, 22nd and 23rd Sections "to the Civil and Criminal Provincial Courts, existing independently of the Supreme Court; and of the Governor-General and Council or some Committee thereof, as the Chief Appellate Court of the country."

It was not until 1861 that the British Parliament passed the Indian High Courts Act (24 and 25 Victoria, Chapter 104), which replaced the Supreme Court that had hitherto continued to exist at Calcutta, by the High Court which came to be established under the Royal Charters issued under the said Act.

It should be remembered that before the passing of this Act, both at Bombay and Madras also the Supreme Courts with powers analogous to that of the Supreme Court at Calcutta had been established. The Supreme Court was established in Madras in December 1801, and at Bombay in 1823. The Supreme Courts of Judicature at these two places had replaced what were known as Recorder's Court and continued to function—subject of course to such restrictions as were imposed on the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Calcutta at Saint Fort Williams—till they were replaced by the High Courts constituted under the Charters issued under the Indian High Courts Act 1861.

The Indian High Courts Act (or the Charter Act of 1861) was repealed and re-enacted with slight modifications by the Government of India Act, 1915, which in turn with certain modifications was repealed by the Government of India Act, 1935. In the 1st Section of the said High Courts Act, it was said :

"It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Letters Patent under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom to erect and establish a High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal for the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William, aforesaid, and by like Letters Patent to erect and establish like High Courts at Madras and Bombay for those Presidencies respectively. Such High Courts to be established in the said several Presidencies at such time or respective times as to Her Majesty may seem fit and the High Court to be established under any such Letters Patent in any of the said Presidencies shall be deemed to be established from and after the publication of such Letters Patent in the same Presidency, or such other time as in such other Letters Patent may be appointed in this behalf."

And in the 8th Section as a consequence of the establishment of such High Court, as aforesaid, in the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal, it was directed that "the Supreme Court and the Court of Sudder Dewany Adawlut and Sudder Nizamut Adawlut at Calcutta, in the same Presidency, shall be abolished"; Further it was provided:

"And upon the establishment of such High Court in the Presidency of Madras, the Supreme Court and the Court of the Sudder Adawlut and Foujdary Adawlut in the same Presidency shall be abolished:

"And upon the establishment of such High Court in the Presidency of Bombay, the Supreme Court and the Court of Sudder Dewany Adawlut and Sudder Foujdary Adawlut in the same Presidency shall be abolished:

"And the records and documents of the several Courts so abolished in each Presidency shall become, and be, records and documents of the High Court established in the same Presidency."

As to the jurisdiction and powers of the new High Courts, in the 9th Section of the said Act the following was provided:

"9.—Each of the High Courts to be established under this Act shall have and exercise all such Civil, Criminal, Admiralty, and Vice-Admiralty, Testamentary, Intestate, and Matrimonial Jurisdiction, original and Appellate, and all such powers and authority for, and in relation to, the administration of justice in the Presidency for which it is established, as Her Majesty may by such Letters Patent as aforesaid, grant, and direct subject, however, to such directions and limitations as to the exercise of Original, Civil and Criminal jurisdiction beyond the limits of the Presidency Towns as may be prescribed thereby; and save as by such Letters Patent may be otherwise directed, and subject and without prejudice to the legislative powers in relation to the matters aforesaid of the Governor-General of India-in-Council, the High Court to be established in each Presidency shall have and exercise all jurisdiction and every power and authority whatsoever in any manner vested in any of the Courts in the same Presidency abolished under this Act at the time of the abolition of such last-mentioned Courts."

The Charters were originally issued in 1862 and, again afterwards, new Charters were issued in 1865 constituting the High Courts in Bengal, Madras and Bombay. Later on, in March 1866, Letters Patent were issued establishing a High Court pursuant to S. 16 of the High Court and Charter Act of 1861, in the North-West Provinces of Bengal Presidency. High Court of Allahabad was established by Letters Patent, dated March 17, 1866. In 1916 by Letters Patent, High Court was established at Patna. The High Court of Lahore was established under Letters Patent, dated March 21, 1919. The High Court of Burma was established at Rangoon in 1922, by means of a Letters Patent, and a High Court for Central Provinces was established in 1936 at Nagpur.

The history relating to the establishment of High Court at Lahore may now be briefly described. It is detailed by Herbert Cowell in the following words:

"In the Punjab, prior to the establishment of a High Court by Letters Patent at Lahore in 1919, a Chief Court had been established, constituted very much upon the model of the High Courts. It derived its existence from an Act of the Imperial Legislative Council, instead of a Royal Charter, and the Judges who composed it were appointed by the Governor-General-in-Council and not by Her Majesty. It was established by Act IV of 1866, passed with the previous sanction of the Secretary of State for India-in-Council, to amend the constitution of the previously existing Judicial Commissioner's Court. Act XVII of 1877, and later on, Act XVIII of 1884, c. 2, reconstituted it. This Act was amended by Act XIX of 1895, and Act XXV of 1899. The new tribunal was invested with an original jurisdiction for the trial of certain civil and criminal cases. It consisted of three or more Judges.

They held their offices at the pleasure of the Governor-General. The Chief Court was the highest Court of Appeal from the Civil and Criminal Courts in the Punjab, over which it had a general supervision and control. Its proceedings were regulated by the civil procedure for the time being in force in the Punjab; and in exercising its jurisdiction it was bound to apply the rules of law or equity and good conscience which the local Court would have applied. It had complete jurisdiction over European British subjects, and it had superintendence over all Courts subject to its appellate jurisdiction." (pp. 232-33).

After the creation of the independent and sovereign Dominion of Pakistan, the High Court at Lahore was continued by G.G.O. 7, (High Court (Lahore) Order 1947,) dated 11-8-1947 and it was provided that it shall, save as otherwise provided by the High Courts (Punjab) Order 1947 (G.G.O. 5 of 1947) have all its original, appellate and other jurisdiction as it had immediately before the appointed day (that is before 15-8-1947).

For the proper understanding of the jurisdictional aspects of the two existing High Courts in Pakistan it is necessary to refer to the following enactments:

As to the High Court for East Pakistan at Dacca.

- (2) Letters Patent for the High Court of Calcutta, dated 28th of December 1865; and

As to the West Pakistan High Court.

- (3) Letters Patent for the Lahore High Court, dated March 21, 1919; and
- (4) The Establishment of West Pakistan High Court Order, 1956.

215. Constitutional Status of the Supreme Courts and the High Courts

Both the Supreme Court as well as the High Court in this country are courts of record and have all the powers of such a court including the power to make any order for the investigation or punishment of any contempt of itself. (ART. 176). It is a common law doctrine that the power to punish for contempt of itself is a power which is inherent in any court that is a court of record. What is and what is not a court of record is, however, not a very simple problem to resolve, having regard to the fact that there are divergent views as to the meaning of the expression "Court of Record" that have been advanced by different textbook writers in England and in America. To advert to Halsbury's Law of England, Volume 9 of the Third Edition, page 346, paragraph 816, this is what one finds: "Another manner of division is into courts of record and courts not of record. Certain courts are expressly declared by statute to be courts of record. In the case of courts not expressly declared to be courts of record, the answer to the question whether a court is a court of record seems to depend in general upon whether it has power to fine or imprison, by statute or otherwise, for contempt of itself or other substantive offences; if it has such power, it seems that it is a court of record. In the case of criminal courts, this seems to be the only test. In the case of civil courts, it has been said that courts of record at common law, are such courts as have power to hear and determine, according to the course of common law, actions in which the debt, damages or value of the property claimed is 40 shillings or above. In the case of civil courts, the further distinction formerly existed between courts of record and courts not of record, that in the case of the former, where a judgment was alleged to be wrong, a writ of error lay whereas in the case of the latter the remedy was by way of a writ of false judgment . . . The proceedings of a court of record preserved in its archives are called records, and are conclusive evidence of that which is recorded therein."

The power to punish in respect of contempt of itself would seem to flow from the status of a court as a court of record, and if this power has been specially mentioned in the Constitution at all it has been done so out of abundant caution in order to meet a possible argument, namely, the doctrine of English common law whence the power of punishing for contempt is derived, may not be relevant in respect of a court which is a creature of statute.

The value of distinction between superior and inferior courts is immense since it helps to resolve the question of jurisdiction with particular reference to the onus cast upon the party denying it. Inferior courts are established to carry justice to every man's door. The superior courts are courts of general jurisdiction. In the words of the Editors of Halsbury's Law of England, Paragraph 820, 9th Volume, 3rd Edition, "Prima facie, no matter is deemed to be beyond the jurisdiction of a superior court unless it is expressly shown to be so, while nothing is within the jurisdiction of an inferior court unless it is expressly shown on the face of the proceedings that the particular matter is within the cognizance of a particular court. An objection to the jurisdiction of one of the superior courts of general jurisdiction must show what other court has jurisdiction, so as to make it clear that the exercise by the superior court of its general jurisdiction is unnecessary. The High Court, for example, is a court of universal jurisdiction and superintendency in certain classes of actions and cannot be deprived of its ascendancy by showing that some other court could have entertained the particular action. In an inferior court, other than a county court, unless the proceedings show on their face that the cause of action arose within its jurisdiction, the action cannot be maintained, and even in inferior courts with a local limit of jurisdiction it must appear that such limit is not being exceeded." (See also Peacock v. Bell, 1 Saund 69 cited in London v. Cox L.R. 2 H.L. 239, where it was said, "Nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which specially appears to be so, and on the contrary, nothing shall be intended to be within the jurisdiction of an inferior court but that which is so expressly alleged.")

It is submitted that the Supreme Court of Pakistan is, having regard to its Constitution, no doubt superior most court in the country, but it is the High Courts in our country that may be regarded as superior courts of general jurisdiction. This would appear to be indicated from the History of Development of the Judicial Power in the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent ever since the days of East India Company's rule, as also by the analysis of their jurisdictional aspects as they are disclosed by our Constitution.

A few remarks of a somewhat general nature on the relationship between the two categories of the superior courts in this country may now be offered.

The constitutional status of Supreme Court and its superiority over all High Courts can admit of no doubt: that the Court is Supreme in every conceivable sense of the term, appears to be indicated by the provisions of the Constitution which we have discussed so far. We have seen, for instance, that it is a Court of ultimate jurisdiction and the law declared by it is binding on all our Courts in Pakistan. It is essential that this status of the supremacy of the Supreme Court should be fully respected in the letter and in the spirit in which it would appear to be the intention of the framers of our Constitution that it should be so respected. The maintenance of the supremacy of the Supreme Court is essential for securing proper administration of justice in the country and for the due safeguarding of the constitutional rights of the citizens as also for ensuring the orderly implementation of those constitutional processes which are so essential for the smooth working of democratic institutions within the framework of the Constitution and the law. Whether the High Courts are Courts subordinate to the Supreme Court of Pakistan in the sense in which all the Courts in the country other than the Supreme Court are declared by the law to be subordinate to the High Court, is a question which does not arise for consideration. The High Courts within the limits of their jurisdiction are supreme and subject to those constitutional provisions whereunder their decisions are thrown open for adjudication by the Supreme Court of the country, their authority is practically untrammelled and is completely independent of all external determinations, by the Supreme Court. ART. 163 contains indications that the Supreme Court has the last word in matters relating to judicial process in this country. All executive and judicial authorities throughout Pakistan are directed to act in aid of the process of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court has the power to issue such directions, orders, decrees or writs as may be necessary for doing complete justice in any case or matter pending before it and any such direction, order, decree or writ shall be enforceable throughout Pakistan and shall be executed as if it has been issued by the High Court of appropriate Province. These provisions are analogous to those that were mentioned in S.210 of the Government of India Act and were reviewed in the case of Fazal Elahi & others v. The Crown, PLD (1953) F.C. 35 decided by the Federal Court of Pakistan. In that case the question to be determined was about the extent to which decisions rendered by the late Federal Court could be deemed binding upon the High Courts and in particular as to the extent to which the High Court could re-open questions of fact found by the Federal Court and made a basis of their judgment. The pre-eminence of Federal Court in that case was held to stem from the following constitutional provisions (at p. 60):

- ‘“(i) that all orders of every kind made by a High Court are appealable to this Court, unless an appeal be barred by statute;
- (ii) that all courts are enjoined, not only to follow the law laid down by this Court, but in addition, to recognise it as binding, a requirement connoting mental cognition, in the nature of a submission;
- (iii) that all authorities, civil and judicial, throughout Pakistan are required to act in aid of this Court; and
- (iv) that all its orders made in the exercise of jurisdiction conferred upon it, are enforceable throughout Pakistan, the manner of such enforcement, where not already provided by existing law, being left to be prescribed by rules made by this Court, in accordance with law.”

It was further observed that from the highest to the lowest, the courts of the country (at p. 60):

“are all engaged in the same duty, namely that of administering justice in the cases which come before them. For this purpose, the judicial system has provided a gradation of Courts, charged with the duty of ascertaining the facts of such cases, and applying thereto the law as contained in the statutes and judicial precedents which are of binding effect. In this process, which is obviously designed for the elimination of error, the law, in its wisdom, has provided that the determination of facts shall ordinarily be concluded at an earlier stage than the determination of law and legal principles. It is therefore that the courts of highest appellate jurisdiction are frequently restricted either by law or by their own practice in their approach to the facts as found by Courts which precede them in the gradation. But in regard to the legal principles which are ascertained as applying to these facts, and any further legal principles which may, conformably to relevant statutes, be drawn from the case, the view of the highest Court of appellate jurisdiction must necessarily prevail. This does not connote anything in the nature of subordination of the Courts which dealt with the case at earlier stages, but on the other hand, can only rightly be regarded as the last product of a fruitful collaboration by all such Courts including the highest appellate Court, for a common end, namely the application of reason to the resolution of problems arising out of human affairs, according to the due process of law. That indeed furnishes the clue to the bond which exists between the Courts constituting the gradation referred to above. Each in its place doing justice according to its lights, in conformity with law and the limitation upon its functions, is bound to its inferiors as well as its superiors by a single tie, namely, of that amenability to reason applied for the purposes of justice in accordance with law.”

The Court then referred to the judgment of Lord Halsbury in the case of Quinn v. Leathem (1901) A.C. 495 in an endeavour to show that the hypothesis of fact upon which a view of the law is taken by a Court is sacrosanct and is not open to being resurrected by the Courts before which the judgment is placed as a binding precedent. In that case the question to be considered was the effect of the rule laid down in the famous case of Allen v. Flood, (1898) A.C. 1. In the opinion of Lord Halsbury the hypothesis of fact upon which the case was decided by the majority of those who took part in the decision, was really what was to be looked at and then he made those observations, which are often cited in our country:

“Now before discussing the case of Allen v. Flood and what was decided therein, there are two observations of a general character which I wish to make, and one is to repeat what I have very often said before, that every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved, or assumed to be proved, since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law, but governed and qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are to be found. The other is that a case is only an authority for what it actually decides. I entirely deny that it can be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it.”

The Federal Court then stated its approach to these matters as follows (at p. 72):

“We trust that this instance of a Lord Chancellor, accepting with grace and dignity, a view of the facts of a precedent case with which he himself did not agree at all, for the purpose of appreciating and limiting the law laid down thereon, by the majority of the judges who decided that case, will serve not only to establish that, in the recognised mode of treatment of judicial precedents of Courts of ultimate jurisdiction, the hypothesis of fact upon which the law has been laid down is no less sacrosanct, in relation to Courts which are obliged by law to follow such precedent, than the law which has been laid down, but will also assist such Courts in the realization that any resistance, by the exercise of powers vested in them, for the purpose of asserting their own varying views either of the facts or the law, is neither consistent with judicial tradition and decorum nor to be recommended as likely to produce any result, much less a useful result.”

It would be useful, at this stage, to remind the reader of what has been stressed earlier: Professor Goodhart in the long extract cited at page 610, has answered the point raised in Fazal Elahi's case. To the question, can the Judge, by making a mistake as to the state of real facts before him, give himself the authority to decide “what in fact is a hypothetical case”, the learned author makes the following answer:

“. . . The whole doctrine of precedent is based on the theory that as a general rule Judges do not make mistakes either of fact or of law. In an exceptional case a Judge may in error base his conclusion on a non-existent fact, but it is better to suffer this mistake, which may prove of benefit to the law as a whole, however painful its results may have been to the individual litigant, than to throw doubt on every precedent on which our law is based.”

In the case before the Federal Court, the judgment of the High Court, which was the subject matter of appeal before them had in it an expression of opinion by the learned Judges of the High Court about what was decided by the Federal Court itself in a case previously decided by it. (See Ali & Bashir v. The Crown, P.L.D. (1952) F.C. p. 71). The High Court had explained this decision of the Federal Court with reference not to the facts found by the Federal Court but with reference to facts that were supposed to have been established on the record: in fact, while engaged in the discharge of this undertaking, a re-statement of facts was attempted by the High Court. "It is necessary", said the High Court, "to examine the whole position with special reference to the facts of and the principles deducible from the Federal Court Judgment in Ali & Bashir v. The Crown, (1952 P.L.D. Federal Court p. 71), in order to decide the claim for a retrial." As to whether such a course would be deemed permissible, the Federal Court ruled in Fazal Elahi's case as follows (at p. 58):

"It has been repeatedly laid down by the Privy Council, and we take the opportunity of declaring the rule to be applicable to the pronouncements of this Court as well, that their judgments were not to be construed as laying down the law generally, but only as declaring the law in relation to the precise findings of fact reached or accepted or assumed by them. It is in this limited sense that Section 212 of the Government of India Act is to be understood. For, if the words of that section be understood in their widest import, they undoubtedly purport to invest the Federal Court with a legislative power, which, at any rate, could not be resisted by 'all courts' mentioned in the section. That is clearly not the true interpretation of the Section, for it would be contrary to the clear division of function between the legislature and the judicature, which is rightly and universally recognised as inherent in British Constitutional practice, and which it was one of the purposes of the Government of India Act, 1935, to provide. But the sole limitation which can conceivably be placed upon the power clearly vested in the Federal Court by means of this Section, is that of laying down the law for each particular case, that is to say, in respect of the facts found in that case. It is obvious that the recognition which is required of the courts must extend both to these facts, as well as to the law laid down thereon, if the Section is not to be deprived of its effect. That is to say, it is not open to any court, whether in the same or in any other case, to revise, or re-examine, or otherwise attempt to reach a different finding upon, any matters of fact on which the Federal Court has reached or accepted a finding or made an assumption in relation to which it has been declared the law. This prohibition applies irrespective of whether such court eventually finds that the principle of law laid down by the Federal Court is, or is not, applicable to the case before it."

220. The Privy Council as a Court of Indian Appeals

The jurisdiction of the Sovereign-in-Council is founded on the Crown prerogative and the common law. King being the fountain source of justice in the eye of the English law and constitutional practice, unless a statute duly passed by King-in-Parliament curtails or limits in express terms this prerogative to administer justice, it is supposed to exist. In the case of Hull v. M'kenna, (1926) I.R. 402 P.C., Lord Haldane stated the constitutional position of the Privy Council as follows:

"The Privy Council is an Imperial Body representing the Empire and is no more English than it is for instance, Indian, Canadian or South African. The Sovereign is everywhere throughout the Empire in the contemplation of the law and it is only for convenience that the Committee sits in London."

There have been, however, two principal statutes, namely (1) The Judicial Committee Act of 1833 (3 & 4 William IV, Chapter 41), and (2) The Judicial Committee Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Victoria, Chapter 69), that have defined and regulated the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The first statute directed the hearing of appeals by a special Committee of the Privy Council who were to advise the Crown upon the determinations that had to be rendered in the cause. Material portion of S. 3 of the Act of 1833, which provides for the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee, is as follows :—

"All appeals or complaints in the nature of appeals whatever, which either by virtue of this Act, or by any law, statute or custom, may be brought before His Majesty or His Majesty-in-Council from or in respect of the determination, sentence, rule, or order of any Court, Judge, or Judicial officer, and all such appeals as are now pending and unheard shall from and after the passing of this Act be referred by His Majesty to the said Judicial Committee of His Privy Council, and such appeals, causes, and matters shall be heard by the said Judicial Committee, and a report or recommendation thereon shall be made to His Majesty-in-Council for his decision thereon."

The history of the jurisdictional aspects of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as a Court of Appeal is given by Viscount Sankey in the case of British Coal Corporation v. The King, (1935) Appeal Cases page 500:

"The Judicial Committee is a statutory body established in 1833 by an Act of 3 and 4 William IV, Chapter 41, entitled an Act for the better administration of justice in His Majesty's Privy Council. It contains (inter alia) the following recital: 'And whereas, from the decisions of various courts of Judicature in the East Indies, and in the plantations, colonies, and other dominions of His Majesty abroad, an appeal lies to His Majesty in Council.' The Act then provides for the formation of a Committee of His Majesty's Privy Council, to be styled 'the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council', and enacts that all appeals or complaints in the nature of appeals whatever, which, either by virtue of this Act or of any law, statute, or custom, may be brought before His Majesty in Council from the order of any Court or Judge should thereafter be referred by His Majesty to, and heard by, the Judicial Committee, as established by the Act, who should make a report or recommendation to His Majesty in Council for his decision thereon, the nature of such report or recommendation being always stated in open Court. The Act contained a great number of provisions for the conduct of appeals. It is clear that the Committee is regarded in the Act as a judicial body or Court, though all it can do is to report or recommend to His Majesty in Council, by whom alone the Order in Council which is made to give effect to the report of the Committee is made. But according to constitutional convention it is unknown and unthinkable that His Majesty in Council should not give effect to the report of the Judicial Committee, who are thus, in truth, an appellate court of law, to which by the statute of 1833 all appeals within their purview are referred . . . In this way the functions of the Judicial Committee as a Court of law were established. The practice had grown up that the colonies under the authority either of Orders in Council or of Acts of Parliament should provide for appeals as of right from their Courts to the King in Council and should fix the conditions on which such appeals should be permitted. But outside these limits there had always been reserved a discretion to the King-in-Council to grant special leave to appeal from a colonial Court irrespective of the limitations fixed by the colonial law: this discretion to grant special leave to appeal was in practice described as the prerogative right: it was, indeed, a residuum of the Royal prerogative of the Sovereign as the fountain of justice."

The development of the considerable bulk of law which now prevails in India and Pakistan could be traced to the influence wrought by the decisions of the Privy Council rendered in cases taken to it from the Courts of final jurisdiction within the country. The conferment of the right of appeal to the Privy Council from the judgments of the Indian Courts could be traced back to the year 1726, the year in which, under the Charter issued in the reign of George I, the Mayor's Courts in the three Presidency Towns of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay were first established. In the Judicial Committee Act of 1833 the right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was provided in respect of cases decided by Supreme Courts in India and also from Sudder Dewany Adawlut: in the former case it was decided that the case should involve a value of over 1000 pagodas, and in the latter £5000 before appeal could be taken. Later on, by an Order-in-Council, the amount was rendered uniform and was fixed at Rs. 10,000. Special leave to appeal, however, could be taken from the Privy Council in any case irrespective of the amount of the claim involved in the case. In the case of Chartered High Courts established under the High Courts Act of 1861, the conditions precedent for the exercise of right to appeal to the Privy Council from "any final judgment, decree or order" rendered by them was that the claims involved be not less than Rs. 10,000 although regardless of the value involved the High Court was empowered to certify that the case was fit one for appeal to the Privy Council, in which case the appeal would lie as of right. When the Code of Civil Procedure was enacted the provisions relating to the right of appeal to the Privy Council were incorporated in it, and for this the student is referred to Ss. 109, 110 and 112 of the Civil Procedure Code.

In criminal matters, however, no appeal lay as a matter of right, but upon obtaining a special leave to appeal the Privy Council could entertain an appeal subject, of course, to the well known self imposed limitations enunciated by the Privy Council in several cases, referred to earlier and in particular in the case of Dal Singh v. King-Emperor, (1917) 44 Calcutta 876 (P.C.), where it was observed:

"According to the practice of the Judicial Committee in dealing with an appeal in a criminal case, the general principle is established that the Sovereign-in-Council does not act in the exercise of the prerogative right to review the course of justice in criminal cases in the free fashion of a fully constituted Court of Criminal Appeal. The exercise of the prerogative takes place only where it is shown that injustice of a serious and substantial character has occurred. A mere mistake on the part of the Court below, as for example, in the admission of improper evidence, will not suffice if it has not led to injustice of a grave character. Nor do the Judicial Committee advise interference merely because they themselves would have taken a different view of evidence admitted. Such questions are, as a general rule, treated as being for the final decision of the Courts below."

When the Government of India Act, 1935, was passed it envisaged the creation of the Federation of India and in order to provide for a judicial forum where Federal disputes and questions relating to the interpretation of the Constitution could be adjudicated, it established the Federal Court of India. Upon a certificate being given under S.205 by the High Court the appeal lay from its judgment, decree or order, to the Federal Court. The right to appeal to the Privy Council, however, was not affected. For in S.110(3) of the said Act it was provided:

"Nothing in this Act shall be taken to empower the Federal Legislature or any Provincial Legislature to make any law derogating from any prerogative rights of His Majesty to grant special leave to appeal from any Court, except in so far as is expressly permitted by any subsequent provisions of this Act."

In S.206(2) of the Government of India Act, the Federal Legislature was invested with the power to enlarge the appellate jurisdiction of the Federal Court. No such enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Privy Council took place before the establishment of the two independent Dominions of India and Pakistan, but both in India as well as in Pakistan, legislation was passed by the two Dominion Legislatures enlarging jurisdiction of the Federal Court in respect of certain matters. The student is referred to the Federal Court Enlargement of Jurisdiction Act (I of 1948) passed by the Indian Constituent Assembly as also the Federal Court Enlargement of Jurisdiction Act 1949 (Act No. I of 1950) passed by the Pakistan Constituent Assembly in the exercise of its legislative powers on 13th of January 1950, for a study of the extent to which in India and Pakistan the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Federal Court took place in civil cases. The Constituent Assembly of India abolished appeals to the Privy Council as from the 10th of October 1949, investing the Indian Federal Court in addition to its previously assigned jurisdiction with the same jurisdiction which was hitherto enjoyed in this behalf by the Privy Council. In Pakistan also the Privy Council (Abolition of Jurisdiction) Act, 1950, was passed by the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan on 20th of April 1950, whereby under S.3 it was provided:

"As from the appointed day the Federal Court shall, in addition to the jurisdiction conferred on it by the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Federal Court Enlargement of Jurisdiction Act, 1949, but subject to the provisions of this Section, have the same jurisdiction to entertain and dispose of Pakistan appeals and petitions as His Majesty in Council has, whether by virtue of His Majesty's prerogative or otherwise, immediately before the appointed day."

Thus it was that the Privy Council ceased absolutely to exercise any jurisdiction in relation to the adjudication of legal disputes in this country.

The tribute paid by the Chief Justice of Pakistan to the Privy Council in the case of Noorul Hassan and others v. The Federation of Pakistan, reported in P.L.D. 1956 S.C. p. 331, merits to be quoted in this context as it, in the opinion of the present writer, represents a just appreciation of what that august tribunal has done to exemplify the spirit and manner in which law has to be applied by a Judicial Tribunal for securing administration of justice. It will be recalled that Chief Justice was dealing with the contention of Mr. Manzur Qadir, the Counsel who appeared for the appellant, namely that the Privy Council's decision in Venkata Rao's case (64 Indian Appeals p. 55), was not rightly decided and is not good law. The contention was rejected. Here are the words of the Chief Justice (at p. 359):

"He addressed us no arguments in support of his contention and contented himself with the mere assertion that the rule laid down in that case, having been enunciated when India was still under the British domination, no longer holds good and that we are entitled to dissent from it. He also said something which I did not quite follow about imperialistic considerations influencing judgments of the Privy Council in such matters. I agree that decisions of the Privy Council are no longer binding on us now, but being expositions of the law by one of the highest judicial tribunals in the world composed of distinguished men who had special knowledge of our public law, they are entitled to the greatest respect and we are not to disregard them merely on the ground of changed conditions because the recognition of any such ground for departure from well-settled and fundamental principles would be tantamount to imputing judicial dishonesty to that Tribunal. Since Mr. Manzur Qadir persisted in his assertion, it becomes necessary to consider whether the several decisions of the Privy Council, which form important landmarks in the exposition of the law governing the tenure of office of servants under the Crown and their right to seek redress from Courts, proceeded on correct principles which are applicable to present conditions, no change by the new Constitution having been made in that respect in the law."

Then the learned Chief Justice examined practically all the cases decided by the Privy Council on that subject and came to the conclusion (at p. 363):

"I cannot, therefore, accept the contention that a breach of the rule requiring the holding of a formal inquiry was actionable and that the Privy Council was wrong in ruling to the contrary."

It is not necessary for the present writer to say anything more about the value of the decisions of the Privy Council. In fact in the present book his bias, if it can be so described, for quoting as authority the decisions of the Privy Council, is so patent that it needs no specific pointing out. The present writer considers the decisions of the Privy Council as the last word in that difficult art of saying decisively in few words what the law upon a particular subject is. These decisions would continue to be regarded as models of scholarship and legal reasoning worthy of emulation by the highest tribunal in any civilized country of the world.

The Privy Council was required to give, what is called 'advice', to the sovereign and this was tendered in one judgment pronounced by it in open court. This was followed by an Order-in-Council, upon the publication of which the decision of the Privy Council became merged in the Order-in-Council and thus became effective. There was no minority judgment or minute of dissent appended to the leading judgment.

The Privy Council never granted leave just for the sake of deciding merely an abstract or academic point of law, that is a point which did not fully and squarely arise in the case before it. (See R. v. Louw, Ex. Parte Attorney-General for the Cape of Good Hope, (1904) A.C. 412 P.C.). Nor did Privy Council ever give speculative opinions on questions that did not arise upon the facts of the case submitted for its determination. (See Attorney-General for Ontario v. Hamilton Street Railway, (1903) A.C. p. 524; as also Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada, (1916) 1 A.C. p. 598).

One could only fervently hope that the glorious and noble tradition of the Juristic Thought and Practice that has been left by the Privy Council in the matter of interpreting and applying law and of doing justice, will continue in the days that lie ahead, to be a never-failing source of guidance and inspiration to the Judges in this country.

SECTION — IV

Outline of the General System of the Law and Courts of our Country

221. Subordinate Judiciary

The courts subordinate to the High Court are established by or under several enactments (some of them are set up under special, and others under, local laws) having well defined jurisdiction to administer justice, civil as well as criminal. The tenure of office, as also the conditions of service of the personnel of subordinate judiciary, are regulated by several Acts of National and Provincial Legislatures.

Unlike the Government of India Act, 1935, which made special provisions with regard to judicial officers (see Ss. 253, 254, 255 and 256, provisions relating to the appointment of District Judges, Subordinate Civil Judicial Service, as also the Subordinate Criminal Magistracy etc.), our Constitution does not make any special provision with regard to these matters. In the Chapter relating to Services of Pakistan, there are general provisions affecting members of the Civil and Armed Services of Pakistan, including provisions with regard to the Constitution of All-Pakistan Service, etc. No reference, however, is to be found in that Chapter with regard to the Subordinate Judicial Service. (The Indian Constitution in Chapter VI, of Part VI (ARTS. 233 to 237), makes a provision for "Subordinate Courts").

It would thus appear that all these matters will now be governed by organic law to be enacted for the purpose by the National and Provincial Legislatures, and, until these laws are so made, the conditions of Subordinate Judicial Service will be regulated by pre-Constitutional legislative provisions. (See ART. 232).

It is however to be regretted that there are no constitutional provisions of the sort that existed in the Government of India Act, 1935, for ensuring that appointments to subordinate judiciary be made in the case of District Judges by the Governor of the Province after consulting the High Court. Similarly, the Subordinate Civil Judicial Service was under the Government of India Act regulated by rules made by the Governor of the Province after consultation with the Provincial Public Service Commission and with the High Court. These rules used to define the standard of minimum qualifications that had to be attained by persons desirous of entering the Subordinate Civil Judicial Service of the Province and thereby ensure the maintenance of proper standards of recruitment to that Service. Even the question of the posting and promotion, as also the question relating to the grant of leave to persons belonging to the Subordinate Civil Judicial Service of the Province, were in the hands of the High Court. (See Section 255(3) of the Govt. of India Act 1935).

The High Court undoubtedly has the power of superintendence and control over all courts subject to its appellate or revisional jurisdiction and can (a) call for returns; (b) make and issue general rules, and prescribe forms for regulating the practice and procedure of such courts; (c) prescribe forms in which books, entries and accounts shall be kept by the officers of any such courts; and (d) settle tables of fees to be allowed to sheriffs, attorneys and all clerks and officers of such courts, etc. (See Paragraph 5 of Part II of Third Schedule). The provisions of this Paragraph correspond to ART. 227 of the Indian Constitution with one major difference, namely, that whereas the High Courts in India have superintendence over all courts and tribunals throughout the territories in relation to which they exercise jurisdiction, our High Courts have the power of superintendence and control over only courts that are subject to their appellate or revisional jurisdiction. The power of the Indian High Courts is thus far more extensive than that of our High Courts: the reach of this power of the Indian High Courts has been circumscribed territorially with the result that by reason of the mere fact of a court or a tribunal exercising jurisdiction within the territories over which a

High Court exercises its jurisdiction, the High Court acquires jurisdiction to exercise its power of superintendence over such courts or tribunals. In our country, however, the condition precedent for the exercise of power of superintendence and control over courts is the requirement that those courts must be subject to High Court's appellate or revisional jurisdiction. So wide is the power of superintendence conferred upon the Indian High Courts by ART. 227 that in the 4th clause of that Article that power had to be expressly delimited, and the tribunals constituted by or under any law relating to Armed Forces had to be especially taken out from the reach of High Court's jurisdiction. The paragraph 5 of Third Schedule of our Constitution merely refers to the administrative function of High Courts whereas ART. 227 of the Indian Constitution confers power of superintendence over all courts and tribunals, and the power is not only administrative, it can be judicial as well. (See Sukhdeo v. Brij Bhushan, AIR (1951) All 667; Israel Khan v. State of Assam, AIR (1951) Assam 106; A.R. Sarin v. B.C. Patil, AIR (1951) Bombay 423.)

The Broad categories of subordinate Courts.

System of Civil Subordinate Courts.

General Jurisdiction of Civil Courts S. 9 of C. P. Code.

The subordinate courts established by law for the purpose of administering justice may be divided into two broad categories: (1) courts of civil subordinate jurisdiction, and (2) courts of criminal jurisdiction established by the Code of Criminal Procedure and under other special and local laws.

Confining our attention to courts of civil jurisdiction, we notice that the 3rd Section of the Code of Civil Procedure defines their relative status for the purposes of that Code as follows:

"The District Court is subordinate to the High Court, and every Civil Court of a grade inferior to that of a District Court and every Court of Small Causes is subordinate to the High Court and District Court."

The High Court, with reference to civil proceedings, is the highest Court of Appeal. [See S.3 (25) of the General Clauses Act, 1897]. The District Courts and courts subordinate to them shoulder the main burden of administering civil justice. The internal organization of these subordinate Civil Courts is often regulated by the provisions of local and special laws. Certain kinds of causes, as for instance suits relating to immovable property, etc., cannot be taken cognizance of by Courts of Small Causes whether they be established under the Provincial Small Causes Courts Acts or they be in any other category of "Small Causes Courts" established by special legislation. The original jurisdiction of subordinate courts is invariably determined with reference to the pecuniary value involved in the suit to be tried by it and appeals from the decrees passed by them are taken to superior courts in accordance with the requirements of the provisions enacted in that behalf.

The Code of Civil Procedure in its 9th Section sets-forth the jurisdiction of these Civil Courts in the following terms:

"The Courts shall (subject to the provisions herein contained) have jurisdiction to try all suits of a civil nature excepting suits of which their cognizance is either expressly or impliedly barred."

The Section has an Explanation appended to it which says :

"A suit in which the right to property or to an office is contested is a suit of a civil nature, notwithstanding that such right may depend entirely on the decision of questions as to religious rites or ceremonies."

It would be noticed from the language used in this Section that it is only the suits of civil nature that can be adjudicated in Civil Courts: and what is, and what is not, a suit of a civil nature is by itself a highly involved and a difficult question indeed. The explanation to the 9th Section reproduced above shows that, if the principal or the only question in the suit is a caste question or a question relating to religious rites or ceremonies, the suit is not of a civil nature, the argument being that such matters do not involve determination of civil right as substantially the issue is of a purely social character. But when these questions become subsidiary questions to determine with reference to another principal question affecting plaintiff's rights to property or to any office, then the suit becomes one which would be adjudicated in the Civil Courts. (See Sarda Kunwar Mt. v. Gajanand A.I.R. (1942) Allahabad 320; see also Thiruvenkata Ramanuja v. Venkatacharlu, 73 I.A. 156: AIR (1947) P.C. 53.

If a determination made by an authority that professes to act under a special law in the exercise of a power conferred upon him by statute is challenged in a Civil Court, the plaintiff in order to succeed will have to show that (a) such authority has in fact acted without jurisdiction, or (b) its orders are mala fide or have been made on a wrong basis, or that (c) the order passed is ultra vires. If he could show any of these things, the Civil Courts would have the jurisdiction to interfere and set aside the orders complained of. (See Kasandas v. Ankleshvar, (1901) 26 Bombay 294; Secretary of State v. Hughes, (1914) 38 Bombay 293; Dhuplal v. Ramdhani, AIR (1943) Patna 353). It is also possible to attack in Civil Courts the order passed by an authority who has not conformed to the procedure enjoined by the Act under which it has purported to act. (See Municipal Council of Tanjore v. Umamba, Boi Saheb (1900) 23 Madras 523). The jurisdiction of the Civil Courts to decide these matters is derived from the Common Law doctrine that it is in the last resort for the ordinary civil courts of the country to determine what the limits of the powers of the Courts of special jurisdiction are. (See Mohammad Nawaz v. Bhagata Nand, AIR 1938 P.C. 219). If a question arises in respect of the legal right of a person to hold a certain office, the issue thus raised would have to be further investigated to see if the right to such office, carried any remuneration. If there is no such right to remuneration, the Civil Court will have no jurisdiction—for the Civil Court cannot deal with a situation resulting from the mere exclusion of a particular person from the enjoyment of a social privilege that carries with it no right to property. (See Kanji v. Arjun, (1894) 19 Bombay 115). But if a person is expelled from a caste and such an expulsion amounts to deprivation of a legal right which forms an integral part of his status, a declaratory suit will lie to the effect that plaintiff be re-admitted into the caste as also for damages. (See Jagannath v. Akali, (1894) 21 Calcutta 463). But before a plaintiff can succeed in such an action, he must show that the rules of natural justice were not complied with before the decision in a domestic forum to expel him took place. The Courts would, upon such an issue being raised, be mainly concerned to see whether or not there was a due enquiry and that the plaintiff was heard in his defence before decision adverse to him was taken, (see Ambalal Sarabhai v. Phiroz, A.I.R. (1939) page 35). Should the defendant allege that the plaintiff in such a suit was guilty of the breach of a caste rule, the Court will enquire into the question of fact to find whether or not such a breach of the caste rule had in fact taken place. (See Krishnasami v. Virasami, (1887) 10 Madras 133).

Thus it would be seen that the Civil Courts have a comprehensive and all-embracing jurisdiction to entertain suits of a civil nature, and that such a jurisdiction which is defined so broadly can only be resisted by the defendant showing that the cognizance by the Courts in respect of a given cause of action is expressly or impliedly barred under law. Under several statutes, more particularly statutes relating to collection of revenue, there are often to be found clauses which take away expressly or impliedly the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts to question the validity of acts done by the authorities charged with the duty of determining people's rights and liabilities. (See for instance S.97 of the Income Tax Act, S. 4 of the Pensions Act, S.57 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act). The question that often arises in such cases is: What are the limits within which the ordinary Civil Court can, despite these clauses relating to ouster of its jurisdiction, interfere with the orders passed by these specially constituted authorities, tribunals or bodies?

Primary of the ordinary Civil Courts Jurisdiction over Courts and Tribunals of Special Jurisdiction.

There is, to begin with, a presumption in favour of the jurisdiction of a Civil Court, the general rule being that statutes barring the jurisdiction of Courts are to be construed in such a way as to avoid as far as possible the effect of transferring the burden of securing and determination of rights and liabilities of persons from ordinary courts to special tribunals and authorities. (See Winter v. Attorney-General, (1875) L.R.P.C. 380). Therefore, it would be for the party, who is contending that the jurisdiction of the Civil Court is ousted, to establish his contention. [See Suraj Narain v. Jamil Ahmad, AIR (1946) Patna 385, as also Ali Muhammad v. Hakim, AIR (1928) Lahore 121]. And even if the jurisdiction of the Civil Court is to be excluded because there is an express bar enacted in any special or local law with respect to a matter which is to be decided in a special way, it is still open to the Civil Court to enquire into the allegation, should it come to be made, that the tribunal has not acted within the four corners of the statute and/or has not complied with the provisions of law relating to the exercise of its own jurisdiction, and also to see if the tribunal has acted in conformity with the fundamental principles of judicial procedure. (See Secretary of State v. Mask & Co., AIR (1940) P.C. 105: 67 I.A. 222, and Nur Mohammad v. Solaiman, (1947) 1 Calcutta 339).

We may next turn our attention to Criminal Courts. As regards the Courts of criminal jurisdiction, the Code of Criminal Procedure, after making a due allowance for the existence of Courts of Special jurisdiction, establishes the following Courts under its 6th Section:

"Besides the High Courts and the Courts constituted under any law other than this Code for the time being in force, there shall be five classes of Criminal Courts in the Provinces and the Capital of the Federation, namely :—

- I. Courts of Session,
- II. Presidency Magistrate's Courts, (deleted by Adaptation Order 1949);
- III. Magistrates of the first Class;
- IV. Magistrates of the second Class ;
- V. Magistrates of the third Class."

Every Province is divided into several "Sessions Divisions", and "every sessions division" shall, for the purpose of that Code, consist of 'districts', (see Section 7). The Provincial Government have the power to alter the limits or number of such divisions and districts, (Section 7) and also the power to divide any district into sub-divisions or make any portion of any such district a sub-division and may alter the limits of any sub-division (See Section 8). The Provincial Government appoints a Judge of the Sessions Court for every Sessions Division and can also appoint Additional Sessions Judges, Assistant Sessions Judges to exercise jurisdiction in one or more such Courts. (See Section 9). The Provincial Government also appoints in every District, a Magistrate of the first class, who shall be called the "District Magistrate" and it can appoint Additional District Magistrates having all or any of the powers of the District Magistrate under the Code or under any other law for the time being in force, (Section 10). Similarly, the Code establishes Magistrates of various classes and defines their jurisdiction to inflict sentence of varying degrees of severity.

Criminal Procedure.
Under its 28th Section, the Code empowers any offence under the Penal Code to be tried by a High Court or by the Court of Session or by any other Court by which such offence is shown in the 8th column of its Second Schedule, to be so triable; in its 29th Section the Code describes the procedure with respect to offences under any law other than the Penal Code and declares that where no particular Court is mentioned in any such law, the offence is to be tried in accordance with the requirements contained in the 8th column of the Second Schedule, but where the Court is mentioned, then by such Court. Sections 31 and 32 describe the extent and the kinds of punishment which the High Court, the Sessions

Judge, the Additional Sessions Judge or the Assistant Sessions Judge or the Magistrate of the first class, second class or third class would be able to pass under the law.

Since the substantive criminal law of this country is codified, there is no such thing with us as a 'crime' recognised by common law. The problem of deciphering the nature of a particular crime with which an accused person is charged is, accordingly, a simple one indeed; all we have to do is to see the statutory definition of that crime just to see what the ingredients of the given offence are. The Pakistan Penal Code deals generally with the law of crimes and mentions in Chapter IV general exceptions that are available as defences to the criminal liability. In other words, the whole of the Penal Code is to be read subject to the general exceptions contained in its Fourth Chapter, and the word 'offence' which is defined by S.40 of the Penal Code shows that the word 'offence' occurring in Chapter IV denotes "a thing punishable under this Code or under any special or local law." The result is that all offences created by special or local law also attract the application of general exceptions contained in Chapter IV of the Penal Code.

The student of criminal law of our country will derive much benefit from the study of the state of criminal law of England, because it is only too true to say that the basic principles of that law have more or less received statutory recognition in the criminal law of our country in the Penal Code. It is for this reason that the knowledge of English criminal law is necessary for the proper understanding of the statutory language employed by the Penal Code or by any other special or local law that creates and punishes a crime.

To constitute a crime two ingredients of the criminal act, namely mens rea (that is criminal state of the mind) and the actus reus, are essential. "So long as an act rests in bare intention", said Lord Mansfield, "it is not punishable by our laws." (See Scofield, 1784 Cald. 402).

A tribunal cannot punish for what it cannot know. And the mere intention, in the words of Chief Justice Brian, is not triable: "The thought of man is not triable, for the devil himself knoweth not the thought of man". Therefore criminal state of the mind must reflect itself in acts and omissions to provide evidence of its own existence before it can be culpable. Even omissions for the purpose of criminal law are acts. (See S. 32. and also S.33 of the Penal Code, which says, "the word 'act' denotes as well a series of acts as a single act: the word 'omission' denotes as well a series of omissions as a single omission"). Macaulay, the author of this Code stated the underlying reasoning of this rule as follows:

"It is, indeed, most highly desirable that men should not merely abstain from doing harm to their neighbours, but should render active services to their neighbours. In general, however, the Penal Law must content itself with keeping men from doing positive harm, and must leave to public opinion, and to the teachers of morality and religion, the office of furnishing men with motives for doing positive good. It is evident that the attempt to punish men by law for not rendering to others all the service which it is their duty to render to others would be preposterous. We must grant impunity to the vast majority of those omissions which a benevolent morality would pronounce reprehensible, and must content ourselves with punishing such omissions only when they are distinguished from the rest by some circumstance which marks them out as peculiarly fit objects of penal legislation." (Lord Macaulay, works, ed. Lady Trevelyan, vii (1866) 497)

There must thus be a positive statutory duty to act, before omission to act with respect to it can become illegal. This rule is recognised by the sections of the Penal Code quoted above read with S. 43.

In the modern statutes we often have species of crimes or offences created by the legislature that more appropriately should be described as wrongs of absolute liability.

Mens Rea and offences of absolute liability.

The requirement of mens rea as an essential constituent element of the crime in such cases is reduced to the barest minimum if not completely eliminated.

It is by now well accepted that where the Legislature has created either expressly or impliedly an offence of absolute liability, it is irrelevant for the Court to enquire into the defendant's state of mind. In offences of such a kind proof of mens rea, (of a guilty mind) is not necessary and all that is required of the prosecution is to show that the accused intentionally did the prohibited act. Some Judges have gone so far as to say that, "This in itself gives full scope to the doctrine of mens rea". (See R. v. Maughan, (1934) 24 Cr. App. R. 130; R. v. Wheat (1921) 2 K.B. 119 at p. 126; Kat v. Diment, (1950) 2 All E.R. 657 at p. 661; Reynolds v. G.H. Austin Co. Ltd. (1951) 2 K.B. 135; 1951, 1 All E.R. 606; Lamb v. Sunderland and District Creamery Ltd., (1951) 1 All E.R. at p. 923; Browning v. Watson, (1953) 2 All E.R. 775; Harding v. Price, (1948) 1 K.B. 695. And see, also on the subject of 'Mens Rea in Statutory Offences' a book of that name by J.L.L.J. Edwards.) Many of the modern statutes use as a part of the definition of the offences they create, the words like 'unlawfully', 'wilfully', 'knowingly' or use expressions 'permitting', 'suffering', 'causing', 'allowing', in respect of the thing which is prohibited to be done etc. and a criminal court is invariably called upon to interpret and apply the varying shades of meaning which the doctrine of mens rea is supposed to impart to them.

"A statute", says Glanville Williams in his recent book on 'Criminal' Law, at p. 711 "sometimes requires an offence to be committed 'knowingly' and sometimes leaves the requirement of knowledge to be implied under the general law of mens rea. It has been judicially thought that the omission of 'knowingly' shifts the burden of proof of absence of knowledge to the accused; but the better view is to the contrary. All that the word 'knowingly' does is to say expressly what is normally implied. (See Roper v. Taylor's etc. Ltd. (1951) 2 Times L.R. 284). Even where the word 'knowingly' is in the statute, the prosecution may be aided by an evidential presumption; for instance, there may be a conviction of knowingly receiving stolen goods on evidence of possession of goods recently stolen. Similarly there may be a conviction of knowingly harbouring uncustomed goods on proof only of the harbouring, if the defendant gives no explanation of his possession which raises a doubt in the jury's mind as to his guilty knowledge that the goods were uncustomed. (See Cohen (1951) 1 K.B. 505) (C.C.A.)".

Burden of Proof in English Law.

Closely allied with the recent developments in the definition of statutory offences of absolute or quasi-absolute criminal liability is the legislative revolution that has been brought about in the law relating to burden of proof; onus of proof is not infrequently now-a-days seen to be statutorily cast upon the accused to prove a negative.

The question of burden of proof and presumptions have thus become closely linked up with the intricacies of criminal substantive law itself.

"These matters", says Glanville Williams, at p. 691 "are in a difficult state, partly because of contrariety of opinion as to the law and partly for lack of a precise terminology. The phrase 'burden of proof' means two things, which have not always been kept distinct. It means, in the first place, the risk of not persuading the jury, and, in the second place, the duty of going forward with evidence to satisfy the judge."

He further goes on to say:

"To begin with the first, it is a cardinal rule that the general burden of proof in a criminal case is upon the prosecution. Moreover, the quantum of proof required is a high one, for the tribunal must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty . . . If the prosecution does not prove its case beyond reasonable doubt, the verdict must go for the accused. The philosophy underlying the criminal rule is the oft-quoted maxim that it is better that ten guilty persons should escape than one innocent suffer.

"In Woolmington's case, (1935 A.C. at 481), the House of Lords explained the rule by saying that 'it is sufficient for (the prisoner) to raise a doubt as to his guilt'. (See also the following cases, Mancini v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1942) A.C. 1 at p. 11, Rex v. Kritz (1950) 2 K.B. 82 (C.C.A.).)

With regard to the second meaning of the expression 'burden of proof' it is more or less the same thing as saying that the burden of introducing evidence is on the side on whom the onus has been cast by the law to prove a particular fact. This kind of burden of proof is to be distinguished from the burden in the first sense which may be characterised in the felicitous phrase of Glanville Williams as 'evidential burden'. If the prosecution gives no reasonable evidence the case must fail, but where, the accused introduces evidence which suggests a defence, evidence which if true, would either minimise or negative his liability at law, he need not prove the existence of those facts to the degree of probative certainty which is required of the prosecution, in such a case then it will be for the jury to take such evidence as has been tendered by the accused in conjunction with the rest of the evidence produced by the prosecution to see whether or not the explanation given by the accused and evidence offered by him in support thereof may reasonably be true, although they are not convinced that it is true. Even on these premises although the suggested defence has not been proved by the accused beyond reasonable doubt, the accused would be entitled to be acquitted on the view that under the circumstances the State has failed to discharge the overall burden imposed on it by law of satisfying the jury beyond reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner. (See (1914) 84 L.J.K.B. 396 case of Rex v. Schama).

We have so far stated the common law rules with regard to the burden of proof as these are applied in England in the decision of criminal cases. It is necessary to remember that the legal position on this question in this country is somewhat different, since we have here a codified law of evidence, an Act in which the Legislature has used the expression 'burden of proof' not with a view to indicating the varying shades of the meaning of that expression suggested by the distinction drawn by the English lawyers, but in one and the same sense—whether it be the evidential burden or burden of introducing evidence. It is doubtful if we are entitled to read into our law of evidence, which has been, as pointed out earlier, reduced to the form of express statutory propositions, the distinctions that have been drawn in England with regard to the meaning of the expression 'burden of proof'—meaning of that expression being different accordingly as the burden is cast upon the prosecution or upon the accused who are called upon to discharge it.

The Indian Courts as also the Courts of our country have been considerably influenced in the matter of interpreting the relevant provisions of Evidence Act regarding "Burden of Proof" by the English Law of Evidence despite the fact that that Act does not, on plain construction, seem to accommodate within its framework these two meanings of the expression 'burden of proof'. The word 'proof' is defined thus: "A fact is said to be proved when, after considering the matters before it, the Court either believes it to exist, or considers its existence so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it exists"; and the term 'disproved' is defined: "A fact is said to be 'disproved' when, after considering the matters before it, the Court either believes that it does not exist, or considers its non-existence so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it does not exist." In between these two attitudes of judicial belief lies the no-man's-land which is taken over by the term 'not proved': "A fact is said not to be proved", says the Evidence Act, "when it is neither proved nor disproved." The presumptive proof is also of three kinds as indicated by the terms 'may presume', 'shall presume' and 'conclusive proof'. This is how the Evidence Act defines them:

'May presume'—'Whenever it is provided by this Act that the Court may presume a fact, it may either regard such fact as proved, unless and until it is disproved, or may call for proof of it.'

'Shall presume'—'Whenever it is directed by this Act that the Court shall presume a fact, it shall regard such fact as proved, unless and until it is disproved.'

'Conclusive proof'—'When one fact is declared by this Act to be conclusive proof of another, the Court shall, on proof of the one fact, regard the other as proved, and shall not allow evidence to be given for the purpose of disproving it.'

Now the provisions relating to the burden of proof come in the 3rd Part of the Evidence Act which is entitled 'Production and Effect of Evidence', and following Sections from 101 to 106 take up the question of general statement of law regarding the burden of proof and the remaining Sections (107 onwards to 114) deal with some specified aspects of this general doctrine in special cases. Sections 101 to 114 along with the illustrations given by the Legislature are reproduced here below for ready reference:

"101.—Whoever desires any Court to give judgment as to any legal right or liability dependent on the existence of facts which he asserts, must prove that those facts exist.

When a person is bound to prove the existence of any fact, it is said that the burden of proof lies on that person.

Illustrations(a). 'A' desires a Court to give judgment that B shall be punished for a crime which A says B has committed. A must prove that B has committed the crime

(b) 'A' desires a Court to give judgment that he is entitled to certain land in the possession of 'B', by reason of facts which he asserts, and which B denies to be true. A must prove the existence of those facts.

"102.—The burden of proof in a suit or proceeding lies on that person who would fail if no evidence at all were given on either side.

Illustrations.—(a) A sues B for land of which B is in possession, and which, as A asserts, was left to A by the will of C, B's father.

If no evidence were given on either side, B would be entitled to retain his possession. Therefore the burden of proof is on A.

(b) A sues B for money due on a bond. The execution of the bond is admitted but B says that it was obtained by fraud, which A denies.

If no evidence were given on either side, A would succeed as the bond is not disputed and the fraud is not proved. Therefore the burden of proof is on B.

"103.—The burden of proof as to any particular fact lies on that person who wishes the Court to believe in its existence, unless it is provided by any law that the proof of that fact shall lie on any particular person.

Illustration. (a) A prosecutes B for theft, and wishes the Court to believe that B admitted the theft to C. A. must prove the admission.

B wishes the Court to believe that, at the time in question, he was elsewhere. He must prove it.

"104.—The burden of proving any fact necessary to be proved in order to enable any person to give evidence of any other fact is on the person who wishes to give such evidence.

Illustrations.

- (a) A wishes to prove a dying declaration by B. A must prove B's death.
- (b) A wishes to prove, by secondary evidence the contents of a lost document. A must prove that the document has been lost.

"105.—When a person is accused of any offence, the burden of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within any of the General Exceptions in the Pakistan Penal Code, or within any special exception or proviso contained in any other part of the same Code, or in any law defining the offence, is upon him, and the court shall presume the absence of such circumstances.

Illustrations:

- (a) A, accused of murder, alleges, that by reason of unsoundness of mind, he did not know the nature of the act. The burden of proof is on A.
- (b) A. accused of murder, alleges that by grave and sudden provocation, he was deprived of the power of self-control. The burden of proof is on A.
- (c) Section 325 of the Pakistan Penal Code provides that whoever, except in the case provided for by section 335, voluntarily causes grievous hurt, shall be subject to certain punishments.

A is charged with voluntarily causing grievous hurt under section 325. The burden of proving the circumstances bringing the case under section 335 lies on A.

"106.—When any fact is especially within the knowledge of any person, the burden of proving that fact is upon him.

Illustrations:

- (a) When a person does an act with some intention other than that which the character and circumstances of the act suggest, the burden of proving that intention is upon him.
- (b) A is charged with travelling on a railway without a ticket. The burden of proving that he had a ticket is on him.

"107.—When the question is whether a man is alive or dead, and it is shown that he was alive within thirty years, the burden of proving that he is dead is on the person who affirms it.

"108.—Provided that when the question is whether a man is alive or dead, and it is proved that he has not been heard of for seven years by those who would naturally have heard of him if he had been alive, the burden of proving that he is alive is shifted to the person who affirms it.

"109.—When the question is whether persons are partners, landlord and tenant, or principal and agent, and it has been shown that they have been acting as such, the burden of proving that they do not stand, or have ceased to stand, to each other in those relationships respectively, is on the person who affirms it.

"110.—When the question is whether any person is owner of anything of which he is shown to be in possession, the burden of proving that he is not the owner is on the person who affirms that he is not the owner.

"111.—Where there is a question as to the good faith of a transaction between parties, one of whom stands to the other in a position of active confidence, the burden of proving the good faith of the transaction is on the party who is in a position of active confidence.

Illustrations :

- (a) The good faith of a sale by a client to an attorney is in question in a suit brought by the client. The burden of proving the good faith of the transaction is on the attorney.
 - (b) The good faith of a sale by a son just come of age to a father is in question in a suit brought by the son. The burden of proving the good faith of the transaction is on the father.
- "¹¹².—The fact that any person was born during the continuance of a valid marriage between his mother and any man, or within two hundred and eighty days after its dissolution, the mother remaining unmarried, shall be conclusive proof that he is the legitimate son of that man, unless it can be shown that the parties to the marriage had no access to each other at any time when he could have been begotten.
- "¹¹³.—A notification in the official Gazette that any portion of British territory has before the commencement of Part III of the Government of India Act, 1935, been ceded to any Native State, Prince or Ruler, shall be conclusive proof that a valid cession of such territory took place at the date mentioned in such notification.
- "¹¹⁴.—The Court may presume the existence of any fact which it thinks likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business, in their relation to the facts of the particular case.

Illustrations:

The Court may presume—

- (a) that a man who is in possession of stolen goods soon after the theft, is either the thief or has received the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession;
- (b) that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars;
- (c) that a bill of exchange, accepted or endorsed, was accepted or endorsed for good consideration;
- (d) that a thing or state of things which has been shown to be in existence within a period shorter than that within which such things or states of things usually cease to exist, is still in existence;
- (e) that judicial and official acts have been regularly performed;
- (f) that the common course of business has been followed in particular cases;
- (g) that evidence which could be and is not produced, would if produced, be unfavourable to the person who withholds it;
- (h) that, if a man refuses to answer a question which he is not compelled to answer by law, the answer, if given, would be unfavourable to him;
- (i) that when a document creating an obligation is in the hands of the obligor, the obligation has been discharged.

But the Court shall also have regard to such facts as the following, in considering whether such maxims do or do not apply to the particular case before it:—

As to illustration (a)—A shopkeeper has in his till a marked rupee soon after it was stolen, and cannot account for its possession specifically, but is continually receiving rupees in the course of his business:

As to illustration (b)—A, a person of the highest character, is tried for causing a man's death by an act of negligence in arranging certain machinery. B, a person of equally good character, who also took part in the arrangement, describes precisely what was done, and admits and explains the common carelessness of A and himself:

As to illustration (b)—a crime is committed by several persons. A, B and C, three of the criminals are captured on the spot and kept apart from each other. Each gives an account of the crime implicating D, and the accounts corroborate each other in such a manner as to render previous concert highly improbable:

As to illustration (c)—A, the drawer of a bill of exchange, was a man of business. B, the acceptor, was a young and ignorant person completely under A's influence:

As to illustration (d)—it is proved that a river ran in a certain course five years ago, but it is known that there have been floods since that time which might change its course:

As to illustration (e)—a judicial act, the regularity of which is in question, was performed under exceptional circumstances:

As to illustration (f)—the question is, whether a letter was received. It is shown to have been posted, but the usual course of the post was interrupted by disturbances:

As to illustration (g)—a man refuses to produce a document which would bear on a contract of small importance on which he is sued, but which might also injure the feelings and reputation of his family:

As to illustration (h)—a man refuses to answer a question which he is not compelled by law to answer, but the answer to it might cause loss to him in matters unconnected with the matter in relation to which it is asked:

As to illustration (i)—a bond is in possession of the obligor, but the circumstances of the case are such that he may have stolen it."

From a study of these provisions it would appear that the burden of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within any of the general exceptions in the Pakistan Penal Code or within any special exception or proviso contained in any part of the same Code or any law defining the offence is upon the accused and the Court shall presume the absence of such circumstances.

The observations of Viscount Sankey relating to the burden of proof in Woolmington v. Director of Public Prosecutions, (1935) A.C. 462 at p. 481, cannot in terms apply the decision of criminal cases in our country to the extent they have been deemed applicable by our Courts.

These words are:—

"Throughout the web of English criminal law one golden thread is always to be seen, that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the prisoner's guilt, subject to what I have already said as to the defence of insanity and subject also to any statutory exception".

The expression 'subject also to any statutory exception' is important: and if the statutory law of evidence in this country employs a sort of language which is only capable of being construed as warranting a view of the onus of proof different from the one which is available under the English common law, then that view is necessarily to be adopted, and the English view abandoned. Upon a review of the whole position, as it emerges from perusal of the relevant provisions of the Evidence Act, Collister J. in the Full Bench case of Parbhoo v. Emperor, A.I.R. (1941) Allahabad 402, put his analysis as follows (at p. 413):—

Observation of Collister J. in 1941, All, 402 supported.

"The position therefore is as I see it, that the Court shall regard as proved the absence of the circumstances pleaded by the accused person unless, upon a review of all the evidence, the Court either believes that such circumstances did exist or considers the fact of their existence so probable that a prudent man should act upon the supposition that they did exist. I can find nothing in any of these provisions of the Evidence Act to support the proposition that the introduction of evidence or the eliciting of facts which create a reasonable doubt but which fall short of satisfying the above mentioned conditions, will entitle the accused person to an acquittal on a plea of a right of private defence under S.96—or any other exception—of the Penal Code.

"It is contended that notwithstanding the above-mentioned specific provisions of the Evidence Act relating to exceptions, the Court must acquit an accused person if it entertains a reasonable doubt as regards his guilt; and this contention is based on the principle that the onus never shifts from the Crown to prove the prisoner's guilt. The onus is certainly on the Crown to prove all the facts which constitute the elements of the offence, and if there is any reasonable doubt left in the mind of the Court as to whether these facts have been established, the accused person is entitled to the benefit thereof; but in my opinion this general onus is subject by statute to the special onus which S.105 imposes on the accused person, and when the Legislature has enacted specific provisions in the Evidence Act as to what amounts to proof or disproof, I do not think that the Court will be justified in falling back on the general principle that the Crown must prove the prisoner's guilt. So far as the Courts in this country are concerned, the law of Evidence is embodied in the Evidence Act, and in my judgment the Courts in India are strictly bound by its provisions when considering the question of the onus of proof and its discharge. It is perfectly true that the Indian Evidence Act was based on the English law modified to suit conditions in India; but it was enacted as long as 1872 when the law in England on this particular subject was by no means as clear as it is now

"It is our duty to interpret the Indian Statute as it stands. If its meaning is plain, as I deem it to be, we must follow its plain meaning. If the intention of the Legislature was in fact different from what appears, it is open to the Legislature to amend the Act. I certainly prefer the law as enunciated in (1935) A.C. 462 (Woolmington's case), and I can see no reason why the law in India as regards this branch of burden of proof should differ from the law in England; but it is our duty to say what the law is, not what it ought to be."

It is submitted that if the Evidence Act is to be interpreted in accordance with its plain and natural meaning, there is no scope here of introducing the conceptions of English law relating to evidence and burden of proof. It is for the Legislature to alter the law to bring it in conformity with the recent trends as they are noticeable in the English case-law upon the subject, and until the Legislature does that our Courts are duty bound to interpret and apply such law as they find upon the subject in the Evidence Act. Our Federal Court, however, has ruled that the law with regard to the onus of proof as laid down in Woolmington's case is the law that is applicable here. And since that is the law declared by the highest Court of our Country the principle of those decisions is binding upon our Courts. Reference in this behalf should be made to the cases of :—

222. Professional Services of the Bar and the Administration of Justice

The advocates' role in the administration of justice and development of law has reference to the nature of judicial process which, as has been argued elsewhere, is no "slot-machine operation" but presents a great deal of scope for choice not only in the sphere of the exercise of judicial discretion but also in the mode of construing statutes, of grappling with precedents and extracting from the labyrinth of case-law the principle which is to control the judgment of the court. It is in this area of choice that the professional assistance which the advocates render in the administration of justice finds its fulcrum: such is the system of law which we have to work in this country that unless there is active co-operation between the Bar and the Bench it is not possible to expect that the wheels of administration of justice will ever run smoothly and give to us the results that are expected of it. It is thus to the professional advocate that even judiciary must gratefully turn for that much assistance without which it cannot be expected to perform creditably its difficult duty of administering justice "according to law."

The lawyer's role as a legal practitioner in our courts is a difficult one indeed. On the one hand, his loyalty to his client demands of him the adoption of an approach to the question under adjudication which is consistent only with the interest of his client, and, on the other hand, as an officer of the court and as a serviceable gear in the mechanism of the total legal order, he has a duty which may, at times, bring him in sharp conflict with that very interest which he, by the nature of his professional engagement, is committed to advance. Often enough, an advocate finds himself on the horns of a dilemma: there is a narrower approach which incites him to see that the cause of his client is vindicated even if it be at the cost of a false legal principle being enunciated in the process, and then there is a broader view of his duty to the court, nay, to the very institution of law to whose existence he owes the importance of his office, a duty to see that in the process of administering justice law is not violated, and to be able to realise that what emerges as a temporary triumph for the cause of his client is not drawn into an evil precedent which will continue to be a source of menace to the administration of justice for all time to come. It is very difficult, by and large, to resolve this dilemma and, considered in terms of a rational principle, it is hardly possible to offer a satisfactory solution of the difficulties posed by the paradoxical position in which the professional advocate finds himself. In a well known speech of Lord Brougham, made during the course of an argument in his defence of Queen Caroline before the House of Lords, with respect to the devotion with which an advocate is supposed to do his duty to his client, we have been told that "An advocate by the sacred duty which he owes to his client, knows in the discharge of that office but one person in the world, that is his client and none other. To save that client by all expedient means, to protect that client at all hazards and costs, to all others, and among others to himself, is the highest and most unquestioned of his duties; and he must not regard the alarm, the suffering, the torment, the destruction which he may bring upon any other. Nay, separating even the duties of a patriot from those of an advocate, and casting them, if need be, to the wind, he must go on reckless of the consequences, if his fate it should unhappily be to involve his country in confusion for his client's protection."

This mode of regarding the role of an advocate, as later commentators and critics have pointed out, is somewhat vitiated by the placing of an exaggerated emphasis on the advocate's duty to his client: Lord Brougham has overstated the case for the inculcation of that desirable sense of devotion to duty which the advocate must be possessed of before he could be deemed to be worthy of being a member of the noble profession. But as Lord Chief Justice Cockburn has pointed out, there has to be added to this statement a qualifying rider:

"My noble and learned friend Lord Brougham", said Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, "whose words are the words of wisdom, said that an advocate should be fearless in carrying out the interests of his client, but I couple that with this qualification and this restriction—that the arms which he wields are to be the arms of the warrior and not of the assassin. It is his duty to strive to accomplish the interests of his client per fas, but not per nefas; it is his duty, to the utmost of his power, to seek to reconcile the interests he is bound to maintain, and the duty it is incumbent upon him to discharge, with the eternal and immutable interests of truth and justice." (See 19 California Law Review page 521 of the year (1931).)

Ethics of the profession has not as yet prescribed a well settled norm in regard to the duty of the lawyer to the courts when the performance of that duty brings him in conflict with the advancement of the cause of his client's case. The American Bar Association in its very first article of the Canons of Professional Ethics has laid down:

"It is the duty of the lawyer to maintain towards the Courts a respectful attitude, not for the sake of the temporary incumbent of the judicial office, but for the maintenance of its supreme importance. Judges, not being wholly free to defend themselves, are peculiarly entitled to receive the support of the Bar against unjust criticism and clamour. Whenever there is proper ground for serious complaint of a judicial officer, it is the right and duty of the lawyer to submit his grievances to the proper authorities. In such cases, but not otherwise, such charges should be encouraged and the person making them should be protected."

And in the 15th and 22nd Articles, his duty to his client and towards the court are set forth as follows :—

"15. How Far a Lawyer May go in Supporting A Client's Cause.

Nothing operates more certainly to create or to foster popular prejudice against lawyers as a class, and to deprive the profession of that full measure of public esteem and confidence which belongs to the proper discharge of its duties than does the false claim, often set up by the unscrupulous in defence of questionable transactions, that it is the duty of the lawyer to do whatever may enable him to succeed in winning his client's cause.

It is improper for a lawyer to assert in argument his personal belief in his client's innocence or in the justice of his cause.

The lawyer owes "entire devotion to the interest of the client, warm zeal in the maintenance and defence of his rights and the exertion of his utmost learning and ability," to the end that nothing be taken or be withheld from him, save by the rules of law, legally applied. No fear of judicial disfavour or public unpopularity should restrain him from the full discharge of his duty. In the judicial forum the client is entitled to the benefit of any and every remedy and defence that is authorized by the law of the land, and he may expect his lawyer to assert every such remedy or defence. But it is steadfastly to be borne in mind that the great trust of the lawyer is to be performed within and not without the bounds of the law. The office of attorney does not permit, much less does it demand of him for any client, violation of law or any manner of fraud or chicane. He must obey his own conscience and not that of his client."

Some questions on Professional ethics.

"22. Candor And Fairness.

The conduct of the lawyer before the Court and with other lawyers should be characterized by candor and fairness.

It is not candid or fair for the lawyer knowingly to misquote the contents of a paper, the testimony of a witness, the language or the argument of opposing counsel, or the language of a decision or a textbook; or with knowledge of its invalidity, to cite as authority a decision that has been overruled, or a statute that has been repealed; or in argument to assert as a fact that which has not been proved, or in those jurisdictions where a side has the opening and closing arguments to mislead his opponent by concealing or withholding positions in his opening argument upon which his side then intends to rely.

It is unprofessional and dishonourable to deal other than candidly with the facts in taking the statements of witnesses, in drawing affidavits and other documents, and in the presentation of causes.

A lawyer should not offer evidence which he knows the Court should reject, in order to get the same before the jury by argument for its admissibility, nor should he address to the Judge arguments upon any point not properly calling for determination by him. Neither should he introduce into any argument, addressed to the court, remarks or statements intended to influence the jury or by-standers.

These and all kindred practices are unprofessional and unworthy of an officer of the law charged, as is the lawyer, with the duty of aiding in the administration of justice . . . "

To the straight question: Is it the duty of a lawyer appearing in a pending case to advise the court of decisions adverse to his client's contentions that are known to him and unknown to his adversary, the American Bar Association Committee on 'Professional Ethics and Grievances' has returned the following answer:

"A lawyer is an officer of the court. His obligation to the public is no less significant than his obligation to his client. His oath binds him to the highest fidelity to the court as well as to the client. It is his duty to aid the court as well as his client. It is his duty to aid the court in the due administration of justice. The conduct of the lawyer before the Court and with other lawyers should be characterised by candor and fairness . . . We are of the opinion that this Canon (namely 22), requires the lawyer to disclose such decisions to the court. He may, of course, after doing so, challenge the soundness of the decisions or present reasons which he believes would warrant the court in not following them in the pending case."

To the same effect are the remarks of Lord Birkenhead, Lord Chancellor, in the case Glebe Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. v. Trustees of Port and Harbours of Greenock (1921) 125 L.T. 578.

The matter, however, is not free from difficulty and the wisdom of the rule laid down above has been seriously questioned upon several considerations and the best statement of the counter viewpoint would be found in an article contributed by Tunstall, on Ethics in Citation, in 35 American Bar Association Journal of the year 1949.

On the whole it would appear to be a fair summing of the conflicting viewpoints to state that in each case as it comes up before an advocate for his professional assistance, it is up to him to strive to secure consistency between his duty to the court and his duty to the client, and while pressing for the acceptance of the court the approach to the case which may be favourable to the cause of his client, he should not omit stating, as objectively as it may be practicable, considerations in support of a contrary point of view before the court so that the judges are assisted in the performance of their duties of deciding what, in accordance with the oath of their office is to be the correct rule that should govern their decision in the controversies before them.

The image of the lawyer, "as one who watches for his prey, darts on it at the proper moment with alacrity, and when he has got his victim, delights to play with him but never lets him escape from his clutches", brings him very near to the ferocious members of the feline race and exhibits him as a callous, hard-hearted and a wicked man. As has been often noticed, "no personal excellences, no intellectual ability, no moral probity on the part of an individual advocate can succeed in eradicating from the mind of public their instinctive mistrust of his profession."

There are grounds in support of the current prejudice against the legal profession and in this connection it is necessary to point out that it is largely because of the existence of some base pretenders to this noble calling of the law that this popular judgment down the ages has gained general acceptance.

As to the defence about the existence of the profession of advocacy as a public institution, the author cannot do better than summon the evidence of Hugh Macmillan, for his are the words that can hardly be improved upon.

"Ever since", says he, "the State decreed that men must cease to settle their disputes with the vigorous arguments of fist and club, the administration of justice has been the prime concern of the State. In order to enable this primary function of government to be efficiently discharged, the experience of every civilised community has shown that it is indispensable to have a class of men skilled in advising and aiding the citizen in the vindication of his rights before the Courts to which the State delegates the task of dispensing justice in accordance with the law of the land. As social life grows more and more complex, as the relations of men grow more and more manifold, as the enactments by which the legislature seeks to keep pace with and regulate the constantly developing progress of the community become more and more elaborate and technical, the value of the part which the advocate is called upon to play in the social system becomes more and more apparent. The danger indeed in a democratic State is that his value may be over-estimated and the sphere of his activities unduly extended, so that he is tempted to take upon himself functions for which the very excellence of his technical aptitudes unfits him."

The duties of an advocate are thus important in the contemporary scheme of things. So long as courts have to decide questions of facts submitted to them upon admissible material, it will always be necessary to subject that material to a searching analysis in an attempt to discover what precisely its probative force is. And who can render better assistance to the Bench in this behalf than the professional advocates? Apart from the disputed questions of fact, there are complicated questions of law, and an ordinary citizen who gets involved in the net-work of the highly complicated legal provisions cannot hope to present to the court his point of view as effectively as can a professional advocate. All the fair means which can be resorted to in submitting a favourable view of the case on behalf of a particular client are the exclusive preserve of a skilful advocate and it is his duty to do his best for his client in that direction. Even in cases where men are charged with the gravest of offences, like that of subverting the Government established by law, the accused is entitled, as of right, to the professional services of an Advocate of his choice.

"From the moment that an Advocate", says Lord Erskine, "can be permitted to say that he will or will not stand between the Crown and the subject arraigned in the Court where he daily sits to practise, from that moment the liberties of England are at an end. If the Advocate refuses to defend from what he may think of the charge or of the defence, he assumes the character of the Judge, nay, he assumes it before the hour of judgment and in proportion to his rank and reputation puts the heavy influence of perhaps a mistaken impression into the scale against the accused in whose favour the benevolent principles of English Law makes all presumptions and which commands the very judge to be his counsel."

That is not to say that the advocate must exploit every and any conceivable argument or means for defending his client's view of the case. There are obvious limits prescribed by law and nobody can transgress these limits with impunity. Nobody is allowed to produce perjured testimony in court, nor is he permitted to become a party to the suborning of false evidence in a court. There is that honourable type of Advocate who could always be expected to assist the court in its task of reaching a correct conclusion on the facts and law of the case. And consistently of course, with his duty to his client, it is the duty of every advocate to do so. The trouble, however, is that there are many who do not conform to this high standard of professional probity—and it is they who have, by their presence, defiled the sanctity of the legal profession. Here are the eloquent words of an Irish Judge uttered in the case of The Queen versus O'Connell (1844) 7 Irish L. R. 304 at page 313), and these are the words the author would like every one of the members of the Bar never to forget.

"He (the advocate)", says Mr. Justice Crampton, "is a representative not a delegate. He gives to his client the benefit of his learning, his talents and his judgment; but all through he never forgets what he owes to himself and to others. He will not knowingly mis-state the law—he will not wilfully mis-state the facts, though it be to gain the cause for his client. He will ever bear in mind that if he be the advocate of an individual, and retained and remunerated (often inadequately) for his valuable services, yet he has a prior and perpetual retainer on behalf of truth and justice; and there is no Crown or other licence which in any case or for any party or purpose can discharge him from that primary and paramount retainer."

That is the ideal of Advocacy which advocates all over the civilized world are called upon to reflect in their day to day practice in courts. It is only the weak and the foolish ones who disdain to strive for this ideal—but then here, as elsewhere, the weak and the foolish must be left to their folly.

In conclusion, it is necessary to stress that courage, intellectual honesty and moral independence ought to be the chief ornaments of the advocate's personality. Legal learning by itself is not enough. Above all, an advocate should have a mind of his own: so much is this true that it is better to be wrong sometimes than never to have a mind of one's own. In the court, of course, an advocate can only make submissions at the bar, and he cannot make a present of his personal opinions. All that is required of him is advocacy, not his judgment. The judgment is to be of the court which it should be his endeavour to procure as far as practicable in favour of his client. And as to this, the judges too have an obligation to assist the Counsel at the Bar in serving the institution of the law.

"Judges", says Bacon, "ought to be more learned than witty, more reverend than plausible and more advised than confident. Above all things, integrity is their portion and proper virtue.

"Patience and gravity of hearing is an essential part of justice, and an overspeaking Judge is no well-tuned symbol. It is no grace to a Judge first to find that which he might have heard in due course from the Bar, or to show quickness of comment in cutting off evidence or counsel too short, or to prevent information by questions, though pertinent."

The Judge has the last word on the case and a great Judge recognises that until that last word is delivered it is the advocate who must have the last-but-one-word.

Bench and the Bar—and the qualities that count.

J. S. Mill on
of the 'good'.

A Judge must not surrender his right to judge at the altar of prevailing prejudices, nor again must he take any notice of "what the World will say of his decision". A great deal could be said by way of elaboration upon this chief virtue of the Judicial valour, but the present writer would forego the privilege of doing so, for the most effective argument as to this has been preserved for us in that well known passage from the writings of J. S. Mill, where that famous "Apostle of Rationalism" of the nineteenth century in his dissertation on "Liberty" speaks of the honest but undignified and iniquitous judgments delivered against those for whom posterity has chosen to show greater respect than it has for those who were called upon to judge their conduct, and in his inimitable manner has exhibited the folly of a judge assuming the joint infallibility of himself and the multitude.

"Mankind can hardly be too often reminded, that there was once a man named Socrates, between whom and the legal authorities and public opinion of his time there took place a memorable collision. Born in an age and country abounding in individual greatness, this man has been handed down to us by those who best knew both him and the age, as the most virtuous man in it; while we know him as the head and prototype of all subsequent teachers of virtue, the source equally of the lofty inspiration of Plato and the judicious utilitarianism of Aristotle, "i maestri di color che sanno," the two head-springs of ethical as of all other philosophy. This acknowledged master of all the eminent thinkers who have since lived—whose fame, still growing after more than two thousand years, all but outweighs the whole remainder of the names which made his native city illustrious—was put to death by his countrymen, after a judicial conviction, for impiety and immorality. Impiety, in denying the gods recognized by the State; indeed his accuser asserted that he believed in no gods at all. Immorality, in being, by his doctrines and instructions, a "corruptor of youth". Of these charges the tribunal, there is every ground for believing, honestly found him guilty, and condemned the man who probably of all then born had deserved best of mankind to be put to death as a criminal.

"To pass from this to the only other instance of judicial iniquity, the mention of which, after the condemnation of Socrates, would not be an anticlimax; the event which took place on Calvary rather more than eighteen hundred years ago. The man who left on the memory of those who witnessed his life and conversation such an impression of his moral grandeur that eighteen subsequent centuries have done homage to him as the Almighty in person, was ignominiously put to death, as what? As a blasphemer. Men did not merely mistake their benefactor; they mistook him for the exact contrary of what he was, and treated him as that prodigy of impiety which they themselves are now held to be for their treatment of him. The feelings with which mankind now regard these lamentable transactions, especially the latter of the two, render them extremely unjust in their judgment of the unhappy actors. These were, to all appearance, not bad men—not worse than men commonly are, but rather the contrary; men who possessed in a full, or somewhat more than a full measure, the religious, moral, and patriotic feelings of their time and people: the very kind of men who, in all times, our own included, have every chance of passing through life blameless and respected. The high-priest who rent his garments when the words were pronounced, which, according to all the ideas of his country, constituted the blackest guilt, was in all probability quite as sincere in his horror and indignation as the generality of respectable and pious men now are in the religious and moral sentiments they profess; and most of those who now shudder at his conduct, if they had lived in his time, and been born Jews, would have acted precisely as he did. Orthodox Christians who are tempted to think that those who stoned to death the first martyrs must have been worse men than they themselves are, ought to remember that one of those persecutors was Saint Paul.

"Let us add one more example, the most striking of all, if the impressiveness of an error is measured by the wisdom and virtue of him who falls into it. If ever any one, possessed of power, had grounds for thinking himself the best and most enlightened among his contemporaries, it was the Emperor Marcus Aurelius. Absolute monarch of the whole civilized world, he preserved through life not only the most unblemished justice, but what was less to be expected from his Stoical breeding, the tenderest heart. The few failings which are attributed to him were all on the side of indulgence; while his writings, the highest ethical product of the ancient mind, differ scarcely perceptibly, if they differ at all, from the most characteristic teachings of Christ. This man, a better Christian in all but the dogmatic sense of the word than almost any of the ostensibly Christian sovereigns who have since reigned, persecuted Christianity. Placed at the summit of all the previous attainments of humanity, with an open, unfettered intellect, and a character which led him of himself to embody in his moral writings the Christian ideal, he yet failed to see that Christianity was to be a good and not an evil to the world, with his duties to which he was so deeply penetrated. Existing society he knew to be in a deplorable state. But such as it was, he saw, or thought he saw, that it was held together, and prevented from being worse, by belief and reverence of the received divinities. As a ruler of mankind, he deemed it his duty not to suffer society to fall in pieces; and saw not how, if its existing ties were removed, any others could be formed which could again knit it together. The new religion openly aimed at dissolving these ties: unless, therefore, it was his duty to adopt that religion, it seemed to be his duty to put it down. Inasmuch then as the theology of Christianity did not appear to him true or of divine origin; inasmuch as this strange history of a crucified God was not credible to him, and a system which purported to rest entirely upon a foundation to him so wholly unbelievable, could not be foreseen by him to be that renovating agency which, after all abatements, it has in fact proved to be; the gentlest and most amenable of philosophers and rulers, under a solemn sense of duty, authorized the persecution of Christianity. To my mind this is one of the most tragical facts in all history. It is a bitter thought, how different a thing the Christianity of the world might have been, if the Christian faith had been adopted as the religion of the empire under the auspices of Marcus Aurelius instead of those of Constantine. But it would be equally unjust to him and false to truth to deny, that no one plea which can be urged for punishing anti-Christian teaching was wanting to Marcus Aurelius for punishing, as he did, the propagation of Christianity. No Christian more firmly believes that Atheism is false, and tends to the dissolution of society, than Marcus Aurelius believed the same things of Christianity; he who, of all men then living, might have been thought the most capable of appreciating it. Unless any one who approves of punishment for the promulgation of opinions, flatters himself that he is a wiser and better man than Marcus Aurelius—more deeply versed in the wisdom of his time, more elevated in his intellect above it—more earnest in his search for truth, or more singleminded in his devotion to it when found; let him abstain from that assumption of the joint infallibility of himself and the multitude, which the great Antoninus made with so unfortunate a result (pp. 86-88).

With this long quotation from John Stuart Mill as an epilogue to the Chapter on the Nature, Structure and Reach of Judicial Power, we are now in a position to conclude our survey of the Constitution of Pakistan. There remain, however, some provisions of the Constitution which have been deliberately kept out by the present writer since they, in his opinion, more appropriately fall to be considered in the final chapter of the book which deals with Ideological, Religious & Ethical Implications of our Constitution—and to that task we might now turn our attention.

CHAPTER VIII

RELIGIOUS, ETHICAL AND IDEOLOGICAL
IMPLICATIONS OF OUR CONSTITUTION

RELIGIOUS, ETHICAL AND IDEOLOGICAL IMPLICATIONS OF OUR CONSTITUTION

223. The discussion of Ethico-religious Basis of the State is not strictly relevant in a study like the present one.

The present writer is constrained in this study to deal with some of the outstanding ideological implications of the Constitution of Pakistan that stem from those of its provisions that deal with and describe its "religious" character, or present, what may be regarded as, a manifesto of its economo-social policy and programme. Considered strictly from the legal stand-point, these matters are hardly relevant, and if they have been adverted to at all, it is for the reason that, over and above the juridical aspect of our Constitution, its political and ethico-religious aspects also fall to be considered in any study that professes to be comprehensive. Much of what will be said in the sequel will have reference to the preamble, to the provisions contained in the Chapter relating to the Directive Principles of State Policy, as also to what the Constitution describes as the Islamic provisions. (See Chapter I of Part XII of the Constitution, ARTs. 197 and 198).

The ideas that are about to be presented in this chapter have little or no direct relationship with the theory of law which is relevant for the purposes of analytic jurisprudence. The questions that form the subject-matter of the present discussion are a part of the province of the study, which in Maitland's happy phrase, may well be called "Meta-jurisprudence". Meta-jurisprudence studies questions like the ultimate basis of political obligation, or the nature of the transcendental sanctions that underlie and account for our obedience to the rules of conduct prescribed by the law etc. A consideration of these and other allied questions has become somewhat important in the study of the Constitution of our country, if only because of what is mentioned in the salutary paragraphs of the Preamble to the Constitution. Besides, even the name we have given to our polity directly involves an examination of issues that are quite extraneous to the study of analytic jurisprudence.

For the purposes of analytic jurisprudence, the relationship of the law to the State is easily stated: considered purely from the formalistic stand-point, once the idea of the State as sovereign is accepted, law becomes indistinguishable from the will of the State. Law is just that which the State is prepared to enforce; and from this it follows automatically that what it enforces as law is the manifestation of its will. The content of the law, considered strictly from this juristic point of view, becomes a matter of no consequence: it may be a wise, mistaken or foolish rule of conduct which may have been sanctioned by the State as law, but all these criteria are totally irrelevant once it is realised that what is law is law only because the State has ordained it. Its claim to obedience is derived simply from the circumstance of the source whence it emanates. Were it otherwise, the State would not any longer be considered as sovereign for the simple reason that there would be then ex hypothesi some other sovereign whose will would have an overriding effect in the determination of what should be the law in respect of a given subject-matter—in which case, again, it would be this higher source of law that would be called the State, for the State, by definition, as we have seen earlier, is a sovereign association having an exclusive claim to coerce a political society and the individual members composing it, into doing that which is in conformity with its will.

But, as we shall presently see, this conception of the relationship of law to the State, though important for the study of analytic jurisprudence, ceases to be relevant once the State itself is defined as an agent or instrument of a higher law, be that law conceived as the natural law or the religious law. The necessity of grounding jurisprudence on some such transcendental basis is, in a measure, due to the very constitution of the human mind, for, as explained by Harold J. Laski, the human mind "revolts from jurisprudence as bare and as formal" as the one referred to above. To quote our author further:

"It (that is, the human mind) remembers the long medieval effort to identify law with the will of God, the stoic notion of law as the voice of universal reason, the famous phrase of Ulpian which makes of law the science of distinguishing between right and wrong in human conduct. It rejects the idea of law as that behind which there is found the sovereign power of the State because, as the eminent Jesuit jurist Cathrein has said, 'then one must regard every statute, however absurd, contrary to reason, or despicable, as a true statute, and one no longer becomes entitled to complain of injustice.' Law, to be law, it is widely felt, must correspond with something more valid than the will of an authority which grounds its claim to respect upon nothing more than the coercive power at its disposal."

Besides all this, even the Austinean law-giver within the State, who claims to speak on behalf of the State, must have some inspiration and guidance from a source higher than himself for the purpose of laying down the law. Even the will of such a law-giver must have some reference to a transcendental norm. The law-giver commands that a certain rule of conduct be followed because it is right—and not because, what is commanded by him acquires the attribute of being right from the mere circumstance that it is commanded by the law-giver. Importance of stressing this approach to the philosophic conception of law will become apparent as we proceed to deal with some of the meta-jurisprudential questions that are raised in the pages that follow.

224. Declaration in the Preamble that Sovereignty over the Universe belongs to God:

The Constitution of Pakistan begins "In the name of Allah, the Beneficent, the Merciful," and in its Preamble acknowledges that "sovereignty over the entire Universe belongs to Allah Almighty alone", and further recognises that "the authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him is a sacred trust." In making all these assertions, as any one can see, a great deal is assumed, and what is more, what is asserted upon the footing of those assumptions, is somehow believed to be relevant for the purpose of founding a Government and distributing the sovereign power within the State.

The "State" of Pakistan, as a juridical entity, undoubtedly is a creation of the Constitution—and as to this Constitution it is said, that it is the people of Pakistan who "in their Constituent Assembly on the 29th day of February 1956, and the 17th day of Rajab 1375 A.H." have adopted, enacted and given the same to themselves. An enunciation of the pre-suppositions upon which the assertions like (a) "the sovereignty over the entire universe belongs to Allah", and (b) "the authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him being a sacred trust" are sought to be based, require a great deal to be said before the relevance of the principles they embody could be rendered plain and easy of comprehension. In fact, as it will more clearly appear as the argument proceeds, it is not possible to avoid metaphysical reflections upon the general validity of the ideas like 'Natural Law', 'Higher Reason' etc., in any discussion concerning the religious and ideological foundations of our State.

Students of history are fully aware that the basic philosophic conceptions that underlie man's creative effort to live under law are practically the same, no matter whether you see them displayed in the writings of the ancient Egyptians, the Greeks, the Hindus, the Chinese or see them asserted in a somewhat different vernacular in the pages of some of the recent writings of our thinkers.

State of Pakistan as a Juridical entity.

Basic Philosophic conception of Law is the same everywhere.

Turning to the ancient times, we can still hear the voice of Cicero telling us all about the essential nature of law. His words, strange to say, possess a touch of modernity about them. We read, for example, in his De Republica:

"True law is right reason conformable to nature (a Stoic phrase); it is universally diffused, unchanging, and eternal; it summons men to their duty by its commands, and deters them from crime by its prohibitions; but while it affects the good by its commands and its prohibitions, it fails to move the bad. No rule may be made in substitution for this law, no rule can be made in derogation from it, nor can it be utterly abrogated; we cannot be released from it either by the senate or by the people, nor is any commentator or interpreter of it other than itself to be sought. There will not be one law at Athens and another at Rome, or one law now and another in the future; all nations (gentes), at all times, will be bound by the one eternal and immutable law: there will be one God who is common to all men and, as it were, their master and ruler (imperator); and He it is who devises, debates, and enacts this law, the which if a man disobeys he will be a runaway from himself, and rejecting thereby the nature of man he will pay the utmost penalty by that very act of rejection, even if he escapes other punishments which men believe he will incur."

And to the same effect are the views of a contemporary English scholar of the eminence of Sir Ernest Barker, contained in the following passage which is taken from his book "Traditions of Civility". He has no difficulty in explaining the emergence of the doctrine of natural law and its development down to our times as being "an old and indefeasible movement of the human mind." In his words:

"The origin of the idea of natural law may be ascribed to an old and indefeasible movement of the human mind (we may trace it already in the Antigone of Sophocles) which impels it towards the notion of eternal and immutable justice; a justice which human authority expresses, or ought to express—but does not make; a justice which human authority may fail to express—and must pay the penalty for failing to express by the diminution, or even the forfeiture, of its power to command. This justice is conceived as being the higher or ultimate law, proceeding from the nature of the universe—from the Being of God and the reason of man. It follows that law—in the sense of the law of the last resort—is somehow above the law-making. It follows that law-makers, after all, are somehow under and subject to law."

Of course, if by the expression "movement of the human mind" is to be understood all that seemingly flows from man's creative thought, it is easy to explain the entire development of our civilisation and culture as being man's creation. But in an attempt to explain this very same phenomenon, the universal religion of mankind teaches us that there is a divine ground that underlies man's effort to reflect those higher ideals and to realise those spiritual values that are not demanded merely by the logic of Earthly Necessity, that is, the logic of "here" and "now". Beyond what we see here and now, there is a something which religion postulates as the 'Here-after',—and even the conception of Nirvana of the Buddhists is no exception to this—which we are told, upon the testimony of the Teachers of Universal Religion, to bear in view before our earthly pursuits can be fruitful. And according to this teaching, man's preoccupation with the immediate present, derives its meaning only from this wider context of "eternal life" in which the experience of his every "now" continually seems to involve him. Religion is, from this point of view, an explanation of man's deepest yearnings, needs and aspirations; it is a hypothesis by appeal to which man can secure consistency between the demands that earthly life makes on him on the one hand, and those deeper vaticinating pulsations which seem to animate all his higher thoughts and utterances and inspire all his heroic ventures here below, on the other. It also assures its votaries that the values man aspires for count in the scheme of things and are conserved in the sense that sooner or later they will be realised.

