

FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF PAKISTAN

FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF PAKISTAN

BY:

A. K. BROHI

FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF PAKISTAN

"To seek to be wiser than the law is the very thing which is by good laws forbidden."

—Aristotle

"JUDICIAL power, as contradistinguished from the power of the laws, has no existence. Courts are the mere instruments of the law, and can will nothing."

—Chief Justice Marshall

FUNDAMENTAL LAW OF PAKISTAN

Being an exposition and a critical review of the juridical, political and ideological implications of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan in the light of the Basic Principles of Comparative Constitutional Jurisprudence.

Dedicated to the Dear and Revered Memory of Quaid-e-Millat Liaquat Ali Khan Pakistan's First Prime Minister and a Diligent Crusader and Valiant Martyr in her Cause as an expression of heartfelt Gratitude for what he and his Example has been to me and to men of my Generation.

By

A. K. Brohi

Din Muhammadi Press, McLeod Road, Karachi
Pakistan

1958

All rights including that of translation reserved by the Author.

FIRST EDITION, MAY, 1958.

Printed in Pakistan
by

Kh. Ghulam Hussain, Manager, Din Muhammadi Press, McLeod Road, Karachi and Published by him for

Al-e-Ummat
Publications

P R E F A C E

This book has been written primarily to supply the need of an elementary text book on Constitutional Law, a subject which forms an important item in the curriculum of legal studies prescribed by our Universities. A rising generation of lawyers in this country has to have the aid of a book that should first state in a simplified form, the principles of comparative constitutional jurisprudence, and then offer a critical analysis of them with particular reference to the provisions of the Constitution of our country. With this end in view, the author has endeavoured to place before the students, a comprehensive statement of the principles of Constitutional Law, and has, wherever possible, brought in the provisions of Pakistan Constitution as if in a sharp focus, so that they can be seen by them against the background furnished by an overall development of constitutional theory and practice as it obtains in several civilised countries of the modern world. The author fervently hopes that the present book will serve as a spring-board for the thoughtful students to get on to the study of the more authentic sources and authoritative treatises for the purpose of acquiring a thorough mastery over the principles of constitutional law.

Acquisition of knowledge of law is not the same thing as having merely information as to what law is : fundamentally, it consists in our capacity for correct legal thinking, that is, in the acquiring of a sure instinct for perceiving legal problems in the light of those important principles of jurisprudence which underlie the entire system of our law, nay, constitute its real essence, indeed, its very life and soul. Law is, after all, a growing organism : it is not a static institution nor a set of petrified legal propositions. This habit of correct legal thinking can be fostered in the mind of the young aspiring student, by enabling him to have an easy access to the important works on the subject, so that, quite at the formative stage of his mental life, he is enabled to enter in communion with the forensic thought of the master minds in this field. But it cannot be emphasised too often that the utterances of our great judges and jurists and other writers of repute are merely the raw material upon which the young student must be asked to concentrate his attention ; in particular, it is essential that he should be taught how to look at all this material. For instance, he should be taught how, with a becoming humility but nevertheless a dignified sense for intellectual honesty and independence, to grapple with the argument of the learned in the law in an attempt to decipher the principle of law responsible for a given opinion or utterance. "You cannot show greater reverence to a Philosopher", T.H. Green used to say, "than by pulling his system to pieces". What is true in regard to the development of critical faculties in the study of philosophy is equally true in the sphere of law. Reverence to authority is not antithetical to intellectual honesty, independence and courage.

Now, there are two ways of introducing to the beginner the basic principles and the subject matter of any branch of legal learning : the first, which may be called the method of exposition, consists in the presentation of the statement of law, attempted by the author in his own words, supported wherever possible by reference to authorities ; and, the second, which may be termed as the case-method, consists in the presentation of the basic principles of a given branch of legal study, by means of a properly edited and suitably arranged series of judicial decisions wherein these basic principles are seen enunciated and applied to the facts and circumstances of the actual cases that have gone up before courts for their adjudication. The second method is by far the better of the two, for its application to the difficult task of teaching law to the student, results in atleast one clear advantage, namely, that it enables the student to have access to an authentic statement of law in the very words that have been used by the learned Judges themselves; and what is more, the student is thereby helped to see, for himself, the judicial method actually at work and thus made at first hand to understand and appreciate the way in which the principles of law are applied in the determination of controversies that come up to the courts.

In our country, however, the Constitution, which was enacted only a year and a half ago, is yet to be judicially interpreted and, such a body of judicial decisions as we actually do have, cannot very well be regarded in any sense as being sufficient for serving as the material in the light of which the application of the teaching of law by the case-method could be effectively invoked. We must therefore perforce await the advent of that day when the future commentator on our country's Constitution should have the necessary material presented to him by decisions rendered by our superior courts in regard to the interpretation of our Constitution in its various spheres of application. And as any one can see, some time must necessarily elapse before such an authentic commentary, based on authoritative decisions of our courts, could at all be made available to us. In the meanwhile, we must fall back upon the conventional method of presenting a concise statement of the constitutional law of our country by the application of the method of exposition referred to above.

In the pages that follow, however, an attempt has been made by the author to combine the method of critical exposition of the subject of 'Constitutional Law' with that of case-method; and the author has, with this end in view, liberally drawn upon the decisions rendered by the United States Supreme Court, the House of Lords, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the High Court of Australia, the Supreme Courts of Canada, India and the Federal Courts of India and Pakistan in an endeavour to borrow such light as is possible under the circumstances for the purpose of rendering plain the 'first principles' of our constitutional law and jurisprudence. These decisions, be it noted, have been appealed to by him not so much in the sense in which they could be regarded as 'infallible oracles' that must, anyhow, be obeyed in the matter of interpreting and applying the provisions of the Constitution of Pakistan, but as merely furnishing to our statesmen, administrators, lawyers and judges not only an important source of inspiration but also a welcome aid and assistance in the interpretation of our Constitution. The framers of our Constitution have themselves drawn considerably upon the experience in this field of those who have, before them, framed and worked the Constitutions of their own countries. And the present writer would venture to submit that it would be worse than being pretentious for any one in this Country to claim that there is anything so very unique or original about any dominant trait of our Constitution which would not be referable to some constitutional experiment or precedent upon that point or which would not bear examination in the light of the judicial decisions rendered by the superior courts of countries that have the system of law and jurisprudence that is akin to our own. The debt that we in this country owe to our precursors in this field is so enormous that it would amount to an act of unpardonable ingratitude if anyone of us felt that members of our Constituent Assembly evolved the Constitution as if from an 'eternal nowhere' or that they were not guided by the insights and intuitions of those who have before them been the pioneers in the matter of securing an overall institutional development of the Art and Science of establishing and maintaining Constitutional Governments.

A far more difficult question, however, with which the author was confronted when he set out to expound the principles of constitutional law, was to make up his mind as how best to tackle this task of interpreting the Articles of the Constitution—in particular, the problem for him was to decide, whether he should like to comment on the Constitution, Article by Article (as has been done by some of the well known commentators of the fame of Durga Das Basu, the renowned commentator of the Constitution of India, and the almost omniscient and indefatigable authors of the All India Reporter's commentaries) or to adopt the method of setting-forth the principles of constitutional law topicwise and to advert to the consideration of the several Articles of the Constitution only, as and when, a treatment of any of them became necessary in the context of a general discussion on the fundamental questions of constitutional law. He felt, however, that the latter approach would be more helpful to the students who are seeking legal education in the Law Colleges of his country. And as this was to be a book primarily for the uninitiated and not for the 'advanced' constitutional lawyer, the author had no option but to abjure the comparatively easier task of commenting on the Constitution, Article by Article, in favour of a somewhat difficult and laborious undertaking involved in having to deal with the problem of expounding the principles of constitutional law topicwise.

Besides, in the writer's considered opinion, the problem of discussing the principles of constitutional law cannot be scientifically tackled if one were to comment upon the Constitution, Article by Article. Arrangement of Articles in a written constitution, itself, is not always scientifically conceived by its authors and as is well known some of the important principles of the Constitutional Law have no direct, clear and unambiguous reference to the text of the written Constitution at all: in fact, the subject varies as hopelessly from Article to Article as it does in any dictionary of thought which follows the method of dealing with a given subject-matter in terms of the alphabetical order of its principal 'words' and 'phrases'. The book before the reader thus is not a commentary on the Articles of our Constitution in the conventional sense of that term. Nor is it merely a book of reference. The treatment of the principles of Constitutional Law, as also the interpretation of the text of our Constitution, have been inwardly conceived as an organic whole, and the book should, on that account, be read from beginning to end, like any other work which is a significant whole. The book reflects a total view of Constitutional Law—for, essentially, it is a book on Comparative Constitutional Jurisprudence. The author has dealt with the basic principles of constitutional jurisprudence and has endeavoured to present them to the students of that subject from different co-ordinates of forensic thought—in fact, he returns to them over and over again in diverse parts of his book, in order to enable the students to appreciate the fullness of their significance in the total scheme of Comparative Constitutional Jurisprudence.

It was largely due to the desire on the part of the author to place before the young students appropriate material to enable them to think correctly about legal problems, that he has quoted copiously in this study, wherever he has deemed it relevant so to do, important quotations and extracts from authoritative legal works and decisions. The intention all along has been to make the student think about legal principles and not to overwhelm him with the weight of authority or opinion. Several points of view on fundamental questions of law have been presented in the very words of some of the greatest of our judges and jurists, so that the student might have the opportunity to assess for himself the relative validity of these conflicting opinions on almost identical legal problems. The book may well, from this point of view, be regarded as an aid towards the performance by the student of a 'conducted tour' in the immense pasture of legal literature.

The delineation of the basic principles of constitutional law no doubt forms the chief object of the present study, but since the author of the present work is profoundly convinced that the Constitution of a country, as Woodrow Wilson used to say, "is not a mere lawyer's document but is in fact the vehicle of a nation's life", an effort has been made by him to present, (whenever the context has so demanded) a statement, be it even so sketchily, concerning the political and ideological implications of the Constitution of his country. The students of Politics, of Current Affairs, of Sociology and of Religion would, the author fervently hopes, find interspersed here and there in the pages of this book, some observations which would, having regard to their specialised approach to the study of constitutional problems, form the principal point of interest for them.

All over the modern world, it is increasingly being realised that law is a social science; and further, that it cannot be studied properly if it is viewed in isolation from the many dimensional activity that is going on within the Modern State. Law, in its abstraction, at the most, represents but only a cross-section of the total life of the State: the economico-political forces of our time have brought home to us the conviction that law is inextricably woven into the very warp and woof of the entire fabric of our national life and cannot therefore be adequately studied in 'splendid isolation'. A Constitution may be a book primarily for a lawyer, but it would be a mistake to regard it as though it were his exclusive preserve: it is as much needed by the statesman, by the administrator, by the journalist, by the historian—nay, even by the man-in-the-street who, thanks to the right of adult franchise which has been recognised by our Constitution, has become, in this democratic set-up of ours, the last court of appeal for deciding the political and economical questions.

Let the man in the street then be educated. How else shall he know the power that now lies in his hands? And when he will have been educated and informed of the rights that have been guaranteed to him under the Constitution and realise the extent to which his voice has to be reckoned with in the making and unmaking of Governments, he will have become a fuller man—and a better man in the bargain. The awareness of the power that is his, will give to him, not pride, but humility; not indifference to the problems affecting the governance of his country, but a keen sense of political responsibility. The only way to work the Constitution successfully, according to the present writer, is to take steps to teach the voter the value of his vote and give to him the information which it is so necessary for him to have in order that he might exercise his right of vote intelligently and in the interest of the country. It is equally necessary that all the wielders of 'constituted authority', like the legislators, the administrators and the judicial officers, be made fully aware of the limits of their power, so that they may, in the exercise of their authority act, not only within the letter of the law of the Constitution but also in accordance with the spirit thereof. For there is such a thing, says Mr. Walter Lippmann, that famous Publicist, Philosopher and Sage of America, as 'Lawless legality' and this is often, according to him, "to be found where men deny that in making or interpreting law they are bound by the spirit of the law" (See his Good Society, p. 331).

The author hopes that this book will serve to promote the general purposes for which constitutional governments are founded and will contribute to that much understanding of the mandates and exhortations of our Constitution without which we cannot for long hope to have those minimum standards of law and order that the free society of men of good-will all over the Globe requires, in order to grow, expand, and evolve and heroically live for the realisation of the values that count.

And with a view to advancing these purposes the author has laboured towards the end that the cause of constitutional government and democracy should triumph and the institutions through which these values are realized and maintained, endure for all time to come, in this sacred land of ours, that is Pakistan.

A. K. Brohi.

24th December, 1957
Masumah Terrace,
76, Islamabad, Karachi,
Pakistan.

CONTENTS (Topic-wise)

CHAPTER I. CONSTITUTION AND THE LAW OF THE CONSTITUTION

	Page
1. The concept of Constitutional law—an attempt at provisional definition Public & Private law (3) ; Law and conventions of the constitution (3-4); Study of constitution raises complicated questions (4).	3—4
2. Written constitution and constitutional law	4—5
3. The task of explaining the Articles of a written constitution is by no means simple Constitutional law and the 'written' constitution (6)	5—6
4. Concept of constitutional law as expounded by English Lawyers Some constitutional enactments (7); Views of Prof. Maitland Stated (7); Difficulty of working out a satisfactory definition of constitutional law—illustrations from Austin and Holland (8); Austin's approach to the concept of constitutional law (8); Professor Holland's attitude to the concept of Constitutional law (8); Maitland's criticism of Holland's and Austin's approach stated (9).	6—9
5. Idea of the fundamental law of Pakistan	9—10
6. Provisional definition offered Nature of the principles and rules that courts apply to the interpretation of our constitution (10-11).	10—11
7. Nature and purpose of written constitutions Observations of Thomas Paine. Difference between the old and new concept of "Government" (11); Government by consent of those who are to be governed (11); "Paine" on the idea of "Republic" (11); Written Constitution as a compact embodying the 'consent' of sovereign people to be governed under certain conditions (12); Idea of "Government" as an instrument of national will (12); Transition to new concept of government—Thomas Paine quoted (12); Basic principles (13).	11—13
8. Historical review of the emergence of "constitutional government" Written constitution as a "real covenant" (13-14).	13—14
9. Written and unwritten constitution—compared Importance of written constitution in a Federal Polity (14); Virtues of a written constitution offset against its rigidity and the difficulties of interpretation of the written word (14); But the criticism of written constitution is based on a misconception of its real significance (15); C.K. Allen on "English prejudice against written statutes." (15); Paradox to which a written constitution is no proof (16); Judicial interpretation at variance with the written word (16).	14—16
10. Power of judiciary to interpret "Constitution"—is a requirement of the Constitution itself Rigidity of American Constitution (16); Government of Laws—and not men—necessarily involves the idea of some organ of sovereign power to interpret the "written constitution." (17).	16—17
11. Relative merits and demerits of a written constitution—A summing up Sir Henry Maine on U.S. and English constitutions (18); Rigidity of U.S. Constitution—views of Bryce stated (18).	17—18
12. Is our constitution a rigid one? Article 216 (19); Rigidity of our constitution is of varying degrees—depending on the provision sought to be amended (19).	19
13. Comparative study of Amendment Procedures (a) In Canada (20); Distinction between the amendment procedure concerning ordinary and important provisions (20); (b) Amendment of the Indian Constitution (20-21); (c) Amendment of the U.S.A. Constitution (21); Amendment of the Swiss Constitution (21); (e) Amendment of the Constitution of the Fourth French Republic (22).	19—22
14. Rigidity vs. Flexibility considered from the viewpoint of political principle	22—23
15. Amendment procedure of our constitution is in accord with well-settled principles on the subject 'Constitutional' powers of Parliament of Pakistan (24)	23—24

Contents

xx6. Character of English Constitution—no difference between fundamental and ordinary laws Flexibility of English constitution is its primary trait (24); Inflexibility as the very essence of Constitution (25).	24—25
xx7. Constitution as "Supreme Law of the Land" .. . How is the supremacy of constitution conserved (26); Supremacy of English Parliament (26); English Parliament cannot delimit the power of the Successor Parliaments—But this is merely a convention (26); 1932, I.K.B. 733 quoted (26); Case of Ellen Street Estates Ltd. v. Minister of Health (1934) 1 K.B. 590 quoted (27); Is there a sense in which it could be said the English Parliament is not omnipotent (27).	25—27
xx8. Doctrine of Judicial Review—The American Experience .. . Two leading cases considered: Marbury v. Madison (28); Comment on Marbury v. Madison (30); M'Culloch v. Maryland (30); Marshall's contribution to Constitutional Jurisprudence (32); M. R. Cochen quoted (32); Lord Bryce quoted (33); President Jackson's protest against Marshall's views (33); Justice Holmes' views on the importance of judicial power declaring State Laws 'void' (33).	27—33
xx9. Origin of the Doctrine of Judicial Review: the English background .. . Dr. Bonham's Case (34).	33—34
xx10. Postulates of the Doctrine of Judicial Review .. . Judicial power and the Constitution (36).	34—37
xx11. Doctrine of Judicial Review of Legislation and our Constitution .. .	37
xx12. Courts of our Country—Are they super-Legislatures? Legislation void if the legislature enacting it is incompetent (38).	37—38
xx13. Power of Courts to give full effect to Constitution .. . Our polity is law-dominated (39); Government by the Judges (39); "Internal limitations and restraints" on judicial power (39).	38—40
xx14. Role of Judiciary in the English Constitution .. . Case of Lee v. Bude quoted (40); Principles of statutory interpretation in England (40); Principles of Judicial interpretation—position in Pakistan (40).	40—41
xx15. Supremacy of some Constitutions is secured through means other than that of "Judicial Review" (a) Swiss example (41); Dicey quoted (41); (b) French example (41); Conclusion (42).	41—42
xx16. Meaning of "Unconstitutional Law" .. .	42—43
xx17. Position under Government of India Act compared with the position under present Constitution Enforcement of limits on power requires the existence of an agency charged with the duty of maintaining these limits (43).	43—44
xx18. Power to declare laws "Unconstitutional"—not inconsistent with giving effect to the will of the People .. . Professor Willoughby quoted (44); (a) The case of U.S.A. Constitution (44); Walter Lippmann quoted (44); (b) Case of French Constitution: Revolutionary Constitution (45); (c) Case of French Constitution of 1946 (45); (d) Cases of Weimar and Soviet Constitutions (46); (e) Case of our Constitution (46).	44—45
xx19. Usefulness of the fiction of sovereign people establishing the Constitution .. . Lippmann quoted (46).	46
xx20. Meaning of "Sovereignty" .. . Austin's view (46); Critical estimate of Austin's views (48) Austin's Theory and the Logic of written constitution (48).	46—49
xx21. Contemporary Thought on the subject of "Sovereignty" .. . Dicey's criticism of Austin's Theory of Sovereignty (49); Theory of Sovereignty and our Constitution (50).	49—50
xx22. Paradox of the relative priority of Law and Constitution .. . Constitutions of India and Pakistan—legal basis of—(51)	50—51
CHAPTER II. SOME OUTSTANDING CHARACTERISTICS OF OUR STATE
xx33. Pakistan—Islamic Republic of Pakistan .. .	55