225. Revealed Religion as a means of securing the overall Education of the Human Race.

It is the claim of the Qur'an, which book the Muslims all over the world regard as the 'Revealed Word of God', that this institution of universal religion has grown with the growth of man himself, and that the Cosmic Power that has created man in its own image and appointed him as "Vicegerant" on earth, has, through a series of Prophets that were from time to time sent down to Earth, helped him to outgrow the state of his moral and spiritual immaturity. The Qur'an claims that there is not a clime nor again any age in Man's History in which God's messengers have not come to inspire people to do the right and to avoid the evil. (See Ch. 16:37; Ch. 35:25; Ch. 40:79 of the Qur'an). This process of revelation was essential because during the period of the childhood of our race, the infantile age of humanity demanded that it be helped to discriminate between what was right and what was wrong, between what was helpful and what was injurious; what was right and what was wrong, between what was helpful and what was injurious; the process of education of the race went on till the advent of Islam when the religion was perfected. (cf. Qur'an: Says God to Muhammed: Today I have perfected for you your religion and fulfilled my favour unto you, and willed that Islam should be your religion. Surah 5: 3) Humanity was thus virtually declared to have reached a phase of maturity whereafter its evolution was to be directed through the efforts of creative individuals. With the Man's coming of Age, there was no need any more for the Prophets to come: Revelation was not needed any more now that the forces of reason were liberated in the soul of man to help man to work out his destiny. By observing the courses of nature, by reflecting over its mysteries and by understanding the secret of its power, its beauty and appeal, man was to find enough guidance from the Book of God's Creation to perform his tasks here below and thereby be in a position to take up the problem of his own evolution, of his unfolding, into his own hands. Man was commanded to read the Book of Nature and so reach from Nature to Nature's God. Between his inner world and the laws that control its evolution and the outer world and the laws that control its historic manifestations there was to be an inter-action—and man was to be a spectator of this contact between the two worlds—and he was called upon to realise by means of thought, belief and action the unity between the two.

The realisation of the unity of creation is the highest ideal. And man was commanded, to use the words of the Qur'an: "Then set your face upright for religion in the right state—the nature made by Allah in which He has made man; there is no altering of Allah's creation:—that is the right religion, but most people do not know." (Chapter XXX, verse 30). In the above verse is set-forth the root of the matter: the religion that has been in fact are incapable of being altered. The obedience to the law which is reflected in nature constitutes the religion of man. Islam merely establishes this truth and prepares a ground for man's recognition of this law, initially on the authority of revelation but ultimately and fundamentally upon man's own inward realisation of the truth of this law, through right thought, through right belief and through right action. Even thought and belief in a sense are action: in whatever form man wills, he acts; and thinking is action as much as is believing. The sage, the highly evolved soul, reflects by his very being, the supremacy of this law—law which is writ-large in the skies and the truth of which is attested by the very nerve and fibre of Man's own inner-most being.

Man's moral consciousness that prescribes the norm in relation to which he could view his acts as being either right or wrong, is of practical assistance to him in the realisation of this transcendental law. Having regard to man's finitude and his location in the context of a given set of space and time conditions, he cannot, from the very nature of the case, perceive the total scheme of creation to be able to see the cosmic purpose in the fullness of its majesty, its splendour and its glory. The life of instinct, no doubt, to some extent helps him to adjust himself to his immediate environment, but with the emergence of intelligence, the burden of freedom descends heavily on him, and the difficulty of choosing the right course of conduct and of rejecting the evil begins to make the problem of living highly complicated. As creatures of instinct, all children are already cast into a mould in which they automatically obey the Laws of Nature: that is why Muhammed, the last Prophet of God, often used to say, "Every child that is born conforms to the true religion (literally human nature) then his parents make of him a Jew or a Christian or a Magian—as a beast is born entire in all its limbs or without defect; do you see one born maimed and mutilated?" Whenever he used to say this he used to cite as authority for the truth of what he was asserting, the present verse: "The nature made by Allah in which he has made man; there is no altering of Allah's creation, that is the right religion."

Islam thus is the natural religion of man and enjoins three basic principles to be freely accepted and adopted by him:—

- (a) unity and all-comprehensive authority of one sovereign power who as Creator reflects himself in creation, and is yet independent of it; and further that the entire creation endures in the Law and its continued existence is made possible by the sustenance it derives from the Law;
- (b) the universality of divine revelation of pre-Islamic period of human history, belief in Muhammad's Mission and the acceptance of the entire pre-Islamic development of Religion, and
- (c) man's direct responsibility and accountability for all actions that he may do or omit doing here below. (It thus rules out the dogma of intercession by intermediaries and declares that nothing belongs to Man except his effort. Chap. LIII, V. 38-39)

In a recent study The Ideas of Arab Nationalism by Dr Hazem Zaki Nusiebeh of Princeton University (Cornell University Press, Ithaca, New York) the following has been offered as the definition of Islam :—

"It is of course, a religion, a body of doctrines and beliefs clustered around the principle of Tawhid ("asserting oneness") which teaches that God is the ultimate spiritual basis of all life. It is a universal and not a national religion. Its message is addressed to mankind in its entirety and not to any one nation, even though the Prophetic Revelation is through the instrumentality of Arabic Language.

"O Mankind! — Lo! We have created you male and female and have made you nations and tribes that you may know one another. The noblest of you in the sight of God is the best in conduct' (Quoran tr. by M.M. Pickthal New York, 1953 (Sura XLIX, verse 13), and as a creed Islam is unequivocally hostile to the sort of divisive contentions that are an endemic features of nationalism'."

In the opinion of the present writer, the foregoing definition of Islam is a valid one and its importance lies in the fact that it states correctly in a nutshell, what the relationship of Islam to the gospel of Nationalism is like—and the importance of this approach would be made manifest as the argument in this chapter proceeds.

226. Relevance of Religious hypothesis to the establishment of a Constitutional Set-up.

But what has Islam got to do, one might well ask, with the settlement of questions which confront us when we set out to establish the institutional framework of an earthly authority; after all that is an undertaking which, as any one can see, involves the mere management of our earthly affairs and not the holding of any concourse with the Heavenly Powers. One may as well argue: Cannot one have, irrespective of the acceptance of the Sovereignty of this Transcendent Law, a secular Constitution just to be able to establish the institutions which must ensure the orderly working of political processes and set up organs of the state-power charged with the duty of making, executing and enforcing the laws required for securing just relations between man and man.

The answer to this question must depend not on any of the abstract considerations of a philosophical character, but upon the practical question of understanding the people, in relation to whom, a machinery of constitutional government is sought to be designed and established. And having said that much, it is necessary, in order to avoid misunderstanding, at once to add that, in the ultimate analysis, it is impossible to escape the logical necessity of affirming a transcendental ground in terms of which sanctions for the due exercise of all earthly authority could be imposed. And a religion is after all only a hypothesis regarding this transcendental ground; and it is in this sense that Macaulay regarded Religion as "the last restraint on earthly power and the last solace of earthly misery". And Religion thus regarded is a Universal Institution of mankind and is inescapably the foundation of all our social and political institutions.

De
views:

"There is hardly any human action", says De Tocqueville in his Democracy in America, "however particular it may be, that does not originate in some very general idea men have conceived of the Deity, of his relation to mankind, of the nature of their own souls, and of their duties to their fellow creatures. Nor can anything prevent these ideas from being the common spring from which all the rest emanates."

"Men are therefore immeasurably interested in acquiring fixed ideas of God, of the soul, and of their general duties to their Creator and their fellow men; for doubt on these first principles would abandon all their actions to chance and would condemn them in some way to disorder and impotence."

"This, then, is the subject on which it is most important for each of us to have fixed ideas; and unhappily it is also the subject on which it is most difficult for each of us, left to himself, to settle his opinions by the sole force of his reason. None but minds singularly free from the ordinary cares of life, minds at once penetrating, subtle, and trained by thinking, can, even with much time and care, sound the depths of these truths that are so necessary. And, indeed, we see that philosophers are themselves almost always surrounded by uncertainties; that at every step the natural light which illuminates their path grows dimmer and less secure; and that, inspite of all their efforts, they have discovered as yet only a few conflicting notions, on which the mind of man has been tossed about for thousands of years without ever firmly grasping truth or finding novelty even in its errors. Studies of this nature are far above the average capacity of men; and, even if the majority of mankind were capable of such pursuits, it is evident that leisure to cultivate them would still be wanting."

Having thus explained the need for having those fixed ideas about God and Human nature, without which mankind would find it difficult to do their day's work here below, De Tocqueville proceeds to advance the thesis that this need is adequately satisfied by Religion. In his words:

"The first object and one of the principal advantages of religion is to furnish to each of these fundamental questions a solution that is at once clear, precise, intelligible, and lasting, to the mass of mankind. There are religions that are false and very absurd, but it may be affirmed that any religion which remains within the circle that I have just traced without pretending to go beyond it (as many religions have attempted to do for the purpose of restraining on every side the free movement of the human mind), imposes a salutary restraint upon the intellect; and it must be admitted that, if it does not save men in another world, it is at least very conducive to their happiness and greatness in this.

"This is especially true of men living in free countries. When the religion of a people is destroyed, doubt gets hold of the higher powers of intellect and half paralyses all the others. Every man accustoms himself to having only confused and changing notions on the subjects most interesting to his fellow creatures and himself. His opinions are ill-defended and easily abandoned; and, in despair of ever solving by himself the hard problems respecting the destiny of man, he ignobly submits to think no more about them. Such a condition cannot but enervate the soul, relax the springs of the Will, and prepare a people for servitude."

The foregoing extracts from Democracy in America Vol. II, pp. 20-21, 1953 (Alfred A. Knopp, New York) may be regarded as an elucidation of what Carlyle meant when he said, "All great ages are ages of Faith." Religion saves its votaries against the paralysis of the Will that must ordinarily set in if there be no settled philosophy about man's place in the scheme of this mysterious universe.

There is no constitutional Government in the modern world that does not, in some significant sense, owe its inspiration to the teachings of those who were deeply imbued by, what may be called, the sense for religious values, and the present author would not admit an exception to this general statement even in the case of a communist State which, as will be argued later, despite the protestations of its founders, does not escape from the necessity of accepting the Religious hypothesis—and this despite the fact that it is only too true to say that communism establishes another kind of religion altogether. This is so because, in the words of Disraeli, "The most powerful principle which governs man is the religious principle". And in the same strain said that savant and saint, Edmund Burke, "We know and what is better, we inwardly feel, that Religion is the basis of civil society, and the source of all good and all comfort."

To take the Constitution of the United States as a case in point, we have, to begin with, to notice in its preamble the following:—

"We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for common defence, promote general welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

This must be read in conjunction with the First Amendment, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof...." It would be apparent that the preamble of the Constitution of U.S. is tinged with religious emotion and refers us to values like justice, general welfare of mankind and blessings of liberty etc. A rational mind would like to ask, why were these things considered valuable, worth treasuring and fit for being incorporated in the text of the Constitution. The answer to this can only be that those values transcend the logic of man's immediate interests and practical expediencies; that their appeal to us is to be traced to their being rooted in the very constitution of man. And in fact, the evidence of history which shows up to us the virtue of courage, of the spirit of self-sacrifice, nay the very spectacle of the martyrdom of Man, is a pointer to the same truth; and such is the stuff out of which man is made that he would ceaselessly toil and labour and make all the sacrifices he can in order to perpetuate his heritage. In Man, as has been truly said, the river of life rises beyond its source. This philosophy of self-transcendence is itself religion—for it offers an ultimate explanation of

of the United States and the Religious Hypothesis.

Man's deepest strivings for what are prima facie unearthly objectives. And the need for doing so ostensibly is not attested by any immediate experience but is a function of man's instinctive perception of the operation of a higher law to which Man freely declares his allegiance.

The impact of the Doctrines of Natural law upon the development of American constitutional jurisprudence has been assessed elsewhere in the book (see Chapter on Fundamental Rights p. 306) and in this context, it now remains only to refer to the historical factors that were responsible for the assimilation of the ideas of Natural Law in the minds of those who were the pioneers of the Movement for American Independence. As to the sort of intellectual climate that inspired, nourished and sustained the beliefs of those who waged the war of American Independence, Mr. Commager points out that:

"The doctrines of natural law were deeply rooted, plausible, and tenacious. They derived from Greek and Roman philosophy, were fortified by medieval Christianity, and vindicated by Newtonian science; tested in the crucible of seventeenth-century English and eighteenth-century American revolutions, they appeared to justify themselves. Intellectually their appeal was almost irresistible, for they taught that law was rooted in the very nature of things, articulated to the framework of the universe, and expressive of the will of God, that it operated with the mathematical certainty of the axioms of Euclid, and that conformity to it was a duty of Reason. Emotionally, too, their appeal was persuasive. They offered a formula at once simple and conclusive and asserted the harmony of man with the universe; in a world of change they provided permanence, and in a world of disorder security."

"The Fathers of the Revolution and of the Constitution embraced the tenets of natural law as a matter of course. A generation trained on the classics could quote Aristotle's definition of law as "reason unaffected by desire" and Cicero's conclusion that "law is the highest reason implanted in nature, which commands what ought to be and forbids the opposite...". A generation still deeply imbued with Puritanism knew that religion itself dictated conformity to the laws of Nature, for, as Jonathan Mayhew put it, 'God himself does not govern in an absolutely arbitrary and despotic manner. The power of this Almighty King is limited by law—by the eternal laws of truth, wisdom, and equity, and the everlasting tables of right reason.' A generation which read the Commentaries of Blackstone recalled that 'upon the law of nature and the law of revelation depend all human laws; that is to say, no human laws should be suffered to contradict these,' and rejoiced that the laws of England, happily transferred to America, were patterned on the laws of nature. A generation bathed in the Enlightenment pledged its lives, its fortunes, and its sacred honor to the conviction that the laws of Nature and Nature's God required American independence and justified faith in the unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It was not surprising that Americans wrote natural law into their constitutions, enshrined it in their Bills of Rights, and pronounced it from their judicial tribunals."

(See "The American Mind" by Henry Steele Commager 1955 Edition Chapter XVII pp. 366-7.)

Any one reading the writings and utterances of some of the leading figures from among the Founding Fathers would be struck by their deeply religious tone. They were truly God-inspired men. A. Hamilton could write: "The sacred rights of mankind are not to be rummaged for among old parchments or musty records. They are written so, as if with a sunbeam, in the whole volume of Human Nature, by the hand of Divinity Itself, and can never be erased or obscured by mortal power". So we have Jefferson saying: "The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time". Was that not also an American who as far back as 1764 uttered the most decisive of all the truths upon the subject of the alleged omnipotence of Parliament.

"To say the Parliament is absolute and arbitrary is a contradiction. The Parliament cannot make 2 and 2, 5; Omnipotency cannot do it. The supreme power in a State is jus dicere only—jus dare, strictly speaking, belongs alone to God. Parliaments in all cases, are to declare what is good of the whole, but it is not the declaration of Parliament that makes it so. There must be in every instance, a higher authority, viz. God. Should the act of Parliament be against any of His Natural Laws, which are immutably true their declaration would be contrary to eternal Truth, Equity and Justice, and consequently void: and so it would be adjudged by Parliament itself when convinced of their mistake. (See James Otis.—Rights of the British Colonies asserted and proved, p. 67.)"

The above quoted extract is one out of the many expressions of that idea with which Qur'an has made us so familiar: viz. that there are the prescribed limits within which man must act, limits imposed by the Divine law, limits beyond which mankind cannot go forward with impunity.

The First Amendment of the American Constitution rightly warns us against the perils of establishing "official religion" but at the same time it has very wisely declared that the Congress shall make no law prohibiting the free exercise of religion. Most of those who constituted the American citizennaire of the day when the Constitution was framed, were those who had suffered from religious persecution, persecution which made it impossible for them to stay in the land where they were born; they were, therefore, alive to the danger of all institutionalised religions and in particular of the State religion—for whatever else it is, a State religion is not a religion, but a caricature of it. They were aware, however, of the supreme importance of permitting the fullest measure of freedom possible to those who wished to profess and practice any religion.

227. No place under our Constitution for an "official" or "State-Religion"

It would be obvious from the study of our Constitution that in it too there is no room for the establishment of any official religion. There is no provision anywhere in our Constitution which says that Islam shall be the official religion of the State. As to the requirement that the Head of the State shall be a Muslim or that the name of the State shall be the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, all that could be said in this context is that they do not,—no matter what other interpretation is placed on them,—constitute Islam as an official religion of the State of Pakistan. From the very nature of the case, Islam cannot be a "State Religion", for that would amount to narrowing its appeal and denying to it that universal character which is its decisive hall-mark. Besides, Islam is a religion of living human beings and cannot be extended to cover the cases of artificially created and contrived institutions like the State. Islamic principles like those concerning social justice, freedom, democracy, equality, tolerance, have no doubt been declared by our Constitution as values that will inspire those who are to be in charge of governmental affairs, but that is not the same thing as saying that the Constitution denies to citizens of Pakistan not professing the Islamic faith, the right to pursue and practise articles of their own faith and realise the values which their religious outlook has taught them to venerate and cherish. Reference in this behalf should be made to the fundamental rights guaranteed to all citizens of Pakistan in the matter of professing and practising their religion. (See Arts. 13, 14, 17, 18 & 21). Of these Art. 18 is important: it provides—

"Subject to law, public order and morality—

(a) every citizen has the right to profess, practise and propagate any religion; and Religious freedom admissible to all citizens

- (b) every religious denomination and every sect thereof has the right to establish, maintain and manage its religious institutions."

It is a remarkable feature of our Constitution that the right to profess, practise and propagate any religion is reserved to every citizen: it is reserved as much to a Muslim as to a non-Muslim, and the right is available to all under identical conditions. So also every religious denomination and every sect has the right to establish, maintain and manage its religious institutions. There is no Article or provision anywhere in the Constitution which recognises the establishment of any official religion, and what is more, all such laws as will be made by the Legislature in Pakistan will have to be considered and voted upon by all the legislators—Moslems and non-Moslems alike—and all their implications and the question concerning their relevance to the economic-political situation of the time, will have to be examined in the light of what might be found to be for the good of the country as a whole.

228. Implications of the name "Islamic Republic of Pakistan"

We have already seen that the very first Article of the Constitution says that "Pakistan shall be a Federal Republic to be known as the Islamic Republic of Pakistan." It is the view of the present writer that upon the plain construction of the language used in the Article under question, the legal character of the State of Pakistan is no other than that it is to be Federal Republic and it is only its name that is "Islamic Republic of Pakistan". And for the purpose of law, nothing depends on what name you give to the State so long as the provisions of the Constitution confer upon it a character which is at variance with, or is in any sense different from, the one that is connoted by its name.

It is difficult for a lawyer, having regard to what is contained in the Constitution, to see how and in what sense Pakistan can be described as an Islamic State. Its provisions do not in any manner establish the possibility of the State being regarded as Islamic. Assuming for the sake of argument, but without conceding, that such a concept as Islamic State or Islamic Republic can be deduced from anything that is contained in the holy Quran or the Sunnah, the all important question is: what are the distinguishing features of "Islamic State", and how far does the State, established by our Constitution, conform to that pattern.

Summary statement of the religious provisions contained in our Constitution

Preamble.

Before commenting any further on the alleged Islamic character of the State of Pakistan, it becomes necessary to summarise the several provisions contained in our Constitution which could conceivably have a bearing on the settlement of the claim that our Constitution establishes a theocratic State. The following provisions are stated in the order in which they appear in the Constitution with a view to laying a foundation for a proper appreciation of the claim that the State established by the Constitution is a religious one.

(a) Preamble: In the name of Allah, the Beneficent, the Merciful

WHEREAS sovereignty over the entire Universe belongs to Allah Almighty alone, and the authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him is a sacred trust;

WHEREAS the Founder of Pakistan, Quaid-i-Azam Mohammad Ali Jinnah, declared that Pakistan would be a democratic State based on Islamic principles of social justice:

AND WHEREAS the Constituent Assembly, representing the people of Pakistan, have resolved to frame for the sovereign independent State of Pakistan a constitution;

WHEREIN the State should exercise its powers and authority through the chosen representatives of the people;

WHEREIN the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam, should be fully observed;

WHEREIN the Muslims of Pakistan should be enabled individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the teachings and requirements of Islam, as set out in the Holy Quran and Sunnah....."

(b) Art. 1—"Pakistan shall be a Federal Republic to be known as the Islamic Republic of Pakistan....."

(c) Art. 24—"The State shall endeavour to strengthen the bonds of unity among Muslim countries, to promote international peace and security, to foster goodwill and friendly relations among all nations, and to encourage the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means."

(d) Art. 25—" (1) Steps shall be taken to enable the Muslims of Pakistan individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the Holy Quran and Sunnah.

(2) The State shall endeavour, as respects the Muslims of Pakistan,—

- (a) to provide facilities whereby they may be enabled to understand the meaning of life according to the Holy Quran and Sunnah;
- (b) to make the teaching of the Holy Quran compulsory;
- (c) to promote unity and the observance of Islamic moral standards; and

(d) to secure the proper organization of Zakat, wakfs and mosques."

(e) Art. 32—This Article provides for the President of the Republic to be a Muslim.

(f) Art. 197—" (1) The President shall set up an organization for Islamic research and instruction in advanced studies to assist in the reconstruction of Muslim society on a truly Islamic basis.

(2) Parliament may by Act provide for a special tax to be imposed upon Muslims for defraying expenses of the organization set up under clause (1), and the proceeds of such tax shall not, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, form part of the Federal Consolidated Fund."

(g) Art. 198—" (1) No law shall be enacted which is repugnant to the Injunctions of Islam as laid down in the Holy Quran and Sunnah, hereinafter referred to as Injunctions of Islam, and existing law shall be brought into conformity with such injunctions.

(2) Effect shall be given to the provisions of clause (1) only in the manner provided in clause (3).

(3) Within one year of the Constitution Day, the President shall appoint a Commission—

- (a) to make recommendations—
 - (i) as to the measures for bringing existing law into conformity with the Injunctions of Islam, and
 - (ii) as to the stages by which such measures should be brought into effect; and

(b) to compile in a suitable form, for the guidance of the National and Provincial Assemblies, such Injunctions of Islam as can be given legislative effect.

Art. 25

Art. 32

Art. 198

The Commission shall submit its final report within five years of its appointment, and may submit any interim report earlier. The report, whether interim or final, shall be laid before the National Assembly within six months of its receipt, and the Assembly after considering the report shall enact laws in respect thereof.

(4) Nothing in this Article shall affect the personal laws of non-Muslim citizens, or their status as citizens, or any provision of the Constitution.

Explanation.—In the application of this Article to the personal law of any Muslim sect, the expression "Quran and Sunnah" shall mean the Quran and Sunnah as interpreted by that sect."

It should be noticed that Part II of our Constitution, that deals with fundamental rights, does not so much as use the word Islam in any of its provisions, to say nothing of the fact that it extends religious freedom to all and it also concedes the right to maintain and establish religious institutions to every citizen and to every religious denomination and every sect thereof; thus the right to profess, practise and propagate any religion subject to law, public order and morality is constitutionally guaranteed. (See Art. 18). And Arts. 24 and 25 are mere Directive Principles of state-policy and are not enforceable in any court (See Art. 23).

President of our State to be Muslim. But he has no real power.

With regard to the President of the State being a Muslim, it is pertinent to point out that in his absence or in the other contingencies visualised by Article 36, the functions of his office are to be exercised by the Speaker of the National Assembly. The Speaker of the National Assembly is not required under the Constitution to be a Muslim and in the event of his becoming an Acting President, compliance with the constitutional requirement, viz., that the President shall be a Muslim, is to a considerable extent compromised with. Having regard to the fact that about 85 per cent of the population of Pakistan is Muslim, it would be a matter of course that the Head of the State would be a Muslim. Consequently the incorporation of this provision at best may be regarded as having some sort of a symbolic value and cannot, by any means, be regarded as something to which serious exception can be taken. The more so, when it is realised that the President, as the constitutional Head of the State, possesses practically no political power—as, by and large, the entire executive authority of the Federal Government, is controlled by the advice of the President's Cabinet. Neither the Prime Minister nor the Members of the Cabinet are necessarily to be Muslims and as it is, in the Cabinet which is under our own Constitution to be the repository of all political powers, the minorities are not precluded from playing an important or predominant role in determining the questions relating to the administration of the affairs of the State. Governors of the Federating Units are not necessarily to be Muslims and it is quite possible for a non-Muslim to be appointed either as a Governor of a Federating Unit or a Member of the Central Cabinet or of a Cabinet of a Province.

Religious Provisions in some other Constitutions.

Ireland

Sweden

Norway

If we look at some other Constitutions of the World we find that there too, religious preferences and predilections have been given legislative recognition and effect. A few samples of this practice might as well be exhibited to illustrate the point of these remarks:

(a) The Constitution of Ireland has in its preamble the words: "We, the people of Eire, Humbly acknowledging all our obligations to our Divine Lord, Jesus Christ....."

(b) The Constitution of Sweden provides in Article 2 that "The King shall always belong to the pure evangelical faith, as adopted and explained in the unaltered Augsburg Confession and in the resolution of Upsala Synod."

(c) Article 2 of the Constitution of Norway provides that "The Evangelical-Lutheran religion shall remain the public religion of the State. The inhabitants professing it shall be bound to bring up their children in the same. Jesuits shall not be tolerated"; and in Article 4, is provided that "The King shall always profess the Evangelical-Lutheran religion, and maintain and protect the same."

Denmark

Switzerland

Greece

Argentina

Afghanistan

Iran

Iraq

(d) Article 3 of the Constitution of Denmark provides that "The Evangelical-Lutheran Church is the Danish Established Church and is, as such, subsidized by the State", and Article 5, that "The King shall be a member of the Evangelical-Lutheran Church."

(e) Article 50 of the Constitution of Switzerland guarantees free exercise of religion but forbids the erection of any See within Swiss territory without the approval of the Confederation; and Article 51 bans the order of Jesuits and provides that the ban may be extended "to other religious orders whose activity is dangerous to the State or disturbs the peace between the various religious bodies." Similarly, Article 52 forbids the founding of new religious houses or religious orders, and the re-establishment of those which have been suppressed.

(f) In the Constitution of Greece also it is mentioned in the Preamble: "In the name of the Holy Consubstantial and Invisible Trinity", and the Second National Assembly of the Greeks in Athens decrees in Articles 1 and 2 that the established religion in Greece is that of the Eastern Orthodox Church of Christ: other religions are tolerated and protected but proselytism and all interference with the established religion is prohibited. The doctrine of the church is stated, supervision over the ministers of religion, State as well as others, is provided for, and the text of the Holy Scriptures is required to be maintained unchanged.

(g) The Constitution of the Argentina Republic (of March 16, 1949) in its 77th Article, provides: "To be eligible to the office of President or Vice-President of the Nation, a person must have been born in Argentine territory, must belong to the Catholic church and must possess the other qualifications required to be chosen a Senator."

In some Muslim countries, too, similar provisions are to be found.

1. In Afghanistan, the Constitution provides: "In the name of God the Merciful, the Forgiving; the Faith of Afghanistan is the sacred faith of Islam, and the official religion and that of the population in general is the Hanafi religion. The King of Afghanistan should be a follower of this religion. Followers of other religions....also enjoy protection."

2. In Iran, the Constitution begins with the words: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate"; and, after reciting the establishment of a National Council to give effect to the enactments of the Sacred Law of His Holiness the Prophet, provides, in Article 11, that Members of the Assembly on taking their seats shall take an oath on the Quran. The Supplementary Fundamental Law further provides, in Article 1, that "The official religion of Iran is Islam, according to the orthodox Ja'fariya doctrine of the Ithna' Asharriyya (Church of the twelve Imams) which faith the Shah of Iran must profess and promote."

Article 2 provides for the election of an ecclesiastical committee of not less than five mujtaheds from a panel of twenty whose decision shall be binding, so that no "legal enactment of the Sacred National Assembly" shall "be at variance with the sacred principles of Islam or the laws established by His Holiness, the Best of Mankind (on whom and on whose Household be the Blessings of God and His Peace)"; and ordains that "This Article shall continue unchanged until the appearance of His Holiness, the Prophet of the Age (may God hasten his glad Advent)."

3. The Constitution of Iraq begins with the dedication: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Forgiving....", and provides in Article 13 that Islam is the official religion of the State. Freedom to practise the rites of the different sects of that religion, as observed in Iraq, is guaranteed. Complete freedom of conscience and freedom to practise the various forms of worship in conformity with the accepted customs, is guaranteed to all inhabitants of the country, provided that such forms of worship do not conflict with the maintenance of order and discipline or public morality."

4. Article 3 of the Constitution of Syria provides that "The religion of the President of the Republic will be Islam. Muslim Law is the principal source of legislation."

All other provisions contained in our Constitution, detailed above, are merely directory: they are not judicially enforceable and are not inconsistent with the policy of allowing religious minorities to freely profess and practise their religion or to establish and maintain their religious institutions. Even the Organisation of Islamic Research and Instruction which the President is required to set up under Article 197, is to be financed by means of a special tax to be imposed by an Act of Parliament upon Moslems alone. Similarly, the personal laws of the non-Moslems are constitutionally declared immune from any legislation that might be passed to give effect to the principle of Article 198, namely, the principle of avoiding conflict between the Injunctions of the Islamic Teaching and the laws to be passed by the Legislatures in Pakistan. Legislatures of Pakistan have to pass laws on the basis of majority vote and membership of the legislature is open to the Moslems and non-Moslems alike. The laws are thus not to be made only by the Moslems: the non-Moslem representatives also participate in the law-making activities of the State.

229. What is an Islamic State? Views of the Authors of the Martial Law Court of Inquiry Report.

In a well-known document, called the Report of the Court of Enquiry (constituted under Punjab Act II of 1954), we have a scholarly analysis of the legal and political implications of the concept of the Islamic State given by Chief Justice Muhammad Munir and Mr. Justice M. R. Kayani, the President and the Member of the Court of Enquiry, respectively and it would be useful to refer to their observations in this context in an attempt to place the question relating to the alleged religious character of the State of Pakistan into its proper perspective.

It should be recalled that the Court of Enquiry was constituted under a law passed by the Province of the Punjab to enquire into the widespread disturbances that broke out in that province in March/April 1953. These disturbances had taken "such an alarming turn" and assumed "such a menacing form" that in several places Military Forces had to be called in, and in the city of Lahore, Martial Law had to be proclaimed, which remained in force till the middle of May 1953. Before the clamping down of the Martial Law, the Police had to resort to firing in several places and a number of lives were lost and many more were injured. And the amount of property looted and burnt was also enormous. These disturbances were the direct result of a religious controversy between the Ahmadias and non-Ahmadias, a controversy the precise nature of which has been discussed in the Report at page 187 onwards. The religious differences between the Ahmadias and the Musalmans have been set forth in the Report comprehensively and any one wishing to understand what these doctrinal differences are would be well advised to read the Report. Among the things to which the authors of the Report advert in the course of their Report is the concept of the Islamic State (See page 201). According to the authors of the Report, the Constitution of an Islamic State "must contain the following five provisions":—

- (1) That all laws to be found in the Quran or the Sunnah shall be deemed to be a part of the law of the land for Muslims and shall be enforced accordingly;
- (2) that unless the Constitution itself is framed by Ijma'-i-ummah, namely, by the agreement of the ulama and mujtahids of acknowledged status, any provision in the Constitution which is repugnant to the Quran or Sunnah shall to the extent of the repugnancy be void;

- (3) that unless the existing laws of Pakistan are adopted by ijma'-i-ummah of the kind mentioned above, any provision in the existing law which is contrary to the Quran or Sunnah shall to the extent of the repugnancy be void;
- (4) that any provision in any future law which is repugnant to Quran or Sunnah shall be void; and
- (5) that no rule of International Law and no provision in any convention or treaty to which Pakistan is a party which is contrary to the Quran and the Sunnah shall be binding on any Muslim in Pakistan." (See pp. 209-210)

Without commenting on the correctness of the approach of the authors of the Report in regard to the constitutional requirements inherent in the idea of "Islamic State," it is sufficient to remark that none of these requirements is reflected in the text of our present Constitution—and to that extent, at any rate, it cannot conceivably be characterised as "Islamic".

Similarly, the authors of the Report, after a careful examination of the mass of opinion that was advanced before them during the course of the Enquiry by the ulama (Doctors of the Religious Law of Islam) observe:

"That the form of Government in Pakistan, if that form is to comply with the principles of Islam, will not be democratic is conceded by the ulama. We have already explained the doctrine of sovereignty of the Quran and the Sunnah. The Objectives Resolution rightly recognised this position when it recited that all sovereignty rests with God Almighty alone. But the authors of that Resolution misused the words 'sovereign' and 'democracy' when they recited that the Constitution to be framed was for a sovereign State in which principles of democracy as enunciated by Islam shall be fully observed. It may be that in the context in which they were used, these words could not be misunderstood by those who are well versed in Islamic principles, but both these words were borrowed from western political philosophy and in that sense they were both wrongly used in the Resolution. When it is said that a country is sovereign, the implication is that its people or any other group of persons in it are entitled to conduct the affairs of that country in any way they like and untrammelled by any considerations except those of expediency and policy. An Islamic State, however, cannot in this sense be sovereign, because it will not be competent to abrogate, repeal or do away with any law in the Quran or the Sunnah. Absolute restriction on the legislative power of a State is a restriction on the sovereignty of the people of that State and if the origin of this restriction lies elsewhere than in the will of the people, then to the extent of that restriction the sovereignty of the State and its people is necessarily taken away. In an Islamic State, sovereignty, in its essentially juristic sense, can only rest with Allah." (p. 210 of the Report).

It is impossible to controvert the reasoning contained in the foregoing extract from the Report cited above, and the only comment one can reasonably make upon it is to dispute the premises on which the reasoning of the authors of the Report is based. Assuming that the sovereignty lies with God and assuming further that the Quran and the Sunnah contain some absolute restrictions upon the power of the people to make laws and to administer them, it does not follow, as the authors of the Report assume that it does, that, within the framework of such limited authority as is available to man to legislate and to administer law, he cannot found a Sovereign or a Democratic State. To illustrate this idea, let us take the case of United States of America. At present, the authority of the sovereign organs of the United States, like the Legislature, the Executive and the Judiciary is limited in the manner indicated by the Constitution of that country. To that extent, then, such democratic processes as are to be witnessed in America are admittedly confined within the limitations imposed by the Constitution. It is true that the Constitution can be amended and another Constitution improvised: to this extent, of course, it is true that the sovereign people of the U.S.A. are capable of undoing the limitations which they have imposed upon themselves. But in so far as they have limited the constitutional authority of the Legislature and the Executive, it is submitted that, from the point of view of constitutional principle, the resulting position is precisely the same as would be in a case where the limitation upon the authority to administer the State is imposed in the name of a religious or, what is the same thing as, transcendent law. At no point does this analogy break down: the limitations imposed by the framers of the U.S. Constitution were inspired by their respect for the Higher or Transcendent Law and the distrust they had for all Earthly Authority that was not confined within the limits of that Law. But, as between the Higher or Transcendent Law, on the one hand, and the Religious Law, on the other, there is a thin partition wall indeed: in fact these are substantially the facets of one and the same principle—only the means of perception involved in the recognition of their reality are different. What is forgotten is that whatever even the transcendent law has enjoined has to be appreciated, understood and applied by Man. To that extent, the words in which the religious law has been revealed have to be interpreted, and so long as the final interpretation of the law remains with man, each time the limitation is applied by man in relation to the functioning of any institution which he may design to administer the affairs of a State, a certain amount of flexibility is introduced even in the operation of the transcendent law. Practically the same is true about an endeavour to change a Constitution by a sovereign people: there would be some limits which such a sovereign people would lay down in the matter of designing State-machinery for the purpose of making and administering the laws. Of course, there is nothing to prevent the "sovereign people" from saying that the Constitution or any portion of it will not be liable to amendment and in fact the French Constitution explicitly provides against the possibility of changing the Republic form of Government it has established. In such a case, the authors of the Report, would not, it would seem, concede that the French Constitution accommodates or conserves democratic values. The very fact that you have a written Constitution shows that you mean to limit the power of the Government. Why have a constitution at all if the Government is not to be an agency with limited powers.

What is suggested in this argument is that in deciding to follow the law, man is still left with the liberty of interpreting the law and applying it to the concrete situations of life presented to him by the changing conditions of society in which he lives. Islam merely provides for a frame-work of those absolute limits which are acknowledged even by the secular law with perhaps one difference, namely, that whereas in the establishment of the secular law a man draws upon the wisdom of the ages which in itself is a contribution of the development of universal religion, his belief in the code of behaviour enjoined by revealed religion is based on faith, and ultimately grounded upon the trust that that man reposes in the personality of the Founder of a given religion.

Islam is not the exclusive preserve of a 'group' of people.

It is true that a universal religion cannot be so construed as to narrow it down to being the preserve, and an exclusive preserve at that, of a given group of people. A religion of humanity, such as Islam, is not the property of any group of people; and it is not up to those self-styled professors of the creed of that universal religion, to dispute with the rest of the world as to what are and what are not the essentials of universal religion. Unless Islam is taken to be a natural religion in the sense stressed by the present author it is not possible to make it universal, that is, make it, its teaching and its injunctions, valid for all time to come and relevant for all the people that inhabit our globe. Those scholars of Islam who see in Islam merely the juridical provisions concerning the details of the actual working of the Government, that is, the specific modes in which the sovereign power within the State is to be distributed, and who go to the length of saying that for almost every situation of our individual and collective life, not merely the principles but actual, detailed practical injunctions in a clear-cut form are to be found contained in the Quran or Sunnah, are only attempting to make of Islam what it is not, and thereby converting a universal religion which Islam admittedly is, into something local and particular, and therefore, one that is available only for a certain type of people in a certain historical setting. The moment you make an attempt to reduce the spirit of a universal religion to specific and particular injunctions you must, in logic, concede that in the very process you have robbed that religion of its universal character.

230. Concept of Islamic State—Reference to other Authorities

Lest it should appear that the members of the Martial Law Court of Enquiry laid undue stress on, what may be regarded as, accidental traits of an Islamic State, it is necessary to refer to two other recent attempts that have been made in this field by those who claim that they understand Islam and have given some thought to the problem of improvising Islamic Constitution for Pakistan.

The present writer would like to refer the student to an article that appeared in 'Arafat' (March 1948) published by the Department of Islamic Reconstruction, Government of West Punjab, Lahore, under the authorship of Muhammad Asad on the subject of Islamic Constitution-Making. That scholar argued in support of the establishment of an Islamic State, although he conceded that the form of the polity that may be validly designated as Islamic is not a fixed or stereotyped one so that a deviation from that model would detract from the Islamic character of the State. He considered such an idea as erroneous and stated:

"If we critically examine the political laws and ordinances forthcoming from Qur'an and Sunnah we find that in reality there is no "specific form" of the Islamic State. The Shari'ah does not prescribe any definite pattern to which a state should conform, nor does it elaborate in detail a constitutional theory, but, on the contrary, allows for a great latitude in governmental methods and administrative procedures. The Political Law laid down in the context of Qur'an and Sunnah is, nevertheless, no illusion. It is very real and self-contained, and gives us the outline of a political scheme which is capable of realisation at all times and under all conditions of human life; but precisely because it was meant to be realised at all times and under all conditions, that scheme has been given to us in an outline only and not in details—for, man's political, social and economic needs are time-bound and therefore variable. Being a Divine Ordinance, the Shari'ah duly anticipates all possibilities and necessities of historical evolution and confronts man with no more than a very limited number of fundamental, political laws to which any constitution must conform if the State is to be Islamic; beyond that, it leaves a vast field of constitution-making activity (and of legislation generally) to the ijtihad of the time concerned.

"In other words, there is not only one form of Islamic State but many; and it is for the people of every period to discover the form most suitable to their needs."

He then proceeded to crystallise in the form of 14 propositions what he thought were the cardinal features of the sort of state that he would have established in Pakistan and these are reproduced here below :

1. The State holds power in trust from God so that the people may live in accordance with the Law of Islam.
2. The laws of the Shari'ah bearing on matters of public concern form the inviolable, basic Code of Public Law.

(A) Mohd.
Asad's views

3. No temporal legislation, mandatory or permissive, shall be valid if it is found to contravene any stipulation of the Shari'ah.
4. The Head of the State (Amir) shall be a Muslim; he shall be elected to his office by the community; and, on being elected, he shall declare that he would govern in obedience to the Law of Islam.
5. The legislative powers in the State vest in the Majlis-ash-Shura, the members of which shall be freely elected by the people. The Majlis is entitled to legislate in respect of all matters not covered by the Shari'ah, and is presided over by the Amir or a delegate to be chosen by him from among the members of the Majlis. The laws passed by the Majlis are binding on the Executive.
6. Self-canvassing by any person desirous of being appointed to an administrative post or of being elected to a representative assembly, shall automatically disqualify that person from being elected or appointed.
7. The Head of the State (Amir) shall be Head of the Government as well, and he alone shall be responsible to the Majlis-ash-Shura for the activities of the Government. He shall appoint and dismiss his Ministers at his own discretion; they shall act as his Secretaries of State, and shall be responsible to him alone.
8. The guardianship of the Constitution is vested in the Supreme Tribunal, the members of which shall be elected by the Majlis-ash-Shura on the advice of the Amir. This Tribunal shall have the right (a) to arbitrate, on the basis of the nass ordinances of Qur'an and Sunnah in all cases of disagreement between the Amir and the Majlis-ash-Shura referred to the Tribunal by either of the two parties, (b) to veto, on the Tribunal's own accord, any legislative act passed by the Majlis-ash-Shura or any administrative act on the part of the Amir which, in the Tribunal's considered opinion, offends against a nass ordinance of Qur'an or Sunnah, and (c) to order the holding of a referendum on the question of the Amir's deposition from office in case the Majlis-ash-Shura prefers, by a two-third's majority, an impeachment against him to the effect that he governs in flagrant contravention of the Shari'ah.
9. Every citizen has the right to express his opinions, in speech and in writing, on any matter of public concern, provided that such an expression of opinion (a) does not aim at undermining the peoples' belief in Islam, (b) does not amount to incitement against the Law of Islam or to sedition against the established Government, and (c) does not offend against common decency.
10. Whereas non-Muslim citizens shall be free to preach their religious beliefs within their own community and among communities belonging to other non-Muslim religions, all missionary activities directed at converting Muslims to another religion shall be deemed a cognisable offence and shall be punished by law.
11. The State guarantees to all its citizens full freedom and protection in the expression of their religious beliefs and in the exercise of their religious practices, as well as in the pursuance of all their legitimate, cultural interests. No non-Muslim citizen shall be compelled, directly or indirectly, to embrace Islam against his will and conscience; and forcible conversion of a non-Muslim to Islam shall be deemed a cognisable offence and shall be punished by law.
12. Throughout the domains of the State, education shall be free and compulsory for every citizen, male and female, from the age of . . . to the age of . . . years, and the Government shall make suitable provision for the establishment

- and the running of schools. Islamic religious instruction shall form an integral, compulsory part of the curriculum in so far as Muslims are concerned; while in all schools controlled by the Government arrangements shall be made as well for the instruction of non-Muslims in the tenets of their religions, provided that the community or communities concerned so desire.
13. The lives, persons and possessions of the citizens are inviolable, and none shall be deprived of his life, freedom or property, except under the law.
 14. It falls within the responsibility of the State to ensure to every one of its citizens to (a) productive and remunerative work while of working age and in good health, (b) free and efficient health service in case of illness and (c) a provision, by the State, of adequate nourishment, clothing and shelter in cases of disability arising from illness, unemployment due to circumstances beyond individual control, old age or under-age. No citizen shall suffer undeserved want while others have more than they need; and every citizen shall be protected from such undeserved want by means of a free and compulsory State Insurance carrying an equitable subsistence-minimum, to be determined by Law in accordance with conditions prevailing."

It would appear that judged by these standards the present Constitution of Pakistan would not be characterised as Islamic by this scholar, and of the 14 propositions detailed above, with the possible exception of No. 13, all other Articles are not only not reflected in our Constitution but are contradicted by it, and as to the 13th Article, it is fully reflected in so many other secular Constitutions of the civilised world like India, U.S.A., Ireland etc., and on that account it cannot validly be made into any distinctive attribute of a Muslim polity.

Another spokesman of the claim that the state of Pakistan should be an Islamic one, and in fact one of its ablest defenders, is Maulana Maudoodi, who is the founder of a politico-religious movement in this country, called the Jamat-e-Islami. In his book entitled Islamic Law and Constitution, the following 9 propositions are detailed by him, which propositions, in his opinion, ought to be embodied in the Constitution of Pakistan before it can lay a valid claim to being considered "Islamic".

1. That the Islamic Shari'ah shall form the law of the land;
2. That there shall be no such legislation as would contravene any of the dictates or principles of the Shari'ah;
3. That all such laws as are in conflict with the dictates or the principles of the Shari'ah shall be abrogated;
4. That it shall be incumbent upon the State to eradicate all such vices whose eradication Islam demands and to uphold and stabilize all such virtues which should be upheld and stabilized according to Islam;
5. That none of the basic civic rights of the people—security of life and property, freedom of speech and writing, and freedom of association and movement—shall be forfeited except when a crime has been proved in an open court of law after affording due opportunity of defence;
6. That the people shall have the right to resort to a court of law against transgression on the part of the legislative or the executive machinery of the State;
7. That the Judiciary shall be immune from all interference from the Executive;
8. That it shall be the responsibility of the State to see that no citizen shall remain unprovided for in respect of the basic necessities of life, viz... (food, clothing, shelter, medical aid and education; and

9. That the Qadianis shall be included in the list of non-Muslim minorities and their seats shall be reserved according to their population, through separate electorate." (see pp. 6-7 and also at p. 196 & pp. 197-200).

Needless to say that none of these articles is incorporated or reflected in our Constitution—with the possible exception of Nos. 6 and 7, which, however, are the kinds of articles that would be discovered even in the secular Constitutions of India and the U.S.A. Besides, Maulana Maudoodi holds that according to Quranic injunction Ar-rijal-o-qawwamona-Alin-nissa (which he translates as, 'Men are in charge of women'—IV.34), the women should not be allowed the right of election to Legislature or appointment to responsible posts. "According to the Teachings of Islam, politics and administration are no concern of women. They belong to man's sphere of responsibilities and it is un-Islamic to drag women into these affairs." (See page 86 of his Islamic Law and Constitution). Considering that our Constitution recognises the right of women to vote and to be returned to the legislature, it would appear that the Maulana would find our Constitution un-Islamic even on this score.

231. Concept of Islamic State—Conclusion of the argument

Sufficient has been said to indicate that the conception of Islamic State as it is propounded by those who claim that they understand it, is not a clear-cut one and there would appear to be as many variations on the theme of Islamic State as there are the expounders of it. In respect of one thing, however, there appears to be a concensus of opinion and that is, that the State and the law in Islam stem from the law of God, and that religion has a paramount influence on the establishment of the State and in the making of law.

Religious Foundation of Law is not a distinctive feature of the Law of Islam.

But even as to this, it may, in the first place, be pointed out that, although this view of Islam is true, it cannot by any means be regarded as a distinctive feature of the institution of law in the religion of Islam for, as has been remarked by Tyabji in his book on Muhammadan Law:

"That religion has a paramount influence on Muhammadan law is not a point in which that system differs from the systems of law governing the nations of the West. The Greeks spoke of law "as a discovery and gift of God." The priestly colleges moulded the Roman law. In 1456, Chief Justice Prisot declared, in England, that "Scripture was the Common Law on which all classes of Laws were founded." And it would probably be difficult to produce anything in the texts of Muslim law equalling the following dialogue in quaintness or the power and confidence with which religious sanctions are wielded. Argument of Counsel: "There is the law of the land for many things, and many things are tried in Chancery which are not remediable in the common law, and some things are only a matter of conscience between a man and his confessor." The Chancellor answers: "I know that every law is, or ought to be, according to the law of God. And the law of God is, that an executor who is badly disposed shall not waste all the goods, &c.; and I know well, that if he does so, and does not make amends, if he has the power, unless he repents, he shall be damned in hell." As late as in 1857, Chief Baron Kelly in the Court of Exchequer laid down that "Christianity is part and parcel of the law of the land." This decision was overruled only in 1917, and then not without the dissent of the Lord Chancellor." (p. 23).

Islam emphasises the development of the character of individual.

In the second place, if the predominant emphasis in the creed of Islam has reference to the ideal of producing a highly evolved man, a fully integrated individual and a balanced society, then the emphasis has necessarily to be placed on the ethical and moral principles enjoined by that religion, with a view to organising the life of the individual and society. But if Islam is, on the other hand, taken as something synonymous with the body of laws and regulations enjoined by that religion, that is, laws and regulations that have to be meticulously observed by all people and at all times and in all places, some explanation is due from those who take this view of Islam to tell the world how it is possible to have a rigid system of practices, observances, rules and regulations which would cover the entire sphere of man's individual and collective life and yet not be amenable to any change due to the changes that may overtake the individual and society with the passage of time. It is difficult to have it both ways—for it is inherent in the nature of things, as has been remarked earlier, that what is lost in length is necessarily gained in breadth. Either you have a universal religion, a religion which is valid for all time and for all places, or you have a localised, ephemeral religion, a religion which is valid only for a limited span of time and is available to a people belonging to a certain localised and fixed formations. A universal religion like Islam must, therefore, be elastic enough to accommodate within its philosophy varying and different needs of the people and to that extent it could only validly afford to provide for us the frame-work of essential beliefs and practices, leaving the rest to be worked out in accordance with its principles of inner dynamism and growth.

We must then draw a line somewhere between what are to be regarded as the essentials of Islam as opposed to what may be regarded as constituting the mere details of the way in which those essentials have to reflect themselves under the stimulus of different historical conditions. For instance, when the Quran says: (II : 177)

"Righteous is he who believeth in Allah and the Last Day and the Angels and Scripture and the Prophets; and giveth his wealth, for love of Him, to kinsfolk and to orphans and the needy and the wayfarer and to those who ask, and to set slaves free; and observeth proper worship and payeth the poor due. And those who keep their treaty when they make one, and be patient in tribulation and adversity and time of stress. Such are they who are sincere. Such are the God-fearing. (See Translation by Mohammed Marmaduke Pickthall in "The meaning of the Glorious Qur'an", a Mentor Book, New American Library, 1953.)"

—its message may be looked at from a broad and liberal point of view. The religion of Islam may be then regarded as enjoining upon man the duty of conforming to righteous conduct, that is, the sort of conduct the idea of which is contained in the foregoing verse. In a society where slavery in the conventional sense has been abolished, the expression, "to set slaves free", occurring in the above quoted verse would, on this view, be construed as applying to Man's duty to redeem those who are staggering under the weight of economic and political tyrannies and other social injustices. For such persons too are slaves who have to be rendered free. The ideal before man is to be God-fearing—in other words, negatively, it consists in not doing anything which will injure anyone of His creatures, and put positively, it enjoins that we are, at all events, to promote the general good.

When Islam is seen in this perspective, it would at once be appreciated that it is a creed that places before man the ideal of developing a large and liberal outlook. The catholicity and universality of the spirit of Islam, as Iqbal has testified in his Lectures on the "Reconstruction of Islamic Thought", is practically limitless and it is due to this that it can lay a valid claim to be considered as the religion for Modern Man.

Besides all this, it should be realised that, historically considered, the Quranic values have anyhow found general acceptance all over the world. To illustrate this truth one could usefully make a reference even to as mundane an affair as the philosophy, the policy and programme which sustain the conservative tradition in English politics. In the words that follow, the essentials of that tradition have been set-forth by H. J. White, and any Muslim reading them would hardly find any ground of objection which could be effectively urged from the view point of Islam to any of the principles on which that creed is grounded.

"To discover the order which inheres in things rather than to impose an order upon them; to strengthen and perpetuate that order rather than to dispose things anew according to some formula which may be nothing more than a fashion; to legislate along the grain of human nature rather than against it; to pursue limited objectives with a watchful eye; to amend here, to prune there; in short, to preserve the method of nature in the conduct of the state—because nature, as Burke observed, is wisdom without reflection and above it: this is Conservatism. Its method is Aristotelian, its temper sceptical. It has none of the dogmatic flavour of Continental parties of the 'Right'. It abhors the use of force as a political weapon by majorities and minorities alike: salutary experience as a proscribed minority taught English Toryism the value of the rule of law and the futility of coup d'état in the hard school of Jacobitism in the eighteenth century. It takes men as they are, children of nature under Divine Providence, finite being, prone to error, capable of becoming something decent with discipline, but more than likely to become something less than men without it. While concerning itself with improvement, it never forgets that a very considerable part of human effort and energy must always be expended in preventing things from getting worse. To say that the Conservative is distinguished by a profound attachment to the theory of Original Sin would be an over-simplification. It is enough to say that he sees that a theory of progress is a delusion unless it is accompanied by a proper awareness of the ever-present forces of degeneration which afflict man's imperfect will.

"Once you have accepted man for what he is, once you have replaced perfectionism by improvement, once you have learned to postpone the Kingdom of God to the timeless place of Civitas Dei, then the principles of Conservatism become clear. They are three in number. The first is the radical inadequacy of the political as a final account of man; the second is the organic conception of society; the third is the rejection of 'Will' as the sanction, or sanctification, of law. All Conservative political thinking, and all Conservative policies, spring from these original concepts." (See Conservative Tradition Edited by R. J. White, Nicholas Kaye, London 1950).

Similarly, a bare perusal of the programme of the Labour Party in England too would serve to point out the truth of the foregoing contention, namely that the Ideals, Values and Teachings of Islam have found acceptance at the hands of several political parties all over the civilised world.

It is in this sense that, as a matter of fact, Islam has to be acknowledged as a decisive and an all-pervading force of Modern History. God's light has spread all over the world and has influenced everywhere man's approach to the problems of state-craft.

As far back as 1838, Gladstone much in the manner of a Muslim, could write about the ethics of political power as follows:

"In fulfilment, then, of his obligations as an individual, the statesman must be a worshipping man. But his acts are public; the powers and instruments with which he works are public: acting under and by the authority of the law, he moves at his word ten thousand subject arms; and, because such energies are thus essentially public and wholly out of the range of mere individual agency, they must be sanctified not only by the private personal prayers and piety of those who fill public situations, but also by public acts of the men composing the public body. They must offer prayer and praise in their public and collective character, in that character wherein they constitute the organ of the nation, and wield its collected force . . .

"Whenever there is power in the universe, that power is the property of God, the King of that universe—his property of right, however for a time withheld or abused. Now this property is as it were realised, is used according to the will of the owner, when it is used for the purpose he has ordained, and in the temper of mercy, justice, truth and faith, which he has taught us. But those principles never can be truly, never can be permanently, entertained in the human breast, except by a continual reference to their source, and the supply of Divine grace. The powers, therefore, that dwell in individual acting as a government, as well as those that dwell in individuals acting for themselves, can only be secured for right uses by applying for themselves, can only be secured for right uses by applying to them a religion The principle of an established religion is a natural and legitimate consequence of the mere fact of government, however defective the idea of religion entertained by the governors

"Political power . . . is equally the property of God; men are equally bound to sanctify it, whether it be derived to the governors immediately or through the people. Where the government is democratic, and the majority are of a given religion, the principle above stated will apply. Where government is founded on paternal principles, and the fiction of popular sovereignty is discountenanced, there the function of choice in the legislature is still more apparent. The latter case is that of our own country. But if there be those who would class it with the former, still the national estate of religion (for we are not yet concerned with it as the church) represents in its present form the religion of the majority of the people, and it is their duty to sustain it in its position. " (See his, The State in its relations with the Church)

The trouble with the modern man is not to be traced to the groundless accusation often made against him, namely, that he is lacking in loyalty to higher ideals, morality of faith, but, in the present writer's opinion, only to what may be called, partial perception of truth on his part and the resulting failure to give to its demands a rational recognition in the formulation of political programmes and policies. A word of explanation about this is necessary.

The Second World War, we are told, was fought between the defenders of democracy, (who are supposed to be freedom-loving people) on the one hand, and the apostles of Fascism, (who believe in brute force, and the regimentation of the individual in the interest of total society) on the other. But let us consider what terms like "Democracy" and "Fascism" signify in the dictionary of belligerents. Here is the description of Democracy and Fascism attempted by Mr. Agar, an American journalist, and Major Barnes, the International Secretary of Fascism, respectively. Says Mr. Agar :

"Democracy is first of all a code of conduct. It is a rigorous way of life, beginning with morals. It begins with an act of faith about the nature of man and about the dignity of his soul, and with a determination to build institutions which will fulfill that nature and uphold that dignity. To be true democrats we must conquer within ourselves the slackness, the indifference to truth, the acquiescence in what stupid men call 'practical', the worship of what William James has called 'that bitch-goddess Success'."

And says Major Barnes :

"Fascism is a definite revolt against materialism. . . . It is determined to educate the new generation into one of believers in Divine Providence, the heralders of an age of faith; to make it a generation of heroes who know no fear because of their faith; who would exalt the spirit of sacrifice, gladly fly to face any danger in a worthy cause and welcome martyrdom with a smile. This is no exaggeration. This is the root of the Fascist Revolution. God is to become once more the central principle of our conscious life, with an objective didactic moral law, founded on reason, recognized as paramount a law that sums up and harmonizes all our loyalties, de-thrones both the individual and the state from the position they would usurp from God."

Modern Man is lacking in capacity for Rational thought and action.

The foregoing descriptions that have been taken from Gilbert Murray's essay on "The Anchor of Civilization" have provoked the author of that essay to observe:

"If that is what Fascism is, and democracy is what Mr. Agar says it is, one hardly sees why they should go to war. One would rather expect them to join hands in promoting a 'rebirth of faith', a rejection of materialism, and a crusade for the abolition of slackness, indifference to truth, and the worship of the 'bitch-goddess', and the building up of a generation of heroes.

"It would be easy to collect similar descriptions of other pairs of opposites; for instance Catholicism and Communism as being each essentially an uncompromising rejection of worldly values and a championing of the poor and oppressed. Is it that both the controversialists are more intent on claiming for their own party an ideal which all good men would approve than on describing objectively its real tenets? Or would it be fairer to say that there is some high and true aim by which they are both fascinated but which they see only in fragments and dimly, and which they state all wrong when they translate it into political language?"

Conflict between our 'professions'
and 'practices'.

It is important that this dilemma between the profession of almost identical viewpoints and ideologies, on the one hand, and the actual conflicting practices on the part of those who implement them, on the other, should be clearly perceived. The moral to be learnt then is, that it is not so much in the declaration of man's loyalty to the higher ideals in the abstract, as in his failure to articulate rationally those ideals, that the explanation of man's false approach to the problems that are confronting him seems to lie. This is because:

"The immorality", says Dr. Robert Briffault, "which has afflicted humanity is not a matter of sentiments, of broken commandments, of moral insensibility; it resolves itself into intellectual ignorance, into irrationality which renders possible the uncritical foundations of wrong. It is in that supposedly 'intellectual' field that the real moral reform takes place; progress in morality takes place through the overthrow of some view or theory which in itself is regarded as having nothing to do with morality. We are not under the influence of a higher ethical code than our forefathers, we are not animated by a more intense and loftier moral purpose than Sir Thomas Browne, or Melanchthon, or John Calvin, but the field of rational thought has enlarged. If Dominicans no longer burn heretics, judges no longer use the 'question', tyrants no longer exercise fantastic forms of oppression, it is not because we have received some sublime moral enlightenment. Our morality has improved because our intellectual development and rationality has advanced." (See p. 326 of his, Making of Humanity, George Allen and Unwin, 1928).

That then takes us to the problem of heightening our intellectual powers, of developing our capacities for clarity of thought and of strengthening our stamina for grappling with the problems that confront us, with a view to finding out solution to these problems—solutions which will be in accord with our deeper aspirations and strivings. It is reason and reason alone that will come to our rescue. On Earth the destiny of Man is ruled by forces of reason.

232. Theory of the State and the Law in Islam

There is no word in the Holy Quran which may be said to convey the idea underlying the term 'State', as it is understood in the science of Modern Politics. But it is also abundantly clear that much of the text of the Quran concerns itself with the establishment of a politico-social order that has its ultimate foundation and source in the Will of God. Muhammad, the Prophet of God, merely was, so at least the Moslems believe, the mouth-piece of God's Will and his call to people around him to become believers had its orientation in the Will of God. The obligation to obey this call stems from the belief enjoined by Islam that man is created to do God's Will, and in showing obedience to His law he finds the fulfilment of his destiny. There is also a reference in the Quran to the primaeval contract or covenant between God and the Soul of man: "Am I not your Lord?" asked the Lord and the Soul replied: "Indeed, Thou art". The context in which this appears is the following. "When the Lord drew forth from the children of Adam—from their loins—their descendants and made them Testify concerning themselves (saying) Am I not your Lord (Who cherishes and sustains you)? They said, "Yes; We do testify: (This), lest you should say on the day of Judgment: "Of this we were Never (duly) warned." Q. 7. 172.

This acknowledgment by man of the supremacy of the power of the Lord is the central idea that animates the whole system of juridical and political relationships that according to Islam ought to exist between man and man. The idea of the contract as being the foundation of society is so succinctly stated by Ibn Khaldun, a Moslem Thinker of the 14th Century, in his 'Prolegomena' that in this he may be regarded as a precursor of that class of writers like Locke, Hume, Rousseau and others who nearly three hundred years later developed the same idea in a somewhat greater detail.

The foundation of the socio-political order in Islam could only be the individual who is endowed with a certain type of character. Quran aims at making men into Salehin (the Righteous ones), Muttaquin (Self-controlled ones), Muttehirin (those who reform the Society), the Sadiqueen (those who relentlessly adhere to the call of Truth) etc., and it is out of this community of men that it wants to make a nucleus of that organised group of God-fearing people who will, by their deed and thought, provide an example to the world even as the Prophet has been an example unto them.

Islam engenders a move towards a Supra-national synthesis of mankind—a synthesis achieved not so much upon the emotional level induced by racial kinship, territorial or tribal loyalty, as being inspired and animated by the life of the spirit. The consummation of Islamic way of life could be seen in two directions—(a) in the life of individual purification and self-controlled behaviour fostered by prayers, fasting and the giving away of one's wealth as a measure of love for one's fellow men, and (b) in the total life of Humanity, as symbolised by those who annually assemble at the eve of pilgrimage at Mecca. Both the life of individual and the collective life of the community are thus taken care of by the Islamic Ideals. Such a group of organised believers who practise these ideals, responds to the concept of Ummate-wustan—that is, then they form spiritual fraternity, a community, that avoids the extremes and endeavours to reconcile the claims of individuality with those that the life of the whole of mankind as a social synthesis makes upon its component members. In short, such a community of believers becomes the torch-bearer of our Evolution.

This community is cemented by the tie of faith, a faith that emphasises the common origin of all men and points to the common destiny of the entire mankind. The ideal political structure of society is thus, according to the teaching of Quran, a mere reflex of the way in which an individual lives in peace with himself and in peace with the world of external relations.

Islam being a religion of the whole of Humanity can alone be the foundation of international or rather supra-national synthesis: basically, be it noted, Islam is not opposed to the creation of a political state on the premises of territorial loyalties of its subjects, as is the fashion of our time when the gospel of nationalism has been claiming our allegiance far more than the ideal of universal brotherhood of man, but Islam is essentially an International Force. The formation of modern states may well be regarded from the standpoint of Islam as being in the nature of the stepping stone towards the creation of a world-organisation where man can live at peace with himself and with all his fellow men. But if they, that is the territorial states, are regarded as representing as ends-in-themselves, they can be, and indeed in fact are, the parents of confusion and disaster. The one important lesson of our time is to transcend frontiers of thinking and feeling and to live as a citizen of the world. No force in our times, not even the United Nations, has that much decisive influence in the matter of securing international understanding and concord as Islam . . .

233. Value of early Experiments by Muslim Administrators assessed in the light of conditions then prevailing.

Such experiments in the art and science of governing the affairs of the country, regarded as a territorial state, as the study of the early history of development of polity in Islam familiarises us with, have to be viewed in the light of the conditions under which they came to be improvised. It would appear that the approach of the early administrators of Islam to the problem of state-craft was conditioned by two main factors:

- (a) All around the community of the believers lay, scattered about, organised religious groups like those of the Jews and the Christians and other 'non-believer' groups who, taken in their totality, were viewed by the early administrators of Islam as constituting a grave source of danger to the continued existence of the infant Muslim community under their care. The Muslim society was in a state of nascent growth, and was surrounded on all sides by religious communities that could not conceivably have contemplated its existence with equanimity. There was a suppressed sense of indignation against the Prophet and his band of believers who had, by their crusade against idolatry, questioned the very foundations of a form of society that pre-existed the advent of Islam: there were, on all sides, to be seen the forces of hostility, threats of subversion—and all these had to be counteracted. Every precautionary measure had, therefore, to be taken to fortify the frontiers of the territories in which the Muslim Administrators had undertaken to establish the law of God, and steps had to be taken to ensure that the Muslim community was not harassed or destroyed by the scheming villainies and machinations on the part of the non-believers. Seen in this light, many of the provisions of the covenants drawn up by the early statesmen of Islam between themselves and the non-Muslim communities could be appreciated as reflecting this anxiety on their part to secure, by all appropriate means, the stability of the growing community of believers and to safeguard it against all the possible assaults from the non-believers. It was thus, from the point of view of our early statesmen, a state of emergency that they had to deal with, and the code of political behaviour prescribed by them had reference to their understanding of the practical methods whereby that emergency could, under those circumstances, have been faced by them.
 - (b) That all the early administrators of Islam were profoundly convinced that the religion of Islam was bound, at not a very distant day, to girdle up the whole of the globe, thus encompassing within it at once the whole of humanity: they felt that until such time as the whole world actually came under the banner of Islam they could afford to wait: they therefore proceeded to make ad hoc and interim political arrangements to continue the administration of the countries that came under their authority—these arrangements were provisional and were to continue till such time as they felt free to devise ways and means of providing a well-considered framework of governance on a world-wide scale.
- They had not, in short, the time to sit back and design a form of polity which would be in accord with the spirit of the teaching of Islam. The more so, when such a thing could not have been considered even as important: it has been hinted earlier that basically the Islamic teaching had much to do with the development of the individual character of the believers and less to do with the establishment of particular forms of governance necessary for the administration of secular affairs. In fact, during the time of the first four right-guided Caliphs there was such a rapid expansion of the world of Islam resulting from victories won by our warriors that the problems that their administration was confronted with were too numerous to have left any time with any of these Caliphs to give any thought to the problem of designing the machinery of the State in accordance with the teaching, of their religion. After all they could afford to wait for the day when the spirit of Islam would capture and possess the being of all the inhabitants living on the earth, and in the meanwhile, carry on as best as they could, the administration of public affairs. This attitude on their part is amply illustrated in the nature of the measures they improvised from time to time to carry on with commendable skill, imagination and courage the historical task that had fallen to their lot to tackle.

It would therefore be a misreading of the whole phase of the early history of Islam, if the forms of governance which were improvised by the Moslems during the thirty years intervening the death of the Prophet and the dastardly assassination of Ali, the fourth Caliph of Islam, are uprooted from their historical context and exhibited as though they grew up in a splendid isolation and then held aloft and characterised as models for being adopted in these times when the world has moved away from them in time by 1300 years and has brought forth within itself an altogether different sort of economico-political cosmos for the modern man to adjust and adapt himself to. Our contemporary situation demands that we should apply our rational faculties for the purpose of designing action—and the improvisation of constitutional arrangements is just one of these actions and by no means any the more important than others—for regulating the life of society. It is only the indolent mind that would like to submit slavishly to the precedents of the past. The history of those first thirty years can be a source of inspiration for us and can help us to reconstruct for ourselves the remarkable manner in which the early administrators of Islam fulfilled their tasks—but to say that across these 1300 years, the forms of government the early administrators of Islam improvised continue to be relevant is, in the opinion of the present writer, an attitude which cannot be defended upon the plain facts of history.

In the light of such rational powers as the Creator has endowed man with, it is his duty each time he comes to deal with it to look upon the world de novo and courageously assume the full responsibility for the handling of his own affairs, untrammelled by the consideration that those that had preceded him, by at least a time lag of 1300 years, had solved their problems of state-craft in a manner radically different from the one which appeals to him as being relevant today.

234. Theoretical Foundation of Social Order in Islam

According to Ibn Khaldun human society is necessary in that, without it, man would not be able to sustain life and to preserve the race: In his words:

"It is therefore necessary to unite his efforts with those of his fellow men in order that by co-operation they will produce food sufficient for many times their number."

Similarly, man cannot defend himself if he were left all to himself for,

"as God gave to each animal an organ of self-defence . . . to man he gave the mind and the hand which, in the service of the mind, can apply itself to the crafts and produce tools which take the place of animal's organs of defence."

Human society being thus necessary for the sustenance of man and for the preservation of his species, in its turn gives rise, when it comes to be established, to the need of designing a machinery for restraining each man from invading the rights of others owing to his animal propensities for aggression and oppression. And so our author says :

"The weapon with which men defended themselves against wild beasts obviously cannot serve as a restraint, since each man can make equal use of them. There must exist accordingly a restraining force . . . which must be sought from one man who will be entrusted with power and authority so that no longer will an individual be attacked by another. This is what is implied in the term mulk (sovereignty or statehood) which exists by nature in man and is necessary for his existence."

Thus the society which is necessary for man also leads up to the idea of some restraining force so that by resort to it, it may be possible to keep each man within the sphere of his permissible activity. That is how the state, which, as Marx pointed out later, was in substance no other than an apparatus of coercion, arises in society.

In the modern political theory the legal order assumes the existence of the sovereign who issues the commands which must be followed by the subjects. It also involves the idea that those who actually exercise the sovereign power, be they individuals or impersonal organs or institutions established within society, must, in turn exercise the power vested in them in accordance with the conditions and limitations they have agreed to impose upon themselves while drawing up the charter of the government. There are, therefore, in reality two covenants: (1) covenant by the several members who compose society to create an authority whose commands will be obeyed, and (2) a covenant by the authority with the people that in the exercise of the power vested in the authority it will be regulated by the conditions and limitations prescribed by those who created that authority. Now in the strict theory of the Muslim law the submission of the individual to the Will of God is absolute and unqualified—and the legal order itself is a manifestation of that Will—and therefore even those who are in charge of the management of public affairs or in control of the political processes within the community are equally bound to submit to the Will of God—that is, as that will is manifested in the legal order. In other words, there is no direct covenant between the ruler and the ruled: the rights and obligations of both stem from the Divine Law and both of them are bound to submit to that law. In the theory of Moslem Law "Contract" is not a bilateral bond: it is really a trilateral, one—God being the third party who is a surety for the due performance of the obligations contracted for by those entering into a contract. (See Quran Chap. XVI. V. 91)

Abdur Rahim's Conception of State in the Muhammadan System.

So long as the Prophet lived, he was the channel of communication between God and man, and what he did convey to the people in this way, in fact in an unadulterated form, is preserved in the Quran till today. But after his death, this channel of communication was interrupted, and the Caliphs could only declare what the law was and enforce it just as it was. Thus it was that a sort of separation between the legislative and the executive power took place. The Caliph was to be, according to the orthodox view, essentially an administrator and a judge and not a legislator. That, for instance, is the view of Abdur Rahim who would have us believe that :

"The conception of a State in the Muhammadan system is, as already mentioned, that of a commonwealth of all the Moslems living as one community under the guidance and direction of a supreme executive head called the Imam or the Caliph. The responsibility of the Administration rests with the Imam, but for the convenient administration, he may delegate his powers to different persons. He may, for instance, appoint ministers to whom he may delegate practically all his powers and faculties or only particular powers, or he may appoint them merely for the purpose of consultation or for executing orders. Similarly, he may appoint a person as Governor of a particular country with such powers as may be necessary. He may also delegate the exercise of his authority in the various departments of administration to different officers, such as the command of the army, administration of justice, police and the like. But the Imam has no legislative powers at all, though he may interpret the law if he happens to be a jurist, but his interpretation will have no special authority by reason of his position as Imam. He is bound by the law and by the decrees and orders of the court like any other citizen. . . The Imam is a mere representative or delegate of the people from whom he derives his rights and privileges. The office is elective being based on Ijma'. (See Abdur Rahim's Jurisprudence, p. 383, London-Lusac & Co. 1911).

The beginnings of legislation in the Law of Islam, in the historical sense at least, could be traced to the emergence of the Institution of Ijma' (that is the consensus of the community) but the later Doctors of Islam so much curtailed the scope of this source of law-making (in the sense that the Shafai' doctrine of Ijma' had described it) that, soon, very soon, thanks to the conservatism of its pretentious professors, the orthodox doctors of law, it ceased to be an effective or productive source of law-making. It is the view of the present writer that the right to legislate within the 'prescribed' limits is not only not denied to man by the Quran, but is permitted by it and in fact it would be inconceivable that any universal legal order—that is legal order which is to face up to the changing conditions of society—could be founded without making a provision in it as to the existence of this source of law-making.

In this context, it is useful to recall, what is after all an authentic hadith of the Prophet: the Prophet sent Mu'adh as a judge to take charge of the legal affairs in al-Yaman, and asked him on what he would base his legal decisions. Mu'adh replied, "On the Quran". "But if that contains nothing for the purpose?" asked Muhammad. "Then upon your tradition," answered Mu'adh. "But if that also fails you?" asked Muhammad. "Then I will follow my own opinion," said Mu'adh. And the Prophet approved this reply. (See Kitab al-Tabaqat al-Kabir of Ibn Sa'd). This tradition of the Prophet, if believed, clearly proves two things: (1) that cases are conceivable in which neither Quran nor his traditions will furnish an answer directly to a problem which confronts a judge or an administrator, and (2) that in dealing with a situation thus presented, a man is not only not precluded from using his own opinion as a guide for determining a case but is called upon to do so. It is true that God alone is the ultimate source of all authority—be it spiritual or temporal—as He has not only knowledge of the perfect law but is Law Himself. And in His Law there is no change—that is, it is eternal. But man who has been created by Him in His image and is His vicegerent on earth can also reflect the attributes of God as a law-giver and in fact he is called upon to do so. "Takhalaqu Be Ikhlaqillah" (Embody in yourselves the Attributes of God) is the command of the Prophet and that command necessarily enjoins upon man the duty of reflecting God's attributes. This necessarily means that man has, within limits, of course, the duty and therefore the capacity to be a law-giver. It is true that this legislative activity to man is available within limits and where there are clear and unmistakable prohibitions they cannot be transgressed by the law-giver. But within those limits, man is called upon to be a law-maker, and it is in this sense that Islam came to establish a kind of legal order wherein law-making could take place only within the prescribed limits and the power to the legislature thus affirmed was to be exercised as a trust "for establishing justice between man and man." In the strict theory of Moslem law, society and state merely exist to fulfil the Divine Law and where a society or a state fails of this purpose it forfeits its right to exist. The object of the law is not then unconnected with the object of human life. The Divine Law and such human laws as can be made within the prescribed limits are calculated to provide for the believer the right path upon which he must endeavour to tread in order to fulfil the purpose for which he has been created. And since there is no institution of priesthood in Islam (God being nearer to man than the vein of his neck and there being no place for any one to take his stand in between) there is a direct relationship between man and God—and such obedience as is being shown to the Divine law by man is merely a means of his own fulfillment.

For the purpose of concerted and co-ordinate social action, it is necessary that differences in the opinion of the believers upon questions affecting the specific content of law must be resolved, and this can best be done by agreement and not by compromise. The Prophet is said to have said, "My people shall never be unanimous in error." And he also said, "The learned ones are the heirs of the Prophet", meaning thereby that persons who attempt to understand the Quran, Nature and Nature's God are in a better position to agree upon a course of conduct which the community of believers ought to follows.

In all that has been stated so far, an attempt has been made to present the theoretical foundation of the state and law as it can be gathered from (a) such injunctions of the Quran and Hadis as are relevant upon that subject and (b) the evidence provided to us by the Ijtihad of those who have attempted to evolve political and legal institutions on the foundations of those injunctions: in substance, the view that has found favour with the Muslim jurists upon this subject is that no nation or community can find happiness for the members who compose it unless it be united from within. This unity is possible only in terms of some agreed norm with reference to which certain activities can be recommended as promoting the inward cohesion of the community and others condemned as being destructive of the organic unity of social life. Our perception of what is right and wrong must not be relegated to the sphere of private judgment of an individual but must be rendered public and enforced as such, at least in regard to matters that affect the community as a whole. The moral consciousness of the community would then provide the clue not only for judging what is to be regarded as right or wrong but it would also provide the basis for evolving rules of public conduct. It is in this sense that society is "individual-writ-large" and "morality is the very nature of things."

Difference between Religious and Secular Law.

Now it is not possible to adopt uncritically any moral ideal without some sort of ultimate and transcendental sanction. It is religion that provides this source and sanction for the consistent maintenance of the moral ideal. The difference between the secular law and the religious law is not one of content so much as of the sanction and the source from where the two are supposed to emerge. The secular legal order has necessarily some pre-suppositions of a moral character. It is impossible to discover a legal order which is not based upon some moral values. Such a thing as justice, liberty, right of the individual to freely express himself in the life of society, the obligation of the community to ensure the development of healthy corporate life, so that happiness of the individuals composing it is ensured against the possibility of attacks emanating from the brute aggression of another community etc. all these and other values are necessarily the alpha and omega of any legal order that could be improvised for the organisation of Social Order. And even the foundation, it is submitted, of an avowedly atheistic communistic state is based upon these moral values, although what constitutes the content of these values, or the norm against the background of which it is possible to appreciate the sense of right and wrong that their acceptance engenders in the mind of man, has reference to a different ideology altogether.

235. Morality and Religion

Whatever may be the content of moral obligation, the fact remains that moral causation is universal and man cannot escape from the grip of its authority. We do habitually pass moral judgments in describing certain acts as good and certain others as bad. Whenever there is a play of conflicting interests in our consciousness and we are called upon to choose out of the several possible courses of conduct the one that we as men ought to pursue because it is the right course of conduct, that something which is ultimately felt to be decisive in the matter of effecting this choice, is attributable to the moral element present in us.

And finally, it is to this element that we must look up for defining the very direction in which our life is evolving. Morality takes the conflict of interests as its point of departure, and in the very act of choosing the interest he should side, man evidences his capacity to serve as an agent of the moral order, moral law. Rationally considered, what a man does when he chooses one out of several conflicting objects of his desideratum consciousness, may be explicable in terms of the biological reflexes, instinctive urges and such other incentives to action with which the vocabulary of analytic psychology makes us familiar. But the point that is being made is that all these biological and psychological factors taken by themselves in their totality are thoroughly inadequate to explain completely the moral behaviour of man, and this for the simple reason that the moral quality of our action transcends all the forces which empirically could be invoked as having brought it into being. In the moral consciousness of man, the river of life rises beyond its source, for its waters defy the logic of the downward movement. In all situations in which man transcends, through action, the immediacy of the total configuration of contending claims which his consciousness mirrors at the time when he is called upon to choose, he gives evidence of his loyalty to a higher order of things—an order, which is radically different from the one with which, having regard to the earthly motivations that impel us to action, the mere animal in us is so familiar.

Now religion, in the present writer's opinion, is an attempt to explain how morality is possible. It is a hypothesis which seeks to explain the claim which the moral law makes over its votaries. Religion thus regarded is the ultimate sanction of all moral conduct. "To preach morality is easy", says Schopenhauer, "but to find a foundation for morality is hard". This foundation for morality has been furnished by religion and that is why the ethical idealists prize religion only for the reason that there is no reason other than the religious sanction to support and sustain the ethical ideal. "Religion, true or false", says W. M. Dixon, in his book "The Human Situation", "with its attendant beliefs in God and a world to come, has been, on the whole, if not the only, at least we may believe, a stout bulwark of morality. With the decay of religion and its sanctions, it becomes an urgent question what can take its place, what support for ethics of equal efficacy, indeed of any efficacy, can be substituted". "It is beyond doubt", wrote Pascal, "that the mortality or the immortality of the soul must make an entire difference in morals; yet philosophers have treated morality as being independent of the question. They discuss it to pass the time." So also runs the opinion of Leibniz, "In order that it may be concluded by a universal demonstration that everything honourable is beneficial, and that everything base is hurtful, we must assume the immortality of the soul, and the Ruler of the Universe, God." And finally said Mr. Joseph: "It seems to me that as long as we hold the world and what happens in it really to be what physical science takes it for, we cannot talk the language of ethics, and must jettison conduct." In all these opinions one detects the kind of approach to religion which makes of it as the ultimate sanction of morality.

In fact, morality itself results from the teachings of the Prophets of Universal Religion, and if today an atheist can take refuge in the thought that he does good because it pleases him to do so, he conveniently forgets that his feeling of pleasure in the doing of good has been engendered by a social situation in which he finds himself, and this situation itself is the product, and therefore explicable only in terms of, the teaching of all higher religion and philosophy. Today anybody who studies elementary physics knows the principles on which the action of the steam engine is to be understood, and in fact one can apply these principles in the making of a steam-engine without being consciously aware about the gratitude we owe to James Watt, the man who first discovered, applied and formulated them. And it is the same with the recognition which an atheist may be disposed to accord to contemporary moral values. These values are the condensed essence, the adventure to realise the kingdom of God on earth. Instead of religion being availed of as a lever for securing social change—it was being used to hoodwink the down-trodden into believing that their suffering would prepare them to being the worthy recipient of a higher and better life in the world to come. The official priests of this Orthodox brand of religion had acquired a vested interest in religion and the only way to get rid of them was to get rid of the institution itself. Communism therefore resolutely rejected all reference to this cosmic orientation of man's pursuits here-below and attempted to find an explanation of it within the frame-work of temporal and earthly causation. Marx taught mankind to believe that man's history shows the inexorable and invincible operation of materialistic forces and enjoined that all man can therefore do is to side with them in order to accelerate the march of events to a pre-ordained state of classless society towards which humanity anyhow is moving. It has already been pointed out that this is an unconvincing explanation of man's yearning to subserve the higher ends and that if history anyhow means an inevitable passage to a classless society considered as an ideal, there is hardly any reason why man should make any sacrifices to reach a target that is anyhow to be attained whether he wants it or no. Islam on the other hand denies that there is any such thing as the inevitability of human progress—for ultimately, even God does not change the conditions of society until and unless the society itself changes such conditions as are within the reach of man to alter. In fact, Islam goes further than communism when it offers a convincing explanation as to why man must participate in the movements of history. Thus man's individual creative effort to concert with his fellow men for the realisation of a higher social ideal ultimately involves obedience to the law of his own being and the fulfilment of the conditions of his own spiritual advancement and inward fulfilment. Man is able to make History precisely because there is something in him which is not the product of History.

237. Communism as a philosophy of life

Communism is at best a narrower ideal and at worst is grounded on assumptions which if allowed to stand uncontradicted will continue to be at war with the harmonies of human life. The theistic belief that there is a benevolent Creator of the Universe and that man has been brought up on the bosom of earth by Him to reflect his law and that in all that a man does he is called upon to serve the higher cosmic order of things—all these articles of faith that are inherent in the creed of the Higher Religion of mankind demand of us to take our stand in the centre of the cosmos and own up our responsibility for the fate of human history. The creative urge in man is the fountain source of all urge to social progress and individual perfection. When the individual is dethroned from his sovereign seat in the scheme of things, the possibility of social progress in the direction of building a lasting and durable civilisation is gravely compromised with.

"Man's whole life", says Erich Frank, "is a struggle to gain true existence, an effort to achieve substantially so that he may not have lived in vain and vanish like a shadow. Whether he is a believer or a sceptic, whether he is a meta-physician or a Positivist—this idea of existential truth is the driving force of all his thought and action. Everything else in the world simply exists; man, however, knows that he is, and he wants to be what he has recognised as his truth, as his true existence. What he seeks is not only satisfaction of his material or spiritual needs, for at the bottom it may be merely an illusion. What man really wants is existential truth, the actualization of his true destiny."

As opposed to this, however, communism teaches that the man in the metaphysical sense does not count, that he must be forced to give up himself in order that the state should thrive and that conditions should be created in which it should be impossible for any one to realise the principles of individuality and value. Entire society thus becomes an amorphous stuff in which there is to be no vestige of the survival of any individuality.

Far be it for the present writer to suggest that the economic factors prevalent in society do not influence man's development. All that is suggested by him, however, is that they should be given their due place—no more and no less. The foundation of social order is the dignity and the sanctity of the individual life and the world-problem in the last resort is an "individual problem". In his endeavour to fulfil himself, to realise his destiny, Man does not stand alone; he is inextricably entangled in the lives of others. To quote Erich Franck again "He is determined by the social, economic and intellectual conditions of the community into which he is born; in short he is moulded by history. No one can make an absolute beginning, nor can he wholly consummate himself in time. The situation in which the individual finds himself is the result of that which he himself and others before him have done and thought, of historical decisions that cannot be revoked. It is only by taking account of this past that man can think and act and be. In this the historicity of his existence consists."

Regarded from this perspective several questions leap up in our mind the moment we begin to meditate upon the problem of appreciating the place of man in the cosmic order of things.

Can history itself give an answer to these questions? Being a process in time, can the deliverance of the teachings of history transcend the time? Can any spectator of the unfolding of the historical evolution of man decipher for us in advance what the plan (if such there be), of the great drama is like? Throughout the ages we see men fighting bitterly about the truth of their different conceptions of Human destiny. Does a man's destiny lie beyond this world and beyond time, in his relation to God, as religion teaches? Or is it to be found in this world, in man himself, in the development of all his natural and rational faculties—in short, in the perfection of civilization as modern man believes. Since the Renaissance, says Erich Franck, the peoples of the Occident have taken an increasingly hostile stand against the religious interpretation of history, according to which mankind is guided by divine Providence; modern man sees his destiny in this world; he has decided to take his fate into his own hands. Communism, however, teaches that man has really no hands of his own to take charge of his fate. All he can hope to do is to accelerate the pace of the forces that are influencing the economic evolution of our society. Besides, in a Communist's dictionary, values like truthfulness, justice and morality do not have any meaning; they merely represent, if at all, episodic aspects of a life of expediency, a mere temporising with emergencies posed by an awfully indifferent if not a ruthlessly hostile environment.

Religion is not antithetical to the ideal of man labouring for realising a better order of things to prevail here below. In fact all higher religions teach us that the kingdom of God can only be realised on earth and that nothing belongs to man except the effort that he puts forward for the realisation of this goal. Communism is right in insisting that the lot of humanity has to be rendered better here below, but it is right only for the wrong reasons, since the whole field of human endeavour is placed by it in a wrong perspective. Traditional religion teaches that we are to labour on earth in obedience to the call of the spirit. And further it teaches that this life is a part of a wider process, and that, when we are engaged in the fulfilment of our earthly task, we have to be conscious that the performance of our earthly duties is demanded by a higher law,—a law, the truth of which is attested by the inward pulsations of our moral consciousness and is so plainly writ-large in the skies.

denouncing the institution of law and the State itself as merely the instruments and agencies that subserve the interests of those who control the production of wealth and the means of its distribution. The Marxist has perforce to banish the ideals from his world, and he can only do so by denouncing them as being merely the "concomitant conditions" of the play of economic forces as they are reflected in the mind of Man.

In his Contribution to the Critique of Political Economy, Karl Marx has the following to say :

"In the social production which men carry on they enter into definite relations that are indispensable and independent of their will; these relations of production correspond to a definite stage of development of their material powers of production. The sum total of these relations of production constitutes the economic structure of society—the real foundation, on which rise legal and political superstructures and to which correspond definite forms of social consciousness."

These forms of "social consciousness" were later on baptised by Karl Marx as "ideological forms in which men become conscious of social reality." Thus in the Marxian system man plays the role of a helpless spectator in the development of a drama whose goal is pre-determined and about which all man can do is to accelerate the pace of the dialectical processes that are anyhow transforming the social reality into a final phase of classless society. In the strict theory of Marxian economic interpretation of history, it is not possible to hold that man can ever accelerate this general advance and this for the reason that even the ideological incentive to be operative for securing this general advancement must be, in its turn recognised as a superficial concomitant phenomenon that reflects an existing pattern of economic forces operating in society. Even thoughts, according to Marx, are only more or less abstract images of real things. Elsewhere he says:

"The mode of production in material life determines the general character of the social, political and spiritual processes of life. It is not the consciousness of man that determines their existence but on the contrary it is their social existence that determines their consciousness."

On these premises even the emergence of Marxian ideology cannot itself be explained, nor again can the Marxian interpretation of history even explain the triumph of Marxian ideology.

"For if economic materialism", says Nicolas Berdyaev, "really contends that the human consciousness is no more than an adjunct of man's economic activities, then how are we to explain the origin of the intellect manifested by the prophets of economic materialism themselves, of that manifested by Marx and Engel which towers above the mere passive reflection of economic relations. When founding his doctrine, Marx claimed to possess that type of reason which transcends the purely passive reflex of economic activities. But if the ideological structure of economic materialism represents no more than the figment of a given productive relation, of those, let us say, which came into being in the nineteenth century as a result of the struggle of the proletariat against the bourgeoisie, then it is incomprehensible how the prophets of this doctrine can claim to possess a greater measure of truth than all those others whose systems are qualified as a self-delusion born of this very figment. In that case their doctrine is another illusion generated by the same economic reality."

Similar observations apply to the Marxian theory of the class struggle. Marx did not clearly comprehended the meaning of the word 'class' he so often used—he did not define it in the context of his own ideas. He in fact read into History what he claimed to have discovered from its pages; in fact he proceeded to apply what was after all an a priori assumption to the facts of History and squeezed them to fit into the Procrustean bed of his Theory.

Considered as an empirical generalization his theory, as every schoolboy knows, is a ridiculous one. The formation of classes is itself contingent upon the subsistence of a type of consciousness in the members of that class by reason of which they can be viewed or grouped as a class. This consciousness was never known to have existed, say for instance, during the period of the ancient Greek and Roman civilizations; the slaves did not view themselves as slaves, as a class by themselves, and the masters did not view themselves as a class owning the slaves. This is also in fact true of any other dichotomy that one can conceive of. Even in an agricultural stage of social evolution, there was no conflict between the landlords and the peasant-labourers, because there was no consciousness of the sort which gives rise to these classes.

But Marx by conceiving the idea of class conflict and by employing it as a lever of social change was able to give a new direction to history. The truth of the matter is that by a conscious formulation of the doctrine of class conflict, he was able to accelerate the formulation of classes, into capitalists and wage-earners. His idea of the class conflict cannot be explained as being a deduction from the lessons of history, although this idea, after it was consciously expressed and propagated, became the bed-rock of subsequent tensions that in turn brought about the requisite consciousness without which the formation of classes cannot even be conceived.

Sufficient has been said to indicate that the ideals of social justice that Marx attempted to advance owe their vitality and vigour not so much to the logic of economic forces current in his day as to a vigorous statement at the plane of reason that he was able to make concerning them. It is to this that tribute must go for such impact as Marxian ideology has been able to make on subsequent history. The success of the Marxian ideology is a complete contradiction of its logical plausibility and ontological validity.

If then it is impossible to escape the grip of ideals, of values and, if the only way the ideals and values can be realised is by means of securing a rational re-statement concerning them so that channels of communication between man and man are established for organizing a well co-ordinated social activity, the only task before us is to know what ideals we are to advance and what values we are going to defend. The fulfilment of this task lies in the field of individual effort.

Thus it would appear the fundamental difference between the code of behaviour enjoined by Islam on its votaries and the one enjoined by communism on its followers is one of emphasis with respect to the manner in which man is to reflect his capacity to impose an inner condition on external environment and so influence and shape history. In essential particulars, the ideal of social amelioration is one that Islam shares with communism but then, fundamentally, it is the manner in which this earthly task is regarded by the two of them that goes to distinguish their strategy. Communism has no trans-historic motivation to offer to man: it merely enjoins that man must make history without satisfactorily explaining why he should; Islam on the other hand commands the same ideal to be realised on earth by man but goes on further to provide a trans-historic reference viz. the ultimate relationship which man as a matter of fact does sustain to the Cosmic order of things. According to Islam, man is an agent here-below of the Supreme Power: according to communism, he is a helpless spectator of the "dull rattling of a chain that was forged innumerable years ago. Islam also enjoins that approximation to that higher and ultimate Power is rendered possible only by Man's executive effort to improve the earth. And in fact according to Qur'an the Earth is the inheritance of the Righteous Servants of God, and they are to act as the trustees of that patrimony.

In many ways communism, at least in its earlier historical stages of development, appears to be a reaction to the manner in which the organised institutionalised religion of mankind at the hands of its false professors was being invoked to stultify man's supreme deposits, the mere accretions that have been precipitated by the teachings of the apostles of universal religion. To say that moral values are completely independent of the religious development of mankind and can subsist without recourse to the maintenance of religious sanctions is something which is plainly opposed to the weight of historical evidence.