Contents

34. Pakistan—A Federal Republic .. . Meaning of the term "Republic" (55); Art. 208 of our Constitution (55—56).	55—56
35. State of Pakistan and the Federal Principle .. . Distinction between Federation and Confederation (56); Professor Wheare's views referred to (56); Attorney General for Commonwealth of Australia v. Colonial Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. quoted (57) Federation involves supremacy of Constitution which must be a written one (58).	56—58
36. India and Pakistan—Are they Federations ? .. . Residuary powers in Indian Union lie with the National Government (59); India, a Union of States—not a Federation but a quasi-Federal Government (59); No territorial integrity of provinces guaranteed by the Indian Constitution (60); Art. IV, S. 3 of U.S. Constitution considered (60); Federal principle and our State (60); Article 109 of our Constitution discussed (60—61); Residuary powers in the Provinces leading to a rule of construction (61); Enumeration of subjects in the Fifth Schedule of our Constitution (61); Territorial integrity of provinces of Federation under our Constitution has been duly safeguarded (61).	58—61
37. Doctrine of Dual Sovereignty has no place in our Constitution .. .	61
38. No dual system of Courts under our Constitution .. .	62
39. Federal Principle: Territorial extent of the Federal and Regional Governments .. .	62
40. Federal Capital .. . Federal Capital—Article 211 (62); Provisions of Art. 211 are anomalous (63); Art. 211—Determination of the Area of Federal Capital (64).	62—64
41. Pakistan—A Parliamentary Democracy .. . What is a Parliamentary Democracy (64); Prime Minister, Minister of State, Deputy Minister, or Parliamentary Secretary must be members of the legislature before they can be so appointed. Observations about Federal Government apply to Provincial set up also (65).	64—65
42. Presidential pattern of democratic Government .. .	65—66
43. Presidential form of Government is based on the theory of separation of Powers .. . U.S. Constitution—a system of checks and balances (67).	66—67
44. There is no 'Cabinet' in the U.S. system of Government .. .	67
45. Powers of the U. S. President .. . (a) Veto power of the U.S. President (67); Distinction between veto-power exercised in parliamentary democracy and Presidential form of Government (68); (b) President's power to send Messages to Congress (68); (c) His other powers (68); The position of the President in U.S.A. Constitution—Pearl quoted (68).	67—69
46. Cabinet Government: Walter Bagehot on the merits of parliamentary executive Earl of Balfour on Presidential and Cabinet Government (69)	69—70
47. Theory of Separation of Powers .. . Theory of separation of powers: its origin and development (70); Madison's views (71); Distribution of power in the U.S. Constitution—Finer quoted (72); Views of Harold Laski on the actual working of U.S. Constitution (72).	70—73
48. Theory of Separation of Powers and Our Constitution .. . In our Constitution there is no clear-cut division of power (75).	74—75
49. The impact of the Theory of Separation of Powers on the Interpretation of Australian Constitution .. . Case of Attorney-General of Australia v. Reginal (1957) 2 All E.R. 45 quoted (76); Scheme of the Australian Constitution (76).	75—77
50. Pakistan—and the democratic principle .. . Meaning of democracy (78); meaning of Parliament (78); Ernest Barker on theory of representative Government (79); Equality, Liberty and Fraternity (80); Rule of Majority (80); Disparity between ideals and institutional devices in democratic governments (81); Brazilian device of safeguarding democratic regime based on pluralities of parties (81); Democratic principle defined (81).	77—82
51. Delegation vs. Representation .. . Burke quoted (82); Observations of Lord Shaw in the case of Society of Railway Servants v. Osborne (1916) A.C. 87 (83); Shifts in party allegiance (83); Our country and the democratic tradition (83) political parties (84); Difficulties of democratic government (84); Importance of Public Education (85); Democratic government—its virtues (85); MacIver's views quoted (85).	82—85

Contents

52. Contents of the Constitution	86—87
Case of Punjab Province v. Malik Khizar Hayat Khan Tiwana, P.L.D. 1956, F.C. 200 quoted
CHAPTER III. MECHANISMS OF PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY
53. Legislative and Executive under our Constitution	91—92
Priority of legislative power (91); Parliament of Pakistan (91); Federal Legislature under the Government of India Act, 1935, and other Constitutions (91); Head of the State—as a part of Parliament (92); Unicameral legislature and Federalism (92).
54. President of the Republic	92—96
Role of President in a Republican Constitution (93); Our President must be a Moslem (93); His other qualifications (93); President's election to office (93); Validity of President's election can not be questioned in any court—Art. 32 (3), (93); relevance of Immunity under Art. 213 (94); His resignation etc. (94); His Impeachment—Art. 35, (94); The term of President's Office (95); Comment on Art. 33(2), (95); Purpose of Impeachment (96); Impeachment under the U.S. Constitution (97).
55. Types of Executive	97—100
Swiss Constitution—a compromise between the removable and irremovable executive (97); Arts. 95 to 103 of Swiss Constitution quoted (98); Comment on Swiss Executive—a wise constitutional solution (99).
56. Extent of Executive Authority of the Federation and the Federal Units	100
57. The Constitutional Scope of 'Executive Authority' under our Constitution	100—101
Difference between Executive and Administrative Power (101).
58. Rules of Business	102
Machinery of Government—Report of Haldane Committee—quoted. (102).
59. Summary statement of President's powers	103—110
Appointment and dismissal of Prime Minister—in his discretion (103); All Federal Executive Authority is vested in the President (103); Supreme Command of the Armed Forces (103); President's right to be informed (103); Power to Issue Proclamations of Emergency (103); Power to appoint Advisory Boards and Commissions, etc. (104); Pardoning power—(A Comment on Art. 209) (104); S. 401 Cr. P.C. quoted (104); Effect of Pardon (107); A general review of the nature of President's Authority (108); The constitutional position in England (108); Ministerial advice binding under Art. 37(7) of Constitution (109); Sanction for the violation of Art. 37(7) is not legal—but political (109).
60. The President, the Prime Minister and the Cabinet	110—116
Role of Cabinet in a parliamentary democracy (110); Prime Minister—his position (110); Prime Minister and his Cabinet colleagues (112); Collective Responsibility of the Cabinet (112); Position under the Govt. (112); Morley on Collective responsibility of the Cabinet (112); Position under the French Constitution of India Act, 1935 (113); Doctrine of Collective Responsibility and the French Constitution (113); Minister's Oath of Secrecy (114); Minister of State and Deputy Ministers (114); Can President appoint a Prime Minister during the period when Assembly is dissolved (115);
61. Dismissal of Cabinet and Cabinet Ministers and their Resignations	116
The English practice upon the question of dissolution (116); Position under our Constitution (116); Care Taker Governments (116).
62. Role of the President vis-a-vis Legislature	116—117
63. President's power to give or withhold assent to Bills and his power to return certain Bills	117—119
Art. 57 of our Constitution considered (117); Veto-power—the position in England (117); Veto-power—the position in India (118); Veto-power, the position in the United States (118); The position under the French Constitution (119); The position in Burma (119).
64. President's power to send messages and to address the Assembly	119—120
Art. 52 of our Constitution considered (119); Right to send messages: the position in England (120); Right to address or send messages: the position in India (120); President's power to send messages: the position in U.S. Constitution (120).
65. The President and the Appointment of Election Commission for Organising and conducting elections to National and Provincial Assemblies	120—123
Appointment of Election Commission and Delimitation Commission—Direction of the President (120); The position in India (121); Wisdom of conferring power of appointment in the discretion of the President (121); Election Commission is an independent and autonomous body (122).

Contents

66. President's power to dissolve the National Assembly	123—137
Articles 50 and 37 discussed (123); The position in England (124); Chalmers and Hood Phillips quoted (124); Anson quoted (124); Controversy on the Home Rule Bill (124); George Cave's views (124); Sir William Anson's view (125); Hugh Cecil's views (125); Professor Dicey's views (125); Asquith quoted (126); Reference to Viscount Haldane's views (126); Harold Laski's views (127); An appraisal and a summing up of constitutional position in England (128); Burke quoted (129); Dissolution of Assembly—constitutional position in Pakistan (129); (a) Written constitution—illustration of the principle from Canada (131); The Canadian controversy of 1926 (131); (b) illustrations from written constitution—position under the Australian constitution (132); A comment on Art. 37 (2), (133); (c) The case of Irish constitution (133); (d) The constitutional position in India (133); Power of dissolution in Pakistan—Summary and conclusion (135); President's power to summon, prorogue National Assembly (136).
67. Constitution of the National Assembly	137—138
Article 44 considered (137); Art. 45: Qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected to National Assembly (137); Art. 46: Bar against double membership (138); Art. 47 discussed (138); Art. 79 dealt with (138); Art. 48 and 49 discussed (138).
68. Constitution of the Provincial Assemblies	138—139
69. Franchise	139—141
Qualification of an elector (139); Art. 217 and the Fourth Schedule dealt with (139); Fourth paragraph of Fourth Schedule discussed (139); Power of Parliament to legislate in respect of matters mentioned in Art. 144 (140);
70. Principle of Franchise—Joint and Separate Electorates	141—143
Art. 145 discussed (141); Political implications of the principle of electorate (141).
71. Adult suffrage and Representative Government	143—144
72. Women's right to vote	144—145
73. Officers of the National and Provincial Assemblies	145—147
Speaker and Deputy Speaker (145); Importance of the Office of the Speaker (146).
74. Privileges of the Members of the National and Provincial Assemblies	147—152
Arts. 56 and 89 discussed (147); Stockdale vs. Hansard case quoted (147); Case of Bradlaugh vs. Gossett discussed (148); Meaning of the expression 'internal proceedings of the House' (150); Case of Rex v. Graham Campbell discussed (151); Privileges of the Members of the English Parliament (152).
75. Privileges of the Members of the Assemblies: The Constitutional Position in our Country.	152—161
Constituent Assembly Proceedings and Privileges Act, 1955 (153); Privileges of Members etc. (153); Comment on the text of Art. 56 of our Constitution; (154) case of Ahmad Saeed Kirmani vs. Fazal Elahi and others discussed (154); National Assembly and its power to commit for contempt (157); Case of in re. Sheriff of Middlesex discussed (158); Case of Burdett v. Abbott quoted (159); Privy Council on the inherent power of Colonial Legislatures to commit for contempt (159); No Mandamus lies against a Legislature (160).
76. The Limits on the Executive Power	161—169
The Executive and the Law (161); Motilal vs. U.P. Government (162); Case of R.S. Ram Jawaya Kapur vs. the State of Punjab (1955, S.C. 549) discussed (163); The Steel Seizure Case (1951) discussed (164); A summing up and conclusion (165); Modern executive tends to be despotic (165); Road to Moscow (166); New Despotism (166); Lord Hewart on New Despotism (166); Menace of delegated legislation (167); Defence of delegated legislation (167); Report of the Select Committee on delegated legislation (168).
77. The functions of the Legislature	169—174
Arts. 55 and 88 considered (169); (a) Legislative business and procedure (170); (b) Financial procedure (171); Excursus on the historical origins of the Government's power to tax the subjects (173); Mode of construing Fiscal Acts (174); Discussion on budget (175); (c) Legislature—as Grand Inquest of the Nation (175).
78. Prohibition against delegated legislation	176—188
Delegated legislation and the theory of separation of powers (176); increase of the legislative business in modern states (176); The constitutional objection to delegated legislation stated (177); Case of Yakus v. U.S. quoted (177); No satisfactory definition of 'legislative power' (177); Unconstitutional delegation of legislative power seen under the doctrine of English Constitutional Law (178); Case of Colonial Legislatures (178); Case of Hodge v. Queen quoted (178); Case of Russell v. The Queen stated (179); A study of the opinion delivered by Supreme Court of India in re Delhi Laws Case (179); Evolution of the legislative power in India (180); Contentions of the Attorney General of India stated (182); A summing up of the effect of pre-existing case law (182); Delegated legislation—views of Kania, C.J. (183); No firm conclusion reached by the Court (183); Jitendra Nath Gupta v. Province of Bihar ,

Contents

1949, F.C. 175, no longer good law in India (184); Observations of Das J. in 1951 S.C. 332 (Delhi Laws Case) (184); Reference to some decided cases on the problem of delegated legislation (184); Summary (184); Statement of the law as attempted by Fazl Ali, J. (185); Delegated legislation—position in our country (185); Conditional legislation (186); Power to extend the life of a temporary Act—not a conditional legislation—Sobho Gianchandi v. Crown (186); Observations of Cornelius J (187).
79. Subordinate or ancillary legislation	188—195
Case of M.V. Syed Mohd & Co. Ltd. v. State of Madras—1953, Madras 105—discussed (188); G.K. Allen on the extent of judicial control of subordinate legislation (189); Some constitutional issues presented (190); Some objectionable kinds of delegated legislation (190); Removal of difficulties clause, 1927, 2 K.B. 229 quoted (191); Conclusive evidence clause—King v. Minister of Health ex parte Yaffee, 1930, 2 K.B. 98, discussed (191); views of Swift, J. stated (192); Observation in the case of King, v. Minister of Health ex parte Yaffee—1930, 2 K.B. 98 (193); Case of Minister of Health v. King, 1931, A.C. 494 (H.L.) stated (194).
80. Adaptation of laws and the delegation of legislative power	195—198
Discussion of Article 224 (195); Removal of difficulty clause-Art. 234 (196); Effect of non-compliance with condition subsequent (197); Meaning of "as soon as may be" (197); Ordinance making power and non-compliance with condition subsequent (198), Arts. 69(2) and 102 (2) discussed (198).
81. Legislative and judicial powers of the executive—A critical review of recent trends ..	198—203
Donoughmore Committee on Ministers' powers (198); Evidence tendered by Robson (199); Recommendations not accepted by the Committee (201); Distinction between judicial and quasi-judicial decisions (201); Important cases on the subject referred (202);
82. Temporary and transitional provisions	203—205
Discussion of Arts. 222, 223, 225, 226 and 227 (203); Art. 224 continuance of existing laws (204); Indian Art. 372 (204); Continuance of existing laws in other constitutional instruments (205); Art. 234—removal of difficulties (206).
CHAPTER IV. FEDERALISM AND THE PROBLEM OF LEGISLATIVE AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMPETENCE
83. Introductory—Division of legislative power	209
84. Territorial extent of legislative power	209—215
Art. 105 stated (209); S. 99 of the Government of India Act, 1935, discussed (209); 1944 F.C. 51—case of Governor General in Council v. Raleigh Investment Co. discussed (211); 1948, P.C. 118—case of Wallace Bros v. Commissioner of Income Tax stated (213); Relevance of the concept of extra-territorial jurisdiction in sphere of Provincial Legislative Authority (214); Case of Macleod v. Attorney General for New South Wales—1891 A.C. 455 stated (214); Case of Royal Bank of Canada v. The King—1913 A.P. 283 quoted (215), Art. 107 (215).
85. Retrospectivity of laws	215—219
Retro-active legislation and penal laws (216); Does the power to legislate retrospectively extend to cover pre-constitution acts and omissions—Union of India v. Madan Gopal—1954 S.C. 158—(216); Rules of interpretation in regard to the retrospective operation of laws (217); Case of Reid v. Reid, 31 Ch. p. 402 quoted (217); Retro-active laws and res judicata—John Lenn vs. Thomas A. Mitchell, 1912 A.C. 400 (217); Hedderwick v. Federal Commissioner—1913, 16 C.L.R. 27 quoted (218);
86. Distinction between procedural law and substantive law	219—220
87. Territorial extent of provincial legislation	220—221
88. Legislative authority in relation to foreigners	221
89. Concept of the territory of the State	222
90. Legislative Competence as to subject-matter	222—233
Art. 106 of our constitution (222); S. 100 of the Government of India Act, 1935 (222); Sections 91 and 92 of the Canadian Constitution (223); Broad features of the federal principle as it operates in Canada (225); Federal principle as it operates in Australia—Sections 51 and 52 of the Commonwealth Constitution (227); The position in the U.S.A. (229); A critical comment on Arts. 106 and 110 of our constitution (230—32). Summary of combined effect of Arts. 106 & 110 (232).
91. Limitations upon competence to enact laws	233
92. Review of some decided cases	233—242
Principles illustrated in some of the cases decided by the Privy Council etc. (233); C.P. Motor Spirit Act case, 1939 F.C. 1, discussed (234); observations of Jayakar, J. (235), State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara quoted (235); Doctrine of pith and substance (236); Incidental trespass (236); Colourable legislation would be struck down (236); Case of W.R. Moran Proprietary Ltd. v. Deputy Commissioner of Taxation, 1940 A.C. 838 stated (237); Doctrine of incidental trespass; Prafulla Kumar v. Bank of Commerce of Khulna, 1947 P.C. 60 (238); A commentary on doctrine of incidental trespass in the light of Privy Council case, 1947 P.C. 60 (240); case of Megh Raj v. Allah Bakhsh, 1942 F.C. 27 (241); Privy Council case of Megh Raj v. Allah Bakhsh stated (241).

Contents

92-A. Analysis of Art. 110	242—245
The problem stated (242); Case of Subrahmanyam Chettier v. Muttuswami Goudan, 1941 F.C. 47 stated (244).
93. Section 104 of Government of India Act and Article 109 of our Constitution ..	245—247
S.104 of Govt. of India Act and Art. 109 of our Constitution discussed (245).
94. Mode of construing entries in the Fifth Schedule	247—249
95. Doctrine of occupied field	249—253
Doctrine of occupied field (249); Case of State of Bombay v. Narottamdas, 1951 S.C. 69 (251).
96. When are laws said to be repugnant to each other	253—255
97. Doctrine of implied powers	255—261
Doctrine of implied power and our Constitution (258); The approach of the High Court of Australia (258); Doctrine of implied powers in our Constitution (261).
98. Doctrine of incidental or ancillary powers	261—262
99. Doctrine of the "original package"	262—264
100. Doctrine of severability	264—266
101. The constitutional relationship of the President with the Governor	266—270
Federal Principle and the executive (266); Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. Receiver General of New Brunswick, 1892 A.C. 437; discussed (267); Case of Hodge v. The Queen, 1883, 9 A.C. 117 discussed; (268).
102. Immunity of the President and Governors from judicial process	270—272
Art. 213 of our Constitution discussed (270); Position under the Govt. of India Act (270); Sec. 306 of Govt. of India Act, 1935, quoted (271); Position under the U.S. Constitution (271).
103. Administrative relations between the Federation and the Provinces	272—273
Arts. 125 to 132 discussed (272).
104. Emergency relations between Federation and the Provinces	274—277
Comment on Part XI of the Constitution (274); Type of emergency proclamations (274);
105. Emergency provisions under other Constitutions	277—282
Position in (a) England stated (277); (b) in Canada stated (279); (c) in U.S.A. stated (281).
106. Proclamations of emergency—unchallengeable in a court of law	282
107. The legislative powers of the President and the Governors	282—283
Arts. 69 and 102—Ordinance making power (282).
108. A comment on the implications of the lapsing of temporary laws	283—288
A comment on the lapsing of temporary laws (283); S. 6 of General Clauses Act (283), The expression 'things done or omitted to be done.' (284); Re. Karamuthu Thiagarayan Chettier and others v. Rex, AIR 1947 Mad. 325 discussed (284); Case of Rex v. Wicks, 1946, 2 All E.R. 529 discussed (286).
109. Ordinance-making power available during the period when Assemblies stand dissolved ..	288—289
110. Legislative history of ordinance-making power	289—290
Art. 123 of the Indian Constitution quoted (290).
111. Some features of Ordinance Law	290—294
112. Administration of excluded and special areas	294—298
Arts. 103 and 104 of our Constitution discussed (294); Administration of justice in Special Areas (296). Political implications; an appreciation (297).