If the above analysis is correct, it must follow that all human beings, who are capable of choosing one out of several courses of conduct that open out before us whenever we are confronted by the complex situations of life, act consciously or unconsciously on what may be called religious grounds. There would be undoubtedly divergence of opinions as to the content of the religious consciousness ultimately responsible in the life of each one of us for the choices we make, but that, each Man's choice has a transcendental basis is an obvious fact of experience and to argue against it is to be convicted of being absurd.

236. Marxian view of 'Religion' and 'History' examined

When Marx therefore declared war against the institution of religion, his war-aims had nothing to do with the elimination of religion as such: he was attacking what he felt was the kind of religious belief and practice sanctioned by traditional religion. He in fact wanted to establish another official religion, and what he preached in many ways smacked of another sermon from the mount. His battle cry was so formulated that it gave a false appearance to his real mission, at least to those whom he was trying to convert to a new faith—for they all felt that what he was establishing was not a new religion but only getting rid of what was an archaic and useless religion.

So much is this thought central to the whole meaning of author's thesis that he would like to linger a little longer in an attempt to make his point clear; and in defence of what he has suggested, he would like to summon the testimony of that celebrated American Philosopher, Ralph Barton Perry, who in his recent book, "Realms of Value", has this to say:

"Religion in this universal sense will then include cults which, judged by Christian standards, are atheistic. Thus communism is said to be 'godless' and anti-religious, because it rejects Christianity. But in the same breath the critics of communism declare that communism itself is a religion, in that it exalts the proletarian revolution above all other ends, and holds that its success is guaranteed by the law of nature and history. Whether one says that communism is atheistic, or that it has made a god of Economic Force, depends on whether one is thinking in terms of a particular religious belief or in terms of religion in general. The god which communism denies is a particular variety of god, such as the Christian god; the god which it affirms is another variety of the universal god; both gods answer the description of god as cosmic power from the standpoint of what men take to be their paramount god."

"It is clear that esoteric Buddhism as well as Marxian communism recognises no god in the Christian sense. But Buddhism teaches that Nirvana is the supreme god, and that the constitution of things—the law of Karma and the ultimate illusoriness of existence—permits Nirvana to be attained. Buddhism is thus a religion in its conjoining of a hierarchy of value with a cosmology; and it can even be said to have its god, if by 'god' is meant the saving grace of man's total environment."

The foregoing extract, on the basis of pragmatic theory of truth, suggests the reason why the atheism of the communist or Buddhist brand is, in effect, hardly distinguishable from the essentials of a theistic creed. It shows quite clearly that God cannot be dethroned from His sovereign seat of power and authority, and that the choice before Man is not between "God" and "No God", but between God who is worthy of man's worship and reverence and a false god who is a mere projection of his base and crude emotions. Even a thorough-going atheist, if he is logically consistent, has much the same foundation for his attitude to what may be described as the Total Environment as is the case with a religious man. He no doubt rejects the existence of a benevolent creator and denies that man has any right to postulate the existence of a power beyond himself. But even such an atheist has to live by an attitude which must take him beyond the evidence which is available to his senses. He cannot say, for instance, that he has, in reaching that attitude, taken into account all that there is to be considered—say, factors like the mechanism of perception, the nature of reality and the time-process in which the changes are taking place in relation to that reality. Even the ultimate attitude of an atheist thus partakes of the character of that very hypothesis which religious consciousness happens to accept as valid.

The reason why Marx disputed the sovereignty of the traditional concept of religion lies somewhat deeper than is generally supposed. He was anxious by his repudiation of the reality of religious consciousness to rob man of just the one thing that would have helped to him to withstand the onslaught of the forces of regimentation which he was going to unleash and to dispute the authoritarian order of society which he was so anxious to establish. If the dictatorship of the proletariat was at all to be established, man had to be taught to renounce his moral manhood and this time the bargain had to be struck not even as against the cash price of "a mess of pottage". Man had to be taught also that he, as an individual, was an abstraction and that the state was the "Concrete Universal", the higher reality, to serve which, he must give up everything including his right to be free. In order that all these far-reaching lessons could be effectively taught, the entire scale of religious valuation, which had been built up by the labour of our prophets, priests, preachers, the teachers of perennial philosophy and higher poetry had to be denounced as false and misleading. For so long as this teaching stood its ground and claimed attention and loyalty from Man, it was not possible for man to cease to be man and to become a mere superfluous gear in the mechanism of a soulless, irresponsible and authoritarian state.

The all-important choice before the modern world, therefore, is not between theism and atheism but is one which involves momentous issues. Has man the right and the freedom to build a society on the foundation of those values which have been consecrated by the traditional religion or is he to be called upon to surrender that right in order that the forces of mechanistic regimentation and of authoritarian and irresponsible rule by the privileged few should come to prevail?

It is for these reasons that the forces of freedom should be augmented. And the incentive that will inspire men and women to engage themselves in this crusade is no other than the one which is provided by religion. When it is realised that the religious consciousness is the ultimate sanction of morality, and that morality itself takes for its starting point the clash of contending interests and nurses its powers on the freedom to choose in the light of the higher ideals which are sanctioned by traditional religion, men will no longer see the contradiction between the religious way of life and the life of freedom, but would begin to realise that one is sustained by the other, nay, that one without the other is inconceivable.

If we are to pose the question in the Kantian way, "How is freedom possible", and proceed to investigate the ground which may be regarded as the postulate of the continued enjoyment of the gift of freedom, it would be found that this ground takes us to a cosmic view of things—a view, which regards this life as a preparation for a higher and better life which is to follow a heroic discharge of our earthly duties here below.

Everyone of us is committed to promoting some purposes which we regard as being 'valuable': consciously or unconsciously we are dominated by the invisible and the intangible ideals. The communist is afraid to candidly acknowledge their authority because the ideals at the altar of which he actually says his prayers and the Temple of Dialectical materialism in which he makes his sacrifices are not such as can be defended at the plane of reason. And he takes his refuge in the economic interpretation of social reality, by 238. Is there a distinction between secular and religious law?

Enough has been said to point out the nature of the relationship that subsists between morality and religion and it is now necessary to sum up the essential differences between the secular law and the religious law. The religious law claims for itself a source higher than the one upon which the secular law is itself based. Any moral law that can claim to be permanent and absolute, cannot be firmly and finally established by a man who is himself the creature of his age, in the sense that, his thinking and feeling are controlled by such factors as his heredity or what he discovers operating in his environment. Considering that all knowledge is provisional, in the sense that any new experience which cannot be accommodated within the framework of its deliverance must of necessity bring about a revision of the conclusions which had so far been established by those who have been engaged in thinking about life and experience, a necessity arises for accepting the reality of the life of faith—that is, of the way which has been preached by those whose teaching has meant so much to human history. This must have been the thinking behind the views of that greatest of Moslem Philosophers—Imam Al-Ghizali—who in Munqidh Mina't Dalail stated the position on this subject as follows:

"As to those who, professing, by their lips, the faith of the Prophet, place the ordinance of Religion on the same footing as the rules of philosophy—they, in reality repudiate belief in prophecy; for, with them, the Prophet is no more than a wise man, who has been placed by a higher authority as a guide for man. Now this is to ignore the essence of the Prophet's function; true faith in the Prophet implies belief that there exists a sphere above our intelligence and that, to those who are within that sphere, are revealed truth that human intelligence cannot compass—just as the ear cannot perceive things that are perceptible by the eye, as the sense of touch cannot perceive notions of the mind."

If, of course, a given people is satisfied with merely accepting as valid those values which their moral intuitions establish for them as being beyond dispute, it would not be proper, merely on that score, to denounce their social economic and political institutions as being necessarily irreligious or Satanic. It is in the opinion of the present writer not possible to act consistently with our notions of the moral law, unless we read moral law as evidence of the existence of Divine Law. But it is equally true that for conducting the affairs of the State, if the people who compose it happen to agree in discarding the ultimate religious hypothesis and find enough agreement between themselves to promote the general good in the light of the general moral sense of the community, it would be wrong altogether to denounce such a society as being opposed to the purposes which religious consciousness establishes as constituting the proper pursuit of mankind. The present writer therefore does not view the secular democracies of America, France and Britain as being antithetical to the kind of the society which Islam came to establish. His only criticism against them is that they do not carry forward their moral intuitions to the extent to which rationally considered they ought to be carried. It is the religious foundation of Law alone that, by its coherency of construction, can provide to us a complete and satisfactory answer to our political and socio-economic problems. It alone can provide a durable and lasting basis for world peace. It is the conscious obedience to this law that can give to Man a sense of inward fulfilment and make of him a diligent missionary for the cause of humanity.

239. Reasons why people of Pakistan constituted themselves into a State to be known as "Islamic Republic".

The reasons why the majority of the people of Pakistan insisted upon constituting themselves as an Islamic Republic are, therefore, more to be discovered from the pages of their history than from any compelling necessity as to an interpretation of their faith.

Reasons why people of Pakistan constituted themselves into a State to be known as "Islamic Republic"

It would be wrong for the Moslems to believe that the light which was revealed by God through the personality of the Prophet, has remained an exclusive property of the so-called Musalmans and that the rest of the world down these thirteen centuries has been groping in the dark. The correct view of the situation is to say that the light of God's truth has travelled all over the globe (for God is God of the East as well as of the West), and that such progress as humanity has admittedly registered after the last dispensation was announced by the Prophet, has been precisely in the direction in which that dispensation or prophecy hinted that the things would move. In fact, observation shows that it is only the Musalmans who have lagged behind in this general march of humanity. Their beliefs judged by their practices have lost all the attributes of heroic earnestness and creative vigour and on that account they do not lead up to any constructive action. Religion with them has become conventionalised and institutionalised, somewhat like the caste-system of the Hindus. It no longer represents a living ideal: it no longer inspires them to live a life of dedication to the call of their Creator.

And so from Indonesia to Morocco Moslems, by and large, are found to be living individually and collectively a sort of life which is far removed from the one that was commanded to them by their Prophet. No wonder that the sages of yore said prophetically about these awful and Godless times that Islam would be found in the Quran and the Musalmans would be found laid well under their silent graves.

240. A brief historical account of the emergence of the State of Pakistan

We cannot advert in any detail in a study like this, to the recounting of that highly fascinating historical narrative of the circumstances connected with and the factors responsible for the emergence of Pakistan as a State on the map of the World: plainly, such a narrative, if attempted, would appear to be out of place in a study like the present one which is avowedly confined to the limited purpose of merely expounding the juridical and political implications of the Constitution of Pakistan as it exists today. Suffice it to say, however, that the demand for the partition of India was voiced by a significant and appreciable minority of the people of the sub-continent who wanted to realise the full measure of the potentialities of their distinctive culture and who wanted to be left free to establish conditions whereby they could be enabled to order their lives according to the teachings of a religion in which they believed.

And when that demand of theirs was conceded by the departing British Power, they set about improvising a framework of constitutional arrangements within which to fulfil the desire of that community to found a State where the beliefs and teachings of Islam could be freely professed and practised. But the framers of the Constitution, overwhelming majority of whom were Muslims, while they were engaged in this task of giving full effect to that desire, realised only too well, that irrespective of anything else, their religion had enjoined upon them to respect the rights of the minorities and to concede in their favour their right to profess, practise and propagate their religion, and to establish, maintain and manage their religious institutions.

Our Constitution thus reflects this compromise between these two, at several points conflicting, programmes: our Constitution has recognised the values which the Muslim majority community, on the one hand, and the non-Muslim minorities, on the other, could legitimately pursue for the purpose of securing the full development of the potentialities that lie dormant within them, and the framers of our Constitution, within the limits set by the nature of this compromise, have designed institutional devices for accommodating these conflicting goals within the framework of an over-all democratic process. All questions of the conduct of State-policy, of the passing of legislation etc. are matters that have henceforth to be decided by an appeal to the majority-principle, provided, of course, that these decisions do not by themselves run counter to those limitations on State-Power that have been set forth in the Constitution itself.

The basis of the partition of India is reflected in the Statement of June 3, 1947, made by His Majesty's Government. The Statement is sufficiently important, representing as it does, an important land-mark in the history of the transfer of power from the British hands into the hands of the accredited representatives of the major political parties of the day, and is on that account reproduced by the present writer in the Appendix to this Book. A careful study of that document as also of the chief factors in the process leading up to the solution of the Constitutional problem of India which is embodied therein, would disclose what the principle upon which the partition was effected to transfer the power was. The partition itself, it must be remembered, was effected as a result of the determination made by those representatives of the people of India, who did not wish to join the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly of India which had been set up earlier under a State-paper dated May 16, 1946. But the matter is sufficiently important to need a somewhat more elaborate statement than the one that has been attempted so far.

It would be recalled that the Cabinet Mission to India, in their Statement, dated the 16th of May, 1946, (paragraph 11), had examined the idea of the formation of the sovereign State of Pakistan but had come to the conclusion that they found themselves "unable to advise the British Government that the power that at present resides in British hands should be handed over to two entirely sovereign States". But they were careful enough to add that, "This decision does not, however, blind us to the very real Muslim apprehension that their cultural, political and social life might become submerged in a pure unitary India, in which the Hindus with their greatly superior numbers must be a dominating element." (For the text of the Statement please see the Appendix) They then proceeded to make their recommendations as to the improvisation of constitution—making machinery in order to enable the new Constitution to be worked out. (See paragraphs 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21).

The Muslim League representatives did not participate in the work of the Constituent Assembly thus set up under the Cabinet Mission Plan, and so in the 4th paragraph of the Statement of the 3rd June, 1947, His Majesty's Government defined a new approach to the settlement of the Indian constitutional problem. It was stated:

"His Majesty's Government are satisfied that the procedure outlined below embodies the best practicable method of ascertaining the wishes of the people of such areas on the issue where their Constitution is to be framed:

- (a) in the existing Constituent Assembly, or
- (b) In the new and separate Constituent Assembly consisting of the representatives of those areas which decide not to participate in the existing Constituent Assembly."

The rest of the Statement was devoted to giving the details of this practical method of ascertaining the wishes of the people.

This is not the place in which to determine where and with whom in particular the responsibility for the rejection of the Cabinet Mission Plan lay, but it is necessary to remark that the principle upon which the partition was ultimately effected was agreed to by the major political parties of the undivided India. The creation of Pakistan was the offspring of the desire of the representatives of the major political parties to divide the country into two independent sovereign States and the principle adopted, upon which partition was to be effected, was that the contiguous areas having preponderating Muslim population were to form the State of Pakistan and the rest, the State of Independent India.

The minorities in Pakistan as well as the minorities in the Indian Union have therefore to accommodate themselves within the framework of the two new sovereign States and are expected to play an honourable role in the maintenance and establishment of those States. Any attempt to re-open a question that is settled, or any acceptance of the fact of partition with mental reservation would be wrong in principle and would spell disaster. Partition was agreed to because it was considered that that was the only workable solution available to settle the communal problem which had menaced the very possibility of the emergence of Free India—and it would be an irony of fate if that solution instead of finally settling the problem responsible for its improvisation could, by the mere device of generating false reactions towards it, be made by the scheming politicians, a breeding ground for creating two "majority-minority" conflicts in the two States of India and Pakistan.

The Constitution of Pakistan reflects fully the desire on the part of the majority community to admit all the minority communities living within the territory of our State frontiers, to the benefit of a liberal rule, to their due share in the political, economic and social life of the State. The Constitution contains sound and wholesome provisions that guarantee the legitimate rights of the minorities.

In the 27th ART. of the Constitution we have the following directive principle of State policy:

"The State shall safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of the minorities including their due representation in the Federal and Provincial Services."

Thus it would appear the minorities have been admitted to their right as full-fledged citizens of the new State of Pakistan, and they are in turn expected to work for and make a contribution towards the development of the new State.

Our Constitution makes a special provision for securing the adaptation of the Statute Book of our country in order that it be brought in line with the teachings of Islam as they are contained in the Holy Qur'an and the Sunnah. (See Art. 198 of the Constitution) But before these provisions can be commented upon, it is necessary that we should know what the sources of Muslim Law are and how Muslim Law has hitherto been treated by those who applied it merely as a matter of high policy as the personal law of the Muslims of the Indo-Pakistan Sub-continent.

241. Sources of Muslim Law

The Sunnis, says Lord Hobhouse (18 I. A. p. 59: Fuzul Karim v. Haji Mowla Buksh & others) follow the 4 Imams who appear to agree in placing the sources of their law in the following order: (1) Qur'an, (2) The Hadis or tradition handed down from the Prophet, (3) Ijma' or concordance among the followers and (4) Qiyas, or private judgment. We would follow this scheme in stating briefly the nature of each one of these sources.

With regard to the sources of our law, the Qur'an constitutes the most important one of them: but it must be remembered that the Quran was not given to the world as a code but in fragments during the period of about 22 years (from 609 to 632 of the Christian Era) of our Prophet's ministry. It was not collected and arranged during the life-time of our Prophet, but, despite this, its text is authentic. The practice with the Prophet was that the moment a portion of Qur'an was revealed to him he used to order one of his amanuensis to take it down. The verses used to be written on stray leaves of paper, shoulder blades, dead leaves etc. As a rule, the companions of the Prophet used to commit to memory as much of the revealed verses as they were able to remember. The first attempt at collecting the several suras of the Qur'an was made by Abu Bakr but some 16 years had to elapse after this first attempt by Abu Bakr before Uthman the third Caliph of Islam ordered a second collection. This was done precisely 18 years after the death of the Prophet. All the transcripts now existing are from that edition. We have the testimony of Sir William Muir on the subject of the authenticity of Qur'an when he remarks in his "Life of Muhammed" that, "There is probably no other work in the world which has remained twelve centuries with so pure a text."

The Qur'an differs from other codes in regard to its contents and in regard to the form in which those contents are expressed. In the second chapter of the Qur'an we have:

"This is the scripture whereof there is no doubt, a guidance upto those who ward off evil, who believe in the unseen, and establish worship, and spend of that we have bestowed upon them; and who believe in that which is revealed unto thee (Muhammad) and that which was revealed before thee, and are certain of the hereafter."

A very small portion of the text of Quoran has any direct reference to law. It has already been pointed out that Islam is not promulgated in the Qur'an as a new doctrine but as a continuation of the old religion brought by a long line of the Prophets who preceded Muhammad. We have the following in the Qur'an on this point:

"Say (O Muslims): We believed in Allah and that which is revealed unto us and that which was revealed unto Abraham, and Ismael, and Isaac, and Jacob, and Jesus received, and that which the Prophets received from their Lord. We make no distinction between any of them, and unto Him we have surrendered."

It should be remembered that the order in which the verses have been mentioned in the text of the Qur'an, that is in current use, is not chronological and each Sura according to later scholarship has been shown to be confined to the specific situation for which its deliverance was relevant at the time when it was revealed to the Prophet. Qur'an does not abrogate the pre-existing law extant in the Arab Society of the day and, on that score too, it could be alikened to an amending Act rather than a code.

"It is amply evident", says Majid Khaduri in his "War and Peace in the Law of Islam", "to show that Islamic law evolved from Arab customary law and that after the expansion of the Islamic State, Islam absorbed the legal customs and practices of the conquered territories no less than other religious customs had done." (p. 20)

It is undoubtedly true that in many ways, the law of Islam was revolutionary; but all the same there were many elements in the pre-Islamic customary law which were continued, either under the express direction of the Prophet, or at least by reason of the fact that he seemed to have connived at their continuance.

"The reforms introduced by Islam", says Tyabji, in his monumental work on 'Mohammadan Law',

"were such as to bring about a complete transformation of the society of the Arabs. So conscious were the Arabs themselves of this change, that they began to refer to the period before Muhammad as the period of ignorance or rather wildness or savagery, in antithesis to the moral reasonableness of a civilized man It was natural to think with horror of the days of superstition and idolatry, when the widow formed part of the estate of her deceased husband and could be inherited like chattels and goods, and when daughters were buried alive, to distrust all "the precedents of the days of brutal ignorance, and to fear the retention of anything from the old manners and customs, unless there was some living proof that the Prophet of God did not disapprove of it."

2. HADITH

The sayings of the Prophet constitute what is called the ahadith (which literally means that which occurred) and are the evidence of sunnah. They too furnish an important source of the law. This is due to the fact that what the Prophet said or did was itself considered a commentary on what is contained in the Qur'an. The Prophet of God was never weary of emphasizing that he was a man like any other men around him—except, of course, that he was favoured by God in the sense that He sent down His message through him. "I am no more than man", said he, "but when I enjoin anything respecting religion, receive it; and when I order anything about the affairs of world, then I am nothing more than man." And as to the relative authority of the Qur'an and Sunnah he said: "My words are not contrary to the words of God, but the word of God can contradict mine." He further is said to have remarked, "I leave with you the guides which if you follow faithfully you will never go astray, the Qur'an and my practices".

If the authority of the hadith has suffered a set-back it is for the reason that its authenticity cannot be guaranteed to the extent to which one would ordinarily insist upon the rule of conduct to be proved before it could be made a basis for practical guidance. Much of the value of the sayings of the Prophet is ultimately dependent upon the nature of the proof that is made available as to their authenticity. The compilation of some of the traditions of the Prophet is believed to have been done during his life time but many thousands of traditions that have come down to us are those that were orally transmitted by word of mouth by one companion to another, who to his son or his friend and so on, and this process went on for a period of nearly two hundred years before they were finally set down in writing.

It was not until the reign of Umayyads (A. D. 661-750) that the full possibilities of traditions of the Prophet as a source of law were realised. "It proved to be an enormous power in the hands of the authorities to shift the responsibility for any decision and to give it stability by referring to the alleged reports of the practice of the Prophet which could be so easily manufactured". (See Tyabji's Mohammadan Law, p. 10).

President and the Member of the Court of Enquiry, in their report, a document to which reference has already been made, commented on the value of ahadith as a source of law as follows:

"The work of compilation of hadith began in the third century after the Hijra and the Sihah Sitta were all compiled in that century. These are the musannifs of:

- | | |
|-------------------------|-------------------|
| (1) Al-Bukhari , | died 256/870, |
| (2) Muslim , | died 261/875, |
| (3) Abu Dawud , | died 275/888, |
| (4) Al-Tirmizi , | died 279/892, |
| (5) All Nisa'i , | died 203/915, and |
| (6) Ibn-i-Maja , | died 273/886. |

"According to modern laws of evidence, including our own, the ahadith are inadmissible evidence of Sunnah because each of them contains several links of hearsay, but as authority on law they are admissible pro prio vigore. The merit of these collections lies not so much in the fact that (as is often wrongly stated) their authors decided for the first time which of the numerous traditions in circulation were genuine and which false but rather in the fact that they brought together everything that was recognised as genuine in orthodox circles in those days.

"The Shias judge hadith from their own stand-point and only consider such traditions reliable as are based on the authority of Ali and his adherents. They have, therefore, their own works on the subject and hold the following five works particularly in high esteem—

- (1) Al-Kafi of Muhammad b. Yaqub Al-Kulini, died 328/939,
- (2) Man La Yastahdiruhu'l-Fakih of Muhammad b. Ali b. Babuya Al-Kummi, died 381/991,
- (3) Tahdid Al-Ahkam and
- (4) Al-Istibsar Fi-Ma'khalafat Fihi'l-Akhbar, (Extract from the preceding) of Muhammad Altusi, died 459/1067,
- (5) Nahj Al-Balaghah (alleged sayings of Ali) of Ali b. Tahir Al-Sharif Al-Murtaza, died 436/1044 (or of his brother Radi Al-Din Al-Baghda).

"After the ritual, the dogma and the most important political and social institutions had taken definite shape in the second and third centuries, there arose a certain communis opinio regarding the reliability of most transmitters of tradition and the value of their statement. The main principles of doctrine had already been established in the writings of Malik b. Anas, Al-Shafi'i and other scholars regarded as authoritative in different circles and mainly on the traditional sayings of the Holy Prophet. In the long run no one dared to doubt the truth of these traditions and this almost conclusive presumption of truth had since continued to be attached to the ahadith compiled in the Sihah Sittah." (p. 207)

3. IJMA'

We may next consider the third source of our law namely Ijma', which may be translated as consensus and may be defined as the rule governing the Muslim law which results from the agreement of jurists among the followers of Muhammad in a particular age on a question of law. This source of our law was recognised during the golden age of the development of Muslim jurisprudence—that is, during the Abbaside Caliphs of Baghdad regime extending from 750 to 1258 A.D. Some of the greatest Imams who have influenced the growth of law lived and flourished during the period. Some of these were:

- (1) Jafar Sadiq (A.H. 80-148 (699-765))
- (2) Abu Hanifa, (A.H. 80-150 (699-767))
- (3) Malik Ibn Anas, (A.H. 95-175 (713-795))
- (4) Shafii (A.H. 150-204 (767-814))
- (5) Ibn Hambal (A.H. 164-241 (780-855))

With the expansion of the Moslem world and the complexities of social life brought in by a growing civilization, these Muslim jurists had to face the problem of adapting law to the changing conditions of their time. It was realised by these jurists that this method of evolving law through consensus of the companions could not be indiscriminately exploited but that it was to be of limited application, and with this end in view, these jurists laid down rules as to the classes of matters on which Ijma' may be effective, the persons whose opinions are to be authoritative, the course that had to be followed where there is conflict of authorities etc. The theory of the Ijma' was that the learned men of the Community had the authority delegated to them to lay down the rules of conduct by the exercise of their Ijtihad.

"The laws so laid down", says Abdur Rahim in his 'Muhammadan Jurisprudence', "are presumed to be what God intended and are thus covered by the definition of law as a communication from God. This source of law is called Ijma or consensus of opinion (p. 53).

Each one of the Mujtahids must be well read in the Quran and the Hadith and must have led a life of piety before he can take his place in the body of learned men whose consensus of opinion might be regarded as a source of law. There were some of course who felt that in accepting Ijma' as the source of law they were running a great risk in throwing open flood gates of indiscriminate law-making and this was particularly true of those who entertained the opinion that everything required by man on this earth had been provided for in the Quran and the Sunnah. They did not think it possible to trust the unfettered reason of the jurist to frame a rule of conduct or to discover one which can have the claim to being considered as a law in the real sense of the term.

4. QIYAS

Lastly we might notice the fourth source of law called Qiyas which in English may be rendered as 'reasoning by analogy' from what is contained in the Quran, Sunnah and Ijma'. This method of juristic deduction was first evolved and applied by Imam Abu Hanifa; detailed rules governing the process of juristic deductions were evolved by him and a study of these rules tends to show the great care with which he limited the application of this source of law-making in the matter of answering questions of practical difficulty that arise in the settlement of legal disputes.

In conclusion we might notice an argument which is often asserted in support of the contention that Ijma' as known to the Muslim jurist cannot be identified with what is called legislation in the sense in which the term is used to-day. The argument may be stated in the words of the authors of the Report of the Court of Enquiry:

"Since Islam is a perfect religion containing laws, express or derivable by Ijma' or Ijtihad, governing the whole field of human activity, there is in it no sanction for what may, in the modern sense, be called legislation. Questioned on this point Maulana Abul Hasanat, President, Jami'at-ul-Ulama-i-Pakistan, says:

Q. Is the institution of legislatures as distinguished from the institution of a person or body of persons entrusted with the interpretation of law, an integral part of an Islamic State?

A. No. Our law is complete and merely requires interpretation by those who are experts in it. According to my belief no question can arise the law relating to which cannot be discovered from the Qur'an or the Hadith.

Q. Who were Sahib-ul-hall-i-wal-aqd?

A. They were the distinguished ulama of the time. These persons attained their status by reason of the knowledge of the law. They were not in any way analogous or similar to the legislature in modern democracy.

"The same view was expressed by Amir-i-Shari'at Sayyed Ata-ullah Shah Bukhari, in one of his speeches reported in the Azad of 22nd April, 1947, in the course of which he said that our deen is complete and perfect and that it amounts to kufr to make more laws. Maulana Abul Aala Maudoodi, however, is of the opinion that legislation in the true sense is possible in an Islamic State on matters which are not covered by the Quran, the Sunnah, or previous Ijma' and he has attempted to explain his point by reference to the institution of a body of persons whom the Holy Prophet, and after him the Khulafa, consulted on all matters relating to affairs of State. The question is one of some difficulty and great importance because any institution of legislature will have to be reconciled with the claim put forward by Maulana Abul Hasanat and some other religious divines that Islam is a perfect and exhaustive code wide enough to furnish an answer to any question that may arise relating to any human activity and that it does not know of any 'unoccupied field' to be filled by fresh legislation. There is no doubt that Islam enjoins consultation, and that not only the Holy Prophet but also the first four Caliphs and even their successors, resorted to consultation with the leading men of the time, who for their knowledge of the law and piety could well be relied upon. In the inquiry not much has been disclosed about the Majlis-i-Shura except what is contained in Maulana Abul Aala Maudoodi's written statement which he supplied to the Court at its request. That there was a body of men who were consulted is true, but whether this was a standing body and whether its advice had any legal or binding force, seems somewhat doubtful. These men were certainly not elected in the modern way, though their representative character cannot be disputed. Their advice was certainly asked ad hoc, but that they were competent to make law as the modern legislatures make laws is certainly not correct. The decisions taken by them undoubtedly served as precedents and were in the nature of Ijma', which is not legislation but the application of an existing law to a particular case. When consulted in affairs of State, their functions were truly in the nature of an advice given by a modern cabinet but such advice is not law but only a decision.

"Nor can the legislature in a modern State correspond to Ijma' because, as we have already pointed out, the legislature legislates while the Ulama of Majlis-i-Shura who were called upon to determine what should be the decision on a particular point which was not covered by the Quran and the Sunnah, merely sought to discover and apply the law and not to promulgate the law, though the decision when taken had to be taken not only for the purposes of the particular case but for subsequent occasions as a binding precedent." (p. 211-212)

242. The application of Muslim Law in British India

The law that was applied by the British Indian courts was not Muslim Law stricto sensu but was, what may be characterised as, a cross-breed, a hybrid, resulting from the interaction of the Principles of Muslim Law with the rules of Muslim Law as these were adopted and applied by the British Indian courts pursuant to the powers conferred on them by several legislative enactments defining their powers and jurisdiction to apply Muslim law in the determination of controversies before them. In order to understand more fully the emergence of this body of law known as "the Anglo-Muhammadan Law", it is necessary to trace at least a bold outline of the history of the development of that law from the days of the East India Company down to the present day. We have already referred, in another context, to the kind of the courts that had been established under the system of administration of justice that was improvised by Warren Hastings before the establishment of the Supreme Court that came to be constituted under the provisions of the Regulating Act of 1773. By Section 27 of the Regulation 2 of 1772 it had been enacted "That in all suits regarding inheritance, succession, marriage and caste and other religious usages or institutions the laws of Qur'an with respect to Muhammadans, and those of the Shastra with respect to gentoos (Hindus) shall be invariably adhered to." The Muhammadan Law Officers used to be attached to the courts that administered justice and they advised the presiding officers of the courts as to the rule of Muslim law that would be applicable to the facts of a given case before them. In the matter of administration of criminal justice, the law of the Shari'at was invariably applied irrespective of the religion of the offenders, and it was only as late as 1790 that this jurisdiction was greatly anglicised. But despite this, the Muhammadan element in the substantive law regulating criminal proceedings continued to be decisive until it was superseded by the Penal Code which was enacted in 1862 and its Rules of Evidence until 1872, when the Indian Evidence Act was passed. The Supreme Court that was established at Calcutta, as has been pointed out earlier, under the Act of Parliament (Regulating Act of 1773) had the power:

- (a) to exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction over all persons in Calcutta, and
- (b) to exercise civil jurisdiction over all persons in the service of the East India Company throughout its newly acquired territory.

There was, however, very little information contained in the Royal Charter constituting the Supreme Court at Calcutta with regard to the law that was to be applied by the judges who were appointed by the Crown in England. Following the theory which prevailed during the colonial days with English settlers elsewhere, the judges applied English common and statute law as it was in force in the mother country in so far as it was deemed appropriate and applicable to the new circumstances. And the limits within which this principle is applicable were stated in the case of Freeman v. Fairlie, 1 Moore's Indian Appeal page 306 of the year 1828. The case gives an enunciation of the principles that regulate the application of the law which a settler is deemed to carry with him when he lands in a newly discovered territory: it also draws a distinction between the extent of the operation of the laws that he thus carries with him as applied to a territory he discovers, as opposed to the case of a territory where there pre-exists and prevails a lex loci. The case also provides an interesting study of the gradual manner in which the English law, within the limits stated by the Privy Council, came to be applied under the mandate of earlier enactments and Charters that were applicable during the early days of the East India Company's rule. The following passages culled from that scholarly judgment of the Privy Council are no substitute for a careful study of the entire judgment.

"The first question", observed the Privy Council "that naturally suggests itself, on these opinions, is how, and when, the English law was generally introduced. The learned Judges all refer its introduction, for the Government of British subjects, to the Charter of 1774, and former charters, without further explanation, which would lead to the notion, that the English law, introduced by different portions, since the introduction of the whole code, is obviously an act, not susceptible of iteration, and therefore, must have been done, if at all, in that way, by a single charter, not by several; and in that case, it would be material, to ascertain by which of the number, the English law had been introduced, because from its date, subsequent Acts of Parliament would have no effect, without an express extension of their enactments to India; but on referring to printed copies of the charters granted to the East India Company, from the year 1601 to the charter of 26th March 1774, inclusively, and particularly examining the same, from the charter of September 24, 1726, inclusively, being the charter which provided for the administration of justice, in the Company's settlements, by establishing a Court, called the Mayor's Court; I find, in none of them, any express introduction of English law, but on the contrary, they seem all to have proceeded on the assumption, that English law was already in force in those settlements, and their provisions, are directed chiefly to the establishing competent judicial authorities, and rules of proceeding, by which the existing law, may be better administered, specifically ordaining therein, many departures from the practice of the Courts in England, and in other cases, referring generally to the jurisdiction and authority, and forms of proceedings, of those Courts and their officers, as what the new Indian Courts and officers were to conform to, as nearly as local circumstances would permit." (pp. 320-321)

After surveying the various Charters the Privy Council observed: (at pp. 322-323)

"I must conclude, therefore, that English law was not, as the learned Judges have supposed, brought in by the charters; nevertheless, that the law of England, subject to the exceptions in question, and to others introduced by the charters, ought in general to be, and practically is, the law by which British subjects are governed, and their rights determined, within the territories of the East India Company, in Bengal, is agreed on all hands, and has been virtually recognized by Parliament, not merely by Acts which authorised, and have confirmed the charters, but by an enactment in the statute, 21 Geo. III, c. 70 Ss. 17 and 19, the intent of which, cannot otherwise be explained. By that statute, entitled, 'An Act to explain and amend so much of an Act, made in the 13th year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled an Act for establishing certain regulations for the better management of the affairs of the East India Company, as well in India as in Europe, as relates to the administration of justice in Bengal,' etc., it is enacted, 'that the said Supreme Court shall have full power and authority to hear and determine, in such manner as is provided for that purpose by the said charter of 1774, all actions and suits against all the singular inhabitants of the city of Calcutta, provided that the inheritance and succession to lands, rents, and goods, and all matters of contracts, and dealing between party and party, shall be determined in the case of Mahomedans, by the laws and usages of Mahomedans, and in the case of Gentoos, by the laws and usages of Gentoos; and where only one of the parties shall be a Mahomedan or Gento, by the law and usages of the defendant.' And it is thereby further enacted, 'That it shall be lawful for the said Supreme Court to frame such process, and make such rules and orders for the execution thereof, in suits, civil and criminal, against the natives of Bengal, Bihar, and Orissa, as may accommodate the same to the religion and manners of such natives, so far as the same may consist with the due execution of the laws and attainment of justice.' Though it is not here declared by what law the same questions shall be governed and determined, when the parties, inhabitants, are neither Mahomedans nor Gentoos, it seems plainly implied, that the legislature had some other laws and usages in view, which were applicable, and should be applied, to the cases of British subjects, and others inhabiting there; and these could be no other than the laws of England, modified by force of the charters, or other local institutions."

Having reviewed the relevant provisions of the earlier legislative enactments, the Privy Council proceeded to deal with the difficulty of:

"How to reconcile the general introduction and authority of English law with the power of executors and administrators to sell the lands and tenements of their testators or in testate, and, with such property, being assets, for the satisfaction of debts, of every degree, in their hands."

That is, in other words, to answer the question: From what legitimate source were such particular departures, from one general law of real property, actually derived? And in relation to this question they proceeded to observe: (at pp. 323—325)

"It appears to me, that a satisfactory solution of this difficulty may be found by referring the introduction of English law, in the East India Company's settlement in Bengal, to what I conceive to have been its real period, and its true source, and by ascribing to it such modifications as naturally arose from the peculiar circumstances of the case. The general rules, as to the law of countries newly settled, by British subjects, or acquired by the British Crown, are not fully adverted to by the learned Judges whose opinions are in evidence before me, and not, I conceive, accurately applied by them to the case of our Indian settlements. It is true, as remarked by Sir Anthony Buller, that if a new country is discovered and settled by British subjects, they carry with them the English law, but with this modification, unnoticed by the learned Judge, that is, so far as that law is applicable to their local circumstances. India, however, is not, in the sense of authorities by which the rule has been laid down, a new-discovered country; and, with respect to colonies or settlements, acquired by cession or conquest, within the description our Indian territories are, the rule is different, the laws of the place, in such cases, remaining in force till changed by royal or parliamentary authority. But there is an anomaly in the case of the settlements in question, which made it difficult or impossible, as I conceive, practically to apply there the latter rule, to its full extent, and took the case out of the principles on which both those rules were founded. I apprehend the true general distinction to be, in effect, between countries in which there are not, and countries in which there are, at the time of their acquisition, any existing civil institutions and laws, it being, in the first of those cases, matter of necessity that the British settlers should use their native laws, as having no others to resort to; whereas, in the other case, there is an established lex loci, when it might be highly inconvenient all at once to abrogate; and, therefore, it remains till changed by the deliberate wisdom of the new legislative power. In the former case, also, there are not, but in the latter case there are, new subjects to be governed, ignorant of the English laws, and unprepared, perhaps, in civil and political character, to receive them. The reason why the rules are laid down in books of authority, with reference to the distinction between new-discovered countries, on the one hand, and ceded or conquered countries, on the other, may be found, I conceive, in the fact, that this distinction had always, or almost always, practically corresponded with that, between the absence and the existence of a lex loci, by which the British settlers might, without inconvenience, for a time, be governed; for the powers from whom we have wrested colonies by conquest, or had obtained them by treaties of cession, had ordinarily, if not always, been civilized and Christian States, whose institutions, therefore, were not wholly dissimilar to our own. But, in the settlements formed by the East India Company in Bengal, the case was very different, and one to which neither of the rules referred to could possibly have an entire application. The acquired territory was not newly discovered or inhabited, but well peopled, and by a civilised race, governed by long-established laws, to which they were much attached, and which it would have been highly inconvenient and dangerous imme-

ately to change. On the other hand, those laws were so interwoven with, and dependant on, their religious institutions, as Mahomedans or Pagans, that a great part of them could not possibly be applied to the Government of a Christian people. Besides, there was, as appears from the Act of Parliament last mentioned, no uniform lex loci to regulate inheritance, successions, and other important subjects of legislation. But the two great classes of native inhabitants, Mahomedans and Gentoos, were governed, in such matter, by different laws, derived from their respective religious institutions. Some new course was to be taken in this peculiar case; and the course actually taken seems to have been, to treat the case, in a great measure, like that of a new-discovered country, for the government of the Company's servants, and other British or Christian settlers using the laws of the mother country, as far as they were capable of being applied for that purpose, and leaving the Mahomedan and Gentoo inhabitants to their own laws and customs, but with some particular exceptions that were called for by commercial policy, or the convenience of mutual intercourse, and between the British settler and the natives, and which are found quite reconcilable with differences of religious faith: such, for instance, as leaving the interest of money unlimited by law. It seems highly probable that the same general adherence to English law, and the same partial adoption of the existing laws and customs of the country, were applied to immovable property, when acquired by British subjects, and produced the seemingly incongruous practice for which the Judges, at a period remote from its first introduction, have found it so difficult to account on legal grounds. If it be supposed that lands and tenements in Bengal, whether held by Mahomedans or Gentoos, were liable to be sold, in the owner's lifetime, by legal process, for his debts, and were liable as general assets, after his death, in the hands of those who had the administration of his personal estate for the satisfaction of his debts, of every degree, and might be sold by them for that purpose; it will be obvious that these were parts of the law of the country which, there were strong reasons of commercial policy and convenience, and even justice, for adopting, in regard to the same species of property, when in the hands of British subjects."

The minor Presidency like that of Madras was not free from the confusion which prevailed in the matter of conflict of laws of the kind that prevailed in the Presidency of Bengal for the legislation applicable to it was modelled very much along lines of legislation that was in force in Bengal. In the Presidency of Bombay, however, the legal development was somewhat different and this had a great deal to do with the fact that the immediate precursor of the British power in that part of western India was not, as remarked by Wilson, a de facto Muhammedan Government but a Hindu Government with the result that the advent of the British law did not have to reckon with the Muhammedan law, civil or criminal, as being a part of the general territorial law of the territories that were acquired by them in 1818. Besides, in the Regulation of 1827 which was the first of the enactments made applicable to that part of India, there was a provision which was somewhat differently worded than the parallel provision that had prevailed in the Presidency of Bengal or Madras with regard to the law to be observed by the courts in the decisions of cases: This provision was :

The law to be observed in the trial of suits shall be, Acts of Parliament and Regulations of Government applicable to the case; in the absence of such Acts and Regulations, the usage of the country in which the suit arose; if none such appears the law of the defendant, and in the absence of specific law and usage, justice, equity and good conscience alone."

It would be apparent that this formulation does not contain any specific enumeration of the particular matters with reference to which personal law was to be the rule of decision. The law of the defendant which had to be the rule of the decision, be it noticed, was to be applicable subject to the important condition that it was to be available, whatever may be the nature of the controversy, only upon failure to prove the usage of the country in which the suit arose. It was this relative primacy of the local usage over the personal law which led up to those controversies that had reference to the legal status of the members of a number of communities like the Khojas, Memons, Kachhis etc: For although they were, broadly speaking, Musalmans, they had, by reason of the operation of some established usages which they could prove, been deemed to be exempted from the operation of the rules of Muslim Law. A student interested in pursuing his studies further to understand the development of law on this subject would be well advised to read the cases decided by the Bombay High Court and the Privy Council like—

1. Advocate-General of Bombay, ex relatione Daya Muhammad vs. Muhammad Husen Huseni (1866) 12 Bombay High Court Reports, 323;
2. In re Kasam Pirhai, (1871) 8 Bombay High Court Reports (Cr. Cas.) 95;
3. Mahomed Sidick v. Haji Ahmed, (1885) 10 Bom. 1;
4. Rashid Karmali v. Sherbanoo, (1904) 29 Bombay 85;
5. Rashid Karmali v. Sherbanoo, (1907) 31 Bombay 264;
6. Cassamally Jairajbhai v. Sir Currimbhoy Ebrahim, (1911) 36 Bombay 214 at 260-61;
7. Jan Mahomed v. Datu Jaffer, (1918) 38 Bombay 449;
8. Abdurahim Haji Ismail Mithu v. Halimabai, (1915) 43 I. A 35 and
9. Advocate General of Bombay v. Jimbabai, (1915) 41 Bombay 181.

Specific legislation had therefore to be passed in order to restore to these denominations of the Muslim communities of India, the legal status necessary to attract the rules of Muslim Law.

The position in the Punjab.

The legal position in the Punjab in relation the application of Muslim Law, after it came under the British rule in 1849, was influenced by the peculiar facts of the previous political history of the province. For nearly half a century, previous to the advent of the British power in that province, nearly three million of Hindus and Muhammadans had been held under a system of tyrannous subjection and fealty by half a million or so of the Sikhs who had by then, from a pacifist religious order, become a nation of militant aggressors and unscrupulous warriors. The first tentative solution as to the application of personal law to the subjects was embodied in the compilation known as the Punjab Civil Code which though drafted initially with the intention of its being enacted as the law for the Province of Punjab continued to have the status analogous to the one which could be accorded to a manual of instructions to be used by the courts. In Section III of that Code it was provided as follows:—

- (1) The Hindu and Muhammadan Codes, and the Lex Loci, or local custom, or other system of law obeyed by any tribe or sect, may be followed in all matters of civil right and social importance which are not opposed to morality, public policy, or positive law, and which may not have been provided for by any specific rule.
- (2) Those who belong to the Sikh persuasion are, in civil and secular affairs, generally bound by the Hindu Law.
- (3) If the parties to a suit belong to different sects or different tribes, and if the law which they respectively observe should be conflicting with regard to the point in dispute, then the judge, having considered the bearings of both laws on the particular case, will decide according to equity and reason.
- (4) In any of the matters described in the first clause of this section the judge may place a definite issue before persons learned in the native law, and file their written opinions with the record. But, if possible, the judge will also consult authorities, and form his own opinion. If the case should have been decided by arbitrators, the Court will observe whether their award is in accordance with law and custom.

- (5) Whenever it may appear that the Hindu, Muhammadan, or other law has been in any district superseded by local usage, and that both parties would rather be governed by custom than by law, the Court may ascertain the custom from competent and experienced persons, and decide according to it.
- (6) If one party should elect that the suit be decided by custom and the other by law, the Court will determine whether, in the particular case, the law or the custom has the most authority.
- (7) The laws and customs, as above described, should especially be observed in matters relating to inheritance, special property of females, marriage, divorce special property of females, marriage, divorce and adultery, adoption, wills, legacies, gifts and partitions. On the other hand, there are many matters in which their observance should be avoided, such as the prohibition of interest; civil disabilities on account of caste, religion, sex, disease, and other disqualifications not allowed under British rule; rights connected with slavery, forfeiture of property, by reason of conversion to a religion other than that in which the party may have been brought up; various periods of minority; absence of any law for the limitation of suits, trial by ordeal, etc."

It was not until 1872 that some parts of this law were given legislative recognition and it was not until 1878 that any comprehensive legislation was passed defining the legal position in relation to the application of the customary law on personal matters. The matters affecting personal law were mentioned in some detail but taken in their totality these did not amount to much. The difference between the law as administered in Bengal and Punjab in regard to the subject of personal law has been stated by Wilson in his Anglo-Muhammadan Law (as revised and brought up to date by Yusuf Ali) as follows:—

"The really important difference is that whereas the Bengal Regulations, now represented by S. 37 of Act XII of 1887 took no notice at all of custom, and merely referred the judges to 'justice, equity, and good conscience' in cases not otherwise provided for, the Punjab Act directs the Court to inquire, in the first place, whether there is any custom applicable to the parties concerned, and governing the matter in question, and assigns only the second place to Hindu or Muhammadan Law."

It was not till little after the creation of Pakistan that the Government of the Province of West Punjab passed laws bringing about a change in the law relating to the application of Muslim Law. (See Acts of Provincial Legislature of Punjab of the years 1947-52).

Conclusion

We have set-forth the principal factors that were responsible for the growth of that body of law which is known as the Anglo-Muhammadan Law. The principles of Muhammadan Law were applied by the Judges of the Pre-Partition phase of Indian History, keeping in view their notions of equity, good conscience and public policy, on the one hand, and the rules of Muslim Law proper as they could be gleaned from the writings of the old commentators of our law, on the other. Anglo-Muhammadan Law is thus a 'cross-breed', a compromise and represents but a half-way house between the forces of progress and conservatism. Here and there the legislature intervened to pass declaratory Acts to rescue some of the principles of our law from being suppressed under the dead weight of dusty and false precedents; but on the whole, the bulk of those distortions that our law has had to be involved into remains, till today, the major part of that body of the Anglo-Muhammadan Law which must be presumed to have been continued into force and effect by virtue of the provisions contained in ART. 224 of our Constitution—which article as has been remarked earlier has continued "save as is otherwise expressly provided in the Constitution" the pre-existing law "so far as applicable and with necessary modifications", until it is altered, repealed or amended by the appropriate Legislature or other competent authority. The only redeeming feature of the change brought in by our Constitution in the matter of securing the progressive Islamisation of our Society and law are those provisions that deal with (a) the establishment of an organisation for Islamic research and instruction in advanced studies to assist in the reconstruction of Muslim Society on a truly Islamic basis and (b) provide for the setting up of a Commission to make recommendations for bringing existing law into conformity with the Injunctions of Islam. These provisions are contained in ARTs. 197 and 198, and we are now in a position to set forth the essentials of the programme of securing the overall adjustment of the corpus juris of Pakistan within the frame-work of what might be termed as "The Pure Muslim Law".

243. Analysis of ARTs. 197 & 198.

Articles 197 and 198 are contained in Chapter 1 entitled Islamic Provisions in Part XII of our Constitution. These Articles are important and merit a careful examination.

ART. 197 merely requires the President to set up an organization for Islamic research and instruction in advanced studies to assist in the reconstruction of Muslim society on a truly Islamic basis. The expenses to be incurred for the purpose are to be met with by way of raising a special tax to be imposed upon the Muslims by means of an Act of Parliament. This fund will be a separate one and would not form part of the Federal Consolidated Fund.

ART. 198 enacts (a) that no law shall be enacted which is repugnant to the Injunctions of Islam as laid down in the Holy Qur'an and Sunnah, and further (b) that existing laws shall be brought into conformity with such Injunctions. Thus, in substance, there is emphasis on a two-fold requirement: (1) a general prohibition upon law-making organs of the State to the effect that they should not enact laws which are repugnant to the Injunctions of Islam, and (2) the demand that the existing laws are to be brought into conformity with the Injunctions of Islam. Obviously this is a duty cast upon the executive.

The second clause of ART. 198 is important; it enjoins: Effect shall be given to the requirements stated above only in the manner indicated in the third clause of the Article—a clause which enjoins upon the President to appoint a Commission to accomplish a two-fold purpose: (a) "to make recommendations as to the measures for bringing existing law into conformity with the Injunctions of Islam, and as to the stages by which such measures should be brought into effect", and (b) "to compile in a suitable form, for the guidance of the National and Provincial Assemblies, such Injunctions of Islam as can be given legislative effect." In other words, the requirement of clause (1) of ART. 198 is limited by way of its implementation to the method prescribed in the third clause: negatively, the requirement of the Constitution, namely that no law be enacted which will be repugnant to the teachings of Islam and that the existing laws will be brought into conformity with those Injunctions, is not capable of being enforced by a court of law. Legislation passed in contravention of this requirement of the Constitution cannot be successfully challenged in a court of law, nor again can a writ of mandamus lie to compel the executive or the legislature to bring existing law in conformity with the Injunctions of Islam.

There are some significant features of this Article that should be carefully borne in mind.

- (a) The President appoints the Commission but the number of the members of the Commission not having been mentioned in the Article itself, becomes a matter upon which the Government of the day is to have a final say. Even a 'one-man-Commission' is possible.

- (b) The report that the Commission will submit is to be laid before the National Assembly "within six months of its receipt", and the Assembly after considering the report "shall enact laws in respect thereof". The language employed seems to suggest that the Assembly is bound to give legislative effect to the report of the Commission. But since all legislative measures must have the support of the majority of the members in the House, what would be the result if the requisite majority support is not forthcoming in respect of either the whole or a part of the recommendations contained in the report of the Commission? It is obvious that no mandamus can lie to compel the Assembly to enact the law. All decisions which the Assembly in the matter of law-making takes, have to be taken by a majority vote of the members present and voting. (See ARTs. 55(1)(b) and 88(1)(b)). The mandamus to the Legislature, in the first instance, cannot lie even as a matter of common law rule relating to that jurisdiction, and, in the second instance, since it is really the members of the National Assembly who have to vote, the exercise of this right to vote cannot, at least in principle, be commanded by a mandamus. What then would be the consequence of the failure or refusal of the National Assembly to enact laws in terms of the report of the Commission? Besides the expression "The National Assembly after considering the report shall enact laws in respect thereof" does not convey any sense for the simple reason that the requirement of the laws being passed "in respect of the report" is a somewhat dubious and fanciful one.
- (c) The personal law of the non-Muslim citizens or their status as citizens cannot be interfered with by the Legislature professing to act in obedience to the duty cast upon it "of considering the report of the Commission and of enacting law in respect thereof", nor again, can any provisions of the Constitution be affected under the professed exercise of power to give legislative effect to the recommendations of the Commission. We know that the Constitution requires that the members should freely vote in the Legislature and only in respect of measures that receive the majority vote of members present at the time of voting that they become the laws under the Constitution. These are the requirements of the Constitution. It is difficult to discover any sense in the mandate contained in the third clause of ART. 198, namely, that the Assembly after considering the report shall enact laws in respect thereof, for in that case the compulsion that they accept the recommendations of the Commission would virtually tantamount to denying them their right to exercise their constitutional right to vote freely either for or against a proposed legislative measure. Clause 4 of Art. 198 preserves the over-riding effect of other provisions of the Constitution.
- (d) The explanation to the Article says, "In the application of this Article to the personal law of any Muslim sect, the expression Qur'an and Sunnah shall mean the Qur'an and Sunnah as interpreted by that sect." It is difficult to apply this explanation to the situation presented to us by the principle of ART. 198. It is a matter of common knowledge that there are many sects within the fold of Muslim Community itself who offer conflicting interpretations of Qur'an and Sunnah upon important questions of law. Is it suggested that at the time of enacting laws there are bound to be different provisions in respect of different sects—particularly in those cases where legislative effect of the provisions of Qur'an and Sunnah bears upon the diverse interpretations bestowed upon them by various sects. Students of Muslim Law know that there are fundamental differences between the various Schools of juristic thought: there are the Hanafi, the Malaki, the Shafa'i and the Hambali Schools of the Sunnis' thought as also there is the Shia School of jurisprudence. Is it the requirement of the Constitution that each one of these Schools of Muslim Law will contend for legislative recognition of their mode of interpreting the Qur'an and Sunnah in respect of the application of the principle of this Article to the specific Injunctions that according to the recommendations of the Commission are to be given legislative effect?

Besides, should there be a failure to give due effect to the requirement of the explanation would it be possible by means of appropriate proceedings to raise this question before a court of law with a view to obtaining an adjudication upon the controversy relating to the constitutionality of a certain legislative provision (which may have been enacted in consequence of the recommendations of the Commission) being contrary to the interpretation bestowed on the text of the Qur'an or the provisions of the Sunnah?

These questions do raise numerous difficulties for the solution of which no provision has been made in the Constitution. On the whole, it would appear that ART. 198 is so much hedged in by limitations and qualifications that hardly any substantial progress in the direction of securing adjustment of existing law and making it conform to the Injunctions of Islam would be attained within the foreseeable future.

- (e) How are the expenses required for the purpose of setting up this Commission to be met with? Is it the requirement of the Constitution that for the purpose of implementing the mandate of this Article a special tax be imposed upon the Muslim citizens of this State? If so, why has this not been clearly laid down in the Constitution as has been done, for instance, in the case of organization required to be set up under ART. 197? The Constitution requires in its 21st Article that "No person shall be compelled to pay any special tax the proceeds of which are to be spent on the propagation or maintenance of any religion other than his own." Would not the non-Muslim citizens be entitled to complain that since ART. 198 is directed to ensuring the conformity of laws with the teachings of Islam, it is virtually an attempt at the propagation or maintenance of that religion and therefore this should be done by means of a special tax and not by means of securing appropriation from the Consolidated Fund?

Conclusion

As a summing up of the general effect of what the provisions contained in Articles 197-198 come to, the author can do no better than to quote from a recent study, made by a jurist of repute, of the Constitution of our Country. After explaining that any teeth that the stipulation of ART. 198(1) may have, would seem to be promptly drawn by the succeeding paragraphs of that Article, Mr. McWhinney goes on to point out:

"This is a far cry indeed from the original proposal of Moslem religious leaders that a Commission of Holy Men, learned in the Quoran and the Sunnah, should have power to pass on all laws enacted by the legislative and to determine their validity in accordance with their conformity or non-conformity to the Quoran and Sunnah. Lacking any enforcement agency other than the predominantly lay-educated supreme court, these Moslem Fundamental Provisions seem likely to reduce to pious injunctions of purely moral significance, for individual members of government to interpret according to their consciences. (p. 149, Judicial Review in the English Speaking World—Toronto Press.)"

244. A comment on the Socio-Economic State Policy

The Preamble to our Constitution lays emphasis on the securing for the people of Pakistan of the social, economic and political justice, as also upon the paramount necessity of safeguarding the legitimate interests of minorities and the backward and depressed classes. ARTs. 28 and 29 contain the following directives of the State-policy:

"28.—The State shall endeavour to—

- (a) promote, with special care, the educational and economic interests of the people of the Special Areas, the Backward Classes and the Scheduled Castes;
- (b) remove illiteracy, and provide free and compulsory primary education within the minimum possible period;
- (c) make provision for securing just and humane conditions of work, ensuring that children and women are not employed in avocations unsuited to their age and sex, and for maternity benefits for women in employment;
- (d) enable the people of different areas, through education, training and industrial development, to participate fully in all forms of national activities, including employment in the service of Pakistan;
- (e) prevent prostitution, gambling and the taking of injurious drugs; and
- (f) prevent the consumption of alcoholic liquor otherwise than for medicinal and, in the case of non-Muslims, religious purposes.

"29. The State shall endeavour to—

- (a) secure the well-being of the people, irrespective of caste, creed, or race, by raising the standard of living of the common man, by preventing the concentration of wealth and means of production and distribution in the hands of a few to the detriment of the interest of the common man, and by ensuring equitable adjustment of rights between employers and employees, and landlords and tenants;
- (b) provide for all citizens, within the available resources of the country, facilities for work and adequate livelihood with reasonable rest and leisure;
- (c) provide for all persons in the service of Pakistan and private concerns social security by means of compulsory social insurance or otherwise;
- (d) provide basic necessities of life, such as food, clothing, housing, education and medical relief, for all such citizens, irrespective of caste, creed or race, as are permanently or temporarily unable to earn their livelihood on account of infirmity, sickness or unemployment;
- (e) reduce disparity, to a reasonable limit, in the emoluments of persons in the various classes of service of Pakistan; and
- (f) eliminate riba as early as possible."

These directives clearly imply that the State is to move towards the goal of constructive socialism. The present state of our society exhibits serious economic mal-adjustment between the claims of capital and labour: nor again is the relationship between the landlords and tenants based on any sound principles of social justice and it seems that under the existing economic dispensation there is denial of even the right of equal opportunities for all.

In East Pakistan a great step forward in the direction of socialism has been taken by the State in that it has abolished landlordism, and has brought the tillers of the soil in direct relationship with the Government by eliminating the intervening links of numerous landlords who were living on unearned income—practically living upon the sweat of labour of the peasants. But although legislative reforms have been countenanced, it would be some time before the beneficial consequences of this legislation are shared by the tillers of the soil.

In West Pakistan, however, the existence of landlords, having large scale agricultural holdings, e.g. jagirdars and zamindars as a class, continue to constitute one of the main obstacles in the way of securing agrarian reforms and of giving to the peasants and tillers of the soil, the just fruits of their labour.

The framers of the Constitution have emphasised the necessity of preventing the concentration of wealth in the hands of few, the idle rich, and of raising the standard of living of the common man, and of ensuring the establishment of just relationship between employers and employees, and landlords and tenants. If this policy directive is implemented in the proper spirit, the citizenry of Pakistan can look up to an era of social reform and economic justice which will bring to each one of them adequate opportunities for self-expression and self-realisation.

Similarly, the framers of the Constitution have shown considerable solicitude for the social uplift of (a) the people of the Special Areas, and the people, the Constitution describes as forming, (b) the backward classes, and (c) the Scheduled Castes. And they have enjoined upon the State the duty of promoting with particular care, their educational and economic interests.

These are all undoubtedly the ideals of a high social policy and they require men of vision to implement them.

We have already referred in another part of this work, to the appointment of Commissions and the setting up of other appropriate instrumentalities for the purpose of securing an overall improvement of the scheduled castes and backward classes in Pakistan. Reference in this behalf should be made to Chapter IV of Part XII of our Constitution (ARTs. 204 to 207). If all these recommendations are implemented in the spirit and manner in which they ought to be implemented, the people of Pakistan can confidently look up to a very bright future indeed.

Art. 199.

In ART. 199, the framers of the Constitution have provided for the setting up of a National Economic Council which is to be charged with the duty of reviewing the overall economic position of the country and of formulating plans in respect of financial, commercial and economic policies which are to be pursued by the Federal and Provincial Governments. They have been directed to keep in view the ideal of ensuring "that uniform standards are attained in the economic development of all parts of the country." In the 4th clause of the said Article the President of the Republic is charged with the duty of taking suitable steps "to decentralise the administration by setting up, in each Province, necessary administrative machinery to provide the maximum convenience to the people, and expeditious disposal of Government business and public requirements." The report submitted by the Council to the National Assembly is every year to be laid before each Provincial Assembly.

All these provisions are designed to create, by means of some well-defined institutional procedures, conditions for bringing about the economic and social well-being of the people of Pakistan.

It is essential to realise that the predominant factors that shape our society and condition the actual working of Government, and make of it either a beneficent organ of society or an instrument of tyranny are the economic ones. Democracy itself is a hand-maid of economic forces of our time. As was pointed out by Henry Demarest Lloyd in his famous book Wealth against Commonwealth, due to the economic disequilibrium in society:

"The power of citizenship is relinquished by those who have a livelihood to make to those who make politics their livelihood. These specialists of ward club, the primary, the campaign, the election, and office unite, by a law as irresistible as that of the sexes, with all those who want the goods of government—charters, contracts, rulings, permits..... There might come a time when the policeman and the railroad President would equally show that they cared nothing for the citizen, individually or collectively, because aware that they and not he were the government. (See pp. 355—356)".

Everywhere corruption in the government stems from the commercial classes, from the contaminating touch of the Big Business Bosses and what is more, even the right to vote which democracy concedes to the common man cannot be freely exercised by him in a spoils-system which is the natural product of predatory economy. Moral approach to politics cannot thrive in an immoral society: a society that is ready to tolerate the curse of economic inequality (which has already everywhere defiled the current of History with corpses) as though it had been blessed by every Saint in Heaven cannot, for long, endure. Ours is an age where the economic forces are primary and fundamental, and unless we restore health to the economic order of things, political process will be stifled at their very source. 245. Concluding Considerations

Having reviewed from the ideological stand-point the salient features and discussed the essential nature of the State of Pakistan that has been established by our Constitution, and also appreciated the spirit of the teaching of Islam, we are now in a position to survey at one glance the premises upon which an ideological State could be founded.

The decisive force in the organization of the economico-political institutions of our time is undoubtedly the gospel of Nationalism. "Nationalism" has had enormous following during the last four hundred years or so. After the ecclesiastical power wielded by the Pope at Rome had ceased to serve as the basis of that underlying unity which had given to the isolated feudal principalities of Christian Europe an appearance of being possessed of a homogenous outlook and a reason for defending the claim of the Cross against the call of the Crescent, new loyalties were summoned to fill in the vacuum; after the prestige of the Papal authority was smashed by the Protestant movement, thanks to the onset of 'new life' that was beginning to be born on the ashes of the dark age of Europe, the secular States of modern Europe began to claim the allegiance of the people of that Continent. As a result of this revolution, a permanent wedge was driven into the life of man, and he began to witness in himself the conflict between his loyalty to the spiritual values, on the one hand, and the claims which were being made on him by the things in which Caesar was interested, on the other. Not only the individual, but also society itself became infested with these poisoning shafts of conflicts: Society was splintered into minute particles and it was out of these that gradually European Nations emerged centred round the heredity of domestic kings.

The gospel of "Nationalism" in Europe has had no spiritual orientation; it has been the offspring of a negative movement, a movement that called itself by no better name than "Protestanism." Against what was this protest being lodged, and by whom? These questions have not, as yet, been honestly answered. But the answer is available to any one who cares to look at History without allowing the spectacles of bigotry and prejudice to intervene between himself and the light of its truth. The decisive forces of the Modern World no doubt revealed themselves in that 'Protest' and Modern Civilization in a substantial sense, is Protestant Civilization. To that extent, at any rate, it is neither Hellenistic, nor Roman, nor Christian—nor again merely a mixture of all the three legacies. But even Protestantism is half-truth—and like all half-truths can be worse than the lie. Already we are beginning to see whither that half-truth is taking us to. . . . But to return to the Gospel of Nationalism.

Every school boy in Europe is today taught to believe that 'Reformation' was the result of 'Renaissance' which is supposed to have been ushered in, thanks to the revival of learning that took place after the fall of Constantinople. That is all taught in the Universities of civilized Europe and America in the name of liberal Education! And as to this 'Renaissance' itself, all kinds of false explanations exist—and continue to be concocted—but an honest attempt at historical analysis will show, in the words of Dr Robert Briffault, that:

"It was under the influence of the Arabian and Moorish revival of culture, and not in the Fifteenth Century, that the real Renaissance took place. Spain, not Italy, was the cradle of the rebirth of Europe. After steadily sinking lower and lower into barbarism, it had reached the darkest depths of ignorance and degredation when the cities of the Saracenic world, Baghdad, Cairo, Cardova, Toledo were growing centres of civilization and intellectual activity. It was there that the new life arose which was to grow into a new phase of Human Evolution. From the time when the influence of their culture made itself felt, began the stirring of a new life."

Dr. Briffault at least is clear that—

"It is highly probable that but for the Arabs modern European civilization could never have arisen at all; it is absolutely certain that but for them, it would not have assumed that character which has enabled it to transcend all previous phases of evolution. For although there is not a single aspect of European growth in which decisive influence of Islamic Culture is not traceable, nowhere is it so clear and momentous as in the genesis of that power which constitutes the paramount distinctive force of the Modern World and the Supreme Source of its Victory—Natural Science and the Scientific Spirit." (See his Making of Humanity pp. 188-190)

Not merely in the direction of intellectual evolution of Modern Europe alone is the influence of Islam to be acknowledged and understood. "To the Intellectual Culture of Islam", says the same Author,

"which has been fraught with consequences of such moment, corresponded an ethical development no less notable in the influence which it has exercised. The fierce intolerance of Christian Europe was indeed more enraged than humiliated by the spectacle of the broad tolerance which made no distinction of creed and bestowed honour and position on Christian and Jew alike, and whose principles are symbolised in the well-known analogue of the Three Rings popularised by Boccaccio and Lessing. It was, however, not without far-reaching influence on the more thoughtful minds of those who came in contact with Moorish Civilization. But barbaric Europe confessed itself impressed and was stung to emulation by the lofty magnanimity and the ideals of chivalrous honour presented to it by the Knights of Spain, by gentlemen like the fierce soldier Al-Mansur who claimed that, though he had slain many enemies in battle, he had never offered an insult to any—an ideal of knightly demeanour and dignity which Twentieth Century England might with profit perpend. The ruffianly crusaders were shamed by the grandeur of conduct and generosity of Saladin and his chivalry. The ideal of knightly virtue was adopted, the tradition of Noblesse Oblige was established. Poetry and Romances deeply tinged with Arabian ideas formed the only secular literature which circulated and appealed to the popular imagination; and a new conception of the place and dignity of women passed into Europe through the Courts of Provence from the Moorish world, where she shared the intellectual interests and pleasures of man Thus, shocking as the paradox may be to our traditional notions, it would probably be only strict truth to say that Muhammadan culture has contributed atleast as largely to the actual practical, concrete morality of Europe as many a more sublimated ethical doctrine." (See his "The Making of Humanity" pp. 307-309).

The two World-Wars of the Twentieth Century have been symptomatic of the clash of national prejudices. On the contemporary political scene, however, the conflict to which we are alluding has acquired the new-fangled name of 'cold war'. Global strategy between the forces of what is euphemistically, if not ironically, called 'the world of freedom-loving peoples' on either side of the Atlantic on the one hand and the defenders of the Gospel of Changez Khan, which in the contemporary scene is reflecting itself in the totalitarian order of society behind the Iron Curtain, on the other, continues to engage the energies and attention of the eighty and odd Nation-States that form the international community of our time. With the discovery of the secret of atom and the consequent man's mastery of the technique of securing the release of its energy by erecting a fission in its heart we have presented to us the latest creation of Man's diabolical effort—the atom bomb, and the hydrogen bomb with all its ever-increasing progeny. And now the choice is between evolving a world-order, organised under law—or witnessing the very end of things. . . .

Western civilization, we have often been told, is founded on spiritual principles. It is claimed that it has been built on the "thought and achievements" of western man and that all this has owed its inspiration to religious aspirations. The first world war was fought in the belief that that was a war to end wars, and the second world war was fought to save mankind "from the onslaught that had been made upon it by those who did not believe in human freedom." As to the motives of men who might go to third world war, a war the possibility of which looms large in the consciousness of modern Man, nothing specific could be said at the moment. But it is assumed that in this age of cold war which has set in as a "recess time" between the conclusion of the second world war and the commencement of the third, we are face to face with the dull, dreary and dismal prospect of the total destruction of mankind: thanks to the power which the belligerents in the cold war have acquired over the forces of nature, the possibility that "the whole achievement of Man may lie buried in a debris of ruins" is not one which can be lightly excluded. This time the chances are that the whole of mankind would be involved in the armageddon and there will be neither "victor" nor "vanquished" at the end of it.

In the light of these facts of man's recent history, the claim that western civilization is founded on a spiritual principle clearly seems to be pretentious and devoid of any truth whatever. The contemporary political scene does not present any prospect of an early settlement of this global conflict to which a reference has been made earlier. If ever, the tremendous increase in the world population, on the one hand, and the scarcity of available adequate food supplies to feed the teeming millions, on the other, have created a problem for the solution of which we seem to be unequal—and this helplessness has, in its turn, contributed to the feeling of that general frustration and depression which seems to be, with ominous portents, brooding over the lives of most of our fellowmen.

We, in this country of ours, are however concerned fundamentally with the impact of this global conflict upon the mind and future of our own people. Much will depend upon the manner in which we are able to define our attitude to the decisive forces that are shaping the modern world today. We are living in the midst of a world revolution and so small has the world become that either we consciously participate in the life of the whole mankind, by playing our heroic part in it, or we would soon find ourselves involved in a fate which must await those "who would let the steam-roller of history pass over them without any let or hindrance."

There is no agreed definition of that ideology with which the modern west is associated and it can mean different things to different people. For some, it might merely mean "the Greco-Roman cultural heritage, applied Christianity, scientific, industrial and technological advancement and secularism," or it may mean any one of these plus a certain way of life which could best be summed up in the words of a recent writer (S. A. Morrison) under the unholy triad of "drugs, drink, divorce", and of course the worst features of the Hollywood film or scandal-mongering newspaper. There are some again who would consider that the essence of Western civilization consists in its moral and spiritual values, values which they believe are being progressively realised by the modern West. But be the content of Western ideology what it may, the fact remains that as a counterpart to this vast medley of heterogeneous elements of occidental culture and, as if, representing its antipodes, is believed to be that assemblage of ideas and values which we associate with the Religion of Islam, more particularly with its beliefs and practices, with its historical role and mission.

Quite apart from the fact that much of what is decisive and valuable in Western culture and civilization could satisfactorily be explained in terms of the cultural radiation of the light of Islam itself, the important feature of the "contradiction" to which the author is referring lies in the fact that, by and large, the generality of men do view Islam as prescribing a code of life which in many ways is diametrically opposed to the one with which the Modern West is traditionally associated.

To a sociologist, what is really important is what men actually believe in and not merely the question whether what they believe in is objectively valid. Similarly, for the historian, what is essential to perceive is that picture of the mental world in which men habitually live and not merely the world of objective truth in which they, in his opinion, ought to live. This is so because man's reaction to his environment is explicable only in terms of what he takes the world to be and not what the world is in reality for him. Judged in this perspective, the contradiction to which a reference has been made earlier acquires considerable pragmatic relevance for the comprehension of our historical predicament. And we will presently see the various forms in which this contradiction manifests itself in the life of our new State.

The reaction from the Muslim peoples to the Western world, logically considered, can fall into any one of the following categories: (a) it may be one of total rejection of the values of western culture or (b) of its whole-scale acceptance, or (c) it may be one of securing a reconciliation or compromise between the two. There may, theoretically speaking, be yet a fourth attitude, namely, that of total indifference: but then, that attitude need not be seriously considered here because a human being who is indifferent to his environment cannot be regarded as creative in any sense—for in such a condition Man is hardly an element that can be differentiated from the environment in which his lot is cast. "Sensibility", said Mr. Chesterton, "is the very definition of life." And a person who is indifferent is insensitive to his environment and, therefore, could hardly be said to be alive.

Historically speaking, we might cite the examples of Kamal Ataturk and Riza Shah Pehlavi as standing for the dethronement of Islamic way of life in so far as it has any relevance to the question of shaping the nature and character of a modern polity. The present writer does not agree with the view that associates these two leaders with secularism but for the purpose of present analysis it would not be wrong to say that, by and large, these two statesmen are believed to have stood for a secular State. It is well known that they tried to confine State-activity within the narrow precincts of non-religious values. It was their belief that Islam itself had been overlaid with false accretions and practices and they proceeded to apply its wisdom and teaching not to the matters concerning the affairs of the State but only suffered it to be applied only to the ordering of Man's individual life. Religion was made a private affair for each individual and his relationship with the universe. As a recent student of world affairs Mr. S. A. Morrison observes in his book 'Middle East Survey' :

"Both Ataturk and Riza Shah came to the conclusion not only that the dis-establishment of Islam was essential to the progress of the State they ruled, but that Islam itself was overlaid with accretions and practices which must be purged. The Turkish Government abolished the Dervish Orders, replaced the old Muslim Schools with educational institutions of a modern type, substituted the Latin alphabet for the Arabic, forbade the use of the veil and the fez, and took measures for the emancipation of women. In Iran marriage was made a civil ceremony, the wife was given the right, in certain circumstances, to sue for divorce, the veil was abolished, Muslim theological seminaries were placed under the state control, and the income from religious endowments was used to support public welfare projects. Both Ataturk and Riza Shah were probably agnostics and atheists at heart, but many of their supporters, who welcomed these innovations in the name of progress which they identified with material and cultural advancement, still clung to their faith in the belief that, though the less Islam had to do with public life the better, still, as a spiritual force for private conduct, its light was undimmed." (p. 122)

Many intellectuals in the Muslim world today have defended the approach of these two statesmen and anyone interested in pursuing studies along this track of thought will be advised to refer to Dr. Taha Hussain's Pre-Islamic Poetry, Dr. Ali Abdur Razik's The Origins of Government and of Khalid Muhammad Khalid's essay From Here We Begin.

There are, however, others who insist on an outright rejection of western values, for they profoundly believe them to be satanic in character. They want to return to the sort of life with which the early history of Islam makes them familiar. In their anxiety to uphold the supremacy of Muslim way of life and culture, they wish to return to the Holy Qur'an. They stand for the purification of our individual and collective lives, and they insist that this can be best achieved by securing an overall conformity of our conduct with the rules of Muslim conduct, rules which they view in contrast with the laxity of morals prevalent in the modern West.

The third group of persons comprises of those who believe that it is possible for them to combine the Western technological and industrial "know-how" of organising life in modern society with those moral and spiritual incentives to individual culture that are provided for by the Religion of Islam. What is going to be our answer to this all important question of our time? Besides all this, there are other difficult questions to face.

Is the basis of our State to be territorial in character or is it going to be what is loosely called ideological? Does my participation in the political life of our State proceed upon the basis of my belonging to Pakistan, as a citizen in the conventional sense of that term, or does it mean that it proceeds from my belonging to Pakistan not by reason of any territorial nexus but only by my belonging to a particular religion. How can the principle of reaching decisions by a majority vote be reconciled with the ideological basis of our State? Supposing the majority in the legislature tomorrow proceeds to mis-interpret and misapply the religious injunctions upon a given question, what is it that can prevent it from doing so? The question people ask is: "Can a democratic State be at the same time an ideological one?" "Can its existence be reconciled with the logic of having more parties than one in the State?" Regarded from this manner of approach, at least the Progenitors of the U.S.S.R. appear to be consistent. Under the Soviet Communist State, for instance, there can be no room for two or more political parties. The Soviet State is avowedly monolithic. It is intolerant of the emergence of any political party that seeks to contradict the philosophy of the Communist State. But even in the Soviet State one can belong to the ruling party which is secular in outlook without having expressly and publicly to renounce one's religious faith or one's deepest conviction concerning the transcendental sources of morality and religion.

It is no answer to these questions to say that the general aim and end of our national life is to promote those values for which the religion of Islam stands as a symbol. There is, to begin with, hardly any agreement between the view-points of those who say like this: each appears to have his own version of the ends and means sanctioned by Islam. Even if all of us were to assume that there is a general agreement as to the basic purposes for which Muslim society exists, these matters are so vaguely defined that they cannot furnish any common denominator of human thinking and feeling in terms of which one could hope to promote the welfare and solidarity of the peoples of Pakistan.

Although we are avowedly pledged to pursue those values which Islam came to advance, we still have the duty cast upon us to enquire into and determine the precise methodological techniques by resort to which we are going to embody those values within the framework of the contemporary politico-economical situation that is confronting us. It must be admitted that we Pakistanis cannot claim to belong to one and the same race: Pakistan betrays extreme diversity of race and blood in this behalf. Even as a geographical concept, Western and Eastern regions of Pakistan present several anomalous features. The way of life of a man belonging to the North-West Frontier, for instance, is radically different from the way of life of those who belong to Sind and both of them have material differences to exhibit when we come to contrast their ways of life with those of other people who are living in diverse parts of Pakistan. It is true that common religious practices remain the same but it is questionable whether religion itself, regarded from the point of view of cultural anthropology, has after all such a vital force and influence over the lives of the people who seem to profess it. Then the interpretation of this faith differs a great deal from one sect to another, and Western and Eastern wings of Pakistan display such a great variety of religious beliefs and practices that it would be difficult to reconcile them as having flowed from the same fountain source.

It is even wrong to think that the citizens of Pakistan today have a common history or common traditions. When it is said that we have a common history and common traditions it is generally believed that we are referring to Muslim history from which we are to draw inspiration and derive incentive for our action, but even history, before it can become a decisive influence, must first be appreciated as a part and parcel of our living present. We have to reinterpret that history in terms of modern thought before its lessons can be availed of for dealing with existing situations. It is a childish prattle to say that we can, in the past history of the Arabs who had by then only recently come under the banner of Islam find a type of economic and political teaching which, without any further interpretation in the light of present world conditions, could afford us guidance for enabling us to manage our affairs properly. The economic and political structure of the past has nothing in common with the situation which obtains in the contemporary world. The economic forces of our age are definitely of a different dimension, order and magnitude from those that subsisted at about the time of which we are speaking. The growth of international trade, of banking, of exchange, of international credit, of tariff reforms: all these are products of the last 200 years of social revolution and have been called into play as a result of the mastery which man has acquired over the forces of nature and the extent to which he has been able to annihilate space and time. Days of isolation, of localised culture and civilisation are days of the past. No nation today can afford to live, much less hope to grow, in a splendid isolation. The economic policy pursued by the major powers of the world of today affects the economic policy of the rest of the world. Major political events that are happening in the United States of America or Great Britain or the U.S.S.R. for instance, have tremendous repercussions on the formulation of the political or economic policies in different sectors of the world.

The impulse that animates Muslim history was released by the personality of the Holy Prophet and the example of his holy and heroic life which he provided to his followers—and who for their part transmitted the tradition, without so much as rationally comprehending it, to the generations that succeeded them. With the passage of time, a period of decay and demoralisation set in, only because the Muslims could not keep truly to the creed of the Holy Qur'an. They ceased practising the religion of reading, writing and thinking. It would, therefore, require a wholesale reinterpretation of the entire phase of Muslim history before any vital principle is discovered in the forest of its facts or some shining pattern is deciphered in the chaos which the chronicle of its political intrigues clearly presents to an impartial student. As it is, the investigation of facts in the field of Muslim history has not even begun. History, as an instrument of inductive enquiry, has not even been contemplated seriously by modern Muslim scholars. Ibn Khaldun was the first, as undoubtedly he has been the last, to have emphasised this aspect of human history. A considerable bulk of what is loosely described as Muslim history is really the history of the Arabs. The present writer would not admit that the Arabs understood Islam to any remarkable extent, although he is aware that such measure of progress as has been recorded in the pages of their history is directly due to their having been influenced, and that too only superficially, by the life and example of the Holy Prophet. Mohammed's Mission yet remains to be fulfilled. Mohammed's Plato is yet to be born. Muslim history has yet to be made.

It is for this reason that it has been said that the only lesson that we learn from history is that we can learn nothing from history. This is so because to each historical phase belongs a new type of adjustment which can only be secured by the free spirit of man aided by the power of his rational thought. There is no help or guidance that can come to the rescue of man excepting his own thinking. No helper or Messiah will ever avail him. What is decisive in the world of today is clarity of thought and perception. Man must learn to think coherently and act heroically before he can be saved.

Islam is a fecundating principle and has hardly any institutionalised content which could serve as a code of immutable injunctions beyond, of course, the belief that God is one and that Mohammed is the last of his prophets. It unfolds before man the scroll of his destiny and invites him to strive for the incarnation of divine attributes in his being; it is more to be regarded as indicating the varying shades of spiritual spectrum, as reflecting the scale of values which he must strive to reflect in his being. It is a religion that makes man the master of his own destiny—and places in his hands, as instrument of his action, the gift of rational thought. It is a religion which invites Man to think—and by reading the Book of Nature to grow in moral and spiritual stature.

All these observations make it imperative for us to work out a consistent ideology on the basis of which the economic and political policy of the new State can be shaped. The Holy Quran, the life of the Holy Prophet, and his sayings will of course be regarded as the fountain sources from which to draw our inspiration and guidance. But unless we understand the historical forces underlying the contemporary world order, we shall never be able to fruitfully apply those principles which are to be found in the Holy Quran. Our so-called religious leaders who have lulled themselves into a sense of false security on these issues would do well to ponder over the fate that has overtaken some of the Muslim countries that did not know how to adjust themselves to the modern world conditions in accordance with the principles of the Holy Quran.

In amplification of what is said above, it becomes necessary to refer to the observations of Frederick Hertz, one of the well-known sociologists of our time, in order to show somewhat more fully the extent to which the historical role of Islam is not only being minimised, but is actually being construed as though Islam had come to obstruct Human Progress.

"The Young Turk Movement which overthrew despotism in 1908 aimed at the fusion of all the nationalities in a common Ottoman Nation, with Turkish as the language of communication. The Young Turks abandoned the idea of basing the Empire on Islam: they were hostile to the hierarchy of clerical lawyers and promised freedom and equality to all religions and nationalities. Yet they also tried to foster Turkish Patriotism by an appeal to Turkish racial pride. For this purpose they encouraged Pan-Turanianism, cultivating the memory of the alleged Mongolian ancestors of the Turks, and the idea of solidarity and national unity of all peoples of Turanian stock, which implied the liberation of millions of people living in the Russian Empire. A movement set in for purifying the Turkish language from Persian and Arabic words, and for adopting words and names derived from Turanian roots. The Euranianidea, however, was incompatible with that of an Ottoman Nation, based on equality of all races, and, in particular, Young Turkish Policy led to the growth of estrangement between Turks and Arabs. The efforts to save the Empire were thwarted by wars which ended in its ruin. After the World War the Ottoman Empire was dismembered, and the peace terms of the Allies even menaced the integrity of Turkish territory and the whole national future of the Turks. General Mustapha Kemal Pasha organised victorious resistance to these claims, seized power, and then set out to create a national State on an entirely new foundation.

"This policy began with the ethnic unification of the State by expulsion of all elements considered as alien, and by the reception of kindred immigrants expelled from the Balkans. It is significant, however, that the criterion of what was alien and kindred was still religion. Turkey expelled the Christians, even if speaking Turkish only, and the Balkan nations expelled the Moslems, even if speaking Slavic or Greek only. Soon, however, the Turkish reformers more and more discarded religious institutions and traditions from political life. The millets disappeared as also the Capitulations, the people were declared Sovereign, the self-determination of the Arabs was recognised, and Ankara became the capital instead of Constantinople. The Caliphate, which implied the duty of defending Islam and which still appealed to the feelings of millions of Moslems outside Turkey, especially in India, was abolished. In the mosques Turkish replaced the sacred Arabic language, the Holy Quran was translated into Turkish, and the purification and Turanization of the language was continued. Arabic script gave way to Latin script, which meant a great saving of the time in the learning of the art of reading and writing. The fez, which had become a symbol of religious conservatism, was abolished and the European custom of wearing hats introduced. Law was completely emancipated from religion, the Swiss Civil Code and other foreign laws were adopted en bloc, without any discussion of single clause. The legal position of women was fundamentally altered by the abolition of all laws and customs encroaching upon their equality with men. Polygamy was doomed to extinction by prohibiting any further marriage with more than one wife. The sacred custom of women wearing a veil before their faces was suppressed too. Education was taken out of clerical hands and reformed according to European standards. All these and other reforms were quite incompatible with Islamic precepts and traditions. They implied the recognition that modern nationality could only grow in an atmosphere permeated by Western ideas. In this respect the Turkish, like the Chinese, national revival differed from the national movement in India.

"The connexion of modern ideas of nationality with Western civilization is also shown by the rise of Arabian nations in the Ottoman Empire and after its fall. It is significant that the pioneers of the Arab national revival were chiefly Christian Arabs, educated in missionary schools, both Catholic and Protestant. The missionaries and their pupils were the first who gave a modern education in Arabic, published many important books and journals, and united the warring creeds among the Arabs by a common ideal. Egypt, however, detached herself from the Arab cause as its national pride was aroused by the great civilisation of ancient Egypt, which was much older than Arabian civilization."

The foregoing statement is calculated to show prima facie that Turkish nationalism has progressed not because of but in spite of Islam. The fact remains, however, that all the progress that has been made by the Turkish nation has been in the right direction: precisely the direction in which the Holy Quran and Islam point, in the direction in which modern Europe, broadly speaking, has tended to develop. But because there has been no reinterpretation of the teachings of Islam, no proper understanding of the logic of Muslim history, the result appears to be one which is in complete contradiction thereof.

Long before the birth of Pakistan, Allama Iqbal, in his lectures on Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam, had given an account of the forces and factors that had brought about the emergence of the Turkish National Movement, a movement about which Frederick Hertz speaks in the long extract cited above from his Nationality in History and Politics. Iqbal traced the origin of the Turkish National Movement to the proper application, by the genius of the Turkish people, of that dynamic principle of movement in the structure of Islam which its jurists refer to as Ijtehad. Iqbal has, in those lectures, given his interpretation of the way in which the principle of Ijtehad had been applied in Turkey. According to him, "Turk's Ijtehad is that according to the spirit of Islam the Caliphate or Imamate can be vested in a body of persons or an elected assembly. The religious doctors of Islam in Egypt and India so far as I know have not yet expressed themselves on this point. Personally I believe the Turkish view-point is perfectly sound. It is hardly necessary to argue this point. This republican form of government is not only thoroughly consistent with the spirit of Islam, but has also become a necessity in view of the new forces that are set free in the world of Islam".

After referring to Ibn Khaldun's famous Prolegomena to History, and showing how that philosopher of history had himself interpreted the doctrine of Caliphate in Islam, Iqbal proceeds to give an account of the manner in which that great poet of Turkey, Zia, founds Turkish Nationalism upon the ideology of Islam. Iqbal concludes all these considerations by pointing out that the Turkish National Movement is not antithetical to Islam. He says:

"The truth is that among the Muslim nations of today Turkey alone has shaken off its dogmatic slumber, and attained to self-consciousness. She alone has claimed her right of intellectual freedom; she alone has passed from the ideal to the real—a transition which entails keen intellectual and moral struggle. To her the growing complexities of a mobile and broadening life are sure to bring new situations suggesting new points of view, and necessitating fresh interpretations of principles which are only of an academic interest to a people who have never experienced the joy of spiritual expansion. It is, I think, the English thinker Hobbes who makes his acute observation that to have a succession of identical thoughts and feelings is to have no thoughts and feelings at all. Such is the lot of most Muslim countries to-day. They are mechanically repeating old values, whereas the Turk is on the way to creating new values. He has passed through great experiences which have revealed his deeper self to him. In him life has begun to move, change and amplify, giving birth to new desires, bringing new difficulties and suggesting new interpretations. . . . The question which confronts him to-day, and which is likely to confront other Muslim countries in the near future, is whether the Law of Islam is capable of evolution—a question which will require great intellectual effort, and is sure to be answered in the affirmative; provided the world of Islam approaches it in the spirit of Omer—the first critical and independent mind in Islam who, at the last moments of the Prophet, had the moral courage to utter these remarkable words: 'The Book of God is sufficient for us.'

"We heartily welcome the liberal movement in modern Islam; but it must also be admitted that the appearance of liberal ideas in Islam constitutes also the most critical moment in the theory of Islam. Liberalism has a tendency to act as a force of disintegration, and the race-idea which appears to be working in modern Islam greater force than ever may ultimately wipe off the broad human outlook which Muslim people have imbibed from their religion. Further, our religious and political reformers in their zeal for liberalism may over-step the proper limits of reform in the absence of a check on their youthful fervour. We are today passing through a period similar to that of the Protestant Revolution in Europe, and the lesson which the rise and outcome of Luther's movement teaches should not be lost on us. A careful reading of history shows that the Reformation was essentially a political movement, and the net result of it in Europe was a gradual displacement of the universal ethics of Christianity by systems of national ethics. The result of this tendency we have seen with our own eyes in the Great European War which, far from bringing any workable synthesis of the two opposing systems of ethics, has made the European situation still more intolerable. It is the duty of the leaders of the world of Islam today to understand the real meaning of what has happened in Europe, and then to move forward with self-control and a clear insight into the ultimate aims of Islam as a social polity."

These are the words of a man who has been rightly regarded as "Pioneer of the Pakistan Movement", in fact the first man who expressed the ideology of Pakistan; and it would be worth-while for any serious student to go through his lectures over and over again to see for himself the elastic and catholic spirit of Islam and its capacity to yield to the modern world an ideological basis for the establishment of a sort of society which would be free from those international discords and tensions that infest its peace and stability today.

Dr. Zaki's views on the impact of Islam or "Arab Nationalism."

Nor again does the support for the foregoing thesis merely come from a solitary figure in recent History, a lone voice in the world of modern thought. There are many recent writers who have stressed the importance of letting Islamic principles determine the relationship which the individual is to have with the State and through the State to the supra-national synthesis of mankind taken as a whole. There exists a considerable bulk of thought-provoking literature upon the subject but the present writer could do no better than to refer, by way of a sample, to the observations of Dr. Hazem Zaki Nusseibeh contained in his recent study The Ideas of Arab Nationalism for a clear analysis of the problem posed by the recent encounter between the nascent nationalism of the Arabs in the Middle East, in Asia and in South-East Asia, and its relationship with the principles of Islam.

While considering the questions about the genesis and the components of what he calls "Arab-Islamic civilization", our author has no hesitation in declaring that :

- "The first and foremost achievement of the Islamic movement was the unification of the Arabs for the first time in their history. Thus, in a historical setting, Arabism owes to Islam its very existence" (p. 20).
- It was Islam that made the political organisation of the Arabs at all possible. Out of the community of the believers grew the State. "The State, from the Islamic standpoint, is the means whereby the Islamic concepts of life are realised in a definite human organization. The ultimate reality, according to the Quran, is spiritual, but the life of the State consists in its temporal activity. The spirit finds its opportunities in the natural, the material, the secular". (p. 23).

And after quoting Iqbal from his Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam (Lahore, 1934), at p. 147, our author observes that,

Concluding Considerations

"The observation (from Iqbal viz. that Quran contained as set of simple legal principles which like the twelve tables of the Romans carried, as experience subsequently proved, great potentialities of expansion and development by interpretation) is no doubt accurate, when it is referred to Islam in its founding period, at which time nationality and religion were practically synonymous and no state or church organizations existed to which Islam might have presented a threat. In the circumstances of its rise, therefore, Islam's great gift to the Arabs was the creation of a community and the establishment of a state". (pp. 23-24).

- That Islam imparted to the Arabs a consciousness of their National history, and in fact the historical memory of the Arabs is largely the legacy of Islam. "From the relatively obscure and marginal existence which had been their lot, Islam raised them to a position of pre-eminence, and a new vista of creativity in almost all walks of life opened up." (p. 24).

And finally,

- Islam's role in the cultural heritage of the Arabs is paramount. Unlike the Romans, for example, whose pagan history vied with their achievements under Christianity, the Arabs' pagan period was, except for its literary output, relatively barren. All that the Arabs have bequeathed in Philosophy, Theology, Jurisprudence, the sciences, medicines, music, the fine arts, and other disciplines, have been the legacy of the Islamic period." (p. 28).