Contents

CHAPTER V. INDIVIDUAL AND THE STATE (FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS)
113.	Definition of 'right' as a term of jurisprudence Holmes definition of 'legal right' considered too narrow (302); Bentham on natural rights (302).	301—303
114.	The concept of Fundamental Right	303
115.	Notion of the fundamental law is foreign to the law of the English Constitution .. Case of City of London v. Wood, 1701, 12 Mod. Reports 669, discussed (303); Case of Rex v. Earl of Banbury quoted (304);	303—305
116.	Impact of Natural Law on the English Jurisprudence (a) For a custom to be upheld by court, it must be reasonable (305); Case of Produce Brokers v. Olympia Oil and Coke Co., 1916, 2 K.B. 296 (305); (b) Emergence of Equity Jurisprudence (305); (c) Rules of Natural Justice applied by Courts (305); (d) Recognition of Foreign Law by courts (305); (e) Doctrine of unjust enrichment (305); (f) Law of quasi-contract and law merchant (306).	305—306
117.	Impact of natural law on the American jurisprudence	306—307
118.	English Law and the concept of Fundamental Rights.. Rules of interpretation (307); Illustration of the Rules of interpretation where right to property and liberty is affected (308);	307—309
119.	Fundamental Rights and our Constitution Suspension of the fundamental rights—Art. 192 (309); Value of Bill of Rights being incorporated in a Constitution—American Example (309); Examples from other countries (310); Is it wise to have a Bill of Rights incorporated in the Constitution? The view of English Jurists (310); Case of Liversidge v. Sir John Anderson (310); Mr. Smith's views (310); Difficulty of securing precise formulation of Fundamental Rights—K.C. Wheare (311); Some constitutions merely mention Fundamental Rights but do not make them justiciable—Case of France (312); Our Constitution and Directive Principles of State Policy (313); Difficulty of Judicial enforcement (314); K.C. Wheare's illustrations from the American Experience—Meaning of liberty (314);	309—315
120.	Theoretical Basis of the Fundamental Rights Professor Friedmann's views (315); Reasons why the Bill of Rights was included in our Constitution (317); Sections 298, 299 and 300 of the Government of India Act, 1935 (318).	315—319
121.	A Comment on Article 4 Art. 4—Effect of laws inconsistent with Fundamental Rights in Part II (319); Meaning of the term 'Void' (320); Case of Keshavan Madhava Menon v. The State of Bombay, A.I.R. S.C. 128, (320); Dissenting Judgment of Fazl Ali J. supported (321); Constitution not retrospective (323).	319—323
122.	Meaning of term 'void' in American constitutional law Case of Shephard v. Wheeling (324); Wiloughby quoted (324); Case of United States v. Realty Co., 1896, 163 U.S. 427, quoted (324);	324
123.	Meaning of "State" in Article 3 of our Constitution Case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 1886, 118 U.S. 356 (325); Fundamental principles of American Jurisprudence (325); Case of University of Madras v. Shanta Bai, AIR 1954, Mad. 67, discussed (326).	324—327
124.	Does the term 'State' as defined in Art. 3 include 'Judicial Authorities' Judiciary under the scheme of our constitution (328).	327—329
125.	Fundamental rights are exhaustively stated in Part II of our constitution—The American Constitution contrasted Case of Calder v. Bull discussed (329).	329—330
126.	Difference between 'law ex facia being bad' and 'the unjust administration of a law valid on its face, being bad' Case of Dhanraj Mills v. B. K. Kocher, AIR, 1951, Bom. 132 discussed (330); The case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins reviewed (331); Case of Jibendra Kishore v. Province of East Pakistan PLD 1957, S.C. 9 quoted (333).	330—333
127.	Prohibition of Art. 4 cannot be enforced by means of a Writ of Mandamus to be issued to Legislature Case of Rex v. Legislative Committee of the Church Assembly (333); Case of Chotey Lal v. State of U.P., A.I.R. 1951 All. 228 quoted.	333—334

Contents

128.	Acts void only to the extent of inconsistency—Doctrine of severability	334
129.	The issue whether an Act is void must be decided by reference to the provisions of the impugned Act	334
130.	Some Fundamental Rights are for all and others only for citizens	334—335
131.	Definition of 'Citizen' Pakistan Citizenship Act of 1951 (335); Case of Jupiter General Insurance Co. v. Rajagopalan, AIR 1952, Punjab 9, quoted (336).	335—336
132.	Analysis of Part II 'Fundamental Rights' Right of Equality (336); Freedom of speech (337); Freedom of Assembly (337); Freedom of Association (337); Freedom of movement (337); Freedom to acquire, hold and dispose of property (337); Freedom to trade or practice a profession (338); Freedom of religious belief and practice (338); Right to status as a free citizen (338); Prohibition against forced labour (338); Right to maintain distinct culture etc. (338); Right to rule of law (338); Limitation on the state action and the making of law relating to compulsory acquisition of taking of property (Art. 15) (338); Limitation on state action on the making of law relating to arrest and detention—Art. 7 (339); Limitation on the state action on the making of Penal Laws—Art. 6 (339);	336—339
133.	A Comment on Art. 5—Right to Equality Right to equality in favour of citizens (340); The term 'States' does not occur in Art. 5 (340); Case of V. G. Row v. State of Madras, AIR, 1951 Mad. 147, reviewed (340); In re R. N. Ramakrishna, AIR 1955, Mad. 100 quoted (341); Equality before law and equal protection of law—The whole Article must be read so as to reconcile the two (341); Notion of equality (341); Right to equality available only to citizens (342); The interpretation of the Article is likely to be influenced by American concepts (342); Distinction between language of 14th amendment and our Articles (342);	339—342
134.	The 14th and the 5th Amendments of the U.S. Constitution Case of Davidson v. Board of Administrators reviewed (343); Smyth v. Ames and Truas v. Corrigan quoted (343); Equal protection of laws and the question of classification—Case of Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 1911, 220 U.S. 61, quoted (344); Fourteenth amendment—its history and purpose (345); The Indian interpretation has been unduly influenced by the American decisions (346); Case of Kameshwar Singh v. State of Bihar, AIR 1951, Pat. 91, (346); A study of the Indian decision shows a marked change in the interpretation of Art. 14 (347); Case of State of Bengal v. Anwar Ali, AIR 1952, S.C. 75, (347); Views of Bose, J. of the Indian Supreme Court (347); Case of Atchison Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Co. v. Matthews, 1899, 173 U.S. 96 quoted (350); Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 1902, 184 U.S. 540 (350); A test for adjudging an Act being discriminatory (350); Case of Jibendra Kishore v. Province of East Pakistan reviewed (351).	342—353
135.	Difficulty of applying the guarantee of equality Lord Rottschaefer's views (353); American view of the scope of 'equal protection of laws' Professor Willis quoted (354); Equal protection of law and special treatment given to a class—The Indian view (355); State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara, AIR 1951, S.C. 318 reviewed (355); Some Indian cases reviewed—Ambala v. Jawarhal, AIR 1953, Cal. 758 (356); Dharendra v. Superintendent and R.L.A. West Bengal, AIR 1954, S.C. 424 (357); State of Bombay v. United Motors Ltd. A.I.R., 1953 S.C. 252, (357); Charanjit Lal v. Union of India, A.I.R. 1951, S.C. 41 (358); Criticism of the majority view in the above case (359).	353—360
136.	Presumption in favour of the constitutionality of the impugned law	360
137.	Art. 5 and the Citizen's right of access to tribunals of the country Observations of Justice Mr. Maule in a bigamy case (360); No right to professional assistance (361); Position in America (361).	360—361
138.	Comment on some specified aspects of the right of equality Art. 14 considered (361); Case of Anjali Roy v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1952 Cal. 825, (362) Comment on Art. 15, (363).	361—363
139.	Introductory statement re. Concept of qualified liberties Introductory statement on the dogma of (reasonable restrictions) (363); Are the rights fundamental and limitations incidental? Case of Ram Singh v. the State of Delhi, AIR 1951, S.C. 270 (364); The question of burden of proof (364); Individual liberty guaranteed by law (365); Definition of liberty (365).	363—365
140.	Individual liberty and social control—in the United States Due process clause (366); Police power (366); Eminent domain and Taxation power (366).	365—367
141.	Individual liberty and social control—in England The legal position under the English constitution (367); Case of Entick v. Carrington, 1765, E.R. Vol. 95, p. 807 (367); Meaning of Rule of Law (367); Concept of the Rule of Law—Dicey quoted (367); important liberties of English subjects (368).	367—369

Contents

x42.	The individual liberty and social control—position under our Constitution	369—373
	What is and what is not reasonable restriction is for court to decide, Jeshingbhai vs. Emperor, AIR, 1950 Bom. 363 (369); Case of Brajandan Sharma v. State of Bihar quoted (369); Case of N.B. Khare v. State of Delhi, AIR 1950, S.C. 211 (370); Case of State of Madras v. V. G. Row, A.I.R. 1952 S.C. 196 (370); Chintamanrao v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR 1951, S.C. 118 (371); Some suggested tests of reasonable restriction (372); Restriction v. Regulation (372); Case of Vale Proprietary Ltd. v. New South Wales, 1954, 2 All E.R. 607 (373).
x43.	Various Freedoms considered	373—383
	(a) Freedom of speech and expression (373); Legal position in America (374); Clear and present danger (375); Pre-censorship and the freedom of expression (376); Contempt of court (377); Sec. 228 of Penal Code and Sec. 480 of Cr. P.C. (378); Nature of Defence in contempt proceedings, Isar Hussain v. Crown, PLD 1954 F. C. 313 (378); Defamation (378); Sec. 499 of Penal Code (379); Concept of decency or morality (379); Sec. 292 of the Penal Code of Penal Code (379); Case of Queen v. Benjamin Hicklin, 1868, L.R. 3 Q.B.D. 360 (379); Expert (379); Case of Queen v. Benjamin Hicklin, 1868, L.R. 3 Q.B.D. 360 (379); Expert of evidence inadmissible for determining the obscene character of publication (380); Meaning of public order, public interest, and public safety (382);
x44.	Several Freedoms considered (ctd.) (Arts. 10, 11, 18 & 16)	383—393
	Freedom of movement (383); Rights of groups under the U.S. Constitution (383); Position under our and Indian Constitution (385); Art. 10 of our Constitution (385); Comment on Art. 18—Right to profess, practise and propagate religion, etc. (386); Jibeendra Kishore v. Province of East Pakistan case discussed (386); Comment on Art. 16—Injunction against slavery and forced labour (389); 13th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution (389); Slavery and Peonage (390); Case of Bailey v. Alabama stated (391); Point of time when the labour exacted becomes forced (392); Sec. 374 of the Penal Code quoted.
x45.	A general comment on Right to the Rule of Law	393—395
	Arts. 5(2) and 15(1) of the Constitution discussed (393); Restraint on executive power (395); Comment on combined operation of Indian Arts. 21 and 19(1) (d)—A. K. Gopalan Case (394).
x46.	Concept of 'Liberty' and 'Personal Liberty'	395—402
	U.S. Supreme Court's view (395); Case of Allgreyer v. Louisiana quoted (395); Case of Meyer v. Nebraska quoted (395); Indian draft constitution—"liberty" changed into "personal liberty" (395); Meaning of "liberty"—Blackstone quoted (396); "Except in accordance with the procedure authorised by Law"—and "save in accordance with law" (396); Fazl Ali's views—minority judgment in A.K. Gopalan's case (396); Interpretation of the combined effect of Art. 5(2) Arts. 8 to 12—Resting implications of Fazl Ali's views. Due process and our constitution (397); Arts. 15(1) and 11—Rule of Law in the application to the sphere of property rights (398); "Eminent Domain" (398); Meaning of the term 'Law'—appearing in Arts. 15(1) and 5(2)—Does it mean statute law or does it include 'general law of the land' (399); Points of difference between the Indian and our Constitution on this subject (400);
x47.	Right to property—A comment on Art. 15	402—418
	Art. 31 etc. of Indian Constitution—Distinction between our Art. 15 and Indian Art. 31 etc. Sec. 299 of Govt. of India Act, 1935 quoted (404); Sec. 51 of the Australian Constitution (403); Sec. 299 of Govt. of India Act, 1935 quoted (404); Sec. 51 of the Australian Constitution quoted (404); The position under the U.S. Constitution (404); Relation between the two clauses of Art. 15 of our Constitution (404); Case of Surajmal v. Rajasthan State stated (405); Dwarkadas Shrinivas v. Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Co., A.I.R. 1951 Bom. 86 quoted (406); Saghir Ahmad's case quoted (406); Minister of State v. Dalziel 86, C.L.R. 261—meaning of 'acquisition of property' (407); Definition of some terms occurring in Art. 15—(a) Property (408); (b) Public purpose (410); Public purpose need not be expressly stated in the law relating to acquisition of property (410); (c) Acquisition of property (411); Case of Mira Khan v. Meharban and others (411); (d) compensation (411); Principles upon which compensation is paid. Case of Cedar Rapid Manufacturing Co. v. Lacoste quoted (412); Meaning of 'just terms' occurring in S.51 of Australian Constitution (413); Quotation from Nichols on Eminent Domain (413); The principles of 'judicial caution, in the matter of accepting challenges against 'property law' (413); Recent development of law in England (416); Art. 196 (416); Distinction between the constitutional safeguards in U.S.A. and in our country (416); Sections 23 and 24 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894 (417).
x48.	Art. 15 and Savings in respect of existing law	418—421
x49.	A comment on Art. 7—Limitation on the State power of arrest and detention	421—430
	S. 340 of Criminal Procedure Code (421); Right to be informed of the grounds of arrest. Case of Christie v. Leachinsky quoted (421); Art. 7(2) Right to be produced before a magistrate (423); Sec. 167 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (423); Safeguards against arbitrary preventive detention (423); Competence to enact law regarding preventive detention (424); Preventive detention (424); Detention and exterritorial (424); Concept of preventive justice. Case of Rex. v. Halliday (424); Chapter VIII of Criminal Procedure Code (424). Judicial control—satisfaction of detaining authority (425); Case of Liversidge v. Sir John Anderson 1941, 3 All E.R. 338 discussed (425); Mala fides of detention order; burden of proof (427); A summing up of the law re. preventive detention (427). Grounds to be communicated "as soon as may be" (428); Some cases reviewed. Case of Atmaram Shridhar Vaidya discussed (428);

Contents

150. Comment on Art. 5—Prohibition against ex post facto penal laws .. .	430—433
Brazilian Constitution—Art. 141 (430); American Constitution (430); Case of Calder v. Bull (431); The rule under the English law (432).
CHAPTER VI. INDIVIDUAL AND THE STATE (Constitutional Remedies)
151. Introductory statement—Arts. 22 and 170 .. .	437—446
Constitutional remedies: General introduction: Arts. 22 and 170 (437); Corresponding Indian Arts. 32 and 226 (437); 1 and 2 Geo. 6, c.63 (437); Language of article 22 is very wide (438); Analogous pre-constitutional power. S. 49; Cr. P.C. and 45 of the Specific Relief Act (438); Section 45 of the Specific Relief Act conferred power only on the three Presidency Courts (439); Jurisdiction under S. 45, a limited one (440); Pre-constitution East Bengal High Court in Pakistan alone could act under S.45 of the Specific Relief Act (440); Scope of Arts. 22 and 170 compared with S.45 Specific Relief Act (440); Territorial extent (441); 1957 PLD Dacca 342 discussed (441); Power under Art. 22 and the enforcement of fundamental rights (442); Meaning of “for any other purpose” (443); S. 223-A of Govt. of India Act (443); Language of Art. 170 analysed (443); Meaning of “any other purpose” to be restricted to the ejusdem generis rule (443); Arts. 22 and 170 confer concurrent jurisdiction in respect of the enforcement of fundamental rights (444); Supreme Court Rules 1956 (445); Is there a right vested in a subject to ask for the enforcement of the constitutional mandates ? (446).
152. The nature of Writ Jurisdiction .. .	446—450
Can the exercise of writ jurisdiction be regarded as a “proceeding” (446); Assistant Collector of Customs v. Soorajmull quoted (447); Writ jurisdiction is “paramount” (449); The scope of interference in the exercise of writ jurisdiction is wider than that warranted by ordinary remedies (450); Writ jurisdiction—A summing up (450).
153. Are constitutional remedies retrospective? .. .	450—452
Case of Jeshingbhai v. Emperor, AIR (1950) Bom. 363 quoted (451).
154. Writ of Habeas Corpus .. .	452—458
The position under U.S.A. Constitution (452); Object of writ (453); Case of Rex v. Home Secretary ex parte Greene, 1941 3 All. E.R. 104 quoted (455); Habeas corpus and mala fide order of detention (456); Failure to make a return or to make a proper return—consequences (457); Who can make an application for the writ of habeas corpus (457); Legality of detention to be determined at the time of return (457); Are proceedings for a writ of habeas corpus civil or criminal (458).
155. Writ of Mandamus—Introductory observations .. .	584—469
Mandamus defined by (a) Halsbury (458); (b) in case of Rex v. Barker (458); (c) in Rex v. Lambourn (458); (d) in re Nathan (459); Nature of public duty for the enforcement of which mandamus will issue (459); Concept of power complied with duty (459); Case of Julius v. Oxford quoted (459); Meaning of “power” and “duty” etc. (460); Must the duty be to enforce be one enjoined by enacted law as opposed to General Law. Case of Tan Bug Tain v. Collector of Bombay (462); Relevant of the principles of English Law relating to the exercise of writ jurisdiction and the interpretation of Arts. 22 and 170 (462); Relevance of case law on the interpretation of S.45 and 46 of Specific Relief Act (462); Case of P.K. Banerjee v. L. J. Simonds (462); Procedural requirements in the case of petitions for mandamus (463); Relief to be accurately stated in writ petition (464); Mandamus and discretionary orders (464); Observations of Lord Mansfield in Dr. Askew’s case (465); Observations of Cockburn, C.J. in Reg. v. Boteler quoted (466); Purposes for which mandamus will lie (467); Art. 170 confers ordinary power which has to be used cautiously—so as not to prejudice the normal system of administration of justice (468); Principles governing the grant of discretionary remedies—King v. Stafford quoted (468).
156. Writs of “Certiorari” and “Prohibition” .. .	469—475
Difference between certiorari and prohibition (469); Case of Rex v. Electricity Commissioners quoted (469); Remarks of Shah, J. in Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation case (470); Difference between prohibition and injunction (470); Case of King v. Paddington quoted (470); Case of Estate and Trust Agencies v. Singapore Improvement Trust quoted (471); when would writ of certiorari lie (472); Case of King v. Electricity Commissioners quoted (472); Case of King v. London County Council stated (472); Ryots of Garabandho v. Zamindar of Parlakimedi quoted (473); Certiorari and Mandamus—compared and contrasted (473); Certiorari and the power to summon record (474); Revisional Jurisdiction under Criminal and Civil Procedure and Certiorari (475).
157. Bodies or Authorities to whom certiorari will lie .. .	475—484
A difficult question to answer (475); Prof. Robson’s views on the impossibility of formulating a test on this matter (475); Views of Committee on Minister’s powers (476); Case of Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas quoted (477); Illustration of the difficulty of formulating test. Two cases examined (477); (a) Franklin v. Minister of Town Planning quoted (478); (b) Case of King v. Postmaster General (479); Justice Amir Ali's views in the case In re "Banwarilal" (480); An attempt at formulating a test (480); Remarks of Das, J. in Khushaldas' case are not helpful (481); Additional tests suggested—but none is decisive (482); (a) D.M. Gordon quoted (482); (b) Dr. D. C. Holland quoted (483); Roscoe Pound quoted (484); Exercise of discretion judicial or administrative (484);

Contents

158. Discretionary powers and the Fundamental Rules of a Judicial Procedure	484—485
159. Certiorary and correction of erroneous determination of jurisdictional facts	485—491
Case of State of Bombay v. Laxmidas, (1952) Bom. 468 quoted (485); Certiorari and the disregard of the condition precedent for exercise of power (486); Khushaldas Advani's Case (486); Case of Nakhuda Ali v. Jayarante, 1951, A.C. 67 quoted (488); The impact of the case of Nakhuda Ali on the interpretation of Art. 170 (490).
160. Grounds on which Certiorary would lie	491—510
Grounds on which certiorari would lie (491); Meaning of Certiorary "to quash"—and the Concept of appeal etc. (491); Certiorary—Is it a writ of right? (492); Enumeration of grounds on which certiorary lies—defect of jurisdiction (493); Bias (495); Abuse of jurisdiction (499); Ground of failure to comply with principles of natural justice (500); Alridge's case quoted (500); Audi Alteram partem rule (501); Case of Errington v. Minister of Health quoted (502); Error apparent on the face of the record (503); Hari Vishnu Kamath's case quoted (503) Rex v. Northumberland Compensation Tribunal quoted (504); Historical reasons for "error apparent" on the face of record (507); Order 47, rule 1 of Civil Procedure (507); Concept of error apparent under certiorary and review proceedings analysed (507); Illustration from Criminal Procedure Code (509); Error should not be trivial but weighty (509); Are certiorary proceedings civil or criminal (510); No implied ouster of constitution jurisdiction (510).
161. Writ of Quo Warranto	511—519
Writ of quo warranto (511); Quo warranto—civil proceedings (512); Rex v. Speyer case, quoted (512); Limits upon the issue of this writ (512); (a) Will not lie in respect of an office of a private nature (512); (b) Quo Warranto will not issue if it will be futile to do so (513); Impact of Art. 146 on the writ of quo warranto (513); Arts. 146 and 160, Jurisdiction of Supreme Court (515); The reach of quo warranto (518).
162. Writ jurisdiction as a means of securing an overall "judicial control" of administrative action	519—525
Judicial control of discretionary power (521).
163. Comparison with the Judicial review power of the United States Supreme Court	525—531

CHAPTER VII. THE NATURE, STRUCTURE AND REACH OF JUDICIAL POWER

SECTION I—General nature & scope of judicial power.