Having emphasised the foregoing contribution of Islam to the resurgence of Arab Nationalism, Arab Unity, Arabs' consciousness of their national history, and the remarkable contribution which, thanks to Islam, they were, during the first 5 centuries following the advent of Islam, able to make in the field of culture and civilization, our author raises the fundamental question with respect to the nature of historical role which this Arab-Islamic civilization has played. In his words:

"Is it essentially classical, a mere extension of Greek thought, or is it anti-classical? These are not mere historical or intellectual exercises; they have a profound practical significance in the present phase of Arab soul-searching and national reconstruction. The importance of these questions may be gauged from the fact that almost every political movement in the contemporary Arab world is based upon, and in a large measure stems from, the answers to these questions. The Pan-Islamist believes in the supremacy and the integrity of the Islamic legacy, the Pan-Arabist in its uniquely Arab character. Other movements such as the Syrian Nationalist in the Levant or the Pharaonic in Egypt reject the Arab-Islamic episode as the central event of national history. The Syrian boasts of his descent from the Phoenicians—a remnant of Canaanites—who distinguished themselves as a maritime people and who founded an overseas Syriac dominion centered on Carthage. The Pharaonic disciple draws his inspiration, of course, from the ancient indigenous civilizations of Egypt and as a corollary rejects Islam as the paramount national event.

"It has been observed that Arab nationalism regards the legacy of Islam, at least as far as it was expressed in Arabic, as a national heritage, regardless of the racial origins of the contributors or of the sources and influences which moulded its shape. It is recognized that that legacy is a bundle of many strands so intermeshed as to render their untangling well-nigh impossible. But why should they be separated into components? And who is to decide which part is more truly Arab than another?

"The answers to these questions have been rendered the more difficult because of the discontinuity of this civilization. Stagnation has been pervasive for nearly five centuries. Arab contributions to knowledge, impressive and pioneering as they may have been, have long since been out-stripped by the cumulative achievements of the modern era. Even Ibn Khaldun is now admired more for his originality than for the substance of his works, of which most are now out of date. Why then is the Islamic period, in the sense of a civilization, significant to Arab nationalism? It is significant because, without the assurance that stems from association with a worthy past, without the consciousness of forming a distinctive personality with, perhaps, a distinctive mission, a nation loses its basic support, its raison d'être. It is not, therefore, the appurtenances of a civilization but the consciousness of it and the pride in its possession that serves a vital national purpose. It is the feeling of "partnership between those who are living, those who are dead, and those who are to be born."

"Quite apart from his psychological need for pooled self-esteem and the sense of usefulness, Arab nationalism requires the Arab-Islamic legacy in order to discover its own essence and its sources of strength. Although its legacy has been out-stripped by the tremendous advances in the various domains of the sciences, there is still the belief that Arab civilization has not entirely spent itself as a spiritual force. The term spiritual is used in the widest connotation and not in the narrow sense of a religion or a conglomeration of peculiar rituals and beliefs.

"What justification is there for Arab nationalists' belief in the spiritual vitality of their legacy? It is primarily a matter of faith and secondarily disillusionment with what they regard as the spiritual and moral bankruptcy of modern civilization. There have been, as yet, no profound formulations of the latter's spiritual values-in answer to the challenging problems of the modern age. Unless or until such formulations are forthcoming, the Arab-Islamic civilization is essential to the Arab nationalist because he believes and contends that it can make a unique contribution toward solving the dilemmas of today." (pp. 30-32).

While the general approach made by our author to the questions relating to the fecundating influence of Islam on Arab nationalism is, broadly speaking, correct, it is necessary to emphasize an aspect or two of this cultural relationship between Arab Nationalism and Islam without which the perspective in which that relationship is to be perceived is likely to be distorted.

Islam—as a fecundating principle of Human Civilization and Culture.

It is essential to realize that Islam, as a spiritual force, is capable of vivifying, fertilizing all earthly formations—and Arab Nationalism is only one of them—and of raising them, of transforming them into becoming the expressions of the Divine. This, it achieves because of its universality, because of its lack of specific content. Islam, rightly understood, is a principle of growth, of vitality. It, by itself, has hardly any content except of course that it proclaims the oneness of all life and the Divine origin of all things. It is for this reason that even the modern civilization of West, or the national resurgence which one notices in the pages of recent and contemporary history of Asia and Africa can, by the application of the principles of vitality and growth which are contained in the creed of Islam, reach the same results as were reached by the Arabs during its formative period of which our author has spoken. Islam is not just one religion amongst or side by side with, other religions. It came to finish the era of revealed religion and to declare open the era of "Realization" of what had been revealed to Man.

Some European writers, thinkers and scholars of repute, impartial students of Islam, have paid to Islam the tribute that it is the most rational of all religions; and observation shows that its teachings, as has been pointed out earlier, have been, as a matter of course, accepted by the entire world. But, before this claim of Islam can be appreciated properly, it is necessary to discover from the Holy Qur'an itself what are the articles of Moslem faith and what is the philosophy of the life and action it has propounded. All this requires a new outlook on Islam, an outlook that can only come by a study of History, modern science, and philosophy. If the Holy Qur'an is to be regarded as Umm-ul-Kitab, that is the Mother of Books, it is necessary to show how its teachings are in conformity with the findings of modern knowledge.

In Pakistan, as yet, beyond the raising of mere religious slogans, the present writer has not found any precise statement of the principles of Islam as these could be applied to our daily conduct or the governance of our State, a statement in terms whereof we are required to shape our individual and social life and thus make Pakistan a progressive state in the modern world.

That task yet remains to be done and not until that is done can there be Muslim Renaissance, or any hope as to the resurgence of our national spirit or the flowering of our national character....

With the fond hope that the foregoing few stray thoughts expressed by the present writer concerning the creative vigour of Islam would go a long way to assist the student in the comprehension of that historical role which, in the days that lie ahead, it is for the people of Pakistan to play; it is now time to conclude—and in the fashion of the Muslim writers of the past, the present writer would like to bid farewell to the readers of his Book with an invocation of God's Blessings upon them all-

Further God knoweth the best.

APPENDIX

CONSTITUTION OF THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF PAKISTAN

Preamble

In the name of Allah, the Beneficent, the Merciful

WHEREAS sovereignty over the entire Universe belongs to Allah Almighty alone, and the authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him is a sacred trust ;

WHEREAS the Founder of Pakistan, Quaid-i-Azam Mohammad Ali Jinnah, declared that Pakistan would be a democratic State based on Islamic principles of social justice ;

AND WHEREAS the Constituent Assembly, representing the people of Pakistan, have resolved to frame for the sovereign independent State of Pakistan a constitution ;

WHEREIN the State should exercise its powers and authority through the chosen representatives of the people;

WHEREIN the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam, should be fully observed;

WHEREIN the Muslims of Pakistan should be enabled individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the teachings and requirements of Islam, as set out in the Holy Quran and Sunnah;

WHEREIN adequate provision should be made for the minorities freely to profess and practise their religion and develop their culture ;

WHEREIN the territories now included in or in accession with Pakistan and such other territories as may hereafter be included in or accede to Pakistan should form a Federation, wherein the Provinces would be autonomous with such limitations on their powers and authority as might be prescribed ;

WHEREIN should be guaranteed fundamental rights including rights such as equality of status and of opportunity, equality before law, freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship and association, and social, economic, and political justice, subject to law and public morality ;

WHEREIN adequate provision should be made to safeguard the legitimate interests of minorities and backward and depressed classes ;

WHEREIN the independence of the Judiciary should be fully secured ;

WHEREIN the integrity of the territories of the Federation, its independence and all its rights, including its sovereign rights over land, sea and air should be safeguarded ;

So that the people of Pakistan may prosper and attain their rightful and honoured place amongst the nations of the world and make their full contribution towards international peace and the progress and happiness of humanity.

NOW THEREFORE, we the people of Pakistan in our Constituent Assembly this twenty-ninth day of February, 1956, and the seventeenth day of Rajab, 1375, do hereby adopt, enact and give to ourselves this Constitution.

PART I

The Republic and its Territories

1.—(1) Pakistan shall be a Federal Republic to be known as the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, and is hereinafter referred to as Pakistan.

The Republic and its territories.

(2) The territories of Pakistan shall comprise—

- (a) the territories of the Provinces of East Pakistan and West Pakistan ;
- (b) the territories of States which are in accession with or may accede to Pakistan ;
- (c) the territories which are under the administration of the Federation but are not included in either Province ; and
- (d) such other territories as may be included in Pakistan.

Explanation.—In the Constitution, the Province of East Pakistan shall mean the Province known immediately before the Constitution Day as the Province of East Bengal, and the Province of West Pakistan shall mean the Province of West Pakistan set up by the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955.

2. Until Parliament by law otherwise provides, the President may, by Order, make provision for the government and administration of the territories specified in sub-clauses (b), (c) and (d) of clause (2) of Article 1.

Administration of territories outside the Provinces.

Definition of the State.

Laws inconsistent with or in derogation of the fundamental rights to be void.

Equality before law.

Protection against retrospective offences or punishment.

Safeguards as to arrest and detention.

Freedom of speech

Freedom of assembly.

Freedom of association.

Freedom of movement and right to hold and dispose of property.

Freedom of trade, business or profession.

PART II Fundamental Rights

3. In this Part, unless the context otherwise requires, "the State" includes the Federal Government, Parliament, the Provincial Governments, the Provincial Legislatures, and all local or other authorities in Pakistan.

4.—(1) Any existing law, or any custom or usage having the force of law, in so far as it is inconsistent with the provisions of this Part, shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void.

(2) The State shall not make any law which takes away or abridges the rights conferred by this Part, and any law in contravention of this clause shall, to the extent of such contravention, be void.

(3) Nothing in this Article shall apply to any law relating to the members of the Armed Forces, or the Forces charged with the maintenance of public order, for the purpose of ensuring the proper discharge of their duties or the maintenance of discipline among them.

5.—(1) All citizens are equal before law and are entitled to equal protection of law.

(2) No person shall be deprived of life or liberty save in accordance with law.

6. No person shall be punished for an act which was not punishable by law when the act was done, nor shall any person be subjected to a punishment greater than that prescribed by law for an offence when the offence was committed.

7.—(1) No person who is arrested shall be detained in custody without being informed, as soon as may be, of the grounds for such arrest, nor shall he be denied the right to consult and be defended by a legal practitioner of his choice.

(2) Every person who is arrested and detained in custody shall be produced before the nearest magistrate within a period of twenty-four hours of such arrest, excluding the time necessary for the journey from the place of arrest to the court of the magistrate, and no such person shall be detained in custody beyond the said period without the authority of a magistrate.

(3) Nothing in clauses (1) and (2) shall apply to any person—

(a) who for the time being is an enemy alien ; or

(b) who is arrested or detained under any law providing for preventive detention.

(4) No law providing for preventive detention shall authorize the detention of a person for a period exceeding three months unless the appropriate Advisory Board has reported before the expiration of the said period of three months that there is, in its opinion, sufficient cause for such detention.

Explanation.—In this clause "the appropriate Advisory Board" means, in the case of a person detained under a Central Act or an Act of Parliament, a Board consisting of persons appointed by the Chief Justice of Pakistan, or, in the case of a person detained under a Provincial Act or an Act of a Provincial Legislature, a Board consisting of persons appointed by the Chief Justice of the High Court for the Province.

(5) When any person is detained in pursuance of an order made under any law providing for preventive detention, the authority making the order shall, as soon as may be, communicate to such person the grounds on which the order has been made and shall afford him the earliest opportunity of making a representation against the order :

Provided that the authority making any such order may refuse to disclose facts which such authority considers it to be against the public interest to disclose.

8. Every citizen shall have the right to freedom of speech and expression, subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of the security of Pakistan, friendly relations with foreign States, public order, decency or morality, or in relation to contempt of court, defamation or incitement to an offence.

9. Every citizen shall have the right to assemble peacefully and without arms, subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of public order.

10. Every citizen shall have the right to form associations or unions, subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of morality or public order.

11. Subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the public interest, every citizen shall have the right—

(a) to move freely throughout Pakistan and to reside and settle in any part thereof ;

(b) to acquire, hold and dispose of property.

12. Every citizen, possessing such qualifications, if any, as may be prescribed by law in relation to his profession or occupation, shall have the right to enter upon any lawful profession or occupation, and to conduct any lawful trade or business :

Provided that nothing in this Article shall prevent—

- (a) the regulation of any trade or profession by a licensing system, or
- (b) the carrying on, by the Federal or a Provincial Government or by a corporation controlled by any such Government, of any trade, business, industry or service, to the exclusion, complete or partial, of other persons.

13.—(1) No person attending any educational institution shall be required to receive religious instruction, or take part in any religious ceremony, or attend religious worship, if such instruction, ceremony or worship relates to a religion other than his own.

(2) No religious community or denomination shall be prevented from providing religious instruction for pupils of that community or denomination in any educational institution maintained wholly by that community or denomination.

(3) No citizen shall be denied admission to any educational institution receiving aid from public revenues on the ground only of race, religion, caste, or place of birth:

Provided that nothing in this Article shall prevent any public authority from making provision for the advancement of any socially or educationally backward class of citizens.

(4) In respect of any religious institution, there shall be no discrimination against any community in the granting of exemption or concession in relation to taxation.

(5) Every religious community or denomination shall have the right to establish and maintain educational institutions of its own choice, and the State shall not deny recognition to any such institution on the ground only that the management of such institution vests in that community or denomination.

14.—(1) In respect of access to places of public entertainment or resort, not intended for religious purposes only, there shall be no discrimination against any citizen on the ground only of race, religion, caste, sex or place of birth.

(2) Nothing in this Article shall prevent the making of any special provision for women.

15.—(1) No person shall be deprived of his property save in accordance with law.

(2) No property shall be compulsorily acquired or taken possession of save for a public purpose, and save by the authority of law which provides for compensation therefor and either fixes the amount of compensation or specifies the principles on which and the manner in which compensation is to be determined and given.

(3) Nothing in this Article shall affect the validity of—

- (a) any existing law, or
- (b) any law permitting the compulsory acquisition or taking possession of any property for preventing danger to life, property or public health, or
- (c) any law relating to the administration or acquisition of any property which is or is deemed to be evacuee property under any law, or
- (d) any law providing for the taking over by the State for a limited period of the management of any property for the benefit of its owner.

(4) In clauses (2) and (3), "property" shall mean immovable property, or any commercial or industrial undertaking, or any interest in any such undertaking.

16.—(1) No person shall be held in slavery.

(2) All forms of forced labour are prohibited, but the State may require compulsory service for public purposes.

17.—(1) No citizen otherwise qualified for appointment in the service of Pakistan shall be discriminated against in respect of any such appointment on the ground only of race, religion, caste, sex, residence or place of birth :

Provided that for a period of fifteen years from the Constitution Day, posts may be reserved for persons belonging to any class or area to secure their adequate representation in the service of Pakistan :

Provided further that in the interest of the said service, specified posts or services may be reserved for members of either sex.

(2) Nothing in clause (1) shall prevent any Provincial Government or any local or other authority from prescribing, in relation to any class of service under that Government or authority, conditions as to residence in the Province prior to appointment under that Government or authority.

18. Subject to law, public order and morality—

- (a) every citizen has the right to profess, practise and propagate any religion; and

Safeguards as to educational institutions in respect of religion, etc.

Non-discrimination in respect of access to public places.

Protection of property rights.

Slavery and forced labour prohibited.

Safeguard against discrimination in services.

Freedom to profess religion and

Constitution of the Islamic Republic Of Pakistan

to manage religious institutions.

Preservation of culture, script, and language.

Abolition of untouchability.

Safeguard against taxation for purposes of any particular religion.

Remedies for enforcement of rights conferred by this Part.

Promotion of Muslim unity and international peace.

Promotion of Islamic principles.

Parochial and other similar prejudices to be discouraged.

Protection of minorities.

Principles of social uplift.

(b) every religious denomination and every sect thereof has the right to establish, maintain and manage its religious institutions.

19. Any section of citizens having a distinct language, script or culture shall have the right to preserve the same.

20. Untouchability is abolished, and its practice in any form is forbidden and shall be declared by law to be an offence.

21. No person shall be compelled to pay any special tax the proceeds of which are to be spent on the propagation or maintenance of any religion other than his own.

22.—(1) The right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of the rights conferred by this Part is guaranteed.

(2) The Supreme Court shall have power to issue to any person or authority, including in appropriate cases any Government, directions, orders or writs, including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari, whichever may be appropriate, for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by this Part.

(3) The right guaranteed by this Article shall not be suspended except as otherwise provided by the Constitution.

(4) The provisions of this Article shall have no application in relation to the Special Areas.

PART III
Directive Principles of State Policy

23.—(1) In this Part, unless the context otherwise requires, "the State" has the same meaning as in Part II.

(2) The State shall be guided in the formulation of its policies by the provisions of this Part, but such provisions shall not be enforceable in any court.

24. The State shall endeavour to strengthen the bonds of unity among Muslim countries, to promote international peace and security, to foster goodwill and friendly relations among all nations, and to encourage the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means.

25.—(1) Steps shall be taken to enable the Muslims of Pakistan individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the Holy Quran and Sunnah.

(2) The State shall endeavour, as respects the Muslims of Pakistan,—
(a) to provide facilities whereby they may be enabled to understand the meaning of life according to the Holy Quran and Sunnah ;
(b) to make the teaching of the Holy Quran compulsory ;
(c) to promote unity and the observance of Islamic moral standards ; and
(d) to secure the proper organization of zakat, wakfs and mosques.

26. The State shall discourage parochial, racial, tribal, sectarian and provincial prejudices among the citizens.

27. The State shall safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of the minorities, including their due representation in the Federal and Provincial Services.

28. The State shall endeavour to—
(a) promote, with special care, the educational and economic interests of the people of the Special Areas, the backward classes and the Scheduled Castes ;
(b) remove illiteracy, and provide free and compulsory primary education within the minimum possible period ;

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

(c) make provision for securing just and humane conditions of work, ensuring that children and women are not employed in avocations unsuited to their age and sex, and for maternity benefits for women in employment ;

(d) enable the people of different areas, through education, training and industrial development, to participate fully in all forms of national activities, including employment in the service of Pakistan ;

(e) prevent prostitution, gambling and the taking of injurious drugs ; and

(f) prevent the consumption of alcoholic liquor otherwise than for medicinal and, in the case of non-Muslims, religious purposes.

29. The State shall endeavour to—

(a) secure the well-being of the people, irrespective of caste, creed, or race, by raising the standard of living of the common man, by preventing the concentration of wealth and means of production and distribution in the hands of a few to the detriment of the interest of the common man, and by ensuring equitable adjustment of rights between employers and employees, and landlords and tenants ;

(b) provide for all citizens, within the available resources of the country, facilities for work and adequate livelihood with reasonable rest and leisure ;

(c) provide for all persons in the service of Pakistan and private concerns social security by means of compulsory social insurance or otherwise ;

(d) provide basic necessities of life, such as food, clothing, housing, education and medical relief, for all such citizens, irrespective of caste, creed or race, as are permanently or temporarily unable to earn their livelihood on account of infirmity, sickness or unemployment ;

(e) reduce disparity, to a reasonable limit, in the emoluments of persons in the various classes of service of Pakistan ; and

(f) eliminate riba as early as possible.

30. The State shall separate the Judiciary from the Executive as soon as practicable.

Promotion of social and economic well-being of the people.

Separation of the Judiciary from the Executive.

Provisions for equal participation in national activities by people of Pakistan.

The President

Term of office of President

31.—(1) Endeavour shall be made by the State to enable people from all parts of Pakistan to participate in the Defence Services of the country.

(2) Steps shall be taken to achieve parity in the representation of East Pakistan and West Pakistan in all other spheres of Federal administration.

PART IV
The Federation

CHAPTER I.—THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

32.—(1) There shall be a President of Pakistan, in the Constitution referred to as the President, who shall be elected by an electoral college consisting of the members of the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, in accordance with the provisions contained in the First Schedule.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in Part II, a person shall not be qualified for election as President unless he is a Muslim ; nor shall he be so qualified—

(a) if he is less than forty years of age ; or
(b) if he is not qualified for election as a member of the National Assembly ; or
(c) if he has previously been removed from the office of President by impeachment under Article 35.

(3) The validity of the election of the President shall not be questioned in any court.

33.—(1) Subject to clause (3) and Article 35 the President shall hold office for a term of five years from the date on which he enters upon his office :

Provided that notwithstanding the expiration of his term, the President shall continue to hold office until his successor enters upon his office.

(2) No person shall hold office as President for more than two terms.

(3) The President may resign his office by writing under his hand addressed to the Speaker of the National Assembly.

Disabilities of the President.

(4) When a vacancy occurs in the office of President by the death, resignation or removal of the President, or by the expiration of the term of his office, it shall be filled, as soon as may be, in accordance with clause (1) of Article 32.

Impeachment of the President.

34.—(1) The President shall not hold any office of profit in the service of Pakistan, or any other position carrying the right to remuneration for the rendering of services, but nothing in this clause shall prevent him from holding or managing any private property.

(2) The President shall not be qualified for election as a member of the National or a Provincial Assembly; and if a member of any such Assembly is elected as President his seat in that Assembly shall become vacant on the day on which he enters upon his office.

35.—(1) The President may be impeached on a charge of violating the Constitution or gross misconduct.

(2) No such charge shall be preferred unless not less than one-third of the total number of members of the National Assembly give to the Speaker of that Assembly notice of their intention to move a resolution for the impeachment of the President, and no such resolution shall be moved in the Assembly unless fourteen days have expired from the date on which notice of such resolution is communicated to the President.

(3) The President shall have the right to appear and be represented during the consideration of the charge.

(4) If, after the consideration of the charge, a resolution is passed by the National Assembly, by the votes of not less than three-fourths of the total number of members, declaring that the charge has been substantiated, the President shall vacate his office on the day on which the resolution is passed.

(5) Where the Speaker of the National Assembly is exercising the functions of the President under Article 36, the provisions of this Article shall apply subject to the modification that the reference to the Speaker in clause (2) shall be construed as a reference to the Deputy Speaker, and that the reference in clause (4) to the removal from office of the President shall be construed as a reference to the removal of the Speaker from his office as Speaker; and on the passing of a resolution such as is referred to in clause (4) the Speaker shall cease to exercise the functions of President.

Speaker of National Assembly to act as President.

36.—(1) If a vacancy occurs in the office of President, or if the President is absent from Pakistan or is unable to discharge the duties of his office owing to illness or any other cause, the Speaker of the National Assembly shall exercise the functions of President until a President is elected, or until the President resumes the duties of his office, as the case may be.

(2) For any period during which the Speaker of the National Assembly exercises the functions of President he shall be entitled to the same remuneration and privileges as are admissible to the President, but he shall not, during any such period, exercise any of the functions of the office of the Speaker or of a member of the National Assembly, or be entitled to the remuneration and privileges admissible to the Speaker or such a member.

The Cabinet.

37.—(1) There shall be a Cabinet of Ministers with the Prime Minister at its head, to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions.

(2) The question whether any, and if so, what, advice has been tendered by the Cabinet, or a Minister or Minister of State, shall not be inquired into in any court.

(3) The President shall, in his discretion, appoint from amongst the members of the National Assembly a Prime Minister, who, in his opinion, is most likely to command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly.

(4) Other Ministers, Ministers of State and Deputy Ministers shall be appointed and removed from office by the President, but no person shall be appointed a Minister of State or Deputy Minister unless he is a member of the National Assembly.

(5) The Cabinet, together with the Ministers of State, shall be collectively responsible to the National Assembly.

(6) The Prime Minister shall hold office during the pleasure of the President, but the President shall not exercise his powers under this clause unless he is satisfied that the Prime Minister does not command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly.

(7) In the exercise of his functions, the President shall act in accordance with the advice of the Cabinet or the appropriate Minister or Minister of State, as the case may be, except in cases where he is empowered by the Constitution to act in his discretion, and except as respects the exercise of his powers under clause (6).

Explanation.—For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that for the purposes of clause (4) the appropriate Minister shall be the Prime Minister.

(8) A Minister who for any period of six consecutive months is not a member of the National Assembly shall, at the expiration of that period, cease to be a Minister, and shall not before the dissolution of that Assembly be again appointed a Minister unless he is elected a member of that Assembly.

(9) Nothing in this Article shall be construed as disqualifying the Prime Minister or any other Minister, or a Minister of State or Deputy Minister, for continuing in office during any period during which the National Assembly stands dissolved, or as preventing the appointment of any person as Prime Minister or other Minister, or as Minister of State or Deputy Minister, during any such period.

38.—(1) The President shall appoint an Attorney-General for Pakistan, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the President, shall receive such remuneration as may be determined by the President, and shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the President.

(2) No person shall be qualified for appointment as Attorney-General for Pakistan unless he is qualified for appointment as a Judge of the Supreme Court, but no person shall be appointed as Attorney-General if he is or has been a Judge of the Supreme Court or of a High Court.

(3) In the performance of his official duties the Attorney-General shall have a right of audience in all courts in Pakistan.

39.—(1) The executive authority of the Federation shall vest in the President and shall be exercised by him, either directly or through officers subordinate to him, in accordance with the Constitution.

(2) The executive authority of the Federation shall extend to all matters with respect to which Parliament has power to make laws :

Provided that, save as expressly provided in the Constitution or in any Act of Parliament which Parliament is, under the Constitution, competent to enact for a Province, the said authority shall not extend in any Province to any matter with respect to which the Provincial Legislature also has power to make laws.

40.—(1) The Supreme Command of the Armed Forces shall vest in the President, and the exercise thereof shall be regulated by law.

(2) Until Parliament makes provision by law in that behalf, the President shall have the power—

- (a) to raise and maintain the Naval, Military and Air Forces of Pakistan and the Reserves of such Forces ;
- (b) to grant Commissions in such Forces ; and
- (c) to appoint Commanders-in-Chief of the Army, Navy and Air Forces and determine their salaries and allowances.

41.—(1) All executive actions of the Federal Government shall be expressed to be taken in the name of the President.

(2) The President shall by rules specify the manner in which orders and other instruments made and executed in his name shall be authenticated, and the validity of any order or instrument so authenticated shall not be questioned in any court on the ground that it was not made or executed by the President.

(3) The President shall also make rules for the allocation and transaction of the business of the Federal Government.

42. It shall be the duty of the Prime Minister—

- (a) to communicate to the President all decisions of the Cabinet relating to the administration of the affairs of the Federation and proposals for legislation ;
- (b) to furnish such information relating to the administration of the affairs of the Federation and proposals for legislation as the President may call for ; and
- (c) if the President so requires, to submit, for the consideration of the Cabinet any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Cabinet.

CHAPTER II.—THE PARLIAMENT OF PAKISTAN

43. There shall be a Parliament of Pakistan consisting of the President and one House, to be known as the National Assembly.

44.—(1) Subject to the succeeding clauses, the National Assembly shall consist of three hundred members, one half of whom shall be elected by constituencies in East Pakistan, and the other half by constituencies in West Pakistan.

(2) In addition to the seats for the members mentioned in clause (1), there shall, for a period of ten years from the Constitution Day, be ten seats reserved for women members only, of whom five shall be elected by constituencies in East Pakistan, and five by constituencies in West Pakistan ; and constituencies shall accordingly be delimited as women's territorial constituencies for this purpose :

Provided that a woman who, under this clause, is a member of the Assembly at the time of the expiration of the said period of ten years shall not cease to be a member until the Assembly is dissolved.

Right of Ministers and the Attorney-General to address the National Assembly.

(3) Parliament may by Act alter the number of members of the National Assembly, provided that equality of representation between East Pakistan and West Pakistan is preserved.

(4) Parliament may by Act provide for the representation in the National Assembly of any territory which is included in a Province after the Constitution Day, but no such Act shall alter the number of members to be elected by constituencies in that Province.

45.—(1) A person shall be qualified to be elected to the National Assembly—

(a) if he is not less than twenty-five years of age, and is qualified to be an elector for any constituency for the National Assembly under Article 143 ; and

(b) if he is not disqualified for being a member by the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.

(2) If any question arises whether a member has, after his election, become subject to any disqualification, the Speaker of the National Assembly shall obtain the opinion of the Election Commission and, if the opinion is that the member has incurred any disqualification, his seat shall become vacant.

(3) If any person sits or votes in the National Assembly knowing that he is not qualified for, or is disqualified for, membership thereof, he shall be liable in respect of every day on which he so sits or votes to a penalty of five hundred rupees, which may be recovered from him as a debt due to the Federation.

46.—(1) No person shall at the same time be a member of the National Assembly for two or more constituencies.

(2) Nothing in clause (1) shall prevent a person from being at the same time a candidate for two or more constituencies, but if a person has been elected as a member for two or more constituencies and does not, within thirty days of his election by the constituency by which he has been elected last, make a declaration in writing under his hand addressed to the Speaker specifying the constituency which he wishes to represent, all his seats in the National Assembly shall become vacant ; but so long as a person is a member for two or more constituencies he shall not sit or vote in the Assembly.

(3) If a member of the National Assembly for one constituency permits himself to be nominated as a candidate for election by another constituency for the Assembly, his seat in respect of the former constituency shall become vacant.

47. If a member of the National Assembly is absent from the Assembly, without leave of the Assembly, for sixty consecutive sitting days, his seat shall become vacant.

48. If a member of the National Assembly fails to make and subscribe an oath or affirmation in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution within a period of six months from the date of the first meeting of the Assembly after his election, his seat shall become vacant :

Provided that the Speaker may, before the expiration of the said period, for good cause shown, extend the period.

49. A member of the National Assembly may resign his seat by notice in writing under his hand addressed to the Speaker.

Meetings and Procedure of the National Assembly

50.—(1) The President may summon, prorogue or dissolve the National Assembly and shall, when summoning the Assembly, fix the time and place of the meeting :

Provided that at least one session of the National Assembly in each year shall be held at Dacca.

(2) Whenever a Prime Minister is appointed, the National Assembly, if, at the time of the appointment, it is not sitting and does not stand dissolved, shall be summoned so as to meet within two months thereafter.

(3) Unless sooner dissolved, the National Assembly shall stand dissolved on the expiration of five years from the date of its first meeting.

51. There shall be at least two sessions of the National Assembly in every year, and six months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Assembly in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

52. The President may address the National Assembly and may send messages thereto.

53. Every Minister and the Attorney-General shall have the right to speak in, and otherwise take part in the proceedings of, the National Assembly, and of any committee thereof of which he may be named a member, but shall not by virtue of this Article be entitled to vote.

Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the National Assembly.

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

54.—(1) The National Assembly shall, as soon as may be, choose two of its members to be respectively Speaker and Deputy Speaker thereof, and so often as the office of Speaker or Deputy Speaker becomes vacant, the Assembly shall choose another member to be Speaker or Deputy Speaker, as the case may be.

(2) A member holding office as Speaker or Deputy Speaker shall vacate his office if he ceases to be a member of the National Assembly, may at any time resign his office by writing under his hand addressed to the President, and may be removed from his office by a resolution of the Assembly passed by a majority of the total number of members thereof; but no resolution for the purpose of this clause shall be moved unless at least fourteen days' notice has been given of the intention to move the resolution :

Provided that whenever the National Assembly is dissolved, the Speaker shall not, by virtue of the dissolution, vacate his office until immediately before the first meeting of the Assembly after the dissolution.

(3) While the office of Speaker is vacant, or the Speaker is acting as President, or is otherwise unable to perform the duties of his office, those duties shall be performed by the Deputy Speaker, or if the office of Deputy Speaker is also vacant, by such member of the Assembly as the President may appoint for the purpose; and during any absence of the Speaker from any sitting of the Assembly the Deputy Speaker, or if he also is absent, such person as may be determined by the rules of procedure of the Assembly, shall act as Speaker.

55.—(1) Subject to the provisions of the Constitution—

(a) the procedure of the National Assembly shall be regulated by rules of procedure framed by the Assembly ;

(b) a decision in the National Assembly shall be taken by a majority of the members present and voting; but the person presiding shall not vote except when there is an equality of votes, in which case he shall have and exercise a casting vote ;

(c) the National Assembly shall have power to act, notwithstanding any vacancy in the membership thereof, and any proceedings in the Assembly shall not be invalid only for the reason that some person who was not entitled to do so, sat or voted or otherwise took part in the proceedings.

(2) If at any time during a meeting of the National Assembly the attention of the person presiding is drawn to the fact that less than forty members are present, it shall be the duty of the person presiding either to adjourn the Assembly, or to suspend the meeting until at least forty members are present.

56.—(1) The validity of any proceedings in the National Assembly shall not be questioned in any court.

(2) No officer or member of the National Assembly in whom powers are vested for the regulation of procedure, or the conduct of business, or the maintenance of order in the Assembly, shall, in relation to the exercise by him of any of those powers, be subject to the jurisdiction of any court.

(3) No member of the National Assembly, and no person entitled to speak therein, shall be liable to any proceedings in any court in respect of anything said or any vote given by him in the Assembly or any committee thereof.

(4) No person shall be liable to any proceedings in any court in respect of the publication by or under the authority of the National Assembly of any report, paper, vote or proceedings.

(5) Subject to this Article, the privileges of the National Assembly, the committees and members thereof, and the persons entitled to speak therein, may be determined by Act of Parliament.

57.—(1) When a Bill has been passed by the National Assembly it shall be presented to the President, who shall, within ninety days,—

(a) assent to the Bill ; or

(b) declare that he withdraws assent therefrom ; or

(c) in the case of a Bill, other than a Money Bill, return the Bill to the Assembly with a message requesting that the Bill, or any specified provision thereof, be reconsidered, and that any amendments specified by him in the message be considered.

(2) When the President has declared that he withdraws assent from a Bill the National Assembly shall be competent to reconsider the Bill, and if it is again passed, with or without amendment, by the Assembly, by the votes of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting, it shall be again presented to the President, and the President shall assent thereto.

(3) When the President has returned a Bill to the National Assembly it shall be reconsidered by the Assembly, and if it is again passed, with or without amendment, by the Assembly, by a majority of the total number of members of the Assembly, it shall be again presented to the President, and the President shall assent thereto.

Financial Procedure

58.—(1) In this Part, "Money Bill" means a Bill containing only provisions dealing with all or any of the following matters, that is to say—

Rules of procedure, quorum, etc.

Privileges, etc., of members of the National Assembly.

President's assent to Bills.

Money Bills.

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

- (a) the imposition, abolition, remission, alteration or regulation of any tax ;
 - (b) the borrowing of money, or the giving of any guarantee, by the Federal Government, or the amendment of the law relating to the financial obligations of that Government ;
 - (c) the custody of the Federal Consolidated Fund, the payment of moneys into or the issue or appropriation of moneys from, such Fund ;
 - (d) the imposition of a charge upon the Federal Consolidated Fund, or the abolition or alteration of any such charge ;
 - (e) the receipt of moneys on account of the Federal Consolidated Fund, or the Public Account of the Federation, or the custody or issue of such moneys, or the audit of the accounts of the Federal or a Provincial Government ; and
 - (f) any matter incidental to any of the matters specified in the aforesaid sub-clauses.
- (2) A Bill shall not be deemed to be a Money Bill by reason only that—
- (a) it provides for the imposition or alteration of any fine, or other pecuniary penalty, or for the demand or payment of a licence fee, or a fee or charge for any service rendered ; or
 - (b) it provides for the imposition, abolition, remission, alteration or regulation of any tax by any local authority or body for local purposes.

(3) Every Money Bill, when it is presented to the President for his assent, shall bear a certificate under the hand of the Speaker that it is a Money Bill, and such certificate shall be conclusive for all purposes and shall not be questioned in any court.

President's recommendation required for financial measures.

No taxation except by an Act of Parliament.

Federal Consolidated Fund and the Public Account of the Federation.

Custody of public moneys of the Federation.

Annual Financial Statement.

59. No Bill or amendment which makes provision for any of the matters specified in clause (1) of Article 58, or which if enacted and brought into operation would involve expenditure from the revenues of the Federation, shall be introduced or moved in the National Assembly except on the recommendation of the President.

60. No tax shall be levied for the purposes of the Federation except by or under the authority of an Act of Parliament.

61.—(1) All revenues received by the Federal Government, all loans raised by that Government, and all moneys received by it in repayment of any loan, shall form part of one consolidated fund, to be known as the Federal Consolidated Fund.

(2) All other public moneys received by or on behalf of the Federal Government shall be credited to the Public Account of the Federation.

62.—(1) The custody of the Federal Consolidated Fund, the payment of moneys into such Fund, the withdrawal of moneys therefrom, the custody of public moneys other than those credited to such Fund received by or on behalf of the Federal Government, their payment into the Public Account of the Federation and the withdrawal of moneys from such Account, and all matters connected with or ancillary to matters aforesaid, shall be regulated by Act of Parliament and, until provision in that behalf is so made, by rules made by the President.

(2) All moneys received by or deposited with—

- (a) any officer employed in connection with the affairs of the Federation in his capacity as such, other than revenues or public moneys raised or received by the Federal Government ;
- (b) any court to the credit of any cause, matter, account or person in connection with the affairs of the Federation ;

shall be paid into the Public Account of the Federation.

63.—(1) The President shall, in respect of every financial year, cause to be laid before the National Assembly a statement of the estimated receipts and expenditure of the Federal Government for that year, in this Part referred to as the Annual Financial Statement.

(2) The Annual Financial Statement shall show separately—

- (a) the sums required to meet expenditure described by the Constitution as expenditure charged upon the Federal Consolidated Fund ; and
- (b) the sums required to meet other expenditure proposed to be made from the Federal Consolidated Fund ;

and shall distinguish expenditure on revenue account from other expenditure.

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

64. The following expenditure shall be charged upon the Federal Consolidated Fund :—

- (a) the remuneration payable to the President and other expenditure relating to his office, and the remuneration payable to—
 - (i) the Judges of the Supreme Court;
 - (ii) the members of the Federal Public Service Commission ;
 - (iii) the Comptroller and Auditor General ;
 - (iv) the Election Commissioners and Regional Election Commissioners ;
 - (v) the Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the National Assembly ; and
 - (vi) the members of the Delimitation Commission ;
- (b) the administrative expenses, including the remuneration payable to officers and servants, of the Supreme Court, the Federal Public Service Commission, the department of the Comptroller and Auditor-General, the Election Commission, the Secretariat of the National Assembly, and the Delimitation Commission ;
- (c) all debt charges for which the Federal Government is liable, including interest, sinking fund charges, the repayment or amortisation of capital, and other expenditure in connection with the raising of loans, and the service and redemption of debt on the security of the Federal Consolidated Fund ;
- (d) any sums required to satisfy any judgment, decree or award against Pakistan by any court or tribunal ; and
- (e) any other sums declared by the Constitution or by an Act of Parliament to be so charged.

65.—(1) So much of the Annual Financial Statement as relates to expenditure charged upon the Federal Consolidated Fund may be discussed in, but shall not be submitted to the vote of, the National Assembly.

(2) So much of the Annual Financial Statement as relates to other expenditure shall be submitted to the National Assembly in the form of demands for grants, and that Assembly shall have power to assent to, or to refuse to assent to any demand, or to assent to any demand subject to a reduction of the amount specified therein.

(3) No demand for a grant shall be made except on the recommendation of the President.

66.—(1) As soon as may be after the grants under the last preceding Article have been made by the National Assembly, there shall be introduced in the Assembly a Bill to provide for appropriation out of the Federal Consolidated Fund of all moneys required to meet—

(a) the grants so made by the National Assembly ; and
 (b) the expenditure charged on the Federal Consolidated Fund, but not exceeding in any case the amount shown in the statement previously laid before the National Assembly.

(2) No amendment shall be proposed in the National Assembly to any such Bill which shall have the effect of varying the amount or altering the destination of any grant so made.

(3) Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, no money shall be withdrawn from the Federal Consolidated Fund except under appropriation made by law passed in accordance with the provisions of this Article.

67. If in respect of any financial year it is found—

- (a) that the amount authorized to be expended for a particular service for the current financial year is insufficient, or that a need has arisen for expenditure upon some new service not included in the Annual Financial Statement for that year, or
- (b) that any money has been spent on any service during a financial year in excess of the amount granted for that service for that year ;

the President shall have power to authorize expenditure from the Federal Consolidated Fund, whether the expenditure is charged by the constitution upon that Fund or not, and shall cause to be laid before the National Assembly a Supplementary Financial Statement, or as the case may be, an Excess Financial Statement, setting out the amount of that expenditure, and the provisions of Articles 63 to 66 shall apply to the aforesaid statements as they apply to the Annual Financial Statement.

68.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this chapter, the National Assembly shall have power—

- (a) to make any grant in advance in respect of the estimated expenditure for a part of any financial year pending the completion of the procedure prescribed in Article 65 for the voting of such grant and the passing of law in accordance with the provisions of Article 66 in relation to that expenditure ;

Charges on the Federal Consolidated Fund.

Procedure relating to Annual Financial Statement.

Appropriation Bill.

Supplementary and Excess Grants.

Votes on Account, Votes of Credit, etc.

(b) to make a grant for meeting an unexpected demand upon the resources of the Federation when on account of the magnitude or the indefinite character of the service, the demand cannot be specified with the details ordinarily given in an Annual Financial Statement;

(c) to make an exceptional grant which forms no part of the current service of any financial year; and Parliament shall have power to authorize by law the withdrawal of moneys from the Federal Consolidated Fund for the purposes for which the said grants are made.

(2) The provisions of Articles 65 and 66 shall have effect in relation to the making of any grant under clause (1) and to any law to be made under that clause as they have effect in relation to the making of a grant with regard to any expenditure mentioned in the Annual Financial Statement and law to be made for the authorization of appropriation of money out of the Federal Consolidated Fund to meet such expenditure.

Legislative Powers of the President

Promulgation of Ordinances when National Assembly is not in session.

69.—(1) If at any time, except when the National Assembly is in session, the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render immediate action necessary, he may make and promulgate such Ordinances as the circumstances appear to him to require, and any Ordinance so made shall have the like force of law as an Act of Parliament, but the power of making Ordinances under this clause shall be subject to the like restrictions as the power of Parliament to make laws, and any Ordinance made under this clause may be controlled or superseded by any such Act.

(2) An Ordinance promulgated under clause (1) shall be laid before the National Assembly, and shall cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the next meeting of the Assembly, or if a resolution disapproving it is passed by the Assembly, upon the passing of that resolution.

(3) At any time when the National Assembly stands dissolved, the President may, if he is satisfied that circumstances exist which render such action necessary, make and promulgate an Ordinance authorizing expenditure from the Federal Consolidated Fund, whether the expenditure is charged by the Constitution upon that Fund or not, pending compliance with the provisions of Articles 63, 65 and 66.

(4) As soon as may be after the date of the reconstitution of the National Assembly, any Ordinance promulgated under clause (3) shall be laid before the Assembly, and the provisions of Articles 63, 65 and 66 shall be complied with within six weeks from that date.

PART V
The Provinces

CHAPTER I.—THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

70.—(1) There shall be a Governor for each Province who shall be appointed by the President and shall hold office during the pleasure of the President.

(2) No person shall be eligible for appointment as Governor unless he is a citizen of Pakistan and is not less than forty years of age.

(3) A Governor may resign his office by writing under his hand addressed to the President.

(4) Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Article, a Governor shall hold office for a period of five years from the date on which he enters upon his office.

(5) A Governor shall not be a member of the National or a Provincial Assembly, and if a member of any such Assembly is appointed a Governor, his seat in that Assembly shall become vacant on the date on which he enters upon his office.

71.—(1) There shall be a Cabinet of Ministers with the Chief Minister at its head, to aid and advise the Governor in the exercise of his functions.

(2) The question whether any, and if so, what, advice has been tendered by the Cabinet or a Minister to the Governor shall not be inquired into in any Court.

(3) The Governor shall, in his discretion, appoint from amongst the members of the Provincial Assembly a Chief Minister, who, in his opinion, is most likely to command the confidence of the majority of the members of the Provincial Assembly.

(4) Other Ministers, Deputy Ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries shall be appointed and removed from office by the Governor, but no person shall be appointed a Deputy Minister or Parliamentary Secretary unless he is a member of the Provincial Assembly.

(5) The Cabinet shall be collectively responsible to the Provincial Assembly.

(6) The Chief Minister shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor, but the Governor shall not exercise his powers under this clause unless he is satisfied that the Chief Minister does not command the confidence of the majority of the members of the Provincial Assembly.

The Governors.

The Cabinet.

(7) In the exercise of his functions, the Governor shall act in accordance with the advice of the Cabinet or the appropriate Minister, as the case may be, except in cases where he is empowered by the Constitution to act in his discretion, and except as respects the exercise of his powers under clause (6).

Explanation.—For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that for the purposes of clause (4) the appropriate Minister shall be the Chief Minister.

(8) A Minister who for any period of six consecutive months is not a member of the Provincial Assembly shall, at the expiration of that period, cease to be a Minister, and shall not before the dissolution of that Assembly be again appointed a Minister unless he is elected a member of that Assembly.

(9) Nothing in this Article shall be construed as disqualifying the Chief Minister or any other Minister, or a Deputy Minister or Parliamentary Secretary, for continuing in office during any period during which the Provincial Assembly stands dissolved, or as preventing the appointment of any person as Chief Minister or other Minister, or as Deputy Minister or Parliamentary Secretary, during any such period.

72.—(1) The Governor shall appoint an Advocate-General for the Province, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor, shall receive such remuneration as may be determined by the Governor, and shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the Governor.

(2) No person shall be qualified for appointment as Advocate-General unless he is qualified for appointment as a Judge of a High Court, but no person shall be appointed as Advocate-General if he is or has been a Judge of the Supreme Court or of a High Court.

(3) A person shall not hold office as Advocate-General after he has attained the age of sixty-five years.

73.—(1) The executive authority of a Province shall vest in the Governor and shall be exercised by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him, in accordance with the Constitution.

(2) Except as expressly provided in the Constitution, the executive authority of a Province shall extend to all matters with respect to which the Provincial Legislature has power to make laws.

74.—(1) All executive actions of the Government of a Province shall be expressed to be taken in the name of the Governor thereof.

(2) The Governor shall by rules specify the manner in which orders and other instruments made and executed in his name shall be authenticated, and the validity of any order or instrument so authenticated shall not be questioned in any court on the ground that it was not made or executed by the Governor.

(3) The Governor shall also make rules for the allocation and transaction of the business of the Provincial Government.

75. It shall be the duty of the Chief Minister of each Province—

- to communicate to the Governor of the Province all decisions of the Cabinet relating to the administration of the affairs of the Province and proposals for legislation;
- to furnish such information relating to the administration of the affairs of the Province and proposals for legislation as the Governor may call for; and
- if the Governor so requires, to submit for the consideration of the Cabinet any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Cabinet.

CHAPTER II.—THE PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURE

76. There shall be a Provincial Legislature for each Province consisting of the Governor and one House, to be known as the Provincial Assembly.

77.—(1) Subject to the succeeding clauses, each Provincial Assembly shall consist of three hundred members.

(2) In addition to the seats in each Provincial Assembly for the members mentioned in clause (1), there shall, for a period of ten years from the Constitution Day, be ten seats reserved in each Provincial Assembly for women members only; and constituencies shall accordingly be delimited as women's territorial constituencies for this purpose:

Provided that a woman who, under this clause, is a member of a Provincial Assembly at the time of the expiration of the said period of ten years, shall not cease to be a member until the Assembly is dissolved.

(3) Parliament may by Act alter the number of the members of the Provincial Assemblies, provided that the number of members of the two Assemblies shall remain equal.

(4) Parliament may, with the consent of a Provincial Assembly, by Act provide for the representation in that Assembly of any territory which is included in the Province after the Constitution Day, but no such Act shall alter the number of members of the Assembly.

(5) Until the fourteenth day of October, 1965, the number of members of the Provincial Assembly of the Province of West Pakistan elected by constituencies in the territory which, immediately before the Qualifications and disqualifications for membership.

78.—(1) A person shall be qualified to be elected to a Provincial Assembly—

- (a) if he is not less than twenty-five years of age and is qualified to be an elector for any constituency for the Provincial Assembly under Article 143; and
- (b) if he is not disqualified for being a member by the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.

(2) If any question arises whether a member has, after his election, become subject to any disqualification, the Speaker of the Provincial Assembly shall obtain the opinion of the Election Commission and, if the opinion is that the member has incurred any disqualification, his seat shall become vacant.

(3) If any person sits or votes in a Provincial Assembly knowing that he is not qualified for, or is disqualified for, membership thereof, he shall be liable in respect of every day on which he so sits or votes to a penalty of five hundred rupees, which may be recovered from him as a debt due to the Province.

Bar against double membership.

79.—(1) No person shall at the same time be a member of the National Assembly and of a Provincial Assembly, and if a person has been elected as a member both of the National Assembly and of a Provincial Assembly, and does not, within thirty days of his election to the Assembly to which he has been elected last, resign one of his seats, his seat in the Provincial Assembly shall become vacant.

(2) No person shall at the same time be a member of both the Provincial Assemblies, and if a person has been elected as a member of both the Assemblies and does not, within thirty days of his election to the second Assembly, resign one of his seats, his seats in both the Assemblies shall become vacant.

(3) No person shall at the same time be a member of a Provincial Assembly for two or more constituencies; but nothing in this clause shall prevent a person from being at the same time a candidate for two or more constituencies, but if a person has been elected as a member for two or more constituencies and does not, within thirty days of his election by the constituency by which he has been elected last, make a declaration in writing under his hand addressed to the Speaker specifying the constituency which he wishes to represent, all his seats in the Assembly shall become vacant; but so long as a person is a member for two or more constituencies he shall not sit or vote in the Assembly.

(4) If a member of a Provincial Assembly for one constituency permits himself to be nominated as a candidate for election by another constituency for the Assembly, his seat in respect of the former constituency shall become vacant.

Absence from Provincial Assembly.

80. If a member of a Provincial Assembly is absent from the Assembly, without leave of the Assembly, for sixty consecutive sitting days, his seat shall become vacant.

Oath of Members.

81. If a member of a Provincial Assembly fails to make and subscribe an oath or affirmation in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution within a period of six months from the date of the first meeting of the Assembly after his election, his seat shall become vacant:

Provided that the Speaker may, before the expiration of the said period, for good cause shown, extend the period.

Resignation of members.

82. A member of Provincial Assembly may resign his seat by notice in writing under his hand addressed to the Speaker.

Meetings and Procedure of Provincial Assembly

Duration, summoning, prorogation and dissolution of a Provincial Assembly.

83.—(1) The Governor may summon, prorogue or dissolve the Provincial Assembly and shall, when summoning the Assembly, fix the time and place of the meeting.

(2) Whenever a Chief Minister of a Provincial Government is appointed, the Provincial Assembly, if, at the time of the appointment, it is not sitting and does not stand dissolved, shall be summoned so as to meet within two months thereafter.

(3) Unless sooner dissolved, a Provincial Assembly shall stand dissolved on the expiration of five years from the date of its first meeting.

Governor's address and messages to the Provincial Assembly.

85. The Governor of a Province may address the Provincial Assembly and may send messages thereto.

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

86. Every Minister and the Advocate-General of a Province shall have the right to speak in, and otherwise take part in the proceedings of, the Provincial Assembly, and of any committee thereof of which he may be named a member, but shall not by virtue of this Article be entitled to vote.

Right of Ministers and the Advocate-General to address a Provincial Assembly.

Speaker and Deputy Speaker.

87.—(1) Every Provincial Assembly shall, as soon as may be, choose two of its members to be respectively Speaker and Deputy Speaker thereof and, so often as the office of Speaker or Deputy Speaker becomes vacant, the Assembly shall choose another member to be Speaker or Deputy Speaker, as the case may be.

(2) A member holding office as Speaker or Deputy Speaker shall vacate his office if he ceases to be a member of the Provincial Assembly, may at any time resign his office by writing under his hand addressed to the Governor, and may be removed from his office by a resolution of the Assembly passed by a majority of the total number of members thereof; but no resolution for the purpose of this clause shall be moved unless at least fourteen days' notice has been given of the intention to move the resolution:

Provided that whenever the Provincial Assembly is dissolved the Speaker shall not, by virtue of the dissolution, vacate his office until immediately before the first meeting of the Assembly after the dissolution.

(3) While the office of Speaker is vacant, or the Speaker is for any reason unable to perform the duties of his office, those duties shall be performed by the Deputy Speaker, or if the office of Deputy Speaker is also vacant, by such member of the Assembly as the Governor may appoint for the purpose; and during any absence of the Speaker from any sitting of the Assembly the Deputy Speaker, or if he also is absent, such person as may be determined by the rules of procedure of the Assembly, shall act as Speaker.

88.—(1) Subject to the provisions of the Constitution—

- (a) the procedure of a Provincial Assembly shall be regulated by rules of procedure framed by the Assembly;
- (b) a decision in a Provincial Assembly shall be taken by a majority of the members present and voting; but the person presiding shall not vote except when there is an equality of votes, in which case he shall have and exercise a casting vote;
- (c) a Provincial Assembly shall have power to act notwithstanding any vacancy in the membership thereof, and any proceedings in the Assembly shall not be invalid only for the reason that some person who was not entitled to do so sat or voted, or otherwise took part in the proceedings.

(2) If at any time during a meeting of the Provincial Assembly the attention of the person presiding is drawn to the fact that less than forty members are present, it shall be the duty of the person presiding either to adjourn the Assembly, or to suspend the meeting until at least forty members are present.

89.—(1) The validity of any proceedings in a Provincial Assembly shall not be questioned in any court.

(2) No officer or member of a Provincial Assembly in whom powers are vested for the regulation of procedure, or the conduct of business, or the maintenance of order in the Assembly, shall, in relation to the exercise by him of any of those powers, be subject to the jurisdiction of any court.

(3) No member of a Provincial Assembly, and no person entitled to speak therein, shall be liable to any proceedings in any court in respect of anything said or any vote given by him in the Assembly or any committee thereof.

(4) No person shall be liable to any proceedings in any court in respect of the publication by or under the authority of a Provincial Assembly of any report, paper, vote or proceedings.

(5) Subject to this Article, the privileges of a Provincial Assembly, the committees and members thereof, and the persons entitled to speak therein, may be determined by Act of the Provincial Legislature; but such privileges may not exceed those conferred on the National Assembly, its committees and members, and the persons entitled to speak therein.

90.—(1) When a Bill has been passed by a Provincial Assembly it shall be presented to the Governor, who shall, within ninety days,—

- (a) assent to the Bill; or
- (b) reserve the Bill for the consideration of the President; or
- (c) declare that he withdraws assent from the Bill; or
- (d) in the case of a Bill other than a Money Bill, return the Bill to the Assembly with a message requesting that the Bill, or any specified provision thereof, be reconsidered, and that any amendments specified by him in the message be considered.

Privileges, etc., of the members of the Provincial Assembly.

Governor's assent to Bills.

(2) When the Governor has reserved a Bill for the consideration of the President it shall be presented to the President, who shall, within ninety days,—

- (a) assent to the Bill ; or
- (b) declare that he withdraws assent therefrom.

(3) When the Governor has declared that he withdraws assent from a Bill, the Provincial Assembly shall be competent to reconsider the Bill, and if it is again passed, with or without amendment, by the Assembly, by the votes of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting, it shall be again presented to the Governor, and the Governor shall assent thereto.

(4) When the Governor has returned a Bill to the Provincial Assembly it shall be reconsidered by the Assembly, and if it is again passed, with or without amendment, by the Assembly, by a majority of the total number of members of the Assembly, it shall be again presented to the Governor, and the Governor shall assent thereto.

Financial Procedure

Money Bills.

91.—(1) In this Part “Money Bill” means a Bill containing only provisions dealing with all or any of the following matters, that is to say,—

- (a) the imposition, abolition, remission, alteration or regulation of any tax ;
 - (b) the borrowing of money, or the giving of any guarantee, by the Provincial Government, or the amendment of the law relating to the financial obligations of that Government ;
 - (c) the custody of the Provincial Consolidated Fund, the payment of moneys into, or the issue or appropriation of moneys from, such Fund ;
 - (d) the imposition of a charge upon the Provincial Consolidated Fund, or the abolition or alteration of any such charge ;
 - (e) the receipt of moneys on account of the Provincial Consolidated Fund, or the Public Account of the Province, or the custody or issue of such moneys ; and
 - (f) any matter incidental to any of the matters specified in the aforesaid sub-clauses.
- (2) A Bill shall not be deemed to be a Money Bill by reason only that—
- (a) it provides for the imposition or alteration of any fine or other pecuniary penalty, or for the demand or payment of a license fee, or a fee or charge for any service rendered ; or
 - (b) it provides for the imposition, abolition, remission, alteration, or regulation of any tax by any local authority or body for local purposes.

(3) Every Money Bill, when it is presented to the Governor for his assent, shall bear a certificate under the hand of the Speaker that it is a Money Bill, and such certificate shall be conclusive for all purposes and shall not be questioned in any court.

Governor's recommendation required for financial measures.

92. No Bill or amendment which makes provision for any of the matters specified in clause (1) of Article 91, or which if enacted and brought into operation would involve expenditure from the revenues of the Province, shall be introduced or moved in a Provincial Assembly except on the recommendation of the Governor.

No taxation except by Act of the Provincial Legislature.

93. No tax shall be levied for the purposes of a Province except by or under the authority of an Act of the Provincial Legislature.

Provincial Consolidated Fund and the Public Account of the Province.

94.—(1) All revenues received by a Provincial Government, all loans raised by that Government, and all moneys received by it in repayment of any loan, shall form part of one consolidated fund, to be known as the Provincial Consolidated Fund.

(2) All other public moneys received by or on behalf of the Provincial Government shall be credited to the Public Account of the Province.

Custody of public moneys in a Province.

95.—(1) The custody of the Provincial Consolidated Fund, the payment of moneys into such Fund, the withdrawal of moneys therefrom, the custody of public moneys other than those credited to such Fund received by or on behalf of the Provincial Government, their payment into the Public Account of the Province, and the withdrawal of moneys from such Account, and all matters connected with or ancillary to matters aforesaid, shall be regulated by Act of the Provincial Legislature and, until provision in that behalf is so made, by rules made by the Governor.

(2) All moneys received by or deposited with—

- (a) any officer employed in connection with the affairs of a Province in his capacity as such, other than revenues or public moneys raised or received by the Provincial Government ;
- (b) any court to the credit of any cause, matter, account or person in connection with the affairs of the Province ; shall be paid into the Public Account of the Province.

96.—(1) The Governor shall, in respect of every financial year, cause to be laid before the Provincial Assembly a statement of the estimated receipts and expenditure of the Provincial Government for that year, in this part referred to as the Annual Financial Statement.

(2) The Annual Financial Statement shall show separately—

- (a) the sums required to meet expenditure described by the Constitution as expenditure charged upon the Provincial Consolidated Fund ; and
- (b) the sums required to meet other expenditure proposed to be made from the Provincial Consolidated Fund ;

and shall distinguish expenditure on revenue account from other expenditure.

97. The following expenditure shall be charged on the Provincial Consolidated Fund :—

- (a) the remuneration payable to the Governor and other expenditure relating to his office, and the remuneration payable to—
 - (i) the Judges of the High Court ;
 - (ii) the members of the Provincial Public Service Commission ; and
 - (iii) the Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the Provincial Assembly ;
- (b) the administrative expenses, including the remuneration payable to officers and servants, of the High Court, the Provincial Public Service Commission, and the Secretariat of the Provincial Assembly ;
- (c) all debt charges for which the Provincial Government is liable, including interest, sinking fund charges, the repayment or amortisation of capital and other expenditure in connection with the raising of loans and the service and redemption of debt on the security of the Provincial Consolidated Fund ;
- (d) any sums required to satisfy any judgment, decree or award against the Province by any court, or tribunal ; and
- (e) any other sums declared by the Constitution or by an Act of the Provincial Legislature to be so charged.

98.—(1) So much of the Annual Financial Statement as relates to expenditure charged upon the Provincial Consolidated Fund may be discussed in, but shall not be submitted to the vote of, the Provincial Assembly.

(2) So much of the Annual Financial Statement as relates to other expenditure shall be submitted to the Provincial Assembly in the form of demands for grants, and that Assembly shall have power to assent to, or to refuse to assent to any demand, or to assent to any demand subject to a reduction of the amount specified therein.

(3) No demand for a grant shall be made except on the recommendation of the Governor.

99.—(1) As soon as may be after the grants under the last preceding Article have been made by the Provincial Assembly, there shall be introduced in the Assembly a Bill to provide for appropriation out of the Provincial Consolidated Fund of all moneys required to meet—

- (a) the grants so made by the Provincial Assembly ; and
- (b) the expenditure charged on the Provincial Consolidated Fund, but not exceeding in any case the amount shown in the statement previously laid before the Provincial Assembly.

(2) No amendment shall be proposed in the Provincial Assembly to any such Bill which shall have the effect of varying the amount or altering the destination of any grant so made.

(3) Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, no money shall be withdrawn from the Provincial Consolidated Fund except under appropriation made by law passed in accordance with the provisions of this Article.

100. If in respect of any financial year it is found—

- (a) that the amount authorized to be expended for a particular service for the current financial year is insufficient, or that a need has arisen for expenditure upon some new service not included in the Annual Financial Statement for that year, or
- (b) that any money has been spent on any service during a financial year in excess of the amount granted for that service for that year ;

Credit, etc.

the Governor shall have power to authorize expenditure from the Provincial Consolidated Fund, whether the expenditure is charged by the Constitution upon that Fund or not, and shall cause to be laid before the Provincial Assembly a Supplementary Financial Statement or, as the case may be, an Excess Financial Statement, setting out the amount of that expenditure, and the provisions of Articles 96 to 99 shall apply to the aforesaid statements as they apply to the Annual Financial Statement.

101.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this chapter, the Provincial Assembly shall have power—

(a) to make any grant in advance in respect of the estimated expenditure for a part of any financial year pending the completion of the procedure prescribed in Article 98 for the voting of such grant and the passing of the law in accordance with the provisions of Article 99 in relation to that expenditure ;

(b) to make a grant for meeting an unexpected demand upon the resources of the Province when on account of the magnitude or the indefinite character of the service the demand cannot be specified with the details ordinarily given in an Annual Financial Statement ;

(c) to make an exceptional grant which forms no part of the current service of any financial year ; and the Provincial Legislature shall have power to authorize by law the withdrawal of moneys from the Provincial Consolidated Fund for the purposes for which the said grants are made.

(2) The provisions of Articles 98 and 99 shall have effect in relation to the making of any grant under clause (1) and to any law to be made under that clause as they have effect in relation to the making of a grant with regard to any expenditure mentioned in the Annual Financial Statement and law to be made for the authorization of appropriation of money out of the Provincial Consolidated Fund to meet such expenditure.

Legislative Powers of the Governor

Promulgation of Ordinances
when Provincial
not in session.

102.—(1) If at any time, except when the Provincial Assembly is in session, the Governor is satisfied that circumstances exist which render immediate action necessary, he may make and promulgate such Ordinances as the circumstances appear to him to require, and any Ordinance so made shall have the like force of law as an Act of the Provincial Legislature; but the power of making Ordinances under this clause shall be subject to the like restrictions as the power of the Provincial Legislature to make laws, and any Ordinance made under this clause may be controlled or superseded by any such Act :

Provided that the Governor shall not, without previous instructions from the President, promulgate any such Ordinance if an Act of the Provincial Legislature containing the same provision would, under the Constitution, have been invalid unless it had received the assent of the President.

(2) An Ordinance promulgated under clause (1) shall be laid before the Provincial Assembly and shall cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the next meeting of the Assembly, or if a resolution disapproving it is passed by the Assembly, upon the passing of that resolution.

(3) At any time when the Provincial Assembly stands dissolved, the Governor may, if he is satisfied that circumstances exist which render such action necessary, make and promulgate an Ordinance authorizing expenditure from the Provincial Consolidated Fund, whether the expenditure is charged by the Constitution upon that Fund or not, pending compliance with the provisions of Articles 96, 98 and 99.

(4) As soon as may be after the date of the reconstitution of the Provincial Assembly, any Ordinance promulgated under clause (3) shall be laid before the Assembly; and the provisions of Articles 96, 98 and 99 shall be complied with within six weeks from that date.

Excluded and Special Areas

Excluded
Areas.

103.—(1) In this Article the expression "excluded area" means an area which was an excluded area immediately before the Constitution Day.

(2) The executive authority of a Province shall extend to any excluded area therein but, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, no Act of Parliament or of a Provincial Legislature shall apply to an excluded area unless the Governor by public notification so directs, and in giving such a direction with respect to any Act he may direct that the Act shall in its application to the area, or any specified part thereof, have effect subject to such exceptions or modifications as may be specified in the direction.

(3) The Governor may make regulations for the peace and good government of any excluded area in the Province, and any such regulations may repeal or amend any Act of Parliament, or of the Provincial Legislature, or any other law in force in the area :

Provided that no regulation repealing or amending an Act of Parliament shall take effect until it has been approved by the President.

(4) The President may by Order direct that the whole or any specified part of an excluded area shall cease to be an excluded area, and any such Order may contain such incidental and consequential provisions as appear to the President to be necessary and proper.

104.—(1) The executive authority of the Province of West Pakistan shall extend to the Special Areas, but notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, no Act of Parliament or of the Provincial Legislature shall apply to a Special Area or to any part thereof unless the Governor, with the previous approval of the President, so directs, and in giving such a direction with respect to any Act the Governor may direct that the Act shall, in its application to a Special Area, or to any specified part thereof, have effect subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the direction.

(2) The Governor may, with the previous approval of the President, make regulations for the peace and good government of a Special Area, or any part thereof, and any regulation so made may repeal or amend any Act of Parliament, or of the Provincial Legislature, or any other law in force in the area.

(3) The President may, from time to time, give such directions to the Governor relating to the whole or any part of a Special Area as he may deem necessary, and the Governor shall, in the exercise of his functions under this Article, comply with such directions.

(4) The President may, at any time, by Order, direct that the whole or any part of a Special Area shall cease to be a Special Area, and any such Order may contain such incidental and consequential provisions as appear to the President to be necessary and proper :

Provided that before making any Order under this clause, the President shall ascertain, in such manner as he considers appropriate, the views of the people of the area concerned.

PART VI

Relations between the Federation and the Provinces

CHAPTER I.—LEGISLATIVE POWERS

Special Areas.

Extent of Federal and Provincial laws.

Subject-matter of Federal and Provincial laws.

Power of Parliament to legislate for Provinces
by consent.

Power of Parliament to give effect to international agreements, etc.

Residuary power of legislation.

Inconsistency between laws made by Parliament
and laws

105. Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, Parliament may make laws, including laws having extra-territorial operation, for the whole or any part of Pakistan, and a Provincial Legislature may make laws for the Province or any part thereof.

106.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in the two next succeeding clauses, Parliament shall have exclusive power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Federal List.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in clause (3), Parliament, and subject to clause (1) a Provincial Legislature also, shall have power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List.

(3) Subject to clauses (1) and (2), a Provincial Legislature shall have exclusive power to make laws for a Province or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Provincial List.

(4) Parliament shall have power to make laws with respect to matters enumerated in the Provincial List, except for a Province or any part thereof.

107. If it appears to the Provincial Assemblies to be desirable that any of the matters enumerated in the Provincial List, or any matter not enumerated in any list in the Fifth Schedule should be regulated in the Provinces by Act of Parliament, and if resolutions to that effect are passed by the Provincial Assemblies, it shall be lawful for Parliament to pass an Act regulating that matter accordingly, but any Act so passed may, as respects any Province, be amended or repealed by an Act of the Legislature of that Province.

108. Parliament shall have power to make laws for the whole or any part of Pakistan for implementing any treaty, agreement or convention between Pakistan and any other country, or any decision taken at any international body, notwithstanding that it deals with a matter enumerated in the Provincial List or a matter not enumerated in any list in the Fifth Schedule :

Provided that no law under this Article shall be enacted except after consultation with the Governor of the Province to which the law is to be applied.

109. Subject to the provisions of Articles 107 and 108, the Provincial legislature shall have exclusive power to make laws with respect to any matter not enumerated in any list in the Fifth Schedule, including any law imposing a tax not mentioned in any such list ; and the executive authority of the Province shall extend to the administration of any law so made.

110.—(1) If any provision of an Act of a Provincial Legislature is repugnant to any provision of an Act of Parliament, which Parliament is competent to enact, or to any provision of any existing law with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List, then, subject to the provisions of clause (2), the Act of Parliament, whether passed before or after the Act of the Provincial Legislature, or, as the case may be, the

made by the Provincial

existing law, shall prevail and the Act of the Provincial Legislature shall, to the extent of the repugnancy, be void.

(2) Where an Act of a Provincial Legislature with respect to any of the matters in the Concurrent List contains any provision repugnant to the provisions of an earlier Act of Parliament or an existing law with respect to that matter, then, if the Act of the Provincial Legislature, having been reserved for the consideration of the President, has received his assent, the Act of the Provincial Legislature shall prevail in the Province concerned, but nevertheless Parliament may at any time enact any law with respect to the same matter, amending or repealing the law so made by the Provincial Legislature.

Provisions
as to recommendations.

111.—(1) Where under any provision of the Constitution the previous recommendation of the President or of a Governor is required to the introduction of a Bill or the moving of an amendment, the making of the recommendation shall not preclude him from exercising subsequently in regard to the Bill in question any powers conferred on him by the Constitution with respect to the withholding of assent to, or the returning or reservation of, Bills.

(2) No Act of Parliament or a Provincial Legislature, and no provision in any such Act, shall be invalid by reason only that some previous recommendation was not made, if assent to that Act was given—

- where the previous recommendation required was that of the Governor, either by the Governor, or by the President ; and
- where the previous recommendation required was that of the President, by the President.

CHAPTER II.—FINANCIAL PROVISIONS

Property of the Federal and Provincial Governments exempted from taxes.

112.—(1) The Government of a Province shall not be liable to taxation under any Act of Parliament in respect of lands or buildings situated in Pakistan, or income accruing, arising or received in Pakistan :

Provided that where a trade or business of any kind is carried on by or on behalf of the Government of a Province outside that Province, nothing in this Article shall exempt that Government from any Federal taxation in respect of that trade or business, or any operation connected therewith, or any income arising in connection therewith, or any property occupied for the purposes thereof.

Exemption
on electricity.

(2) Property vested in the Federal Government shall, save in so far as an Act of Parliament may otherwise provide, be exempt from all taxes imposed by, or by any authority within, a Province.

(3) Nothing in this Article shall prevent the imposition of fees for services rendered.

Grant-in-aid to Provinces.

113. Save in so far as Parliament may by law otherwise provide, no Act of a Provincial Legislature shall impose or authorize the imposition of a tax upon the consumption or sale of electricity which is consumed by the Federal Government, and any Act of a Provincial Legislature imposing or authorizing the imposition of a tax on the sale of electricity shall secure that the price of electricity sold to the Federal Government for consumption by that Government shall be less by the amount of the tax than the price charged to other consumers of a substantial quantity of electricity.

114. Parliament may by law make grants-in-aid of the revenues of a Province which may be in need of assistance.

Borrowing
by the Federation.

115. The executive authority of the Federation shall extend to borrowing upon the security of the Federal Consolidated Fund within such limits, if any, as may be determined by Act of Parliament, and to the giving of guarantees within such limits, if any, as may be so determined.

Loans to and borrowing
by the Provinces.

116.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this Article the executive authority of a Province shall extend to borrowing upon the security of the Provincial Consolidated Fund within such limits, if any, as may be determined by Act of the Provincial Legislature, and to the giving of guarantees within such limits, if any, as may be so determined.

(2) The Federal Government may, subject to such conditions, if any, as it may think fit to impose, make loans to, or, so long as any limits determined under the last preceding Article are not exceeded, give guarantees in respect of loans raised by, a Province and any sums required for the purpose of making loans to a Province shall be charged on the Federal Consolidated Fund.

(3) A Province may not without the consent of the Federal Government borrow outside Pakistan, nor without the like consent raise any loan if there is still outstanding any part of a loan made to the Province by the Federal Government or in respect of which a guarantee has been given by the Federal Government.

(4) A consent under this Article may be granted subject to such conditions, if any, as the Federal Government may think fit to impose, but no such consent shall be unreasonably withheld, nor shall the Federal Government refuse, if sufficient cause is shown, to make a loan to, or to give a guarantee in respect of a loan raised by, a Province, or seek to impose in respect of any of the matters aforesaid any condition which is unreasonable; and, if any dispute arises whether a refusal of consent, or a refusal to make a loan or to give a guarantee, or any condition insisted upon, is or is not justifiable, the dispute shall be settled in accordance with the procedure prescribed in Article 129.

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

117.—(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in Article 106, no Provincial law relating to taxes for the benefit of a Province or of a municipality, district board, local board, or other local authority therein in respect of professions, trades, callings or employments shall be invalid on the ground that it relates to a tax on income.

(2) The total amount payable in respect of any one person to a Province or to any one municipality, district board, local board or other local authority in the Province by way of taxes on professions, trades, callings and employments shall not exceed fifty rupees per annum.

(3) The fact that a Provincial Legislature has power to make laws as aforesaid with respect to taxes on professions, trades, callings and employments shall not be construed as limiting, in relation to professions, trades, callings and employments, the generality of the entry in the Federal List relating to taxes on income.

118.—(1) As soon as may be after the Constitution Day, and thereafter at intervals not exceeding five years, the President shall constitute a National Finance Commission consisting of the Minister of Finance of the Federal Government, the Ministers of Finance of the Provincial Governments, and such other persons as may be appointed by the President after consultation with the Governors of the Provinces.

(2) It shall be the duty of the National Finance Commission to make recommendations to the President as to—

- the distribution between the Federation and the Provinces of the net proceeds of the taxes mentioned in clause (3) ;
- the making of grants-in-aid by the Federal Government to the Governments of the Provinces ;
- the exercise by the Federal Government and Provincial Governments of the borrowing powers conferred by the Constitution ; and
- any other matter relating to finance referred to the Commission by the President.

Explanation.—In this Article “net proceeds” means, in relation to any tax, the proceeds thereof reduced by the cost of collection.

(3) The taxes referred to in paragraph (a) of clause (2) are the following taxes raised under the authority of Parliament, namely :—

- export duty on jute and cotton, and any other specified export duty ;
- taxes on income other than corporation tax ;
- specified duties of Federal excise ;
- taxes on sales and purchases ; and
- any other specified tax.

(4) As soon as may be after receiving the recommendations of the National Finance Commission, the President shall by Order specify, in accordance with the recommendations of the Commission under sub-clause (a) of clause (2), the share of the net proceeds of the taxes mentioned in clause (3) which is to be allocated to each Province, and that share shall be paid to the Government of the Province concerned, and shall not form part of the Federal Consolidated Fund.

(5) The recommendations of the National Finance Commission, together with an explanatory memorandum as to the action taken thereon, shall be laid before the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies.

119. No Provincial Legislature or Provincial Government shall have power—

- to pass any law, or take any executive action, prohibiting or restricting the entry into, or export from, the Province of goods of any class or description ; or
- to impose any taxes, cesses, tolls or dues which, as between goods manufactured or produced in the Province and similar goods not so manufactured or produced, discriminate in favour of the former, or which, in the case of goods manufactured or produced outside the Province, discriminate between goods manufactured or produced in any locality and similar goods produced in any other locality :

Provided that no Act of a Provincial Legislature which imposes any reasonable restriction in the interest of public health, public order or morality shall be invalid under this Article if it is otherwise valid under the Constitution ; but any Bill for this purpose passed by the Provincial Assembly shall be reserved for the assent of the President, and shall not become law unless the President assents thereto.

CHAPTER III.—AUDIT AND ACCOUNTS

120.—(1) There shall be a Comptroller and Auditor-General of Pakistan, who shall be appointed by the President.

Duties and powers of Comptroller and Auditor-General, Form of public accounts.

Reports of Comptroller and Auditor-General.

Protection of Provinces by Federation.

Directions to Provincial Governments in certain cases.

Delegation of powers to Provinces.

(2) The terms and conditions of service and the term of office of the Comptroller and Auditor-General shall be determined by Act of Parliament, and until so determined, by rules made by the President.

121.—(1) A person who has held office as Comptroller and Auditor-General shall not be eligible for further appointment in the service of Pakistan.

(2) The Comptroller and Auditor-General shall not be removed from office before the expiration of the term of his office except on the like grounds and in the like manner as a Judge of a High Court.

122. The Comptroller and Auditor-General shall perform such duties and exercise such powers, in relation to the expenditure and accounts of the Federation and of the Provinces, as may be provided by Act of Parliament.

123. The accounts of the Federation and of the Provinces shall be kept in such form as the Comptroller and Auditor-General may, with the approval of the President, prescribe.

124. The reports of the Comptroller and Auditor-General relating to the accounts of the Federation shall be submitted to the President, who shall cause them to be laid before the National Assembly, and his reports relating to the accounts of a Province shall be submitted to the Governor, who shall cause them to be laid before the Provincial Assembly.

CHAPTER IV.—ADMINISTRATIVE RELATIONS BETWEEN THE FEDERATION AND THE PROVINCES

125. It shall be the duty of the Federal Government to protect each Province against external aggression and internal disturbance, and to ensure, subject to the provisions of Part XI, that the Government of every Province is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

126.—(1) The executive authority of every Province shall be so exercised—

(a) as to ensure compliance with Acts of Parliament and existing laws which apply to that Province, and

(b) as not to impede or prejudice the exercise of the executive authority of the Federation.

(2) The executive authority of the Federation shall extend to the giving of such directions to a Province as may appear to the Federal Government to be necessary for the purposes of clause (1), and the said authority shall also extend to the giving of directions to a Province—

(a) as to the construction and maintenance of means of communication declared in such direction to be of national or military importance;

(b) as to the measures to be taken for the protection of railways within the Province;

(c) as to the manner in which the executive authority of the Province is to be exercised for the purpose of preventing any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity or economic life of Pakistan, or any part thereof; and

(d) as to the carrying into execution in the Province of any Act of Parliament which relates to a matter enumerated in Part II of the Concurrent List and authorizes the giving of such directions.

(3) Where in carrying out any direction given to a Province under sub-clauses (a) and (b) of clause (2), costs have been incurred in excess of those which would have been incurred by the Provincial Government in the discharge of the normal duties of that Government if such directions had not been given, there shall be paid by the Federal Government to the Provincial Government such sums as may be agreed, or in default of agreement, as may be determined in accordance with the procedure prescribed in Article 129.

127.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, the President may, with the consent of a Provincial Government, entrust either conditionally or unconditionally to that Government, or to any officer thereof, functions in relation to any matter to which the executive authority of the Federation extends.

(2) An Act of Parliament may, notwithstanding that it relates to a matter with respect to which a Provincial Legislature has not the power to make laws, confer powers and impose duties, or authorise the conferment of powers and the imposition of duties, upon a Province or officers or authorities thereof.

(3) Where by virtue of this Article powers and duties have been conferred or imposed upon a Province, or officers or authorities thereof, there shall be paid by the Federal Government to the Provincial Government such sums as may be agreed, or, in default of agreement, as may be determined in accordance with the procedure prescribed in Article 129, in respect of any extra costs incurred by the Provincial Government in connection with the exercise of those powers and duties.

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

128. The Federal Government may, if it deems it necessary to acquire any land situate in a Province for any purpose connected with a matter with respect to which Parliament has power to make laws, require the Provincial Government to acquire the land on behalf, and at the expense of the Federal Government or, if the land belongs to the Province, to transfer it to the Federal Government on such terms as may be agreed or, in default of agreement, as may be determined in accordance with the procedure prescribed in Article 129.

129.—(1) Any dispute between the Federal Government and one or both Provincial Governments, or between the two Provincial Governments, which under the law or the Constitution is not within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, may be referred by any of the Governments involved in the dispute to the Chief Justice of Pakistan, who shall appoint a tribunal to settle the dispute.

(2) Subject to the provisions of any Act of Parliament, the practice and procedure of any such tribunal, including the fees to be charged and the award of costs, shall be determined by rules made by the Supreme Court and approved by the President.

(3) The report of the tribunal shall be forwarded to the Chief Justice, who shall determine whether the purpose for which the tribunal was appointed has been carried out, and shall return the report to the tribunal for re-consideration if he is of opinion that the purpose has not been carried out; and when the report is in order the Chief Justice shall forward the report to the President, who shall make such order as may be necessary to give effect to the report.

(4) Effect shall be given in a Province to any order made under this Article by the President, and any Act of the Provincial Legislature which is repugnant to the order shall, to the extent of the repugnancy, be void.

(5) An order by the President under this Article may be varied by the President in accordance with an agreement made by the parties concerned.

130. If at any time it appears to the President that the public interest would be served by the establishment of an Inter-Provincial Council charged with the duty of—

(a) investigating and discussing subjects in which the Provinces, or the Federation and one or both of the Provinces, have a common interest; or

(b) making recommendations upon any such subject and, in particular, recommendations for the better co-ordination of policy and action with respect to that subject, the President may, with the consent of the Governors of the Provinces, establish such a Council and define the nature of the duties to be performed by it, and its organization and procedure.

131.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution it shall be competent to the Provincial Government to construct and use transmitters with respect to broadcasting in the Province:

Provided that when a Provincial Government constructs and uses transmitters in the Province, it shall be entitled to a part of the net proceeds of the fees received by the Federal Government in respect of the use of any receiving apparatus in the Province, in such proportion as may be agreed, or, in default of agreement, as may be determined in accordance with the procedure prescribed in Article 129.

(2) Any Act of Parliament with respect to broadcasting shall be such as to secure that effect can be given to the foregoing provisions of this Article.

(3) Nothing in this Article shall be construed as restricting the powers conferred on the President by the Constitution for the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of Pakistan or any part thereof.

132.—(1) Parliament may by law provide for the transfer of the railways in each Province to the Government of the Province or to an authority constituted in the Province for that purpose, and for all conditions, reservations and other matters appertaining to the said transfer; and until a transfer made by or under any such law takes effect railways shall remain within the purposes of the Government of the Federation, and Parliament shall, notwithstanding anything contained in Article 106, have exclusive power to make laws with respect thereto.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in Article 106, a Provincial Legislature shall not have power to make any law affecting any provisions of a law made under clause (1).

PART VII

Property, Contracts and Suits

133. Any property which has no rightful owner, or which but for the enactment of the Constitution, would have accrued to Her Majesty by escheat or lapse, or as bona vacantia for want of a rightful owner, shall, if it is property situate in a Province, vest in the Provincial Government, and shall, in any other case, vest in the Federal Government:

Provided that any property which at the date when it would have accrued to Her Majesty was in the possession or under the control of the Federal Government or a Provincial Government shall, according as the purposes for which it was then held were purposes of the Federation or of a Province, vest in the Federal Government or the Provincial Government, as the case may be.

Power to acquire and dispose of property and make contracts.

134.—(1) The executive authority of the Federation and of each Province shall extend to the purchase or acquisition of property for their respective purposes, and any such property shall vest in the Federal Government or, as the case may be, in the Provincial Government.

(2) The executive authority of the Federation and of each Province shall extend to the transfer by grant, sale, mortgage or otherwise of property vested in the Federal Government or the Provincial Government, as the case may be, and to the making of contracts.

(3) All lands, minerals and other things of value underlying the ocean within the territorial waters of Pakistan shall vest in the Federal Government.

Contracts.

135.—(1) All contracts made in the exercise of the executive authority of the Federation or of a Province shall be expressed to be made by the President or the Governor of the Province, as the case may be, and all such contracts and all assurances of property made in the exercise of that authority, shall be executed on behalf of the President, or the Governor by such person and in such manner as he may direct or authorize.

(2) Neither the President nor the Governor shall be personally liable in respect of any contract or assurance made or executed in pursuance of any provision of the Constitution, or of any Federal or Provincial law, nor shall any person making or executing any such contract or assurance on behalf of any of them be personally liable in respect thereof:

Provided that nothing in this clause shall be construed as restricting the right of any person to bring appropriate proceedings against the Federal Government or the Government of a Province.

Suits and proceedings.

136. The Federal Government may sue and be sued by the name of Pakistan, and the Government of a Province may sue and be sued by the name of the Province.

PART VIII

Elections

Composition of Election Commission and Regional Commissions.

137.—(1) There shall be an Election Commission consisting of a Chief Election Commissioner, who shall be the Chairman of the Commission, and such number of other Election Commissioners as the President may determine.

(2) The Chief Election Commissioner and every other Election Commissioner shall be appointed by the President.

(3) The President may, after consultation with the Election Commission, appoint such Regional Election Commissioners as he may consider necessary, to assist the Election Commission in the discharge of its functions under this Part.

(4) In the exercise of his functions under this Article the President shall act in his discretion.

Conditions of service of Election Commissioners and Regional Election Commissioners.

138.—(1) The conditions of service of the Election Commissioners and Regional Election Commissioners shall be determined by Act of Parliament, and until so determined, by rules made by the President.

(2) The Chief Election Commissioner shall not be removed from his office except on the like grounds and in the like manner as a Judge of a High Court, but any other Election Commissioner or a Regional Election Commissioner may be removed from his office by the President, in his discretion, after consultation with the Chief Election Commissioner.

(3) The term of office of the Election Commissioners and Regional Election Commissioners shall be five years:

Provided that no such Commissioner shall continue to hold office after he has attained the age of sixty-five years.

(4) On the expiration of his term of office—

- the Chief Election Commissioner shall be eligible for re-appointment for one further term of office, but shall not otherwise be eligible for any appointment in the service of Pakistan;
- any other Election Commissioner shall be eligible for re-appointment for one further term of office, or for appointment as Chief Election Commissioner, but shall not otherwise be eligible for any appointment in the service of Pakistan; and
- a Regional Election Commissioner shall be eligible for re-appointment for one further term of office, or for appointment as an Election Commissioner, but shall not otherwise be eligible for any appointment in the service of Pakistan.

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

139.—(1) It shall be the duty of all executive authorities in the Federation and in the Provinces to assist the Election Commission in the discharge of its functions, and for this purpose the President may, after consultation with the Election Commission, issue such directions as he may consider necessary.

(2) When so requested by the Election Commission, it shall be the duty of the Federal Government and of each Provincial Government to make available to the Commission such staff as may be necessary for the discharge of its functions, and in the event of any disagreement as to what staff is necessary for this purpose the question shall be decided by the President in his discretion.

140. The Election Commission shall be charged with the duty of—

- preparing electoral rolls for elections to the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, and revising such rolls annually; and
- organizing and conducting elections to the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies.

141. Whenever the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly is dissolved, a general election for the reconstitution of the Assembly shall be held not later than six months from the date of dissolution; and whenever a casual vacancy occurs in any such Assembly, a by-election to fill the vacancy shall be held not later than three months from the date of the occurrence of the vacancy:

Provided that the Chief Election Commissioner may, if in his opinion climatic conditions so require, hold a by-election at any time after three months, but not later than six months, from the date of the occurrence of the vacancy.

142.—(1) The President may from time to time constitute a Delimitation Commission consisting of a Chairman who is, or has been a Judge of a High Court, and two other members who shall not be members of the National Assembly or of a Provincial Assembly.

(2) The Chairman and other members of the Delimitation Commission shall be appointed by the President for such period as the President may fix, shall hold office during the pleasure of the President, and shall be entitled to such remuneration and privileges as may be determined by the President.

(3) In the exercise of his functions under the two preceding clauses the President shall act in his discretion.

(4) The Delimitation Commission shall have power to delimit territorial constituencies for election to the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies and shall publish lists of such constituencies by public notification.

(5) The validity of anything done by or under the authority of the Delimitation Commission shall not be called in question in any court.

143.—(1) A person shall be entitled to be an elector in a constituency if—

- he is a citizen of Pakistan;
- he is not less than twenty-one years of age on the first day of January in the year in which the preparation or revision of the electoral roll commences;
- he is not declared by a competent court to be of unsound mind;
- he has been resident in the constituency for a period of not less than six months immediately preceding the first day of January in the year in which the preparation or revision of the electoral roll commences;
- he is not subject to any disqualification imposed by the Constitution or Act of Parliament.

(2) Until Parliament by Act otherwise provides, the word "resident", for the purposes of this Article, shall have the same meaning as in the Fourth Schedule.

144. Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, Parliament may by Act provide for—

- the delimitation of constituencies, the preparation of electoral rolls, the determination of objections and the commencement of electoral rolls;
- the conduct of elections and election petitions; the decision of doubts and disputes arising in connection with elections;
- matters relating to corrupt practices and other offences in connection with elections; and
- all other matters necessary for the due constitution of the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies;

but no such law shall have the effect of taking away or abridging any of the powers of the Election Commission under this Part.

145. Parliament may, after ascertaining the views of the Provincial Assemblies and taking them into consideration, by Act provide whether elections to the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies shall be held on the principle of joint electorate or separate electorate, and may in any such Act provide for all matters incidental and consequential thereto.

146. No election to the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to such authority and in such manner as may be provided by Act of Parliament.

147. Nothing in this Part shall apply to the Special Areas; but the President may by Order make such provision for the representation of the Special Areas in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assembly of West Pakistan as he may think fit.

PART IX

The Judiciary

CHAPTER I.—THE SUPREME COURT

148. There shall be a Supreme Court of Pakistan consisting of a Chief Justice, to be known as the Chief Justice of Pakistan, and not more than six other Judges:

Provided that Parliament may by Act increase the number of other Judges beyond six.

149.—(1) The Chief Justice of Pakistan shall be appointed by the President, and the other Judges shall be appointed by the President after consultation with the Chief Justice.

(2) A person shall not be qualified for appointment as a Judge of the Supreme Court unless he is a citizen of Pakistan, and—

(a) has been for at least five years a Judge of a High Court or two or more High Courts in succession;

or

(b) has been for at least fifteen years an advocate or a pleader of a High Court, or of two or more High Courts.

(3) For the purpose of computing any such period as is referred to in sub-clause (a) of clause (2) there shall be included any period during which a person has been a Judge of a High Court in Pakistan before the Constitution Day.

(4) For the purpose of computing any such period as is referred to in sub-clause (b) of clause (2) there shall be included any period during which a person was an advocate or a pleader of a High Court in Pakistan before the Constitution Day or of any High Court in British India.

150.—(1) Subject to Articles 151 and 173, a Judge of the Supreme Court shall hold office until he attains the age of sixty-five years.

(2) A person who has held office as a permanent Judge of the Supreme Court shall not plead or act before any court or authority in Pakistan.

151.—(1) A Judge of the Supreme Court shall not be removed from his office except by an order of the President made after an address by the National Assembly, supported by the majority of the total number of members of the Assembly and by the votes of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting, has been presented to the President for the removal of the Judges on the ground of proved misbehaviour or infirmity of mind or body:

Provided that no proceedings for the presentation of the address shall be initiated in the National Assembly unless notice of the motion to present the address is supported by not less than one-third of the total number of members of the Assembly.

(2) Parliament may by law prescribe the procedure for the presentation of an address and for the investigation and proof of misbehaviour or infirmity of mind or body of a Judge, and until such a law is made the President may by order prescribe the said procedure.

152. If the office of Chief Justice of Pakistan becomes vacant, or if the Chief Justice is, by reason of absence or otherwise, unable to perform the duties of his office, those duties shall, until some person permanently appointed to the vacant office has entered on the duties thereof, or until the Chief Justice has resumed his duties, as the case may be, be performed by such one of the other Judges of the Supreme Court as the President may appoint as Acting Chief Justice.

153. When any Judge of the Supreme Court is appointed to act temporarily as Chief Justice of Pakistan, or when any such Judge is unable to perform his duties on account of absence through grant of leave or for any other reason, the President may appoint a Judge of a High Court, who is qualified for appointment as a Judge of the Supreme Court, to act temporarily as a Judge of that court, and the person so appointed shall be deemed to be a Judge of the Supreme Court until the President revokes the appointment.

154. If at any time for want of a quorum of the Judges of the Supreme Court it is not possible to hold or continue any sittings of the Court, the Chief Justice of Pakistan may, in writing, require a Judge of a High Court qualified for appointment as a Judge of the Supreme Court to attend the sittings of the Court as an ad hoc Judge for such period as may be necessary; and while so sitting such ad hoc Judge shall have the same power and jurisdiction as a Judge of the Supreme Court :

Provided that no Judge shall be so nominated by the Chief Justice of Pakistan without previous consultation with the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned.

155. The Supreme Court shall sit in Karachi and at such other place as the Chief Justice of Pakistan may, with the approval of the President, from time to time appoint:

Provided that the Court shall sit in Dacca at least twice in every year, for such period as the Chief Justice of Pakistan may deem necessary.

156.—(1) Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, the Supreme Court shall, to the exclusion of any other Court, have original jurisdiction in any dispute between—

(a) the Federal Government and the Government of one or both Provinces; or

(b) the Federal Government and the Government of a Province on the one side, and the Government of the other Province on the other; or

(c) the Governments of the Provinces, if and in so far as the dispute involves—

(i) any question, whether of law or of fact, on which the existence or extent of a legal right depends; or

(ii) any question as to the interpretation of the Constitution.

(2) The Supreme Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction shall not pronounce any judgment other than a declaratory judgment.

157.—(1) An appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in civil, criminal or other proceedings, if the High Court certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution.

(2) Where the High Court has refused to give such a certificate, the Supreme Court may, if it is satisfied that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, grant special leave to appeal from such judgment, decree or final order.

(3) Where such a certificate is given or such leave is granted, any party in the case may appeal to the Supreme Court on the ground that any such question as aforesaid has been wrongly decided, and with the leave of the Supreme Court, on any other ground.