164. Consideration of Arts. 148—172	535—536
The Jurisdiction of Supreme Court completely, but of High Courts only partially set forth in our constitution (535).
165. Scope of present study of the provisions relating to judiciary	536
166. Nature and scope of judicial power	536—537
Judiciary defined (536); Judicial power—no vesting provision in our constitution corresponding to the U.S. and Australian Constitutions (536); Some definitions of Judicial power stated (536); Huddart's case quoted (536); Case of Shell Co. of Australia vs. Federal Commissioners quoted (536); Dictum of Miller J. cited (537).
167. Hierarchy of Courts	537—538
Hierarchy of courts (537); Authority of Courts to evolve legal principles (537).
168. Are our Courts, courts of law or courts of Justice?	538—543
Which way is the Judge to turn if neither statute nor precedent furnished to him the rule of decision (539); Analogical reasoning (539); relevance of persuasive precedents from foreign system of jurisprudence (540); Public policy to ethical considerations (540); Public policy and the growth of law (541); Justice according to law: View of Denning, J. quoted (542).
169. Some observations on the development of "judicial method"	543—551
Three important factors in the development of judicial method (543); Principle of consistency (543); Principle of equality (544); Element of practicability (544); Abstract notions of justice—A disturbing factor—Max Radin quoted (544); Expression "equity" and "good conscience". (546); Meaning of the term "Equity" (546); Impact of Equity on the growth of Roman and English Law (547); Principles of Natural Law and Justice (547); Baylis v. Bishop of London quoted (547); Views of professor Paton (547); Justice Holmes quoted (547); Choice of principles (548); Legal fictions and their relevance (548); Glasgow Corporation v. Muir quoted (548); Conflict between law and justice—views of Ernest Barker (549); Conclusion stated (550); Views of Judge Jerome stated (551).

Contents

170. Some terms defined	551—556
(a) Courts (552); (b) Jurisdiction (553); (c) Law (554); Austin theory of law as command examined—views of Prof. Gray supported (555).
171. Theory of Interpretation of statutes	556—561
(a) Statutes as an important source of law (556); (b) The theory of the interpretative functions of judiciary (557); (c) Intention of legislative is at best a "useful fiction" (557); (d) The Judge is not a diviner of Legislative intent—His role is creative (558); (e) Views of Prof. Pound reiterated (558); (f) Approach to judicial function: a summary statement (559); (g) Frederick Pollock's views advocated (560).
172. Rules of statutory construction	561—571
(a) Judge's duty to give effect to legislative intent (561); (b) Some technical rules on statutory constructions stated (563) Rules in Heydon's case (565); Summary statement from Sir Courtenay Ilbert (565); Construction—mandatory and discretionary provisions (565); Construction of "it shall be lawful" etc. (567).
173. Internal and External Aids for the construction of Statutes	571—572
Place of preamble in the scheme of interpretation of an enactment (571); Headings and Marginal Notes (572); Dictionaries—reports of debates, etc. (572).
174. The Judges and the problem of the interpretation of the Constitution	572—574
Interpretation of statutes: Rowland, J. in Emperor v. Benoari Lall has summed up the attitude of Privy Council (572). Same rules apply to the interpretation of a written constitution—Some cases reviewed (573); Constitution must be construed liberally (574).
175. Relevance of American cases on the interpretation of U.S. Constitutions to our system of jurisprudence	574—577
Case of (1) D'Emden v. Peddar quoted (574); (2) Bank of Toronto v. Lambe (P.C.) quoted (575); (3) Re. Amalgamated Society of Engineers, 28 C.L.R. 129 quoted (575); (4) Attorney General for Ontario v. Attorney General for Canada quoted (575); (5) Attorney General for South Wales v. Brewery Employees (576); (6) Engineers' Case, 28 C.L.R. 129 quoted (576).
176. Progressive Interpretation	577—581
Illustration of these approaches (a) English (578); (b) American (579).
177. Arguments based upon "spirit of the constitution" and the doctrine of "political necessity" etc.	581—585
The limits within which the rules of progressive interpretation would apply to our constitution (581); Willoughby quoted (582); Doctrine of Political Necessity and Interpretation of Constitution (583).
178. The dominant purpose that ought to underlie the judicial approach to constitutional interpretation	585
179. Limits of judicial power in relation to the judicial enforcement of our constitution.	585—587
180. Our supreme court and the constitution	587—590
The views of learned Hand quoted (587); Difficulty in enforcing "general principles" enacted as constitutional limitations (588).
181. Effect of court's declaration of a law as "unconstitutional"	590—593
Federal Commissioner of Taxation v. Munro quoted (591); Theoretical basis for the judicial power to strike down "unconstitutional legislation" (591); Party aggrieved alone is entitled to challenge the constitutionality of law (592); Conclusion (592).
182. Courts and the judicial precedents	593—596
"Judgment" or "opinion" of a court as embodying a rule of law (593); Blackstone quoted (594); Sir James Parke's view in Mirehouse v. Rennel quoted (594); Lord Halsbury's observations in London Street Tramways' Case (595); Rationale of the binding value of a judicial precedent (595); G.W. Keeton's views cited (595); Judicial precedent and the continental system of jurisprudence (596).
183. Factors on which the Authority of the precedent depends	596
Limit of the rule—Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co's case.
184. Rule of "Stare Decisis"	597—598
Limits of the rules of stare decisis in criminal matters. (597).

Contents

185. Doctrine of stare decisis and constitutional adjudications	598—599
Privy Council practice (598); A.G. Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation case quoted (598).
186. Argument ab inconvenienti—Federation of Pakistan v. Tamizuddin Khan	599—600
Views of Cornelius (600); Views of the American Jurists (601); United States v. State Bank case (602); Case of Lithographic Company v. Sarony quoted (603); Case of United States v. Midwest Oil Co. quoted (603).
187. Limits of the Rule re. Stare Decisis	603—604
Stare decisis—the view of American Courts (603).
188. Our Supreme Court and the rule relating to stare decisis	604—606
Binding value of precedents—previous practice (605); Decisions of foreign courts—as persuasive precedents (606);
189. Relative merits of the law declared by the Legislature and the Courts	607—609
190. How to determine the ratio decidendi of a case	609—612
Ratio decidendi —some definitions stated (609); (a) Stephens quoted (609); (b) Salmond (609); (c) Professor Gray (609); (d) C. K. Allen (609); (e) From Halsbury's Laws of England (610); Lord Dunedin's observations in 1928 A.C. 57, quoted (610); Professor Goodhart's analysis presented (610); Conclusion (611).
SECTION II—CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITS ON JUDICIAL POWER IN SPECIFIED MATTERS
(A)—Judicial power and actions against the Government
191. A comment on Article 136	613—620
Position in England (613); Crown Proceedings Act (614); Historical account of the growth of prevailing constitutional position (614); Case of Secretary of State v. Kamachi Boye Sahaba quoted (615); Observations of Sir Barnes Peacock in the Penninsular case (615); Difference between Indian Art. 300 and our Art. 136 (616); Liability of Government ex contractu (616); Delictual liability (617); Secretary of State v. Moment , 40 I.A. 48 (617); Udy Chand v. Province of Bengal (618); Is the distinction between sovereign and non-sovereign functions any longer relevant (618); The position in U.S. constitution (619); Great Northern Life Insurance Co. v. Read (620);
192. A comment on Article 135	620—621
Formal requirements in a valid contract with Government (620); Effect of non-compliance with the requirements of Art. 135 (621).
(B) The Judicial power and the Administrative Action
193. The concept of rule of law and the act of State	621—623
What is "Act of the State" (622); Case of Rustomjee v. The Queen (622); Salaman vs. Secretary of State for India quoted (622);
(C) The Judicial power and the protection of public servants
194. Comment on Article 181	623—628
Conditions of service and tenure of Public Servants—Arts. 179 and 180 and 182 (624); Public Service Commission (624); Role of Public Services (625); Nature of protection given to Civil Servants (626); The politician and the Civil Servants (626).
195. Tenure during pleasure	628—633
Shenton v. Smith (629); Views of the Privy Council in Rangachari's and Venkata Rao's cases (629); Section 96-B of the Government of India Act, 1919 (629); Government of India Act, 1935 (631); High Commissioner for India and High Commissioner for Pakistan vs. I. M. Lall (632).
196. Sec. 243 of the Government of India Act and Suraj Narain's case.	633—639
Suraj Narain's case (633); Noorul Hassan v. Federation of Pakistan (633); State of Bihar v. Abdul Majid (634); No provision in our present constitution corresponding to S. 243 of the Govt. of India Act, 1935 (635); Is breach of rules actionable (636); Case of Muhammad Ayub v. West Pakistan quoted (637).
197. Tenure during good behaviour and other allied matters	639—644
Interpretation of Dismissal, removal or reduction in rank (640); Limits within which principle of Art. 181 operates (642);
(D) Judicial Power and the Martial Law
198. Concept of Martial Law	644—645
Entry in List III and No. 1 of List I of Fifth Schedule (645).

Contents

199. Some definitions of Martial Law considered	645—650
Muhammad Munir's summing up in " Mohd. Umar Khan v. The Crown " case (645); Martial Law—as Law of necessity (646); Case of Tilonko v. Attorney General of Natal quoted (647); The purpose of an Act of Indemnity (647); Case of Phillips v. Eyre quoted (648) Martial Law and the U.S. Constitution (648); The position in America. Limits within which martial law operates stated (649); Martial law as an aspect of jus belli (650).
200. Canadian Governor General's Right to proclaim Martial Law	650
201. The concept of Military Law	650—651
202. Personnel of the Armed Forces and their relationship with General Law of the Land	651—653
203. Controlling jurisdiction of the High Court and the Courts-Martial	653—655
Case of Rex v. Secretary for War, ex parte Martyn quoted (654); Rex v. Officer Commanding Depot Battalion etc. ex parte Elliot (654); Rex v. Mansergh (655);
204. A comment on Art. 160—Ouster of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court	655
205. A comment on Art. 146	656—658
Section III—Jurisdictional Aspects of the Superior Courts
206. Constitution limit on the number of Supreme Court Judges	659—660
Number of Supreme Court Judges fixed under the Constitution to avoid the executive "packing the Court" (659); Example from U.S. History (659); Art. 124 of the Indian Constitution (660).
207. Constitutional status of our Supreme Court	660—668
Some general observations of the role of Supreme Court in a system of written constitution (660); Harold Laski's views (660); Status of Supreme Court (660).
208. The method of securing appointment of Supreme Court Judges	662—664
Election v. Nomination of Supreme Court Judges (622); Arts. 150 and 151 (663); Arts. 150(2), 166(3) and 174 (663); Art. 175 (663); Removal of Supreme Court Judge (664); A judge of a High Court cannot be transferred without his consent (Art. 172); Resignation of Judges (Art. 173).
209. Position of English Judiciary	664—666
Term and tenure of the office of Judges in England (665); The position in our country (665).
210. Jurisdiction of Supreme Court—Plan of present study	666
211. Federal Jurisdiction of Supreme Court (Art. 156)	667—671
Section 104 of Government of India Act, 1935, (667); Some American cases reviewed (669); Dominion of Canada v. The Attorney General of Ontario case, 1910 A.C. 637 (670); Art. 156 and Arts. 118 and 129 (670).
212. Supreme Court as the Court of Appeal in matters involving interpretation of the Constitution (Art. 157)	671—674
Art. 164 (672); Art. 171 (674).
213. Supreme Court as a Court of Appeal in Civil Matters (Art. 158)	674—679
Art. 158 and Ss. 109 and 110 of Code of Civil Procedure (675); Distinction between "Civil" and "Criminal" proceedings (677); High Court should give reason why it has refused to give the certificate (678); Concurrent findings of facts (679); No new point to be allowed to be raised (679).
214. Supreme Court as a Court of Criminal Appeal	679—684
Meaning of Criminal proceedings (680); Blackstone on distinction between 'public' and 'private' wrong (680); The nature of 'contempt' proceedings (681); The fitness of a criminal case for appeal to Supreme Court (682); Bibhabati Devi v. Ramendra Narayan quoted (682); Case of Pritam Singh vs. The State (683);
215. Supreme Court and its general jurisdiction to grant special leave to appeal (Art. 150)	684—685
216. Supreme Court and its Advisory Jurisdiction (Art. 162)	685—691
Advisory Jurisdiction (685); The position in the U.S.A. (685); Rationale of the refusal by the U.S. Supreme Court to exercise Advisory Jurisdiction (686); The nature of objection to the enforcement of Advisory Jurisdiction on Courts (686); Views of Zafrullah Khan (687); Case of Attorney General for British Columbia v. Attorney General for Canada , 1914, A.C. 153 (688); Reference made by the Governor General, 1955 PLD Federal Court 435 (688); The Advisory opinion is not "law declared" and is not binding upon Courts (690).

Contents

217. The Supreme Court and the Power of Review (Art. 151)	691—694
Order 47, Rule 1, C.P.C. (692); Grounds of Review (693); "Appeal" and "Review" proceedings distinguished (694).
218. Constitution and the Jurisdiction of the High Courts in Pakistan	694—700
Administrative functions of High Courts (695); Importance of High Courts in the scheme of administration of Justice (695); Outline of judicial History of the powers of Superior Courts (696).
219. Constitutional status of the Supreme Court and the High Courts	700—704
Relationship of Supreme Court with the High Courts.
220. The Privy Council as a Court of Indian Appeal	704—708
Case of British Coal Corp. v. King (705); Historical review of the growth of Privy Council Jurisdiction (705); Chief Justice Md. Munir's tribute to the Privy Council (707); Privy Council Practice (708).

Section IV—Outline of the General System of the Law & Courts of our country

221. Subordinate Judiciary	709—72
Terms and conditions of subordinate judiciary not mentioned in the Constitution (709); High Court's power of general superintendence and control of subordinate courts (709); The broad categories of subordinate courts (710); System of civil subordinate courts (710); General Jurisdiction of Civil Courts, S.9 of Civil Procedure Code (710); Primacy of the ordinary Civil Courts Jurisdiction over courts and tribunals of special jurisdiction (711); System of subordinate Criminal Courts (712); Criminal Procedure (712); With us substantive Criminal Law is a creature of Statute (713); Relevance of study of English Criminal Law (713); Concept of crime in law— Mens rea and actus reus (713); Mens rea and offences of absolute Liability (714); Meaning of burden of proof in English Law (714); Our law of evidence is codified (715); Sections 3, 101 to 114 of Evidence Act (715); Woolmington's Case quoted (719); Observations of Collister J. in 1941 All 402 supported (719).
222. Professional services of the Bar and the Administration of Justice	721—728
The predicament of the professional Advocate (721); Some questions on professional ethics (722); Current prejudice against the profession of law examined (724); Bench and the Bar—and the qualities that count (725); J. S. Mill on the wickedness of the Court (726).

CHAPTER VIII. RELIGIOUS, ETHICAL AND IDEOLOGICAL IMPLICATIONS OF OUR CONSTITUTION
223. The discussion of ethico-religious basis of the state is not strictly relevant in a study like the present one	731—732
Nature of meta-jurisprudential questions posed in this study (731); Relationship of the law to the State (731); State as an agent of Higher Law (731).
224. Declaration in the Preamble that Sovereignty over the Universe belongs to God	732—734
State of Pakistan as a juridical entity (732); Basic philosophic conception of law is the same everywhere (732); Views of Cicero stated (733); Ernest Barker attributes idea of Natural Law to "an old and indivisible movement of the mind." (733); Higher Law and the religious hypothesis (733).
225. Revealed religion as a means of securing the overall education of the human race	734—735
Islam—a natural religion (734); Man's finitude posits as a reaction the existence of the Infinite (734); Essentials of Islam (735); Dr. Zaki's definition of Islam cited (735).
226. Relevance of religious hypothesis to the establishment of a Constitutional set-up	735—739
DeTocqueville's views (736); Religious law as the underlying principle of constitutional governments (737); Constitution of the United States and the religious hypothesis (737); Transcendental basis of American Constitution (738); Impact of religious look on the writings of America Founding Fathers (738); Significance of the First Amendment of the American Constitution (739).
227. No place under our Constitution for an "official or State-religion"	739—740
Religious freedom admissible to all citizens (740).
228. Implication of the name "Islamic Republic of Pakistan"	740—744
Summary of statement of the religious provisions contained in our Constitution (740); (a) Preamble (740); Art. 1 (741); Art. 24 (741); Art. 25(741); Art. 32 (741); Art. 197(741);

Contents

Art. 198(741); President of our State to be Muslim, but he has no real power (742); Religious provisions in some other constitutions (742); Ireland (742); Sweden (742); Norway (742); Denmark (743); Switzerland (743); Greece (743); Argentina (743); Afghanistan (743); Iran (743); Iraq (743); Syria (744); Other religious provisions are directory (744).
229. What is an Islamic State? Views of the Authors of the Martial Law Court of Inquiry Report	744—747
Munir Enquiry Report (744); A comment on the views of the Court of Enquiry (745); Islam is not an exclusive preserve of a group of people (746);
230. Concept of Islamic State—Reference to other Authorities	747—750
(A) Mohd. Asad's views (747); (B) Views of Maulana Maudoodi (749).
231. Concept of Islamic State—Conclusion of the argument	750—754
Religious foundation of law is not a distinctive feature of the law of Islam (750); Islam emphasises development of character of the individual (750); Islam—as a decisive de-facto historical force of our time (751); Gladstone quoted (752); Modern man is lacking in capacity for rational thought and action (753); conflict between our 'professions' and 'practices' (754).
232. Theory of the state and the Law in Islam	754—756
Transforming the character of individual is the primary concern of Islamic teaching (755); Islam engenders a move towards a supra-national synthesis of mankind (755); Muslim community cemented by the tie of faith (755).
233. Value of early experiments by Muslim administrators assessed in the light of conditions then prevailing	756—757
234. Theoretical Foundation of social order in Islam	757—760
Views of Ibn Khaldun stated (757); Abdur Rahim's conception of State in the Muhammadan system (758); Beginnings of legislation in the history of Islam (759); Right to follow one's own opinion where Quran and Hadith offer no guidance for the solution of political problem (759); A summing up (760); Difference between religious and secular law (760).
235. Morality and religion	760—762
Religion explains how morality is possible (761); the atheistic attitude to moral causation (761).
236. Marxian view of 'religion' and 'history' examined	762—766
Islam and communism (765).
237. Communism as philosophy of life	766—768
Relevance of economic factors in history (767).
238. Is there a distinction between secular and religious law?	768
239. Reasons why people of Pakistan constituted themselves into a State to be known as "Islamic Republic"	768—769
240. A brief historical account of the emergence of the State of Pakistan	769—771
Basis of the partition of India (770); Our constitution establishes the frame-work of a liberal democratic rule (771); Our constitution lays emphasis on the development of Islamic law (771).
241. Sources of Muslim Law	771—776
1. Qur'an (771); 2. Hadith (772); Value of Abadith—a comment by the Martial Law Inquiry Tribunal (773); 3. Ijma (774); 4. Qiyyas (774); Conclusion (774).
242. The application of Muslim Law in British India	776—782
A historical review (776); Freeman v. Fairlie, 1 M.I.A. 306(776) ; Position in Madras and Bombay Presidencies (779); The position in the Punjab (780); Conclusion (781).
243. Analysis of Arts. 197 and 198	782—784
Conclusion (784).
244. A comment on the socio-economic state policy	785—787
Arts. 28 and 29 (785); Art. 199 (786).
245. Concluding Considerations	787—799
Impact of western thought and culture on the world of Islam (787); Gospel of nationalism (787); European renaissance of the 15th century (788); Reflections on contemporary chaos in the field of international relations (789); Genology of western ideology (790); Re-action of Muslim people to western civilisation and culture (790); Kemal Ataturk and Riza Shah Pehlavi (79); Implications of ideological State (791); Frederick Hertz quoted (793); Iqbal's views (795); Dr. Zaki's views on the impact of Islam on "Arab nationalism" (796); Islam—as a fecundating principle of human civilization and culture (798).

Contents

Article-wise

[for Text of the Constitution, see Appendix, pp. 803—858].

	Pages
Preamble	732, 740
PART I
THE REPUBLIC AND ITS TERRITORIES
All its Territories	19, 55, 60, 61, 62, 293, 740, 741.
All territories outside the Provinces. ..	62.
PART II
FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS
State	324, 325, 327, 329.
All with or in derogation of the fundamental rights	37, 204, 309, 319, 320, 333, 334, 336, 369.
law	37, 161, 336, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 350, 351, 352, 353, 360, 361, 362, 393, 395, 396, 399, 400, 402, 419.
All retrospective offences or punishment	216, 336, 430, 432, 433.
arrest and detention	336, 393, 421, 423, 424, 425.
Each	37, 336, 337, 363, 369, 373, 374, 376, 382, 395, 396, 397, 588.
Assembly	37, 151, 336, 337, 363, 369, 373, 382, 395, 396, 397, 588.
Citizenship	37, 336, 337, 363, 369, 373, 382, 383, 385, 395, 396, 397, 588.
Movement and right to hold and dispose of property	37, 336, 337, 338, 363, 369, 373, 382, 383, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 405, 588.
Trade, business or profession	336, 338, 363, 369, 373, 395, 396, 397, 588.
Educational institutions in respect of religion, etc.	320, 321, 322, 323, 336, 337, 338, 363, 739
Protection in respect of access to public places	331, 336, 361, 362, 363, 398, 739.
Property rights	37, 161, 336, 337, 338, 339, 351, 393, 397, 398, 399, 400, 402, 403, 404, 405, 408, 410, 411, 418, 419, 420.
Prohibited labour prohibited	336, 383, 388, 389, 390, 391, 393.
Against discrimination in services	336, 337, 363, 739.
To profess religion and to manage religious institutions	336, 338, 363, 386, 387, 739, 742.
Of culture, script and language	336, 338.
Untouchability	336, 337.
Against taxation for purposes of any particular religion	336, 337, 739.
Enforcement of rights conferred by this Part	37, 110, 155, 160, 297, 336, 339, 437, 438, 440, 441, 443, 444, 445, 446, 451, 462, 490, 491, 519, 524, 586, 666.

PART III DIRECTIVE PRINCIPLES OF STATE POLICY

23.	Definition of State 313, 333, 341
24.	Promotion of Muslim unity and international peace 313, 741, 742.
25.	Promotion of Islamic Principles 313, 741, 742.
26.	Parochial and other similar prejudices to be discouraged 313.
27.	Protection of minorities 313, 771.
28.	Principles of social uplift 313, 785.
29.	Promotion of social and economic well-being of the people 313, 351, 785.
30.	Separation of the Judiciary from the Executive 313.
31.	Provisions for equal participation in national activities by people of Pakistan.	19, 293, 313.

Contents

PART IV

THE FEDERATION

Chapter I.—The Federal Government

Articles		Pages
32. The President	38, 93, 94, 95, 96, 586, 741, 657, 658.
33. Term of office of President	93, 94, 95.
34. Disabilities of the President	94, 95, 96.
35. Impeachment of the President	93, 94.
36. Speaker of National Assembly to act as President	93, 95, 147, 313, 742.
37. The Cabinet	38, 64, 65, 74, 93, 100, 103, 108, 109, 110, 114, 115, 116, 120, 123, 129, 130, 133, 135, 136, 158, 313, 586.
38. Attorney-General	108, 313.
39. Extent of Executive Authority of the Federation	19, 91, 103, 161, 293, 313.
40. Supreme Command of the Armed Forces	103, 313, 645.
41. Conduct of business of the Federal Government	102, 103, 109, 313.
42. Duties of Prime Minister in relation to President	103, 136, 313.
Chapter II.—The Parliament of Pakistan
43. Parliament of Pakistan	91, 313.
44. Composition of the National Assembly	19, 137, 145, 293, 313.
45. Qualifications and disqualifications for membership	95, 137, 138, 139, 313.
46. Bar against double membership	138, 313.
47. Absence from the National Assembly	138, 313.
48. Oath of members	138, 313.
49. Resignation of members	138, 313.
Meetings and Procedure of the National Assembly
50. Duration, summoning, prorogation and dissolution of the National Assembly	117, 123, 129, 130, 135, 136, 137, 313.
51. Sessions of the National Assembly	137, 313.
52. President's address and messages to the National Assembly	117, 119, 120.
53. Right of Ministers and the Attorney-General to address the National Assembly	134.
54. Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the National Assembly	145, 146.
55. Rules of procedure, quorum, etc.	147, 169, 170, 783.
56. Privileges, etc. of members of the National Assembly	38, 147, 152, 153, 154, 586.
57. President's assent to Bills	74, 117, 173.
Financial Procedure
58. Money Bills	38, 74, 146, 171, 586.
59. President's recommendation required for financial measures	74, 171.
60. No taxation except by an Act of Parliament	161, 171, 293.
61. Federal Consolidated Fund and the Public Account of the Federation	135, 171.
62. Custody of public moneys of the Federation	171.
63. Annual Financial Statement	171, 172, 288, 289.
64. Charges on the Federal Consolidated Fund	123, 171, 172.
65. Procedure relating to Annual Financial Statement	171, 172, 288, 289.
66. Appropriation Bill	171, 172, 288, 289.
67. Supplementary and Excess Grants	171, 172.
68. Votes on Account, Votes of Credit, etc.	171, 172.
Legislative Powers of the President
69. Promulgation of Ordinances when National Assembly is not in Session	63, 74, 198, 282, 289, 293, 298.

Contents

PART V
THE PROVINCES
Chapter I.—The Provincial Government
Articles	Pages
70. The Governors	65, 100, 108, 266.
71. The Cabinet	65, 100, 266.
72. The Advocate-General for the Province	65.
73. Extent of Executive Authority of a Province	65, 91, 100, 161.
74. Conduct of business of the Provincial Government	65, 134.
75. Duties of Chief Minister in relation to Governor	65, 134.
Chapter II.—The Provincial Legislature
76. The Provincial Legislature	91, 138.
77. Composition of Provincial Assembly	19, 138, 145, 293.
78. Qualifications and disqualifications for membership	134, 138, 139.
79. Bar against double membership	138.
80. Absence from Provincial Assembly	138.
81. Oath of Members	138.
82. Resignation of Members	138.
Meetings and Procedure of Provincial Assembly
83. Duration, summoning, prorogation and dissolution of a Provincial Assembly
84. Sessions of a Provincial Assembly
85. Governor's address and messages to the Provincial Assembly
86. Right of Ministers and the Advocate-General to address a Provincial Assembly
87. Speaker and Deputy Speaker	145, 146.
88. Rules of procedure, quorum, etc.	147, 156, 169, 783.
89. Privileges, etc., of the members of the Provincial Assembly	147, 154, 155, 156, 160,
90. Governor's assent to Bills
Financial Procedure
91. Money Bills	146, 171.
92. Governor's recommendation required for financial measures	171.
93. No taxation except by Act of the Provincial Legislature	161, 171, 293.
94. Provincial Consolidated Fund and the Public Account of the Province	171.
95. Custody of public moneys in a Province	171.
96. Annual Financial Statement	171, 289.
97. Charges on the Provincial Consolidated Fund	171, 172.
98. Procedure relating to Annual Financial Statement	171, 172, 289.
99. Appropriation Bill	171, 172, 289.
100. Supplementary and Excess Grants	171.
101. Votes on Account, Votes of Credit, etc.	171, 172.
Legislative Powers of the Governor
102. Promulgation of Ordinances when Provincial Assembly is not in session.	198, 282, 289.
Excluded and Special Areas
103. Excluded Areas	294.
104. Special Areas	294, 295, 297.
PART VI
RELATIONS BETWEEN THE FEDERATION AND THE PROVINCES
Chapter I.—Legislative Powers
105. Extent of Federal and Provincial Laws	38, 100, 185, 209, 214, 216, 233, 520.

Article-wise Index

Article	Pages
106. Subject-matter of Federal and Provincial Laws	19, 38, 41, 100, 209, 222, 223, 230, 231, 232, 233, 240, 242, 244, 245, 246, 249, 293, 520.
107. Power of Parliament to legislate for Provinces by consent	41, 100, 209, 215, 233, 240, 243.
108. Power of Parliament to give effect to International agreements, etc.	41, 100, 209.
109. Residuary power of legislation	41, 100, 209, 231, 245, 246.
110. Inconsistency between laws made by Parliament and laws made by the Provincial Legislature.	38, 41, 100, 209, 230, 231, 232, 233, 240, 242, 243, 244, 249, 251, 520.
111. Provisions as to recommendations	41, 100, 209.
Chapter II.—Financial Provisions
112. Property of the Federal and Provincial Governments exempted from taxes.	41, 100
113. Exemption from taxes on electricity	41, 100.
114. Grant-in-aid to Provinces	100.
115. Borrowing by the Federation	100.
116. Loans to and borrowing by the Provinces	100.
117. Taxes on professions, trades, callings and employments	19, 100, 293, 670, 671.
118. National Finance Commission	19, 100, 293.
119. Inter-Provincial trade	19, 100, 293.
Chapter III.—Audit and Accounts
120. Comptroller and Auditor General of Pakistan	108, 173.
121. Removal of the Comptroller and Auditor-General and ineligibility for further service.	173.
122. Duties and powers of Comptroller and Auditor-General	173.
123. Form of public accounts	173.
124. Reports of Comptroller and Auditor-General	173.
Chapter IV.—Administrative Relations Between the Federation and the Provinces
125. Protection of Provinces by Federation	272.
126. Directions to Provincial Governments in certain cases	272, 273.
127. Delegation of powers to Provinces	272, 273.
128. Acquisition of land for Federal purposes	272, 273.
129. Settlement of disputes	272, 273, 670, 671.
130. Inter-Provincial Council	272, 273.
131. Broadcasting	272, 273, 672, 675.
132. Transfer of railways to Provincial control	272, 273, 672, 675.
PART VII
PROPERTY, CONTRACTS AND SUITS
133. Property accruing by escheat or lapse or as bona vacantia	279, 672, 675.
134. Power to acquire and dispose of property and make contracts	270, 616.
135. Contracts	270, 616, 617, 620, 621.
136. Suits and proceedings	270, 613, 616, 619.
PART VIII
ELECTIONS
137. Composition of Election Commission and Regional Commissions	93, 108, 117, 120, 121.
138. Conditions of service of Election Commissioner and Regional Election Commissioners.	123.
139. Assistance to Election Commission	121, 122.
140. Functions of Election Commission	123, 137, 667, 691.
141. Time of Election and By-election

Contents

Article	Pages
142. Delimitation Commission	38, 108, 117, 120, 142, 420, 586, 691.
143. Qualifications of electors	95, 96, 137, 139, 691.
144. Electoral laws	140, 293.
145. Principle of electorate	141, 293.
146. Election Tribunals	513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 586, 656, 657, 685.
147. Special provisions for Special Areas	297, 298, 672.

PART IX

THE JUDICIARY

Chapter I.—The Supreme Court

148. Establishment and constitution of the Supreme Court	535, 659.
149. Appointment of Judges of Supreme Court	108, 535, 659, 663.
150. Age of retirement and disabilities of Judges of Supreme Court	535, 659, 663.
151. Removal of Judges of Supreme Court	161, 535, 659, 663.
152. Temporary appointment of Chief Justice	535, 659.
153. Temporary appointment of Acting Puisne Judges	535, 659.
154. Appointment of ad hoc Judges	535, 659.
155. Seat of the Supreme Court	535, 659, 667.
156. Original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court	535, 659, 666, 667, 668, 670, 671.
157. Appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in matters involving interpretation of Constitution	535, 659, 665, 666; 671, 672, 673, 674, 675.
158. Appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in civil matters	535, 659, 666, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 681.
159. Appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in criminal matters	535, 659, 666, 677, 679, 680, 681, 682.
160. Appeal to the Supreme Court by special leave of the Court	515, 516, 518, 535, 598, 656, 657, 659, 666, 678, 680, 682, 684, 685.
161. Review of judgments or orders by the Supreme Court	535, 598, 659, 666, 691.
162. Advisory jurisdiction of the Supreme Court	206, 535, 659, 685, 690, 691.
163. Enforcement of the decrees and orders of the Supreme Court and powers of the Supreme Court	535, 605, 659, 691, 702.
164. Interpretation	535, 659, 672, 673.

Chapter II.—The High Courts

165. Constitution of High Courts	297, 535, 694.
166. Appointment of High Court Judges	108, 535, 663, 664.
167. Qualifications of High Court Judges	535.
168. Temporary appointment of Chief Justice and Judges of High Courts	535.
169. Removal of Judges of High Courts	535, 664.
170. Power of High Courts to issue certain writs, etc.	37, 110, 154, 155, 156, 160, 297, 339, 437, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 449, 450, 451, 462, 468, 490, 491, 519, 524, 535, 586, 638, 639, 653, 656, 695.
171. Power of High Court to transfer cases to itself from subordinate courts	297, 535, 674, 695.
172. Transfer of High Court Judges	535, 664.

Chapter III.—General Provisions as to the Supreme Court and High Courts

173. Resignation of Judges of Supreme Court and High Courts	535, 664.
174. Ineligibility of Supreme Court and High Court Judges for employment as Governor	535, 663.
175. Remuneration, etc., of Judges of Supreme Court and High Courts	161, 535, 663.
176. Supreme Court and High Courts to be courts of record	535, 700.
177. Application of Third Schedule	535.
178. Exclusion of Supreme Court and High Court jurisdiction from Special Areas	296, 297, 298, 535.

Contents

Article	Pages
PART X
THE SERVICES OF PAKISTAN
Chapter I.—Services
179. Conditions of service of persons in the service of Pakistan	624.
180. Tenure of office of persons employed in public services	624, 638, 639.
181. Dismissal, disciplinary matters, etc.	623, 624, 635, 636, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645.
182. Recruitment and conditions of service	624, 626, 636, 637, 638, 639, 641.
183. All-Pakistan Services	626.

Chapter II.—Public Service Commissions

184. Public Service Commissions
185. Composition of Public Service Commissions
186. Appointment, etc. of Members of Public Service Commissions	108, 625.
187. Removal of the Members of Public Service Commissions
188. Functions of Public Service Commissions	625.
189. Power to extend functions of Public Service Commissions
190. Reports of Public Service Commissions

PART XI

EMERGENCY PROVISIONS

191. Proclamation of emergency on account of war, internal disturbance, etc.	103, 137, 274, 275, 282, 303, 309.
192. President's power to suspend fundamental rights, etc. during emergency period.	137, 275, 303, 309.
193. Proclamation of assumption of power by the Federation in case of failure of constitutional machinery in provinces.	103, 108, 274, 275, 276, 277, 282, 283, 284.
194. Proclamation in case of financial emergency	274, 277, 282.
195. Revocation of Proclamation, etc.	103, 274, 586.
196. Parliament to make laws of indemnity, etc.	274, 309, 416, 644, 650.

PART XII

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Chapter I.—Islamic Provisions
197. Organisation for Islamic research and instruction	104, 731, 741, 744, 782, 783.
198. Provisions relating to the Holy Quran and Sunnah	104, 731, 741, 744, 771, 782, 783, 784.

Chapter II.—Appointment of Special Councils and Boards

199. National Economic Council	19, 104, 293, 786.
200. Appointment of Advisory Boards for Posts and Telegraphs Department.	104.

Chapter III.—Provisions relating to States and Rulers

201. Territories in accession with Pakistan
202. Agreements relating to Rulers
203. Provisions relating to the State of Jammu and Kashmir

Chapter IV.—Scheduled Castes and Backward Classes

204. Definition of Scheduled Castes	786.
205. Promotion of the interests of Scheduled Castes and backward classes.	786.
206. Appointment of Commission to investigate the conditions of Scheduled Castes and backward classes.	104, 786.
207. Special Officer for Scheduled Castes and backward classes	104, 786.

Contents

Article	Pages
Chapter V.—Miscellaneous
208. Titles, honours and decorations	55, 104.
209. Pardons, reprieves, etc.	104, 107.
210. Special provisions relating to major ports and aerodromes
211. Federal Capital	62, 63, 64, 108.
212. Remuneration of President, Ministers, etc., not to be varied during their term of office.	..
213. Protection to the President and the Governor	94, 270.
214. State languages
215. Oaths and affirmations
216. Amendment of the Constitution	64, 293, 309, 586.
217. Application of Fourth Schedule	139, 157
Chapter VI.—Interpretation
218. Definitions, etc.	9, 157, 158, 230, 283, 293, 295, 319, 335, 624, 675.
219. Application of General Clauses Act, 1897 ..	9, 293.
Chapter VII.—Commencement and Repeal
220. Commencement	9.
221. Repeal	153, 204, 206 304.
PART XIII
TEMPORARY AND TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS
222. Provision as to President	203, 586.
223. Provision as to the National Assembly and its officers ..	203.
224. Continuance in force of existing laws and their adaptation ..	35, 62, 130, 153, 157, 195, 196, 204, 205, 303, 320, 400, 402, 524, 535, 536, 616, 644, 657, 695, 781.
225. Provincial Legislatures	203, 535.
226. Continuance in office of Governors, Ministers and Advocate-General.	203, 331.
227. Judges, courts and legal proceedings	203, 297, 535, 675.
228. Legal proceedings by or against the Federation of Pakistan ..	203, 206.
229. Public Service Commission	203, 206.
230. Provisions as to financial matters	203, 206.
231. Succession to property and assets, rights, liabilities and obligations ..	205, 206.
232. Transitional provisions as to servants of the Crown ..	205, 206.
233. Transitional provisions as to conditions of service of persons appointed by the Secretary of State.	206.
234. Power of President to remove difficulties	196, 205, 206.

APPENDIX—(803-982)

1. Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan	803—858
2. Pakistan Citizenship Act, 1951 (as modified)	859—863
3. General Clauses Act, 1897	864—876
4. Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955	877—882
5. Representation of the People Act, 1957	883—908
6. Constitution of India (Part III—Fundamental Rights)	909—914
7. Constitution of United States of America	915—923
8. Statement by H.M.'s Government, (3-6-1947)	924—926
9. Indian Independence Act, 1947	927—936
10. Quaid-i-Azam's First Presidential address to the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan on 11-8-1947	937—938
11. Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan's speech dated 3-3-1949 introducing the "Objectives" Resolution ..	939—942
12. Essay on the creative principle of political constitutions (By Joseph de Maistre) ..	943—947
13. Supreme Court Rules, 1956	948—977
14. National Assembly of Pakistan Rules	978—982

(NOTE :—For (1) Table of Cases, see pp. 983-996; (2) Subject Index, see pp. 1001—1016.)

CHAPTER I

CONSTITUTION AND THE LAW OF THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AND THE LAW OF THE CONSTITUTION

In democracies of the most extreme type, there has arisen a false idea of freedom which is contradictory to the true interests of the states. For two principles are characteristic of democracy, the government of the majority and freedom. Men think that what is just is equal; and that equality is the supremacy of the popular will, and that freedom means the doing of what a man likes. In such democracies every one lives as he pleases . . . But this is all wrong; men should not think it slavery to live according to the rule of the Constitution; for it is their salvation.

Aristotle

If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external, nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men, the great difficulty lies in this; you must first enable the government to control the governed and in the next place oblige it to control itself.

Alexander Hamilton

If there be a country which cannot stand any one of these tests—*a country whose knowledge cannot be diffused without perils of mob law and statute law;

where speech is not free;
where the post office is violated, mail bags opened, and letters tampered with;
where public debts and private debts outside of the state are repudiated; where liberty is attacked in the primary institution of social life...
where the laborer is not secured in the earnings of his own hand; where suffrage is not free or equal* —that country, is, in all these respects, not civil, but barbarous; and no advantage of soil, climate, or coast can resist these suicidal mischiefs.

Ralph Waldo Emerson

I believe there are more instances of the abridgment of the freedom of the people by gradual and silent encroachments of those in power than by violent and sudden usurpation.

James Madison

1. The Concept of Constitutional Law—an attempt at provisional definition

What is meant by "Fundamental" or "Constitutional" law? How is this branch of law related to the corpus juris of a country? These and such other questions bring to the forefront the problem of determining the province of our study.