158.—(1) An appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in civil proceedings—

(a) if the amount or value of the subject-matter of the dispute in the court of first instance was, and also in dispute on appeal is, not less than fifteen thousand rupees or such other sum as may be specified in that behalf by Act of Parliament; or

(b) if the judgment, decree or final order involves directly or indirectly some claim or question respecting property of the like amount or value; or

(c) if the High Court certifies that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in this Article, no appeal shall, unless as Act of Parliament otherwise provides, lie to the Supreme Court from the judgment, decree or final order of a Judge of a High Court sitting alone.

159. An appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, final order or sentence of a High Court in criminal proceedings, if the High Court—

(a) has on appeal reversed an order of acquittal of an accused person and sentenced him to death or to transportation for life; or

(b) has withdrawn for trial before itself any case from any court subordinate to its authority, and has in such trial convicted the accused person and sentenced him as aforesaid; or

(c) certifies that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court; or

(d) has imposed any punishment on any person for contempt of the High Court:

Provided that where a certificate is issued under paragraph (c) of this Article an appeal shall lie subject to such rules as may be made in that behalf under paragraph 3 of the Third Schedule, and to such other rules, not inconsistent with the aforesaid rules, as may be made in that behalf by the High Court.

160. Notwithstanding anything in this Part, the Supreme Court may grant special leave to appeal from any judgment, decree, order or sentence of any court or tribunal in Pakistan, other than a court or tribunal constituted by or under any law relating to the Armed Forces.

161. The Supreme Court shall have power, subject to the provisions of any Act of Parliament and of any rules made by the Supreme Court, to review any judgment pronounced, or order made, by it.

162. If at any time it appears to the President that a question of law has arisen, or is likely to arise, which is of such a nature and of such public importance that it is expedient to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court upon it, he may refer the question to that court for consideration, and the court may, after such hearing as it thinks fit, report its opinion thereon to the President.

163.—(1) The law declared by the Supreme Court shall be binding on all courts in Pakistan.

(2) All executive and judicial authorities throughout Pakistan shall act in aid of the Supreme Court.

(3) The Supreme Court shall have power to issue such directions, orders, decrees or writs as may be necessary for doing complete justice in any cause or matter pending before it, and any such direction, order, decree or writ shall be enforceable throughout Pakistan, and shall be executed as if it had been issued by the High Court of the appropriate Province.

(4) If a question arises as to which High Court shall give effect to a direction, order, decree or writ of the Supreme Court, the decision of the Supreme Court thereon shall be final.

(5) The Supreme Court shall have power to issue any order for the purpose of securing the attendance of any person or the discovery or production of any document.

(6) Any order of Her Majesty-in-Council made before the Constitution Day on an appeal or petition shall be enforceable as if it were an order issued by the Supreme Court.

164. In this part, references to any substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution shall include references to any substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act, 1935, or the Indian Independence Act, 1947, including any enactment amending or supplementing the said Acts or any Order made under the said Acts.

CHAPTER II.—THE HIGH COURTS

165.—(1) There shall be a High Court for each Province.

(2) The High Courts for the Provinces of East Bengal and West Pakistan functioning immediately before the Constitution Day shall be deemed to be High Courts, under the Constitution, for the Provinces of East Pakistan and West Pakistan, respectively.

(3) A High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and such number of other Judges as the President may determine.

166.—(1) Every Judge of a High Court shall be appointed by the President, after consultation with the Chief Justice of Pakistan, the Governor of the Province to which the appointment relates, and if the appointment is not that of the Chief Justice, the Chief Justice of the High Court of that Province.

(2) Subject to Articles 169 and 173, a Judge of a High Court shall hold office until he attains the age of sixty years.

(3) A person who has held office as a permanent Judge of a High Court shall not plead or act before that court or any court or authority within its jurisdiction.

167.—(1) A person shall not be qualified for appointment as a Judge of a High Court unless he is a citizen of Pakistan and—

- (a) has been, for at least ten years, an advocate or a pleader of a High Court, or of two or more High Courts; or
- (b) is a member of the Civil Service of Pakistan of at least ten years' standing, who has for at least three years served as, or exercised the powers of, a District Judge; or
- (c) has for at least ten years held a Judicial office in Pakistan:

Provided that a person shall not be qualified for appointment as a permanent Chief Justice of a High Court unless—

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

- (i) he is, or, when first appointed to a Judicial office, was, an advocate or a pleader in a High Court; or
- (ii) he has served for not less than three years as a Judge of a High Court in Pakistan:

Provided further that a person who was immediately before the Constitution Day a Judge of a High Court shall not be disqualified from continuing as such on the ground only that he is not a citizen of Pakistan.

(2) For the purpose of computing any period referred to in sub-clause (a) of clause (1) there shall be included—

- (a) any period during which a person has held Judicial office after he became an advocate or a pleader; and
- (b) any period during which a person was an advocate or a pleader of a High Court in British India.

(3) For the purpose of computing any period referred to in sub-clause (c) of clause (1) there shall be included any period during which a person held Judicial office in British India.

168.—(1) If the office of the Chief Justice of a High Court becomes vacant, or if any such Chief Justice is, by reason of absence or otherwise, unable to perform the duties of his office, those duties shall, until some person permanently appointed to the vacant office has entered on the duties thereof, or until the Chief Justice has resumed his duties, as the case may be, be performed by such one of the other Judges of the Court as the President may appoint as acting Chief Justice.

(2) If the office of any other Judge of a High Court becomes vacant, or if any such Judge is appointed to act temporarily as a Chief Justice or is by reason of absence, or otherwise, unable to perform the duties of his office, the President may appoint a person qualified for appointment as a Judge of a High Court to act as a Judge of that Court, and the person so appointed shall, unless the President revokes his appointment, be deemed to be a Judge of that Court, until some person permanently appointed to the vacant office has entered on the duties thereof, or until the permanent Judge has resumed his duties.

169. A Judge of a High Court shall not be removed from his office except by an order of the President made on the ground of misbehaviour or infirmity of mind or body, if the Supreme Court on reference being made to it by the President, reports that the Judge ought to be removed on any of those grounds.

170. Notwithstanding anything in Article 22, each High Court shall have power, throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction, to issue to any person or authority, including in appropriate cases any Government, directions, orders or writs, including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari, for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by Part II and for any other purpose.

171. If a High Court is satisfied that a case pending in a court subordinate to it involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, the determination of which is necessary for the disposal of the case, it shall withdraw the case from that court and may—

- (a) either dispose of the case itself; or
- (b) determine the said question of law, and return the case to the court from which the case has been so withdrawn, together with a copy of its judgment on such question, and the said court shall, on receipt thereof, proceed to dispose of the case in conformity with such judgment.

172.—(1) The President may transfer a Judge of a High Court from one High Court to the other High Court, but no such Judge shall be transferred except with his consent and after consultation with the Chief Justice of Pakistan and the Chief Justice of the High Court of which he is a Judge.

(2) When a Judge is so transferred, he shall during the period for which he serves as a Judge of the High Court to which he has been transferred, be entitled to such compensatory allowance, in addition to his salary, as the President may by order determine.

CHAPTER III.—GENERAL PROVISIONS AS TO THE SUPREME COURT AND HIGH COURTS

173. A Judge of the Supreme Court or of a High Court may resign his office by writing under his hand addressed to the President.

(2) Subject to Article 151, the conduct of a Judge of the Supreme Court or of a Judge of a High Court shall not be discussed in the National or a Provincial Assembly.

176. The Supreme Court and each High Court shall be a court of record and shall have all the powers of such a court, including the power to make any order for the investigation or punishment of any contempt of itself.

177. Until other provisions in that behalf are made by Act of Parliament, the provisions of the Third Schedule shall apply in relation to the Supreme Court and High Courts in respect of matters specified therein.

178. Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, neither the Supreme Court nor a High Court shall, unless Parliament by law otherwise provides, exercise any jurisdiction under the Constitution in relation to the Special Areas.

PART X

The Services of Pakistan

CHAPTER I.—SERVICES

179.—(1) No person who is not a citizen of Pakistan shall be eligible to hold any office in the service of Pakistan :

Provided that the President or, in relation to a Province, the Governor, may authorize the temporary employment of a person who is not a citizen of Pakistan :

Provided further that a person who is, immediately before the Constitution Day, a servant of the Crown in Pakistan shall not be disqualified from holding any office in the service of Pakistan on the ground only that he is not a citizen of Pakistan.

(2) Except as expressly provided by the Constitution, the appointment and conditions of service of persons in the service of Pakistan may be regulated by Act of the appropriate legislature.

180. Except as expressly provided by the Constitution—

(a) every person who is a member of a defence service, or of a civil service of the Federation, or of an All-Pakistan Service, or holds any post connected with defence or a civil post in connection with the affairs of the Federation, shall hold office during the pleasure of the President, and

(b) every person who is a member of a civil service of a Province or holds any civil post in connection with the affairs of a Province, other than a person mentioned in paragraph (a) of this Article, shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor.

181.—(1) No person who is a member of a civil service of the Federation or of a Province, or of an All-Pakistan Service, or holds a civil post in connection with the affairs of the Federation, or of a Province, shall be dismissed or removed from service, or reduced in rank, by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed.

(2) No such person as aforesaid shall be dismissed or removed from service, or reduced in rank, until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him:

Provided that this clause shall not apply—

(a) where a person is dismissed or removed from service or reduced in rank on the ground of conduct which has led to his conviction on a criminal charge ; or

(b) where an authority empowered to dismiss or remove from service a person, or to reduce him in rank, is satisfied that for some reason, to be recorded by that authority, it is not reasonably practicable to give that person an opportunity of showing cause; or

(c) where the President or the Governor, as the case may be, is satisfied, for reasons to be recorded by him, that in the interest of the security of Pakistan or any part thereof, it is not expedient to give to that person such an opportunity.

182.—(1) Except as expressly provided by the Constitution or an Act of the appropriate legislature, appointments to the civil services of, and civil posts in the service of, Pakistan shall be made—

(a) in the case of services of the Federation and posts in connection with the affairs of the Federation, by the President or such person as he may direct ;

Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan

(b) in the case of services of a Province and posts in connection with the affairs of a Province, by the Governor of the Province, or such person as he may direct.

(2) Except as expressly provided by the Constitution, or an Act of the appropriate legislature, the conditions of service of persons serving in a civil capacity shall, subject to the provisions of this Article, be such as may be prescribed—

(a) in the case of persons serving in connection with the affairs of the Federation, by rules made by the President, or by some person authorized by the President to make rules for the purpose;

(b) in the case of persons serving in connection with the affairs of a Province, by rules made by the Governor of the Province, or by some person authorized by the Governor to make rules for the purpose :

Provided that it shall not be necessary to make rules regulating the conditions of service of persons employed temporarily on the condition that their employment may be terminated on one month's notice or less; and nothing in this clause shall be construed as requiring the rules regulating the conditions of service of any class of persons to extend to any matter which appears to the rule-making authority to be a matter not suitable for regulation by rule in the case of that class:

Provided further that no such Act as is referred to in this clause shall contain anything inconsistent with the provisions of clause (3).

(3) The rules under clause (2) shall be so framed as to secure—

(a) that the tenure and conditions of service of any person to whom this Article applies shall not be varied to his disadvantage ; and

(b) that every such person shall have at least one appeal against any order which—

(i) punishes or formally censures him; or

(ii) alters or interprets to his disadvantage any rule affecting his conditions of service ; or

(iii) terminates his employment otherwise than upon his reaching the age fixed for superannuation :

Provided that when any such order is the order of the President or the Governor, the person affected shall have no right of appeal, but may apply for review of that order.

183.—(1) In the Constitution "All-Pakistan Services" means the services common to the Federation and the Provinces which were the All-Pakistan Services immediately before the Constitution Day.

(2) Parliament shall have exclusive power to make laws with respect to the All-Pakistan Services.

(3) Articles 182 and 188 shall apply to the All-Pakistan Services as they apply to Services of the Federation.

(4) No member of an All-Pakistan Service shall be transferred to a Province to serve in connection with the affairs of that Province, or be transferred from that Province, except by order of the President made after consultation with the Governor of that Province.

(5) While a member of an All-Pakistan Service is serving in connection with the affairs of a Province, his promotion and transfer within that Province, and the initiation of any disciplinary proceedings against him in relation to his conduct in that Province, shall take place by order of the Governor of that Province.

CHAPTER II.—PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSIONS

184.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this Article, there shall be a Public Service Commission for the Federation, and a Public Service Commission for each Province.

(2) The Public Service Commission for the Federation, if requested so to do by the Governor of a Province, may, with the approval of the President, exercise all or any of the functions of the Public Service Commission of the Province.

(3) Where the Federal Public Service Commission is exercising the functions of a Provincial Public Service Commission in respect of any matter, references in the Constitution or in any Act to the Provincial Public Service Commission shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be construed, in relation to that matter, as references to the Federal Public Service Commission.

185. In the case of the Federal Public Service Commission the President, and in the case of a Provincial Public Service Commission the Governor, may by regulations determine—

(a) the number of members of the Commission and their conditions of service; and

(b) the number of members of the staff of the Commission and their conditions of service.

186.—(1) The Chairman and other members of a Public Service Commission shall be appointed, in the case of the Federal Public Service Commission by the President in his discretion, and in the case of a Provincial Public Service Commission by the Governor of the Province in his discretion.

Commissions.

(2) Not less than one half of the members of a Public Service Commission shall be persons who have held office in the service of Pakistan for not less than fifteen years.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this Article the service of Pakistan shall be deemed to include the service of the Crown in British India, and the service of the Crown in Pakistan before the Constitution Day.

(3) The term of office of the Chairman and other members of the Federal Public Service Commission and of a Provincial Public Service Commission shall be five years.

(4) Any member of a Public Service Commission may resign his office by writing under his hand addressed, in the case of the Federal Public Service Commission to the President, and in the case of a Provincial Public Service Commission to the Governor.

(5) On ceasing to hold office—

- (a) the Chairman of the Federal Public Service Commission shall not be eligible for further employment in the service of Pakistan ;
- (b) the Chairman of a Provincial Public Service Commission shall be eligible for appointment as Chairman or other member of the Federal Public Service Commission, or as Chairman of another Provincial Public Service Commission, but shall not be eligible for any other employment in the service of Pakistan ; and
- (c) a member of a Public Service Commission, other than the Chairman thereof, shall be eligible for appointment as Chairman or other member of any Public Service Commission other than that on which he has already served, but shall not be eligible for any other employment in the service of Pakistan :

Provided that a person who is a member of a Public Service Commission may be appointed as Chairman of that Commission for the unexpired term of his office.

Removal of the members of Public Service Commissions.

187.—(1) A member of a Public Service Commission shall not be removed from office except on the ground of misbehaviour or infirmity of mind or body.

(2) A member of the Federal Public Service Commission shall not be removed from office except in the manner applicable to a Judge of a High Court.

(3) A member of a Provincial Public Service Commission shall not be removed from office except by an order of the Governor of the Province made in a case where the Supreme Court, on reference having been made to it by the Governor, has reported that the member ought to be removed on a ground such as is mentioned in clause (1).

Functions of Public Service Commissions.

188.—(1) It shall be the duty of the Federal Public Service Commission and a Provincial Public Service Commission to conduct examinations for appointment to the services and posts connected with the affairs of the Federation, or the Province, as the case may be.

(2) The President, in respect of services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Federation, and the Governor of a Province, in respect of services and posts in connection with the affairs of the Province, may make regulations specifying the matters in which generally or in any particular class of case, or in any particular circumstances, it shall not be necessary for a Public Service Commission to be consulted; but, subject to such regulations, the appropriate Public Service Commission shall be consulted—

- (a) on all matters relating to methods of recruitment to civil services and posts, and qualifications of candidates for such services and posts ;
- (b) on the principles to be followed in making appointments to civil services and posts and in making promotions and transfers from one service to another, and on the suitability of candidates for such appointments, promotions or transfers ;
- (c) on all disciplinary matters affecting a person in the service of the Federal or a Provincial Government in a civil capacity, including compulsory retirement whether for disciplinary reasons or otherwise; and memorials or petitions relating to such matters;
- (d) on any claim by or in respect of a person who is serving or has served under the Federal or a Provincial Government in a civil capacity that any costs incurred by him in defending any legal proceedings instituted against him in respect of acts done or purported to be done in the execution of his duty should be paid out of the Federal Consolidated Fund or the Provincial Consolidated Fund, as the case may be;
- (e) on any proposal to withhold a special or additional pension or to reduce an ordinary pension ; and
- (f) on any claim for the award of a pension or allowance in respect of injuries sustained while serving under the Federal or a Provincial Government in a civil capacity; and any question as to the amount of any such award ; and it shall be the duty of the Public Service Commission to advise on any matter so referred to them, and on any other matter which the President or the Governor, as the case may be, may refer to the Commission.

(3) Where under the Constitution or any law, rules are made for regulating the appointment or conditions of service of persons in the service of Pakistan, but not under the control of the Federal Government or a Provincial Government, such rules may provide for consultation with the appropriate Public Service Commission; and, subject to any express provision of the Constitution or of the said law, clause (2) shall apply mutatis mutandis.

189. An Act of Parliament may provide for the exercise of additional functions by the Federal Public Service Commission, and an Act of a Provincial Legislature may provide for the exercise of additional functions by the Provincial Public Service Commission.

Power to extend functions of Public Service Commissions.

Reports of Public Service Commissions.

190.—(1) It shall be the duty of the Federal Public Service Commission to present to the President annually a report on the work done by the Commission, and the President shall cause a copy of the report to be laid before the National Assembly; and it shall be the duty of each Provincial Public Service Commission to present to the Governor annually a report on the work done by the Commission, and the Governor shall cause a copy of the report to be laid before the Provincial Assembly.

(2) The report shall be accompanied by a memorandum setting out—

- (a) the cases, if any, in which the advice of the Commission was not accepted and the reasons therefor;
- (b) the matters, if any, on which the Commission ought to have been consulted, but was not consulted, and the reasons therefor.

PART XI

Emergency Provisions

191.—(1) If the President is satisfied that a grave emergency exists in which the security or economic life of Pakistan, or any part thereof, is threatened by war or external aggression, or by internal disturbance beyond the power of a Provincial Government to control he may issue a Proclamation of Emergency, in this Article referred to as a Proclamation.

(2) While a Proclamation is in operation, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution—

- (a) Parliament shall have power to make laws for a Province, or any part thereof, with respect to any matter not enumerated in the Federal or the Concurrent List ;
- (b) the executive authority of the Federation shall extend to the giving of directions to a Province as to the manner in which the executive authority of the Province is to be exercised; and
- (c) the President may by Order assume to himself, or direct the Governor of a Province to assume on behalf of the President, all or any of the functions of the Government of the Province, and all or any of the powers vested in, or exercisable by, any body or authority in the Province other than the Provincial Legislature, and make such incidental and consequential provisions as appear to the President to be necessary or desirable for giving effect to the objects of the Proclamation, including provisions for suspending, in whole or in part, the operation of any provisions of the Constitution relating to any body or authority in the Province :

Provided that nothing in sub-clause (c) shall authorize the President to assume to himself, or direct the Governor of the Province to assume on his behalf, any of the powers vested in or exercisable by a High Court, or to suspend either in whole or in part the operation of any provisions of the Constitution relating to High Courts.

(3) The power of Parliament to make laws for a Province with respect to any matter shall include power to make laws conferring powers and imposing duties, or authorizing the conferring of powers and the imposition of duties, upon the Federation, or officers and authorities of the Federation, as respects that matter.

(4) Nothing in this Article shall restrict the power of a Provincial Legislature to make any law which under the Constitution it has power to make, but if any provision of a Provincial law is repugnant to any provision of a Federal law, which Parliament has under this Article power to make, the Federal law, whether passed before or after the Provincial law, shall prevail and the Provincial law, shall, to the extent of the repugnancy, but so long only as the Federal law continues to have effect, be void.

(5) A law made by Parliament, which Parliament would not but for the issue of a Proclamation have been competent to make, shall, to the extent of the incompetency, cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of six months after the Proclamation has ceased to operate, except as respects things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said period.

(6) A Proclamation shall be laid before the National Assembly as soon as conditions make it practicable for the President to summon that Assembly, and if approved by the Assembly, shall remain in force until it is revoked, or if disapproved, shall cease to operate from the date of disapproval.

Proclamation of emergency on account of war, internal disturbance, etc.

(7) A Proclamation declaring that the security of Pakistan or any part thereof is threatened by war or external aggression may be made before the actual occurrence of war or any such aggression if the President is satisfied that there is imminent danger thereof.

President's power to suspend fundamental rights, etc., during emergency period.

Proclamation of assumption of power by the Federation in case of failure of constitutional machinery in Provinces.

192.—(1) While a Proclamation issued under Article 191 is in operation, the President may, by Order, declare that the right to move any court for the enforcement of such of the rights conferred by Part II as may be specified in the Order, and all proceedings pending in any court for the enforcement of the rights so specified, shall remain suspended for the period during which the Proclamation is in force.

(2) While a Proclamation issued under Article 191 is in operation, the President shall have power by Order to suspend the operation of the proviso to clause (1) of Article 50.

(3) Every Order made under this Article shall, as soon as may be, be laid before the National Assembly.

193.—(1) If the President, on receipt of a report from the Governor of a Province, is satisfied that a situation has arisen in which the government of the Province cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, the President may by Proclamation—

- (a) assume to himself, or direct the Governor of the Province to assume on behalf of the President, all or any of the functions of the Government of the Province, and all or any of the powers vested in, or exercisable by, any body or authority in the Province, other than the Provincial Legislature;
- (b) declare that the powers of the Provincial Legislature shall be exercisable by, or under the authority of, Parliament;
- (c) make such incidental and consequential provisions as appear to the President to be necessary or desirable for giving effect to the objects of the Proclamation, including provisions for suspending in whole or in part the operation of any provisions of the Constitution relating to any body or authority in the Province :

Provided that nothing in this Article shall authorize the President to assume to himself, or direct the Governor of the Province to assume on his behalf, any of the powers vested in, or exercisable by, a High Court, or to suspend either in whole or in part the operation of any provisions of the Constitution, relating to High Courts.

(2) A Proclamation under this Article (not being a Proclamation revoking a previous Proclamation) shall be laid before the National Assembly, and shall cease to operate at the expiration of two months, unless before the expiration of that period it has been approved by a resolution of the National Assembly, and may by a like resolution be extended for a further period not exceeding four months; but no such Proclamation shall in any case remain in force for more than six months:

Provided that if any such Proclamation (not being a Proclamation revoking a previous Proclamation) is issued at a time when the National Assembly stands dissolved or if the dissolution of the National Assembly takes place during the period of two months referred to in this clause, the Proclamation shall cease to operate at the expiry of thirty days from the date on which the National Assembly first meets after its reconstitution, unless before the expiration of the said period of thirty days, a resolution approving the Proclamation has been passed by that Assembly.

(3) Where by a Proclamation issued under this Article it has been declared that the powers of the Provincial Legislature shall be exercisable by or under the authority of Parliament, it shall be competent—

- (a) to Parliament to confer on the President the power of the Provincial Legislature to make laws;
- (b) to Parliament, or the President, when he is empowered under sub-clause (a), to make laws conferring powers and imposing duties, or authorizing the conferring of powers and the imposition of duties upon the Federation, or officers and authorities thereof;
- (c) to the President, when the National Assembly is not in session, to authorize expenditure from the Provincial Consolidated Fund, whether the expenditure is charged by the Constitution upon that Fund or not, pending the sanction of such expenditure by Parliament;
- (d) to the National Assembly by resolution to sanction expenditure authorized by the President under sub-clause (c).

(4) Any law made in exercise of the power of the Provincial Legislature by Parliament or the President, which Parliament or the President would not, but for the issue of a Proclamation under this Article have been competent to make, shall, to the extent of the incompetency, cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of six months after the Proclamation under this Article has ceased to operate, except as to things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said period.

194.—(1) If the President is satisfied that a situation has arisen whereby the financial stability or credit of Pakistan, or any part thereof, is threatened, he may after consultation with the Governors of the Provinces or with the Governor of the Province concerned, as the case may be, by Proclamation make a declaration to that effect, and while such a Proclamation is in operation, the executive authority of the Federation shall extend to the giving of directions to any Province to observe such principles of financial propriety as may be specified in the directions, and to the giving of such other directions as the President may deem necessary for the financial stability or credit of Pakistan or any part thereof.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, any such directions may include a provision requiring a reduction of the salary and allowances of all or any class of persons serving in connection with the affairs of a Province.

(3) While a Proclamation issued under this Article is in operation, the President may issue directions for the reduction of the salaries and allowances of all or any class of persons serving in connection with the affairs of the Federation, including the Judges of the Supreme Court and High Courts.

(4) The provisions of clause (2) of Article 193 shall apply to a Proclamation issued under this Article as they apply to a Proclamation issued under that Article.

195.—(1) A Proclamation issued under this Part may be varied or revoked by a subsequent Proclamation.

(2) The validity of any Proclamation issued or Order made under this Part shall not be questioned in any court.

196. Nothing in the Constitution shall prevent Parliament from making any law indemnifying any person in the service of the Federal or a Provincial Government, or any other person, in respect of any act done in connection with the maintenance or restoration of order in any area in Pakistan where martial law was in force, or validating any sentence passed, punishment inflicted, forfeiture ordered or other act done under martial law in such area.

PART XII

General Provisions

CHAPTER I.—ISLAMIC PROVISIONS

197.—(1) The President shall set up an organization for Islamic research and instruction in advanced studies to assist in the reconstruction of Muslim society on a truly Islamic basis.

(2) Parliament may by Act provide for a special tax to be imposed upon Muslims for defraying expenses of the organization set up under clause (1), and the proceeds of such tax shall not, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, form part of the Federal Consolidated Fund.

198.—(1) No law shall be enacted which is repugnant to the Injunctions of Islam as laid down in the Holy Quran and Sunnah, hereinafter referred to as Injunctions of Islam, and existing law shall be brought into conformity with such Injunctions.

(2) Effect shall be given to the provisions of clause (1) only in the manner provided in clause (3).

(3) Within one year of the Constitution Day, the President shall appoint a Commission—

(a) to make recommendations—

- (i) as to the measures for bringing existing law into conformity with the Injunctions of Islam, and
- (ii) as to the stages by which such measures should be brought into effect ; and

(b) to compile in a suitable form, for the guidance of the National and Provincial Assemblies, such Injunctions of Islam as can be given legislative effect.

The Commission shall submit its final report within five years of its appointment, and may submit any interim report earlier. The report, whether interim or final, shall be laid before the National Assembly within six months of its receipt, and the Assembly after considering the report shall enact laws in respect thereof.

(4) Nothing in this Article shall affect the personal laws of non-Muslim citizens, or their status as citizens, or any provision of the Constitution.

Explanation.—In the application of this Article to the personal law of any Muslim sect, the expression “Quran and Sunnah” shall mean the Quran and Sunnah as interpreted by that sect.

CHAPTER II.—APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COUNCILS AND BOARDS

199.—(1) As soon as may be after the Constitution Day, the President shall constitute a National Economic Council, hereinafter to be called the Council, consisting of four Ministers of the Federal Government, three Ministers of each Provincial Government, and the Prime Minister, who shall be ex officio Chairman of the Council.

(2) The Council shall review the overall economic position of the country and shall, for advising the Federal and Provincial Governments, formulate plans in respect of financial, commercial and economic policies;

Revocation of Proclamation, etc.

Parliament to make laws of indemnity, etc.

Organization for Islamic research and instruction.

Provisions relating to the Holy Quran and Sunnah.

National Economic Council.

and in formulating such plans, the Council shall aim at ensuring that uniform standards are attained in the economic development of all parts of the country.

(3) The Council may, from time to time, appoint such committees or expert bodies as it considers necessary for the discharge of its functions.

(4) In the implementation of the aforesaid plans, the President shall take suitable steps to decentralise the administration by setting up, in each Province, necessary administrative machinery to provide the maximum convenience to the people, and expeditious disposal of Government business and public requirements.

(5) Nothing in this Article shall affect the exercise of the executive authority of the Federation or the Provinces.

(6) The Council shall submit every year to the National Assembly a report on the results obtained and the progress made in the achievement of its objects, and copies of the report shall also be laid before each Provincial Assembly.

Appointment of Advisory Boards for Posts and Telegraphs Department.

200.—(1) The President shall appoint a Board for each Province consisting of representatives of the Federal Government and the Government of the Province, to advise the Federal Government on matters relating to Posts and Telegraphs in the Province.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, recruitment to posts and services, other than Class I, in the Posts and Telegraphs Department in a Province shall be made from amongst persons domiciled in that Province.

CHAPTER III.—PROVISIONS RELATING TO STATES AND RULERS

201. Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, the President may, by Order, make provision for representation in the National Assembly of the territories mentioned in sub-clauses (b), (c) and (d) of clause (2) of Article 1, provided that equality of representation between East Pakistan and West Pakistan is preserved.

202.—(1) Where, under any agreement made at any time before or after the Constitution Day between the Government of Pakistan and the Ruler of a State which at that time was in accession with Pakistan, the payment of any sums free of tax has been guaranteed or assured by the Government of Pakistan to that Ruler as his privy purse, those sums shall be charged on the Federal Consolidated Fund and shall be paid out of that Fund to the Ruler free of tax.

(2) Where the territories of any such Ruler as aforesaid are comprised within a Province, there shall be charged on the Consolidated Fund of that Province, and be paid out of that Fund to the Federal Government, any sum which that Government has paid to the Ruler under clause (1).

(3) In the exercise of any power to make laws, and in the exercise of the executive authority of the Federation or a Province, due regard shall be had to the guarantees or assurances given under any such agreement as is referred to in clause (1) with respect to the personal rights, privileges and dignities of the Ruler of any such State as is referred to in that clause.

203. When the people of the State of Jammu and Kashmir decide to accede to Pakistan, the relationship between Pakistan and the said State shall be determined in accordance with the wishes of the people of that State.

CHAPTER IV.—SCHEDULED CASTES AND BACKWARD CLASSES

204. The castes, races and tribes, and parts or groups within castes, races and tribes which, immediately before the Constitution Day, constituted the Scheduled Castes within the meaning of the Fifth Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, shall, for the purposes of the Constitution, be deemed to be the Scheduled Castes until Parliament by law otherwise provides.

205. The Federal and Provincial Governments shall promote, with special care, the educational and economic interests of the Scheduled Castes and backward classes in Pakistan and shall protect them from social injustice and exploitation.

Provision relating to the State of Jammu and Kashmir.

Definition of Scheduled Castes.

Promotion of the interests of Scheduled Castes and backward classes.

Appointment of Commission to investigate the conditions of Scheduled Castes and backward classes.

206.—(1) The President may appoint a Commission to investigate the conditions of Scheduled Castes and backward classes in Pakistan and make recommendations as to the steps to be taken and grants to be made by the Federal or Provincial Governments to improve their conditions.

(2) The Commission appointed under clause (1) shall investigate the matters referred to them and submit a report to the President with such recommendations as the Commission thinks fit, and copies of the report shall be laid before the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies.

Special Officer for Scheduled Castes and backward classes.

Titles, honours and decorations.

Pardons, reprieves, etc.

Special provisions relating to major ports and aerodromes.

Federal Capital.

Remuneration of President, Ministers, etc., not to be varied during their term of office.

Protection to the President and the Governor.

State languages.

207.—(1) There shall be a Special Officer for the Scheduled Castes and backward classes in Pakistan, to be appointed by the President.

(2) It shall be the duty of the Special Officer to investigate all matters relating to the safeguards provided for the Scheduled castes and backward classes by Article 205, to investigate the extent to which any recommendations of the Commission appointed under Article 206 are carried out, and to report his findings to the President at such intervals as the President may direct; and the President shall cause all such reports to be laid before the National Assembly.

CHAPTER V.—MISCELLANEOUS

208.—(1) No title, honour or decoration shall be conferred by the State on any citizen, but the President may award decorations in recognition of distinguished military or public service.

Explanation.—In this clause “the State” has the same meaning as in Part II.

(2) No citizen of Pakistan shall accept any title, honour or decoration from any foreign State except with the approval of the President.

209. The President shall have power to grant pardons, reprieves and respites, and to remit, suspend or commute any sentence passed by any court, tribunal or authority established by law.

210.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, the President may, by public notification, direct that, for a period not exceeding three months from such date as may be specified in the notification—

(a) any law made by Parliament, or by a Provincial Legislature, shall not apply to any major port or aerodrome, or shall apply thereto subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the notification ; or

(b) any existing law shall cease to have effect in so far as it applies to any major port or aerodrome, except as respects things done or omitted to be done before the aforesaid date, or shall in its application to such port or aerodrome, have effect subject to such exceptions or modifications as may be specified in the notification.

Explanation.—In this Article “aerodrome” means an aerodrome as defined in any law relating to airways, aircraft or air navigation.

211.—(1) Parliament shall by law provide for the determination of the area of the Federal Capital, and until such a law is passed the area which immediately before the Constitution Day was comprised in the Capital of the Federation shall continue to be the Federal Capital.

(2) The administration of the Federal Capital shall vest in the President who may, by Order, make such provision as he may deem necessary or proper—

(a) for its government and administration;

(b) with respect to the laws which are to be in force therein;

(c) with respect to the jurisdiction, expenses or revenues of any court exercising the jurisdiction of a High Court therein;

(d) with respect to apportionments and adjustments of, and in respect of, assets and liabilities ;

(e) for authorizing expenditure from the revenues of the Federation; and

(f) with respect to other supplemental, incidental and consequential matters.

(3) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, Parliament shall have power to make laws for the Federal Capital with respect to matters enumerated in the Provincial List and matters not enumerated in any List in the Fifth Schedule, other than matters relating to the High Courts.

212. The remuneration and other privileges of a person holding the office of President, Minister of the Federal or a Provincial Government, Speaker or Deputy Speaker of the National or a Provincial Assembly, Governor, Comptroller and Auditor-General, member of a Public Service Commission, Election Commissioner, or Regional Election Commissioner, or member of the Delimitation Commission shall not be varied to his disadvantage during his term of office.

213. Neither the President nor the Governor of a Province, shall be answerable to any court for the exercise of powers and performance of duties of his office, or for any act done or purported to be done in the exercise of those powers and performance of those duties :

Provided that nothing in this Article shall be construed as restricting the right of any person to bring appropriate proceedings against the Federal Government or a Provincial Government.

214.—(1) The State languages of Pakistan shall be Urdu and Bengali:

Provided that for the period of twenty years from the Constitution Day, English shall continue to be used for all official purposes for which it was used in Pakistan immediately before the Constitution Day, and Parliament may by Act provide for the use of English after the expiration of the said period of twenty years, for such purposes as may be specified in that Act.

(2) On the expiration of ten years from the Constitution Day, the President shall appoint a Commission to make recommendations for the replacement of English.

(3) Nothing in this Article shall prevent a Provincial Government from replacing English by either of the State languages for use in that Province before the expiration of the said period of twenty years.

Oaths and affirmations.

Amendment of the Constitution.

215. A person elected or appointed to any office mentioned in the Second Schedule shall before entering upon the office make and subscribe an oath or affirmation in accordance with that Schedule.

216.—(1) The Constitution or any provision thereof may be amended or repealed by an Act of Parliament if a Bill for that purpose is passed by a majority of the total number of members of the National Assembly, and by the votes of not less than two-thirds of the members of that Assembly present and voting, and is assented to by the President:

Provided that if such a Bill provides for the amendment or repeal of any of the provisions contained in Articles 1, 31, 39, 44, 77, 106, 118, 119, 199, or this Article, it shall not be presented to the President for his assent unless it has been approved by a resolution of each Provincial Assembly, or, if it applies to one Province only, of the Provincial Assembly of that Province:

Provided further that the Schedules, other than the Fifth Schedule and Part IV of the Fourth Schedule, may be amended or repealed if a Bill for that purpose is passed by a majority of the members present and voting and is assented to by the President:

Provided further that a Provincial Legislature may by law make provision with respect to matters specified in Part IV of the Fourth Schedule.

(2) A certificate under the hand of the Speaker of the National Assembly that a Bill has been passed in accordance with the provisions of clause (1) shall be conclusive, and shall not be questioned in any court.

Application of Fourth Schedule.

Definitions, etc.

217. Until other provision in that behalf is made by law, the provisions of the Fourth Schedule shall apply in respect of the matters specified therein.

CHAPTER VII.—COMMENCEMENT AND REPEAL

220. This Article and Articles 218, 219 and 222 shall come into force at once, and the remaining provisions of the Constitution shall come into force on the Constitution Day.

221. The Government of India Act, 1935, and the Indian Independence Act, 1947, together with all enactments amending or supplementing those Acts, are hereby repealed:

Provided that the repeal of the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, applicable for the purposes of Article 230 shall not take effect until the first day of April, 1957.

PART XIII

Temporary and Transitional Provisions

222.—(1) As soon as may be after the National Assembly has been constituted after the first general election held for the purposes of that Assembly, the Chief Election Commissioner shall take the steps necessary for the election of a President under Article 32.

(2) The Constituent Assembly shall, in accordance with the provisions contained in the Sixth Schedule, elect a person to serve as President until such time as a President elected under Article 32 has entered upon his office, and the election shall take place within thirty days of the coming into force of this Article, on a day fixed by the Constituent Assembly.

(3) A person shall not be qualified for election as President under this Article unless he is a citizen of Pakistan and has attained the age of forty years.

(4) The Constituent Assembly shall fix a day to be the Constitution Day, and the person elected as President under this Article shall, after taking an oath or affirmation in the form set out in paragraph 1 of the Second Schedule, enter upon his office on that day.

(5) The validity of the election of a President elected under this Article shall not be questioned in any court.

(6) If a vacancy occurs in the office of the President elected under this Article, by reason of his death, resignation or removal from office, it shall be filled by a person elected by the National Assembly in accordance with the provisions contained in the Sixth Schedule.

223.—(1) Until the first meeting of the National Assembly constituted in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, the body functioning as the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, be the National Assembly of Pakistan.

(2) Any casual vacancy in the National Assembly under this Article shall be filled in accordance with such rules as may be made in that behalf by the President.

(3) Persons holding office immediately before the Constitution Day as Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the Constituent Assembly shall, as from that day, hold office respectively as Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the National Assembly under this Article, on the same terms and conditions as to remuneration and other privileges as were applicable to them immediately before the Constitution Day.

224.—(1) Notwithstanding the repeal of the enactments mentioned in Article 221, and save as is otherwise expressly provided in the Constitution, all laws (other than those enactments), including Ordinances, Orders-in-Council, Orders, rules, bye-laws, regulations, notifications, and other legal instruments in force in Pakistan or in any part thereof, or having extra-territorial validity, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, or far as applicable and with the necessary adaptations, continue in force until altered, repealed or amended by the appropriate legislature or other competent authority.

Explanation 1.—The expression "laws" in this Article shall include Letters Patent constituting a High Court.

Explanation 2.—In this Article "in force", in relation to any law, means having effect as law whether or not the law has been brought into operation.

(2) For the purpose of bringing the provisions of any law in force in Pakistan or any part thereof into accord with the provisions of the Constitution, the President may, within a period of two years from the Constitution Day, by Order, make such adaptations and modifications in such law, whether by way of amendment or repeal, as he may deem necessary or expedient, and any Order so made shall have effect from such date, whether before or after the date of the making of the Order, but not being prior to the Constitution Day, as may be specified in the Order.

(3) The President may authorize the Governor of a Province to exercise, in relation to that Province, the powers conferred upon him by clause (2) in respect of laws relating to matters enumerated in the Provincial List.

(4) The powers exercisable under clauses (2) and (3) shall be subject to the provisions of any Act of the appropriate legislature.

225.—(1) Until a Provincial Assembly for the Province of East Pakistan has been duly constituted under the provisions of the Constitution, the Provincial Legislative Assembly for the Province of East Bengal functioning immediately before the Constitution Day shall exercise the powers conferred, and perform the duties imposed upon, the Provincial Assembly of East Pakistan by or under the provisions of the Constitution; and a person holding office immediately before the Constitution Day as Speaker or Deputy Speaker of the Provincial Legislative Assembly for the Province of East Bengal shall, as from that day, hold office as Speaker or, as the case may be, Deputy Speaker of the Provincial Assembly of East Pakistan.

(2) Until a Provincial Assembly for the Province of West Pakistan has been duly constituted under the provisions of the Constitution, the Legislative Assembly of that province consisting of persons elected thereto under section 11 of the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955 (hereinafter referred to as the Legislative Assembly) shall exercise the powers conferred and perform the duties imposed upon, the Provincial Assembly of West Pakistan by or under the provisions of the Constitution; and such person as may have been elected as Speaker or Deputy Speaker of the Legislative Assembly before the Constitution Day shall, as from that day, hold office as Speaker, or, as the case may be, Deputy Speaker of the Provincial Assembly.

(3) Any casual vacancy in a Provincial Assembly functioning under clause (1) or clause (2) shall be filled in accordance with such rules as may be made in that behalf by the President.

(4) The provisions of clause (1) of Article 79 shall not apply to a Provincial Assembly functioning under clause (1) or clause (2).

226.—(1) A person holding office as Governor of a Province, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, continue to hold that office until a Governor appointed under the Constitution enters upon his office.

(2) A person holding office as Prime Minister or other Minister of the Governor-General, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, hold office as Prime Minister or other Minister of the Federal Government, as the case may be.

Explanation.—In this clause, the word "Minister" includes a Minister of State.

(3) A person holding office as Chief Minister or other Minister of the Governor of a Province, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, hold office as Chief Minister or other Minister of the Provincial Government, as the case may be.

(4) The person holding office as Advocate-General of Pakistan, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, hold office as Attorney-General for Pakistan on the terms and conditions applicable to him immediately before the Constitution Day.

(5) The person holding office as Auditor-General of Pakistan, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, hold office as Comptroller and Auditor-General of Pakistan on the terms and conditions applicable to him immediately before the Constitution Day.

(6) A person holding office as Advocate-General of a Province, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, continue to hold that office on the terms and conditions applicable to him immediately before the Constitution Day.

227.—(1) A person holding office as Chief Justice or other Judge of the Federal Court, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, hold office as Chief Justice or other Judge of the Supreme Court, as the case may be, on the same terms and conditions as to remuneration and other privileges as were applicable to him immediately before the Constitution Day.

(2) A person holding office as Chief Justice or other Judge of a High Court, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, hold office as Chief Justice or other Judge of that court, as the case may be, on the same terms and conditions as to remuneration and other privileges as were applicable to him immediately before the Constitution Day.

(3) All legal proceedings pending in the Federal Court, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, on such day, stand transferred to, and be deemed to be pending before, the Supreme Court for determination; and any judgment or order of the Federal Court delivered or made before the Constitution Day shall have the same force and effect as if it had been delivered or made by the Supreme Court.

(4) Without prejudice to the other provisions of the Constitution, the Supreme Court shall have the same jurisdiction and powers as were immediately before the Constitution Day, exercisable by the Federal Court, and references in any law to the Federal Court shall be deemed to be references to the Supreme Court.

(5) Without prejudice to the other provisions of the Constitution, each High Court shall have the same jurisdiction and powers as were exercisable by it immediately before the Constitution Day.

(6) Subject to the provisions of the Constitution—

(a) all civil, criminal and revenue courts exercising jurisdiction and functions, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, continue to exercise their respective jurisdictions and functions, and all persons holding office in such courts shall continue to hold their respective offices;

(b) all authorities and all officers, judicial, executive, and ministerial throughout Pakistan exercising functions, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, continue to exercise their respective functions.

228.—(1) Subject to clause (2), if any legal proceedings in which the Federation of Pakistan is a party were pending in any court, immediately before the Constitution Day, then, in those proceedings, for "the Federation of Pakistan", "Pakistan" shall, as from that day, be deemed to be substituted.

(2) Any legal proceedings which, but for the Constitution, could have been brought by or against the Federation of Pakistan in respect of a matter which, immediately before the Constitution Day, was the responsibility of the Federation and has, under the Constitution, become, the responsibility of a Province, shall be brought by or against the Province concerned; and if any such legal proceedings were pending in any court immediately before the Constitution Day, then, in those proceedings for the Federation of Pakistan, the Province concerned shall, as from that day, be deemed to be substituted.

229. A person holding office as Chairman or other member of the Federal Public Service Commission or of a Provincial Public Service Commission, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, continue to hold his respective office on the same terms and conditions as to remuneration and other privileges as were applicable to him immediately before the Constitution Day, until the expiration of his term of office as determined by the law under which he was appointed.

230.—(1) The provisions of the Constitution relating to the Federal Consolidated Fund, or a Provincial Consolidated Fund, and the appropriation of moneys from either of such Funds, shall not apply in relation to moneys received or raised, or expenditure incurred, by the Federal Government or the Government of a Province in the financial year which includes the Constitution Day or in the next succeeding financial year; and notwithstanding anything in the Constitution any expenditure incurred during those financial years by the Federal Government or the Government of a Province shall be deemed to have been validly incurred if it is incurred in accordance with the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935.

(2) For the purposes of clause (1), the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, and of any statement, demand, schedule or other document made thereunder, shall have effect in relation to any time after the Constitution Day subject to the modification that references therein to the holder of any office, or to any body, service or other matter, shall be construed as references to the holder of the corresponding office, or, as the case may be, to the corresponding body, service or matter, under the Constitution.

(3) For the purposes of clause (1), if, at any time when the National Assembly stands dissolved, the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render such action necessary, he shall have power to authenticate a schedule of authorized expenditure under the Government of India Act, 1935, although no Annual Financial Statement has previously been laid before the Assembly, and although no grants have been made by the Assembly.

(4) Clause (3) shall apply to the Governor of a Province, subject to the modification that references therein to the President and the National Assembly shall be construed as references to the Governor and the Provincial Assembly respectively.

(5) In relation to accounts which have not been completed or audited before the Constitution Day, the Comptroller and Auditor-General shall exercise the functions of the Auditor-General of the Dominion of Pakistan; but reports relating to the accounts of the Federal Government shall be submitted to the President, who shall cause them to be laid before the National Assembly, and reports relating to the accounts of a Province shall be submitted to the Governor, who shall cause them to be laid before the Provincial Assembly.

(6) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution all taxes and fees levied under law in force, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall continue to be levied until they are varied or abolished by Act of the appropriate legislature.

231.—(1) All property and assets which immediately before the Constitution Day were vested in Her Majesty for the purposes of the Federal Government shall, as from that day, vest in the Federal Government, unless they were used for purposes which on the Constitution Day become purposes of the Government of a Province, in which case they shall, as from that day, vest in the Provincial Government.

(2) All property and assets which immediately before the Constitution Day were vested in Her Majesty for the purposes of the Government of a Province shall, as from that day, vest in the Government of that Province.

(3) All rights, liabilities and obligations of the Federal Government or the Government of a Province, whether arising out of any contract or otherwise, shall as from the Constitution Day, be respectively the rights, liabilities and obligations of the Federal Government, and of the Government of the corresponding Province:

Provided that all rights, liabilities and obligations relating to any matter—

(a) which immediately before the Constitution Day was the responsibility of the Federal Government, but which under the Constitution has become the responsibility of the Government of a Province, whether arising out of a contract or otherwise, shall devolve upon the Government of that Province;

(b) which immediately before the Constitution Day was the responsibility of the Government of a Province, but which under the Constitution has become the responsibility of the Federal Government, whether arising out of a contract or otherwise, shall devolve upon the Federal Government.

232. Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, every person who was, immediately before the Constitution Day, a servant of the Crown in Pakistan, whether serving in connection with the affairs of the Federation or of a Province, shall, as from that day, become a servant of Pakistan on the same terms and conditions as were applicable to him immediately before the Constitution Day.

233. Except as otherwise expressly provided by the Constitution, every person who, having been appointed by the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of State-in-Council, to a civil service of the Crown in India, continues, after the Constitution Day, to serve under the Federal Government or the Government of a Province, shall be entitled to receive from the Federal Government or the Government of the Province, which he is from time to time serving, the same conditions of service as regards salary, allowances, leave and pensions and the same rights in disciplinary matters, or rights as similar thereto as the changed circumstances may permit, as he was entitled to receive immediately before the Constitution Day.

234.—(1) The President may, for the purpose of removing any difficulties, particularly in relation to the transition from the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Indian Independence Act, 1947, together with Acts amending or supplementing those Acts, to the provisions of the Constitution, by Order, direct that the provisions of the Constitution shall, during such period as may be specified in the order, have effect, subject to such adaptations, whether by way of modification, addition or omissions, as he may deem to be necessary or expedient:

Provided that no such Order shall be made after the first meeting of the National Assembly constituted after the first general election held for the purposes of that Assembly.

(2) Every Order under this Article shall be laid before the National Assembly, and may be amended or repealed by Act of Parliament.

FIRST SCHEDULE

(Articles 32 and 33)

Election of President

1. The Chief Election Commissioner shall hold and conduct any election to the office of President, and shall be the Returning Officer for such election.

2. The Chief Election Commissioner shall appoint Presiding Officers to preside at the meeting of the members of the National Assembly, which shall be held at Karachi, and at the meetings of the members of the Provincial Assemblies of East Pakistan and West Pakistan, which shall be held at Dacca and Lahore, respectively.

3. The Chief Election Commissioner shall by public notification fix the time and place for depositing nomination papers, holding a scrutiny, making withdrawals, if any, and holding the poll, if necessary.

4. At any time before noon on the day fixed for nomination any member of the National Assembly or of a Provincial Assembly may nominate for election as President a person qualified for election as President by delivering to the Presiding Officer of the Assembly of which he is a member, a nomination paper, signed by himself as proposer and by another member of that Assembly as seconder, together with a statement signed by the person nominated that he consents to the nomination :

Succession to property and assets, rights, liabilities and obligations.

Transitional provision as to servants of the Crown.

Transitional provision as to conditions of service of persons appointed by the Secretary of State.

Power of President to remove difficulties.

Provided that no person shall subscribe, whether as proposer or as seconder, more than one nomination paper at any one election.

5. The scrutiny shall be held by the Chief Election Commissioner at the time and place fixed by him, and if after scrutiny only one person remains validly nominated, the Chief Election Commissioner shall declare that person to be elected, or if more than one person remains validly nominated, he shall announce, by public notification, the names of the persons validly nominated, to be hereinafter called the candidates.

6. A candidate may withdraw his candidature at any time before noon on the day fixed for this purpose by delivering a notice in writing under his hand to the Presiding Officer with whom his nomination paper has been deposited, and a candidate who has given a notice of withdrawal of his candidature under this paragraph shall not be allowed to cancel that notice.

7. If all but one of the candidates have withdrawn, that one shall be declared by the Chief Election Commissioner to be elected.

8. If there is no withdrawal, or if, after withdrawals have taken place, two or more candidates are left, the Chief Election Commissioner shall announce by public notification the names of the candidates, and their proposers and seconders, and shall proceed to hold a poll by secret ballot in accordance with the provisions of the succeeding paragraphs.

9. If a candidate whose nomination has been found to be in order dies after the time fixed for nomination, and a report of his death is received by the Presiding Officer before the commencement of the poll, the Presiding Officer shall, upon being satisfied of the fact of the death of the candidate, countermand the poll and report the fact to the Chief Election Commissioner, and all proceedings with reference to the election shall be commenced anew in all respects as if for a new election :

Provided that no further nomination shall be necessary in the case of a candidate whose nomination was valid at the time of the countermanding of the poll :

Provided further that no person who has under paragraph 6 of this Schedule given notice of withdrawal of his candidature before the countermanding of the poll shall be ineligible for being nominated as a candidate for the election after such countermanding.

10. The poll shall be taken at the meetings of the members of the National Assembly and of each Provincial Assembly, and the respective Presiding Officers shall conduct the poll with the assistance of such officers as they may, with the approval of the Chief Election Commissioner, respectively appoint.

11. A ballot paper shall be issued to every member of the National Assembly, and of each Provincial Assembly, who presents himself for voting at the meeting of the members of the Assembly of which he is a member (hereinafter referred to as a person voting), and he shall exercise his vote personally by marking the paper in accordance with the provisions of the succeeding paragraphs.

12. The poll shall be by secret ballot by means of ballot papers containing the names of all the candidates in alphabetical order who have not withdrawn, and a person voting shall vote by placing a cross against the name of the person for whom he wishes to vote.

13. Ballot papers shall be issued from a book of ballot papers with counterfoils, the ballot papers and each counterfoil being numbered; and when a ballot paper is issued to a person voting his name shall be entered on the counterfoil and the ballot paper shall be authenticated by the initials of the Presiding Officer.

14. A ballot paper having been marked by the person voting shall be deposited by that person in a ballot box to be placed in front of the Presiding Officer.

15. If a ballot paper is spoiled by a person voting he may return it to the Presiding Officer, who shall issue a second ballot paper, cancelling the first ballot paper and marking the cancellation on the appropriate counterfoil.

16. A ballot paper shall be invalid if—

- (i) there is upon it any name, word or mark, other than the official number, by which the person voting may be identified; or
- (ii) it does not contain the initials of the Presiding Officer ; or
- (iii) it does not contain a cross; or
- (iv) a cross is placed against the names of two or more candidates; or
- (v) there is any uncertainty as to the identity of the candidate against whose name the cross is placed.

17. After the close of the poll each Presiding Officer shall, in the presence of such of the candidates or their authorized representatives as may desire to be present, open and empty the ballot boxes and examine the ballot papers therein, rejecting any which are invalid, count the number of votes recorded for each candidate on the valid ballot papers, and communicate the number of the votes so recorded to the Chief Election Commissioner.

18. If there are only two candidates, the candidate who has obtained the larger number of votes shall be declared by the Chief Election Commissioner to be elected.

19. If there are three or more candidates, and one of those candidates has obtained a larger number of votes than the aggregate number of votes obtained by the remaining candidates, he shall be declared by the Chief Election Commissioner to be elected.

20. If there are three or more candidates, and the last preceding paragraph does not apply, a further poll shall be held in accordance with the preceding provisions of this Schedule, at which the candidate who obtained the smallest number of votes at the previous poll shall be excluded.

21. The three last preceding paragraphs shall apply in relation to the further poll and any subsequent poll which may be necessary under the provisions of those paragraphs.

22. Where at any poll any two or more candidates obtain an equal number of votes, then—

(a) if there are only two candidates for election, or

(b) if one of the candidates who obtained equality of votes is required to be excluded from a further poll under paragraph 20 of this Schedule, the selection of the candidate to be elected, or, as the case may be, excluded, shall be by drawing of lots.

23. When, after any poll, the counting of the votes has been completed, and the result of the voting determined, the Chief Election Commissioner shall forthwith announce the result to those present, and shall report the result to the Federal Government, who shall forthwith cause the result to be declared by a public notification.

24. The Chief Election Commissioner may, by public notification, with the approval of the President make rules for carrying out the purposes of this Schedule.

SIXTH SCHEDULE

(Article 222)

Election of President under Article 222

1. At any time before noon on the day preceding the day fixed for the election of the President, any member of the Assembly may propose a person for election by delivering to the Secretary of the Assembly a nomination paper signed by that member and stating that that person consents to the nomination.
2. Any person who has been nominated may withdraw his candidature at any time prior to the holding of the election.
3. On the day fixed for the election the person presiding over the Assembly shall read out to the Assembly the names of the persons who have been duly nominated and have not withdrawn their candidature, together with the names of their proposers, and, if there is only one such person, shall declare that person to be duly elected. If there is more than one such person, the Assembly shall proceed to elect the President by secret ballot. The ballot shall be held in such manner as the person presiding over the Assembly may direct.
4. Where there are only two candidates for election, the candidate who obtains at the ballot the larger number of votes shall be declared elected. If two candidates obtain an equal number of votes, the determination of the election shall be by drawing of lots.

5. Where the number of persons who have been duly nominated and have not withdrawn their candidature exceeds two, and at the first ballot no candidate obtains more votes than the aggregate votes obtained by the other candidates, the candidate who has obtained the smallest number of votes shall be excluded from the election. Balloting shall then proceed, with the candidate obtaining the smallest number of votes at each ballot being excluded from the election until one candidate obtains more votes than the remaining candidate or than the aggregate votes of the remaining candidates, as the case may be, and such candidate shall be declared elected.

6. Where at any ballot any two or more candidates obtain an equal number of votes and one of them has to be excluded from the election under paragraph 5, the determination of the question as to which of the candidates whose votes are equal is to be excluded shall be by drawing of lots.

7. The meeting of the Assembly at which the election takes place shall be presided over by the Speaker, or, if the Speaker is unable to preside, by the Deputy Speaker, or, if the Deputy Speaker is also unable to preside, by such person as may be determined by the Rules of the Assembly.

8. In this Schedule, "the Assembly" means, as respects the period before the Constitution Day, the Constituent Assembly, and as respects the period commencing on the Constitution Day, the National Assembly.

The Act has been applied to the Chittagong Hill-tracts and to the partially excluded areas of the Mymensingh district with effect from the 25th October, 1951, see Dacca Gazette, 1951, Pt. I, p. 1146.

It has also been brought into force in Baluchistan with effect on and from the 13th day of April, 1951, see Gazette of Pakistan, 1952, Pt. I, p. 218; applied in the Federated Areas of Baluchistan, see ibid., 1953, Pt I, p. 152; and also extended to the Leased Areas of Baluchistan, by the Leased Areas (Laws) Order, 1950 (G. G. O. 3 of 1950).

It has also been extended to the Khairpur State by the Khairpur (Federal Laws) (Extension) Order, 1953 (G.G. O. 5 of 1953).

² Section 311(1) which read as follows:—

"India" means British India together with all territories of any Indian Ruler under the suzerainty of His Majesty, all territories under the suzerainty of such an Indian Ruler, the tribal areas, and any other territories which His Majesty in Council may, from time to time, after ascertaining the views of the Federal Government and the Federal Legislature, declare to be part of India."

³ The word "and" omitted by the Pakistan Citizenship (Amendment) Act, 1952 (5 of 1952), s. 2.

⁵ Section 1 which read as follows:—

"1.—(1) Every person who under this Act is a citizen of the United Kingdom and Colonies or who under any enactment for the time being in force in any country mentioned in sub-section (3) of this section is a citizen of that country shall by virtue of that citizenship have the status of a British subject.

(2) Any person having the status aforesaid may be known either as a British subject or as a Commonwealth citizen; and accordingly in this Act and in any other enactment or instrument whatever, whether passed or made before or after the commencement of this Act, the expression "British subject" and the expression "Commonwealth citizen" shall have the same meaning.

(3) The following are the countries hereinbefore referred to, that is to say, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, Newfoundland, India, Pakistan, Southern Rhodesia and Ceylon."

⁷ Subs. by the Pakistan Citizenship (Amendment) Act, 1952 (5 of 1952), s. 3, for "and has".

in the service of Pakistan or of any Government or Administration in Pakistan at the commencement of this Act, has] or had his domicile within the meaning of Part II of the Succession Act, 1925, as in force at the commencement of this Act, in Pakistan or in the territories now included in Pakistan; or

- (c) who is a person naturalised as a British subject in Pakistan; and who, if before the date of the commencement of this Act he has acquired the citizenship of any foreign State, has before that date renounced the same by depositing a declaration in writing to that effect with an authority appointed or empowered to receive it; ¹[or
- 1(d) who before the commencement of this Act migrated to the territories now included in Pakistan from any territory in the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent outside those territories with the intention of residing permanently in those territories.]

^{2*} * * * *

Citizenship by birth:
4. Every person born in Pakistan after the commencement of this Act shall be a citizen of Pakistan by birth:

Provided that a person shall not be such a citizen by virtue of this section if at the time of his birth—

- (a) his father possesses such immunity from suit and legal process as is accorded to an envoy of an external sovereign power accredited in Pakistan and is not a citizen of Pakistan; or
- (b) his father is an enemy alien and the birth occurs in a place then under occupation by the enemy.

5. Subject to the provisions of section 3 a person born after the commencement of this Act, shall be a citizen of Pakistan by descent if his father is a citizen of Pakistan at the time of his birth:

Provided that if the father of such person is a citizen of Pakistan by descent only, that person shall not be a citizen of Pakistan by virtue of this section unless—

- (a) that person's birth having occurred in a country outside Pakistan the birth is registered at a Pakistan Consulate or Mission in that country, or where there is no Pakistan Consulate or Mission in that country ³[at the prescribed Consulate or Mission or] at a Pakistan Consulate or Mission in the country nearest to that country; or
- (b) that person's father is, at the time of the birth, in the service of any Government in Pakistan.

Citizenship by migration:
6.—(1) The Central Government may, upon his obtaining a certificate of domicile under this Act, register as a citizen of Pakistan by migration any person who ⁴[after the commencement of this Act and before the first day of January 1952 has migrated] to the territories now included in Pakistan from any territory in the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent outside those territories, with the intention of residing permanently in those territories:

Provided that the Central Government may, by general or special order, exempt any person or class⁵ of persons from obtaining a certificate of domicile required under this sub-section.

(2) Registration granted under the preceding sub-section shall include, besides the person himself, his wife, if any, unless his marriage with her has been dissolved, and any minor child of his dependent whether wholly or partially upon him.

7. Notwithstanding anything in sections 3, 4 and 6, a person who has after the first day of March, 1947, migrated from the territories now included in Pakistan to the territories now included in India shall not be a citizen of Pakistan under the provisions of these sections:

Provided that nothing in this section shall apply to a person who, after having so migrated to the territories now included in India has returned to the territories now included in Pakistan under a permit for resettlement or permanent return issued by or under the authority of any law for the time being in force.

8. The Central Government may, upon application made to it in this behalf, register as a citizen of Pakistan any person who, or whose father or whose father's father, was born in the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent and who is ordinarily resident in a country outside Pakistan at the commencement of this Act, if he has, unless exempted by the Central Government in this behalf, obtained a certificate of domicile:

³ Ins. by the Pakistan Citizenship (Amendment) Act, 1952 (5 of 1952), s. 4.

⁴ Subs. ibid., s. 5, for "before the commencement of this Act migrated".

⁵ All Government servants including optees coming from the late Government of India, shall as a class be exempt from obtaining the Certificate of Domicile, see Gazette of Pakistan, 1952, Pt. I, p. 113.

Provided that a certificate of domicile shall not be required in the case of any such person who is out of Pakistan under the protection of a Pakistan passport, or in the case of any such person whose father or whose father's father is at the commencement of this Act residing in Pakistan or becomes, before the aforesaid application is made, a citizen of Pakistan.

9. The Central Government may, upon an application made to it in that behalf by any person who has been granted a certificate of naturalisation under the Naturalisation Act, 1926, register that person as a citizen of Pakistan by naturalisation:

Provided that the Central Government may register any person as a citizen of Pakistan without his having obtained a certificate of naturalisation as aforesaid.

10.—(1) Any woman who by reason of her marriage to a ¹[British subject] before the first day of January, 1949, has acquired the status of a ¹[British subject] shall, if her husband becomes a citizen of Pakistan, be a citizen of Pakistan.

(2) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (1) and sub-section (4) a woman who has been married to a citizen of Pakistan or to a person who but for his death would have been a citizen of Pakistan under section 3, 4 or 5 shall be entitled, on making application therefor to the Central Government in the prescribed manner, and, if she is an alien, on obtaining a certificate of domicile and taking the oath of allegiance in the form set out in the Schedule to this Act, to be registered as a citizen of Pakistan whether or not she has completed twenty-one years of her age and is of full capacity.

(3) Subject as aforesaid, a woman who has been married to a person who, but for his death, could have been a citizen of Pakistan under the provisions of sub-section (1) of section 6 (whether he migrated as provided in that sub-section or is deemed under the proviso to section 7 to have so migrated) shall be entitled as provided in sub-section (2) subject further, if she is an alien, to her obtaining the certificate and taking the oath therein mentioned.

(4) A person who has ceased to be a citizen of Pakistan under section 14 or who has been deprived of citizenship of Pakistan under this Act shall not be entitled to be registered as a citizen thereof under this section but may be so registered with the previous consent of the Central Government.

11.—(1) The Central Government may, upon application to it in this behalf made in the prescribed manner by a parent or guardian of a minor child of a citizen of Pakistan, register the child as a citizen of Pakistan.

(2) The Central Government may, in such circumstances as it thinks fit, register any minor as a citizen of Pakistan.

12. Any person registered as a citizen of Pakistan shall be such a citizen from the date of his registration.

13. If any territory becomes a part of Pakistan the Governor-General may, by order, specify the persons who shall be citizens of Pakistan by reason of their connection with that territory; and those persons shall be citizens of Pakistan from such date and upon such conditions, if any, as may be specified in the order.

14.—(1) Subject to the provisions of this section if any person is a citizen of Pakistan under the provisions of this Act, and is at the same time a citizen or national of any other country, he shall, unless ^{2*} * * he makes a declaration according to the laws of that other country renouncing his status as citizen or national thereof, cease to be a citizen of Pakistan.

³[(1A) Nothing in sub-section (1) applies to a person who has not attained twenty-one years of his age.]

(2) Nothing in ⁴[(sub-section) (1)] shall apply to any person who is a subject of an Acceding State so far as concerns his being a subject of that State.

15. Every person becoming a citizen of Pakistan under this Act shall have the status of a Commonwealth citizen.

Citizenship by naturalisation.

Married women.

Registration of minors.

Citizenship by registration to begin on date of registration.

Citizenship by incorporation of territory.

Dual citizenship or nationality not permitted.

Persons becoming citizens to have the status of Commonwealth citizens.

⁴ Subs. ibid., for "this section".

Deprivation of citizenship.

16.—(1) A citizen of Pakistan shall cease to be a citizen of Pakistan if he is deprived of that citizenship by an order under the next following sub-sections.

(2) Subject to the provisions of this section the Central Government may by order deprive any such citizen of his citizenship if it is satisfied that he obtained his certificate of domicile or certificate of naturalisation ¹[under the Naturalisation Act, 1926] by means of fraud, false representation or the concealment of any material fact, or if his certificate of naturalisation is revoked.

(3) Subject to the provisions of this section the Central Government may by order deprive any person who is a citizen of Pakistan by naturalisation of his citizenship of Pakistan if it is satisfied that that citizen—

- (a) has shown himself by any act or speech to be disloyal or disaffected to the Constitution of Pakistan; or
- (b) has, during a war in which Pakistan is or has been engaged, unlawfully traded or communicated with the enemy or engaged in or associated with any business that was to his knowledge carried on in such a manner as to assist the enemy in that war; or
- (c) has within five years of being naturalised been sentenced in any country to imprisonment for a term of not less than twelve months.

(4) The Central Government may on an application being made or on its own motion by order deprive any citizen of Pakistan of his citizenship if it is satisfied that he has been ordinarily resident in a country outside Pakistan for a continuous period of seven years ¹[beginning not earlier than the commencement of this Act] and during that period has neither—

- (i) been at any time in the service of any Government in Pakistan or of an international organisation of which Pakistan has, at any time during that period been a member; nor
- (ii) registered annually in the prescribed manner at a Pakistan Consulate or Mission or in a country where there is no Pakistan Consulate or Mission ²[at the prescribed Consulate or Mission or] at a Pakistan Consulate or Mission in a country nearest to the country of his residence his intention to retain Pakistan citizenship.

(5) The Central Government shall not make an order depriving a person of citizenship under this section unless it is satisfied that it is in the public interest that that person should not continue to be a citizen of Pakistan.

(6) Before making an order under this section the Central Government shall give the person against whom it is proposed to make the order notice in writing informing him of the grounds on which it is proposed to make the order and calling upon him to show cause why it should not be made.

(7) If it is proposed to make the order on any of the grounds specified in sub-sections (2) and (3) of this section and the person against whom it is proposed to make the order applies in the prescribed manner for an inquiry, the Central Government shall, and in any other case may, refer the case to a committee of inquiry consisting of a chairman, being a person possessing judicial experience, appointed by the Central Government and of such other members appointed by the Central Government as it thinks proper.

17. The Central Government may upon an application being made to it in the prescribed manner containing the prescribed particulars grant a certificate of domicile to any person in respect of whom it is satisfied that he has ordinarily resided in Pakistan for a period of not less than one year immediately before the making of the application, and has acquired a domicile therein.

18. The Central Government may, by order notified in the official Gazette, direct that any power conferred upon it or duty imposed on it by this Act shall, in such circumstances, and under such conditions, if any, as may be specified in the direction, be exercised or discharged by such authority or officer as may be specified.

19.—(1) Where a person with respect to whose citizenship a doubt exists, whether on a question of law or fact, makes application in that behalf to the Central Government, the Central Government may grant him a certificate that at the date of the certificate he is a citizen of Pakistan.

(2) The certificate, unless it is proved to have been obtained by fraud, false representation or concealment of any material fact, shall be conclusive evidence of the fact recorded in it.

20. The Central Government may upon such terms and conditions as it may by general or special order specify register a ³[Commonwealth citizen or a British protected person] as a citizen of Pakistan.

21. Any person who in order to obtain or prevent the doing of anything under the Act makes any statement or furnishes any information which is false in any material particular and which he knows or has reasonable cause to believe to be false, or does not believe to be true, shall be deemed to have committed an offence punishable under section 177 of the Pakistan Penal Code.

22.—(1) For the purposes of this Act a person born aboard a registered ship or aircraft, or aboard an unregistered ship or aircraft of the Government of any country shall be deemed to have been born in the place in which the ship or aircraft was registered or as the case may be in that country.

(2) Any reference in this Act to the status or description of the father of a person at the time of that person's birth shall, in relation to a person born after the death of his father be construed as a reference to the status or description of the father at the time of the father's death; and where that death occurred before, and the birth occurs after the commencement of this Act, the status or description which would have been applicable to the father had he died after the commencement of this Act shall be deemed to be the status or description applicable to him at the time of his death.

Where any ²[Central Act] or Regulation made after the commencement of this Act authorises or requires any document to be served by post, whether the expression "serve" or either of the expressions "give" or "send" or any other expression is used, then, unless a different intention appears, the service shall be deemed to be effected by properly addressing, pre-paying and posting by registered post, a letter containing the document, and, unless the contrary is proved, to have been effected at the time at which the letter would be delivered in the ordinary course of post.

Citation of enactments.

128.—(1) In any ²[Central Act] or Regulation, and in any rule, bye-law, instrument or document, made under, or with reference to, any such Act or Regulation, any enactment may be cited by reference to the title or short title (if any) conferred thereon or by reference to the number and year thereof, and any provision in an enactment may be cited by reference to the section or sub-section of the enactment in which the provision is contained.

(2) In this Act and in any ²[Central Act] or Regulation made after the commencement of this Act, a description or citation of a portion of another enactment shall unless a different intention appears, be construed as including the word, section or other part mentioned or referred to as forming the beginning and as forming the end of the portion comprised in the description or citation.

Saving for previous enactments, rules and bye-laws.

129. The provisions of this Act respecting the construction of Acts, Regulations, rules or bye-laws made after the commencement of this Act shall not affect the construction of any Act, Regulation, rule or bye-law made before the commencement of this Act, although the Act, Regulation, rule or bye-law is continued or amended by an Act, Regulation, rule or bye-law made after the commencement of this Act.

Application of Act to Ordinances.

130. In this Act the expression '²[Central Act]' wherever it occurs, except in section 5, and the word "Act" in clauses (9), (12), (38), (48) and (50) of section 3 and in section 25 shall be deemed to include an Ordinance made and promulgated by the Governor-General under section 23 of the Indian Councils Act, 1861 ⁶[or section 72 of the Government of India Act, 1915] ⁷[or section 42 ⁸* * * of the Government of India Act, 1935].

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF WEST PAKISTAN ACT, 1955

An Act to provide for the establishment of the Province of West Pakistan by integrating Provinces and States and for other purposes connected therewith.

It is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. Short title and commencement—(1) This Act may be called the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, ⁴1955.

(2) It shall come into force at once.

2. Integration of the Provinces and States into West Pakistan—(1) The Governor-General shall declare by public notification that as from the date specified in such notification, hereinafter referred to as the "appointed day", the territories which, before the appointed day, were the territories of—

- (i) the Governor's Provinces of the Punjab, the North-West Frontier and Sind,
- (ii) the chief Commissioner's Province of Baluchistan and the Capital of the Federation,
- (iii) the States of Bahawalpur and Khairpur, and the Baluchistan States Union,
- (iv) the Tribal Areas of Baluchistan, the Punjab and the North-West Frontier, and the States of Amb, Chitral, Dir and Swat (hereinafter referred to as the "specified territories"), shall be incorporated into the Province of West Pakistan.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in the preceding sub-section the Capital of the Federation shall be administered in accordance with the provisions of section 290-A of the Government of India Act, 1935.

(3) Nothing in this Act shall authorise any change in the internal administration of the Tribal Areas of Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier or the States of Amb, Chitral, Dir and Swat (hereinafter referred to as the "special areas") except in accordance with this sub-section and the following provisions shall apply to the special areas:—

(a) The executive authority of the Province of West Pakistan shall extend to any special area therein, but no Act of the Federal Legislature or of the Provincial Legislature shall apply to a special area or any part thereof unless the Governor with the previous approval of the Governor-General so directs, and in giving such a direction with respect to any Act the Governor may direct that the Act shall in its application to the area, or to any specified part thereof, have effect subject to such exceptions and modifications as he thinks fit;

(b) The Governor may with the approval of the Governor-General make regulations for the peace and good government of a special area or any part thereof and any regulation so made may repeal or amend any Act of the Federal Legislature or of the Provincial Legislature or any other law in force in the Area;

(c) The Governor-General may give such directions to the Governor relating to any special area as he may deem necessary and the Governor shall in the discharge of his function under this sub-section, comply with such direction; and

(d) The Governor-General may at any time by order direct that the whole or any part of a special area shall cease to be a special area or alter the boundaries of any special area, and any such order may contain such incidental and consequential provision as appear to the Governor-General to be necessary and proper:

Provided that before making such an order the Governor-General shall ascertain, in such manner as he considers appropriate, the views of the people of the special area or areas concerned.

3. Taxes, Assets, Property, Liabilities, etc., of the Capital of Federation—Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in sections 6 and 9 of this Act the proceeds of all taxes and other revenues payable in accordance with the laws in force immediately before the appointed day, in the Capital of the Federation shall continue to be payable to the revenues of the Federation and all property and assets which immediately before the appointed day vested in the Federal Government in respect of the Capital of the Federation shall continue to be vested in the Federal Government and all rights, liabilities and obligations of the Federal Government in respect of the Capital of the Federation shall continue to be the rights, liabilities and obligations of the Federal Government.

4. Amendment of laws—As from the appointed day any reference in any Act, including the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Indian Independence Act, 1947, or in any rule, regulation, order, bye-law or public notification to any specified territory shall be construed as a reference to the Province of West Pakistan, or as the context may indicate, to a part thereof.

5. Orders of the Governor-General—(1) The Governor-General may by order make such provision as appears to him to be necessary or expedient—

The Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955

- (a) for constituting the Province of West Pakistan;
- (b) for the purpose of adaptation of laws, make repeals of, omissions from, additions to and modifications of any Act (other than this Act, the Government of India Act, 1935, or the Indian Independence Act, 1947), or any Order-in-Council, Letters Patent, Ordinance or any rule, regulations, order, bye-law or public notification applying immediately before the appointed day to any specified territory;
- (c) for authorizing the exercise, by any person or authority specified in the Order, of any of the functions of government in any specified territory between the date of this Act and the appointed day;
- (d) for other matters supplemental, and incidental to and consequential upon the establishment of the Province of West Pakistan.

(2) The Governor-General may delegate any of his functions under clauses (b) and (c) of sub-section (1) of this section to the Governor of West Pakistan and any order of the Governor may include any matter supplemental or incidental to, or consequential upon, any provision made by such order:

Provided that the power exercisable under this section shall not extend beyond six months from the appointed day.

6. Financial provisions—(1) The proceeds of all taxes and other revenues payable in accordance with the laws in force immediately before the appointed day to the revenues or the public funds of any Governor's Province in the specified territories, or to the revenues or public funds of the State of Bahawalpur or the State of Khairpur, or the Baluchistan States Union shall be payable to the revenues or public funds of the Province of West Pakistan, as the case may be.

(2) The proceeds of all taxes and other revenues payable in accordance with the laws in force immediately before the appointed day in any of the specified territories to the revenues or the public funds of the Federation but which would, if the specified territory had been a Governor's Province, have been payable to the revenues or the public funds of the Province, shall be payable to the revenues or the public funds of the Province of West Pakistan.

(3) There shall be paid from the revenues of the Federation to the revenues of the Province of West Pakistan—

- (a) in respect of each complete financial year after the appointed day, a sum estimated by the Governor-General to be the difference between the proceeds of the taxes and other revenues referred to in sub-section (2) of this section in the last complete financial year before the appointed day and the expenditure of the Federation during that financial year in the specified territories to which that sub-section applies in respect of functions which are by or under this Act transferred to the Province of West Pakistan; and
- (b) in respect of the financial year which includes the appointed day, such proportion of the sum payable under paragraph (a) of this sub-section as the Governor-General thinks equitable.

(4) Pending the exercise by the Legislative Assembly of West Pakistan of the powers vested in it by sections 78 to 81 of the Government of India Act, 1935, the Governor of West Pakistan shall have power to authenticate by his signature a schedule specifying—

- (a) the sums required to meet expenditure charged upon the revenues of the Province; and
- (b) the sums required to meet other expenditure proposed to be made from the revenues of the Province; and any such schedule shall be sufficient authority for the expenditure of the sums specified therein and shall be valid for a period of not more than six months from the appointed day.

7. High Courts—(1) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any law, including the Government of India Act, 1935, the Governor-General may by order establish a High Court for the Province of West Pakistan to replace the High Court in Lahore, the Chief Court of Sind and the Judicial Commissioners' Courts in North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan and any other Court functioning as High Court for any other specified territories, and the High Court so established and the judges thereof shall exercise jurisdiction in relation to the whole of the Province of West Pakistan, ¹[except the Special Areas,] and the powers and authority exercisable by the High Court in Lahore and the Judges thereof, immediately before the date on which the order under this sub-section comes into force, shall be exercisable by the High Court of West Pakistan and the judges thereof in ²[the whole of the Province of West Pakistan, except the Special Areas,] and section 223 of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall be construed accordingly.

² Substituted for the words "the whole of West Pakistan", ibid., with effect on and from 14th October, 1955.

The Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955

(2) As from the date of the establishment of the High Court of West Pakistan under sub-section (1) of this section, section 219 of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall be omitted and the following shall be substituted therefor:—

"219.—The following courts shall in relation to Pakistan, be deemed to be High Courts for the purposes of this Act, that is to say, the High Court of East Bengal, and the High Court of West Pakistan."

(3) As from the date of establishment of a High Court for the Province of West Pakistan under sub-section (1) of this section the Judges of the High Court of Lahore, the Judges of the Chief Court of Sind and the Judges of the Judicial Commissioner's Court of North-West Frontier Province shall become Judges of the High Court of West Pakistan and the Chief Justice of the High Court of Lahore shall become the Chief Justice of the High Court of West Pakistan;

Provided that—

(a) a person who becomes a Judge of the High Court of West Pakistan in accordance with this sub-section shall be entitled to terms and conditions of service, including terms and conditions in respect of leave and pension, not less favourable than those to which he was entitled as a Judge of the High Court from which he is transferred under this sub-section, and section 221 of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall be construed accordingly;

(b) any person who was immediately before the date of the order serving as a temporary or additional judge shall on that date become a temporary or additional judge, as the case may be, in the High Court of West Pakistan, and section 222 of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall be construed accordingly.

(4) An order under sub-section (1) of this section shall make such provision as seems to the Governor-General to be necessary or expedient for determining the places within the Provinces of West Pakistan at which the High Court or any Judges or division thereof may sit.

¹[(5) All proceedings which immediately before the appointed day are pending in the High Court of Lahore, the Chief Court of Sind and the Judicial Commissioner's Courts in the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan, and in any other court functioning as High Court for any other specified territory, shall, as from that day, stand transferred to the High Court of West Pakistan and shall be continued as if they had been proceedings instituted in the High Court of West Pakistan, and any order made by any of the said replaced High Courts in any such proceedings as aforesaid, shall for all purposes, have effect as an order made by the High Court of West Pakistan.]

(6) The power of the Governor-General to make Order under this section shall include the power to make arrangements—

- (a) for the disposal of the work in the High Court of West Pakistan including proceedings transferred to the High Court from the replaced High Courts,
- (b) for the transfer to the High Court of West Pakistan of the officers and servants of replaced High Courts, and

(c) for all other matters consequential and incidental thereto, and he may delegate to the Chief Justice of the High Court any of the powers conferred upon him under this subsection.]

8. Public Services and Public Service Commission—(1) The Governor of West Pakistan may by order establish a Public Service Commission for the Province of West Pakistan to replace the Joint Public Service Commission for the Punjab and North-West Frontier Province, the Public Service Commission for Sind, and any other Public Service Commission functioning as such for any other specified territory.

(2) As from the date of the establishment of the Public Service Commission for the Province of West Pakistan under sub-section (1) of this section, the Chairman and members of the Joint Public Service Commission for the Punjab and North-West Frontier Province and of the Public Service Commission for Sind shall become members of the Public Service Commission of the Province of West Pakistan :

Provided that—

(a) Nothing in this sub-section shall extend the period of service of any person transferred under this sub-section; and

(b) A person transferred under this sub-section shall be employed under terms and conditions not less favourable than the terms and conditions on which he was employed immediately before the appointed day.

(3) All persons in the service of the Crown, serving in connection with the affairs of the specified territories, and all persons holding civil posts under the Government of the State of Bahawalpur, or the State of ¹ Subsection (5) and (6) added, ibid., with effect on and from 14th October 1955.

The Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955

Khairpur, or the Baluchistan States Union, shall, as from the appointed day, be deemed to be persons serving the Crown in connection with the affairs of the Province of West Pakistan on such terms and conditions as the Governor of the Province of West Pakistan may determine:

Provided that—

- (a) such terms and conditions shall not be less favourable than the terms and conditions admissible to them immediately before the 10th day of August, 1955; and
- (b) notwithstanding the terms of his appointment in the specified territory, any such person may be required to serve in any post or capacity and in any part of West Pakistan.

9. Transfer of property, liabilities, etc.—(1) All property and assets which immediately before the appointed day were vested in Her Majesty for the purposes of the Government of any Governor's Province included in the specified territories or in the Ruler of any State so included for the purposes of the government of that State shall vest in Her Majesty for the purposes of the Government of West Pakistan: and the rights, liabilities and obligations of any such Province or State shall be the rights, liabilities and obligations of the Province of West Pakistan.

(2) The Governor-General may by order declare that any property and assets which immediately before the appointed day were vested in Her Majesty for the purposes of the government of any other specified territory shall vest in Her Majesty for the purposes of the Government of West Pakistan and that any of the rights, liabilities and obligations of any such territory shall be the rights, liabilities and obligations of the Province of West Pakistan.

(3) The provisions of sub-section (1) of this section shall not apply to any property or assets recognized by the Governor-General as the private property of the Ruler of a State.

10. Continuation of laws—(1) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, and subject to any order of the Governor-General under section 5 of this Act and to the powers of any competent legislature, all laws in force in West Pakistan immediately before the appointed day shall continue to apply to the areas and the persons to whom they would have applied if this Act had not been passed.

(2) For the purposes of this section "law" includes any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, any law passed by a competent legislature in India or Pakistan, and any Order-in-Council, Letters Patent, ordinance, order, regulation, rule, bye-law or public notification made or issued by a competent authority.

(3) For the purpose of bringing the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, into accord with the provisions of this Act, the Government of India Act, 1935, shall as from the appointed day be amended in accordance with the provisions of the First Schedule to this Act.

11. Interim Legislature for West Pakistan—(1) Notwithstanding anything in the Government of India Act, 1935, there shall be, until a Provincial Legislature is constituted for West Pakistan in accordance with that Act, an Interim Provincial Legislature for West Pakistan consisting of the Governor of West Pakistan and a Legislative Assembly, which shall be composed of three hundred and ten members as provided in the Second Schedule to this Act:

Provided that the Interim Legislature shall, unless dissolved earlier in accordance with the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, or for the purpose of enforcement of the new Constitution to be framed by the Constituent Assembly, stand dissolved on the expiration of eighteen months from the date of the commencement of this Act.

(2) A person shall be qualified for election to the Legislative Assembly constituted under this section if he is—

- (a) a citizen of Pakistan;
- (b) ¹[not less than twenty-five years of age;]
- (c) resident in West Pakistan; and
- (d) not disqualified for being chosen as a member of a Provincial Legislative Assembly by section 69 of the Government of India Act, 1935.

(3) For the purposes of each election at the general election, the Governor of West Pakistan shall appoint a Returning Officer who shall conduct the election in accordance with the provisions of this Act:

Provided that for the purpose of first general election to the Interim Provincial Legislature the Returning Officers shall be appointed by the Governor-General.

(4) An election under this section shall be held on a day and at a place and time fixed by the Governor of West Pakistan:

Provided that for the purpose of the first general election to the Interim Provincial Legislature the date, place and time shall be fixed by the Governor-General.

¹ Substituted for the words "twenty-five years of age" by the Establishment of West Pakistan (Amendment) Act, 1955, section 3, with effect on and from 14th October, 1955.

The Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955

(5) The Interim Provincial Legislature may by law make provision for the filling of casual vacancies.

(6) The provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall apply to the Interim Provincial Legislature established under this Act as they apply to a Provincial Legislature under section 60 of the Government of India Act, 1935:

Provided that—

- (a) the composition of the Legislative Assembly shall be such as is specified in this section; and
- (b) the Fifth and Sixth Schedules to that Act shall not apply.

(7) On the appointed day the Legislative Assemblies of the Provinces of the Punjab, the North-West Frontier Province and Sind, and ¹[the Legislative Assemblies of the States of Khairpur and Bahawalpur] shall cease to exist, and the persons holding offices as Minister, Parliamentary Secretary, Private Parliamentary Secretary or Speaker or Deputy Speaker of such Legislative Assembly shall cease to hold such offices:

Provided that the first meeting of the Interim Provincial Legislature shall be held within four months of the completion of the elections.

12. Disputes relating to election to Interim Legislature of West Pakistan—(1) If any doubt or dispute arises as to whether a person has or has not been validly elected to the Legislative Assembly constituted under section 11 of this Act, it shall be raised by a petition to the Governor of West Pakistan and if—

- (a) the petition is received by the Governor within a period of thirty days after the publication of the result of the election in the official Gazette; and
- (b) before or at the same time as the petition is received by the Governor the petitioner has deposited in a treasury of the Government of West Pakistan the sum of rupees one thousand in cash as security for the cost of the investigation;

the Governor shall appoint a tribunal (hereinafter referred to as the "tribunal") in accordance with the provision of sub-section (2) of this section.

(2) The tribunal shall consist of a chairman who shall be or has been a Judge of a High Court and of two other persons, who shall be or have been District and Sessions Judges in Pakistan, and shall be set up within six weeks of the receipt of the petition by the Governor.

(3) The tribunal shall have all such powers of a High Court as it may deem necessary to investigate the question including the powers to enforce the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, and shall decide its own procedure.

(4) For the purpose of investigation and decision of doubts and disputes the provisions of the Government of India (Provincial Elections) (Corrupt Practices and Election Petitions) Order, 1936, and of Part E of the Punjab Legislative Assembly Electoral Rules, 1950, relating to Corrupt Practices and the Final Decision of Doubts and Disputes as to the validity of an Election, shall apply with such modifications as the context may require.

(5) The tribunal shall report to the Governor on the question submitted to it, and the Governor shall make such consequential order as to him seems necessary to give effect to the report, and any such order shall be final and shall not be questioned in any court.

(6) The validity of an election under section 11 of this Act shall not be questioned in any court.

13. Filling of casual vacancies in the Constituent Assembly—(1) For section 8 of the Constituent Assembly (Proceedings and Privileges) Act, 1955, the following provision shall as from the appointed day be substituted—

"8. Whenever the seat of a member of the Assembly becomes vacant the Speaker of the Assembly shall within seven days of the vacancy give notice thereof in the official Gazette and as soon as may be reasonably practicable thereafter the Governor of East Bengal, or the Governor of West Pakistan, as the case may be, shall take steps to fill the vacancy, and shall appoint a returning officer, who shall conduct the election in accordance with the rules in the Schedule to this Act".

(2) For the purposes of an election to fill a casual vacancy to which sub-section (2) of section 8 of the Constituent Assembly (Proceedings and Privileges) Act, 1955, applies, the following amendments shall as from the appointed day be made in the Schedule to that Act, that is to say—

- (a) In rule 2, the words "in the case of East Bengal, the Punjab, the North-West Frontier Province and Sind" shall be omitted;
- (b) Rule 3 shall be omitted;
- (c) In rule 4, the words "or rule 3" shall be omitted.
- (d) In rule 10, the words "or the Chief Commissioner, as the case may be" shall be omitted.

¹ Substituted for the words "Legislative Assembly of the State of Khairpur", ibid., with effect on and from 14th October 1955.

The Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955

14. Forty per cent representation of Punjab—For a period of ten years from the commencement of this Act, the number of persons elected to represent the territory which immediately before the commencement of this Act constituted the Province of Punjab shall not be more than forty per cent of the total number of members of the Legislature of the Province of West Pakistan.

Provision regarding administration of the Federal Capital at Karachi. [see pages 62—64].

¹[290A]—(1) Except in respect of matters relating to High Court, the Provincial Legislature shall have no power to make laws in respect of the Capital of the Federation.

(2) The Governor-General may by order make, in respect of the Capital of the Federation, such provisions—

- (a) for its government and administration;
- (b) for varying composition of the Legislature of the Province affected thereby and the representation in the Federal Legislature of that Province;
- (c) with respect to the laws which are to be in force in the area;
- (d) with respect to the expenses or revenues of any court theretofore exercising the jurisdiction of a High Court in the area;
- (e) with respect to apportionments, and adjustments of, and in respect of, assets and liabilities; and
- (f) with respect to other supplemental, incidental and consequential matters;

as he may deem necessary or proper.

(3) The Governor-General may by order alter, amend or modify any order made under this section.

(4) The executive authority of the Federation extends to the Capital of the Federation and any order made under this subsection may be controlled or superseded by an Act of the Federal Legislature, which shall have also power to make laws for the Capital of the Federation with respect to matters enumerated in the Provincial Legislative List, other than matters relating to High Court.

(5) An order made under this section may authorise expenditure from the revenues of the Federation.]

Whereas it is necessary to provide for the conduct of elections to the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, the qualifications and disqualifications for membership of those Assemblies, corrupt and illegal practices and other offences at or in connection with such elections, the determination of doubts and disputes arising out of or in connection with such elections, and other matters arising out of or connected with the matters aforesaid;

It is hereby enacted as follows:—

PART I—PRELIMINARY

1. Short title and commencement.—(1) This Act may be called the Representation of the People Act, 1957.
- (2) It shall come into force on such day or days as the President may, by public notification, appoint, and different days may be appointed for different provisions of the Act.

2. Interpretation.—(1) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,— “candidate” means a person who has been nominated as a candidate, whether the nomination was valid or not;
 “constituency” means a constituency delimited for the election of a member to the National Assembly or to the Provincial Assembly, as the context may require;
 “contesting candidate” means a candidate who has been validly nominated and has not withdrawn before the date and time fixed for the withdrawal of candidature;
 “costs” means all costs, charges and expenses of or incidental to the trial of an election petition;
 “election” means an election to fill a seat in the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly;
 “Election Commission” means the Election Commission appointed under the Constitution;
 “election petition” means a petition presented in pursuance of Part III;
 “Election Tribunal” or “Tribunal” means a tribunal appointed under this Act for the trial of election petitions;
 “elector” in relation to an election, means any person whose name is for the time being on the electoral roll to be used at that election;
 “official Gazette” means, in relation to anything which concerns the National Assembly, the Gazette of Pakistan, and in relation to anything which concerns the Assembly of a Province, the official Gazette of that Province;
 “person” does not include a body of persons;
 “prescribed” means prescribed by rules made under this Act;
 “returned candidate” means a candidate whose name has been published under section 50 as duly elected.
 (2) Where a Returning Officer is required or authorised by this Act to give any public notice, he may do so by advertisement in the Press and, if he thinks fit, by placard, handbill or such other means as he thinks best calculated to afford information to the electors.

PART II—CONDUCT OF ELECTIONS

Chapter I—Administrative Arrangements

3. General election.—(1) For the purpose of constituting the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies of East Pakistan and West Pakistan, as the case may be, in due time under the Constitution a general election shall be held.
 (2) A general election shall also be held on the expiration of the duration of the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly or upon the dissolution of the same in order that a new Assembly may be constituted.

4. Notifications for election to the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies.—For the purpose of constituting the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly the President shall by one or more notifications in the official Gazette call upon the constituencies of the Assembly concerned to elect members thereto in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder, before such date as may therein be specified:

Provided that for the purpose of constituting an Assembly on the expiration of its duration, no such notification shall be issued at any time earlier than three months before the date of the expiration of its duration.

5. Returning Officers and Assistant Returning Officers.—(1) For every election, the Election Commission shall appoint for each constituency a Returning Officer who shall be an officer of the Central or a Provincial Government:

Provided that the same person may be appointed as the Returning Officer for two or more constituencies.

(2) The Election Commission may appoint one or more persons, being officers of the Central or a Provincial Government, Assistant Returning Officers to assist the Returning Officer in the exercise of his functions.

(3) The Assistant Returning Officer shall, subject to the control of the Returning Officer and such conditions and restrictions as may be imposed by the Election Commission, have power to perform all or any of the functions of the Returning Officer.

(4) It shall be the duty of a Returning Officer and of an Assistant Returning Officer performing the functions of a Returning Officer to do all such acts and things as may be necessary for effectively conducting an election in accordance with this Act and the rules made thereunder.

6. Polling districts and polling stations.—(1) It shall be the duty of the Returning Officer to provide, with the previous approval of the Election Commission, in each constituency a sufficient number of polling stations at places within such distances as may be prescribed.

(2) No polling station shall be located in the premises belonging to or under the control of any of the candidates.

(3) There shall be separate polling for male and female electors.

(4) The Election Commission shall cause a list of the polling stations in each constituency to be published in the official Gazette and at such place or places as it may think fit in the constituency and may consider any representation made to it in respect of any polling station and if it thinks fit, may direct the Returning Officer to make such alterations in the polling stations as the Commission thinks necessary in the circumstances, and the Returning Officer shall make the alterations accordingly, and the list shall be republished so as altered.

7. Presiding officer and polling officer.—(1) For each polling station the Returning Officer shall appoint a presiding officer and such number of polling officers as he thinks necessary, but no person shall be so appointed if he is or has at any time been employed by or on behalf of any of the candidates in the election.

(2) It shall be the duty of the presiding officer to maintain order in the polling station, to carry out the provisions of this Act and the rules thereunder in relation to the conduct of the poll, and to report to the Returning Officer any fact or incident which may in his opinion affect the fairness of the poll, and it shall be the duty of each polling officer to assist the presiding officer in the discharge of his duties under this Act.

(3) The Returning Officer shall authorize one of the polling officers to act in place of the presiding officer if the presiding officer is at any time during the poll through illness or other cause not present at the polling station, or is for some other reason unable to exercise any of his functions; but any absence of the presiding officer and the reasons thereof shall, as soon as possible after the close of the poll, be reported to the Returning Officer.

(4) The Returning Officer may at any time during the poll, for reasons to be recorded, suspend any presiding officer or polling officer from the exercise of his functions and make such arrangements as he may consider necessary for the exercise of the functions of the officer so suspended.

8. Notification of days for different stages of an election.—As soon as may be after a notification under section 4 has been published the Election Commission shall in respect of each election and in relation to each constituency by public notification appoint the following days, that is to say:—

(a) a day (hereinafter referred to as the “nomination day”) for the receipt of nomination papers not earlier than fourteen days from the date of the said notification;

(b) a day (hereinafter referred to as the “scrutiny day”) for the scrutiny of nominations not earlier than at least twenty-four hours after the nomination day;

(c) a day (hereinafter referred to as the “withdrawal day”) for the withdrawal of candidature not earlier than seven days after the nomination days;

(d) a day at least thirty days after the nomination day (hereinafter referred to as the “polling day”) on which a poll shall, if necessary, be taken; and

(e) a day (hereinafter referred to as the “counting day”) or days on which votes shall, if necessary, be counted.

9. Public notice of election.—As soon as may be after the public notification made under section 8, the Returning Officer shall in respect of his constituency give a public notice of his intention to hold the election and shall specify the place at which nomination papers are to be delivered.

Chapter II—Nomination of Candidates

10. Nomination.—A candidate may be nominated in the same constituency by more than one nomination paper.

11. Who may be nominated.—(1) Any person whose name appears on the electoral roll of any constituency for the National Assembly and who is not otherwise disqualified for election to that Assembly may be nominated as a candidate for election to that Assembly in any constituency thereof.

(2) Any person whose name appears on the electoral roll of any constituency for a Provincial Assembly and who is not otherwise disqualified for election to that Assembly may be nominated as a candidate for election to that Assembly in any constituency thereof.

12. Who may nominate.—Any elector in a constituency may nominate a person as a candidate for election to fill a seat in that constituency if such person is qualified to be elected to fill that seat under the provisions of the Constitution and this Act.

13. Method of nomination.—(1) Each candidate shall be nominated by a separate nomination paper, in the prescribed form, signed by his proposer and seconder, and containing a certificate signed by the proposer that the candidate has consented to the nomination and such nomination paper shall be delivered to the Returning Officer by the candidate himself, or his proposer or seconder, at the place specified in the notice under section 9, on the nomination day between the hours of nine o’clock in the morning and five o’clock in the afternoon.

(2) No person shall be a proposer or a seconder for the purposes of this section unless his name appears on the electoral roll of the constituency in which the seat is to be filled:

Provided that no person may subscribe more than one nomination paper, either as proposer or as seconder; and if any person subscribes more than one nomination paper, all such nomination papers after the first received by the Returning Officer shall be void.

(3) On the presentation of a nomination paper, the Returning Officer shall acknowledge the receipt of it and satisfy himself that the names and electoral roll numbers of the candidate and his proposer and seconder as entered in the nomination paper are the same as those entered in the electoral rolls:

Provided that the Returning Officer shall permit any error in the nomination paper in regard to the said names or numbers to be corrected in order to bring them in conformity with the corresponding entries in the electoral rolls; and where necessary, direct that any clerical or printing error in the said entries shall be overlooked.

(4) The Returning Officer shall endorse on nomination paper the name of the person presenting it and the date and time at which it is received and inform the candidate of the time and place at which he shall hold the scrutiny.

(5) The Returning Officer shall cause to be affixed at some conspicuous place in his office a notice of every nomination paper received by him containing descriptions identical with those contained in the nomination paper, both of the candidate and his proposer and seconder.

(6) Where a candidate is nominated in a constituency other than that in which his name is entered on the electoral roll as an elector it shall be sufficient for the purposes of sub-section (3) if he or his proposer or seconder produces before the Returning Officer a certified copy of the entry in that roll.

14. Deposit.—(1) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (2), no nomination paper shall be accepted unless a sum of five hundred or of two hundred and fifty rupees, accordingly as the election is to fill a seat in the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly, is deposited by the candidate or on his behalf either in cash at the time of the delivery of the nomination paper, or the nomination paper is accompanied by a receipt showing that the appropriate sum has been deposited by the candidate or on his behalf at any branch of the National Bank of Pakistan or at a Government Treasury.

(2) No candidate who has been nominated in the same constituency by more than one nomination paper shall be required to make more than one deposit.

15. Scrutiny.—(1) On the scrutiny day, the candidates, their election agents, and proposer or proposers and seconder or seconds, as the case may be, and one other person duly authorised in writing by each candidate, may attend at the time and place specified by the Returning Officer, and the Returning Officer shall give such persons all reasonable opportunities for examining all nomination papers delivered to him in accordance with section 13 of this Act.

(2) The Returning Officer shall then examine the nomination papers and decide any objection made to any nomination and may, either on such objection or of his own motion, and after such summary inquiry, if any, as he thinks necessary, reject any nomination on any of the following grounds:—

(a) that the candidate is not qualified to be elected to fill the seat under the Constitution or this Act;

(b) that the proposer or seconder is disqualified from subscribing to nomination papers under this Act; or

(c) that any of the provisions of section 12 or section 13 or section 14 has not been complied with; or

(d) that the signature of the proposer or seconder is not genuine:

Provided that—

(i) if a nomination paper is rejected, the candidate's nomination shall not be refused if he is validly nominated by another nomination paper; and

(ii) the Returning Officer shall not reject any nomination paper on the ground of any defect which is not of substantial character, and may allow any such defect to be remedied forthwith.

(3) The Returning Officer shall endorse on each nomination paper his decision accepting or rejecting it, and where he rejects a nomination paper he shall record on it a brief statement of his reasons for rejecting it, and except as provided in sub-section (4) the decision of the Returning Officer shall be final.

(4) Where the Returning Officer rejects all the nomination papers of a candidate, he shall forthwith refer the matter to the Election Commission, together with those papers and the statements referred to in sub-section (3), and the Commission, after giving to the parties concerned such opportunity of representing their case as it may deem fit, shall take a decision in the matter before the withdrawal day, and such decision shall be final:

Provided that the election may be questioned in an election petition on the ground of the improper rejection of the nomination paper of a candidate.

Explanation.—For the purpose of this subsection, any member of the Election Commission appointed by the Chief Election Commissioner in this behalf shall be deemed to be the Election Commission.

16. Withdrawal.—(1) Any candidate may withdraw his candidature by notice in writing in the prescribed form, signed by him, and delivered to the Returning Officer within the time fixed for withdrawal, and no such notice of withdrawal shall be subject to cancellation.

(2) The Returning Officer shall on receiving such notice of withdrawal and on being satisfied that the signature is that of the candidate, cause a notice thereof to be affixed at some conspicuous place in his office.

17. Retirement from contest at elections.—(1) A contesting candidate may retire from the contest by a notice in the prescribed form which shall be delivered to the Returning Officer between the hours of eleven o'clock in the forenoon and three o'clock in the afternoon of any day not later than ten days before the polling day either by such candidate in person or by an agent authorized in this behalf in writing by such candidate.

(2) No person who has given a notice of retirement under sub-section (1) shall be allowed to cancel the notice.

(3) The Returning Officer shall, upon receiving a notice of retirement under sub-section (1), cause a copy thereof to be affixed to his notice board and also to be published in such manner as may be prescribed.

(4) Any person who has given a notice of retirement under sub-section (1) shall thereafter be deemed subject to the provisions of sections 51 and 90 not to be a contesting candidate.

18. Publication of valid nominations.—The Returning Officer shall immediately after the expiry of the time fixed for withdrawal prepare and publish a list of valid nominations in such manner as may be prescribed.

19. Death of candidate after nomination.—If after the closing of nominations and before the poll is taken any contesting candidate dies, the Returning Officer shall by public notice cancel all proceedings relating to that election and fresh proceedings shall commence and new dates shall be fixed for nomination, scrutiny and withdrawal in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this Part.

20. Postponement on account of emergencies.—If the Returning Officer is satisfied that proceedings relating to nomination, scrutiny or withdrawal cannot take place on the date fixed therefor by reason of riot or natural calamity, he may postpone or adjourn the proceedings, and with the approval of the Election Commission, by public notice, fix a new date for such proceedings, and for any proceedings following therefrom.

21. Contested and uncontested election.—(1) If after scrutiny under section 15, the Returning Officer decides that only one person has been validly nominated for election, or if after any withdrawal or retirement only one person remains validly nominated for election, the Returning Officer shall declare that person to be elected a member for the constituency concerned, shall give public notice of such election and shall make a return of the election in the prescribed manner to the Election Commission and to the Secretary to the appropriate Assembly.

(2) The return so made shall be published in the official Gazette by the Election Commission.

(3) If on the expiry of the period fixed for withdrawal, more than one candidate remains duly nominated, the Returning Officer shall in the prescribed manner and form—

(a) prepare and publish a list of valid nominations; and

(b) give notice of the poll.

22. Identifying symbols.—(1) The Election Commission shall prescribe a list of symbols by which contesting candidates may be identified.

(2) A candidate or his proposer or seconder may deliver to the Returning Officer, with his nomination paper a declaration stating the candidate's order of preference among the symbols prescribed under sub-section (1).

(3) Subject to any general or special instructions issued by the Election Commission the Returning Officer shall allocate a symbol to each contesting candidate, and such symbol shall be indicated in the list of valid nominations published under subsection (3) of section 21 against the name of the candidate to whom it has been allocated:

Provided that, subject to instructions as aforesaid, the Returning Officer shall in allocating symbols give effect as nearly as may be to any preference stated under sub-section (2).

Chapter III—Election Agents

23. Election agent.—(1) Every person nominated as a candidate at an election shall, unless he appoints some other person to be his election agent, be deemed to be his own election agent.

(2) Where an appointment is made under subsection (1), a declaration of the appointment containing the name, father's name and address of the election agent shall be delivered to the Returning Officer along with the nomination paper.

(3) A candidate deemed to be his own election agent shall, so far as circumstances permit, be subject to the provisions of this Act both as candidate and as election agent, and except where the context otherwise requires any reference in this Act to an election agent shall be construed as a reference to him acting as his own election agent.

(4) Not more than one election agent shall be appointed for each candidate, and any such appointment may be revoked in writing.

(5) If an appointment is revoked under subsection (4) or an election agent dies, the candidate may appoint another election agent, and if he does so, the name, father's name and address in writing of the person so appointed shall be delivered to the Returning Officer who shall give public notice thereof.

(6) No person shall be appointed an election agent if he is disqualified for such appointment under this Act.

24. Office of election agent.—Every election agent shall have an office to which all claims, notices, summons and documents may be sent, and his address shall be the address delivered to the Returning Officer under section 23 and any claim, notice, writ, summons or documents addressed to the election agent and delivered at such office shall be deemed to have been served on the election agent.

25. Duties and functions of election agent.—It shall be the duty of the election agent to keep such books of account and enter therein such particulars of receipt and expenditure as may be prescribed and to perform such other functions as are by or under this Act to be performed by such agent.

26. Polling and counting agents.—(1) A contesting candidate or his election agent may, before the commencement of the poll, appoint in the manner prescribed such number of polling agents as may be prescribed to act as polling agents at the polling stations.

(2) A contesting candidate or his election agent may, before the counting of votes begins, appoint in the manner prescribed one and only one counting agent to attend at the counting of votes.

(3) Every appointment of a polling agent and a counting agent shall forthwith be communicated to the Returning Officer, or, to the presiding officer who shall inform the Returning Officer.

(4) The appointment of any polling agent or counting agent may be revoked by the contesting candidate or his election agent, and a notice of such revocation shall be delivered to the Returning Officer or, to the presiding officer who shall inform the Returning Officer.

(5) If a polling agent or a counting agent dies, or becomes incapable of acting, or his appointment is revoked, the contesting candidate or his election agent may appoint another person in his place and shall give notice in writing of such appointment to the Returning Officer, or, to the presiding officer who shall inform the Returning Officer.

(6) The functions of a polling agent and a counting agent respectively shall be those provided by or under this Act.

27. Attendance of contesting candidate at polling station or place of counting.—(1) A contesting candidate may attend at any polling station or place of counting votes, and may himself do or assent his polling agent or counting agent in doing any act or thing which such agent is authorised by or under this Act to do.

(2) The provisions of subsection (1) apply to the election agent of a contesting candidate as they apply to the contesting candidate himself.

28. Absence of polling or counting agents.—Where by or under this Act, any act or thing is required or authorised to be done in the presence of polling or counting agents, the failure of any such agent to attend at the time and place appointed for the purpose shall not invalidate any act or thing otherwise duly done.

Chapter IV—Poll

29. Hours of poll.—Subject to any direction issued by the Election Commission, the Returning Officer shall determine the hours during which the poll shall be taken and shall give public notice thereof in the prescribed manner:

Provided that the total period allotted on any one day for polling at an election in a constituency shall not be less than eight hours and shall be unbroken.

30. Adjourned poll.—(1) If at any time the poll at any polling station is interrupted or obstructed by riot or open violence, beyond the control of the executive authorities, or by reason of any natural calamity it is not possible to proceed with the poll, the presiding officer at that polling station may stop the poll and shall forthwith so inform the Returning Officer.

(2) When a poll is stopped under subsection (1) the Returning Officer shall immediately report the circumstances to the Election Commission and as soon as may be, with the approval of the Commission, appoint a day on which a fresh poll shall be taken and shall fix the place, date and hours during which such poll shall be taken.

(3) The Returning Officer shall not count any votes already cast by the electors at such election and all such electors shall be allowed to cast their votes afresh.

31. Poll to be by ballot.—(1) Except as provided in subsection (2), the votes at the poll shall be cast by ballot, the result shall be ascertained by counting the votes given to each contesting candidate, and the contesting candidate receiving the largest number of valid votes shall be declared to be elected.

(2) Rules may be made under this Act to provide for postal voting by persons who have been registered in an electoral roll in pursuance of rules made under the Electoral Rolls Act, 1957 (XXI of 1957).

32. Ballot papers.—(1) The ballot of every elector shall consist of a ballot paper which shall be in such form and marked and numbered in such manner as may be specified by the Election Commission.

(2) In specifying the form and manner under sub-section (1), the Commission shall ensure the secrecy of voting and the security of the ballot paper.

33. Ballot boxes.—(1) The Returning Officer shall provide each presiding officer with one ballot box for every candidate and with as many ballot boxes to be held in reserve as the Returning Officer may consider necessary.

(2) The ballot boxes shall be of such material and design as may be specified by the Election Commission.

(3) Immediately before the commencement of the poll, the Presiding Officer shall show each ballot box empty to the contesting candidate, or his election or polling agent so that they may see that it is empty, and shall then proceed to close and seal it in such manner as may be prescribed and shall place the box in a screened compartment in the polling station ready to receive the ballot papers.

34. Admission to polling station.—Subject to such instructions as may be given by the Election Commission, the Presiding Officer shall regulate the number of electors to be admitted to the polling station at the same time, and shall exclude all other persons except—

(a) the contesting candidates and their election and polling agents;

(b) the polling officers and other officers appointed by the Returning Officer to attend at the polling station;

(c) any child in arms accompanying an elector;

(d) the companions of blind electors; and

(e) any other person on duty in connection with the election.

35. Presiding officer to keep order.—(1) The Presiding Officer shall keep order at the polling station.

(2) Any person who misconducts himself in a polling station or fails to obey the lawful orders of the presiding officer may immediately, by order of the presiding officer, be removed from the polling station by any police officer or by any other person authorised in writing by the Returning Officer to remove him, and the person so removed shall not without the permission of the presiding officer again enter the polling station during the day.

(3) Any person so removed may, if charged with the commission of an offence in the polling station, be dealt with as a person arrested without warrant.

(4) The powers conferred by this section shall not be so exercised as to deprive an elector otherwise entitled to vote of an opportunity to vote at that or another polling station.

36. Special procedure for preventing impersonation.—(1) Every person who applies for a ballot paper at a polling station shall be required to receive a personal mark made with indelible ink, in such manner as may be specified by the Election Commission, before a ballot paper is handed to him.

(2) Where such requirement is imposed a ballot paper may be refused to a person who applies therefor if when applying he already bears such a mark.

(3) Every person as aforesaid in subsection (1) may also be required, before a ballot paper is handed to him, to sign or place his thumb mark on a statement, in such form as may be prescribed, certifying his identity and his particulars in the electoral roll.

37. Voting procedure.—(1) The polling officer shall deliver a ballot paper to every person who applies for it and whose name is recorded as an elector in the electoral roll of the constituency to which the election relates and who is entitled to vote at that polling station, and in deciding whether the person is so entitled the presiding officer may disregard any clerical or printing error if he is satisfied that the entry in the electoral roll refers in fact to the person applying for the ballot paper.

(2) Immediately before the ballot paper is delivered to the elector—

(a) the number, name and description of the elector as stated in the electoral roll shall be called out;

(b) the number of the elector shall be marked on the counterfoil;
 (c) a mark shall be placed on the electoral roll against the number of the elector to denote that a ballot paper has been issued but without showing the particular ballot paper which has been issued; and
 (d) the ballot paper shall be stamped with the official mark.

(3) The elector, on receiving the ballot paper, shall forth-with enter the screened compartment referred to in sub-section (3) of section 33 and there secretly place his ballot paper in the box bearing the name and symbol of the candidate for whom he wishes to vote.

(4) The elector shall vote without undue delay, and shall leave the polling station as soon as he has put his ballot paper into the ballot box.

(5) No person shall at any election vote in more than one constituency of the same class, nor shall any person vote more than once in the same constituency notwithstanding that his name may have been registered in the electoral roll for that constituency more than once, and if he votes in contravention of this subsection all his votes shall be void.

38. Votes by presiding officer, etc.—(1) At the request of an elector incapacitated from voting in the manner required by or under this Act, the presiding officer shall, if he is satisfied that the elector is so incapacitated, cause, in the presence of the polling agents, the elector's ballot paper to be placed in the ballot box bearing the name and symbol of the candidate for whom the elector wishes to vote.

(2) The name and number on the electoral roll of every elector whose vote is marked in pursuance of sub-section (1) and the reason why it is so marked, shall be entered on a list hereinafter called "the list of votes cast by the presiding officer."

(3) If any such elector as is referred to in subsection (1), states that he is blind and requests the presiding officer to allow him to vote with the assistance of another person the presiding officer shall, if he is satisfied that the elector is blind and is also satisfied by the companion that the companion is a qualified person within the meaning of this section, grant the request; and thereupon anything which is by this Act required to be done to or by the said elector in connection with the giving of the vote may be done to or with the assistance of the companion.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3), a person shall be qualified to assist a blind elector to vote, if that person is either—

(a) entitled to vote at the election in that constituency; or

(b) the father, mother, brother, sister, husband, wife, son or daughter of the blind elector and has attained the age of twenty-one years, and has not previously assisted more than one blind person to vote at the election.

(5) The name and number in the electoral roll of every elector whose vote is given in accordance with subsection (3) and the name and address of the companion shall be entered in a list hereinafter called "the list of blind electors assisted by companion".

39. Questions to be put to elector.—(1) The presiding officer may, and if required by a candidate or his election or polling agent shall, put to any person applying for a ballot paper at the time of his application, but not afterwards, the following questions, or either of them, in a language which the Presiding Officer believes to be understandable by the person so applying, namely:—

(a) Are you the person registered in the electoral roll as follows?

(Here the whole entry in the roll shall be read).

(b) Have you already voted here or elsewhere at this election?

(2) No ballot paper shall be delivered to any person who refuses to answer or who answers the first question in the negative or the second question in the affirmative.

40. Tendered ballot papers.—(1) If a person representing himself to be an elector applies for a ballot paper when another person has already represented himself to be that elector and has voted under the name of the person applying he shall, on satisfactorily answering the questions permitted by section 39, be entitled, subject to the provisions of this section, to take a ballot paper (in this Act called "tendered ballot paper") in the same manner as any other elector.

(2) A tendered ballot paper shall, instead of being put into the ballot box, be given to the presiding officer and endorsed by him with the name of the person applying and his number in the electoral roll, and set aside in a separate packet endorsed with the name of the candidate for whom he wishes to vote.

(3) The name of the person applying and his number on the electoral roll be entered in a list (hereinafter called "the tendered votes list").

41. Challenge of elector.—(1) If at the time a person applies for a ballot paper for the purposes of voting or after he has applied and before he has left the polling station a candidate or his polling agent declares to the presiding officer that he has reasonable cause to believe that that person has committed an offence of personation and undertakes to prove the charge in the Court of law, the presiding officer may, after complying with the provisions of section 39 and warning the person of the consequences of personation and if he is satisfied with the answers given by him issue a ballot paper to that person.

(2) If the presiding officer issues a ballot paper under subsection (1) to such person he shall enter the name and address of that person in a list to be called "the challenged votes list" and obtain his signature or thumb impression thereon:

Provided that no action shall be taken by the presiding officer unless such sum as may be prescribed has been deposited in cash with the Presiding Officer by the candidate or his agent for each challenge made under this section.

42. Spoilt paper.—An elector who has inadvertently dealt with his ballot paper in such manner that it cannot conveniently be used as a ballot paper may, on delivering it to the Presiding Officer and proving to his satisfaction the fact of the inadvertence, obtain another ballot paper in the place of the ballot paper so delivered (hereinafter called "the spoilt ballot paper"); and the spoilt ballot paper shall be immediately cancelled.

43. Electors present at closing hour.—(1) With the exception of persons who, at the hour of the close of poll, are present at the building, room, tent or other place in which the polling station is situated and who are waiting to vote, no person shall be given a ballot paper or permitted to vote after that hour.

(2) For the purposes of this section, a person is said to be present and waiting to vote if he has not voted and if—

(a) where the building, room, tent or other place aforesaid is—

(i) situated in an enclosed space, he is within that enclosed space; or

(ii) not so situated, he is in a line of persons waiting to be admitted thereto for the purpose of voting; or

(b) he has been given such statement as is mentioned in subsection (3) of section 36 as a preliminary to applying for a ballot paper.

44. Procedure on close of poll.—(1) As soon as may be after the close of the poll and in the presence of the polling agents the presiding officer shall open all the ballot boxes of each candidate in succession, and having counted the ballot papers in the first box shall seal them, with a certificate stating how many they are, in a separate packet bearing the name and symbol of the candidate, and so on with the next and succeeding boxes, and shall then enclose all the packets relating to that candidate together with a certificate stating how many packets are enclosed in a principal packet bearing the like name and symbol, and seal it.

(2) The presiding officer shall then, in the presence of the polling agents, seal in separate packets—

(a) the unused and spoilt ballot papers placed together;

(b) the tendered ballot papers;

(c) the marked copies of the electoral rolls;

(d) the counterfoils of the used ballot papers;

(e) the certificates of employment on duty on the date of the poll;

(f) the list of votes cast by the presiding officer;

(g) the list of blind electors assisted by companions;

(h) the tendered votes list;

(i) the challenged votes list; and

(j) such other papers as the Returning Officer may direct; and shall cause all the ballot boxes and packets to be delivered to the Returning Officer.

(3) The packets shall be accompanied by a statement (hereinafter called "the ballot paper account") made by the presiding officer in the prescribed form showing the number of ballot papers entrusted to him, the number of ballot papers taken out of the ballot boxes and counted and the number of ballot papers returned by him to the Returning Officer as unused, spoilt and tendered ballot papers.

(4) The presiding officer shall give a certified copy of the ballot paper account referred to in sub-section (3) to each contesting candidate or his election or polling agent present.

(5) It shall be the duty of the Returning Officer to provide for the safe transport and custody of all ballot boxes, packets and documents mentioned in this section until the votes have been counted.

Chapter V—The Counting of votes

45. Attendance at count.—(1) The Returning Officer shall count the votes on the counting day, or days, and shall give the candidates, or their election agents, if any, notice in writing of the time and place at which he shall begin the count.

(2) No person other than the Returning Officer and his clerks, the candidates and their election agents and counting agents shall be present at the count.

(3) The Returning Officer shall give the counting agents all such reasonable facilities for observing the count and all such information with respect thereto as he can give consistently with the orderly conduct of business and the discharge of his duties in connection therewith.

46. The count.—(1) Before the Returning Officer begins the count he shall, in the presence of the counting agents, collect together all the principal packets referred to in subsection (1) of section 44 into separate groups, candidate by candidate, and having opened the principal packets and the packets enclosed in them shall count and record the number of the ballot papers in each principal packet in succession until the entire group has been counted.

(2) Tendered ballot papers shall not be included in the count.

(3) The votes shall be counted in the following manner:—

(a) the votes shall be counted at a table, or as many tables as may be convenient, by persons hereinafter called "tellers";

(b) not more than one teller at a time shall sit at any one table;

(c) all the votes given for one candidate shall be counted before the counting of the votes given for another candidate is begun;

(d) for the purposes of clause (c) the first candidate whose votes are counted shall be the candidate whose name appears first in the list published in pursuance of clause (a) of subsection (3) of section 21, the second candidate whose name so appears second, and so on.

(4) When counting the votes the Returning Officer shall keep the ballot papers in such a manner that the identity of the elector may not be disclosed.

(5) The Returning Officer shall, so far as practicable, proceed with the count continuously allowing time only for refreshment, but if he has to suspend the count by reason of the lateness of the hour he shall seal the ballot papers (keeping those counted separate from those uncounted) and other documents and allow such counting agents as desire to do so to affix their seals, and place the ballot papers and documents in a place of safety till the count is resumed.

47. Recount.—(1) A candidate or his election agent or counting agent may, if present when the count or any recount of the votes is completed, request the Returning Officer to have the votes recounted or again recounted, but the Returning Officer may refuse the request if in his opinion it is unreasonable.

(2) No further step shall be taken after the completion of the count or any recount unless the candidates and the election agents present at the completion thereof have been given a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right conferred by this section.

48. Rejected ballot papers.—(1) Any ballot paper—

(a) which does not bear the official mark, or

(b) on which anything except the printed number on the back is written or marked by which the elector can be identified.

shall be void and not counted.

(2) The Returning Officer shall endorse the word "rejected", on every ballot paper which under this section is rejected, and shall add to the endorsement the words "rejection objected to" if a counting agent objects to the rejection.

(3) The Returning Officer shall draw up a statement in the prescribed form showing the number of ballot papers rejected in pursuance of each clause of subsection (1) and any counting agent may copy the statement.

(4) The decision of the Returning Officer on any question arising in respect of a ballot paper shall be final but shall be subject to review on an election petition.

49. Equality of votes.—Where, after the count (including any recount) is completed, an equality of votes exists between any contesting candidates and the addition of one vote would entitle one of those candidates to be declared elected, the Returning Officer shall forthwith decide between those candidates by lot and the candidate on whom the lot falls shall be deemed to have received the majority of votes.

Chapter VI—Final Proceedings

50. Declaration of result.—(1) After the result of the poll has been ascertained the Returning Officer shall—

(a) declare the candidate elected who has or is deemed under section 49 to have received the majority of votes;

(b) give public notice of his name and the total number of votes given to each contesting candidate; and
(c) make a return in the prescribed form to the Election Commission and to the Secretary of the appropriate Assembly.

(2) The return so made shall be published in the official Gazette by the Election Commission.

51. Return or forfeiture of deposit.—(1) Subject to the provisions of subsections (2), (3) and (4) the deposit made in pursuance of section 14 shall be returned to the person making it, or to his legal representative, as soon as may be after the result of the election is declared.

(2) If a candidate has withdrawn or the poll is countermanded by reason of his death, his deposit shall be returned as soon as may be after his withdrawal or death.

(3) The deposit made in pursuance of section 14 shall not be returned in the case of a candidate who retires under section 17.

(4) If a poll is taken and after the completion of the count (including any recount) a contesting candidate is found not to have polled more than one-eighth of the total number of votes polled by all the contesting candidates his deposit shall be forfeited to the Federation.

52. Verification of ballot papers account.—When the count is completed the Returning Officer shall seal up in separate packets the counted and rejected ballot papers, and shall then in the presence of the candidates and their election agents and counting agents verify each ballot paper account by comparing it with the number of ballot papers recorded by him under subsection (1) of section 46, and opening and resealing the packets containing the unused and spoilt ballot papers and the tendered votes list, with the unused and spoilt ballot papers in his possession and the tendered votes list and shall draw up a statement of the result of the verification, which any counting agent may copy, but he shall not open the sealed packets of tendered ballot papers nor those of the marked copies of the electoral roll.

53. Delivery of documents to the Election Commission.—The Returning Officer shall in the prescribed manner forward to the Election Commission the following documents:—

(a) the packets of ballot papers;

(b) the ballot paper accounts, the statements of rejected ballot papers, and the statement prepared in accordance with section 52;

(c) the tendered votes lists, the lists of blind electors assisted by companions, and the lists of votes cast by the presiding officer and the statements relating thereto;

(d) the tendered ballot papers, and certificates relating thereto;

(e) the packets containing marked copies of electoral rolls;

endorsing on each packet a description of its contents, the date of the election to which they relate, and the name of the constituency for which the election was held.

54. Retention and public inspection of documents.—(1) The Election Commission shall retain for a period of one year all documents received in accordance with the last preceding section and thereafter shall, unless otherwise directed by a High Court or an Election Tribunal, cause them to be destroyed with convenient speed.

(2) The said documents, except the ballot papers, shall be open to public inspection at such time and subject to such conditions as may be prescribed.

(3) The Election Commission shall, on request, supply copies of, or extracts from, the documents open to public inspection on payment of such fee and subject to such conditions as may be prescribed.

55. Order for production of documents.—(1) A High Court may make an order—

(a) for the inspection or production of any rejected ballot paper, or

(b) for the inspection of any counted ballot paper in the custody of the Election Commission if the Court is satisfied by evidence on oath that the order is required for the purpose of instituting or maintaining a prosecution for an offence in relation to the ballot paper, or for the purpose of an election petition.

(2) An Election Tribunal may order the opening of a sealed packet of counterfoils and certificates or the inspection of any counted ballot papers.

(3) An order under this section may be made subject to such conditions as to persons, time, place and mode of inspection, production or opening as the Court or Tribunal making the order may think expedient:

Provided that in making and carrying into effect an order for the inspection of counted ballot papers, care shall be taken that no vote shall be disclosed until it has been proved to have been given and to have been declared by a competent Court or tribunal to be invalid.

(4) Where an order is made under this section the production by the Election Commission of the document in such manner as may be directed by the order shall be conclusive evidence that the document relates to the election specified in the order, and any endorsement on any packet of ballot papers so produced shall be prima facie evidence that the ballot papers are what the endorsement states them to be.

(5) The production from proper custody of a ballot paper purporting to have been used at an election, and of a counterfoil marked with the same printed number and having a number marked thereon in writing, shall be prima facie evidence that the elector whose vote was given by that ballot paper was the elector who had on the electoral roll the same number as was written on the counterfoil;

(6) Save as in this section provided, no person shall be allowed to inspect any rejected or counted ballot paper in the possession of the Election Commission.

PART III—DISPUTE RELATING TO ELECTION

Chapter I—Presentation of Election Petition

56. Election petitions.—No election shall be called in question except by an election petition presented to the Election Commission in accordance with the provisions of this Part.

57. Presentation of petition.—An election petition may be presented by any elector or candidate and the petition shall be deemed to have been presented—

(a) when it is delivered in person to the Secretary to the Commission or to such other officer as may be appointed by the Commission in that behalf,—

(i) by the petitioner; or

(ii) by a person authorised in writing in this behalf by the petitioner; or

(b) when delivered by registered post to the Secretary to the Commission or to such other officer as aforesaid, and not otherwise.

58. Respondents to a petition.—Where a petitioner has been a contesting candidate he shall join as respondents to his petition all the other contesting candidates, and a copy of the petition shall be served upon each respondent.

59. Time for presentation or amendment of petition.—(1) An election petition shall be presented within thirty days next after the return made to the Election Commission under section 21 or section 50, as the case may be, has been published:

Provided that—

(a) where the petition alleges that a corrupt or illegal practice has been committed in relation to election expenses, it may be presented within the fourteen days next following the day on which the Returning Officer received the return of election expenses under section 90; and

(b) where it alleges that a corrupt or illegal practice has been committed by the returned candidate since the date of the election, but within the two months next following the publication of the result of the election in the official Gazette, it may be presented within the twenty-eight days next following the date on which such corrupt or illegal practice was alleged to have been committed.

(2) An election petition may be amended within the period specified by clause (a) or clause (b) of the proviso to subsection (1) in order to include an allegation to which that clause applies.

60. Contents of petitions.—(1) An election petition shall—

(a) contain a precise statement of the material facts on which the petitioner relies;

(b) set forth full particulars of any corrupt or illegal practice or other illegal act alleged by the petitioner, including as full a statement as possible of the names of the persons alleged to have committed such practices or acts and the date and place of the commission of every such practice or act.

(2) Every petition and every schedule or annex to the petition shall be signed by the petitioner and verified in the manner laid down in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (Act V of 1909), for the verification of pleadings.

61. Relief claimed by the petitioner.—A petitioner may claim any one of the following declarations—

(a) that the election of the returned candidate is void; or

(b) that the election of the returned candidate is void and that the petitioner or some other person has been duly elected; or

(c) that the election as a whole is void.

62. Security for costs.—(1) Every petition shall be accompanied by a receipt showing that the petitioner has deposited a sum of two thousand rupees in a Government Treasury or in the State Bank of Pakistan in favour of the Secretary of the Election Commission as security for the costs of the petition.

(2) At any time during the trial of the petition the Election Tribunal appointed under section 65 may call upon the petitioner to increase the security deposited in pursuance of sub-section (1).

63. Dismissal of petition by Election Commission.—If in respect of any petition presented to the Election Commission any provision of sections 57 to 62 has not been complied with the petition shall be forthwith dismissed.

Chapter II—Trial of Election Petition

64. Petitions to be referred to Election Tribunal.—If an election petition is not dismissed under section 63 Election Commission shall refer it for trial to an Election Tribunal appointed in accordance with the provisions of section 65:

Provided that where more than one petition is presented in respect of the same election in the same constituency, all such petitions shall be referred to the same Tribunal, and the Tribunal may try such petitions either separately or in one or more groups.

65. Appointment of Tribunal.—(1) The Election Commission shall appoint the District Judge having jurisdiction in the area included in any constituency to be the Tribunal to hear election petitions made in respect of that constituency.

(2) Where the area included in any constituency is under the jurisdiction of more District Judges than one, the Election Commission shall appoint one of those District Judges to be the Tribunal to hear election petitions made in respect of that constituency.

(3) Every such appointment shall be made in virtue of office and not by name, and for the purposes of this section the expression "District Judge" shall not include an Additional District Judge.

(4) Where any District Judge so appointed is succeeded in his office by another person or persons as District Judge, the trial of any petition begun before one District Judge may be continued before his successor or successors.

66. Power of Election Commission to transfer petition.—(1) The Election Commission, either of its own motion or on an application made to it in this behalf by any of the parties, may at any stage transfer any election petition from the Election Tribunal to which it has been referred for trial under section 64 to any District Judge, and, notwithstanding anything contained in section 65, constitute such District Judge as the Election Tribunal for the purpose of trial of the petition, and the Tribunal so constituted shall proceed with the trial of the petition from the stage at which it was transferred:

Provided that such Tribunal may, if it thinks fit, recall and re-examine any of the witnesses already examined.

(2) The provisions of sub-section (3) and sub-section (4) of section 65 shall apply to every Tribunal constituted under sub-section (1).

67. Place of trial.—(1) The trial shall be held at such place within the constituency for which the election was held as the Tribunal may think fit:

Provided that on being satisfied that special circumstances exist rendering it desirable that the hearing of the petition should be held or continued elsewhere the Tribunal may appoint some other place, whether within or without the constituency, for the hearing.

(2) The trial shall not be invalid only by reason that the place where it is held is outside the territorial jurisdiction of the District Judge appointed to the Tribunal for the trial of that election petition.

68. Attorney-General to assist the Tribunal.—If the Election Commission so directs the Attorney-General or the Advocate-General of a Province shall assist the Tribunal at the hearing of an election petition in such manner as the Tribunal may require.

69. Procedure before the Tribunal.—(1) Subject to the provision of this Act and the rules made thereunder, every election petition shall be tried as nearly as may be in accordance with the procedure applicable under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (Act V of 1908), to the trial of suits:

Provided—

(a) that, unless it is satisfied that there is a special reason for taking the evidence of any witness down in writing, the Tribunal may make a memorandum of the substance of the evidence of each witness as his examination proceeds; and

(b) that the Tribunal may refuse to examine a witness if it considers that his evidence is not material or that he is called on frivolous grounds or for the purpose of delaying the proceedings.

(2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Evidence Act, 1872 (I of 1872), shall apply for the trial of an election petition.

(3) Notwithstanding anything in section 63, an election petition may be dismissed by the Tribunal if any provision of sections 57 to 62 has not been complied with.

(4) The Tribunal may at any time, upon such terms and on payment of such costs as it may direct, allow a petition to be amended in such manner as may, in its opinion, be necessary for ensuring a fair and effective trial and for determining the real questions at issue in the trial.

70. Appearance before the Tribunal.—Any appearance, application or act before the Tribunal may be made or done by a party in person or by an advocate or pleader or any person entitled or allowed to plead in any Civil Court and duly appointed to act on his behalf;

Provided that the Tribunal may, where it considers it necessary, direct any party to appear in person.

71. Powers of the Tribunal.—(1) The Tribunal shall have the same powers as are vested by the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (Act V of 1908) in a Court trying a civil suit, and in particular powers in respect of—

- (a) discovery and inspection;
- (b) enforcing the attendance of witnesses, and requiring the deposit of their expenses;
- (c) compelling the production of documents;
- (d) examining witnesses on oath;
- (e) granting adjournments;
- (f) receiving evidence taken on affidavit; and
- (g) issuing commissions for the examination of witnesses, and it may summon and examine suo moto any person whose evidence appears to it to be material.

(2) The Tribunal shall be deemed to be a Civil Court within the meaning of sections 480 and 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (Act V of 1898).

(3) For the purpose of enforcing the attendance of witnesses, the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Tribunal shall be the limits of the Province in which the election was held.

72. Further provision relating to evidence and witnesses.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in any enactment to the contrary no document shall be inadmissible in evidence at the trial of an election petition only on the ground that it is not duly stamped or registered.

(2) No witness shall be excused from answering any question as to any matter relevant to a matter in issue in the trial of an election petition upon the ground that the answer to such question may incriminate or tend to incriminate him, or that it may expose or tend to expose him to any penalty or forfeiture:

Provided that—

(a) no witness or other person shall be required to state for whom he has voted at an election;

(b) a witness who answers truly all questions which he is required to answer shall be entitled to receive a certificate of indemnity from the Tribunal; and

(c) an answer given by a witness to a question put by or before the Tribunal shall not, except in the case of any criminal proceeding for perjury in respect of his evidence, be admissible in evidence against him in any civil or criminal proceeding.

(3) A certificate of indemnity granted to any witness may be pleaded by him in any Court and shall be a full and complete defence to or upon any charge under Chapter IX-A of the Pakistan Penal Code (Act XLV of 1850), or under this Act arising out of the matter to which such certificate relates, but it shall not be deemed to relieve him from any disqualification in connection with an election imposed by this Act or any other law for the time being in force.

(4) The reasonable expenses incurred by any person in attending to give evidence may be allowed to him by the Tribunal and shall, unless the Tribunal otherwise directs, be deemed to be part of the costs.

73. Recrimination when seat is claimed.—(1) When in an election petition a declaration is claimed that any candidate other than the returned candidate has been duly elected, the returned candidate or any other party may give evidence to prove that the election of such other candidate would have been declared void had he been the returned candidate and had a petition been presented calling his election in question:

Provided that the returned candidate or such other party as aforesaid shall be entitled to give such evidence unless he has within the fourteen days next following the commencement of the trial given notice to the Tribunal of his intention so to do and has also deposited the security, or increased security, referred to in section 62.

(2) Every notice referred to in sub-section (1) shall be accompanied by such statement and particulars as are required by section 60 in the case of an election petition, and shall be signed and verified in like manner.

74. Decision of the Tribunal.—(1) At the conclusion of the trial of an election petition the Tribunal shall make an order—

- (a) dismissing the petition; or
- (b) declaring the election of the returned candidate to be void; or
- (c) declaring the election of the returned candidate to be void and the petitioner or any other candidate to have been duly elected; or

(d) declaring the election as a whole to be void.

(2) At the time of making an order under sub-section (1) the Tribunal shall also make an order—

(a) where the petition alleges any corrupt or illegal practice recording—

(i) a finding whether any corrupt or illegal practice has been committed by, or with the connivance of, any candidate or his agent at the election, and if so, the nature of that practice; and

(ii) the names of all persons, if any, found guilty of any corrupt or illegal practice, and the nature of it together with any recommendation the Tribunal may think proper to make for the exemption of any persons from disqualification incurred in this connection under section 117; and

(b) fixing the costs to be paid and specifying the persons by and to whom they are to be paid:

Provided that no person shall be named in an order made under sub-clause (ii) of clause (a) unless—

(a) he has been given notice to appear before the Tribunal to show cause why he should not be so named; and

(b) if he has appeared in pursuance of the notice, he has been given an opportunity of cross-examining any witness who has already given evidence against him, and of calling evidence in his own defence and of being heard.

75. Grounds for declaring election void.—The Tribunal shall declare an election to be void if it is satisfied that—

(a) the rejection of the nomination paper of a candidate was improper; or

(b) the nomination of the returned candidate was invalid; or

(c) on the nomination day the returned candidate was not qualified for or was disqualified from, being elected for the constituency; or

(d) the failure of any person to comply with the provisions of the Constitution or this Act or the rules thereunder has materially affected the result of the election; or

(e) the result of the election has been materially affected by the improper acceptance or rejection of any nomination; or

(f) the improper reception or refusal of any vote, or the reception of any vote which should not have been received, has materially affected the results of the election; or

(g) the election of the returned candidate has been procured or induced by any corrupt or illegal practice; or

(h) a corrupt or illegal practice has been committed by the returned candidate or his agent or by any other person with the connivance of the candidate or his agent; or

(i) corrupt or illegal practices or illegal payments, employments or hirings have so extensively prevailed at the election that they may be reasonably supposed to have affected the result:

Provided that if the Tribunal is satisfied that a corrupt practice has been committed by an agent of the candidate other than his election agent, the Tribunal may decide that the election of the returned candidate was not void if it is also satisfied that—

(i) no such corrupt or illegal practice was committed at the election by the candidate or his election agent, and that such corrupt practice was committed contrary to the order, and without the sanction or connivance of the candidate or his election agent;

(ii) clause (c) of this section did not apply; and

(iii) the candidate and his election agent took all reasonable precautions to prevent corrupt or illegal practices at the election.

76. Votes to be struck off for corrupt or illegal practices.—Where in an election petition a seat is claimed for any candidate—

(a) if it is proved that the candidate or any agent on his behalf has been guilty of bribery or undue influence in respect of any person who voted at the election there shall be struck off one vote for every person who voted at the election and is proved to have been so bribed or unduly influenced.

(b) if any person guilty of a corrupt or illegal practice or of illegal payment, employment or hiring, voted at the election his vote shall be void; and

(c) if any person disqualified from voting voted at the election his vote shall be void.

77. Declaration that some other candidate was elected.—If in an election petition it is claimed that a contesting candidate other than the returned candidate should have been declared elected, the Tribunal shall if satisfied that such other contesting candidate obtained the majority of the valid votes cast, declare him duly elected and the election of the returned candidate void.

78. Equality of votes on a scrutiny.—(1) If during the trial of an election petition it appears that there is an equality of votes between any contesting candidates then—

(a) any decision made by the Returning Officer under the provisions of this Act shall, in so far as it determines the question between those candidates, apply also for the purposes of the petition; and

(b) in any other case the Tribunal shall decide between them by lot drawn in the presence of the candidates and proceed as if candidate on whom the lot falls had received an additional vote.

(2) Before proceeding to decide by lot under clause (b) of sub-section (1) the Tribunal shall give notice to the contesting candidates between whom there is an equality of votes, and shall proceed to decide by lot on the day and at the time and place stated in the notice:

Provided that if the contesting candidates concerned are present when it appears that there is an equality of votes between them the Tribunal may proceed forthwith to decide by lot without giving notice as aforesaid.

79. Other provisions relating to order of a Tribunal.—(1) Every order of a Tribunal under section 74 or section 77 shall take effect as soon as it is made.

(2) An order of the Tribunal under section 77 shall be communicated to the Election Commission which shall publish it in the official Gazette.

(3) The records of the Tribunal shall be deemed to be records of the Court of the District Judge appointed to be the Tribunal.

80. Order as to costs.—(1) Costs shall be in the discretion of the Tribunal.

(2) If in any order as to costs under the provisions of this Part there is a direction for the payment of costs by any party to any person such costs shall, if they have not already been paid, be payable in full, and shall upon application in writing in that behalf made within six months of the order by the person to whom costs have been awarded be paid as far as possible out of the security for costs deposited by such party under section 62.

(3) Where no costs have been awarded against a party who has deposited security for costs, or where no application for payment of costs have been made within the aforesaid six months, or where a residue remains after costs have been paid out of the security, such security or the residue thereof as the case may be shall upon application in writing therefor by the person who made the deposit or by his legal representative be returned by the Election Commission to the person making the deposit.

(4) Any order for costs may be enforced by an application to the Court of the District Judge appointed to be the Tribunal as if it was a decree passed by that Court:

Provided that no proceedings shall be brought under this sub-section except in respect of costs which cannot be recovered by an application under sub-section (2).

81. Appeal.—(1) Save as expressly provided in this section no appeal shall lie from any order made by a Tribunal.

(2) An appeal shall lie to the High Court from an order passed by a Tribunal under section 74 and an order granting leave under section 82.

82. Withdrawal of petition.—(1) An election petition may be withdrawn—

(a) before a Tribunal has been appointed, by leave of the Election Commission; and

(b) after a Tribunal has been appointed, by leave of the Tribunal.

(2) Where an application for leave to withdraw a petition is made notice thereof shall be served on the other parties to the petition and shall be published in the official Gazette.

(3) No application for leave to withdraw a petition shall be granted unless the Commission or the Tribunal, as the case may be, is satisfied that no agreement or bargain has been made or that the terms of the agreement or bargain are such that the application may be allowed.

(4) If the application is granted—

(a) the petitioner shall, if the application has been made to the Tribunal, be ordered to pay the costs of the respondents thereto, or such portion thereof as the Tribunal may allow;

(b) within fourteen days after such publication any person who might himself have been a petitioner may apply to the Commission or the Tribunal, as the case may be, for leave to be substituted as petitioner and, if he complies with the provisions of section 62 as to security for costs, he may be so substituted and may continue the proceedings on such terms as the Commission or the Tribunal may decide.

(5) Where leave to withdraw a petition is granted by the Tribunal and no person has been substituted as petitioner under subsection (4), the Tribunal shall report such withdrawal to the Election Commission and the Commission shall publish the report in the official Gazette.

83. Abatement on death of petitioner.—(1) An election petition shall abate on the death of a sole petitioner or of the survivor of several petitioners.

(2) Where a petition abates under sub-section (1) after a Tribunal has been appointed, notice of the abatement shall be given by the Tribunal to the Election Commission.

(3) Where a petition abates before a Tribunal has been appointed, or where notice is given under sub-section (2), the Election Commission shall give notice of the abatement in the official Gazette, and within the fourteen days next following such publication any person who might himself have been a petitioner may apply to the Commission or the Tribunal, as the case may be, for leave to be substituted as petitioner and, if he complies with the provisions of section 62 as to security for costs, he may be so substituted and may continue the proceedings on such terms as the Commission or the Tribunal may decide.

84. Death or withdrawal of respondent.—If before the conclusion of the trial of an election petition a respondent does or gives notice in the prescribed form that he does not intend to contest the petition, and no respondent remains to contest the petition, the Tribunal shall cause notice thereof to be published in the official Gazette, and any person who might himself have been a petitioner may, within the fourteen days next following the publication, apply to be substituted as a respondent to oppose the petition and shall be entitled to continue the proceedings upon such terms as the Tribunal may think fit.

85. Failure of petitioner to appear.—(1) Where at any stage in the trial of a petition no petitioner appears the Tribunal may, on the application of any person who might himself have been a petitioner, order that that person may be substituted for the original petitioner or petitioners on such terms as it may think proper.

(2) If no application for substitution is made under sub-section (1) the petition shall be dismissed for default, but the Tribunal may make such order as to costs as it thinks proper.

PART IV—ELECTION EXPENSES

86. Payment of election expenses.—(1) Except as provided by sections 87 and 89 no payment and no advance or deposit shall be made by a candidate, or by an agent or any other person on his behalf, at any time in respect of election expenses otherwise than by or through the election agent, and every payment made by an election agent in respect of election expenses shall, except where the amount is less than twenty-five rupees, be vouchered for by a bill stating the particulars and by a receipt.

(2) All money provided by any person other than the candidate for election expenses, whether as gift, loan, advance or deposit, shall be paid to the candidate or his election agent and not otherwise.

87. Personal expenses of candidates and petty expenses.—(1) The candidate may pay any personal expenses incurred by him on account of or in connection with or incidental to the election, but the amount shall not exceed seven hundred and fifty rupees in all and any further personal expenses so incurred by him shall be paid by his election agent.

(2) Any person may, if so authorised in writing by the election agent, pay any necessary expenses for stationery, postage, telegrams and other petty expenses, to a total amount not exceeding that named in the authority, but any excess above the amount so named shall be paid by the election agent.

(3) A written statement of the amount spent by the candidate under sub-section (1) and of the particulars of payment made under sub-section (2) shall be sent to the election agent within fourteen days of the day on which the result of the election is declared and payments under sub-section (2) shall be vouchered for by a bill containing the receipt of the person making such payments.

88. Prohibition of unauthorised expenses.—(1) No expenses shall, with a view to promoting or procuring the election of a candidate, be incurred by any person other than the candidate, his election agent and persons authorised in writing by the election agent, or by the political organisation to which the candidate belongs, on account of—

(a) holding public meetings or organising any public display; or

(b) issuing advertisements, banners, circulars or publications; or

(c) otherwise presenting to the electors the candidate or his views or his symbol or the extent or nature of the support he enjoys or disparaging another candidate:

Provided that clause (c) of this sub-section shall not—

(i) restrict the publication of any matter relating to election in a newspaper or other periodical; or

(ii) apply to any expenses not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of ten rupees which may be incurred by any person and are not incurred in pursuance of a plan suggested by or connected with other persons, or the expenses incurred by any person in travelling or in living away from home or similar personal expenses.

(2) If any person incurs, or aids, abets, counsels or procures any other person to incur, any expenses in contravention of this section he shall be guilty of a corrupt practice:

Provided that—

(a) the court before whom a person is convicted under this sub-section may, if it thinks fit in the special circumstances of the case, mitigate or entirely remit any incapacity imposed by section 117, and

(b) a candidate shall not be liable, nor shall his election be avoided, for a corrupt practice under this sub-section committed by an agent without his consent or connivance.

89. Limitation of election expenses.—(1) No sum shall be paid and no expenses shall be incurred by a candidate or his election agent, whether before, during or after an election, on account of or in respect of the conduct or arrangement of the election, in excess of four annas for each entry in the register of electors to be used at the election and a candidate or election agent knowingly acting in contravention of this sub-section shall be guilty of an illegal practice.

(2) The sum specified in subsection (1) shall not be required to cover the candidate's personal expenses under section 87.

90. Return of election expenses.—(1) Within the thirty-five days next following the day on which the result of the election is published in the official Gazette in pursuance of sub-section (2) of section 50, the election agent of every contesting candidate who has not withdrawn and of every candidate who has retired under section 17 before the election shall transmit to the Returning Officer a true return in the prescribed form, or to the like effect, containing as respects that candidate a statement of all payments made by the election agent together with all the bills and receipts.

(2) The return shall also contain as respects that candidate—

- (a) a statement of the amount of personal expenses, if any, paid by the candidate;
- (b) a statement of all disputed claims of which the election agent is aware;
- (c) a statement of all the unpaid claims, if any, of which the election agent is aware;

(d) a statement of all money, securities and equivalent of money received by the election agent from the candidate or any other person for the purposes of election expenses incurred or to be incurred, with a statement of the name of every person from whom they have been received:

Provided that where the candidate is his own election agent a statement of all money, securities and equivalent of money paid by the candidate shall be substituted for the statement of all money, securities and equivalent of money received by the election agent from the candidate.

(3) The return transmitted under sub-section (1) shall be accompanied if the candidate is his own election agent by an affidavit sworn by him in the prescribed form, and if he employs an election agent by such affidavits sworn by the candidate and the election agent severally.

(4) Any election agent, who fails to transmit a return in the form and within the time required under the foregoing sub-sections shall be given notice permitting him under a penalty of two hundred and fifty rupees to transmit the return within such further time as may be stated in the notice, and in default he shall be deemed to have failed to comply with the requirements of this section.

(5) Subject to the provisions of section 91, if a candidate or election agent fails to comply with the requirements of this section he shall be guilty of an illegal practice.

(6) Nothing in this section applies to a candidate who has withdrawn in pursuance of section 16.

91. Authorised excuses.—The Election Commission may, on application made to it, remove any disqualification incurred in respect of the provisions of section 90 if for reason to be recorded by it in writing it is satisfied that failure to lodge the return within the time prescribed therefor or any error or false statement in any such return arose from circumstances beyond the applicant's control.

92. Inspection of returns and affidavits.—Returns, affidavits and any accompanying documents sent to the Returning Officer under section 90 shall be kept at the Office of the Returning Officer or some convenient place appointed by him and shall at all reasonable times during the twelve months next following the day they are received by him be open to inspection by any person on payment of such fee as may be prescribed, and the Returning Officer shall on demand furnish copies thereof or of any part thereof at such fee as may be prescribed.

PART V—OFFENCES, PENALTY AND PROCEDURE

93. Prohibition of public meetings on polling day.—(1) No person shall convene, hold or attend any public meeting within any constituency on the polling day in that constituency.

(2) Any person who contravenes the provisions of this section shall be punishable with fine not exceeding two hundred and fifty rupees.

94. Disturbance of election meetings.—Any person who at a public meeting to which this section applies acts, or incites others to act, in a disorderly manner for the purpose of preventing the transaction of the business for which the meeting has been called together, shall be punishable with fine not exceeding two hundred and fifty rupees.

(2) This section applies to any public meeting of a political character held in any constituency between the date of issue of a notification under this Act calling upon the constituency to elect a member or members and the polling day.

(3) If any police officer has reason to suspect any person of committing an offence under this section he may, if requested so to do by the chairman of the meeting require that person to declare to him immediately his name and address, and if the police officer has reason to believe that the name or address declared is false, the police officer may arrest him without warrant.

95. Prohibition of canvassing in or near polling station.—(1) Any person who, on any day on which a poll is taken at a polling station, does any of the following acts within a radius of 400 yards of the polling station, that is to say—

- (a) canvasses for votes; or
- (b) solicits the vote of any elector; or
- (c) persuades any elector not to vote at the election or not to vote for a particular candidate; or
- (d) exhibits any notice, sign, banner or flag designed to encourage electors to vote for or discourage electors from voting for, any contesting candidate; shall be guilty of an offence, which shall be cognizable and punishable with fine not exceeding two hundred and fifty rupees.

(2) Nothing in clause (d) of sub-section (1) shall prevent the display of any such notice, sign, banner and flag at a place reserved for a candidate and his agents with the permission of the Returning Officer, such place not being within one hundred yards of the polling station.

(3) If a police officer has reason to believe that an offence is being committed under clause (d) of sub-section (1) he may remove the notice, sign, banner or flag.

96. Disorderly conduct near polling station.—(1) If while polling is in progress at a polling station any person does any act which disturbs or cause annoyance to any elector visiting the polling station for the purpose of casting a vote or interferes with the performance of the duty of a presiding officer, polling officer or polling agent, the person so acting shall be guilty of an offence under this section.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of sub-section (1) a person shall be guilty of an offence under this section if he—

(a) uses in such manner as to be audible within the polling station any gramophone, megaphone, loud-speaker or other apparatus for reproducing or amplifying sounds; or

(b) persistently shouts in such manner as to be audible within the polling station, or shouts with the intention of being audible within that station.

(3) Any person who abets an offence under this section shall be guilty of an offence under this section.

(4) An offence under this section shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or with fine or with both.

(5) If the presiding officer has reason to believe that any person is committing or has committed an offence under this section he may direct a police officer to arrest such person, and thereupon the police officer shall arrest him without warrant.

(6) Any police officer may take such steps, and use such force, as may be reasonably necessary for preventing the commission of an offence under this section and may seize any apparatus to which sub-section (2) applies.

97. False statements as to candidates.—(1) Any person who before or during an election makes or publishes any false statement of fact concerning the personal character of a candidate or, in such a way as to affect the candidate, concerning the personal character of a relation of the candidate, for the purpose of affecting or procuring the return of any candidate at the election shall be guilty of a corrupt practice, unless he can show that he had reasonable grounds for believing, and did believe, the statement to be true:

Provided that a candidate shall not be liable nor shall his election be avoided for any corrupt practice under this sub-section committed by his agent other than his election agent unless—

(a) he or his election agent has authorised or consented to the committing of the corrupt practice by the other agent or has paid for the circulation of the false statement constituting the practice; or

(b) an Election Tribunal finds that the election of the candidate was procured or materially affected in consequence of the making or publishing of such false statement.

(2) Any person who, before or during an election, knowingly publishes a false statement relating to the symbol of any candidate, whether that symbol has been allocated to the candidate or not, shall be guilty of a corrupt practice.

(3) Any person who, before or during an election, knowingly publishes a false statement of the withdrawal of a candidate at the election for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of another candidate shall be guilty of a corrupt practice.

(4) A candidate shall not be liable, nor shall his election be avoided, for a corrupt practice under subsection (2) or subsection (3) committed by his agent other than an election agent, unless the corrupt practice was committed with the knowledge and consent of the candidate or his election agent.

(5) Where an offence under this section is committed by a body or association corporate every office-holder and officer thereof shall, unless he proves the offence was committed without his knowledge, be deemed to have committed the offence.

98. Appeal to communal prejudices.—Any person who calls upon or attempts to persuade any person to vote, or to refrain from voting, for any candidate merely on the ground that the candidate belongs to a particular caste, race, tribe, sect, community or religion, shall be guilty of a corrupt practice:

Provided that a candidate shall not be liable in respect of, nor shall his election be void for, the corrupt practice under this section committed by his agent other than his election agent.

99. Use of vehicles and vessels.—(1) No person in order to support or oppose any candidate at an election shall let, lend or employ, or hire, borrow or use any vehicle or vessel for the purpose of conveying electors to or from the poll, and a person knowingly acting in contravention of this sub-section shall be guilty of a corrupt practice:

Provided that no candidate shall be liable, nor shall his election be avoided, for a corrupt practice under this sub-section committed without his consent or connivance by an agent other than his election agent.

(2) Nothing in this section shall—

(a) prevent any person from employing a vehicle or vessel for the purpose of conveying to or from the poll himself or any members of the household to which he belongs, or from borrowing a vehicle or vessel from a member of that household to be employed for that purpose; or

(b) prevent an elector, or several electors together, from hiring or using a vehicle or vessel for the purpose of conveying himself, or themselves, to or from the poll.

100. Bribery.—(1) A person shall be guilty of a corrupt practice if he is guilty of bribery.

(2) A person shall be guilty of bribery if he directly or indirectly by himself or by any other person on his behalf gives, offers, or promises any gratification to any person for purposes of inducing—

(a) a person to stand or not to stand as, or to withdraw or retire from being, a candidate at an election; or

(b) an elector to vote or to refrain from voting at an election, or for the purpose of rewarding—

(i) a person for having stood or not stood, or for having withdrawn or retired from being, a candidate at an election; or

(ii) an elector for having voted or refrained from voting at an election.

(3) A person shall be guilty of bribery if before or during an election he directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person receives, agrees, or contracts for any gratification for standing or not standing, or withdrawing or retiring from being a candidate at an election or for voting or refraining from voting at the election.

(4) For the purposes of this section "gratification" includes a gratification in money or estimable in money and all forms of entertainment and all forms of employment for reward, but does not include the payment of any election expenses incurred bona fide and duly entered in the return of election expenses.

101. Undue influence.—(1) A person shall be guilty of a corrupt practice if he is guilty of undue influence—

(2) A person shall be guilty of undue influence—

(a) if he directly or indirectly by himself or by any other person on his behalf makes use of or threatens to make use of any force, violence or restraint, or inflicts or threatens to inflict by himself or by any other person any injury, damage, harm or loss upon or against any person or to call down divine displeasure or the displeasure of any saint or Pir upon or to give a religious sentence against or in respect of any person or uses official influence or governmental patronage in order to induce or compel that person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of that person having voted or refrained from voting, or to induce him not to offer himself as a candidate for election or to withdraw his candidature; or

(b) if, by abduction, duress or any fraudulent device or contrivance, he impedes or prevents the free exercise of the franchise by an elector, or thereby compels, induces or prevails upon an elector either to vote or to refrain from voting.

(3) For the purposes of this section "harm" includes social ostracism or excommunication or expulsion from any caste or community.

102. Personation.—(1) A person shall be guilty of a corrupt practice if he commits, abets, counsels or procures the commission of the offence of personation.

(2) A person shall be guilty of personation at an election if he votes as some other person whether that other person is living or dead or is a fictitious person.

(3) For the purposes of this section, a person who has applied for a ballot paper for the purpose of voting shall be deemed to have voted.

(4) If the presiding officer has reason to believe that any person is committing or has committed an offence under this section, he may direct a police officer to arrest such person, and thereupon the police officer shall arrest him without warrant.

103. Causing waiting elector to depart.—A person shall be guilty of a corrupt practice if he causes or attempts to cause any person present and waiting to vote within the meaning of section 43 to depart without having voted.

104. Other voting offences.—(1) A person shall be guilty of an offence if he—

(a) votes knowing that he is disqualified from voting; or

(b) votes more than once in the same constituency; or

(c) votes in more than one constituency at a general election; or

(d) removes a ballot paper from a polling station during the poll; or

(e) knowingly induces or procures some other person to do an act which is, or but for that other person's want of knowledge would be, an offence under this sub-section.

(2) For the purposes of this section a person who has applied for a ballot paper for the purpose of voting shall be deemed to have voted.

(3) An offence under this section shall be an illegal practice:

Provided that—

(a) the Court before which a person is convicted of any such offence may, if it thinks it just in the special circumstances of the case, mitigate or entirely remit any disqualification imposed by section 117, and

(b) a candidate shall not be liable, nor shall his election be avoided for an illegal practice under this section by any agent of his, unless the offence was committed with his knowledge or at his instigation.

105. Breach of official duty in connection with elections.—(1) If any Registration Officer, Returning Officer, presiding officer or any other person employed by such an officer in connection with his official duties, and any person employed in the postal or telegraphic services is, without reasonable cause, guilty of any act or omission in breach of his official duty, he shall be guilty of an offence punishable with fine not exceeding five hundred rupees.

(2) The expression "official duty" shall for the purpose of this section be construed accordingly, but shall not include duties imposed otherwise than by or under this Act.

106. Tampering with papers.—(1) A person shall be guilty of an offence if at an election under this Act he—

(a) fraudulently defaces or fraudulently destroys any nomination paper, or

(b) fraudulently defaces or fraudulently destroys any ballot paper, or the official mark on a ballot paper; or

(c) without due authority applies any ballot paper; or

(d) forges any ballot paper or official mark; or

(e) fraudulently puts into any ballot box any ballot paper other than the ballot paper which he is authorised by law to put in; or

(f) fraudulently takes out of the polling station any ballot paper; or

(g) without due authority destroys, takes, opens or otherwise interferes with any ballot box or packet of ballot paper in use for the purpose of the election; or

(h) without due authority breaks any seal affixed in accordance with this Act; or

(i) fraudulently or without due authority, as the case may be, attempts to do any of the foregoing acts.

(2) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall—

(a) if he is a Returning Officer, or presiding officer or any other officer or clerk on official duty in connection with the election be punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or with fine or with both; or

(b) if he is any other person, with imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or with fine, or with both.

(3) Any offence punishable under clause (b) of sub-section (1) shall be cognizable.

- 107. Requirement of secrecy.—(1) The following persons, that is to say—
 (a) every Returning Officer, presiding officer or polling officer: and
 (b) every candidate and election agent or polling agent attending at a polling station; shall maintain and aid in maintaining the secrecy of voting and shall not, except for some purpose authorised by law communicate to any person before the poll is closed any information as to—
 (i) the name or number on the electoral roll of any elector who has or has not applied for a ballot paper or voted at a polling station; or
 (ii) the official mark.
 (2) Every person attending at the counting of votes shall maintain and aid in maintaining the secrecy of voting and shall not—
 (a) ascertain or attempt to ascertain at the counting of the votes the number on the back of any ballot paper; and
 (b) communicate any information obtained at the counting of the votes as to the candidate for whom any vote is given on any particular ballot paper.
 (3) No person whosoever shall—
 (a) interfere or attempt to interfere with an elector when recording his vote; or
 (b) otherwise obtain or attempt to obtain in a polling station information as to the candidate for whom an elector in that station is about to vote or has voted;
 (c) communicate at any time any information obtained in a polling station as to the candidate for whom an elector in that station is about to vote or has voted, or as to the number on the back of the ballot paper given to an elector at that station.
 (4) No person having undertaken to assist a blind elector to vote shall communicate at any time any information as to the candidate for whom that elector intends to vote or has voted or as to the number on the back of the ballot paper given for the use of that elector.
 (5) If any person acts in contravention of this section he shall be guilty of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or with fine or with both.
- 108. Officials at election not to act for candidates.—(1) No person who is a Returning Officer, or an Assistant Returning Officer, or presiding or polling officer at a polling station, or any officer or clerk appointed by the Returning Officer or the presiding officer to perform any duty in connection with an election shall in the conduct or the management of the election do any act other than that of voting to further or to hinder the election of a candidate.
 (2) No such person as aforesaid, and no member of a police force, shall endeavour—
 (a) to persuade any person to give his vote at the election; or
 (b) to dissuade any person from giving his vote at the election; or
 (c) to influence the voting of any person at the election in any manner.
 (3) The provisions of subsections (2) and (4) shall apply to the members of any organised body of persons who are on duty in connection with the election under the authority of any law or with the permission of the presiding officer.
 (4) Any person who contravenes the provisions of this section shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or with fine or with both.
- 109. Obtaining assistance of Government officer prohibited.—(1) No candidate or election agent, and no other person with the connivance of a candidate or his election agent, shall obtain or procure or abet or attempt to obtain or procure, any assistance prohibited by section 110.
 (2) Any contravention of this section shall be an illegal practice.
- 110. Assistance by Government officer prohibited.—(1) No person in the service of Pakistan shall give any assistance to further or to hinder the election of a candidate except by giving his own vote, and shall not close for whom he has voted.
 (2) If any person acts in contravention of this section he shall be guilty of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or with fine or with both.
- 111. Prosecution for corrupt or illegal practices.—(1) Any person who commits a corrupt practice shall be guilty of an offence, which shall be cognizable and punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or a fine or both.
 (2) Any person who commits an illegal practice shall be guilty of an offence punishable with a fine not exceeding five hundred rupees.

- (3) A prosecution under this section shall be commenced within six months of the commission of the offence or, if the election was made the subject of an election petition and an order has been made by an election Tribunal in respect thereof, within three months of the date of such order.
 (4) Where an offence under this section is alleged to have been committed by a citizen of Pakistan outside Pakistan, proceedings may be taken before the appropriate court in Pakistan having jurisdiction in the place where the person to be charged may be found, and the period of six months referred to in sub-section (3) shall run from the date on which the person charged first arrived in Pakistan next after the commission of the offence.
- 112. Prosecution for offences by public officers.—(1) If the Election Commission has reason to believe that any offence punishable under sections 105 to 110 has been committed, it shall be the duty of the Commission to cause such enquiries to be made and such prosecutions to be instituted as the circumstances of the case appear to it to require.
 (2) No court shall take cognizance of any such offence if it is alleged to have been committed by any person in respect of his official duty, unless there is a complaint made by order of, or under authority from, the Election Commission.
 (3) For the purposes of subsection (2), "court" does not include an Election Tribunal.
- 113. Procedure.—Save as otherwise provided in this Act, the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (Act V of 1898), shall as far as applicable and with necessary modifications, apply to the trial of offences punishable under this Act.
- 114. This Part not to apply to certain matters.—Nothing in this Part applies to a declaration of future administrative or political intentions or policy, or to a promise of administrative or political action or to the exercise of a legal right without intent to interfere with an electoral right.
- PART VI—DISQUALIFICATIONS
- 115. Provisions in addition to and not in derogation of other laws.—The provisions of this Part shall be in addition to and not in derogation of the provisions of paragraph 4 in Part II of the Fourth Schedule to the Constitution.
- 116. Government contractors, etc.—(1) Subject to the other provisions of this section, a person shall be disqualified for being elected or being a member of the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly, if, whether by himself or by any person or body or persons in trust for him or for his benefit or on his account, he has any share or interest in a contract for the supply of goods to, or for the execution of any works or the performance of any services undertaken by, the Government.
 (2) A disqualification under subsection (1) shall not, where the share or interest in the contract devolves on a person by inheritance or succession or as a legatee, executor or administrator, take effect until the expiration of six months after it has so devolved on him or of such longer period as the Election Commission may in any particular case allow.
 (3) A person shall not be disqualified under sub-section (1) by reason of his having a share or interest in a contract entered into between the Government and a public company, as defined in section 2 of the Companies Act, 1913 (VII of 1913), of which he is a shareholder but is neither a director holding an office of profit under the company nor a managing agent.
 (4) Nothing in sub-section (1) shall extend to a contract entered into between a co-operative society and the Government.
 (5) For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that where any such contract as is referred to in sub-section (1) has been entered into by or on behalf of a Hindu undivided family and the Government, every member of that family shall become subject to the disqualification mentioned therein, but where the contract has been entered into by a member of a Hindu undivided family carrying on a separate business in course of such business, any other member of the said family having no share or interest in that business shall not become subject to such disqualification.
- 117. Disqualification from membership.—(1) Where an order has been made by a Tribunal under section 74 recording a finding whether any corrupt or illegal practice has been committed, by, or with the connivance of, any candidate or his agent at the election, the candidate and, if the corrupt or illegal practice was committed by the election agent, the election agent also, shall be disqualified for being or being elected as a member of the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly for a period of six years from the date of the order.
 (2) Where such an order has been made recording a finding that a corrupt or illegal practice has been committed by a person other than a candidate or his election agent such person shall be disqualified for being or being elected as a member of the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly for a period of six years from the date of the order.

(3) Where a person has been convicted of an offence under this Act which is not a corrupt practice the Court shall inform the Election Commission of the conviction, and the Commission may disqualify him for being or being elected as a member of the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly for a period not exceeding four years.

118. Disqualification from voting.—(1) Where a person is disqualified for being elected as a member of the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (1) or sub-section (2) of section 117 he shall also be disqualified for being registered as an elector and for voting at an election for the National or a Provincial Assembly for the same period.

(2) Where a person has been convicted of an offence under this Act which is not a corrupt practice the Court shall inform the Election Commission of the conviction, and the Commission may disqualify him for being registered as an elector or for voting at an election for the National or a Provincial Assembly for a period not exceeding four years.

119. Disqualification for being election agent.—Any person who is for any period disqualified under section 117 for being or being elected as a member of the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly shall also stand disqualified for that period for being appointed an election agent.

PART VII—MISCELLANEOUS

120. Extension of time for an election.—Notwithstanding anything in this Act, but subject always to the provisions of section 8, it shall be lawful for the Election Commission to extend the time for the nomination of candidates or the holding of a poll.

121. Bye-elections.—(1) When the seat of a member elected to the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly becomes vacant or is declared vacant, or his election is declared void, the Election Commission shall, by notification in the official Gazette, call upon the constituency concerned to elect a person for the purpose of filling the vacancy so caused before such date as may be specified in the notification, and the provisions of this Act and of the rules and orders made thereunder shall apply, as far as may be, in relation to the election of a member to fill such vacancy.

(2) Whenever a vacancy as is referred to in sub-section (1) occurs, the Speaker of the Assembly concerned shall forthwith intimate the fact to the Election Commission.

122. Power to make rules.—The Central Government, after consultation with the Election Commission, may make such rules, not inconsistent with this Act, as it may consider necessary for carrying out the purposes of this Act.

CONSTITUTION OF INDIA

PART III

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

General

12. In this Part, unless the context otherwise requires, “the State” includes the Government and Parliament of India and the Government and the Legislature of each of the States and all local or other authorities within the territory of India or under the control of the Government of India.

13. (1) All laws in force in the territory of India immediately before the commencement of this Constitution, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Part, shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void.

(2) The State shall not make any law which takes away or abridges the rights conferred by this Part and any law made in contravention of this clause shall, to the extent of the contravention be void.

(3) In this article, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) “law” includes any Ordinance, order, bye-law, rule, regulation, notification, custom or usage having in the territory of India the force of law;

(b) “laws in force” includes laws passed or made by a Legislature or other competent authority in the territory of India before the commencement of this Constitution and not previously repealed, notwithstanding that any such law or any part thereof may not be then in operation either at all or in particular areas.

Right to Equality

14. The State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India.

15. (1) The State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them.

(2) No citizen shall, on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them, be subject to any disability, liability, restriction or condition with regard to—

(a) access to shops, public restaurants, hotels and places of public entertainment; or

(b) the use of wells, tanks, bathing ghats, roads and places of public resort maintained wholly or partly out of State funds or dedicated to the use of the general public.

(3) Nothing in this article shall prevent the State from making any special provision for women and children.

[(4) Nothing in this article or in clause (2) of article 29 shall prevent the State from making any special provisions for the advancement of any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens or for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes.]

16. (1) There shall be equality of opportunity for all citizens in matters relating to employment or appointment to any office under the State.

(2) No citizen shall, on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, descent, place of birth, residence or any of them, be ineligible for, or discriminated against in respect of any employment or office under the State.

(3) Nothing in this article shall prevent Parliament from making any law prescribing, in regard to a class or classes of employment or appointment to an office under the Government of, or any local or other authority within, a State or Union territory, any requirement as to residence within that State or Union territory prior to such employment or appointment.

(4) Nothing in this article shall prevent the State from making any provision for the reservation of appointments or posts in favour of any backward class of citizens which in the opinion of the State, is not adequately represented in the services under the State.

(5) Nothing in this article shall affect the operation of any law which provides that the incumbent of an office in connection with the affairs of any religious or denominational institution or any member of the governing body thereof shall be a person professing a particular religion or belonging to a particular denomination.

17. “Untouchability” is abolished and its practice in any form is forbidden. The enforcement of any disability arising out of “Untouchability” shall be an offence punishable in accordance with law.

18. (1) No title, not being a military or academic distinction, shall be conferred by the State.

(2) No citizen of India shall accept any title from any foreign State.

- (ii) the carrying on by the State or by a corporation owned or controlled by the State, of any trade, business, industry or service, whether to the exclusion, complete or partial, of citizens or otherwise.]

Protection in respect of conviction for offences.

20. (1) No person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of a law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence.

(2) No person shall be prosecuted and punished for the same offence more than once.

(3) No person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself.

21. No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law.

22. (1) No person who is arrested shall be detained in custody without being informed, as soon as may be, of the grounds for such arrest nor shall he be denied the right to consult, and to be defended by, a legal practitioner of his choice.

(2) Every person who is arrested and detained in custody shall be produced before the nearest magistrate within a period of twenty-four hours of such arrest excluding the time necessary for the journey from the place of arrest to the court of the magistrate and no such person shall be detained in custody beyond the said period without the authority of a magistrate.

Constitution of India (Fundamental Rights)

(3) Nothing in clauses (1) and (2) shall apply—

- (a) to any person who for the time being is an enemy alien; or
- (b) to any person who is arrested or detained under any law providing for preventive detention.

(4) No law providing for preventive detention shall authorise the detention of a person for a longer period than three months unless—

(a) an Advisory Board consisting of persons who are, or have been, or are qualified to be appointed as, Judges of a High Court has reported before the expiration of the said period of three months that there is in its opinion sufficient cause for such detention:

Provided that nothing in this sub-clause shall authorise the detention of any person beyond the maximum period prescribed by any law made by Parliament under sub-clause (b) of clause (7); or

- (b) such person is detained in accordance with the provisions of any law made by Parliament under sub-clauses (a) and (b) of clause (7).

(5) When any person is detained in pursuance of an order made under any law providing for preventive detention, the authority making the order shall, as soon as may be, communicate to such person the grounds on which the order has been made and shall afford him the earliest opportunity of making a representation against the order.

(6) Nothing in clause (5) shall require the authority making any such order as is referred to in that clause to disclose facts which such authority considers to be against the public interest to disclose.

(7) Parliament may by law prescribe—

(a) the circumstances under which, and the class or classes of cases in which, a person may be detained for a period longer than three months under any law providing for preventive detention without obtaining the opinion of an Advisory Board in accordance with the provisions of sub-clause (a) of clause (4);

(b) the maximum period for which any person may in any class or classes of cases be detained under any law providing for preventive detention; and

(c) the procedure to be followed by an Advisory Board in an inquiry under sub-clause (a) of clause (4).

Right against Exploitation

23. (1) Traffic in human beings and begar and other similar forms of forced labour are prohibited and any contravention of this provision shall be an offence punishable in accordance with law.

(2) Nothing in this article shall prevent the State from imposing compulsory service for public purposes, and in imposing such service the State shall not make any discrimination on grounds only of religion, race, caste or class or any of them.

24. No child below the age of fourteen years shall be employed to work in any factory or mine or engaged in any other hazardous employment.

Right to Freedom of Religion

25. (1) Subject to public order, morality and health and to the other provisions of this Part, all persons are equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate religion.

(2) Nothing in this article shall affect the operation of any existing law or prevent the State from making any law—

(a) regulating or restricting any economic, financial, political or other secular activity which may be associated with religious practice;

(b) providing for social welfare and reform or the throwing open of Hindu religious institutions of a public character to all classes and sections of Hindus.

Explanation I.—The wearing and carrying of kirpans shall be deemed to be included in the profession of the Sikh religion.

Explanation II.—In sub-clause (b) of clause (2), the reference to Hindus shall be construed as including a reference to persons professing the Sikh, Jaina or Buddhist religion, and the reference to Hindu religious institutions shall be construed accordingly.

26. Subject to public order, morality and health, every religious denomination or any section thereof shall have the right—

(a) to establish and maintain institutions for religious and charitable purposes;

(b) to manage its own affairs in matters of religion;

(c) to own and acquire movable and immovable property; and

(d) to administer such property in accordance with law.

Prohibition of traffic in human beings and forced labour.

Prohibition of employment of children in factories, etc.

Freedom of conscience and free profession, practice and propagation of religion.

Freedom to manage religious affairs.

Constitution of India (Fundamental Rights)

Freedom as to payment of taxes for promotion of any particular religion.

Freedom as to attendance at religious instruction or religious worship in certain educational institutions.

Protection of interests of minorities.

Right of minorities to establish and administer educational institutions.

Compulsory acquisition of property.

Saving of laws providing for acquisition of estates etc.

27. No person shall be compelled to pay any taxes, the proceeds of which are specifically appropriated in payment of expenses for the promotion or maintenance of any particular religion or religious denomination.

28. (1) No religious instruction shall be provided in any educational institution wholly maintained out of State funds.

(2) Nothing in clause (1) shall apply to an educational institution which is administered by the State but has been established under any endowment or trust which requires that religious instruction shall be imparted in such institution.

(3) No person attending any educational institution recognised by the State or receiving aid out of State funds shall be required to take part in any religious instruction that may be imparted in such institution or to attend any religious worship that may be conducted in such institution or in any premises attached thereto unless such person or, if such person is a minor, his guardian has given his consent thereto.

Cultural and Educational Rights

29. (1) Any section of the citizens residing in the territory of India or any part thereof having a distinct language, script or culture of its own shall have the right to conserve the same.

(2) No citizen shall be denied admission into any educational institution maintained by the State or receiving aid out of State funds on grounds only of religion, race, caste, language or any of them.

30. (1) All minorities, whether based on religion or language, shall have the right to establish and administer educational institutions of their choice.

(2) The State shall not, in granting aid to educational institutions, discriminate against any educational institution on the ground that it is under the management of a minority, whether based on religion or language.

Right to Property

31. (1) No person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law.

2[(2) No property shall be compulsorily acquired or requisitioned save for a public purpose and save by authority of a law which provides for compensation for the property so acquired or requisitioned and either fixes the amount of the compensation or specifies the principles on which, and the manner in which, the compensation is to be determined and given; and no such law shall be called in question in any court on the ground that the compensation provided by that law is not adequate.]

(2A) Where a law does not provide for the transfer of the ownership or right to possession of any property to the State or to a corporation owned or controlled by the State, it shall not be deemed to provide for the compulsory acquisition or requisitioning of property notwithstanding that it deprives any person of his property.]

(3) No such law as is referred to in clause (2) made by the Legislature of a State shall have effect unless such law, having been reserved for the consideration of the President, has received his assent.

(4) If any Bill pending at the commencement of this Constitution in the Legislature of a State has, after it has been passed by such Legislature, been reserved for the consideration of the President and has received his assent, then, notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, the law so assented to shall not be called in question in any court on the ground that it contravenes the provisions of clause (2).

(5) Nothing in clause (2) shall affect—

- (a) the provisions of any existing law other than a law to which the provisions of clause (6) apply, or
- (b) the provisions of any law which the State may hereafter make—
 - (i) for the purpose of imposing or levying any tax or penalty, or
 - (ii) for the promotion of public health or the prevention of danger to life or property, or
 - (iii) in pursuance of any agreement entered into between the Government of the Dominion of India or the Government of India and the Government of any other country, or otherwise, with respect to property declared by law to be evacuee property.

(6) Any law of the State enacted not more than eighteen months before the commencement of this Constitution may within three months from such commencement be submitted to the President for his certification; and thereupon, if the President by public notification so certifies, it shall not be called in question in any court on the ground that it contravenes the provisions of clause (2) of this article or has contravened the provisions of sub-section (2) of section 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935.

31A. 4[(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in article 13, no law providing for—

- (a) the acquisition by the State of any estate or of any rights therein or the extinguishment or modification of any such rights, or

Constitution of India (Fundamental Rights)

(b) the taking over of the management of any property by the State for a limited period either in the public interest or in order to secure the proper management of the property, or

(c) the amalgamation of two or more corporations either in the public interest or in order to secure the proper management of any of the corporations, or

(d) the extinguishment or modification of any rights of managing agents, secretaries and treasurers, managing directors, directors or managers of corporations, or of any voting rights of shareholders thereof, or

(e) the extinguishment or modification of any rights accruing by virtue of any agreement, lease or licence for the purpose of searching for, or winning, any mineral or mineral oil, or the premature termination or cancellation of any such agreement, lease or licence, shall be deemed to be void on the ground that it is inconsistent with, or takes away or abridges any of the rights conferred by article 14, article 19 or article 31:

Provided that where such law is a law made by the Legislature of a State, the provisions of this article shall not apply thereto unless such law, having been reserved for the consideration of the President, has received his assent.]

(2) In this article,—

(a) the expression "estate" shall, in relation to any local area, have the same meaning as that expression or its local equivalent has in the existing law relating to land tenures in force in that area, and shall also include any jagir, inam or muafi or other similar grant [and in the States of Madras and Kerala, any jamam right];

(b) the expression "rights", in relation to an estate, shall include any rights vesting in a proprietor, sub-proprietor, under-proprietor, tenure-holder [raiyat, under-raiyat or other intermediary and any rights or privileges in respect of land revenue].

31B. Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions contained in article 31A, none of the Acts and Regulations specified in the Ninth Schedule nor any of the provisions thereof shall be deemed to be void, or ever to have become void, on the ground that such Act, Regulation or provision is inconsistent with, or takes away or abridges any of the rights conferred by, any provisions of this Part, and notwithstanding any judgment, decree or order of any court or tribunal to the contrary, each of the said Acts and Regulations shall, subject to the power of any competent Legislature to repeal or amend it, continue in force].

Right to Constitutional Remedies

32. (1) The right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of the rights conferred by this Part is guaranteed.

(2) The Supreme Court shall have power to issue directions or orders or writs, including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warrantum and certiorari, whichever may be appropriate, for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by this Part.

(3) Without prejudice to the powers conferred on the Supreme Court by clauses (1) and (2), Parliament may by law empower any other court to exercise within the local limits of its jurisdiction all or any of the powers exercisable by the Supreme Court under clause (2).

(4) The right guaranteed by this article shall not be suspended except as otherwise provided for by this Constitution.

33. Parliament may by law determine to what extent any of the rights conferred by this Part shall, in their application to the members of the Armed Forces or the Forces charged with the maintenance of public order, be restricted or abrogated so as to ensure the proper discharge of their duties and the maintenance of discipline among them.

Validation of certain Acts and Regulations.

Remedies for enforcement of rights conferred by this Part.

Power to Parliament to modify the rights conferred by this Part in their application to forces.

Restrictions on rights conferred by this part where martial law is in force in any area.

34. Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this Part, Parliament may by law indemnify any person in the service of the Union or of a State or any other person in respect of any act done by him in connection with the maintenance or restoration of order in any area within the territory of India where martial law was in force or validate any sentence passed, punishment inflicted, forfeiture ordered or other act done under martial law in such area.

Legislation to give effect to the provisions of this Part.

35. Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution,—

- (a) Parliament shall have, and the Legislature of a State shall not have, power to make laws—
 - (i) with respect to any of the matters which under clause (3) of article 16, clause (3) of article 32, article 33 and article 34 may be provided for by law made by Parliament; and
 - (ii) for prescribing punishment for those acts which are declared to be offences under this Part; and Parliament shall, as soon as may be after the commencement of this Constitution, make laws for prescribing punishment for the acts referred to in sub-clause (ii);
- (b) any law in force immediately before the commencement of this Constitution in the territory of India with respect to any of the matters referred to in sub-clause (i) of clause (a) or providing for punishment for any act referred to in sub-clause (ii) of that clause shall, subject to the terms thereof and to any adaptations and modifications that may be made therein under article 372, continue in force until altered or repealed or amended by Parliament.

Explanation.—In this article, the expression “law in force” has the same meaning as in article 372.¹

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA¹

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I

SECTION 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

SECTION 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

SECTION 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

¹ The Constitution was submitted to the States for ratification on 28 September 1787. The ninth State ratified on 21 June 1788, and the Constitution went into effect on 4 March 1789.

Constitution of the United States of America

SECTION 4. The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

SECTION 5. Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

SECTION 6. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been encreased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

SECTION 7. All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approves he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by Yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law.

Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

SECTION 8. The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

To borrow Money on the credit of the United States;

To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes;

To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States;

To coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures;

To provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States;

To establish Post Offices and post Roads;

To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries;

Constitution of the United States of America

To constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court;

To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations;

To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water;

To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than two Years;

To provide and maintain a Navy;

To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces;

To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions;

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

To exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cession of Particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings;—And

To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

SECTION 9. The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed.

No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State.

No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another; nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay Duties in another.

No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time.

No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State.

SECTION 10. No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility.

No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II

SECTION 1. The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

Constitution of the United States of America

Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; a quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

No person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation:—"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

SECTION 2. The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

SECTION 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

SECTION 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

Constitution of the United States of America

ARTICLE III

SECTION 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

SECTION 2. The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States;—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

SECTION 3. Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

ARTICLE IV

SECTION 1. Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the Public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effects thereof.

SECTION 2. The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.

A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein; be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

SECTION 3. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislature of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

SECTION 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

ARTICLE V

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

Constitution of the United State of America

ARTICLE VI

All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII

The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same.

ARTICLES IN ADDITION TO, AND AMENDMENT OF, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PROPOSED BY CONGRESS, AND RATIFIED BY THE SEVERAL STATES, PURSUANT TO THE FIFTH ARTICLE OF THE ORIGINAL CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE [I]¹

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

ARTICLE [II]

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

ARTICLE [III]

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

ARTICLE [IV]

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE [V]

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

ARTICLE [VI]

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

¹ The first ten amendments were proposed by Congress on 25 September 1789, and ratified by sufficient States by 15 December 1791.

Constitution of the United States of America

ARTICLE [VII]

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

ARTICLE [VIII]

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

ARTICLE [IX]

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

ARTICLE [X]

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

ARTICLE [XI]²

The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

ARTICLE [XII]²

The Electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate;—The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.—The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

ARTICLE [XIII]³

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SECTION 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE [XIV]⁴

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SECTION 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SECTION 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SECTION 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SECTION 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

ARTICLE XV¹

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XVI²

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

ARTICLE XVII³

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

ARTICLE XVIII⁴

SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

SECTION 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

SECTION 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the states by the Congress.

ARTICLE [XIX]¹

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE [XX]²

SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SECTION 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or vice President shall have qualified.

SECTION 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

SECTION 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

SECTION 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

ARTICLE [XXI]³

SECTION 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

SECTION 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

ARTICLE [XXII]⁴

SECTION 1. No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this Article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this Article was proposed by the Congress and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this Article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

SECTION 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress.

Statement by His Majesty's Government

3rd June 1947

STATEMENT BY HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Introduction

1. On February 20th, 1947, His Majesty's Government announced their intention of transferring power in British India to Indian hands by June 1948. His Majesty's Government had hoped that it would be possible for the major parties to co-operate in the working-out of the Cabinet Mission's Plan of May 16th, 1946, and evolve for India a Constitution acceptable to all concerned. This hope has not been fulfilled.

2. The majority of the representatives of the Provinces of Madras, Bombay, the United Provinces, Bihar, Central Provinces and Berar, Assam, Orissa and the North-West Frontier Province, and the representatives of Delhi, Ajmer-Merwara and Coorg have already made progress in the task of evolving a new Constitution. On the other hand, the Muslim League Party, including in it a majority of the representatives of Bengal, the Punjab and Sind as also the representative of British Baluchistan, has decided not to participate in the Constituent Assembly.

3. It has always been the desire of His Majesty's Government that power should be transferred in accordance with the wishes of the Indian people themselves. This task would have been greatly facilitated if there had been agreement among the Indian political parties. In the absence of such agreement, the task of devising a method by which the wishes of the Indian people can be ascertained has devolved upon His Majesty's Government. After full consultation with political leaders in India, His Majesty's Government have decided to adopt for this purpose the plan set out below. His Majesty's Government wish to make it clear that they have no intention of attempting to frame any ultimate Constitution for India; this is a matter for the Indians themselves. Nor is there anything in this plan to preclude negotiations between communities for a united India.

The Issues to be decided

4. It is not the intention of His Majesty's Government to interrupt the work of the existing Constituent Assembly. Now that provision is made for certain Provinces specified below, His Majesty's Government trust that, as a consequence of this announcement, the Muslim League representatives of those Provinces, a majority of whose representatives are already participating in it, will now take their due share in its labours. At the same time, it is clear that any Constitution framed by this Assembly cannot apply to those parts of the country which are unwilling to accept it. His Majesty's Government are satisfied that the procedure outlined below embodies the best practical method of ascertaining the wishes of the people of such areas on the issue whether their Constitution is to be framed:—

- (a) in the existing Constituent Assembly; or
- (b) in a new and separate Constituent Assembly consisting of the representatives of those areas which decide not to participate in the existing Constituent Assembly.