If, following the Socratic method of working out a definition of the term that one is to employ in the course of an argument, we were to inquire, what is the proximate genus under which "Constitutional Law" could be subsumed and then add to it the differentia—that is, that feature or quality which distinguishes it from other species—we would not be far from truth if we offered the following as a provisional definition: Constitutional Law is that branch of Public Law which deals with questions relating to the legal character of the State, describes the power-relations that subsist between the several organs of its sovereign power, and sets forth its morphology, its structural peculiarities and the principles of its inner dynamism, growth and movement.

The coercive power of the State reflects itself in the sanctions it provides for the recognition and enforcement of certain class of claims and interests; and such of the claims and interests it recognises and enforces become, by reason of such recognition and enforcement alone, "rights". It is another way of describing the same legal phenomenon when we, following Dr. Holland, regard a right as "a capacity residing in one man of controlling with the assent and assistance of the State the action of another." Where these rights are enforceable by one citizen against another, the net-work of legal relations with reference to which this becomes possible could compendiously be characterised as the domain of private law. And as opposed to this is the sphere of the public law, which consists of the rules with reference to which the State asserts certain rights against the citizens and permits them in turn to exercise certain rights against itself.

The subject-matter of constitutional law is thus practically indistinguishable from and may be regarded as, in a significant sense, being practically co-extensive with, the total realm of law concerning (a) the institutional set-up of the Government of a country, and (b) the relationships which the Constitution describes as subsisting between different component parts of the Government machinery.

The power of the State, apart from the notional fiction that it is vested in a juristic personality called the "State", can only be exercised by certain number of persons or certain group of persons. For the purposes of constitutional law, it is customary to refer to these persons or group of persons that exert the power of the State, as being the agents or organs of the sovereign power. All those who take part in the working of the State machinery in this sense, are found continually engaged "in making or changing of the laws by which rights are created and protected, in the maintenance of order and settled rules of conduct within the community, in preserving its independence or representing it in its dealings with other communities". The connection and relations of these persons form the "Constitution of a Country". (See Anson's Law and the Custom of the Constitution, Second Ed. Vol. I, page 3).

The law of the Constitution refers us to that body of rules which courts of law recognise and enforce for the purpose of defining the relationship between the various organs of the sovereign power inter se, as also the relationship of State to the individual.

Over and above the law of the Constitution, is invariably to be found a set of rules,

Public and Private law.

Law and the Conventions of the Constitution.

Study of Constitution raises complicated questions.

rules which are habitually obeyed by those who are concerned in the administration of public affairs, and these are called the conventions of the Constitution or, what comes to the same thing, the political understandings—and they form the hard core of the ethics of constitutional behaviour or constitutional morality.

These conventions of the Constitution germinate and grow in response to the changing needs of the body-politic of a country and reflect the measure of advance which the 'practice' must make over 'theory' in the matter of working the political institutions of any country. The actual study of the constitutional processes that are found to be at work in the body politic of a country would exhibit this radical difference between what is required by law to be done, on the one hand, and what actually is being done in obedience to some settled rules of practice, on the other. For instance, in America, where there is in existence a written Constitution, the whole machinery of presidential election to be found in actual practice would appear to have departed substantially from what its methodology and technique should be as required under the constitutional document. The same could be said about the transformation of the official status of the Senate which started unostentatiously as a Council of Delegates whose duties were mainly executive but has now become a Chamber entrusted with important powers; so that they "virtually act as critics and moderators of the action of the House of Representatives." The conventions of the English Constitution, (which is an unwritten constitution) have similarly brought about a considerable hiatus between the actual working of the machinery of English Government and what one would expect it to be in the strict theory of the English constitutional law. The most important office-holder under English constitutional set-up is the Prime Minister who is the Head of the Cabinet. But a student, who sets out to discover the constitutional basis of that office, would hardly come across any clear indication in any English statute or judicial decision as to how the Prime Minister has come to occupy the important position he does within the framework of English Constitution. The earliest mention of the word "Prime Minister" in any English Statute would be found in the one of the year 1917 when the Chequer's Trust was constituted, but there too, no information whatever is to be had about the role he plays in the scheme of English Constitutional Law.

Thus the study of the Constitution of a country involves an understanding, not only of the basic statutes, or legal decisions that have a bearing upon the mode in which, under the strict theory of the law, the sovereign power within the State is distributed and exercised, but it also demands a careful observation of and reflection upon, the actual course of conduct of the various organs and authorities of sovereign power in an attempt to be able to discover how, as a matter of fact, the business of running the administration of a country is being carried on. The task that confronts any one, who means to set forth systematically the essentials of constitutional law is, therefore, one of unusual difficulty—and indeed here, the difficulties to be encountered are far more than are involved in the study of the rules of ordinary law, in regard to which, in the lines ascribed to Tennyson, the poet would have us believe in "The lawless science of our law.

That codeless myriad of precedent
That wilderness of single instances."

2. Written Constitution and Constitutional law

It is often uncritically assumed, however, that a writer on the subject of constitutional law is spared the necessity of expounding the true 'nature' and 'scope' of that law, if he be so fortunate as to deal with a 'written' Constitution. It is said that such a one cannot justifiably complain, as did Professor A.V. Dicey, the celebrated English Constitutional Lawyer, in his treatise on Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, of the legal intricacies involved in the unfolding of the proper scope of the Law of the Constitution of a country, like England, which does not possess a 'documentary' Constitution.

"Whatever may be the advantages of a so-called 'unwritten' Constitution", says Professor Dicey, "its existence imposes special difficulties on teachers bound to expound its provisions. Any one will see that this is so who compares for a moment the position of writers, such as Kent or Story, who commented on the Constitution of America, with the situation of any person who undertakes to give instruction in the Constitutional Law of England." (p. 4).

And after commenting upon the comparative precision of the Fundamental Law of the Constitution, where written 'instruments' are involved, as in the case of the articles of the Constitution of the United States, he proceeds further to observe:

"This Law (be it noted) is made and can only be altered or repealed in a way different from the method by which other enactments are made or altered; it stands forth, therefore, as a separate subject for study; it deals with legislature, the executive, and the judiciary, and, by its provisions for its own amendment, indirectly defines the body in which resides the legislative sovereignty of the United States. Story and Kent therefore knew with precision the nature and limits of the department of law on which they intended to comment; they knew also what was the method required for the treatment of their topic. Their task as commentators on the Constitution was in kind exactly similar to the task of commenting on any other branch of American Jurisprudence. The American Lawyer has to ascertain the meaning of the articles of the Constitution in the same way in which he tries to elicit the meaning of any other enactment. He must be guided by the rules of grammar, by his knowledge of the Common Law, by the light (occasionally) thrown on American Legislation by American history, and by the conclusions to be deduced from a careful study of judicial decisions. The task, in short, which lay before the great American commentators was the explanation of a definite legal document in accordance with the received canons of legal interpretation." (p. 5).

And as contrasted from the relatively easy task that lies ahead of any commentator who sets out to expound the meaning of a written Constitution, Dicey describes the difficult predicament of the English Constitutional theorist as follows:

"He may search the Statute-Book from beginning to end, but he will find no enactment which purports to contain the articles of the Constitution; he will not possess any test by which to discriminate laws which are Constitutional or Fundamental from ordinary enactments; he will discover that the very term 'Constitutional Law', which is not (unless my memory deceives me) ever employed by Blackstone, is of comparatively modern origin; and in short, that before commenting on the Law of the Constitution he must make up his mind what is the nature and the extent of English Constitutional Law". (cf. Law of the Constitution p. 6).

3. The task of explaining the Articles of a written Constitution is by no means simple Without disputing the truth of the foregoing comment of Professor Dicey, concerning the alleged difficulty of setting forth the essentials of the Constitutional Law of a country that has an 'unwritten' Constitution, it must be pointed out that the problems which confront a student of a 'written' Constitution are by no means simple; and further that they do present difficulties that are peculiar to the logic of a written Constitution.

The truth of this remark can best be appreciated if the constitutional developments of countries having a written Constitution (like the U.S.A., Canada, Australia, etc.) are studied in the light of the judicial decisions that have interpreted the Constitutions upon which their governance has been based. Anyone studying the constitutional development of these countries is bound to be impressed by the remarkable manner in which, what are called "constitutional practices", "usages", "conventions" and "political understandings" have been woven into the very texture of the written Constitution. He would notice, for instance, that the "written word" that had been designed to enshrine and to perpetuate the distribution of sovereign power within those States, has been made to bear the burden imposed upon it by the deposits left behind by the successive waves of judicial and political interpretation that may have fitfully lashed against it. So much is this true that, the "Constitution-in-action" invariably would be found to be radically different from what, according to a contemporaneous record of its authors' intentions, it was originally designed to be. As has been remarked, should the Founding Fathers of the American Constitution return to earth after their long repose of 150 years or so, they will not be able to reconcile themselves with the way in which the document they left behind has been dealt with by their posterity.

It is for this reason that we should avoid the mistake of confusing the "Constitutional Law" of a country with its "written" Constitution. Indeed, so much is this true, that it would not be correct to say that the Constitutional Law of the U.S.A. is wholly contained in the written instrument which was accepted by the convention of the year 1787, and which was later ratified by the 13 States and which has since continued to persist in the original form together of course with such amendments as have later on been introduced therein. It would thus not be correct to say even in respect of the Constitution of the U.S.A., that anyone wishing to discover what the Law of the Constitution of that country is, must turn only to this document: rather, the American Jurists themselves define Constitutional Law, not in terms of what is contained in the written document, but generally: as, for instance, does Cooley, who defines it as the "body of rules and maxims in accordance with which the powers of sovereignty are habitually exercised". (See Cooley on Constitutional Law, p. 20). "In America", says Samuel P. Weaver, "the term (i.e., Constitution) has been used generally in the more restricted sense. In our Constitutional Law a Constitution has generally referred to a written instrument by which the Fundamental Powers of Government were established, limited and defined, and by which these powers have been distributed among the several departments, this instrument being the formal document adopted by the Constitutional Convention on September 17, 1787. The term has also been used in the more comprehensive sense, as defining our complete governmental structure and consisting of the Fundamental Law of 1787, of statutes implementing the Constitution, of decisions interpreting the Constitution, and of conventions and usages of the Federal Government." (p. 2). Having stated what the restricted and comprehensive sense underlying the term "Constitution" is, the learned author proceeds to define "Constitutional Law" as being one that "treats of the establishment, construction and interpretation of constitutions. It deals with the nature and organisation of Government, its sovereign powers and their distribution and mode of exercise and the relation of the sovereign to the subjects or citizens. In America this phrase is used in a more restricted sense. Since the Fundamental Law of the United States and of every State is expressed in the form of a written instrument, Constitutional Law has been defined as the interpretation and construction of these documents, and the application of them to statutes and other public acts." (pp. 3 & 4 of his Constitutional Law).

4. Concept of Constitutional law as expounded by English Lawyers

Turning to the concept of Constitutional Law as one encounters it in the writings of English Constitutional Lawyers, one can do no better than observe what a recent text book on "Constitutional Law" has to say about it. "There is no hard and fast definition of Constitutional Law. In the generally accepted use of the term it means the rules which regulate the structure of the principal organs of government and their relationship to each other, and determine their principal functions. These rules consist both of legal rules in the strict sense and of usages, commonly called conventions, which without being enacted are accepted as binding by all who are concerned in government". (p. 2 of E.S.C. Wade & G. Godfrey Phillips 'Constitutional Law'—5th Ed.).

It is a noteworthy feature of this attempt at the definition of "Constitutional Law" that it uncritically accepts the pre-suppositions and the peculiarities of English Constitutional Law and offers a generalisation based on these presuppositions and peculiarities. For instance, such a statement as "the Constitution is the supreme Law of the Land", can never be true about the English Constitution since there is no available means of finding out what are the Constitutional and what are the ordinary Laws in England. From the purely legal stand-point, it is impossible to specify which Rules, Procedures, and Institutions are part of the Constitution and which are not; and a Constitutional Lawyer, reasoning merely from legal assumptions, can never satisfactorily explain the nature of the constitution and its function. That is why a French writer, de Tocqueville, has said that because of the legal supremacy of the Parliament—which is the corner-stone of the political system of England—there is in reality no constitution at all. (Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, Part I, Chapt. 6, p. 103 Tr. by Henry Reude, (New York 7 & H. G. Laughley, 1841).

Certain important enactments of Parliament are supposed to tell us at least a part of the story of what the Law of the Constitution in England is like: of these principal Constitutional Statutes, mention may be made of the following:

- (a) Magna Charta, 1215, (which marks the beginning of representative Government in England,)
- (b) The Petition of Rights, 1628, 3 CAR 1, C.I.,
- (c) The Bill of Rights, 1689,
- (d) Act of Settlement, 1701,
- (e) Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865,
- (f) Parliament Acts of 1911, and 1949,
- (g) Emergency Powers Act, 1920,
- (h) Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925,
- (i) Statute of Westminster, 1931,
- (j) Public Order Act, 1936,
- (k) Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937,
- (l) The Crown Proceedings Act, 1947,
- (m) British Nationality Act, 1948,
- (n) Representation of the People Act, 1949.

But even a close study of these Acts, however, would not give any clear idea as to the kind of Government which is in existence in England. These statutes could be said to furnish an important source of the Constitutional Law of England—but why they must be characterised as important or principal Constitutional Statutes is a question which can never be answered satisfactorily in terms of any well defined principle.

Professor Maitland, in the course of his lectures on the Constitutional History of England, (Cambridge University Press, 1948), discusses the problem of the definition of Constitutional Law at the very end of his lectures only because it seemed to him that he could not profitably define a department of Law for his students until they knew a good deal of its contents. "The phrase, Constitutional Law", he remarks, "is of course a very common phrase, but it is not a technical phrase of English law. I am not aware that it has ever been used in the statute book or that any Judge has ever set himself to define it. If we had a code which called itself a code of constitutional law, then the definition might be a matter of authority, it would be thrust upon us by the legislature; but we have nothing of the sort, and are therefore free to consider what definition would be convenient and conformable to the ordinary usage of the term." (p. 527).

Difficulty of working out a satisfactory Definition of Constitutional Law—illustrations from Austin and Holland.

Austin's Approach to the concept of Constitutional law.

Professor Holland's attitude to the concept of Constitutional law.

In order to demonstrate the utter impossibility of the formulation of a satisfactory definition of Constitutional Law, Professor Maitland took two samples by way of illustration from the writings of English Lawyers, and these were from Austin and Professor Holland: with regard to the views of the first writer on the nature and scope of constitutional law, he rightly complained that his definition of it was too narrow (for it excluded numerous legal rules and usages which, in the ordinary sense of that term, were covered by that concept); and with regard to the views of Professor Holland, he pointed out that instead of giving us a definition of Constitutional Law he had only described some kinds of rules which, in that author's judgment, appropriately fell within the domain of constitutional law.

Austin in his 'Outline of the Course of Lectures on Jurisprudence (ed. 1873, Vol. 1, p. 73), divides 'public law' (which, according to him, deals with law of 'political conditions'), into 'constitutional law' and 'administrative law'. 'Administrative law', according to him, "determines the ends and modes to and in which the sovereign powers shall be exercised", and the object of the constitutional law, according to him, is to define the sovereign. The constitutional law, according to him, determines the persons or the classes of persons who shall bear the sovereign powers; it determines furthermore the mode wherein those persons shall share those powers. According to Austin, sovereignty in England is placed in the King, Lords and electors. He refused to acknowledge the 'commons' as representing any part of Sovereignty, saying that they were merely the delegates of the electors, and "the sovereignty vested not in the representatives but in those whom they represented."

As to this mode of thinking about the scope of constitutional law of England, it would be observed that there would undoubtedly be a great deal of what is ordinarily understood by the term "constitutional law" which would have to be excluded from the definition offered of that term by Austin. "To take one instance", says Professor Maitland, "the question whether the King has power to tax without the consent of Parliament would be very generally treated as a grave and typical question of constitutional law, but it does not fall within Austin's definition; it might be admitted that the sovereign power was possessed by King and Parliament, or by King, Lords and electors in certain shares, and yet the question would be possible whether law gave the King a power of imposing customs duties." (p. 531).

So far as Professor Holland is concerned, he, to begin with, divides law into 'public and 'private', and he further subdivides public law into six departments, the first of which he calls 'constitutional' and the second 'administrative'. The primary function of constitutional law is "to ascertain the political centre of gravity of any given state". (See his Jurisprudence, 12 Ed., p. 370). It announces in what portion of the whole is to be found the 'internal sovereignty'. "The definition of sovereign power in a state necessarily leads to the consideration of its component parts. The distinction between Legislative, Executive, and Judicial functions is as old as Aristotle, but it was left for Montesquieu to point out the importance of these several functions being discharged by distinct group of persons. With reference to all these questions Constitutional Law enters into minute detail. It prescribes the order of succession to the throne, or, in a Republic, the mode of electing a President. It provides for the continuity of the executive power. It enumerates the 'prerogatives' of the King or other chief magistrate. It regulates the composition of the Council of State, and of the Upper and Lower Houses of the Assembly, when the Assembly is thus divided; the mode in which a seat is acquired in the Upper House, whether by succession, nomination; election or tenure of office, the mode of electing members of the House of Representatives, the powers and privileges of the assembly as a whole and of the individuals who compose it, and the machinery of law-making. It deals also with the ministers, their responsibility and their respective spheres of action; the government offices and their organization; the armed forces of the State, their control and the mode in which they are recruited; the relation, if any, between Church and State; the Judges and their immunities; their power, if any, of disallowing as unconstitutional acts of non-sovereign legislative bodies; local self-government; the relations between the mother country and its colonies and dependencies. It describes the portions of the earth's surface over which the sovereignty of the State extends, and defines the persons who are subject to its authority. It comprises, therefore, rules for the ascertainment of nationality, and for regulating the acquisition of a new nationality by 'naturalization'. It declares the rights of the state over its subjects in respect of their liability to military conscription, to serve as jurymen and otherwise." (pp. 370—372).

Professor Maitland does not regard this as a definition of constitutional law but only an enumeration of its particulars. Similarly, Professor Holland's distinction between constitutional law as dealing with structure, and administrative law as dealing with function, is equally arbitrary and hardly fits in with the accepted notions of what those expressions stand for. Constitutional Law deals not only with the structure of the sovereign power but also with the structure of inferior bodies possessing legal powers of the central or local government, and this can hardly be comprehended without some reference to the functions of the several organs into which the sovereign power is distributed. It is for these reasons that Professor Maitland says that the distinction between constitutional law and other species of law in the English system is one, not of logic but of 'convenience.' "I do not think", says he, "that we have any theory about it (i.e. constitutional law) which can claim to be called orthodox. I think that Austin's definition is decidedly too narrow. I think that Professor Holland's description is fairly conformable to our ordinary usage, but that the line between the constitutional and the administrative departments is one which it is very hard to draw". (Professor Maitland's Constitutional History of England p. 536).

5. Idea of the Fundamental law of Pakistan

The Fundamental Law of Pakistan is contained in the written document which was finally adopted by the Constituent Assembly on 29th of February, 1956, and which received (as required by S. 6 of the Indian Independence Act, 1947) the assent of the Governor-General on 2nd of March, 1956, and which came into force on the midnight of the 23rd of March, 1956, i.e., on the date which is described by the Constitution as the 'Constitution Day'. (See ARTs. 218, 220).

But even this document is not a complete Code indicative of what the Law of the Constitution is: at best it could be described as an important source of the law of our Constitution. The Constitution itself contains a warrant that the provisions of the General Clauses Act, 1897, unless the context otherwise requires, shall apply to the interpretation of the Constitution in the same way as it applies to the interpretation of a Central Act, as if the Constitution were a Central Act. (See ART. 219). It also, for instance, in effect refers us to the Citizenship Act of Pakistan for the interpretation of the term 'Citizen' used by it. (See ART. 218, wherein the definition of that term as also of the expression 'Citizen of Pakistan' is given as meaning "a person who is a citizen of Pakistan according to the law relating to Citizenship").

But quite apart from reference to these laws that exist outside the Constitution, there would be a considerable bulk of its provisions which could be properly understood and applied only if we knew the historical background which led to the formulation of the Articles of the Constitution or the political or constitutional principles responsible for the adoption of its scheme or the improvisation of the structure of the principal organs of its sovereign Power. This is so because, in itself, the text of the Constitution contains only a bare statement of those aspects of the question relating to the establishment of Government as have been considered essential.