When this has been done, it will be possible to determine the authority or authorities to whom power should be transferred.

Bengal and the Punjab

5. The Provincial Legislative Assemblies of Bengal and the Punjab (excluding the European members) will, therefore, each be asked to meet in two parts, one representing the Muslim majority districts and the other the rest of the Province. For the purpose of determining the population of districts, the 1941 census figures will be taken as authoritative. The Muslim majority districts in these two Provinces are set out in the Appendix to this Announcement.

6. The members of the two parts of each Legislative Assembly sitting separately will be empowered to vote whether or not the Province should be partitioned. If a simple majority of either part decides in favour of partition, division will take place and arrangements will be made accordingly.

7. Before the question as to the partition is decided, it is desirable that the representatives of each part should know in advance which Constituent Assembly the Province as a whole would join in the event of the two parts subsequently deciding to remain united. Therefore, if any member of either Legislative Assembly demands, there shall be held a meeting of all members of the Legislative Assembly (other than Europeans) at which a decision will be taken on the issue as to which Constituent Assembly the Province as a whole would join if it were decided by the two parts to remain united.

8. In the event of partition being decided upon, each part of the Legislative Assembly will, on behalf of the areas they represent, decide which of the alternatives in paragraph 4 above to adopt.

9. For the immediate purpose of deciding on the issue of partition, the members of the Legislative Assemblies of Bengal and the Punjab will sit in two parts according to Muslim majority districts (as laid down in the Appendix) and non-Muslim majority districts. This is only a preliminary step of a purely temporary nature as it is evident that for the purposes of a final partition of these Provinces a detailed investigation of boundary questions will be needed; and, as soon as a decision involving partition has been taken for either Province, a Boundary Commission will be set up by the Governor-General, the membership and terms of reference of which will be settled in consultation with those concerned. It will be instructed to demarcate the boundaries of the two parts of the Punjab on the basis of ascertaining the contiguous majority areas of Muslims and non-Muslims. It will also be instructed to take into account other factors. Similar instructions will be given to the Bengal Boundary Commission. Until the report of a Boundary Commission has been put into effect, the provisional boundaries indicated in the Appendix will be used.

Sind

10. The Legislative Assembly of Sind (excluding the European members) will at a special meeting also take its own decision on the alternatives in paragraph 4 above.

North-West Frontier Province

11. The position of the North-West Frontier Province is exceptional. Two of the three representatives of this Province are already participating in the existing Constituent Assembly. But it is clear, in view of its geographical situation, and other considerations, that if the whole or any part of the Punjab decides not to join the existing Constituent Assembly, it will be necessary to give the North-West Frontier Province an opportunity to reconsider its position. Accordingly, in such an event, a referendum will be made to the electors of the present Legislative Assembly in the North-West Frontier Province to choose which of the alternatives mentioned in paragraph 4 above they wish to adopt. The referendum will be held under the aegis of the Governor-General and in consultation with the Provincial Government.

British Baluchistan

12. British Baluchistan has elected a member, but he has not taken his seat in the existing Constituent Assembly. In view of its geographical situation, this Province will also be given an opportunity to reconsider its position and to choose which of the alternatives in paragraph 4 above to adopt. His Excellency the Governor-General is examining how this can most appropriately be done.

Assam

13. Though Assam is predominantly a non-Muslim Province, the district of Sylhet which is contiguous to Bengal is predominantly Muslim. There has been a demand that, in the event of the partition of Bengal, Sylhet should be amalgamated with the Muslim part of Bengal. Accordingly, if it is decided that Bengal should be partitioned, a referendum will be held in Sylhet district under the aegis of the Governor-General and in consultation with the Assam Provincial Government to decide whether the district of Sylhet should continue to form part of the Assam Province or should be amalgamated with the new Province of Eastern Bengal, if that Province agrees. If the referendum results in favour of amalgamation with Eastern Bengal, a Boundary Commission with terms of reference similar to those for the Punjab and Bengal will be set up to demarcate the Muslim majority areas of Sylhet district and contiguous Muslim majority areas of adjoining districts, which will then be transferred to Eastern Bengal. The rest of the Assam Province will in any case continue to participate in the proceedings of the existing Constituent Assembly.

Representation in Constituent Assemblies

14. If it is decided that Bengal and the Punjab should be partitioned, it will be necessary to hold fresh elections to choose their representatives on the scale of one for every million of population according to the principle contained in the Cabinet Mission's Plan of May 16th, 1946. Similar elections will also have to be held for Sylhet in the event of its being decided that this district should form part of East Bengal. The number of representatives to which each area would be entitled is as follows:—

Province	General	Muslims	Sikhs	Total
Sylhet District	..	1	2	Nil 3
West Bengal	..	15	4	Nil 19
East Bengal	..	12	29	Nil 41
West Punjab	..	3	12	2 17
East Punjab	..	6	4	2 12

Statement by His Majesty's Government

15. In accordance with the mandates given to them, the representatives of the various areas will either join the existing Constituent Assembly or form the new Constituent Assembly.

Administrative Matters

15. Negotiations will have to be initiated as soon as possible on the administrative consequences of any partition that may have decided upon :—

- (a) Between the representatives of the respective successor authorities about all subjects now dealt with by the Central Government, including Defence, Finance and Communications.
- (b) Between different successor authorities and His Majesty's Government for treaties in regard to matters arising out of the transfer of power.
- (c) In the case of Provinces that may be partitioned, as to the administration of all provincial subjects such as the division of assets and liabilities, the police and other services, the High Courts, provincial institutions, etc.

The Tribes of the North-West Frontier

17. Agreements with tribes of the North-West Frontier of India will have to be negotiated by the appropriate successor authority.

The States

18. His Majesty's Government wish to make it clear that the decisions announced above relate only to British India and that their policy towards Indian States contained in the Cabinet Mission Memorandum of 12th May 1946 remains unchanged.

Necessity for Speed

19. In order that the successor authorities may have time to prepare themselves to take over power, it is important that all the above processes should be completed as quickly as possible. To avoid delay, the different Provinces or parts of Provinces will proceed independently as far as practicable within the conditions of this Plan. The existing Constituent Assembly and the new Constituent Assembly (if formed) will proceed to frame Constitutions for their respective territories: they will of course be free to frame their own rules.

Immediate Transfer of Power.

20. The major political parties have repeatedly emphasized their desire that there should be the earliest possible transfer of power in India. With this desire His Majesty's Government are in full sympathy, and they are willing to anticipate the date of June, 1948, for the handing over of power by the setting up of an independent Indian Government or Governments at an even earlier date. Accordingly, as the most expeditious, and indeed the only practicable way of meeting this desire, His Majesty's Government propose to introduce legislation during the current session for the transfer of power this year on a Dominion Status basis to one or two successor authorities according to the decisions taken as a result of this announcement. This will be without prejudice to the right of the Indian Constituent Assemblies to decide in due course whether or not the part of India in respect of which they have authority will remain within the British Commonwealth.

Further announcements by Governor-General

21. His Excellency the Governor-General will from time to time make such further announcements as may be necessary in regard to procedure or any other matters for carrying out the above arrangements.

THE INDIAN INDEPENDENCE ACT, 1947.

(10 AND 11 GEO. 6, CH. 30).

CHAPTER 30

An Act to make provision for the setting up in India of two Independent Dominions, to substitute other provisions for certain provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, which apply outside those Dominions, and to provide for other matters consequential on or connected with the setting up of those Dominions.

[18TH JULY 1947]

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1. (1) As from the fifteenth day of August, nineteen hundred and forty-seven, two Independent Dominions shall be set up in India, to be known respectively as India and Pakistan.

(2) The said Dominions are hereafter in this Act referred to as "the new Dominions", and the said fifteenth day of August is hereafter in this Act referred to as "the appointed day".

2. (1) Subject to the provisions of sub-sections (3) and (4) of this section, the territories of India shall be the territories under the sovereignty of His Majesty which, immediately before the appointed day were included in British India except the territories which, under subsection (2) of this section, are to be the territories of Pakistan.

(2) Subject to the provisions of sub-sections (3) and (4) of this section, the territories of Pakistan shall be—

(a) the territories which, on the appointed day, are included in the Provinces of East Bengal and the *Punjab, as constituted under the two following sections;

(b) the territories which, at the date of the passing of this Act, are included in the Province of Sind and the Chief Commissioner's Province of British Baluchistan; and

(c) if, whether before or after the passing of this Act but before the appointed day, the Governor-General declares that the majority of the valid votes cast in the referendum which at the date of the passing of this Act, is being or has recently been held in that behalf under his authority in the North-West Frontier Province are in favour of representatives of that Province taking part in the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan, the territories which, at the date of the passing of this Act, are included in that Province.

(3) Nothing in this section shall prevent any area being at any time included in or excluded from either of the new Dominions, so, however, that—

(a) no area not forming part of the territories specified in sub-section (1), or, as the case may be, sub-section (2), of this section shall be included in either Dominion without the consent of that Dominion; and

(b) no area which forms part of the territories specified in the said sub-section (1) or, as the case may be, the said subsection (2), or which has after the appointed day been included in either Dominion, shall be excluded from that Dominion without the consent of that Dominion.

(4) Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of sub-section (3) of this section, nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the accession of Indian States to either of the new Dominions.

3. (1) As from the appointed day—

(a) the Province of Bengal, as constituted under the Government of India Act, 1935, shall cease to exist; and

(b) there shall be constituted in lieu thereof two new Provinces, to be known respectively as East Bengal and West Bengal.

(2) If, whether before or after the passing of this Act, but before the appointed day, the Governor-General declares that the majority of the valid votes cast in the referendum which, at the date of the passing of this Act, is being or has recently been held in that behalf under his authority in the District of Sylhet are in favour of that District forming part of the new Province of East Bengal, then as from that day, a part of the Province of Assam shall, in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (3) of this section, form part of the new Province of East Bengal.

(3) The boundaries of the new Provinces aforesaid and, in the event mentioned in subsection (2) of this section, the boundaries after the appointed day of the Province of Assam, shall be such as may be determined, whether before or after the appointed day, by the award of a boundary commission appointed or to be appointed by the Governor-General in that behalf, but until the boundaries are so determined—

- (a) the Bengal Districts specified in the First Schedule to this Act, together with, in the event mentioned in sub-section (2) of this section the Assam District of Sylhet, shall be treated as the territories which are to be comprised in the new Province of East Bengal;
- (b) the remainder of the territories comprised at the date of the passing of this Act in the Province of Bengal shall be treated as the territories which are to be comprised in the new Province of West Bengal; and
- (c) in the event mentioned in sub-section (2) of this section, the district of Sylhet shall be excluded from the Province of Assam.

(4) In this section, the expression "award" means, in relation to a boundary commission, the decisions of the Chairman of that commission contained in his report to the Governor-General at the conclusion of the commission's proceedings.

The Punjab.

4. (1) As from the appointed day—

- (a) the Province of the Punjab, as constituted under the Government of India Act, 1935, shall cease to exist; and
- (b) there shall be constituted two new Provinces, to be known respectively as the *Punjab and East Punjab.

(2) The boundaries of the said new Provinces shall be such as may be determined, whether before or after the appointed day by the award of a boundary commission appointed or to be appointed by the Governor-General in that behalf, but until the boundaries are so determined—

- (a) the Districts specified in the Second Schedule to this Act shall be treated as the territories to be comprised in the new Province of the †Punjab; and
- (b) the remainder of the territories comprised at the date of the passing of this Act in the Province of the Punjab shall be treated as the territories which are to be comprised in the new Province of East Punjab.

(3) In this section, the expression "award" means, in relation to a boundary commission, the decisions of the Chairman of that commission contained in his report to the Governor-General at the conclusion of the commission's proceedings.

5. For each of the new Dominions, there shall be a Governor-General who shall be appointed by His Majesty and shall represent His Majesty for the purposes of the Government of the Dominion:

Provided that, unless and until provision to the contrary is made by a law of the Legislature of either of the new Dominions, the same person may be Governor-General of both the new Dominions.

The Governor-General of the new Dominions.

Legislation for the new Dominions.

6. (1) The Legislature of each of the new Dominions shall have full power to make laws for that Dominion, including laws having extra-territorial operation.

(2) No law and no provision of any law made by the Legislature of either of the new Dominions shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of this or any existing or future Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom, or to any order, rule or regulation made under any such Act, and the powers of the Legislature of each Dominion include the power to repeal or amend any such Act, order, rule or regulation in so far as it is part of the law of the Dominion.

(3) The Governor-General of each of the new Dominions shall have full power to assent to any law of the Legislature of that Dominion and so much of any Act as relates to the disallowance of laws by His Majesty or the reservation of laws for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure thereon or the suspension of the operation of laws until the signification of His Majesty's pleasure thereon shall not apply to laws of the Legislature of either of the new Dominions.

(4) No Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom passed on or after the appointed day shall extend, or be deemed to extend, to either of the new Dominions as part of the law of that Dominion unless it is extended thereto by a law of the Legislature of the Dominion.

(5) No Order in Council made on or after the appointed day under any Act passed before the appointed day, and no order, rule or other instrument made on or after the appointed day under any such Act by any United Kingdom Minister or other authority, shall extend, or be deemed to extend, to either of the new Dominions as the part of the law of that Dominion.

(6) The power referred to in sub-section (1) of this section extends to the making of laws limiting for the future the powers of the Legislature of the Dominion.

7. (1) As from the appointed day—

- (a) His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have no responsibility as respects the Government of any of the territories which, immediately before that day, were included in British India;
- (b) the suzerainty of His Majesty over the Indian States lapses, and with it, all treaties and agreements in force at the date of the passing of this Act between His Majesty and the rulers of Indian States, all functions exercisable by His Majesty at that date with respect to Indian States, all obligations of His Majesty existing at that date towards Indian States or the rulers thereof, and all powers, rights, authority or jurisdiction exercisable by His Majesty at that date in or in relation to Indian States by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance or otherwise; and
- (c) there lapse also any treaties or agreements in force at the date of the passing of this Act between His Majesty and any person having authority in the tribal areas, any obligations of His Majesty existing at that date to any such persons or with respect to the tribal areas, and all powers, rights, authority or jurisdiction exercisable at that date by His Majesty, in or in relation to the tribal areas by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance or otherwise:

Provided that, notwithstanding anything in paragraph (b) or paragraph (c) of this sub-section, effect shall, as nearly as may be continued to be given to the provisions of any such agreement as is therein referred to which relate to customs, transit and communications, posts and telegraphs, or other like matters until the provisions in question are denounced by the ruler of the Indian State or person having authority in the tribal areas on the one hand, or by the Dominion or Province or other part thereof concerned on the other hand, or are superseded by subsequent agreements.

(2) The assent of the Parliament of the United Kingdom is hereby given to the omission from the Royal Style and Titles of the words "Indian Imperator" and the words "Emperor of India" and to the issue by His Majesty for that purpose of His Royal Proclamation under the Great Seal of the Realm.

8. (1) In the case of each of the new Dominions, the powers of the Legislature of the Dominion shall, for the purpose of making provision as to the constitution of the Dominion, be exercisable in the first instance by the Constituent Assembly of that Dominion, and references in this Act to the Legislature of the Dominion shall be construed accordingly. [Notwithstanding anything contained in this sub-section or in the Government of India Act, 1935, the powers of the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan shall include and shall be deemed always to have included power to make constitutional provisions for the whole of the Federation of Pakistan as defined in section 5 of the Government of India Act, 1935, or for any part thereof; and notwithstanding anything contained in section 204 or in any other provision of the Government of India Act, 1935, or of any other law, the power of the Constituent Assembly exercised under this sub-section shall not be called in question in any court of law].

(2) Except in so far as other provision is made by or in accordance with a law made by the Constituent Assembly of the Dominion under sub-section (1) of this section, each of the new Dominions and all Provinces and other parts thereof shall be governed as nearly as may be in accordance with the Government of India Act, 1935; and the provisions of that Act, and of the Orders in Council, rules and other instruments made thereunder, shall, so far as applicable, and subject to any express provisions of this Act, and with such omissions, additions, adaptations and modifications as may be specified in orders of the Governor-General under the next, succeeding section, have effect accordingly:

Provided that—

- (a) the said provisions shall apply separately in relation to each of the new Dominions and nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as continuing on or after the appointed day any Central Government or Legislature common to both the new Dominions;
- (b) nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as continuing in force on or after the appointed day any form of control by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom over the affairs of the new Dominions or of any Province or other part thereof;
- (c) so much of the said provisions as requires the Governor-General or any Governor to act in his discretion or exercise his individual judgment as respects any matter shall cease to have effect as from the appointed day;

Consequences of the setting up of the new Dominions.

Temporary provision as to Government of each of the new Dominions.

Orders for bringing this Act into force.

(d) as from the appointed day, no Provincial Bill shall be reserved under the Government of India Act, 1935, for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure, and no Provincial Act shall be disallowed by His Majesty thereunder; and

(e) the powers of the Federal Legislature or Indian Legislature under that Act, as in force in relation to each Dominion, shall, in the first instance, be exercisable by the Constituent Assembly of the Dominion, in addition to the powers exercisable by that Assembly under sub-section (1) of this section.

(3) Any provision of the Government of India Act, 1935, which, as applied to either of the new Dominions by sub-section (2) of this section and the orders therein referred to operates to limit the power of the legislature of that Dominion shall, unless and until other provision is made by or in accordance with a law made by the Constituent Assembly of the Dominion in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (1) of this section, have the like effect as a law of the Legislature of the Dominion limiting for the future the powers of that Legislature.

9. (1) The Governor-General shall by order make such provision as appears to him to be necessary or expedient—

- (a) for bringing the provisions of this Act into effective operation;
- (b) for dividing between the new Dominions, and between the new provinces, to be constituted under this Act, the powers, rights, property, duties and liabilities of the Governor-General in Council or, as the case may be, of the relevant Provinces which, under this Act, are to cease to exist;
- (c) for making omissions from, additions to and adaptations and modifications of, the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Orders in Council, rules and other instruments made thereunder, in their application to the separate new Dominions;
- (d) for removing difficulties arising in connection with the transition to the provisions of this Act;
- (e) for authorizing the carrying on of the business of the Governor-General in Council between the passing of this Act and the appointed day otherwise than in accordance with the provisions in that behalf of the Ninth Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935;
- (f) for enabling agreements to be entered into, and other acts done, on behalf of either of the new Dominions before the appointed day;
- (g) for authorising the continued carrying on for the time being on behalf of the new Dominions, or on behalf of any two or more of the said new Provinces, of services and activities previously carried on on behalf of British India as a whole or on behalf of the former Provinces which those new Provinces represent;
- (h) for regulating the monetary system and any matters pertaining to the Reserve Bank of India; and
- (i) so far as it appears necessary or expedient in connection with any of the matters aforesaid, for varying the constitution, powers or jurisdiction of any legislature, court or other authority in the new Dominions and creating new legislatures, courts or other authorities therein.

(2) The powers conferred by this section on the Governor-General shall, in relation to their respective Provinces, be exercisable also by the Governors of the Provinces which, under this Act, are to cease to exist; and those powers shall, for the purposes of the Government of India Act, 1935, be deemed to be matters as respects which the Governors are, under that Act, to exercise their individual judgment.

(3) This section shall be deemed to have had effect as from the third day of June, nineteen hundred and forty-seven and any order of the Governor-General or any Governor made on or after that date as to any matter shall have effect accordingly, and any order made under this section may be made so as to be retrospective to any date not earlier than the said third day of June :

Provided that no person shall be deemed to be guilty of an offence by reason of so much of any such order as makes any provision thereof retrospective to any date before the making thereof.

(4) Any orders, made under this section, whether before or after the appointed day, shall have effect—

- (a) up to the appointed day, in British India;
- (b) on and after the appointed day, in the new Dominion or Dominions concerned; and
- (c) outside British India, or, as the case may be, outside the new Dominion or Dominions concerned, to such extent, whether before, on or after the appointed day, as a law of the Legislature of the Dominion or Dominions concerned would have on or after the appointed day, but shall, in the case of each of the Dominions, be subject to the same powers of repeal and amendment as laws of the Legislature of that Dominion.

(5) No order shall be made under this section by the Governor of any Province, after the appointed day, or, by the Governor-General, after the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and forty-[nine]¹, or such earlier date as may be determined, in the case of either Dominion, by any law of the Legislature of that Dominion.

(6) If it appears that a part of the Province of Assam is, on the appointed day, to become part of the new Province of East Bengal, the proceeding provisions of this section shall have effect as if, under this Act, the Province of Assam was to cease to exist on the appointed day and be reconstituted on that day as a new Province.

10. (1) The provisions of this Act keeping in force provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall not continue in force the provisions of that Act relating to appointments to the civil services of, and civil posts under, the Crown in India by the Secretary of State, or the provisions of that Act relating to the reservation of posts.

(2) Every person who—

(a) having been appointed by the Secretary of State, or Secretary of State in Council, to a civil service of the Crown in India continues on and after the appointed day to serve under the Government of either of the new Dominions or of any Province or part thereof; or

(b) having been appointed by His Majesty before the appointed day to be a Judge of the Federal Court or of any Court which is a High Court within the meaning of the Government of India Act, 1935, continues on and after the appointed day to serve as a judge in either of the new Dominions, shall be entitled to receive from the Government of the Dominions and Provinces or parts which he is from time to time serving or, as the case may be, which are served by the courts in which he is from time to time a judge, the same conditions of service as respects remuneration, leave and pension, and the same rights as respects disciplinary matters or, as the case may be, as respects the tenure of his office, or rights as similar thereto as changed circumstances may permit, as that person was entitled to immediately before the appointed day:

[Provided that the Government of the Dominion of Pakistan may in the case of any such person or class of persons other than persons of non-Asiatic Domicile, for special reasons impose such reduction in the remuneration as may be deemed necessary.]

(3) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as enabling the rights and liabilities of any person with respect to the family pension funds vested in Commissioners under section two hundred and seventy-three of the Government of India Act, 1935, to be governed otherwise than by Orders in Council made (whether before or after the passing of this Act or the appointed day) by His Majesty in Council and rules made (whether before or after the passing of this Act or the appointed day) by a Secretary of State or such other Minister of the Crown as may be designated in that behalf by Order in Council under the Ministers of the Crown (Transfer of Functions) Act, 1946.

3[10A. For the removal of doubts it is hereby declared that subject to the other provisions of this Act and of the Government of India Act, 1935, the power to alter any order, rule, regulation or other instrument passed or made by the Secretary of State or the Secretary of State in Council and existing immediately before the 15th day of August 1947 and continuing on and after that day as part of the law of Pakistan in virtue of section 18 of this Act is vested in the Governor-General and may be exercised by him by order.]

11. (1) The orders to be made by the Governor-General under the preceding provisions of this Act shall make provision for the division of the Indian armed forces of His Majesty between the new Dominions, and for the command and governance of those forces until the division is completed.

(2) As from the appointed day, while any member of His Majesty's forces, other than His Majesty's Indian forces, is attached to or serving with any of His Majesty's Indian forces—

(a) he shall, subject to any provision to the contrary made by a law of the Legislature of the Dominion or Dominions concerned or by any order of the Governor-General under the preceding provisions of this Act, have, in relation to the Indian forces in question, the powers of command and punishment appropriate to his rank and functions; but

(b) nothing in any enactment in force at the date of the passing of this Act shall render him subject in any way to the law governing the Indian forces in question.

12. (1) Nothing in this Act affects the jurisdiction or authority of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, or of the Admiralty, the Army Council, or the Air Council or of any other United Kingdom authority, in relation to any of His Majesty's forces which may, on or after the appointed day, be in either of the new Dominions or elsewhere in the territories which, before the appointed day, were included in India, not being Indian forces.

(2) In its application in relation to His Majesty's military forces, other than Indian forces, the Army Act shall have effect on or after the appointed day—

(a) as if His Majesty's Indian forces were not included in the expressions "the forces", "His Majesty's forces" and "the regular forces"; and

(b) subject to the further modifications specified in Parts I and II of the Third Schedule to this Act.

(3) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (2) of this section, and to any provisions of any law of the Legislature of the Dominion concerned, all civil authorities in the new Dominions, and, subject as aforesaid, and subject also to the provision of the last preceding section, all service authorities in the new Dominions, shall, in those Dominions and in the other territories which were included in India before the appointed day, perform in relation to His Majesty's military forces, not being Indian forces, the same functions as were, before the appointed day, performed by them, or by the authorities corresponding to them, whether by virtue of the Army Act or otherwise, and the matters for which provision is to be made by orders of the Governor-General under the preceding provisions of this Act shall include the facilitating of the withdrawal from the new Dominions and other territories aforesaid of His Majesty's military forces, not being Indian forces.

(4) The provisions of subsections (2) and (3) of this section shall apply in relation to the air forces of His Majesty, not being Indian air forces, as they apply in relation to His Majesty's military forces, subject, however, to the necessary adaptations, and, in particular, as if—

(a) for the references to the Army Act there were substituted references to the Air Force Act; and

(b) for the reference to Part II of the Third Schedule to this Act there were substituted a reference to Part III of that Schedule.

Naval Forces.

13. (1) In the application of the Naval Discipline Act to His Majesty's Naval Forces, other than Indian Naval Forces, references to His Majesty's Navy and His Majesty's ships shall not, as from the appointed day, include references to His Majesty's Indian navy or the ships thereof.

(2) In the application of the Naval Discipline Act by virtue of any law made in India before the appointed day to Indian Naval Forces, references to His Majesty's navy and His Majesty's ships shall, as from the appointed day, be deemed to be and to be only, references to His Majesty's Indian navy and the ships thereof.

(3) In section 90-B of the Naval Discipline Act (which, in certain cases, subjects officers and men of the Royal Navy and Royal Marines to the law and customs of the ships and naval forces of other parts of His Majesty's dominions) the words "or of India" shall be repealed as from the appointed day, wherever those words occur.

Provisions
as to the Secretary of State and the Auditor of Indian Home
Accounts.

14. (1) A Secretary of State, or such other Minister of the Crown as may be designated in that behalf by Order in Council under the Ministers of the Crown (Transfer of Functions) Act, 1946, is hereby authorised to continue for the time being the performance, on behalf of whatever Government or Governments may be concerned, of functions as to the making of payments and other matters similar to the functions which up to the appointed day, the Secretary of State was performing on behalf of Governments constituted or continued under the Government of India Act, 1935.

(2) The functions referred to in subsection (1) of this section include functions as respects the management of, and the making of payments in respect of, Government debt, and any enactments relating to such debt shall have effect accordingly:

Provided that nothing in this subsection shall be construed as continuing in force so much of any enactment as empowers the Secretary of State to contract sterling loans on behalf of any such Government as aforesaid or as applying to the Government of either of the new Dominions the prohibition imposed on the Governor-General in Council by section 315 of the Government of India Act, 1935, as respects the contracting of sterling loans.

(3) As from the appointed day, there shall not be any such advisers of the Secretary of State as are provided for by section 278 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and that section and any provisions of that Act which require the Secretary of State to obtain the concurrence of his advisers, are hereby repealed as from that day.

(4) The Auditor of Indian Home Accounts is hereby authorised to continue for the time being to exercise his functions as respects the accounts of the Secretary of State or any such other Minister of the Crown as is mentioned in subsection (1) of this section, both in respect of activities before, and in respect of activities after the appointed day, in the same manner, as nearly as may be, as he would have done if this Act had not passed.

Legal proceedings by and against the

15. (1) Notwithstanding anything in this Act, and in particular, notwithstanding any of the provisions of the last preceding sections, any provision of any enactment which, but for the passing of this Act, would authorise legal proceedings to be taken, in India or elsewhere by or against the Secretary of State in respect of any right or liability of India or any part of India shall cease to have effect on the appointed day, and any legal proceedings pending by virtue of any such provision on the appointed day shall, by virtue of this Act, abate on the appointed day, so far as the Secretary of State is concerned.

Secretary of State.

(2) Subject to the provisions of this subsection any legal proceedings which, but for the passing of this Act, could have been brought by or against the Secretary of State in respect of any right or liability of India, or any part of India, shall instead be brought—

(a) in the case of proceedings in the United Kingdom, by or against the High Commissioner; and any legal proceedings by or against the Secretary of State in respect of any such right or liability as aforesaid which are pending immediately before the appointed day shall be continued by or against the High Commissioner or, as the case may be, the person designated as aforesaid:

(b) in the case of other proceedings, by or against such person as may be designated by order of the Governor-General under the preceding provisions of this Act or otherwise by the law of the new Dominion concerned.

Provided that, at any time after the appointed day, the right conferred by this subsection to bring or continue proceedings may, whether the proceedings are by, or are against, the High Commissioner or person designated as aforesaid, be withdrawn by a law of the legislature of either of the new Dominions so far as that Dominion is concerned, and any such law may operate as respects proceedings pending at the date of the passing of the law.

(3) In this section, the expression "the High Commissioner" means, in relation to each of the new Dominions, any such officer as may for the time being be authorised to perform in the United Kingdom, in relation to that Dominion, functions similar to those performed before the appointed day, in relation to the Governor-General in Council, by the High Commissioner referred to in section 302 of the Government of India Act, 1935; and any legal proceedings which, immediately before the appointed day, are the subject of an appeal to His Majesty in Council, or of a petition for special leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council, shall be treated for the purposes of this section as legal proceedings pending in the United Kingdom.

Aden.

16. (1) Subsections (2) to (4) of section 288 of the Government of India Act, 1935 (which confer on His Majesty power to make by Order in Council provision for the Government of Aden) shall cease to have effect and the British Settlements Acts, 1887 and 1945 (which authorise His Majesty to make laws and establish institutions for British Settlements as defined in those Acts) shall apply in relation to Aden as if it were a British Settlement as so defined.

(2) Notwithstanding the repeal of the said sub-sections (2) to (4), the Orders in Council in force thereunder at the date of the passing of this Act shall continue in force, but the said Orders in Council, any other Orders in Council made under the Government of India Act, 1935, in so far as they apply to Aden, and any enactments applied to Aden or amended in relation to Aden by any such Orders in Council as aforesaid, may be repealed, revoked or amended under the powers of the British Settlements Acts, 1887 and 1945.

(3) Unless and until provision to the contrary is made as respects Aden under the powers of the British Settlements Acts, 1887 and 1945, or, as respects the new Dominion in question, by a law of the Legislature of that Dominion, the provisions of the said Orders in Council and enactments relating to appeals from any courts in Aden to any courts which will, after the appointed day, be in either of the new Dominions, shall continue in force in their application both to Aden and to the Dominion in question, and the last mentioned courts shall exercise their jurisdiction accordingly.

Divorce
jurisdiction.

17. (1) No court in either of the new Dominions shall, by virtue of the Indian and Colonial Divorce Jurisdiction Acts, 1926 and 1940, have jurisdiction in or in relation to any proceedings for a decree for the dissolution of a marriage, unless those proceedings were instituted before the appointed day, but, save as aforesaid and subject to any provision to the contrary which may hereafter be made by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom or by any law of the Legislature of the new Dominion concerned, all courts in the new Dominions shall have the same jurisdiction under the said Acts as they would have had if this Act had not been passed.

(2) Any rules made on or after the appointed day under subsection (4) of section 1 of the Indian and Colonial Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1926, for a court in either of the new Dominions shall, instead of being made by the Secretary of State with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, be made by such authority as may be determined by the law of the Dominion concerned, and so much of the said sub-section and of any rules in force thereunder immediately before the appointed day as require the approval of the Lord Chancellor to the nomination for any purpose of any judges of any such court shall cease to have effect.

(3) The reference in subsection (1) of this section to proceedings for a decree for the dissolution of a marriage include references to proceedings for such a decree of presumption of death and dissolution of a marriage as is authorised by section 8 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937.

The Indian Independence Act, 1947

(4) Nothing in this section affects any court outside the new Dominions, and the power conferred by section 2 of the Indian and Colonial Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1926, to apply certain provisions of that Act to other parts of His Majesty's dominions as they apply to India shall be deemed to be power to apply those provisions as they would have applied to India if this Act had not passed.

Provisions
as to existing laws, etc.

18. (1) In so far as any Act of Parliament, Order in Council, order, rule, regulation or other instrument passed or made before the appointed day operates otherwise than as part of the law of British India or the new Dominions, references therein to India or British India, however, worded and whether by name or not, shall, in so far as the context permits and except, so far as Parliament may hereafter otherwise provide, be construed as, or as including, references to the new Dominions taken together, or taken separately, according as the circumstances and subject matter may require:

Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as continuing in operation any provision in so far as the continuance thereof as adapted by this sub-section is inconsistent with any of the provisions of this Act other than this section.

(2) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (1) of this section and to any other express provisions of this Act, the Orders in Council made under sub-section (5) of section 311 of the Government of India Act, 1935, for adapting and modifying Acts of Parliament shall, except so far as Parliament may hereafter otherwise provide, continue in force in relation to all Acts in so far as they operate otherwise than as part of the law of British India or the new Dominions.

(3) Save as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, the law of British India and of the several parts thereof existing immediately before the appointed day shall, so far as applicable and with the necessary adaptations, continue as the law of each of the new Dominions and the several parts thereof until other provision is made by laws of the Legislature of the Dominion in question or by any other Legislature or other authority having power in that behalf.

(4) It is hereby declared that the Instruments of Instructions issued before the passing of this Act by His Majesty to the Governor-General and the Governors of Provinces lapse as from the appointed day, and nothing in this Act shall be construed as continuing in force any provision of the Government of India Act, 1935, relating to such Instruments of Instructions.

(5) As from the appointed day, so much of any enactment as requires the approval of His Majesty in Council to any rules of court shall not apply to any court in either of the new Dominions.

Interpretation
etc.

19. (1) References in this Act to the Governor-General shall, in relation to any order to be made or other act done on or after the appointed day, construed—

- (a) where the order or other act concerns one only of the new Dominions, as references to the Governor-General of that Dominion;
- (b) where the order or other act concerns both of the new Dominions and the same person is the Governor-General of both those Dominions, as references to that person; and
- (c) in any other case, as references to the Governors-General of the new Dominions, acting jointly.

(2) References in this Act to the Governor-General shall, in relation to any order to be made or other act done before the appointed day, be construed as references to the Governor-General of India within the meaning of the Government of India Act, 1935, and so much of that or any other Act as requires references to the Governor-General to be construed as references to the Governor-General in Council shall not apply to references to the Governor-General in this Act.

(3) References in this Act to the Constituent Assembly of a Dominion shall be construed as references—
(a) In relation to India, to the Constituent Assembly the first sitting whereof was held on the 9th day of December 1946 modified—

- (i) by the exclusion of the members representing Bengal, the Punjab, Sind and British Baluchistan; and
- (ii) should it appear that the North-West Frontier Province will form part of Pakistan, by the exclusion of the members representing that Province; and
- (iii) by the inclusion of members representing West Bengal and East Punjab; and
- (iv) should it appear that, on the appointed day, a part of the Province of Assam is to form part of the new Province of East Bengal, by the exclusion of the members theretofore representing the Province of Assam, and the inclusion of members chosen to represent the remainder of that Province.

(b) in relation to Pakistan, to the Assembly set up or about to be set up at the date of the passing of this Act under the authority of the Governor-General as the Constituent Assembly for Pakistan:

Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as affecting the extent to which representatives of the Indian States take part in either of the said Assemblies, or as preventing the filling of casual vacancies in the said Assemblies, or as preventing the participation in either of the said Assemblies in accordance with such arrangements as may be made in that behalf, of representatives of the tribal areas on the borders of the Dominion for which that Assembly sits, and the powers of the said Assemblies shall extend, and be deemed always to have extended, to the making of provision for the matters specified in this proviso.

*[Provided further that nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as preventing any increase or reduction in the number of seats or any redistribution of seats in the Constituent Assembly for Pakistan, and the powers of the said Assembly shall extend to and be deemed always to have extended to the making of provision therefor].

(4) In this Act, except so far as the context otherwise requires—

References to the Government of India Act, 1935, include references to any enactments amending or supplementing that Act, and, in particular, references to the India (Central Government and Legislature) Act, 1946;

“India”, where the reference is to a state of affairs existing before the appointed day or which would have existed but for the passing of this Act, has the meaning assigned to it by section 311 of the Government of India Act, 1935;

“Indian forces” includes all His Majesty's Indian forces existing before the appointed day and also any forces of either of the new Dominions;

“Pension” means, in relation to any person, a pension, whether contributory or not, of any kind whatsoever payable to or in respect of that person, and includes retired pay so payable, a gratuity so payable and any sum or sums so payable by way of the return, with or without interest thereon or other additions thereto, of subscriptions to a provident fund;

“Province” means a Governor's Province;

“remuneration” includes leave pay, allowances and the cost of any privileges or facilities provided in kind.

(5) Any power conferred by this Act to make any order includes power to revoke or vary any order previously made in the exercise of that power.

20. This Act may be cited as the Indian Independence Act, 1947.

2. In section forty-three (which relates to complaints), the words "with the approval of the Governor-General in Council" shall be omitted.
3. In sub-sections (8) and (9) of section fifty-four (which, amongst other things, require certain sentences to be confirmed by the Governor-General in Council) the words "India or," the words "by the Governor-General, or, as the case may be" and the words "In India, by the Governor-General, or, if he has been tried" shall be omitted.
4. In subsection (3) of section seventy-three (which provides for the nomination of officers with power to dispense with courts martial for desertion and fraudulent enlistment) the words "with the approval of the Governor-General" shall be omitted.
5. The powers conferred by sub-section (5) of section one hundred and thirty (which provides for the removal of insane persons) shall not be exercised except with the consent of the officer commanding the forces in the new Dominions.
6. In sub-section (2) of section one hundred and thirty-two (which relates to rules regulating service prisons and detention barracks) the words "and in India for the Governor-General" and the words "the Governor-General" shall be omitted except as respects rules made before the appointed day.
7. In the cases specified in sub-section (1) of section one hundred and thirty-four, inquests shall be held in all cases in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (3) of that section.
8. In section one hundred and thirty-six (which relates to deductions from pay), in sub-section (1) the words "India or" and the words "being in the case of India a law of the Indian legislature", and the whole of sub-section (2) shall be omitted.
9. In paragraph (4) of section one hundred and thirty-seven (which relates to penal stoppages from the ordinary pay of officers), the words "or in the case of officers serving in India the Governor-General" the words "India or" and the words "for India or, as the case may be" shall be omitted.
10. In paragraph (12) of section one hundred and seventy-five and paragraph (11) of section one hundred and seventy-six (which apply the Act to certain members of His Majesty's Indian Forces and to certain other persons) the word "India" shall be omitted wherever it occurs.
11. In sub-section (1) of section one hundred and eighty (which provides for the punishment of misconduct by civilians in relation to courts martial) the words "India or" shall be omitted wherever they occur.
12. In the provision of section one hundred and eighty-three relating to the reduction in rank of non-commissioned officers, the words "with the approval of the Governor-General" shall be omitted in both places where they occur.

PART II

Modifications of Army Act.

Section 184-B (which regulates relations with the Indian Air Force) shall be omitted.

PART III

Modifications of Air Force Act.

1. In section 179-D (which relates to the attachment of officers and airmen to Indian and Burma Air Forces), the words "by the Air Council and the Governor-General of India, or, as the case may be", and the words "India or", wherever those words occur, shall be omitted.
2. In section 184-B (which regulates relations with Indian and Burma Air Forces) the words "India or" and the words "by the Air Council and the Governor-General of India or, as the case may be", shall be omitted.
3. Sub-paragraph (e) of paragraph (4) of section one hundred and ninety (which provides that officers of His Majesty's Indian Air Force are to be officers within the meaning of the Act) shall be omitted.

QUAID-I-AZAM'S PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS TO THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY OF PAKISTAN
ON THE 11TH AUGUST 1947

Mr. President: Ladies and Gentlemen, I cordially thank you, with the utmost sincerity, for the honour you have conferred upon me—the greatest honour that is possible for this Sovereign Assembly to confer—by electing me as your first president. I also thank those leaders who spoken in appreciation of my services and their personal references to me. I sincerely hope that with your support and your co-operation we shall make this Constituent Assembly an example to the world. The Constituent Assembly has got two main functions to perform. The first is the very onerous and responsible task of framing our future constitution of Pakistan and the second of functioning as a full and complete Sovereign body as the Federal Legislature of Pakistan. We have to do the best we can in adopting a provisional Constitution for the Federal Legislature of Pakistan. You know really that not only we ourselves are wondering but, I think, the whole world is wondering at this unprecedented cyclonic revolution which has brought about the plan of creating and establishing two independent Sovereign Dominions in this sub-continent. As is, it has been unprecedented; there is no parallel in the history of the world. This mighty sub-continent with all kinds of inhabitants has been brought under a plan which is titanic, unknown, unparalleled. And what is very important with regard to it is that we have achieved it peacefully and by means of an evolution of the greatest possible character.

Dealing with our first function in this Assembly, I cannot make any well-considered Pronouncement at this moment, but I shall say a few things as they occur to me. The first and the foremost thing that I would like to emphasise this—remember that you are now a Sovereign Legislative body and you have got all the powers. It, therefore, places on you the gravest responsibility as to how you should take your decisions. The first observation that I would like to make is this: You will no doubt agree with me that the first duty of a Government is to maintain law and order, so that the life, property and religious beliefs of its subjects are fully protected by the State.

The second thing that occurs to me is this: One of the biggest curses from which India is suffering—I do not say that other countries are free from it, but, I think, our condition is much worse—is bribery and corruption. That really is a poison. We must put that down with an iron hand and I hope that you will take adequate measures as soon as it is possible for this Assembly to do so.

Black-marketing is another curse. Well, I know that black-marketeers are frequently caught and punished. Judicial sentences are passed or sometimes fines only are imposed. Now you have to tackle this monster which today is a colossal crime against society, in our distressed conditions, when we constantly face shortage of food and other essential commodities of life. A citizen who does black-marketing commits, I think, a greater crime than the biggest and most grievous of crimes. These black-marketeers are really knowing, intelligent and ordinarily responsible people, and when they indulge in black marketing, I think they ought to be very severely punished, because they undermine the entire system of control and regulation of food-stuffs and essential commodities, and cause, wholesale starvation and want and even death.

The next thing that strikes me in this: Here again is a legacy which has been passed on to us. Along with many other things good and bad, has arrived this great evil—the evil of nepotism and jobbery. This evil must be crushed relentlessly. I want to make it quite clear that I shall never tolerate any kind of jobbery, nepotism or any influence directly or indirectly brought to bear upon me. Wherever I find that such a practice is in vogue, or is continuing anywhere, low or high, I shall certainly not countenance it.

I know there are people who do not quite agree with the division of India and the partition of the Punjab and Bengal. Much has been said against it, but now that it has, been accepted, it is the duty of every one of us to loyally abide by it and honourably act according to the agreement which is now final and binding on all. But you must remember, as I have said, that this mighty revolution that has taken place is unprecedented. One can quite understand the feeling that exists between the two communities wherever one community is in majority and the other is in minority. But the question is whether it was possible or practicable to act otherwise than has been done. A division had to take place. On both sides, in Hindustan and Pakistan, there are sections of people who may not agree with it, who may not like it, but in my judgment there was no other solution and I am sure future history will record its verdict in favour of it. And what is more it will be proved by actual experience as we go on that that was the only solution of India's constitutional problem. Any idea of a United India could never have worked and in my judgment it would have led us to terrific disaster. May be that view is correct; may be it is not; that remains to be seen. All the same, in this division it was impossible to avoid the question of minorities being in one Dominion or the other. Now that was unavoidable. There is no other solution. Now what shall we do? Now, if we want to make this great State of Pakistan happy and prosperous we should wholly and solely concentrate on the well-being of the people, and especially of the masses and the poor. If you will work in co-operation, forgetting the past, burying the hatchet you are bound to succeed. If you change your past and work together in a spirit that every one of you, no matter to what community he belongs, no matter what relations he had with you in the past, no matter what is his colour, caste or creed, is first, second and last a citizen of this State with equal rights, privileges and obligations, there will be no end to the progress you will make.

I cannot emphasise it too much. We should begin to work in that spirit and in course of time all these angularities of the majority and minority communities the Hindu community and the Muslim community—because even as regards Muslims you have Pathans, Punjabis, Shias, Sunnis and so on and among the Hindus you have Brahmins, Vashnavas, Khatris, also Bengalis, Madrasis, and so on—will vanish. Indeed if you ask me this has been the biggest hindrance in the way of India to attain the freedom and independence and but for this we would have been free peoples long long ago. No power can hold another nation, and specially a nation of 400 million souls in subjection; nobody could have conquered you, and even if it had happened, nobody could have continued its hold on you for any length of time but for this. Therefore we must learn a lesson from this. You are free; you are free to go to your temples, you are free to go to your mosques or to any other places of worship in this State of Pakistan. You may belong to any religion or caste or creed—that has nothing to do with the business of the State. As you know, history shows that in England conditions some time ago were much worse than those prevailing in India today. The Roman Catholics and the Protestants persecuted each other. Even now there are some States in existence where there are discriminations made and bars imposed against a particular class. Thank God we are not starting in those days. We are starting in the days when there is no discrimination, no distinction between one community and another, no discrimination between one caste or creed and another. We are starting with this fundamental principle that we are all citizens and equal citizens of one state. The people of England in course of time had to face the realities of the situation and had to discharge the responsibilities and burdens placed upon them by the Government of their country and they went through that fire step by step. Today you might say with justice that Roman Catholic and Protestants do not exists; what exists now is that every man is a citizen, an equal citizen, of Great Britain and they are all members of the Nation.

Now, I think we should keep that in front of us as our ideal and you will find that in course of time Hindus would cease to be Hindus and Muslims would cease to be Muslims, not in the religious sense, because that is the personal faith of each individual, but in the political sense as citizens of the State.

Well, gentlemen, I do not wish to take up any more of your time and thank you again for the honour you have done to me. I shall always be guided by the Principles of justice and fair-play without any, as is put in the political language, prejudice or ill will, in other words partiality, or favouritism. My guiding principle will be justice and complete impartiality, and I am sure that with your support and co-operation, I can look forward to Pakistan becoming one of the greatest Nations of the world.

I have received a message from the United States of America addressed to me. It reads:

"I have the honour to communicate to you, in Your Excellency's capacity as President of the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan, the following message which I have just received from the Secretary of State of the United States;

"On the occasion of the first meeting of the Constituent Assembly for Pakistan, I extend to you and to members of the Assembly, the best wishes of the Government and the people of the United States for the successful conclusion of the great work you are about to undertake."

MR. LIAQUAT ALI KHAN'S SPEECH ON "OBJECTIVES RESOLUTION"

In moving the Motion on Aims and Objects, on the 7th March, 1949, the Honourable Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan delivered the following speech:—*

Mr. President, I beg to move the following Objectives Resolution embodying the main principles on which the constitution of Pakistan is to be based:

"In the name of Allah, the Beneficent, the Merciful ;

WHEREAS sovereignty over the entire universe belongs to God Almighty alone and the authority which He has delegated to the State of Pakistan through its people for being exercised within the limits prescribed by Him is a sacred trust;

This Constituent Assembly representing the people of Pakistan resolves to frame a constitution for the sovereign independent State of Pakistan;

WHEREIN the State shall exercise its powers and authority through the chosen representatives of the people;

WHEREIN the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam shall be fully observed;

WHEREIN the Muslims shall be enabled to order their lives in the individual and collective spheres in accord with the teachings and requirements of Islam as set out in the Holy Quran and the Sunnah; †

WHEREIN adequate provision shall be made for the minorities freely to profess and practise their religions and develop their cultures;

WHEREBY the territories now included in or in accession with Pakistan and such other territories as may hereafter be included in or accede to Pakistan shall form a Federation wherein the units will be autonomous with such boundaries and limitations on their powers and authority as may be prescribed;

WHEREIN adequate provision shall be made to safeguard the legitimate interests of minorities and backward and depressed classes;

WHEREIN the independence of the judiciary shall be fully secured;

WHEREIN the integrity of the territories of the Federation, its independence and all its rights including its sovereign rights on land, sea and air shall be safeguarded;

So that the people of Pakistan may prosper and attain their rightful and honoured place amongst the nations of the World and make their full contribution towards international peace and progress and happiness of humanity."

Sir, I consider this to be a most important occasion in the life of this country next in importance only to the achievement of independence, because by achieving independence we only won an opportunity of building up a country and its polity in accordance with our ideals. I would like to remind the House that the Father of the Nation, Quaid-i-Azam, gave expression to his feelings on this matter on many an occasion, and his views were endorsed by the nation in unmistakable terms. Pakistan was founded because the Muslims of this sub-continent wanted to build up their lives in accordance with the teachings and traditions of Islam, because they wanted to demonstrate to the world that Islam provides a panacea to the many diseases which have crept into the life of humanity to-day. It is universally recognised that the source of these evils is that humanity has not been able to keep pace with its material development, that the Frankenstein Monster which human genius has produced in the form of scientific inventions now threatens to destroy not only the fabric of human society but its material environments as well, the very habitat in which it dwells. It is universally recognised that if man had not chosen to ignore the spiritual values of life and if his faith in God had not been weakened, this scientific development would not have endangered his very existence. It is God-consciousness alone which can save humanity, which means that all power that humanity possesses must be used in accordance with ethical standards which have been laid down by inspired teachers known to us as the great Prophets of different religions. We, as Pakistanis, are not ashamed of the fact that we are overwhelmingly Muslims and we believe that it is by adhering to our faith and ideals that we can make a genuine contribution to the welfare of the world. Therefore, Sir, you would notice that the Preamble of the Resolution deals with a frank and unequivocal recognition of the fact that all authority must be subservient to God. It is quite true that this is in direct contradiction to the Machiavellian ideas regarding a polity where spiritual and ethical values should play no part in the governance of the people and, therefore, it is also perhaps a little out of fashion to remind ourselves of the fact that the State should be an instrument of beneficence and not of evil. But we, the people of Pakistan, have the courage to believe firmly that all authority should be exercised in accordance with the standards laid down by Islam so that it may not be misused. All authority is a sacred trust, entrusted to us by God for the purpose of being exercised in the service of man so that It does not become an agency for tyranny or selfishness. I would, however, point out that this is not a resuscitation of the dead theory of divine right of kings or rulers, because, in accordance with the spirit of Islam, the Preamble fully recognises the truth that authority has been delegated to the people, and to none else, and that it is for the people to decide who will exercise that authority.

*The Honourable Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan, Prime Minister of Pakistan, was elected by the Muslim Constituency of East Bengal.

†Traditions of the Holy Prophet.

For this reason it has been made clear in the Resolution that the State shall exercise all its powers and authority through the chosen representatives of the people.

This is the very essence of democracy, because the people have been recognised as the recipients of all authority and it is in them that the power to wield it has been vested.

Sir, I just now said that the people are the real recipients of power. This naturally eliminates any danger of the establishment of a theocracy. It is true that in its literal sense theocracy means the Government of God; in this sense, however, it is patent that the entire universe is a theocracy, for is there any corner in the entire creation where His authority does not exist? But in the technical sense, theocracy has come to mean a Government by ordained priests, who wield authority as being specially appointed by those who claim to derive their rights from their sacred position. I cannot over-emphasise the fact that such an idea is absolutely foreign to Islam. Islam does not recognise either priesthood or any sacred position; and, therefore, the question of a theocracy simply does not arise in Islam. If there are any who still use the word theocracy in the same breath as the polity of Pakistan, they are either labouring under a grave misapprehension, or indulging in mischievous propaganda.

You would notice, Sir, that the Objectives Resolution lays emphasis on the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice, and further defines them by saying that these principles should be observed in the constitution as they have been enunciated by Islam. It has been necessary to qualify these terms because they are generally used in a loose sense. For instance, the Western Powers and Soviet Russia, alike claim that their systems are based upon democracy, and, yet, it is common knowledge that their polities are inherently different. It has, therefore, been found necessary to define these terms further in order to give them a well-understood meaning. When we use the word democracy in the Islamic sense, it pervades all aspects of our life; it relates to our system of Government and to our society with equal validity, because one of the greatest contributions of Islam has been the idea of the equality of all men. Islam recognises no distinctions based upon race, colour or birth. Even in the days of its decadence, Islamic society has been remarkably free from the prejudices which vitiated human relations in many other parts of the world. Similarly, we have a great record in tolerance, for under no system of Government, even in the Middle Ages, have the minorities received the same consideration and freedom as they did in Muslim countries. When Christian dissentients and Muslims were being tortured and driven out of their homes, when they were being hunted as animals and burnt as criminals—even criminals have never been burnt in Islamic society—Islam provided a haven for all who were persecuted and who fled from tyranny. It is a well-known fact of history that, when anti-Semitism turned the Jews out of many a European country, it was the Ottoman Empire which gave them shelter. The greatest proof of the tolerance of Muslim peoples lies in the fact that there is no Muslim country where strong minorities do not exist, and where they have not been able to preserve their religion and culture. Most of all, in this sub-continent of India, where the Muslims wielded unlimited authority, the rights of non-Muslims were cherished and protected. I may point out, Sir, that it was under Muslim patronage that many an indigenous language developed in India. My friends from Bengal would remember that it was under the encouragement of Muslim rulers that the first translations of the Hindu scriptures were made from Sanskrit into Bengali. It is this tolerance which is envisaged by Islam, wherein a minority does not live on sufferance, but is respected and given every opportunity to develop its own thought and culture, so that it may contribute to the greater glory of the entire nation. In the matter of social justice as well, Sir, I would point out that Islam has a distinct contribution to make. Islam envisages a society in which social justice means neither charity nor regimentation. Islamic social justice is based upon fundamental laws and concepts which guarantee to man a life free from want and rich in freedom. It is for this reason that the principles: of democracy: freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice have been further defined by giving to them a meaning which, in our view, is deeper and wider than the usual connotation of these words.

The next clause of the Resolution lays down that Muslims shall be enabled to order their lives in the individual and collective spheres in accord with the teachings and requirements of Islam as set out in the Holy Quran and the Sunnah. It is quite obvious that no non-Muslim should have any objection if the Muslims are able to order their lives in accordance with the dictates of their religion. You would also notice, Sir, that the State is not to play the part of a neutral observer, wherein the Muslims may be merely free to profess and practise their religion, because such an attitude on the part of the State would be the very negation of the ideals which prompted the demand of Pakistan, and it is these ideals which should be the corner-stone of the State which we want to build. The State will create such conditions as are conducive to the building up of a truly Islamic Society, which means that the State will have to play a positive part in this effort. You would remember, Sir, that the Quaid-i-Azam and other leaders of the Muslim League always made unequivocal declarations that the Muslim demand for Pakistan was based upon the fact that the Muslims had a way of life and a code of conduct. They also reiterated the fact that Islam is not merely a relationship between the individual and his God, which should not, in any way, affect the working of the State. Indeed, Islam lays down specific directions for social behaviour, and seeks to guide society in its attitude towards the problems which confront it from day to day. Islam is not just a matter of private beliefs and conduct. It expects its followers to build up a society for the purpose of "Good life"—as the Greeks would have called it, with this difference, that Islamic "good life" is essentially based upon spiritual values. For the purpose of emphasizing these values and to give them validity, it will be necessary for the State to direct and guide the activities of the Muslims in such a manner as to bring about a new social order based upon the essential principles of Islam, including the principles of democracy, freedom, tolerance and social justice. These I mention merely by way of illustration, because they do not exhaust the teachings of Islam as embodied in the Quran and the Sunnah. There can be no Muslim who does not believe that the word of God and the life of the Prophet are the basic sources of his inspiration. In these there is no difference of opinion amongst the Muslims and there is no sect in Islam which does not believe in their validity. Therefore, there should be no misconception in the mind of any sect which may be in a minority in Pakistan about the intentions of the State. The State will seek to create an Islamic society free from dissensions, but this does not mean that it would curb the freedom of any section of the Muslims in the matter of their beliefs. No sect, whether a majority or a minority, will be permitted to dictate to the others, and in their own internal matters and sectional beliefs, all sects shall be given the fullest possible latitude and freedom. Actually we hope that the various sects will act in accordance with the desire of the Prophet who said that the differences of opinion amongst his followers are a blessing. It is for us to make our differences a source of strength to Islam and Pakistan, not to exploit them for narrow interests which will weaken both Pakistan and Islam. Differences of opinion very often lead to cogent thinking and progress, but this happens only when they are not permitted to obscure our vision of the real goal, which is the service of Islam and the furtherance of its objects. It is, therefore, clear that this clause seeks to give the Muslims the opportunity that they have been seeking, throughout these long decades of decadence and subjection, of finding freedom to set up a polity, which may prove to be a laboratory for the purpose of demonstrating to the world that Islam is not only a progressive force in the world, but it also provides remedies for many of the ills from which humanity has been suffering.

In our desire to build up an Islamic society we have not ignored the rights of the non-Muslim. Indeed, it would have been un-Islamic to do so, and we would have been guilty of transgressing the dictates of our religion if we had tried to impinge upon the freedom of the minorities. In no way will they be hindered from professed or protecting their religion or developing their cultures. The history of the development of Islamic culture itself shows that the cultures of the minorities, who lived under the protection of Muslim States and empires, contributed to the richness of the heritage which the Muslims built up for themselves. I assure the minorities that we are fully conscious of the fact that if the minorities are able to make a contribution to the sum total of human knowledge and thought, it will redound to the credit of Pakistan and will enrich the life of the nation. Therefore, the minorities may look forward, not only to a period of the fullest freedom, but also to an understanding and appreciation on the part of the majority which has always been such a marked characteristic of Muslims throughout history.

Sir, the Resolution envisages a federal form of Government because such is the dictate of geography. It would be idle to think of a unitary form of Government when the two parts of our country are separated by more than a thousand miles. I, however, hope that the Constituent Assembly will make every effort to integrate the units closer and forge such ties as would make us a well-integrated nation. I have always advocated the suppression of provincial feelings, but I want to make it clear that I am not an advocate of dull uniformity. I believe that all the areas and units which form Pakistan should contribute to the richness of our national life. I do, however, want to make it clear that nothing should be permitted which, in any sense, tends to weaken national unity, and provision should be made for bringing about a closer relationship amongst the various sections of our population that exists today.) For this purpose the Constituent Assembly will have to think anew as to what will be the best method for the distribution of subjects between the Centre and the units, and how the units should be defined in our new set-up.

Mr. President, it has become fashionable to guarantee certain fundamental rights, but I assure you that it is not our intention to give these rights with one hand and take them away with the other. I have said enough to show that we want to build up a truly liberal Government where the greatest amount of freedom will be given to all its members. Everyone will be equal before the law, but this does not mean that his personal law will not be protected. We believe in the equality of status and justice. It is our firm belief, and we have said this from many a platform, that Pakistan does not stand for vested interests of the wealthy classes. It is our intention to build up an economy on the basic principles of Islam which seeks a better distribution of wealth and the removal of want. Poverty and backwardness—all that stands in the way of the achievement of his fullest stature by man—must be eradicated from Pakistan. At present our masses are poor and illiterate. We must raise their standards of life, and free them from the shackles of poverty and ignorance. So far as political rights are concerned, everyone will have a voice in the determination of the policy pursued by the Government and in electing those who will run the State, so that they may do so in the interests of the people. We believe that no shackles can be put on thought and, therefore, we do not intend to hinder any person from the expression of his views. Nor do we intend to deprive anyone of his right of forming associations for all lawful and moral purposes. In short, we want to base our polity upon freedom, progress and social justice. We want to do away with social distinctions, but we want to achieve this without causing suffering or putting fetters upon the human mind and lawful inclinations.

Sir, there are a large number of interests for which the minorities legitimately desire protection. This protection the Resolution seeks to provide. The backward and depressed classes are our special charge. We are fully conscious of the fact that they do not find themselves in their present plight for any fault of their own. It is also true that we are not responsible by any means for their present position. But now that they are our citizens, it will be our special effort to bring them up to the level of other citizens, so that they may bear the responsibilities imposed by their being citizens of a free and progressive State, and share them with others who have been more fortunate than themselves. We know that so long as any sections amongst our people are backward, they will be a drag upon society and, therefore, for the purpose of building up our State we must necessarily look to the interests of these sections.

Mr. President, in the end we firmly believe that by laying the foundations of our constitution on the principles enunciated in this Resolution, we shall be able to put Pakistan on the path of progress, and the day is not far distant when Pakistan will become a country of which its citizens, without distinction of class or creed, will be proud. I am confident that our people have great potentialities. Through their unparalleled sacrifices and commendable sense of discipline, displayed at the time of a grave disaster and crisis, they have earned the admiration of the world. Such a people, I am sure, not only deserves to live, but is destined to make a contribution to the welfare and progress of humanity. It is essential that it should keep alive its spirit of sacrifice, and its adherence to its noble-ideals, and Destiny itself will lead it to its place of glory in the affairs of the world, and make it immortal in the annals of humanity. Sir, this people has traditions of great achievement to its credit; its history is replete with deeds of glory; in every sphere of life it has contributed its full measure of achievement; its heroism adorn the pages of military chronicles; its administrators created traditions which have withstood the ravages of time; in creative art, its poetry, architecture and sense of beauty have won their tribute of appreciation; in the matter of spiritual greatness it has few parallels. It is this people which is again on the march, and, given the necessary opportunities, it will surpass its previous record of glorious achievement. This Objectives Resolution is the first step in the direction of the creation of an environment which will again awaken the spirit of the nation. We, whom Destiny has chosen to play a part, howsoever humble and insignificant, in this great drama of national resurrection, are overwhelmed with the magnitude of the opportunities which are before us. Let us use these opportunities with wisdom and foresight, and I have not the least doubt that these humble efforts will bear fruit far in excess of our wildest expectations, through the help of a Providence which has brought Pakistan into existence. It is not every day that great nations come into their own; it is not every day that peoples stand on the threshold of renaissance; it is not every day that Destiny beckons the down-trodden and the subjugated to rise and greet the dawn of a great future. It is the narrow streak of light heralding the brilliance of the full day, that we salute in the form of this Resolution.

ESSAY ON THE GENERATIVE PRINCIPLE OF POLITICAL CONSTITUTIONS

(By Joseph de Maistre)

I. THE FALLACY OF THE WRITTEN CONSTITUTION

[I.] One of the grand errors of an age, which professed them all, was, to believe that a political constitution could be written and created a priori; whilst reason and experience unite in establishing, that a constitution is a Divine work, and that that which is most fundamental, and most essentially constitutional, in the laws of a nation, is precisely what cannot be written.

[II.] It has often been supposed to be an excellent piece of pleasantries upon Frenchmen, to ask them in what book the Salic Law was written? But Jerome Gignon answered, very apropos, and probably without knowing the full truth of what he said, that it was written IN the hearts of Frenchmen. Let us suppose, in effect, that a law of so much importance existed only because it was written; it is certain that any authority whatsoever which may have written it, will have the right of annulling it; the law will not then have that character of sacredness and immutability which distinguishes laws truly constitutional. The essence of a fundamental law, is, that no one has the right to abolish it: now, how can it be above all, if any one has made it? The agreement of the people is impossible; and even if it should be otherwise, a compact is not a law, and binds nobody, unless there is a superior authority by which it is guaranteed.

Hence it is that the good sense of antiquity, happily anterior to sophisms, has sought, on every side, the sanction of laws, in a power above man, either in recognizing that sovereignty comes from God, or in revering certain unwritten laws as proceeding from him.

[IV.] Ask Roman history what was precisely the power of the Senate: she is silent, at least as to the exact limits of that power. We see, indeed, in general, that the power of the people and that of the Senate mutually balanced each other, and that the opposition was unceasing; we observe also that patriotism or weariness, weakness or violence, terminated these dangerous struggles: but we know no more about it.

[V.] The English Constitution is an example nearer to us, and, therefore, more striking. Whoever examines it with attention, will see that it goes only in not going (if this play upon words is permissible). It is maintained only by the exceptions. The habeas corpus, for example, has been so often and for so long time suspended, that it is doubted whether the exception has not become the rule. Suppose for a moment that the authors of this famous act had undertaken to fix the cases in which it should be suspended; they would ipso facto have annihilated it.

[VI.] At the sitting of the House of Commons, June 26, 1807, a lord cited the authority of a great statesman to show that the king had no right to dissolve Parliament during the session; but this opinion was contradicted: Where is the law? Attempt to make a law, and to fix exclusively by writing the case where the King has this right, and you will produce a revolution. The King, said one of the members, has this right when the occasion is important; but what is an important occasion? Try to decide this too by writing.

[VIII.] Towards the end of the last century, a great outcry was made against a Minister, who had conceived the project of introducing this same English Constitution (or what was called by that name) into a kingdom which was convulsed, and which demanded a constitution of some kind, with a sort of frenzy. He was wrong, if you please, so far at least as one can be wrong when he acts in good faith. But who at that time had the right of condemning him? If the principle is granted, that man can create a constitution, this Minister had the same right to make his own as well as another. Were the doctrine on this point doubted? Was it not believed, on all sides, that a constitution was the work of intelligence, like an ode or tragedy? Had not Thomas Paine declared, with a profoundness that charmed the Universities, that a constitution does not exist, so long as one cannot put it into his pocket? The eighteenth century, which distrusted itself in nothing, hesitated at nothing.

[IX.] The more we examine the influence of human agency in the formation of political constitutions, the greater will be our conviction that it enters there only in a manner infinitely subordinate, or as a simple instrument; and I do not believe there remains the least doubt of the incontestable truth of the following propositions:—

1. That the fundamental principles of political constitutions exist before all written law.
2. That a constitutional law is, and can only be, the development or sanction of an unwritten pre-existing right.
3. That which is most essential, most intrinsically constitutional, and truly fundamental, is never written, and could not be, without endangering the state.
4. That the weakness and fragility of a constitution are actually in direct proportion to the multiplicity of written constitutional articles.

[X.] We are deceived on this point by a sophism so natural, that it entirely escapes our attention. Because man acts, he thinks he acts alone; and because he has the consciousness of his liberty, he forgets his dependence. In the physical order, he listens to reason; for although he can, for example, plant an acorn, water it, etc., he is convinced that he does not make the oaks, because he witnesses their growth and perfection without the aid of human power; and moreover, that he does not make the acorn; but in the social order, where he is present, and acts, he fully believes that he is really the sole author of all that is done by himself. This is, in a sense, as if the trowel should believe itself the architect. Man is a free, intelligent, and noble being: without doubt; but he is not less an instrumental of God, according to a happy expression of Plutarch, in a beautiful passage which here introduces itself of its own accord:

*We must not wonder, he says, if the most beautiful and greatest things in the world are done by the will and providence of God; seeing that in all the greatest and principal parts of the world there is a soul: for the organ and tool of the soul is the body, and the soul is the INSTRUMENT OF GOD. And as the body has of itself many movements, and as the greater and more noble are derived from the soul, even so it is with the soul; some of its operations being self-moved, while in others it is directed, disciplined, and guided, by God, as it pleases Him; being itself the most beautiful organ and ingenious instrument possible: for it would be a strange thing indeed that the wind, the water, the clouds, and the rains, should be instruments of God, with which He nourishes and supports many creatures, and also destroys many others, and that He should never make use of living beings to perform any of His works. For it is far more reasonable that they depending entirely on the power of God, should obey His direction, and accomplish all His will, than that the bow should obey the Scythians, the lyre and flute the Greeks.*¹

No one could write better: and I do not believe that these beautiful reflections could be more justly applied, than to the formation of political constitutions, where it may be said, with equal truth, that man does every thing, and does nothing.

[XII.] Let us now consider some one political constitution, that of England, for example. It certainly was not made a priori. Her Statesmen never assembled themselves together and said, Let us create three powers, balancing them in such a manner, etc. No one of them ever thought of such a thing. The Constitution is the work of circumstances, and the number of these is infinite. Roman laws, ecclesiastical laws, feudal laws; Saxon, Norman, and Danish customs; the privileges, prejudices, and claims of all orders; wars, revolts, revolutions, the Conquest, Crusades; virtues of every kind, and all vices; knowledge of every sort, and all errors and passions;—all these elements, in short, acting together, and forming, by their admixture and reciprocal action, combinations multiplied by myriads of millions, have produced at length, after many centuries, the most complex unity, and happy equilibrium of political powers that the world has ever seen.

[XIII.] Now since these elements, thus projected into space, have arranged themselves in such beautiful order, without a single man, among the innumerable multitude who have acted in this vast field, having ever known what he had done relatively to the whole, nor foreseen what would happen, it follows, inevitably, that these elements were guided in their fall by an infallible hand, superior to man. The greatest folly, perhaps, in an age of follies, was in believing that fundamental laws could be written a priori, whilst they are evidently the work of a power above man; and whilst the very committing them to writing, long after, is the most certain sign of their nullity.

[XVII.] The English doubtless, would never have asked for the Great Charter, had not the privileges of the nation been violated; nor would they have asked for it, if these privileges had not existed before the Charter. What is true of the State, in this respect, is also true of the Church: if Christianity had never been attacked, there never would have been any writings to settle the dogmas; nor would the dogmas have been settled by writing, had they not pre-existed in their natural state, which is the oral.

[XIX.] These ideas (taken in their general sense) were not unknown to the ancient philosophers: they keenly felt the impotency, I had almost said the nothingness, of writing, in great institutions; but no one of them has seen this truth more clearly, or expressed it more happily, than Plato, whom we always find the first upon the track of all great truths. According to him, “the man who is wholly indebted to writing for his instruction, will only possess the appearance of wisdom.”² The word is to writing, what the man is to his portrait. The productions of the pencil present themselves to our eyes as living things; but if we interrogate them, they maintain a dignified silence. It is the same with writing, which knows not what to say to one man, nor what to cancel from another. If you attack it or insult it without a cause, it cannot defend itself; for its author is never present to sustain it. So that he who imagines himself capable of establishing, clearly and permanently, one single doctrine, by writing alone, is a GREAT BLOCK-HEAD. If he really possessed the true germs of truth, he would not indulge the thought, that with a little black liquid and a pen he could cause them to germinate in the world, defend them from the inclemency of the season, and communicate to them the necessary efficacy. As for the man who undertakes to write laws or civil constitutions, and who fancies that, because he has written them, he is able to give them adequate evidence and stability, whoever he may be, a private man or legislator, he disgraces himself, whether we say it or not; for he has proved thereby that he is equally ignorant of the nature of inspiration and delirium, right and wrong, good and evil. Now, this ignorance is a reproach, though the entire mass of the vulgar should unite in its praise.”

[XX.] After having heard the wisdom of the Gentiles, it will not be useless to listen further to Christian Philosophy.

“It were indeed desirable for us,” says one of the most eloquent of the Greek fathers, “never to have required the aid of the written word, but to have had the Divine precepts written only in our hearts, by grace, as they are written with ink in our books; but since we have lost this grace by our own fault, let us then, as, it is necessary, seize a plank instead of the vessel, without however forgetting the pre-eminence of the first state. God never revealed any thing in writing to the elect of the old Testament: He always spoke to them directly, because He saw the purity of their hearts; but the Hebrew people having fallen into the very abyss of wickedness, books and laws became necessary. The same proceeding is repeated under the empire of the New Revelation; for Christ did not leave a single writing to his Apostles. Instead of books, he promised to them the Holy Spirit: It is He, saith our Lord to them, who shall teach you what you shall speak. But because, in process of time, sinful men rebelled against the faith and against morality, it was necessary to have recourse to books.”³

II. THE NECESSITY FOR RELIANCE UPON GOD

[XXIV.] If the desires of a mere mortal were worthy of obtaining of Divine Providence one of those memorable decrees which constitute the grand epochs of history, I would ask Him to inspire some powerful nation, which had grievously offended Him, with the proud thought of constituting itself politically, beginning at the foundations. I would say, “Grant to this people every thing! Give to her genius, knowledge, riches, considerations, especially an unbounded confidence in herself, and that temper, at once pliant and enterprising which nothing can embarrass, nothing intimidate. Extinguish her old government; take away from her memory; destroy her affections; spread terror around her; blind or paralyze her enemies; give victory charge to watch at once over all her frontiers, so that none of her neighbors could meddle in her affairs, or disturb her in her operations. Let this nation be illustrious in science, rich in philosophy, intoxicated with human power, free from all prejudice, from every tie, and from all superior influence; bestow upon her every thing she shall desire, lest at some time she might say, this was wanting or that restrained me; let her, in short, act freely with this immensity of means, that at length she may become, under Thy inexorable protection, an eternal lesson to the human race.”

[XXV.] We cannot, it is true, expect a combination of circumstances which would constitute literally a miracle; but events of the same order, though less remarkable, have manifested themselves here and there in history, even in the history of our days; and, though they may not possess, for the purpose of example, that ideal force which I desired just now, they contain not less of memorable instruction.

We have been witnesses, within the last twenty-five years, of a solemn attempt made for the regeneration of a great nation mortally sick. It was the first experiment in the great work, and the preface, if I may be allowed to express myself thus, of the frightful book which we have been since called upon to read.

[XXVI.] But, it will be said, we know the causes which prevented the success of that enterprise. How then? Do you wish that God should send angels under human guises commissioned to destroy a constitution? It will always be necessary to employ second causes; this or that, what does it signify? Every instrument is good in the hands of the great Artificer; but such is the blindness of men, that if, to-morrow, some constitution-monger should come to organize a people, and to give them a constitution made with a little black liquid, the multitude would again hasten to believe in the miracle announced. It would be said, again, nothing is wanting; all is foreseen; all is written; whilst, precisely because all could be foreseen, discussed, and written, it would be demonstrated, that the constitution is a nullity, and presents to the eye merely an ephemeral appearance.

[XXVII.] I believe I have read, somewhere, that there are few sovereignties in a condition to vindicate the legitimacy of their origin. Admitting the reasonableness of the assertion, there will not result from it the least stain to the successors of a chief, whose acts might be liable to some objections. If it were otherwise, it would follow that the sovereign could not reign legitimately except by virtue of a deliberation of all the people, that is to say, by the grace of the people; which will never happen: for there is nothing so true, as that which was said by the author of the Considerations on France,⁴ that the people will always accept their masters, and will never choose them. It is necessary that the origin of sovereignty should manifest itself from beyond the sphere of human power; so that men, who may appear to have a direct hand in it, may be, nevertheless, only the circumstances. As to legitimacy, if it should seem in its origin to be obscure, God explains Himself, by His prime-minister in the department of this world,—TIME.

[XXX.] But, since every constitution is divine in its principle, it follows, that man can do nothing in this way, unless he reposes himself upon God, whose instrument he then becomes. Now, this is a truth, to which the whole human race in a body have ever rendered the most signal testimony. Examine history, which is experimental politics, and we shall there invariably find the cradle of nations surrounded by priests, and the Divinity constantly invoked to the aid of human weakness. Fable, much more true than ancient history, for eyes prepared, comes in to strengthen the demonstration. It is always an oracle, which founds cities; it is always an oracle, which announces the Divine protection, and successes of the heroic founder.

[XXXII.] The most famous nations of antiquity, especially the most serious and wise, such as the Egyptians, Etruscans, Latæ-daemonians, and Romans, had precisely the most religious constitutions; and the duration of empires has always been proportioned to the degree of influence which the religious principle had acquired in the political constitution: the cities and nations most addicted to Divine worship, have always been the most durable, and the most wise; as the most religious ages have also ever been most distinguished for genius.

[XL.] Not only does it not belong to man to create institutions, but it does not appear that his power, unassisted, extends even to change for the better institutions already established. The word reform, in itself, and previous to all examination, will be always suspected by wisdom, and the experience of every age justifies this sort of instinct. We know too well what has been the fruit of the most beautiful speculations of this kind.

[XLI.] To apply these general maxims to a particular case, it is from the single consideration of the extreme danger of innovations founded upon simple human theories, that, upon the great question of parliamentary reform, which has agitated minds in England so powerfully, and for so long a time, I find myself constrained to believe, that this idea is pernicious, and that if the English yield themselves too readily to it, they will have occasion to repent. But, say the partisans of reform, (for it is the grand argument,) the abuses are striking and incontestable: now can a formal abuse, a defect, be constitutional? Yes, undoubtedly, it can be; for every political constitution has its essential faults, which belong to its nature, and which it is impossible to separate from it; and, that which should make all reformers tremble, is that these faults may be changed by circumstances; so that in showing that they are new, we cannot prove that they are not necessary. What prudent man, then, will not shudder in putting his hand to the work? Social harmony, like musical concord, is subject to the law of temperament in the general key. Adjust the fifths accurately, and the octaves will jar, and conversely. The dissonance being then inevitable, instead of excluding it, which is impossible, it must be qualified by distribution. Thus, on both sides, imperfection is an element of possible perfection. In this proposition there is only the form of a paradox.

[XLII.] Voltaire, who spoke of every thing, during an age, without having so much as penetrated below the surface, has reasoned very humorously on the sale of the offices of the magistracy which occurred in France; and no instance, perhaps, could be more apposite to make us sensible of the truth of the theory which I am setting forth. That this is an abuse, says he, *is proved by the fact, that it originated in another abuse.*⁵ Voltaire does not mistake here as every man is liable to mistake. He shamefully mistakes. It is a total eclipse of common sense. Everything which springs from an abuse, an abuse! On the contrary; one of the most general and evident laws of this power, at once secret and striking which acts and makes itself to be felt on every side, is, that the remedy of an abuse springs from an abuse, and that the evil, having reached a certain point, destroys itself.

[XLIII.] The error of this great writer proceeds from the fact, that, divided between twenty sciences, as he himself somewhere confesses, and constantly occupied in communicating instruction to the world, he rarely gave himself time to think. "A dissipated and voluptuous court reduced to the greatest want by its foolish expenses, devises the sale of the offices of the magistracy, and thus creates" (what it never could have done freely, and with a knowledge of the cause,) "it creates," I say, "a rich magistracy, irremovable and independent; so that the infinite power playing in the world makes use of corruption for creating incorruptible tribunals" (as far as human weakness permits). There is nothing, indeed, so plausible to the eye of a true philosopher; nothing more conformable to great analogies, and to that incontestable law, which wills that the most important institutions should be the results not of deliberation, but of circumstances. Here is the problem almost solved when it is stated, as is the case with all problems. Could such a country as France be better judged than by hereditary magistrates? If it is decided in the affirmative, which I suppose, it will be necessary for me at once to propose a second problem which is this: the magistracy being necessarily hereditary, is there, in order to constitute it at first, and afterwards to recruit it, a mode more advantageous than that which fills the coffers of the sovereign with millions at the lowest price, and which assures, at the same time, the opulence, independence, and even the nobility (of a certain sort) of the supreme judges? If we only consider venality as a means to the right of inheritance, every just mind is impressed with this, which is the true point of view. This is not the place to enter fully into this question; but enough has been said to prove that Voltaire has not so much as perceived it.

[XLIV.] Let us now suppose a man like him at the head of affairs: he will not fail to act in accordance with his foolish theories of laws and of abuses. He will borrow at six and two thirds per cent. to reimburse his nominal incumbents, creditors at two per cent.: he will prepare minds by a multitude of paid writings, which will insult the magistracy and destroy public confidence in it. Soon Patronage, a thousand times more foolish than Chance, will open the long list of his blunders: the distinguished man, no longer perceiving in the right of inheritance a counterpoise to oppressive labours, will withdraw himself, never to return, and the great tribunals will be abandoned to adventures without name, without fortune, and without consideration.

[XLV.] Such is the natural picture of most reforms. Man in relation with his Creator is sublime, and his action is creative: on the contrary, so soon as he separates himself from God, and acts alone, he does not cease to be powerful, for this is a privilege of his nature; but his action is negative, and tends only to destroy.

[XLVI.] Withdrawn, by his vain sciences, from the single science which truly concerns him, man has believed himself endowed with power to create. He has believed,—he who has not the power of producing a single insect or a sprig of moss,—that he was the immediate author of Sovereignty, the most important, the most sacred, the most fundamental thing in the moral and political world; and that such a family, for example, reigns, because such a people wills it: while there are numerous and incontestable proofs, that every sovereign family reigns because it is chosen by a superior power. He has believed, that it was himself who invented languages; while, again, it belongs to him only to see that every human language is learned and never invented. He has believed that he could constitute nations; that is to say, in other terms, that he could create that national unity, by virtue of which one nation is not another. Finally, he has believed that, since he had the power of creating institutions, he had, with greater reason, that of borrowing them from other nations, and transferring them to his own country, all complete to his hand, with the name which they bore among the people from whom they were taken, in order, like those people, to enjoy them with the same advantages.

[LX.] If the formation of all empires, the progress of civilization, and the unanimous agreement of all history and tradition do not suffice still to convince us, the death of empires will complete the demonstration commenced by their birth. As it is the religious principle which has created every thing, so it is the absence of this same principle which has destroyed every thing. The sect of Epicurus, which might be called ancient incredulity, corrupted at first, and soon after destroyed every government which was so unfortunate as to give it admission. Every where Lucretius announced Cesar.

But all past experience disappears before the frightful example afforded by the last century. Still intoxicated with its fumes, men are very far from being, at least in general, sufficiently composed, to contemplate this example in its true light, and especially to draw from it the necessary conclusions. It is then very important to direct our whole attention to this terrible scene.

[LXIII.] It was only in the first part of the eighteenth century, that impiety became really a power. We see it at first extending itself on every side with inconceivable activity. From the palace to the cabin, it insinuates itself every where, and infests every thing. Soon a simple system becomes a formal association, which, by a rapid gradation, changes into a confederacy, and at length into a grand conspiracy which covers Europe.

[LXIV.] Then that character of impiety which belongs only to the eighteenth century, manifests itself for the first time. It is no longer the cold tone of indifference, or at most the malignant irony of scepticism; it is a mortal hatred; it is the tone of anger, and often of rage. The writers of that period, at least the most distinguished of them, no longer treat Christianity as an immaterial human error; they pursue it as a capital enemy; they oppose it to the last extreme; it is a war to the death.

[LXV.] However entire Europe having been civilized by Christianity, the civil and religious institutions were blended, and, as it were, amalgamated in a surprising manner. It was then inevitable that the philosophy of the age should unhesitatingly hate the social institutions, from which it was impossible to separate the religious principle. This has taken place: every government, and all the establishments of Europe, were offensive to it, because they were Christian; and in proportion as they were Christian, an inquietude of opinion, an universal dissatisfaction, seized all minds. In France, especially, the philosophic rage knew no bounds; soon a single formidable voice, forming itself from many voices united, is heard to cry, in the midst of guilty Europe.

[LXVI.] "Depart from us! Shall we then forever tremble before the priests, and receive from them such instruction as it pleases them to give us? TRUTH, throughout Europe, is concealed by the fumes of the censor; it is high time that she come out of this noxious cloud. We shall speak no more of Thee to our children; it is for them to know, when they shall arrive at manhood, whether there is such a Being as Thyself, and what Thou art, and what Thou requirest of them. Every thing which now exists, displeases us, because Thy name is written upon every thing that exists. We wish to destroy all, and to reconstruct the whole without Thee. Leave our councils, leave our schools, leave our houses; we would act alone: REASON suffices for us. Depart from us!"

How has God punished this execrable madness? He has punished it, as He created the light, by a single word. He spake, LET IT BE DONE!—and the political world has crumbled.

[LXVII.] Europe is guilty, for having closed her eyes against these great truths; and it is because she is guilty, that she suffers. Yet she still repels the light, and acknowledges not the arm which gives the blow. Few men, indeed, among this material generation, are in a condition to know the date, nature, and enormity, of certain crimes, committed by individuals, by nations, and by sovereignties; still less to comprehend the kind of expiation which these crimes demand, and the adorable prodigy which compels EVIL to purify, with its own hands, the place which the eternal architect has already measured by the eye for His marvelous constructions.

ORDER IV

ADVOCATES AND ATTORNEYS

1. A person qualified as hereinafter mentioned may apply to be enrolled as an Advocate in the Court and if his application is granted shall, on payment of the prescribed fee, be entitled to be so enrolled and to appear and plead before the Court.

2. The Roll of Advocates shall be in two parts, one containing the names of Senior Advocates and the other the names of other Advocates.

3. A Senior Advocate shall have precedence over other Advocates who are not Senior Advocates, and the provisions of the First Schedule to these Rules shall apply with respect to Senior and other Advocates.

4. A person shall not be entitled to be enrolled as an Advocate unless he is, and has been for not less than ten years in the case of a Senior Advocate or five years in the case of any other Advocate, enrolled as an advocate in the High Court of a Province.

In computing the said period of ten or five years the period during which a person was enrolled as an Advocate in a High Court in Pakistan before the Constitution Day or in any High Court in British India within three years next after the fourteenth day of August, 1947, may be taken into account by the Court.

The period during which a person was entitled as of right to practice as a vakil or pleader in a High Court in Pakistan before the Constitution Day or in a High Court in British India before the fourteenth day of August, 1947, immediately before his enrolment as an Advocate in that High Court, may be taken into account for the purpose of calculating the above-mentioned period of ten or five years.

5. A person who in the case of an appeal before the Court has appeared as counsel, advocate or vakil in that case in the Court from which the appeal is brought shall be entitled to appear and plead in the appeal, notwithstanding that he has not been enrolled as an Advocate in the Court, provided that an Advocate of the Supreme Court is briefed with him.

6. The Chief Justice and Judges may, if for any special reason they think it desirable so to do, permit the enrolment of any other person who is in their opinion sufficiently qualified, or permit such person to appear as an Advocate in a particular case.

7. No Advocate shall appear in any case, unless he is instructed by an Attorney.

8. The Roll of Advocates shall be kept by the Registrar and shall contain such particular as the Court may from time to time require.

9. All advocates appearing before the Court shall wear such robes and costume as may from time to time be directed by the Chief Justice.

10. The enrolment fee for Senior Advocates shall be Rs. 500, for other Advocates Rs. 250, and for an Attorney Rs. 100.

11. The Attorney-General for Pakistan shall have precedence over all Advocates in the Court.

12. The Advocates-General of West Pakistan and East Pakistan shall in that order have precedence immediately after the Attorney-General for Pakistan.

13. The Attorney-General for Pakistan and an Advocate-General shall by virtue of their offices have the status and precedence of a Senior Advocate in the Supreme Court, notwithstanding that their names are not contained in the Roll of Senior Advocates.

14. Subject to the preceding rules of this Order, an Advocate appearing before the Court shall have precedence among the Senior or other Advocates, as the case may be, according to the date of his enrolment as a Senior or other Advocate, as the case may be, in the Court.

Provided that the seniority of Senior or other Advocates as already determined under the relevant rules before the Constitution Day shall be maintained :

Any question which arises with respect to the precedence of any Advocate shall be determined by the Court.

15. A person may apply to be enrolled as an Attorney in the Court if he is entitled to practise as an Attorney or solicitor in any High Court or if he is entitled to appear and plead in a High Court, and if the application is granted shall on payment of the prescribed fee be entitled to be so enrolled.

Supreme Court Rules

16. An Attorney shall before enrolment subscribe before the Registrar a declaration, in such form as the Chief Justice may from time to time direct, undertaking to observe the rules, regulations, orders and practice of the Court and to pay all fees or charges due and payable in any cause, matter or appeal in the Court.

17. Every applicant for enrolment as an Advocate or Attorney shall produce an authenticated copy of his enrolment certificate in his own High Court and a certificate that he is still an/a Attorney/Solicitor/Advocate of that High Court.

18. Every Attorney shall have an office at the seat of the High Court in which he is enrolled as an/a Attorney/Solicitor/Advocate and shall notify the Registrar of the address of his office and of any change of address, and any notice, writ, summons or other document delivered or sent through post to the Attorney at the address so notified shall be deemed to have been properly served.

19. Two or more Attorneys may enter into partnership with one another, and any one of them may act in the name of the partnership, provided that the firm has an office at the seat of the Court and is registered with the Registrar. Any change in the composition of the firm shall be intimated to the Registrar.

20. An Attorney who wishes to have his name removed from the Roll of Attorneys shall apply by petition, verified by affidavit, entitled "In the matter of. an Attorney in this Court", and stating the date of his enrolment as an Attorney, the reason why he wishes his name to be removed, that no application or other proceeding in any Court is pending, or is likely to be instituted against him, and that no fees are owing to the Court for which he is personally responsible.

21. Every Attorney shall before acting on behalf of any person or party file in the Registry a power of Attorney in the prescribed form authorising him to act.

22. No person having an Attorney on the record shall file a power or warrant of Attorney authorising another Attorney to act for him in the same case save with the consent of the former Attorney or by leave of the Court, unless the former Attorney is dead, or is unable by reason of infirmity of mind or body to continue to act.

23. No Attorney may, without the leave of the Court, withdraw from the conduct of any case by reason only of the non-payment by his client of fees, costs and other charges.

24. Every Attorney on record shall be personally liable to the Court for due payment of all fees and charges payable to the Court.

25. No person having an Attorney on the record shall be heard in person save by special leave of the Court.

26. No Attorney shall authorise any person whatsoever, except another Attorney, to do any act in his name in any case. The authorisation shall be in writing.

27. Where a party changes his Attorney, the new Attorney shall give notice of the change to all parties concerned.

28. No advocate shall act as Attorney nor Attorney as Advocate in any circumstances whatsoever.

29. An Advocate or an Attorney who wishes to suspend his practice by reason of his appointment to any office of profit under the Government or his being engaged in another profession or for any other reason shall give intimation thereof to the Registrar.

30. The names of all Senior Advocates, other Advocates and Attorneys enrolled as such in the Federal Court of Pakistan immediately before the Constitution Day shall be deemed to be transferred to the respective Rolls of the Supreme Court.

31. Where on the complaint of any person or otherwise, the Court is of opinion that an Advocate has been guilty of misconduct or of conduct unbecoming an Advocate, the Court may take such disciplinary action against him as it may deem fit, and may report him to his own High Court. For purposes of this rule, an Advocate includes a Senior Advocate.

32. Where on the complaint of any person or otherwise, the Court is of opinion that an Attorney has been guilty of misconduct or has committed a breach of the undertaking given by him, the Court may take such disciplinary action against him as it may deem fit, and may report him to his own High Court, or other authority, if any, to which he is subject.

33. For the purpose of the last two preceding rules the Court shall in the first instance direct a summons to issue returnable before the Court or before a Special Bench to be constituted by the Chief Justice, requiring the Advocate or Attorney, as the case may be, to show cause against the matters alleged in the summons, and the summons shall, if possible, be served personally upon him with copies of any affidavit or statement before the Court at the time of the issue of the summons.

ORDER VI

NOTICES OF MOTION

1. Except where otherwise provided by Statute or prescribed by these Rules, all applications which in accordance with these Rules cannot be made in Chambers shall be made before the Court on motion after notice to the parties affected thereby. Where the delay caused by notice would or might entail prejudice or hardship an application may be made for an ad interim order ex parte, duly supported by an affidavit, and the Court, if satisfied that the delay caused by notice would entail prejudice or hardship, may make order ex parte upon such terms as to costs or otherwise, and subject to such undertaking, if any, as the Court may think just, pending orders on the main application by notice of motion.

2. A notice of motion shall be intituled in the suit or matter in which the application is intended to be made and shall state the time and place of application and the nature of the order asked for and shall be addressed to the party or parties intended to be affected by it and their Attorney or Attorneys, if any, and shall be signed by the Attorney of the party moving, or by the party himself where he acts in person.

3. Save by special leave of the Court the notice of motion together with the affidavit in support thereof, shall be served on the opposite party not less than 8 days before the day appointed for the motion and the affidavit of service shall be filed in the Registry at least 3 days before the day appointed for the motion. Counter affidavits, if any, shall be filed in the Registry during office hours not later than 3-30 P.M. on the day preceding the day of hearing and copies of these affidavits shall be served on the other parties to the notice of motion and the affidavits shall not be accepted in the Registry unless they contain an endorsement of service signed by the other party or parties.

4. Notice shall be given to the other party or parties of all grounds intended to be urged in support of, or in opposition to, any motion.

5. Save by leave of the Court, no affidavit in support of the application beyond those specified in the notice of motion, nor any affidavit in answer or reply filed later than the time prescribed in these Rules shall be used at the hearing or allowed on taxation.

6. Unless otherwise ordered the costs of a motion in a suit or proceeding shall be treated as costs in that suit or proceeding.

ORDER VII

DOCUMENTS

1. The officers of the Court shall not receive any pleading, petition, affidavit or other document, except original exhibits and certified copies of public documents, unless it is fairly and legibly transcribed on one side of standard petition paper, demy-foolscap size.

2. No document in a language other than English shall be exhibited or used for the purpose of any proceedings before the Court, unless it has been translated in accordance with these Rules.

3. Every document required to be translated shall be translated by a translator nominated or approved by the Court on payment of prescribed fees.

4. Every translator shall, before acting, make an oath or affirmation that he will translate correctly and accurately all documents given to him for translation, and at the end of the document he shall certify in writing, signed by him, that the translation is correct.

5. Except as otherwise provided in these Rules, all plaints, petitions, appeals and other documents shall be presented in person by the party or by an Attorney duly appointed by the party for the purpose.

6. Except as otherwise specially provided in these Rules or by any law for the time being in force, the court fees set out in the Third Schedule to these Rules shall be payable on all documents mentioned therein.

Supreme Court Rules

7. The Registrar may decline to receive any document which is presented otherwise than in accordance with these Rules.

ORDER VIII

AFFIDAVITS

1. The Court may at any time, for sufficient reason, order that any particular fact or facts may be proved by affidavit, or that the affidavit of any witness may be read at the hearing, on such conditions as the Court thinks reasonable :

Provided that no such order shall be passed where it appears to the Court that either party bona fide desires the production of a witness for cross-examination and that such witness can be produced, without unreasonable delay or expense.

2. Upon any application evidence may be given by affidavit ; but the Court may, at the instance of other party, order the attendance for cross-examination of the deponent, in Court, unless he is exempted from personal appearance or the Court otherwise directs.

3. Every affidavit shall be intituled in the cause matter or appeal in which it is sworn.

4. Every affidavit shall be drawn up in the first person, and shall be divided into paragraphs to be numbered consecutively, and shall state the description, occupation, if any, and the true place of abode of the deponent.

5. Affidavits shall be confined to such facts as the deponent is able of his own knowledge to prove, except on interlocutory applications, on which statement of his belief may be admitted, provided that the grounds thereof are stated.

6. The costs occasioned by any unnecessary prolixity in the title to an affidavit or otherwise shall be disallowed by the Taxing Officer.

7. An affidavit requiring interpretation to the deponent shall be interpreted by an interpreter nominated or approved by the Court, if made at the seat of the Court, and if made elsewhere shall be interpreted by a competent person who shall certify that he has correctly interpreted the affidavit to the deponent.

8. Affidavits for the purposes of any cause, matter or appeal before the Court may be sworn before any authority mentioned in section 139 of the Code or before the Registrar of this Court, or before a commissioner generally or specially authorised in that behalf by the Chief Justice.

9. Where the deponent is a purdahnashin lady she shall be identified by a person to whom she is known and that person shall prove the identification by a separate affidavit.

10. Every exhibit annexed to an affidavit shall be marked with the title and number of the cause, matter or appeal and shall be initialled and dated by the authority before whom it is sworn.

11. No affidavit having any interlineation, alteration or erasure shall be filed in Court unless the interlineation or alteration is initialled, or unless in the case of an erasure the words or figures written on the erasure are rewritten in the margin and initialled by the authority before whom the affidavit is sworn.

12. The Registrar may refuse to receive an affidavit where in his opinion the interlineations, alterations or erasures are so numerous as to make it expedient that the affidavit should be rewritten.

13. Where a special time is limited for filing affidavits, no affidavit filed after that time shall be used except by leave of the Court.

14. In this Order "affidavit" includes a petition or other document required to be sworn and "sworn" shall include "affirmed".

ORDER IX

INSPECTION, SEARCH, ETC.

1. Subject to the provisions of these Rules a party to any cause, matter or appeal who has appeared shall be allowed to search, inspect or get copies of all pleadings and other documents or records in the case, on payment of the prescribed fees and charges.

2. The Court, at the request of a person not a party to the cause, matter or appeal, may on good cause shown allow such search or inspection or grant such copies as is or are mentioned in the last preceding rule, on payment of the prescribed fees and charges.

3. A search or inspection under the last two preceding rules during the pendency of a cause, matter or appeal, shall be allowed only in the presence of an officer of the Court and after twenty four hours' notice in writing to the parties who have appeared and copies of documents shall not be allowed to be taken, but notes of the search or inspection may be made.

Supreme Court Rules

4. Copies required under any of the preceding rules of this Order may be certified as correct copies by any officer of the Court authorised in that behalf by the Registrar.

5. No record or document filed in any cause, matter or appeal shall, without the leave of the Court, be taken out of the custody of the Court.

ORDER X

JUDGMENTS, DECREES AND ORDERS

1. The Court, after the case has been heard, shall pronounce judgment in open Court, either at once or on some future day, of which due notice shall be given to the parties or their Attorneys, and the decree or order shall be drawn up in accordance therewith.

2. Subject to the provisions contained in Order XXVI a judgment pronounced by the Court or by a majority of the Court or by a dissenting Judge in open Court shall not afterwards be altered or added to, save for the purpose of correcting a clerical or arithmetical mistake or an error arising from any accidental slip or omission.

3. Certified copies of the judgment, decree or order shall be furnished to the parties on application made for the purpose and at their expense.

4. Every decree or order made by the Court shall be drawn up in the Registry and be signed by the Registrar or Deputy Registrar or Assistant Registrar and sealed with the Seal of the Court and shall bear the same date as the judgment.

5. Every order made by the Registrar or other officer shall be drawn up in the Registry and signed by the Registrar or other officer as the case may be.

6. Save as otherwise provided in these Rules, no decree or order in civil proceedings shall be drawn up until applied for by a party unless the Court so directs.

7. In cases of doubt or difficulty with regard to a decree or order made by the Court, the Registrar shall, before issuing the draft, submit the same to the Judge in Chambers.

8. Where a draft of any decree or order is required to be settled in the presence of the parties, the Registrar shall by notice in writing appoint a time for settling the same and the parties shall attend accordingly and produce their briefs and such other documents as may be necessary to enable the draft to be settled.

9. Where any party is dissatisfied with any decree or order as settled by the Registrar, the Registrar shall not proceed to complete the decree or order without allowing that party sufficient time to apply by motion to the Court.

10. The decree passed or order made in every appeal and a direction or writ issued in any matter by the Court shall be transmitted by the Registrar to the Court, tribunal or other authority concerned from whose judgment, decree or order the appeal or matter was brought, and any such decree, order or direction shall be executed and enforced as if it had been made and issued by the High Court of the appropriate Province.

11. Any order as to the costs of proceedings in the Court, as soon as the amount of the costs to be paid is ascertained, shall be transmitted by the Registrar to the Court or tribunal appealed from or to any other authority concerned, and shall be given effect to by that Court, tribunal or authority as if it were an order made by the High Court of the appropriate Province.

12. If any question arises as to which High Court shall give effect to the decree, order, direction or writ of this Court, it shall be decided by the Court.

ORDER XI

CONSTITUTION OF BENCHES

Save as provided by law or by these Rules, every cause, appeal or matter shall be heard and disposed of by a bench consisting of not less than three Judges to be nominated by the Chief Justice :

Provided that petitions for special leave to appeal shall be heard and disposed of by a bench of two Judges, but the Chief Justice may, in a fit case, refer any petition to a larger bench :

Provided further that if the Judges hearing the petition are equally divided in opinion the petition shall be laid for hearing and disposal before another Judge to be nominated by the Chief Justice.

PART II APPELLATE JURISDICTION

ORDER XII

CIVIL APPEALS

1. The provisions of Order XLV of the Code and of any rules made for the purpose by the High Court

Supreme Court Rules

concerned so far as may be applicable, shall apply in relation to appeals preferred to the Court under Articles 157 and 158 of the Constitution :

Provided that the Court may from time to time issue to High Courts any special directions for the purpose of presentation of appeals to the Supreme Court.

2. Where there are two or more appeals arising out of the same matter, and the High Court is of opinion that it would be for the convenience of this Court and all parties concerned that the appeals should be consolidated, the High Court may direct the appeals to be consolidated and make such order for security of costs as it may deem fit.

3. The security to be furnished under rule 7(1) (a) of Order XLV of the Code shall, unless otherwise ordered by the High Court, be in the sum of rupees two thousand :

Provided that the Court appealed from may, if it thinks fit in any appropriate case, require security to a larger amount, but in no case exceeding rupees five thousand.

4. Where the appellant, having obtained a certificate for the admission of an appeal from the High Court, fails to furnish the security or make the deposit required for the preparation and printing of the record, the High Court may, either on its own motion or on an application in that behalf made by the respondent, cancel the certificate for the admission of the appeal and may give such directions as to the costs of the appeal as it shall think fit and make such further or other order as the justice of the case requires.

5. An appellant who has obtained a certificate from the High Court may, at any time prior to the making of an order admitting the appeal, withdraw the appeal on such terms as to costs or otherwise as the High Court may direct.

6. Where an appellant whose appeal has been admitted desires, prior to the dispatch of the record to this Court, to withdraw his appeal, the High Court may upon an application in that behalf made by the appellant, grant him a certificate to the effect that the appeal has been withdrawn, and the appeal shall thereupon be deemed, as from the date of such certificate, to stand dismissed without an express order of this Court, and the costs of the appeal and the security entered into by the appellant shall be dealt with in such manner as the High Court may think fit to direct.

7. The liability of the parties to pay court-fee in this Court, unless otherwise ordered by this Court, shall not be affected by any order for consolidation of appeals made by the High Court or by this Court.

ORDER XIII

PETITIONS FOR SPECIAL LEAVE TO APPEAL IN CIVIL PROCEEDINGS

1. A petition for special leave to appeal shall be lodged in this Court within thirty days from the date of the refusal of leave to appeal by the High Court, or within sixty days of the judgment or order sought to be appealed from :

Provided that the Court may for sufficient cause extend the time.

2. Where the High Court has refused to give a certificate as provided in Article 157(1) and 158(c) of the constitution a petition for special leave to appeal shall be lodged in this Court within thirty days from the date of refusal of grant of the said certificate :

Provided that the Court may for sufficient cause extend the time.

3. A petition for special leave to appeal shall state succinctly and clearly all such facts as it may be necessary to state in order to enable the Court to determine whether such leave ought to be granted, and shall be signed by the counsel and attorney for the petitioner or by the party himself if he appears in person. The petition shall deal with the merits of the case only so far as is necessary for the purpose of explaining and supporting the particular grounds upon which special leave to appeal is sought. The petition shall also state whether the petitioner moved the High Court concerned for leave to appeal against its decision, and if so, with what result.

4. The petitioner shall lodge at least six copies of—

- (i) his petition for special leave to appeal,
- (ii) the judgment and order sought to be appealed from and the order of the High Court refusing leave to appeal, one copy each of which shall be certified to be correct,
- (iii) the affidavit in support of allegations of fact prescribed by rule 4 of Order XVIII hereinafter contained, and
- (iv) unless a caveat as prescribed by Order XVIII, rule 2, has been lodged by the other party who appeared in the court below, an affidavit of service of notice of the intended petition upon such party.

Supreme Court Rules

The petitioner shall, on demand, furnish to other parties, at their expense on the prescribed charges, copies of all or any of the documents filed by him in the Court.

5. Save in cases where caveat as prescribed by rule 2 of Order XVIII has been lodged by the other party who appeared in the Court, appealed from, petitions for special leave to appeal shall be heard ex parte, but the Court may direct the petitioner to issue notice to the other party as it may deem fit, and adjourn the hearing of the petition which shall be posted for hearing after service of notice on the party concerned and upon affidavit of service by the petitioner. Where the other party who has appeared in the Court appealed from has lodged a caveat as aforesaid, notice of the hearing of the petition shall be given to the caveator, but a caveator shall not be entitled to costs of the petition unless the Court otherwise orders.

6. Where the Court grants special leave to appeal, it shall, in its order, specify the amount of the security for costs (if any) to be lodged by the petitioner, up to a maximum of Rs. 5,000, and the time within which such security is to be lodged, and shall, unless the circumstances of a particular case render such a course unnecessary, provide for the transmission of the printed record by the Registrar of the Court appealed from to the Registrar of this Court, and for such further matters, as the justice of the case may require. Unless the Court specially directs otherwise, any security for costs to be furnished by the petitioner, shall be lodged in the Court from whose judgment special leave to appeal has been granted, and that Court shall deal with such security in accordance with the directions contained in the order of this Court when determining the appeal.

7. Where security is required to be furnished in this Court it shall be given to the Registrar or to such other officer as the Court may specially direct, and the Court may permit or order him to assign the same to any other person for the purpose of enforcing it upon such terms as the Court may think fit.

8. Where the appellant has lodged security for the respondent's costs of an appeal in the Registry of the Court, the Registrar of the Court shall deal with such security in accordance with the directions contained in the Court's order determining the appeal.

9. After the grant of special leave to appeal by this Court, the Registrar shall transmit a certified copy of the order to the Registrar of the Court appealed from.

10. On receipt of the said order, the Court appealed from shall, in the absence of any special directions in the order, act in accordance with the provisions contained in Order XLV of the Code, so far as applicable.

11. Where an appellant who has obtained special leave to appeal desires, prior to the despatch of the record to this Court, to withdraw his appeal, the Court appealed from may, upon an application in that behalf made by the appellant, grant him a certificate to the effect that the appeal has been withdrawn and the appeal shall thereupon be deemed as from the date of such certificate to stand dismissed without an express order of this Court and the costs of the appeal and the security entered into by the appellant shall be dealt with in such manner as the Court appealed from may think fit to direct. A copy of the said certificate shall be forwarded to the Registrar of this Court.

12. Where the security is to be deposited in the Court appealed from, the Registrar of that Court as soon as the deposit is made, intimate the fact and the date of such deposit to the Registrar of this Court; where the deposit is not made within the time fixed, or within such further time as may be granted by this Court, the Registrar of the Court appealed from shall forthwith report the default to the Registrar of this Court.

13. Upon receipt of an intimation in this behalf from the Registrar of the Court appealed from or where the security is to be deposited in this Court upon default of the petitioner in depositing the same within the time fixed or such further time as the Court may deem fit to grant, the Registrar shall, after notice to the Attorney for the petitioner, post the matter before the Court for orders in regard to the default on the part of the petitioner in furnishing security, and the Court may thereupon rescind the order granting special leave to appeal or make such other order as it thinks fit.

14. Save as otherwise provided by the preceding rules of this Order, the provisions of Order XVIII hereinafter contained shall apply mutatis mutandis to petitions for special leave to appeal.

15. The provision contained in Order XXII shall apply as far as applicable in the case of any person seeking special leave to appeal to the Court as a pauper.

ORDER XIV

PREPARATION OF RECORD, ETC.

1. As soon as the appeal has been admitted whether by an order of the Court appealed from or by an order of this Court granting special leave to appeal, the appellant shall, without delay, take all necessary steps to have the printed record transmitted to the Registrar of this Court, and the Registrar of the Court appealed from shall, with all convenient speed, certify to the Registrar of this Court that the respondent has received notice, or is otherwise aware, of the order of the Court appealed from admitting the appeal, or of the order of this Court giving the appellant special leave to appeal.

Supreme Court Rules

2. Where an appellant whose appeal has been admitted by an order of the Court appealed from fails to show due diligence in taking all necessary steps in connection with the preparation of the record, the High Court may, either on its own motion, or on the application of the respondent, call upon the appellant to show cause why a certificate should not be issued that the appeal has not been effectually prosecuted by the appellant, and if the High Court sees fit to issue such a certificate the appeal shall be deemed, as from the date of such certificate, to stand dismissed for non-prosecution without an express order of this Court, and the costs of the appeal and the security entered into by the appellant shall be dealt with in such manner as the High Court thinks fit to direct. A copy of the said certificate shall be forwarded to the Registrar of this Court.

3. Where the appellant, who has obtained special leave to appeal by an order of this Court, fails to have the printed record transmitted to this Court with due diligence, the Registrar shall call upon the appellant to explain his default, and, if no explanation is offered, or if the explanation offered is, in the opinion of the said Registrar, insufficient, the said Registrar may issue a summons to the appellant calling upon him to show cause before this Court at a time to be specified in the said summons why the special leave to appeal should not be rescinded. The respondent shall be entitled to be heard before this Court in the matter of the said summons and to ask for his costs and such other relief as he may be advised. The Court may, after considering the matter of the said summons rescind the grant of special leave to appeal, or give such other directions as the justice of the case may require.

4. In the preparation of the printed record for purposes of this Court, the Court appealed from may include the printed paper books prepared for its own use at the earlier stage, if sufficient number of such paper books are available.

5. Where the decision of the appeal is likely to turn exclusively on a question of law, the appellant may, after notice to the respondent and with the sanction of the Court appealed from, print such parts only of the record as may be necessary for the discussion of the same.

6. Save as otherwise provided in the last preceding rule, the Registrar of the Court appealed from, as well as the parties or their attorneys, shall endeavour to exclude from the record all documents (more particularly such as are merely formal) that are not relevant for the decision of the appeal, and, generally to reduce the bulk of the record as far as practicable, taking special care to avoid duplication of documents and unnecessary repetition of headings and other merely formal parts of documents; but the documents omitted to be printed, shall be enumerated in a typewritten list to be transmitted with the record.

7. Where in the course of the preparation of the record one party objects to the inclusion of a document on the ground that it is unnecessary or irrelevant and the other party nevertheless insists upon its being included, the record as finally printed shall, with a view to the subsequent adjustment of the costs of, and incidental to, such documents, indicate, in the index of papers, or otherwise, the fact that, and the party by whom, the inclusion of the document was objected to.

8. The record shall be arranged, prepared and printed under the supervision of the Registrar of the Court appealed from in accordance with the rules embodied in the Fifth Schedule to these Rules, and the parties may submit any disputed question arising in connection therewith to the decision of that Court, and it shall give such directions thereon as the justice of the case may require.

9. When the record has been ready, the Registrar of the Court appealed from shall—

(i) at the expense of the appellant transmit to the Registrar of this Court such number of copies as the Court may direct, or in the absence of any special direction in this behalf, 20 copies of such record, and of which copies he shall certify to be correct by signing his name on, or intalling every eight page thereof and by affixing thereto the Seal of the Court appealed from;

(ii) give notice of the despatch of the record to the parties; and

(iii) send to the Registrar of this Court a certificate as to the date or dates on which the notice under the preceding clause (ii) has been served.

10. As soon as the record is received in the Registry of this Court, it shall be registered in the Registry with the date of arrival, and the names of the parties. Appeals shall be numbered consecutively in each year in the order in which the records are received in the Registry.

11. Each party who has entered an appearance shall be entitled to receive for his own use, three copies of the record.

12. Subject to any special direction from the Court to the contrary, the costs of, and incidental to, the printing of the record shall form part of the costs of the appeal, but the costs of, and incidental to, the printing of any document objected to by one party, in accordance with rule 7 above shall, if such document is found, on the taxation of costs, to be unnecessary or irrelevant, be disallowed to, or borne by, the party insisting or including the same in the record.

Supreme Court Rules

ORDER XV

APPELLANT'S APPEARANCE AND LODGING OF PETITION OF APPEAL

1. The appellant shall enter an appearance before taking any step in the prosecution of the appeal, and after entering such appearance shall forthwith give notice thereof to the respondent and shall endorse a copy of the same to the Registrar.

2. The appellant shall lodge his petition of appeal within a period of 30 days from the date of the service upon him of notice of dispatch of the record by the Registrar of the Court appealed from.

3. The petition of appeal shall be lodged in the form prescribed by Order XVIII, rule 1, hereinafter contained. It shall recite succinctly and, as far as possible, in chronological order, the principal steps in the proceedings leading up to the appeal from the commencement thereof down to the admission of the appeal, but shall not contain argumentative matter or travel into the merits of the case. It shall contain at the foot of it a memorandum of the valuation of the appeal with particulars showing how the valuation has been arrived at and where the appeal is incapable of valuation, it shall be so stated.

4. The appellant shall, after lodging his petition of appeal, serve a copy thereof without delay on the respondent, with the date of the lodgment, and endorse the same to the Registry:

Provided that the Registrar may dispense with service of the petition of appeal on any respondent who was ex parte in the proceedings in the Court appealed from or on his legal representative but an order dispensing with service shall not preclude any respondent or his legal representative from appearing to contest the appeal.

5. Where a party desires to appeal on grounds which can be raised only with the leave of the Court, the petition of appeal shall be accompanied by a separate petition indicating the grounds so proposed to be raised and praying for leave to appeal on those grounds and the petition shall, unless the Court otherwise directs, be heard at the same time as the appeal.

ORDER XVI

WITHDRAWAL OF APPEAL, NON-PROSECUTION OF APPEAL, CHANGE OF PARTIES

1. Where an appellant, who has not lodged his petition of appeal, desires to withdraw his appeal, he shall make an application to that effect to the Registrar of this Court, and the said appeal shall thereupon stand dismissed as from the date of the said application without any further order from the Court. The Registrar shall, with all convenient speed, after receipt of such application, by letter notify the Registrar of the Court appealed from that the appeal has been withdrawn and stands dismissed. The costs of the appeal and the security entered into by the appellant shall then be dealt with in such manner as the Court appealed from may think fit to direct.

2. Where an appellant, who has lodged his petition of appeal, desires to withdraw his appeal, he shall present a petition to that effect to the Court. On the hearing of any such petition a respondent may apply to the Court for his costs.

3. If an appellant fails to take any steps in the appeal within the time fixed for the same by these Rules or, if no time is specified, it appears to the Registrar of this Court that the appellant is not prosecuting his appeal with due diligence, the Registrar shall call upon him to explain his default and, if no explanation, or no explanation which appears to the Registrar to be sufficient, is offered, he may issue a summons calling upon the appellant to show cause to the Court why the appeal should not be dismissed for want of prosecution.

4. The Registrar shall send a copy of the summons mentioned in the last preceding rule to every respondent who has entered an appearance and every such respondent shall be entitled to be heard before the Court and to ask for his costs and other relief.

5. The Court may, after hearing the parties, dismiss the appeal for non-prosecution or give such other directions thereon as the justice of the case may require.

6. An appellant whose appeal has been dismissed for non-prosecution may, within thirty days of the order, present a petition praying that the appeal may be restored and the Court may, after giving notice of such application to the respondent, who had entered appearance in the appeal, restore the appeal, if sufficient cause is shown, on such terms as to costs or otherwise as it thinks fit or pass such other order as the circumstances of the case and the ends of justice may require.

7. Where at any time between the admission of an appeal and the dispatch of the record to this Court, the record becomes defective by reason of the death, or change of status of a party to the appeal, or for any other reason, the Court appealed from may, notwithstanding the admission of the appeal, on an application in that behalf made by any person interested, grant a certificate showing who, in the opinion of the said Court, is the proper person to be substituted or entered on the record, in place of, or in addition to the party on record, and the name of such person shall thereupon be deemed to be so substituted or entered on the record as aforesaid without an express order of this Court.

8. Where the record subsequent to its despatch to this Court becomes defective by reason of the death, or change of status of a party, to the appeal, or for any other reason, the Court appealed from shall, upon an application in that behalf made by any person interested, cause a certificate to be transmitted to the Registrar of this Court showing who, in the opinion of the Court appealed from, is the proper person to be substituted, or entered on the record, in place of, or in addition to, the party on record. A copy of the application made in the High Court in this behalf shall be endorsed to this Court.

9. An application to bring on record the legal representatives of the deceased appellant or respondent shall be made within ninety days of the death of the said appellant or respondent :

Provided that the Court appealed from may for sufficient cause extend the time.

10. A petition for an Order of Revivor or Substitution shall be accompanied by a certificate from the Court appealed from showing who, in the opinion of the said Court, is the proper person to be substituted, or entered, on the record in place of, or in addition to, the party on record.

ORDER XVII

APPEARANCE BY RESPONDENT

1. The respondent shall enter an appearance within thirty days of the receipt of the notice served on him under Order XIV, rule 9(ii); but he may enter an appearance at any time before the hearing of the appeal on such terms as the Court thinks fit.

2. The respondent shall forthwith after entering an appearance give notice thereof to the appellant and endorse a copy of such notice to the Registry.

3. Where there are two or more respondents, and only one, or some of them enter an appearance, the Appearance Form shall set out the names of the appearing respondents.

4. Two or more respondents may, at their own risk as to costs, enter separate appearances in the same appeal.

5. A respondent who has not entered an appearance shall not be entitled to receive any notices relating to the appeal from the Registrar of this Court, nor be allowed to lodge a concise statement in the appeal.

6. Where a respondent fails to enter an appearance in an appeal the following Rules shall, subject to any special order of the Court to the contrary, apply :—

(a) if the non-appearing respondent was a respondent at the time when the appeal was admitted, whether by an order of the Court appealed from or by an order of this Court giving the appellant special leave to appeal, and it appears from a certificate of the Registrar of the Court appealed from that the said non-appearing respondent has received notice of the despatch of the record to this Court, the appeal may, if all other conditions of its being set down are satisfied, be set down ex parte as against the said, non-appearing respondent at any time after the expiration of sixty days from the date of the lodging of petition of appeal.

(b) if the non-appearing respondent was made a respondent by an order of this Court subsequent to the admission of the appeal, and it appears from the record, or from a supplementary record, or from a certificate of the Registrar of the Court appealed from, that the said non-appearing respondent has received notice of his being brought on the record as a respondent, the appeal may, if all other conditions of its being set down are satisfied, be set down ex parte as against the said non-appearing respondent at any time after the expiration of sixty days from the date of his having been served with a copy of the order of this Court bringing him on the record as a respondent :

Provided that where it is shown to the satisfaction of this Court, by affidavit or otherwise, either that an appellant has made every reasonable endeavour to serve a non-appearing respondent with the notices of entering appearance and lodging petition of appeal and has failed to effect such service or that it is not the intention of the non-appearing respondent to enter an appearance to the appeal, the appeal may, without further order in that behalf and at the risk of the appellant, be proceeded with ex parte as against the said non-appearing respondent :

Provided further that if it is certified by the Court appealed from that a respondent intentionally evades service of notice of despatch of the record to this Court or that the said notice cannot be served in the ordinary way, the appeal may, if the Court is satisfied on receipt of an intimation to that effect from the Court appealed from, be set down ex parte as against the said non-appearing respondent after the expiration of sixty days of the lodging of the petition of appeal.

ORDER XVIII

PETITIONS GENERALLY

1. All petitions shall consist of paragraphs numbered consecutively and shall be fairly and legibly written, typewritten, or lithographed on one side of standard petition paper demy-foolscap size or on paper ordinarily used in High Courts for transcribing petitions, with quarter margin and endorsed with the name of the Court appealed from, the full title and Supreme Court number of the appeal to which the petition relates, or the full title of the petition (as the case may be) and the name and address of the Attorney (if any) of the petitioner or of the petitioner where the petitioner intends to appear in person. Unless the petition is a Consent Petition within the meaning of rule 8 of this Order at least six copies thereof shall be lodged.

2. Where a petition is expected to be lodged, or has been lodged, which does not relate to any pending appeal of which the record has been registered in the Registry of this Court, any person claiming a right to appear before this Court on the hearing of such petition may lodge a caveat in the matter thereof, and shall thereupon be entitled to receive from the Registrar notice of the lodging of the petition, if at the time of the lodging of the caveat such petition has not yet been lodged, and, if and when the petition has been lodged, to require the petitioner to serve him with a copy of the petition and to furnish him, at his own expense, with copies of any papers lodged by the petitioner in support of his petition. The caveat shall forthwith, after lodging his caveat, give notice thereof to the petitioner, if the petition has been lodged.

3. Where a petition is lodged in the matter of any pending appeal of which the record has been registered in the Registry of this Court, the petitioner shall serve any party who has entered an appearance in the appeal, with a copy of such petition and the party so served shall thereupon be entitled to require the petitioner to furnish him, at the expense of the said party, with copies of any papers lodged by the petitioner in support of his petition.

4. A petition not relating to any appeal of which the record has been registered in the Registry of this Court, and any other petition containing allegations of fact which cannot be verified by reference to the registered record or any certificate or duly authenticated statement of the Court appealed from, shall be supported by affidavit. Where the petitioner prosecutes his petition in person, the said affidavit shall be sworn by the petitioner himself and shall state that, to the best of the deponent's knowledge, information and belief, the allegations contained in the petition are true. Where the petitioner is represented by an Attorney, the said affidavit may be sworn by such Attorney and shall, besides stating that, to the best of the deponent's knowledge, information and belief, the allegations contained in the petition are true, show how the deponent obtained his instructions and the information enabling him to present the petition.

5. The Registrar may refuse to receive a petition on the grounds that it discloses no reasonable cause of appeal, or is frivolous or contains scandalous matter, but the petitioner may appeal, by way of motion, from such refusal to the Court within fourteen days.

6. As soon as a petition and all necessary documents are lodged, the petition shall thereupon be deemed to be admitted.

7. Subject to the provisions of rule 5 of Order XIII, and the next following rule, the Registrar shall, as soon as the Court has appointed a day for the hearing of a petition, notify all parties concerned of the day so appointed.

8. Where the prayer of a petition is consented to in writing by the opposite party, or where a petition is of a formal and non-contentious character, the Court may, if it thinks fit, make an order thereon, without requiring the attendance of the opposite party, and the Registrar shall not in any such case issue notice as provided by the last preceding rule, but shall, with all convenient speed, after the Court has made its order notify the parties concerned that the order has been made and of the date and nature of such order.

9. A petitioner who desires to withdraw his petition shall give notice in writing to that effect to the Registrar. Where the petition is opposed, the opponent shall, subject to any agreement between the parties to the contrary, be entitled to apply to the Court for his costs, but where the petition is unopposed, or where, in the case of an opposed petition, the parties have come to an agreement as to the costs of the petition, the petition may, if the Court thinks fit, be disposed of in the same way mutatis mutandis as a Consent Petition under the provisions of the last preceding rule.

10. Where a petitioner unduly delays bringing a petition to a hearing, the Registrar shall call upon him to explain the delay, and if no explanation is offered, or if the explanation offered is, in the opinion of the Registrar, insufficient, the Registrar may, after notifying all parties interested, place the petition before the Court for such directions as the Court may think fit to give thereon.

11. At the hearing of a petition not more than one counsel shall be admitted to be heard on one side.

ORDER XIX

LODGING OF CONCISE STATEMENT AND SUPPLEMENTAL PROCEEDINGS

1. The appellant shall lodge in the Registry twelve copies of a concise statement of the facts of the case and of the arguments upon which he proposes to rely within thirty days of the lodging of his petition of appeal.

Supreme Court Rules

2. The respondent shall file in the Registry within thirty days of the service upon him of the notice of the lodging of the petition of appeal by the appellant twelve copies of a concise statement of such facts of the case as he deems material and of the arguments on which he proposes to rely at the hearing.

3. No party to an appeal shall be entitled to be heard by the Court unless he has previously lodged his concise statement; nor shall he be allowed to inspect the concise statement of the opposite party or obtain a copy thereof from the Registrar until he has lodged his own concise statement:

Provided that where a respondent who has entered an appearance does not desire to lodge his concise statement in the appeal, he may give the Registrar notice in writing of his intention not to lodge any concise statement, while reserving his right to address the Court on the question of costs.

4. Two or more respondents may, at their own risk as to costs, file separate concise statements in the same appeal.

5. Each party shall, after filing his concise statement, forthwith give notice thereof, to the other party; and shall be entitled, subject to rule 3 of this Order, to receive two copies of the concise statement filed by the opposite party on his applying therefor.

6. The concise statement shall consist of paragraphs numbered consecutively and shall state, as precisely as possible, the circumstances out of which the appeal arises, the contentions to be urged by the party filing the same, and the reasons therefor, and shall be printed or neatly typed with quarter margin, on one side of standard petition paper, of the same size as the printed record. References by page and line to the relevant portions of the record as printed shall, as far as practicable, be printed or typed in the margin, and care shall be taken to avoid, as far as possible, the reproducing in the concise statement of long extracts from the record. The Taxing Officer in taxing the costs of the appeal shall, either of his own motion, or at the instance of the opposite party, enquire, into any unnecessary prolixity in the concise statement, and may disallow the costs occasioned thereby.

7. As soon as an appeal is set down, the appellant shall attend at the Registry and obtain seven copies of the record and concise statements to be bound for the use of the Court at the hearing. The copies shall be bound in cloth or in one-fourth leather with paper sides, and six leaves of blank paper shall be inserted before the appellant's concise statement. The front cover shall bear a printed label stating the title and Supreme Court number of the appeal, the contents of the volume, and the names and addresses of the Attorneys. The several documents, indicated by incuts, shall be arranged in the following order:—

- (i) Appellant's concise statement,
- (ii) Respondent's concise statement,
- (iii) Record,
- (iv) Supplemental record (if any); and the short title and Supreme Court number of the appeal shall also be shown on the back.

8. The appellant shall lodge the bound copies, not less than seven clear days before the date fixed for the hearing of the appeal.

ORDER XX

HEARING OF APPEALS

1. All appeals filed in the Registry shall, as far as possible, be heard in the order in which they are set down.

2. The Registrar shall, subject to the provisions of Order XVII notify the parties to the appeal of the date fixed for the hearing.

3. Subject to the directions of the Court, at the hearing of an appeal not more than two Advocates shall be heard on one side.

4. The appellant shall not, without the leave of the Court, rely at the hearing on any grounds not specified in his petition of appeal and the concise statement.

5. Where the Court, after hearing an appeal, decides to reserve its judgment therein, the Registrar shall notify the parties concerned of the day appointed by the Court for the delivery of the judgment.

ORDER XXI

MISCELLANEOUS

1. The filing of an appeal shall not prevent execution of the decree or order appealed against, but the Court may, subject to such terms and conditions as it may think fit to impose, order a stay of execution of the decree or order, or order a stay of proceedings, in any case under appeal to this Court.

Supreme Court Rules

2. A respondent may apply for the summary determination of an appeal on the ground that it is frivolous or vexatious or has been brought for the purpose of delay, and the Court shall make such order thereon as it thinks fit.

3. A party to an appeal who appears in person shall furnish the Registrar with an address for service and all documents left at that address, or sent by registered post to that address, shall be deemed to have been duly served.

ORDER XXII

PAUPER APPEALS, PETITIONS ETC.

1. The provisions of Order XLIV in the First Schedule to the Code, shall, with necessary modifications and adaptations, apply in the case of any person seeking to appeal to the Court as a pauper.

2. An application for permission to proceed as a pauper shall be made on petition, setting out concisely in separate paragraphs, the facts of the case and the relief prayed, and shall be accompanied by a certificate of counsel that the petitioner has reasonable grounds of appeal. It shall be also accompanied by an affidavit from the petitioner disclosing all the property to which he is entitled and the value thereof, other than his necessary wearing apparel and his interest in the subject matter of the intended appeal, and stating that he is unable to provide sureties, and pay court-fees. The Registrar on satisfying himself that the petition is in order, may himself enquire into the pauperism of the petitioner after notice to the other parties in the case and to the Attorney-General, or refer the matter to the Registrar of the High Court, and the High Court either itself or by a Court subordinate to the High Court investigate into the pauperism after notice to the parties interested and make a report thereon within thirty days after the receipt of the reference from this Court :

Provided that no reference as aforesaid shall be necessary where the petitioner had been permitted to prosecute his appeal in forma pauperis in the Court appealed from.

4. The Court may allow an appeal to be continued in forma pauperis after it has begun in the ordinary form.

5. Where the petitioner obtains leave of the Court to appeal as a pauper he shall not be required to pay court-fees or to lodge security for the costs of the respondent.

6. Where the appellant succeeds in the appeal, the Registrar shall calculate the amount of court-fees which would have been paid by the appellant if he had not been permitted to appeal as a pauper and incorporate it in the decree or order of the Court ; such amount shall be recoverable by the Federal Government from any party ordered by the Court to pay the same, and shall be the first charge on the subject-matter of the appeal.

7. Where the appellant fails in the appeal or is dispensed, the Court may order the appellant to pay the court-fees which would have been paid by him if he had not been permitted to appeal as a pauper.

8. The Federal Government shall have the right at any time to apply to the Court to make an order for the payment of proper court-fees under the last two preceding rules.

9. In every pauper appeal the Registrar shall, after the disposal thereof, send to the Federal Government a memorandum of the court-fees due and payable by the pauper.

10. No person shall take, agree to take or seek to obtain from a person proceeding as a pauper, any fee, profit or reward for the conduct of the pauper's business in the Court, but the Court may nevertheless award costs against the other party and in that case may direct payment thereof to the Advocate of the pauper and the Attorney acting for him.

ORDER XXIII

CRIMINAL APPEALS

1. Appeals under Article 159(a), (b) and (d) of the Constitution shall be lodged in the Court within thirty days from the date of the judgment, final order or sentence appealed from and appeals under Article 157 and under clause (c) of Article 159 of the Constitution within thirty days from the date of the certificate granted by the High Court :

Provided that the Court may for sufficient cause extend the time.

2. The appeal shall be in the form of a petition in writing which shall be accompanied by a certified copy of the judgment or order appealed against and in the case of appeals under Articles 157 and 159(c) also by a certified copy of the certificate granted by the High Court. The appellant shall file at least six copies of his petition and the accompanying document.

3. The appellant, if he is in jail, may present his petition of appeal and the accompanying documents to the Officer-in-Charge of the jail, who shall forward them forthwith to the Registrar of this Court.

Supreme Court Rules

4. On receipt of the petition of appeal the Registrar shall cause notice of the appeal to be given to the Attorney-General for Pakistan or the Advocate-General of the Province concerned, or to both as the case may require, and in cases where the appeal is by the Government, to the accused and shall also furnish the Attorney-General for Pakistan and or the Advocate-General of the Province concerned or the accused as the case may be, with a copy of the petition of appeal and the accompanying documents.

5. The Registrar shall thereafter send a copy of the petition of appeal to the High Court concerned for its record. The High Court shall then arrange for the printing of the record in the case and for the transmission of the printed record to the Registrar of this Court with all convenient speed. In the preparation of the record, the High Court may include the printed paper book prepared for its own use at the stage of the appeal in the High Court. The record shall be printed at the expense of the appellant, unless otherwise ordered by the Court, but in appeals involving sentence of death, the record shall be printed at the expense of the Government of the Province concerned.

6. As soon as the record has been got ready the Registrar of the High Court shall despatch to the Registrar of this Court not less than 12 copies, one of which copies he shall certify to be correct by signing his name on, or initialling, every eighth page thereof and by affixing thereto the seal of the High Court:

Provided that in cases involving a sentence of death if the record was printed in the High Court it shall form part of the record meant for this Court along with such additional printed or typewritten record as may be necessary and shall be despatched to this Court within a period of 30 days after the receipt of the intimation from the Registrar of this Court of the filing of the petition of appeal.

7. In proper cases the Court may in its discretion direct the engagement of an Advocate for an accused person at the cost of the government. In such a case the engagement of an Attorney to instruct the Advocate shall not be necessary. The fee of the advocate so engaged shall be Rs. 100 per day, the day to be reckoned as 4½ hours of actual hearing in Court.

8. Due notice shall be given to the parties concerned of the date fixed for the hearing of the appeal. The accused may, where he so desires, present his case by submitting his arguments in writing and the Court shall consider the same at the hearing of the appeal.

9. The Court may where it thinks fit so to do, in the interests of justice, direct the production of an accused person at the hearing of the appeal.

10. After the disposal of the appeal the Registrar shall, with the utmost expedition, send a copy of the Court's judgment or order to the High Court concerned.

11. Pending the disposal of any appeal under this Order the Court may order that the execution of the sentence or order appealed against be stayed on such terms as the Court may think fit.

12. In Criminal proceedings no security for costs shall be required to be deposited and no court-fee, process fee or search fee shall be charged, and no copying charges shall be made except for copies other than the first to any party to the proceedings.

13. Save as aforesaid the provisions contained in the preceding Orders in this Part of the Rules shall, with necessary modifications and adaptations, apply, so far as may be, to criminal appeals under this Order, but it shall not be necessary to file a concise statement in such appeals.

ORDER XXIV

PETITIONS FOR SPECIAL LEAVE TO APPEAL IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

1. Save as hereinafter provided the provisions with respect to petitions for special leave to appeal in civil proceedings contained in Order XIII of this Part of the Rules, shall, with necessary modifications and adaptations, apply to applications for special leave to appeal in criminal matters :

Provided that no court-fee, process-fee or search fee shall be charged and no copying charges shall be made except for copies other than the first to any party to the proceedings.

2. All petitions and applications for special leave to appeal in criminal matters shall be lodged in the Court within thirty days from the date of the judgment or order sought to be appealed from, or from the date of the refusal of certificate under Articles 157(1) or 159(c) of the Constitution by the High Court :

Provided that the Court may for sufficient cause shown extend the time.

3. The petitioner, if he is in Jail, may present his petition for special leave to appeal along with the accompanying documents, including any written arguments which he may desire to advance, to the Officer-in-Charge of the Jail who shall forthwith forward them to the Registrar of this Court.

4. The Registrar shall place the petition and the accompanying documents so received before the Court, and the Court may, upon perusal of the papers, reject the petition summarily without hearing the petitioner in person, if it considers that there is no sufficient ground for granting special leave to appeal.

Supreme Court Rules

5. In the case of a petition for special leave to appeal involving a sentence of death the Registrar shall as soon as the petition is filed or received from the Officer-in-charge of a Jail, intimate the fact of the petition having been filed/received in the Court to the Government of the Province concerned and thereupon the execution of the sentence of death shall be stayed pending the disposal of the petition, without any express order of the Court in this behalf.

6. After the grant of petition or application for special leave to appeal by the Court the Registrar shall transmit a certified copy of the order to the Court or tribunal appealed from. The Court or tribunal appealed from shall then arrange for the printing of the record in the case and take other necessary steps in accordance with the provisions contained in Order XXIII relating to criminal appeals.

PART III

ORDER XXV

APPLICATIONS FOR ENFORCEMENT OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

(Art. 22 of the Constitution)

Habeas Corpus

1. An application for a writ of habeas corpus shall be filed in the Registry and shall be accompanied by an affidavit by the person restrained, stating that the application is made at his instance and setting out the nature and circumstances of the restraint. The application shall also state whether the applicant has moved the High Court concerned for the same relief and, if so, with what result :

Provided that where the person restrained is unable owing to the restraint to make the affidavit, the application shall be accompanied by an affidavit to the like effect made by some other person, which shall state the reason why the person restrained is unable to make the affidavit himself.

2. The application shall be heard by a Bench consisting of not less than two Judges.

3. If the Court is of opinion that a prima facie case for granting the application is made out, a rule nisi shall be issued calling upon the person or persons against whom the order is sought to appear on a day to be named therein to show cause why such order should not be made and at the same time to produce in Court the body of the person or persons alleged to be illegally or improperly detained then and there to be dealt with according to law.

4. On the return day of such rule or any day to which the hearing thereof may be adjourned, the Court shall, after hearing such parties as are present and wish to be heard, make such order as in the circumstances it considers to be just and proper.

5. In disposing of any such rule, the Court may in its discretion make such order for costs as it may consider just.

Mandamus, Prohibition, Certiorari, Quo-warranto, etc.

6. Any other application for the enforcement of a fundamental right shall be filed in the Registry. It shall set out the name and description of the applicant the relief sought, and the grounds on which it is sought, and shall be accompanied by an affidavit verifying the facts relied on, and at least six copies of the said application and affidavit shall be lodged in the Registry. It shall also state whether the applicant has moved the High Court concerned for the same relief and, if so, with what result. The application shall be made by notice of motion, but the Registrar may in appropriate cases put up the application before the Court for orders as to the issue of notice.

7. Such application shall be heard by a Bench consisting of not less than two Judges of the Court. Unless the Court otherwise directs, there shall be at least eight clear days between the service of the notice of motion and the day named therein for the hearing of the motion.

8. Copies of the said application and the affidavit in support thereof shall be served with the notice of motion and every party to the proceeding shall supply to any other party, on demand and on payment of the proper charges, copies of any affidavit filed by him.

9. The notice shall be served on all persons directly affected, and on such other persons as the Court may direct :

Provided that on the hearing of any such motion, any person who desires to be heard in opposition to the motion and appears to the Court to be a proper person to be heard shall be heard, notwithstanding that he has not been served with the notice of motion and shall be liable to costs in the discretion of the Court.

10. The Court may in such proceeding impose such terms as to costs and as to the giving of security as it thinks fit.

11. The provisions of Order XVIII relating to petitions shall, so far as may be applicable, apply to applications under this Order.

PART IV
ORDER XXVI
REVIEW

Applications for review shall be filed with the Registrar within 30 days after judgment is delivered in the cause, appeal or matter, and shall distinctly state the grounds for review and be accompanied by a certificate of counsel that the petitioner has reasonable and proper grounds for review.

PART V
ORIGINAL JURISDICTION
ORDER XXVII
PARTIES TO SUITS

1. Two or more plaintiffs may join in one suit in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same act or transaction or series of acts or transactions is alleged to exist.

2. Two or more defendants may be joined in one suit against whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same act or transaction or series of acts or transactions is alleged to exist.

3. (1) The Court may at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the Court to be just, order that the name of any plaintiff or defendant improperly joined be struck out, and that the name of any plaintiff or defendant who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the Court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the suit, be added.

(2) No person shall be added as a plaintiff without his consent.

4. Where it appears to the Court that any causes of action joined in one suit cannot conveniently be tried or disposed of together the Court may order separate trials or make such other order as may be expedient.

5. Where it appears to the Court that any joinder of plaintiffs or defendants may embarrass or delay the trial of the suit, the Court may order separate trials or make such order as may be expedient.

ORDER XXVIII
PLAINTS

1. Every suit shall be instituted by the presentation of a plaint.

2. A plaint shall be presented to the Registrar, and all plaints shall be registered and numbered by him according to the order in which they are presented.

3. Every plaint shall comply with the rules contained in Order XXXI of these Rules so far as they are applicable.

4. A plaint shall contain the following particulars :—

- (a) the names of the plaintiff and of the defendant ;
- (b) the facts constituting the cause of action and when it arose ;
- (c) the facts showing that the Court has jurisdiction ;
- (d) the declaration which the plaintiff claims.

5. The plaintiff shall endorse on the plaint, or annex thereto, a list of the documents (if any) which he has produced along with it and the Registrar shall sign the list if on examination he finds it to be correct.

6. The plaint shall be rejected—

- (a) where it does not disclose a cause of action ;
- (b) where the suit appears from the statement in the plaint to be barred by any law.

7. Where a plaint is rejected the Court shall record an order to that effect with the reasons for the order.

8. The rejection of the plaint shall not of itself preclude the plaintiff from presenting a fresh plaint in respect of the same cause of action.

9. Where a plaintiff sues upon a document in his possession or power, he shall produce it to the Registrar when the plaint is presented and shall at the same time deliver the document or a copy thereof to be filed with the plaint.

10. Where the plaintiff relies on any other documents (whether in his possession or power or not) as evidence in support of his claim, he shall enter such documents in a list to be added or annexed to the plaint.

11. Where any such document is not in the possession or power of the plaintiff, he shall, if possible, state in whose possession or power it is.

12. A document which ought to be produced in Court by the plaintiff when the plaint is presented, or to be entered in the list to be added or annexed to the plaint, and which is not produced or entered accordingly, shall not, without the leave of the Court, be received in evidence at the hearing of the suit.

ORDER XXIX

ISSUES AND SERVICE OF SUMMONS

1. When a suit has been duly instituted a summon may be issued to the defendant to appear and answer the claim.

2. Every summons shall be signed by the Registrar, and shall be sealed with the Seal of the Court.

3. Every summons shall be accompanied by a copy of the plaint.

4. The summons shall be served by being sent by registered post to the Attorney-General for Pakistan or the Advocate-General for the Province, as the case may be, or to an Attorney of the defendant empowered to accept service.

5. There shall be endorsed on every summons a notice requiring the defendant to enter an appearance within twenty-eight days after the summons has been served.

6. A defendant shall enter his appearance by filing in the Registry a memorandum in writing containing the name and place of business of his Attorney, and in default of appearance being entered within the time mentioned in the summons, or as hereinafter provided, the suit may be heard ex parte. The defendant shall also file a written statement along with his memorandum of appearance.

7. The defendant shall forthwith give notice of his having entered an appearance to the plaintiff and shall at the same time supply him a copy of the written statement.

8. The plaintiff shall within fourteen days after the defendant has entered an appearance take out a summons for directions returnable before the Judge in Chambers, and the Judge shall on the hearing of the summons give such directions with respect to pleadings, interrogatories, the admission of documents and facts, the discovery, inspection and production of documents and such other interlocutory matter as he may think expedient.

ORDER XXX

WRITTEN STATEMENT, SET-OFF AND COUNTER-CLAIM

1. It shall not be sufficient for a defendant in his written statement to deny generally the facts alleged by the plaintiff but he shall deal specifically with each allegation of fact of which he does not admit the truth, except damages.

2. Where a defendant denies an allegation of fact he shall not do so evasively but shall answer the point of substance.

3. Each allegation of fact in the plaint, if not denied specifically or by necessary implication, or not expressly stated to be not admitted in the pleading of the defendant, shall be taken to be admitted, but the Court, may in its discretion require any fact so admitted to be proved otherwise than by such admission.

4. Where the defendant claims to set off against a demand by the plaintiff any ascertained sum of money, he may in his written statement but not afterwards without the leave of the Court, state the grounds of his claim and the particulars of the debt sought to be set-off.

5. The written statement containing the particulars mentioned in the last preceding rule shall have the same effect as a plaint in a cross-suit so as to enable the Court to pronounce a final judgment in respect both of the original claim and of the set-off.

6. The rules relating to a written statement by a defendant shall apply to a written statement by a plaintiff in answer to a claim of set-off.

7. No pleading subsequent to the written statement of a defendant other than by way of defence to a set-off shall be presented except by the leave of the Court and upon such terms as the Court may think fit, but the Court may at any time require a written statement or additional written statement from any of the parties and may fix a time for presenting the same.

8. Where any party from whom a written statement is so required fails to present the same within the time fixed by the Court, the Court may pronounce judgment against him, or make such orders in relation to the suit as it thinks fit.

9. The defendant, in addition to his right of pleading a set-off, may set up by way of counter-claim against the claims of the plaintiff any right or claim in respect of a cause of action accruing to him either before or after the filing of the suit but before he has delivered his defence and before the time limited for delivering his defence has expired, whether that counter-claim sounds in damages or not, and the counter-claim, shall have the same effect as a cross-suit, so as to enable the Court to pronounce a final judgment in the same suit, both on the original and on the counter-claim.

10. The Court may, if in its opinion the counter-claim cannot be disposed of in the pending suit or ought not to be allowed, refuse permission to the defendant to avail himself thereof, and require him to file a separate suit.

ORDER XXXI PLEADINGS GENERALLY

1. In this Order "pleading" means plaint or written statement.
2. Every pleading shall contain, and contain only, a statement in a concise form of the material facts on which the party pleading relies, but neither the evidence by which those facts are to be proved, nor any argumentative matter, and shall be divided into paragraphs numbered consecutively. Dates, sums and numbers shall be expressed in figures.

3. A further and better statement of the nature of the claim or defence, or further and better particulars of any matter stated in any pleading may in all cases be ordered, upon such terms, as to costs and otherwise, as may be just.

4. Wherever the contents of any document are material, it shall be sufficient to state the effect thereof as briefly as possible, without setting out the whole or any part thereof, unless the precise words of the document or any part thereof are material.

5. Every pleading shall be signed by, or by an Advocate on behalf of, the Attorney-General for Pakistan or by, or by an Advocate on behalf of, the Advocate-General for the Province, as the case may be.

6. The Court may at any stage of the proceedings order to be struck out or amended any matter in any pleading which may be unnecessary or scandalous or which may tend to prejudice or embarrass or delay the trial of the suit, or which contravenes any of the provisions of this Order.

7. The Court may at any stage of the proceedings allow either party to amend his pleadings in such manner and on such terms as may be just, but only such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real question in controversy between the parties.

8. If a party who has obtained an order for leave to amend does not amend accordingly within the time limited for that purpose by the order, or if no time is thereby limited then within fourteen days from the date of the order, he shall not be permitted to amend after the expiration of such limited time or of such fourteen days, as the case may be, unless the time is extended by the Court.

9. Amendments of pleadings made only for the purpose of rectifying a clerical error may be made on an order of the Registrar without notice, but unless otherwise ordered a copy of the order shall be served on all other parties.

ORDER XXXII DISCOVERY AND INSPECTION

1. Order XI of the First Schedule to the Code shall apply with respect to discovery and inspection in suits instituted before the Court, except rules 5 and 23 of that Order.

2. Where the Court has made an order allowing one party to deliver interrogatories to the other, those interrogatories shall be answered by such persons as the Court may direct.

3. No application for leave to deliver interrogatories shall be made by the defendant until after he has filed his written statement.

4. After an order has been made for the delivery of interrogatories one set of the interrogatories, as allowed, shall be annexed and served with the order upon the person to be interrogated.

5. The Court may, for sufficient reason, allow any affidavit to be sworn, on behalf of the party from whom discovery, production or inspection is sought, by any person competent to make the same.

6. Where any document is ordered to be deposited in Court copy of the order and a schedule of the document shall be left in the Registry at the time when the deposit is made.

7. When the purpose for which any documents have been deposited in Court is satisfied, the party by whom they were deposited may, pending the suit, have them delivered out to him, if he has the consent in writing of the other party, or an order of the Court.

Supreme Court Rules

ORDER XXXIII ADMISSIONS

Order XII in the First Schedule to the Code shall apply.

ORDER XXXIV SUMMONING AND ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES

1. The provisions of sections 28 and 32 of the Code shall apply to summonses to give evidence or to produce documents under these Rules.

2. Order XVI in the First Schedule to the Code with respect to the summoning and attendance of witnesses shall apply, with the exception of the proviso to sub-rule (3) of rule 10, and the words "(a) within the local limits of the Court's ordinary original jurisdiction, or (b) without such limits but" in rule 19.

ORDER XXXV ADJOURNMENTS

Order XVII in the First Schedule to the Code shall apply, with the substitution in rule 2 of the words "in such manner as it thinks just" for the words "in one of the modes directed in that behalf by Order IX, or make such other order as it thinks fit".

ORDER XXXVI HEARING OF SUIT

1. Rules 1, 2, 3, 16, 17 and 18 of Order XVIII in the First Schedule to the Code with respect to the hearing of suits and examination of witnesses shall apply.

2. Witnesses in attendance shall be examined orally in open Court and their evidence taken down in shorthand in the form of question and answer by such officers of the Court as may be appointed for the purpose.

3. The transcript of the shorthand note shall be signed by the officer recording the note and shall be deemed to be the deposition of the witness and shall form part of the record.

4. The party to any suit or matter in which the evidence has been taken in shorthand, and the witness whose evidence has been taken, shall be entitled upon payment of the prescribed fee to be furnished with a certified copy of the transcript.

ORDER XXXVII WITHDRAWAL AND ADJUSTMENT OF SUITS

1. Rules 1, 2 and 3 of Order XXIII in the First Schedule to the Code with respect to the withdrawal and adjustment of suits shall apply.

2. No new suit shall be brought in respect of the same subject-matter until the terms or conditions, if any, imposed by the order permitting the withdrawal of a previous suit or giving leave to bring a new suit have been complied with.

ORDER XXXVIII PAYMENT INTO COURT

Order XXIV in the First Schedule to the Code with respect to payment into Court shall apply.

ORDER XXXIX SPECIAL CASE

1. (1) Parties claiming to be interested in the decision of any question of fact or law may enter into an agreement in writing stating such question in the form of a case for the opinion of the Court, and providing that, upon the finding of the Court with respect to such question,—

- (a) a sum of money fixed by the parties or to be determined by the Court shall be paid by one of the parties to the other of them; or
- (b) some property, movable or immovable, specified in the agreement, shall be delivered by one of the parties to the other of them; or
- (c) one or more of the parties shall do, or refrain from doing, some other particular act specified in the agreement.

(2) Every case stated under this rule shall be divided into consecutively numbered paragraphs, and shall concisely state such facts and specify such documents as may be necessary to enable the Court to decide the question raised thereby.

2. (1) The agreement, if framed in accordance with the rules hereinbefore contained, may be filed in the Court.

(2) The agreement, when so filed, shall be numbered and registered as a suit between one or more of the parties.

3. (1) The case shall be set down for hearing as a suit instituted in the ordinary manner, and the provisions of the Code shall apply to such suits so far as the same are applicable.

(2) Where the Court is satisfied after examination of the parties, or after taking such evidence as it thinks fit,—

- (a) that the agreement was duly executed by them,
- (b) that they have a bona fide interest in the question stated therein, and
- (c) that the same is fit to be decided, it shall proceed to pronounce judgment thereon, in the same way as in an ordinary suit.

ORDER XL

MISCELLANEOUS

In the absence of any specific provision in this Part of the Rules, the provisions of the Code shall apply unless the Court otherwise directs.

PART VI

ORDER XLI

SPECIAL REFERENCES UNDER ARTICLE 162 OF THE CONSTITUTION

1. On receipt by the Registrar of the order of the President referring a question of law to the Court, the Registrar shall give notice to the Attorney-General for Pakistan to appear before the Court on a day specified in the notice to take the directions of the Court as to the parties who shall be served with notice of the Special Reference, and the Court may, if it considers it desirable, order that notice of the Special Reference shall be served upon such parties as may be named in the order.

2. The notice shall require all such parties served therewith as desired to be heard at the hearing of the Special Reference to attend before the Registrar on the day fixed by the order to take the directions of the Court with respect to statements of facts and arguments and with respect to the date of the hearing.

3. Subject to the provisions of this Order, the procedure on a Special Reference shall follow as nearly as may be the procedure in proceedings before the Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, but with such variations as may appear to the Court to be appropriate and as the Court may direct.

4. After the hearing of the Special Reference, the Registrar shall transmit to the President the Report of the Court thereon.

5. The Court may make such order as it thinks fit as to the costs of all parties served with notice under these Rules who appear at the hearing of the Special Reference.

ORDER XLII

SPECIAL REFERENCES UNDER ARTICLES 121, 138, 169 AND 187 OF THE CONSTITUTION

1. The Attorney-General for Pakistan shall deliver to the Registrar the order of the President referring the matter to the Court. The Reference shall be accompanied by a statement of the case setting forth the facts and grounds relied upon. The allegations of facts shall be verified by an affidavit to be made by a Secretary of the appropriate Government.

2. The Registrar shall then lay the Reference before the Court, and the Court may give such directions for the notice of the Reference upon the respondent and for the fixation of the day and time for the filing of any written statement by him. The notice shall be accompanied by all the relevant documents received with the Reference.

3. The procedure for the hearing of the Reference and taking down the statements of witnesses shall be in the discretion of the Court.

4. After the hearing of the Reference the Registrar shall transmit to the President the Report of the Court thereon.

5. The Court may make such order as it thinks fit as to the costs of the respondent.

PART VII

ORDER XLIII

COSTS

1. Subject to any provisions of any Statute or of these Rules, the costs of and incidental to all proceedings shall be in the discretion of the Court. Unless the Court otherwise orders an intervener shall not be entitled to costs.

2. Where it appears that the hearing of any suit or matter cannot conveniently proceed by reason of the neglect of the Attorney of any party to attend personally, or by some proper person on his behalf, or because of his omission to deliver any paper necessary for the use of the Court which ought to have been delivered, the Attorney shall personally pay to all or any of the parties such costs as the Court may think fit to award.

ORDER XLIV

TAXATION

1. The Registrar and the Assistant Registrar shall be the Taxing Officer and the Assistant Taxing Officer of the Court, respectively.

The Chief Justice may assign, and the Taxing Officer may with the approval of the Chief Justice delegate to an Assistant Taxing Officer any function required by or under this Order to be exercised by the Taxing Officer.

2. The Taxing Officer shall allow all such costs, charges and expenses as appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party, and shall not allow any costs, charges and expenses which appear to him to have been incurred or increased unnecessarily or through negligence or mistake.

3. The Court may, in any proceedings where costs are awarded to any party, direct payment of a sum in gross in lieu of taxed costs, and may direct by and to whom that sum shall be paid.

4. Where in the opinion of the Taxing Officer the maximum fee allowed by these Rules is insufficient or a fee ought to be allowed for any matter not provided for in these Rules, he may refer the matter to the presiding Judge of the Bench hearing the appeal, cause or matter and the Judge may make such order thereon as to the allowance of the whole or any part of the amount proposed by the Taxing Officer as he thinks fit.

5. Where the Taxing Officer is of opinion that any costs have been injuriously or unnecessarily occasioned by the negligence or improper conduct of any Attorney, he shall not allow any charge for the same.

6. In all cases of taxation as between party and party, the bill shall be lodged for taxation as between party and party and, unless the client expresses his desire to the contrary in writing, also as between Attorney and client.

7. Every bill of costs lodged for taxation shall specify the exact number of folios contained in the bill lodged.

8. Every bill of costs shall be properly dated throughout and shall show in a column for the purpose the money paid out of pocket.

9. Every bill of costs shall be certified by the signature of the Attorney from whose office it is issued.

10. The fees for taxation and registration of every bill of costs shall be paid in court-fee stamps when the bill is lodged for taxation.

11. Every bill of costs shall, wherever possible, be accompanied by vouchers, and every item of disbursement and the cause thereof shall be distinctly specified, and no payment out of pocket shall be allowed except on production of the necessary voucher, or in the case of Advocate's fees, without the receipt of the Advocate that the fee has been paid :

Provided that the Taxing Officer may dispense with the production of a receipt of fee paid to the Attorney-General for Pakistan or the Advocate-General of a Province.

12. Within one month from the date of the signing of the judgment or order awarding costs, or within such further time as the Taxing Officer may for good cause allow, the party to whom the costs have been awarded shall lodge in the Registry the bill of costs and vouchers accompanied by a certified copy of the decree or formal order drawn up in the case.

13. The party having the charge of the bill shall, within fourteen days or within such further period as the Taxing Officer may for good cause allow, serve on the opposite party a copy of the bill of costs and file in the Registry an affidavit of service. In default of the filing of such affidavit within the time aforesaid or within the further period allowed by the Taxing Officer, the Taxing Officer may return the bill and vouchers and shall not thereafter receive or tax the bill except by order of the Court :

Provided that, where the Taxing Officer is satisfied that the party having the charge of the bill has made all reasonable efforts to have the copy of the bill served and has failed, the Taxing Officer may dispense with such affidavit, and may receive and tax the bill.

14. As soon as the affidavit of service referred to in the last preceding rule has been filed, the Taxing Officer shall fix a date for taxation of the bill and shall notify the parties of the date fixed.

Supreme Court Rules

15. The Taxing Officer shall allow such costs of procuring the advice on evidence of an Advocate, and of employing an Advocate to settle pleadings and affidavits, as the Taxing Officer in his discretion thinks just and reasonable.

16. In cases of taxation as between Attorney and client where the fees are payable by the client personally or out of a fund belonging entirely to him, the Taxing Officer shall allow, as fees to Advocates, all sums actually paid, but not exceeding those set out in the Second Schedule to these Rules, unless the written consent of the client is produced.

17. Where an Attorney acts for different parties to the same suit, appeal or matter, only one set of attendances shall be allowed, unless the Court otherwise orders.

18. Where two or more appeals arising out of a single proceeding are heard together and costs are awarded in both or all of them only one set of counsel's fee shall be allowed for the hearing unless the presiding Judge of the Bench hearing the appeals otherwise directs.

19. Where on the taxation of a bill of costs payable out of a fund or out of the assets of a company in liquidation, the amount of the professional charges and disbursements contained in the bill is reduced by a sixth part or more, no costs shall be allowed to the Attorney lodging the bill for taxation for drawing or copying it, nor for attending the taxation.

20. Where on taxation of an Attorney's bill of costs as between Attorney and client, the amount of the bill is reduced by a sixth part or more, the Attorney shall pay the costs of taxation including the cost of the Attorney (if any) employed in contesting the bill and the same shall be deducted by the Taxing Officer; but the Taxing Officer may certify any special circumstances relating to the bill or taxation and the Court may upon application by the Attorney whose bill has been taxed make any such order as the Court may think just and equitable with respect to the costs of the taxation.

21. No Court fees shall be payable by an applicant to proceed in forma pauperis except the fee for the petition to proceed.

22. In the taxation of costs as between party and party, the costs of and incidental to the attendance of an Advocate on summonses or other matters in Chambers shall not be allowed unless the court certifies that it was a fit case for the employment of an Advocate.

23. Unless specially allowed by the Taxing Officer, no allowance shall be made in party and party taxation for work done before the commencement of proceedings in the Court, except for necessary letter of demand and the reply thereto, if any, for receiving instructions to sue, to defend, or to appeal, and searches necessary for the purpose of instituting or defending proceedings.

24. In every case of taxation as between Attorney and client, the client shall be duly summoned by the Taxing Officer to attend the taxation, unless the Taxing Officer shall see fit to dispense with his attendance.

25. No retaining fee to an Advocate shall be allowed on taxation as between party and party.

26. Any party who is dissatisfied with the allowance or disallowance by the Taxing Officer of the whole or any part of the items in a bill of costs may apply to the Taxing Officer to review the taxation in respect thereof.

27. An application to review shall be made within a week from the date of the passing of the bill by the Taxing Officer.

The application shall contain objections in writing specifying concisely therein items or parts of the bill allowed or disallowed and the grounds for the objections.

28. The Taxing Officer shall serve fourteen days' notice of the application on the opposite party. A copy of the application shall accompany the notice.

29. Objections which were not taken in at the time of the taxation shall not be taken in at the stage of review unless allowed by the Taxing Officer.

30. The Taxing Officer may, where he thinks fit, issue, pending the consideration of any objections, a preliminary allocatur for or on account of the remainder of the bill of costs.

31. Upon application to review the Taxing Officer shall reconsider his taxation upon the objections carried in and may, where he thinks fit, receive further evidence in respect thereof, and shall state in a certificate the grounds of his decision thereon and any special facts or circumstances relating thereto.

32. Any party dissatisfied with the decision of the Taxing Officer on review may, not later than seven days from the date of the decision or within such further time as the Taxing Officer or the Court may allow, apply to the Court for an order to review the decision of the Taxing Officer and the Court may thereupon make such order as may seem just; but the taxation of the Taxing Officer shall be final and conclusive as to all matters which shall not have been objected to in the manner aforesaid.

Supreme Court Rules

33. No evidence shall be received by the Court upon the review of the Taxing Officer's decision which was not before the Taxing Officer when he taxed the bill or reviewed his taxation unless the Court otherwise directs.

34. The certificate of the Taxing Officer by whom any appeal has been taxed shall unless it is set aside or altered by the Court, be final as to the amount of costs covered thereby.

35. Except as otherwise specially provided in these Rules the fees set out in the Second and Fourth Schedules to these Rules may be allowed to Advocates, Attorneys and officers of the Court.

36. In defended appeals, suits and special references the first day's hearing fee shall be allowed in full as fixed under the Second Schedule, for the first four and half hours of the hearing or part thereof, subject to the provisions contained in rules 38 and 39.

37. No refresher shall be allowed unless the hearing has lasted for more than four and a half hours and the Taxing Officer shall have discretion to reduce the refresher or to allow an additional refresher having regard to the duration of the hearing after the first four and a half hours. The refresher shall however not be reduced by more than one half.

38. Where the hearing of a part-heard case is held up on account of the Court being occupied with any other matter, the time taken in the hearing of such matter shall be taken into consideration by the Taxing Officer for purposes of a refresher.

39. In cases involving less than fifteen thousand rupees in value, the Taxing Officer shall have discretion to reduce the fees, including the first day's hearing fee and the fee of the Attorney, suitably according to the nature of the case.

40. Save as otherwise provided in these Rules, the fees provided in the Second Schedule, other than items 1 and 2 of Part I, shall be subject to reduction in the discretion of the Taxing Officer according to the nature of the case.

41. The allowances to be made to witnesses per diem shall be such as the Taxing Officer may think reasonable having regard to the profession or status of the witness, but shall not exceed Rs. 50 per diem unless the Court otherwise directs.

42. Witnesses residing more than five miles from the place where the Court sits shall be allowed travelling expenses according to the sums reasonably and actually paid by them and shall also be allowed such a sum for subsistence money and carriage hire as the Taxing Officer, having regard to the daily allowances fixed under rule 41, considers reasonable.

43. Every person summoned to give evidence shall have tendered to him with the summons a reasonable sum for his travelling expenses (if any) and for the first day's attendance and shall, if obliged to attend for more than one day, be entitled before giving his evidence, to claim from the party by whom he has been summoned the appropriate allowance and expenses for each additional day that he may be required to attend.

44. Witnesses who have not been paid such reasonable sums for their expenses as the Court allows by its Rules may apply to the Court at any time in person to enforce the payment of such sum as may be awarded to them.

45. For the purposes of this Order a folio shall consist of one hundred words; seven figures shall be counted as one word; and part of a folio exceeding fifty words shall be reckoned as a folio. A document consisting of less than one hundred words shall count as one folio.

46. Where the party having the charge of the bill does not appear on the date fixed for taxation, the Taxing Officer may make an order that the bill be rejected. An application for the restoration of the bill shall be made within fourteen days from the date of the rejection of the bill, and the Taxing Officer may for sufficient cause shown receive and tax the bill.

47. A party dissatisfied with the order of the Taxing Officer under the last preceding rule may, not later than seven days from the date of the order, or within such further time as the Taxing Officer or the Court may allow, apply to the Court for an order that the bill be restored.

48. Subject to any agreement in writing to the contrary, the rules regulating the taxation of costs between party and party shall be applicable as far as may be to taxation between Attorney and client.

49. If an Attorney makes an agreement in writing with his client as to his remuneration in respect of any business done or to be done by him in any proceedings in this Court, the amount payable under the agreement shall not be received by the Attorney until the agreement has been examined and allowed by the Taxing Officer, and if the Taxing Officer is of opinion that the amount is unfair or unreasonable, he may seek the direction of the presiding Judge of the bench hearing the appeal, cause or matter and the Judge may reduce the amount payable thereunder, or order the agreement to be cancelled and the costs covered thereby to be taxed as if the agreement had never been made.

50. Where a dispute arises between the Attorney and his client as to fees and charges payable to the Attorney in any proceedings before the Court, either party may apply to the Taxing Officer for an order to have the bill taxed in accordance with the provisions of this Order. The application, when made by the Attorney, shall be accompanied by a copy of the bill sought to be taxed.

51. The Attorney whose bill against his client has been taxed may apply to the Court for an order against his client or his legal representative for payment of the sum allowed on taxation or such sum thereof as may remain due to him. The order so made may be transmitted for execution to such Court or tribunal as the Court may direct.

52. Where it is necessary to enforce payment of costs under a direction of the Registrar, an order for that purpose shall be obtained from a Judge. Applications for such orders may be made, without notice, by petition, supported by a certificate of the Registrar.

53. The Court may on the application of a client or his representative in interest direct an Attorney to deliver up any documents or papers to the possession of which the applicant may be entitled, and pass such other orders in this behalf as the circumstances of the case may require, including orders as to the costs of the application.

PART VIII
MISCELLANEOUS

NOTICE OF PROCEEDINGS TO THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR PAKISTAN ETC.

1. The Court may direct notice of any proceedings to be given to the Attorney-General for Pakistan or to the Advocate-General of any Province, and the Attorney-General or the Advocate-General to whom such notice is given may appear, and shall do so if required by the Court.

2. The Attorney-General for Pakistan or the Advocate-General of any Province may apply to be heard in any proceedings before the Court, and the Court may, if in its opinion the justice of the case so requires, permit the Attorney-General or any Advocate-General so applying to appear and be heard, subject to such terms as to costs or otherwise as the Court may think fit.

ORDER XLVI
FORMS TO BE USED

1. Every writ, summons, order, warrant or other mandatory process shall be signed by the Registrar with the day and the year of signing, and shall be sealed with the Seal of the Court.

2. The forms set out in the Sixth Schedule to these Rules, or forms substantially to the like effect with such variations as the circumstances of each case may require, shall be used in all cases where those forms are appropriate.

ORDER XLVII

SERVICE OF DOCUMENTS

1. Except where otherwise provided by Statute or prescribed by these Rules, all notices, orders or other documents required to be given to, or served on, any person shall be served in the manner provided by the Code for the service of summons.

2. Service of any notice, order or other document on the Attorney of any party may be effected by delivering it to the Attorney or by leaving it at his place of business, or by sending it to his address by registered post.

3. Service of any notice, order or other document upon a person, other than an Attorney, residing at a place within the territories of Pakistan between which place and the seat of the Court there is communication by registered post, may be effected by posting a copy of the document required to be served in a pre-paid envelope registered for acknowledgment, addressed to the party or person at the place where he ordinarily resides:

Provided that the Registrar may direct in a particular case or class of cases, that the service shall be effected in the manner provided by the Code for the service of summons.

4. A document served by post shall be deemed to be served at the time at which it could have been delivered in the ordinary course of post.

5. Except where the notice or process has been served through the Registry, the party required to effect the service shall file an affidavit of service, along with such proof thereof as may be available, stating the manner in which the service has been effected.

6. Where the notice, order or other document has been served through another Court, the service may be proved by the deposition or affidavit of the serving officer made before the Court through which the service was effected.

7. Service effected after Court hours shall for the purpose of computing any period of time subsequent to that service be deemed to have been effected on the following day.

ORDER XLVIII

COMMISSIONS

1. Order XXVI in the First Schedule to the Code with respect to commissions shall apply except rules 13, 14, 19, 20, 21 and 22.

2. An application for the issue of a commission may be made by summons in Chambers after notice to all parties who have appeared, or ex parte where there has been no appearance.

3. The Court may, when the commission is not one for examination on interrogatories, order that the commissioner shall have all the powers of a Court under Chapter X of the Evidence Act, 1872, to decide questions as to the admissibility of evidence, and to disallow any question put to a witness.

4. The commissioner shall record a question disallowed by him and the answer thereto, but the same shall not be admitted in evidence until the court so directs.

5. Unless otherwise ordered the party, at whose instance the commission is ordered to issue, shall lodge in the Court copies of the pleadings and issues in the case within twenty-four hours of the making of the order and those copies shall be annexed to the commission when issued.

6. Any party aggrieved by the decision of the commissioner refusing to admit documentary evidence may apply to the Court within a period of fourteen days of the date of the submission of the report to set aside the decision and for direction to the commissioner to admit the evidence.

7. After the deposition of any witness has been taken down and before it is signed by him, it shall be read over and, where necessary, translated to the witness. Every page of the deposition shall be signed by him and left with the commissioner who shall subscribe his name and the date of the examination.

8. Commissions shall be made returnable within such time as the Court may direct.

ORDER XLIX

POWER TO DISPENSE AND INHERENT POWERS

1. The Court or any Judge or Judges thereof may, for sufficient cause shown, excuse the parties from compliance with any of the requirements of these Rules, and may give such directions in matters of practice and procedure as it shall consider just and expedient.

2. An application to be excused from compliance with the requirements of any of the Rules shall be addressed in the first instance to the Registrar, who shall take the directions of the Court or of any Judge or Judges thereof and communicate the same to the party or parties as the case may be.

3. The Court may enlarge or abridge any time appointed by these Rules, or fixed by any order enlarging time, for doing any act or taking any proceeding, upon such terms (if any) as the justice of the case may require and any enlargement may be ordered, although the application therefor is not made until after the expiration of the time appointed or allowed.

4. The Court may at any time, either of its own motion or on the application of any party, make such orders as may be necessary or reasonable in respect of any of the matters mentioned in rule 8 of Order XXIX of these Rules, may issue summonses to persons whose attendance is required either to give evidence or to produce documents, or order any fact to be proved by affidavit.

5. The Court shall have power to pass any decree and make any order which ought to have been passed or made and to pass or make such further or other decree or order as the case may require, and this power may be exercised by the Court notwithstanding that the appeal is as to part only of the decree and may be exercised in favour of all or any of the respondents or parties, although such respondents or parties may not have filed any appeal or objection.

6. Nothing in these Rules shall be deemed to limit or otherwise affect the inherent powers of the Court to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the Court.

FIRST SCHEDULE

SENIOR AND OTHER ADVOCATES

1. A Senior Advocate shall not appear or plead without a junior.

2. A senior Advocate shall not accept instructions to draw pleadings, affidavits, advice on evidence or to do any drafting work of an analogous kind, but this prohibition shall not extend to settling any such matters as aforesaid in consultation with a junior.

3. An enrolled Advocate may, if otherwise qualified, apply to be enrolled in the list of Senior Advocates and any fee payable by him on enrolment shall be reduced by the amount of the fee paid by him on his original enrolment.

4. A Senior Advocate appearing with another Senior Advocate senior to himself shall be entitled to, and shall be paid, a fee not less than two-thirds of the fee marked on the brief of that other Advocate, and a junior appearing with a Senior Advocate or with any other Advocate senior to himself shall be entitled to, and shall be paid, a fee not less than one-third and not more than two-thirds of the fee marked on the brief of the Senior or other Advocate, but this rule shall not apply in the case of a second junior.

5. A Senior Advocate may inform the Court that he will not accept any brief, or any brief of a specified class, without a special fee of a named amount, in addition to the ordinary fee marked on the brief, and shall not so long as he does not inform the Court to the contrary accept a brief or a brief of the specified class without that special fee.

6. An Advocate appearing with a Senior Advocate whose brief is marked with a special fee in accordance with the last preceding rule shall only be entitled to his proper proportion of the ordinary fee marked on the Senior Advocate's brief and not to any proportion of the special fee.

7. Any disputes arising under this Schedule shall be referred to and determined by the Chief Justice.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF PAKISTAN RULES OF PROCEDURE AND CONDUCT OF BUSINESS

CHAPTER IX

Legislation

(A) Bills

Notice of motions for leave to introduce Bills.

Publication before introduction.

Motion for leave to introduce.

Provisions applicable to amendments requiring recommendation.

Publication after introduction.

Motions after introduction.

Discussion of principle of Bills.

52. (1) Any private member desiring to move for leave to introduce a Bill shall give notice of his intention, and shall, together with his notice, submit a copy of the Bill and a statement of objects and reasons duly signed by him.

(2) If the Bill is one which cannot be introduced under the Constitution without the recommendation of the President, the member shall annex to the notice a copy of such recommendation, and the notice shall not be valid until this requirement is complied with.

(3) If any question arises whether a Bill is or is not a Bill of the nature referred to in sub-rule (2), the question shall be referred to the Speaker whose decision shall be final.

(4) The period of notice of a motion for leave to introduce a Bill under this rule shall be fifteen days, unless the Speaker allows the motion to be made at a shorter notice.

(5) In the case of a Government Bill a motion for leave to introduce a Bill may be made by the member-in-charge at any time after such a motion has been included in the Orders of the Day.

53. The Speaker may cause the publication of any Bill (together with the statement of objects and reasons accompanying it) in the Gazette, although no motion has been made for leave to introduce the Bill. In that case it shall not be necessary to move for leave to introduce the Bill, and, if the Bill is afterwards introduced, it shall not be necessary to publish it again.

54. If a motion for leave to introduce a Bill is opposed, the Speaker, after permitting, if he thinks fit, a brief explanatory statement from the member who moves and from the member who opposes the motion, may without further debate put the question.

55. (1) If any member desires to move an amendment which cannot be moved under the Constitution without the recommendation of the President, he shall annex to the notice required by the Rules a copy of such recommendation and the notice shall not be valid until this requirement is complied with.

(2) If any question arises whether an amendment is or is not an amendment of the nature referred to in sub-rule (1), the question shall be referred to the Speaker whose decision shall be final.

56. As soon as may be, after a Bill has been introduced, the Bill, unless it has already been published, shall be published in the Gazette.

57. When a Bill is introduced, or on some subsequent occasion, the member-in-charge may make any one of the following notions in regard to his Bill, namely :—

- (a) that it be taken into consideration by the Assembly either at once or at some future day to be then specified ; or
- (b) that it be referred to a Select Committee ; or
- (c) that it be circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion thereon :

Provided that no such motion shall be made until after copies of the Bill have been made available for the use of members, and further that any member may object to any such motion being made, unless copies of the Bill have been made available for three days before the days, on which the motion is made, and thereupon such objection shall prevail, unless the Speaker in the exercise of his power to suspend this rule, allows the motion to be made.

58. (1) On the day on which any of the motions referred to in rule 57 is made, or on any subsequent day to which the discussion thereof is postponed, the principle of the Bill and its general provisions may be discussed, but the details of the Bill shall not be discussed further than is necessary to explain its principle.

(2) At this stage no amendments to the Bill may be moved, but—

- (a) if the member-in-charge moves that his Bill be taken into consideration, any member may move as an amendment that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee or be circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion thereon by a date to be specified in the motion ; or
- (b) if the member-in-charge moves that his Bill be referred to a Select Committee, any member may move as an amendment that the Bill be circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion thereon by a date to be specified in the motion.

(3) Where a motion that a Bill be circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion thereon is carried, and the Bill is circulated in accordance with that direction and opinions are received thereon, the member-in-charge, if he wishes to proceed with his Bill thereafter, must move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, unless the Speaker, in the exercise of his power to suspend this rule, allows a motion to be made that the Bill be taken into consideration.

National Assembly (Legislation) Rules

59. No motion that the Bill be taken into consideration or be passed shall be made by any member other than the member-in-charge of the Bill and no motion that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee or be circulated or re-circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion thereon shall be made by any member other than the member-in-charge except by way of amendment to a motion made by the member-in-charge.

(B) Committee of the whole House

60. (1) The Assembly may, by a motion that the House shall immediately or on a future day resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, appoint a Committee of the whole House. Such a motion may be in writing and shall be put to the House without debate.

(2) As soon as the House resolves itself into the Committee of the whole House, the Speaker shall leave the Chair.

(3) The Deputy Speaker shall be the Chairman of the Committee of the whole House. In his absence, a member of the Panel of Chairmen when so requested by him shall act as Chairman. If at any time, there is no person so authorized or able to act as Chairman, the Committee of the whole House shall elect a person from among its members present to preside.

61. The Committee of the whole House may be appointed to consider public Bills or such other matters as the Assembly may deem fit to refer to the Committee.

62. (1) Presence of at least twelve members shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee of the whole House.

(2) If at any time during a meeting of the Committee of the whole House the attention of the Chairman is drawn to the fact that less than twelve members are present, it shall be his duty to leave the Chair and resume the meeting of the Assembly.

63. (1) If the consideration of the matter referred to the Committee of the whole House is not concluded, the Committee may direct the Chairman to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

(2) At 7.30 p.m. if the House be in Committee, the Chairman shall leave the Chair and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

64. (1) When the Chairman of the Committee of the whole House has been ordered to make a report to the House, he shall leave the Chair without putting any question. Every such report shall be brought up without any question being put.

(2) When the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House has been directed to report progress or has left the Chair to report progress, he shall, if the Committee have come to any resolution, so acquaint the House before reporting progress.

(C) Select Committees

65. (1) The Minister concerned with the Bill, the member who introduced the Bill and the Minister of Law shall be members of every Select Committee and it shall not be necessary to include their names in any motion for appointment of such a Committee.

(2) The other members of the Committee shall be appointed by the Assembly when a motion that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee is made, or a motion is made by way of amendment under clause (a) of sub-rule (2) of rule 58.

(3) The Minister of Law shall be the Chairman of the Committee and in his absence, the Deputy Speaker, if he is a member of the Committee, and in his absence, a Chairman of the Assembly, if he is a member of the Committee, shall be the Chairman of the Committee. If two or more Chairmen of the Assembly are members of the Committee then the person whose name appears first in the order of sequence in the Panel of such Chairmen shall be the Chairman of the Committee.

(4) If the Chairman mentioned in sub-rule (3) is not present at any meeting of the Committee, the members of the Committee shall elect their own Chairman.

(5) In the case of an equality of votes, the Chairman shall have the second or casting vote.

(6) A Select Committee may hear expert evidence and representative of special interests affected by the measure before them.

66. (1) At the time of the appointment by the Assembly of the members of a Select Committee, the number of members whose presence shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Committee shall be fixed by the Assembly.

Persons by whom motions in respect of Bills may be made.

Constitution of a committee of the whole House.

Functions of the Committee. Quorum of the Committee.

Presentation of piecemeal report to the Committee.

Presentation of Report of the Committee.

Composition of Select Committee.

Quorum of Select Committee.

National Assembly (Legislation) Rules

(2) If at the time fixed for any meeting of the Select Committee, or if at any time during any such meeting, the quorum of members fixed by the Assembly is not present, the Chairman of the Committee shall either suspend the meeting until a quorum is present or adjourn the Committee to some future day.

(3) Where the Select Committee has been adjourned in pursuance of sub-rule (2) on two successive dates fixed for a meeting of the Committee, the Chairman shall report the fact to the Assembly.

67. A select Committee shall have power to make such amendments in the Bill as they think fit, provided that such amendments are relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill and are not beyond the scope of the Bill.

68. (1) After publication of the Bill in the Gazette, as required by the Rules, the Select Committee to which the Bill has been referred shall make a report thereon.

(2) Such reports shall be made not sooner than three months from the date of the first publication of the Bill in the Gazette, unless the Assembly orders the report to be made sooner:

Provided that the time-limit referred to in this sub-rule shall not apply in the case of Bills imposing taxation.

(3) Reports may be either preliminary or final.

(4) The Select Committee shall in their report state whether the publication of the Bill directed by the Rules has taken place, and the date on which the publication has taken place.

(5) Where a Bill has been altered, the Select Committee may, if they think fit, include in their report a recommendation to the member-in-charge of the Bill that his next motion shall be a motion for circulation, or where the Bill has already been circulated, for re-circulation.

(6) If any member of a Select Committee desires to record a minute of dissent on any point, he must sign the report stating that he does so subject to his minute of dissent, and must at the same time hand in his minute.

69. The Report of the Select Committee on a Bill shall be presented to the Assembly by the member-in-charge of the Bill and there shall be no debate at this stage.

70. The Secretary shall cause every report of a Select Committee, together with the minutes of dissent, if any, to be printed in Urdu, Bengali and English and a copy thereof shall be made available for the use of every member of the Assembly. The report, with the minutes of dissent, if any, and the amended Bill shall be published in the Gazette.

71. (1) After presentation of the final report of a Select Committee on a Bill, the member-in-charge may move—

(a) that the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be taken into consideration: provided that any member of the Assembly may object to its being so taken into consideration if a copy of the report has not been made available for the use of members for seven days, and such objection shall prevail, unless the Speaker, in the exercise of his power to suspend this rule, allows the report to be taken into consideration; or

(b) that the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be referred to the same Committee again either—

(i) without limitation, or

(ii) with respect to particular clauses or amendments only, or

(iii) with instructions to the Select Committee to make some particular or an additional provision in the Bill; or

(c) that the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be circulated or re-circulated for the purpose of obtaining opinion or further opinion thereon.

(2) If the member-in-charge moves that the Bill be taken into consideration, any member may move as an amendment that the Bill be referred to the same Committee again or be circulated or re-circulated for the purpose of obtaining opinion or further opinion thereon.

(D) Amendments to clauses, etc.

72. When a motion that a Bill be taken into consideration has been carried, any member may propose an amendment of the Bill.

73. (1) If notice of a proposed amendment has not been given two clear days before the day on which the Bill, the relevant clause or the schedule is to be considered, any member may object to the moving of the amendment, and thereupon such objection shall prevail unless the Speaker, in the exercise of his power to suspend this rule, allows the amendment to be moved.

Printing and publication of reports.

Procedure after presentation of report.

Proposal of amendment.

Notice of amendments.

National Assembly (Financial Matters) Rules

(2) The Secretary shall, if time permits, cause every notice of a proposed amendment to be printed and a copy thereof to be made available for the use of every member.

74. Notwithstanding anything contained in these Rules, it shall be in the discretion of the Speaker, when a motion that a Bill be taken into consideration has been passed, to submit the Bill, or any part of the Bill, to the Assembly, clause by clause. When this procedure is adopted, the Speaker shall call each clause separately and in respect of such clause a motion shall be deemed to have been made that this clause stand part of the Bill.

75. Amendments shall ordinarily be considered in the order of the clauses of the Bill to which they respectively relate.

(E) Passing of Bills, etc.

76. (1) When a motion that a Bill be taken into consideration has been carried and no amendment of the Bill is made, the member-in-charge may at once move that the Bill be passed.

(2) If any amendment of the Bill is made, any member may object to any motion being made, on the same day, that the Bill be passed, and thereupon such objection shall prevail, unless the Speaker in the exercise of his power to suspend this rule, allows the motion to be made.

(3) Where the objection prevails, a motion that the Bill be passed may be brought forward on any future day.

(4) At this stage no amendment to the Bill may be moved, except verbal amendments which are of formal or consequential nature.

77. The member-in-charge of a Bill may, at any stage of the Bill, move for leave to withdraw the Bill; and if such leave is granted, no further motion shall be made with reference to the Bill.

78. When a Bill is passed by the Assembly, an authenticated copy thereof, signed by the Speaker, shall be submitted direct to the President by the Secretary, for action under Article 57 of the Constitution.

79. When a Bill, which has been passed by the Assembly and submitted to the President, is returned by the President to the Assembly for reconsideration, the point or points referred for reconsideration shall be put before the Assembly by the Speaker, and shall be discussed and voted upon in the same manner as amendments to a Bill, or in such other way as the Speaker may consider most convenient for their consideration by the Assembly.

80. When a Bill has been passed by the Assembly and assented to by the President, it shall be returned to the Speaker who shall immediately cause it to be published in the Gazette.

CHAPTER XIII

Procedure in Financial Matters

(A) The Budget

107. (1) The Budget shall be presented by the Finance Minister to the Assembly on such day as the President may appoint.

(2) Subject to the provisions of the Constitution and these Rules, the Budget shall be presented to the Assembly for its consideration in the manner hereinafter provided:

(i) A separate demand shall be made in respect of the grant proposed for each Ministry: Provided that the President may cause to be included in one demand grants proposed for two or more Ministries, or make a demand in respect of expenditure which cannot readily be classified under a particular Ministry.

(ii) Each demand shall contain a statement of the total grant proposed and a statement of the detailed estimate under each grant divided into items.

(3) No demand for grant can be made except on the recommendation of the President.

108. There shall be no discussion of the Budget on the day on which it is presented to the Assembly.

109. The Budget shall be dealt with by the Assembly in two stages, namely :—

(i) a general discussion; and

(ii) the voting of demands for grants.

110. (1) On a day to be appointed by the Speaker subsequent to the day on which the Budget is presented and for such time as the Speaker may allot for this purpose, the Assembly shall be at liberty to discuss the Budget as a whole or any question of principle involved therein, but no motion shall be moved at this stage, nor shall the Budget be submitted to the vote of the Assembly.

National Assembly (Financial Matters) Rules

- (2) The Finance Minister shall have a general right of reply at the end of the discussion.
 (3) The Speaker may prescribe a time-limit for speeches.

Voting of Demands for Grants.

111. (1) The Speaker, in consultation with the Leader of the House, shall allot so many days as may be compatible with the public interest for the discussion and voting of demands for grants.

(2) On the last day of the allotted days at 7 p.m. the Speaker shall forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of all the outstanding matters in connection with the demands for grants.

(3) Cut-motion may be made to reduce any grant, but not to increase or alter the destination of grant.

(4) No amendments to cut-motions shall be permissible.

(5) When several cut-motions relating to the same demand are offered, they shall be discussed in the order in which the heads to which they relate appear in the Budget.

Notice of cut-motions.

112. If notice of a cut-motion to any grant has not been given two clear days before the day on which the demand is under consideration, any member may object to the moving of the motion, and such objection shall prevail unless the Speaker, in the exercise of his power to suspend this rule, allows the motion to be made.

113. (1) An estimate shall be presented to the Assembly for a supplementary or additional grant when—
 (i) the amount voted in the Budget for a grant is found to be insufficient for the purposes of the current year ; or

(ii) a need arises during the current year for expenditure, for which the vote of the Assembly is necessary upon some new service not contemplated in the Budget for that year:

Provided that when funds to meet proposed expenditure on a new service can be made available by re-appropriation, a demand for the grant of a token sum may be submitted to the vote of the Assembly and if the Assembly assents to the demand, funds may be made available.

(2) An estimate may be presented to the Assembly in the same session or the succeeding session, for an additional or supplementary grant in respect of any demand to which the Assembly has previously refused its assent, or the amount of which the Assembly has reduced.

(3) Supplementary or additional estimates shall be dealt with in the same manner by the Assembly as if they were demands for grants.

114. When money has been spent on any service for which the vote of the Assembly is necessary during any financial year in excess of the amount granted for that service for that year, a demand for the excess shall be presented to the Assembly by the Finance Minister and shall be dealt with in the same manner by the Assembly as if it were a demand for grant.

(B) Committee on Public Accounts

Constitution of a Committee on Public Accounts.

115. (1) As soon as may be after the commencement of the first session of the Assembly, a Committee on Public Accounts shall, subject to the Provisions of this rule, be constituted for duration of the Assembly, for the purpose of dealing with the appropriation accounts of the Government of Pakistan and the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General thereon and such other matters as the Finance Minister may refer to the Committee.

(2) The Committee on Public Accounts shall consist of not more than six members excluding the Chairman. They shall be elected by members of the Assembly according to the principle of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote.

(3) Casual vacancies in the Committee shall be filled, as soon as possible after they occur, by election in the manner aforesaid and any person so elected shall hold office for the period for which the person in whose place he is elected would, under the provisions of this rule, have held office.

(4) The Finance Minister shall be Chairman of the Committee and in the absence of the Finance Minister, the Committee shall elect its own Chairman. In the case of an equality of votes on any matter, the Chairman shall have a second or casting vote.

116. (1) In scrutinizing the Appropriation Accounts of the Government of Pakistan and the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General thereon, it shall be the duty of the Public Accounts Committee to satisfy itself—

(a) that the moneys shown in the accounts as having been disbursed were legally available for and applicable to the service or purpose to which they have been applied or charged;
 (b) that the expenditure conforms to the authority which governs it ; and
 (c) that every re-appropriation has been made in accordance with such rules as may be prescribed by the Finance Minister.

(2) It shall also be the duty of the Public Accounts Committee—
 (a) to examine such trading, manufacturing and profit and loss accounts and balance-sheets as the President may have required to be prepared, and the Comptroller and Auditor-General's report thereon ; and

(b) to consider the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General in cases where the President may have required him to conduct an audit of any receipts or to examine the accounts of stores and stock.

Control of Committee on Public Accounts.