Maitland's Criticism of Holland's and Austin's approach Stated.

No written Constitution can possibly give an exhaustive statement of the principles that underlie the operation of governmental machinery. Every Constitution is designed to be applied to the problems posed by the day-to-day administration of a given country, and it is not possible to work any written Constitution unless "we read its words, not as we read legislative codes which are subject to continuous revision with the changing course of events, but as the revelation of the great purposes which were intended to be achieved by the Constitution as a continuing instrument of government" (Chief Justice Stone in United States v. U.S. Bank, 9, Wheaton 736 (1824)). In fact no constitutional instrument can provide for all conceivable situations that are likely to arise in the matter of the governance of a country: all it can hope to do is to indicate the rugged and bold outline of a scheme concerning the distribution of the sovereign Power within the State.

6. Provisional Definition Offered

The Law of our Constitution may thus be defined as that body or set of rules which the Courts of Law apply in the determination of questions relating to the interpretation and application of the provisions of our Constitution.

The definition is valid even in respect of those cases where, upon a constitutional problem being presented to a Court of Law for its adjudication and for the resolution of which there is no direct, affirmative or clear provision in the Constitution, the Court of Law proceeds to declare the rule of Law that it would apply thereto—for even the declaration that there is no rule to apply to such a specific situation is virtually to apply a rule and thus determine the rights and liabilities of the parties and thereby set the controversy to rest. It was for this reason that former Chief Justice Hughes of America, when he was Governor of New York, said, "We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the Judges say it is . . ." Of course, even the Judges, as will be argued later, have no unbridled power to say what the Constitution is—for judicial power like the Executive or Legislative power is itself the creature of and is, therefore, subordinate to and regulated by, the Constitution and the Law. But there is a great deal of truth in the remark of the Judge-Governor just quoted and this would become apparent when we come to deal with the doctrine of Judicial Review.

Nature of the Principles and Rules that Courts apply to the interpretation of our Constitution.

Now what these rules relating to the interpretation or construction of our Constitution are, could only be discussed in the light of the principles of Constitutional Jurisprudence. These rules have a close connection with the leading features or the distinguishing characteristics of our Constitution. For instance, our Constitution:

- (a) recognises the Supremacy of Law, for it establishes Government by the Law and not of men ;
- (b) distributes the Sovereign Power in accordance with the Federal Principle between the National Government and the Provinces ;
- (c) establishes the Parliamentary Form of Democratic Government, as opposed to the Presidential pattern of Democratic government ;
- (d) consigns to the courts of the country the power to interpret the Constitution and thus in effect upholds the doctrine of judicial review as opposed to the principle of comparative Supremacy of the Legislative Will ;

(e) enumerates the Fundamental Rights of Citizens and non-Citizens resident within the territory of Pakistan, and thereby declares the rights which cannot be abridged or taken away by means of the ordinary administrative, executive or legislative process ;

(f) recounts the manifesto of National Policy in the Chapter relating to the "Directive Principles of State Policy" as also sets forth the ideological basis of our State. (See Chapter relating to Islamic Provisions in Part XII etc.)

All these leading characteristics of our Constitution cannot, it is obvious, be discussed as if in a splendid isolation. They have to be seen in the light of the essential principles of comparative Constitutional Jurisprudence before their significance can be perceived and the provisions of our Constitution in which they have been set-forth can be intelligently applied to the concrete situations posed by the day-to-day administration and governance of our Country.

7. Nature and Purpose of written Constitutions

As a preface to the Study of Pakistan's Constitution, it is necessary that a few general observations on the Nature and Purpose of Constitution be made in an effort to set-forth the perspective in which their pragmatic relevance and legal significance can be appreciated.

In his The Rights of Man, which is one of the greatest books on Political Philosophy of the Eighteenth Century, and in the third chapter of Part II, Thomas Paine writes about the Old and New Systems of Government and shows the divergent principles upon which they are based. "Nothing", says he, "can appear more contradictory than the principles on which the old Government began, and the condition to which Society, Civilization and Commerce are capable of carrying Mankind. Government on the old system is an assumption of power, for the aggrandisement of itself; on the new, a delegation of power for the common benefit of Society (p. 165 Everyman's Edition, 1954). And a little later he says, "All power exercised over a Nation must have some beginning. It must either be delegated or assumed.... All delegated power is trust, and all assumed power is usurpation."

This fundamental difference to which Thomas Paine refers can be expressed in another way: the old system of government was based on domination by the strong over the weak, whereas the modern system is (at least professedly) based on the idea of Government based on the consent of the governed. The ruling Philosophy of our time teaches us to believe that sovereignty lies with the people. A Constitution is the act of the People, of the Nation and not that of Government. It is Constitution that gives power to Government—and also sets bounds to its authority by imposing well defined restraints. Constitution is a device to make the exercise of political power directly or indirectly responsible to the People or the Nation. The highest manifestation of this principle is to be found in the idea of the Republic. "What is called a Republic", says Paine, "is not any particular form of Government. It is wholly characteristic of the purport, matter or object for which Government ought to be instituted, and on which it is to be employed: Res-Publica, the public affairs, or the public good, or, literally translated, the public thing. It is a word of a good original, referring to what ought to be the character and business of Government; and in this sense it is naturally opposed to the word Monarchy, which has a base original signification. It means arbitrary power in an individual person; in the exercise of which, he himself and not the res-publica, is the object." (p. 174)

A sovereign People wishing to establish the conditions in accordance with which political power should be exercised and the processes by resort to which public welfare should be secured and promoted "through an undefined and expanding future", could Observations of Thomas Paine. Difference between the Old and New concept of "Government".

Government by consent of those who are to be governed.

Paine on the Idea of "Republic".

Written Constitution as a compact embodying the 'Consent' of Sovereign people to be governed under certain conditions.

Idea of "Government" as an instrument of National Will.

Transition to New concept of Government—Thomas
Paine quoted.

not do any better than what the Founding Fathers did in enshrining the will of the people in whose name they met in the Philadelphia Federal Convention of 1787—that is, to draw up a charter of their Government, improvise a system of ‘checks and balances’ to regulate the exercise of political power. A constitution thus drawn up, in effect, says to those organs of Government it itself sets up to secure and promote Public Welfare, “Thus far shall you go and no further”. “If need be”, say the People whose will is enshrined in the Constitution, “come to us and we will, if necessary, reconsider and revise our opinion and grant you more powers and redefine the limits under which the several organs and authorities established by us to exercise political power within the State shall thereafter operate.” It is thus to the People, the Constituent Power, and not to Government, that the right to amend the Constitution belongs.

This idea of Government as an instrument of the National Will was revolutionary indeed! The idea that the exercise of all political power is a trust, too was revolutionary. From the concept of Government by the Divine Right of Kings, to that of the Government based on the Fundamental and inviolable rights of Man, is a long leap in History: between the demoralising relationship involved in the correlates ‘Kings & his Subjects’ and the edifying idea of every one having the status of a citizen of the State and of therefore being equal before law and entitled to the equal protection of the law, lie centuries of tyranny and exertions of arbitrary power, under the weight of which mankind has had to suffer soul-crushing blows.

Thomas Paine sums up the position of this ‘general advance’, this transition from the old to the new conception of Government, in words that cannot be improved upon:

“When we survey the wretched condition of Man, under the monarchical and hereditary systems of Government, dragged from his home by one power, or driven by another, and impoverished by taxes more than by enemies, it becomes evident that those systems are bad, and that a general Revolution in the principle and construction of Governments is necessary. What is Government more than the management of the affairs of a Nation? It is not, and from its nature cannot be, the property of any particular man or family, but of the whole community, at whose expense it is supported; and though by force and contrivance it has been usurped into an inheritance, the usurpation cannot alter the right of things. Sovereignty, as a matter of right, appertains to the Nation only, and not to any individual; and a Nation has at all times an inherent, indefeasible right to abolish any form of Government it finds inconvenient, and to establish such as accords with its interest, disposition, and happiness. The romantic and barbarous distinction of men into Kings and Subjects, though it may suit the conditions of courtiers, cannot that of Citizens; and is exploded by the principle upon which Governments are now founded. Every Citizen is a member of the sovereignty, and, as such, can acknowledge no personal subjection: and his obedience can be only to the laws.

“When men think of what Government is, they must necessarily suppose it to possess a knowledge of all the objects and matters upon which its authority is to be exercised. In this view of Government, the Republican system, as established by America and France, operates to embrace the whole of a Nation; and the knowledge necessary to the interest of all the parts, is to be found in the centre, which the parts by representation form; but the old Governments are on a construction that excludes knowledge as well as happiness; Government by monks, who know nothing of the world beyond the walls of a convent, is as inconsistent as Government by Kings.

“What we formerly called Revolutions, were little more than a change of persons, or an alteration of local circumstances. They rose and fell like things of course, and had nothing in their existence or their fate that could influence beyond the spot that produced them. But what we now see in the world, from the Revolutions of America and France, are a renovation of the natural order of things, a system of principles as universal as truth and the existence of man, and combining moral with political happiness and national prosperity.

- Basic Principles
- I. Men are born, and always continue, free and equal in respect of their rights. Civil distinctions, therefore, can be founded only on public utility.
 - II. The end of all political associations is the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of man; and these rights are liberty, property, security and resistance of oppression.
 - III. The Nation is essentially the source of all sovereignty; nor can Any Individual, or Any Body of Men, be entitled to any authority which is not expressly derived from it.” (The Rights of Man. pp. 134-135.)

8. Historical Review of the emergence of “Constitutional Government”

The era of Constitutional Governments begins towards the close of the eighteenth century, and the American Declaration of Independence (July 4, 1776) is the first of the series of those important steps that were taken to lay its foundations and to fortify its institutions. The American example inspired the French National Assembly, and the contagion spread throughout the Americas, Continental Europe, Australia, South Africa and somewhat later, but equally effectively, to the Orient. In the bare course of a hundred and eighty years, the wave of republican influence has practically girdled up the whole planet. And this trust which men repose in written Constitutional Documents, this faith in the power of words engraved on parchments to limit the power of the power-applying organs within the ‘State’, may well be regarded as the tribute we pay to this most important political invention of the recent past. From all indications it seems Constitutionalism has come to stay; and even the Marxians, who otherwise profess their allegiance to Revolution and therefore to unconstitutionalism, as can be seen in their scriptures from the Communist Manifesto down the present day Russian and Chinese Constitutions, have provided us with unimpeachable evidence of the fact that even they have found the written word to be the most potent means of setting forth not only their political goals but also the structure and scheme of their Constitutional processes in the form of exact and enduring language.

If Society is to be conceived as the result of a compact after the manner of Rousseau’s Contrat Social, a written Constitution, which is to embody the Law for Government, could be regarded in reality as representing a significant change, from a convenient metaphor and a useful fiction to a real covenant. Hitherto, the parchment had contained the Decrees of the Kings, and even the history of the English people’s crusade to wrest some rights from their despotic Stuart Kings, shows up to us the use of expressions like Petition of Rights, etc. as if to suggest that these rights were conferred and vouchsafed by a benign and benevolent Power and not declared as natural and inalienable Rights of Man. The truth of the matter is that “All men are created equal, that they are endowed by the Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness—That to secure these Rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just Powers from the Consent of the Governed, that whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these Ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its Foundation on such Principles, and organizing its Powers in such Form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness.” (See Declaration of American Independence, July 4, 1776). Government is established by the Will of the

Written
Constitution
as a “real covenant”

People and cannot be suffered to interfere with their inalienable Rights. "It is not enough", said Condorcet, "that the rights of man should be written in the books of the Philosophers and in the hearts of virtuous men, it is necessary that the ignorant or weak men should read them in the example of a great people; America has given us this example. The act which declares its independence is a simple and sublime exposition of those rights so sacred and so long forgotten." (Oeuvres VIII, (II), quoted in Becker, The Declaration of Independence, pp. 230-231).

9. Written and unwritten Constitution—compared.

In the first place, it ought to be realised that whereas it is possible for a people to choose to be governed under a written Constitution, no such choice could be said to underlie the adoption of the unwritten type. The latter type of Constitution has steadily evolved—unwritten Constitutions have not been adopted: they have not been made.

The emergence of written Constitutions like those of the U.S.A. or of France was preceded by the rejection of monarchical form of Government. They were the offspring of tragic upheavals, not of Bloodless Revolutions. The People, who wrested power, wished to set up the Republican form of Government, and the only way to do this was to reduce to writing the compact representing the mode in which the exercise of the Sovereign Power within the State was to be regulated.

Importance of written Constitution in a Federal Polity.
In the case of a Federal Government the necessity to adopt a written Constitution is practically unavoidable. It is of the essence of Federation that the power should be distributed between the 'regional' and 'national' Governments and further, this partitioning of the sovereign power must be achieved in such a manner that each Government is confined to the sphere of its allotted jurisdiction. This cannot be achieved unless the actual limits of the authority of each Government are reduced to writing and some technique is designed to keep in check the natural inclination and propensity of each Government to trespass upon the field of authority reserved to the other. The only way to limit the power of Government is to set bounds to it by means of a written word.

Virtues of a written Constitution offset against its rigidity and the difficulties of interpretation of the written word.
The main virtues of a written Constitution, namely, its concise formulation of the limits of Governmental power, its availability to every one who cares to know what those limits are, are often set-off against, what has been regarded by its detractors, as the chief reproach against it, viz. its rigidity and the difficulties inherent in the interpretation of a written word. When you want to change the Written Constitution in order to keep pace with the changing conditions of Society, the change cannot be easily effected because of the relative difficulty of securing compliance with the requirements of the special amendment procedure. As to the difficulty involved in the interpretation of a written word, "It (i.e., the written Constitution)", says Walton H. Hamilton, "is not a self-regulating mechanism which automatically holds official conduct to conformity with its lines. An instrument which sets up a government of laws and not of men begins with compromise in its need for interpretation. Its compulsions lie not in what is written down but in what is read from the parchment. The office of construing the text, which the Supreme Court holds by self-appointment, is beset by hazards. Words have no true and natural meaning; verbal currency passes uncertainly between different generations. An intent packed away in stately phrases may be lost; principles may be drawn out of a document which were never stored there. The justices of the highest Court do not of necessity embody the law. They are men of acumen, knowledge, reason, unlike one to another; even in resolving constitutional issues they behave like human beings. In the endless process of the finding out of meaning the vote of the odd man counts for more than insight into the true meaning of a phrase.

"In the procedure questions of policy become issues of Constitutionalism. The validity or the nullity of legislative acts contrived to meet the needs of a great industrial society depends upon the manifest intentions of the distant authors of the covenant. The test runs in terms of jurisdiction, powers and processes of law; the existence of the evil and the appropriateness of the remedy are considered only as they fit into the formula or as justices allow their minds to stray from legal law.

"Yet in matching statutes against the organic law many ingredients unknown to its authors get drawn into the construction. Justices make use of the common law, as it is understood, to clear up ambiguities. They draw upon the previous decisions of the Court to bridge the gap between novel issues and ancient verbiage. They sometimes listen to plausible rules made up by ingenious attorneys and set them down as constitutional principles. As men of experience and opinion they never escape the light of their own understanding. The less sophisticated often believe their own preferences are to be found plainly written in the constitution; the wiser ones frequently make up arguments which march straight to their chosen conclusions. The 'let's pretend', with its submission of current issues to the judgment of the Fathers, imparts to the process of interpretation aspects of an ordeal at law." (See Article on Constitutionalism in Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences, Vol. IV, pp. 256-257, Edition, 1949).

But the Criticism of Written Constitution is based on a misconception of its real significance.
But it is submitted with respect, that the foregoing criticism misses the mark: since the written word must be interpreted in order to be applied, it is but natural, human language being what it is, that much of the certainty of law is in effect abandoned at the altar of the relativity involved in the judicial interpretation of legislative enactments. Thus, this reproach can equally be urged against the whole institution of codified law, and it may, with equal justification, be extended to denounce all forms of literature as being the parents of confusion rather than of clarity. And so following Aristotle, must we not remind ourselves that, what can be urged against all need not be argued against any—for such a sweeping criticism ultimately defeats itself. But the criticism, as the author of the passage just quoted himself remarks, is "directed rather at the judgments of the Courts than at the provisions of the Charter." If the question is one of the choice between the written and unwritten Constitution, the problem could hardly be said to have been properly tackled if what could be urged against the whole system of written Law were urged against the written Constitution. The English Lawyers, curiously enough, prefer their "unwritten" Constitution precisely because they are suspicious of the value of the method of employing the written word to express the Will of the Sovereign. "The prejudice against Statutes", says C. K. Allen, "of which Judges trained in the Common Law are often accused, is not merely captious; it springs from the conviction, based on long experience that a sound and vigorous rule or principle once imprisoned within the formula of words is like Gulliver bound by the Lilliputians. Thus many Constitutional Lawyers would agree that an enactment like the Statute of Westminster has complicated rather than clarified relations with the British Commonwealth and it is for the same reason that English Lawyers, observing the complexities which have risen out of the written or rigid Codes, obstinately prefer their own vague and amorphous Constitution the chief merit of which, as a French observer has said, is that elle n'existe pas (p. 420 Law in the Making. Ed. 1939).

C. K. Allen on "English Prejudice against Written Statutes."
But it is submitted with respect, that a Constitution does not become clear for not being written down any more than a written Constitution becomes vague, nebulous or blurred for being continually subjected to conflicting judicial interpretations. All this can only show that in a fast-changing world there is a need for making at least some parts

Paradox to which a written
Constitution is no proof.

Judicial interpretation
at variance with the written word.

of the Constitution easy of amendment, but it cannot, on the premises of this criticism, be validly said that the written constitutions ought to be abandoned in favour of an unwritten one !

And it is on this account that Walton H. Hamilton himself poses the paradox to which a written Constitution as a purposive device is no proof. (See his Article on Constitutionalism in Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences. Vol. IV, p. 258) :-

"As a purposive device the Constitution has not been proof against paradox. Man contrives his formulae and time and chance rewrite them. A supreme law is invented to guard the rights of a people against an unpopular Government. The scroll is written, the Government becomes popular, the judiciary proclaims itself interpreter—and divine right is replaced by the aristocracy of the robe. It is set down that the great offices in the new republic are to be filled with the wise and good, chosen by select men; there is formal amendment, the rise of political parties, the growth of strange customs—and the aristocratic provisions of the Constitution become democratic. An abracadabra is appended to make the people secure in their persons and property against arbitrary acts of an untrusted officialdom; corporations become persons, vested interests are accounted property, social legislation appears a deprivation, due process becomes a standard in judicial review—and the democratic provisions of the constitution become aristocratic. A society which thinks in static terms of political perfection contrives the best Government it can and safeguards it with a rigid amendment clause; a society which talks in the dynamic terms of progress finds the provision a formidable obstacle to political adaptation. If the Court cannot square current necessity with the ancient law, a small minority have the power to block formal change—and the creation seems to have taken its creators into captivity. The Constitution as a precaution born of experience is an admirable protection against the dangers of another age; as a current institution its life lies in its extra-constitutionality. The failure of event to accord with intent does not distinguish it among human arrangements."

10. Power of Judiciary to interpret "Constitution"— is a requirement of the Constitution itself.

It is pertinent in the context of foregoing considerations to point out that the power of the judiciary to interpret the Constitution and to apply it in the adjudication of cases submitted for its cognizance is itself the requirement of the Constitution. Judges interpret the law but they do not interpret it capriciously or arbitrarily. They are guided in the determination of the questions relating to the meaning and significance of the provisions contained in the Constitution, by the legal arguments submitted at the bar, by appeal to precedent if it is available, by considerations based upon the practice of civilised communities having cognate systems of Constitutional jurisprudence. And every case of first impression decided by the Judges in its turn introduces an element of security in the administration and practice of the Law and the Constitution, in so far as it thereafter becomes a precedent, which would control the interpretation and application of parallel cases that might come before courts of law.

Rigidity of American
Constitution.

It is true that the American Supreme Court has read more into the Constitutional Instrument of 1787 than was infused into it by the Founding Fathers or the Authors of the later amendments, but then, be it remembered that this is due to what might be characterised as the abnormal rigidity of the American Constitution. The judicial interpretation bestowed on the Constitution by the American Judges has been so much in accord with the prevailing mood of the people of the United States that they have acquiesced in the power of the judiciary to apply liberally the constitution to situations for which admittedly the Founding Fathers could not have very well laid down any clear guidance. After all, the Constitution of 1787 was written for an eighteenth century agrarian republic of less than 4 million people, and if the same document had at all to serve as the frame-work of Government for a modern urban industrial society confronted as it is with all the new complex social and economic problems incidental to such a society, its interpretation had to keep pace with the growing complexities of the new era. It is for that reason, that Kelly and Harbinson, the authors of American Constitution—its Origins and Development, have no hesitation in saying: "Industrial Revolution opened a new chapter in American Constitutional history. After 1880, constitutional questions became increasingly entangled in a series of political and social issues of basic consequence to America's destiny." It was for this very reason that as far back as 1819 Marshall, the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, had observed: "... A Constitution is intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs" (In M' Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheaton 316—(1819) (4 L. Ed. p. 579).

Power of Judiciary to interpret "Constitution"—is a requirement of the Constitution itself

If the Government is to be Government of the Laws and not of Men, the laws must be made, and after they are made, since they are not self-enforcing, there must be some organ of the sovereign power within the State to which could be assigned the duty of enforcing them. It is Men who must draft, enact, interpret and apply the law. No legal system, however perfect, could be made to operate with automatic, impersonal and machine-like precision. Laws like any other human institution must be adjusted to the varying needs of the Community, and the Judges who interpret the Supreme Law of the Land have a duty cast upon them of applying that law consistently with the letter and spirit of the Constitution under which they themselves have been appointed and to maintain which they have to take that oath of office which has been prescribed by the framers of the Constitution as a condition precedent for the assumption of such a high and responsible office.

Government of Laws—and not men—necessarily involves the idea of some Organ of Sovereign power to interpret the "Written Constitution."

11. Relative merits and demerits of a written Constitution—A summing up

These reflections show that, in the ultimate analysis, the relative advantages and disadvantages that can be predicated of the written and the unwritten type of Constitution turn out to be a mere matter of academic debate. Here, as elsewhere, Constitution should be adjudged in terms of its pragmatic relevance, and that, it is submitted, is the only decisive test. The question in each case would be: Does the Constitution, written or unwritten, actually work? The answer to this depends upon numerous factors, the outstanding of these being the character of the people and the extent to which it enables them to organise themselves politically. After all, it is the coat that must fit the baby and not the baby that must fit the coat! The Constitution has to be construed and applied. No country can be permanently imprisoned in the straight jacket of a written constitution, either the jacket is stretched by judicial interpretation—witness the immense developments at the hands of American Supreme Court of the inter-state commerce clause—or it is expanded by the growth of conventions. If it were not so, a written constitution would indeed be a lethal thing of De Maistre's Epigram—Des que l'on écrit une constitution, elle est morte (Constitution and Constitutional Law, Enc. Britt. p. 314. 1914 Ed.). It is for this reason that Judges in the United States do not regard their Constitution as a printed finality. "Every legal system for a living society, even when embodied in a written Constitution", says Justice Frankfurter, "must itself be alive. It is not merely the imprisonment of the past; it is also the unfolding of the future. Of all the laws for ordering the political life of a nation the Federal system is the most complicated and subtle. It demands most flexible and imaginative adjustment for harmonising national and local interest. The Constitu-

Sir Henry
Maine on U.S. and English
Constitution.

Rigidity of U.S.
Constitution—
Views of Bryce stated.

tion of the United States is not a printed finality but a dynamic process; its application to actualities of Government is not a mechanical exercise but the function of Statecraft". (Frankfurter, Mr. Justice Holmes and the Supreme Court, 1938, page 75).

In this and such other observations of the American Jurists one detects a desire to help the growth of the Constitutional Law without tampering with the original Constitutional Document and it is doubtful if, as has been hinted earlier, the extent to which the American Judiciary has gone in interpreting its provisions would have been the same had the provisions of that document been capable of being changed by, broadly speaking, a more easy amendment procedure.

Before we conclude, let us recall the observations of Sir Henry Maine and Lord Bryce upon the questions we have been considering.

(a) Sir Henry Maine in his Popular Government has some pertinent observations to make about the essential difference between the rigid and the flexible Constitution and, of course, the references to the American and the English Constitutions, are to be taken in the following extract, as references to the written and the unwritten constitutions respectively.

"The powers and disabilities attached to the United States and to the several States by the Federal Constitution . . . have determined the whole course of American history. That history began, as all its records abundantly show, in a condition of society produced by war and revolution, which might have condemned the great Northern Republic to a fate not unlike that of her disorderly sisters in South America. But the provisions of the Constitution have acted on her like those dams and dykes which strike the eye of the traveller along the Rhine, controlling the course of a mighty river which begins amid mountain torrents, and turning it into one of the most equable water-ways in the world. The English Constitution, on the other hand, like the great river of England, may perhaps seem to the observer to be now-a-days always more or less in flood, owing to the crumbling of the banks and the water poured into it from millions of drain pipes." (p. 245)

(b) The best case that has been put up about the advantages to be derived from a rigid constitution is to be found in Bryce's American Commonwealth, Volume I, in words that follow:

"The rigid Constitution of the United States has rendered, and renders now, inestimable services. It opposes obstacles to rash and hasty change. It secures time for deliberation. It forces the people to think seriously before they alter it or pardon a transgression of it. It makes legislatures and statesmen slow to over-pass their legal powers, slow even to propose measures which the Constitution seems to disapprove. It tends to render the inevitable process of modification gradual and tentative, the result of admitted and growing necessities rather than of restless impatience. It altogether prevents some changes which a temporary majority may clamour for, but which will have ceased to be demanded before the barriers interposed by the Constitution have been overcome.

"It does still more than this. It forms the mind and temper of the people. It trains them to habits of legality. It strengthens their conservative instincts, their sense of the value of stability and permanence in political arrangements. It makes them feel that to comprehend their supreme instrument of Government is a personal duty, incumbent on each one of them. It familiarizes them with, it attaches them by ties of pride and reverence to, those fundamental truths on which the Constitution is based. These are enormous services to render to any free country . . ." (p. 406. New York. 1908 Ed).

12. Is our Constitution a rigid one?

How far could our Constitution be characterised as being a rigid one? The answer to this question must depend upon our appreciation of Article 216 of the Constitution itself which lays down the procedure for amending the Constitution. An analysis of that Article would show the following features :—

- (i) In respect of amendment or repeal of the provisions contained in Articles 1, 31, 39, 44, 77, 106, 118, 119, 199, and 216 itself, a Bill, which specifically provides for the amendments of any of these Articles,
 - (a) must be passed by a majority of the total number of members of the National Assembly, and by the votes of not less than two-thirds of the members of that Assembly present and voting.
- It should then—
- (b) be approved by a resolution of each Provincial Assembly (i.e. of the Provinces of East Pakistan and West Pakistan) or, if the amendments relate to any one Province, of only Provincial Assembly of the Province concerned, and
 - (c) be assented to by the President.
- (ii) For the purpose of amendment or repeal of any other provision of the Constitution (excepting, of course, the provisions of the Fifth Schedule and of Part IV of the Fourth Schedule) the Bill should be passed by the kind of majority mentioned in (i) (a) above, i.e. majority of the total number of Members of the National Assembly and by the votes of not less than two-thirds of the members of that Assembly present and voting, and then be assented to by the President, and,
 - (iii) All Schedules, other than the provisions of the Fifth Schedule and Part IV of the Fourth Schedule, may be amended or repealed if a Bill for that purpose is passed by a simple majority of members present and voting and is assented to by the President.

It should be noted that it is also competent, for the Provincial Legislature, to make a law and thereby provide for any of the matters specified in Part IV of the Fourth Schedule.

A certificate under the hand of the Speaker of the National Assembly that a Bill has been passed in accordance with the provisions of ART. 216(1) is conclusive and cannot be questioned in any court. (See ART. 216(2)).

Thus analysis of ART. 216 would show that our Constitution is rigid in certain respects and what is more, this rigidity itself is of varying degrees. There are, however, certain parts of the Constitution which can be amended by a simple majority—and to that extent our Constitution is flexible—and the only difference between that amending legislation and the ordinary legislation consists in this that the Bill providing for constitutional amendments must be specifically designated as being a Bill for that purpose. In respect of the Articles mentioned in (i) above, the amendment procedure involves not only the support of the kind of majority provided therein but also requires, in addition, that a resolution of approval be passed by either both or one of the two Provincial Assemblies concerned, as the case may be.

13. Comparative Study of Amendment Procedures

For the purpose of making a comparison between the 'amending procedure' provided in our Constitution and those provided in other Constitutions, reference might usefully be made to ART. 368 of the Indian Constitution, ART. 5 of the United States Constitution, ART. 128 of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution, ART. 46 of the Irish

ART. 216.

Rigidity of our Constitution is of varying degrees—depending on the provision sought to be amended.

(a) Canada.

Constitution of 1937, ARTs. 207 to 210 of the Burmese Constitution, 1948, and Section 29(4) of the Ceylon Constitution, (Order-in-Council) 1946.

So far as the Canadian Constitution is concerned, there is no specific provision in the British North America Act providing for amendment to that Constitution. In the absence of specific provision to the contrary contained in the British North America Act, the power to amend the same must be deemed to be reserved to the Imperial Parliament that passed the Act. The Statute of Westminster, 1931, in its seventh section provided that that Act shall not be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment, or alteration of the British North America Acts 1867-1930 or any Order, Rule or Regulation made thereunder. Although there is no legal power with the Dominion Parliament of Canada to amend the Canadian Constitution Act, the convention has grown for the Imperial Parliament to effect amendments only after presentation to it of a joint address of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament, and in respect of such amendments as are to affect the position of the Provinces under the Constitution, the Dominion Parliament makes recommendation only after the consent of the Provinces concerned regarding those amendments has been taken. The latter convention, namely that of obtaining consent of the Provinces was however not followed at the time of the passing of the British North America Act, 1943, which was enacted despite the protest of the Province of Quebec to the passing of the said Amendment Act. Section 92(1) of the Canadian Constitution Act gives to its Provincial Legislatures the power to effect amendments in respect of those provisions that relate to their governance, and this is done by ordinary legislative process. The Imperial Parliament, however, by an Act of 1949 (British North America (2) Act, 1949, 12, 13 and 14 Geo. 6 c. 81), has empowered the Canadian Parliament to amend any of the provisions of the British North America Act which relates to matters within its jurisdiction. This Act gives the Federal Parliament wide powers of amendment, and it is only in respect of the matters excepted from the general power thus conferred that an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom will in future be necessary. (Consult further Constitutional Amendment in Canada by Paul Gerin-Lajoie, Toronto, 1950).

Distinction between the amendment procedure concerning ordinary and important provisions.

(b) Amendment of the Indian Constitution.

A comparative study of the provisions contained in the several Constitutions with regard to the amendment procedure would tend to show that, by and large, a distinction is invariably drawn between amendments that affect ordinary Constitutional provisions, and amendments that affect the scheme of the Constitution or the pattern of the Government established under these constitutions. The amendment procedure in the latter category of cases has been made more difficult than in the former. To illustrate this, one instance will suffice.

In the case of Indian Constitution it has been provided that provisions relating to :

- (a) Election of the President, ART. 54;
- (b) Manner of election of the President, ART. 55 ;
- (c) Extent of the executive power of the Union, ART. 73 ;
- (d) Extent of the executive power of the State, ART. 162;
- (e) Power of the Parliament to constitute High Courts, ART. 241;
- (f) Provisions relating to the High Courts of the State, Chapter V of Part VI or Chapter IV of Part V (Union Judiciary);
- (g) Matters mentioned in Chapter I, Part XI, Legislative Relations between the Union and the States;
- (h) Any of the matters mentioned in the Seventh Schedule, (referring to the Legislative Powers of the Federation and the Provinces), and the Representation of States in Parliament and the amending Article itself—are all capable of being amended by resort to a relatively more difficult procedure in that, over and above the special kind of voting procedure mentioned in the Article relating to amendment (a majority of the total membership of the House and a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members of that House present and voting), the additional requirement of the Constitution is that the proposed amendment must be ratified by the Legislatures of not less than half of the States composing the Union. (See ART 368)

The provisions for which the relatively more difficult amendment procedure is provided, are precisely those which vitally affect the distribution of the sovereign power within the State, and therefore vitally concern the Administration of the States within the Indian Union. It is perfectly in accord with the principle of Government by consent that whenever any change is sought to be effected in these vital provisions, ratification by Federal Units should be required.

(c) Amendment
of the U.S.A.
Constitution.

The amendment procedure provided in the United States Constitution, ART. V, is decidedly more difficult. The abnormal difficulty of moving or proposing amendments can be seen from the fact that the proposed amendment must have the support either of two-third votes of both Houses of Congress, or of the two-third number of the State Legislatures who should petition to the Congress to call for a Convention for the purpose of considering the proposed amendment. There has then to be a ratification by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States of the Federation, in the case of amendment being proposed by two-thirds of the votes of both the Houses of Congress or by the Conventions in three-fourths of the States in the event of amendment being proposed upon the application of the Legislature of the States. No distinction has been drawn between the several provisions of the American Constitution for the purpose of designing different amendment procedures in relation to the subject matter of the proposed amendment. The amending procedure is the same, irrespective of the nature of the provision sought to be amended in or added to the Constitution. It should be noted, as an exception to this generalization in this respect, that under ART. V it is also provided that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

It would be apparent from a perusal of the United States Constitution, first, that it makes provision only for the Federal Scheme and structure of the Constitution, leaving the Constitution of the various States federating in the Union to work out their own constitution subject of course to certain limitations (See S.4 of ART. IV), and secondly that the document itself is a short one and recites only those provisions which are of real constitutional importance. It is in fact the absence of detail that is the greatest merit of the United States Constitution and it is this circumstance, which more than anything else, has contributed most to its permanence and effectiveness.

In Switzerland, the amendment can be effected by a referendum, (See ARTS. 118 to 123, contained in Chapter III of the Federal Constitution of the Swiss Confederation of 1848). Under the Swiss Constitution there is a distinction between total and partial revision of the Constitution and the procedure is different in each case. Either House may pass a resolution for total revision, and in the case of a disagreement between the two Houses on the question whether or not there should be a revision the matter is referred to the people; or the question is so referred if 50,000 voters demand a total revision. If the vote is in the affirmative, then new elections to the two Houses take place to prepare the necessary revision. Similarly partial revision can be proposed by the two Houses—or upon petition of 50,000 voters. After the total or partial revision takes place, the same is put before the people by means of referendum and can become effective as law if it be accepted by a majority of the voters and the Cantons composing the Swiss Federation. Thus the Swiss constitution provides for a novel method of securing the amendment of the Constitution.

(d) Amendment
of the Swiss
Constitution.

The voice of 50,000 voters, which would be one-eighthieth fraction of the total Swiss population, is necessary before the Constitution can be amended. This may appear as an unusually difficult method for bringing about a constitutional change but according to Finer "the process is deliberate, not difficult, and its value is partly created by a set of conditions peculiar to Switzerland: long experience in democratic institutions, comparative simplicity of its problems, and the smallness of the country, which sets much easier problems in propaganda techniques than in larger countries." (See Finer's Theory and Practice of Modern Government, 1950 Edition, page 133).

The principle on which this amendment procedure has been devised is demanded by the logic of the Swiss Constitution which declares Cantons as sovereign units, (See ARTs. 3, 5 and 6), and the procedure imparts to the Constitution a distinctiveness which has hardly any parallel—save perhaps in the Constitution of Fourth French Republic, for which reference to ART. 90 of that Constitution of the year 1946 should be made. ART. 90 of the French Constitution is as follows :

"ART. 90.—Revision of the Constitution shall take place in the following manner:

Revision must be decided upon by a resolution adopted by an absolute majority of the members of the National Assembly.

This resolution shall stipulate the purpose of the revision.

After at least three months, this resolution shall have a second reading under the same rules of procedure as the first, unless the Council* of the Republic to which the resolution has been referred by the National Assembly, has adopted the same resolution by an absolute majority.

After this second reading, the National Assembly shall draw up a bill to revise the Constitution. This bill shall be submitted to the Parliament, and voted by a majority and according to the rules established for any ordinary act of the legislature.

It shall be submitted to a referendum unless it has been adopted on second reading by a two-thirds majority of the National Assembly or voted by a three-fifths majority of each of the two assemblies.

The bill shall be promulgated as a constitutional law within eight days after its adoption.

No constitutional revision relative to the existence of the Council of the Republic may be made without the concurrence of this Council, or resort to a referendum."

14. Rrigidity vs. Flexibility considered from the viewpoint of political principle.

The question whether a Constitution is rigid or flexible cannot be answered in terms of any well defined principle. The terms 'flexible' and 'rigid' recall to us the name of Lord Bryce, who was the first to coin this classification, but even he, so it appears from his writings, uses these terms interchangeably—if not indiscriminately.

It has been rightly remarked, "An unwritten constitution might or might not be flexible; a written constitution may or may not be rigid". A few words to explain this dictum are necessary.

In legal theory, British Parliament may, at one stroke, alter the British Constitution in any respect that it chooses, or the Prime Minister may destroy the convention of Cabinet Government by the simple expedient of not calling the Cabinet altogether. But such things do not happen. In the realism of history the British Constitution is not so flexible after all. It changes very slowly. Apart from several extensions of suffrage, the subordination of the House of Lords in 1911, and the altered Imperial Status of the Self-governing Dominions since the last war, it has flexed very little in the course of a century. Indeed, despite the potentialities for change that exist under the unwritten constitution, it is probably true to say that they foster tendencies towards rigidity rather than flexibility; nor is this surprising for they rest largely upon customs—and customs wax and wane but slowly.

Cases can, however, be cited to show that some countries having written Constitutions have altered them frequently, whereas others have maintained their Constitutions and there is no change despite the flexibility of amendment procedure provided in those Constitutions. The Constitutions of many of the American States are of the former category, and the case of France falls within the latter. Despite the fact that French Constitutional Laws may be amended almost as readily and quickly as the ordinary statutes, no amendment was adopted between the years 1884 and 1906, and it is true to say that they have been seldomly changed.

Commenting on this aspect of the French Constitution, Howard Lee McBain remarks in his article on "Constitution" in the Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences, "This is certainly not referable to the perfection of the French system of Government". A reference to ART. 90 of the Constitution of the Fourth French Republic (1946) would show that in the French Constitution quite apart from the Referendum provided therein, the amendments can be effected in the same way as ordinary legislation. Quite apart from limitations provided in ARTs. 94, 95 and the last clause of ART. 90, it would appear that the amendment procedure visualised in the Constitution of the Fourth French Republic is on par with the procedure prescribed for consummating ordinary legislation. (These limitations are contained in ARTs. 94 and 95. ART. 94 : In the case of occupation of all or part of the metropolitan territory by foreign forces, no procedure of revision may be undertaken or continued; ART. 95 : The republican form of government may not be the subject of any proposal of revision; and for the last clause of ART. 90, see supra p. 20).

15. Amendment Procedure of our Constitution is in accord with well-settled principles on the subject

ART. 216 of our Constitution is thus in accord with the well-settled principles in terms of which amendment procedures have been designed in other Constitutions, and to some of these reference has already been made. A relatively more difficult amendment procedure is provided only in those cases where the proposed change would affect the Federal Units vitally or where the scheme of the distribution of the sovereign power within the State would, to an appreciable extent, be necessarily affected. Thus, ART. 1, which deals with the character of Pakistan's polity as a Federal Republic; ART. 31 which mentions that effort shall be made by the State to enable people from all parts of Pakistan to participate in the defence services of the country and to achieve parity in the representation of East Pakistan and West Pakistan in all other spheres of Federal Administration; ART. 39 which mentions the extent of the executive authority of the Federation; ART. 44 which describes the composition of the National Assembly; ART. 77 which mentions the composition of the Provincial Assembly; ART. 106 which talks of the jurisdictions of the Federal and Provincial Legislatures and establishes procedures for the determination of relative priorities in the matter of their competence to enact laws; ART. 118 which mentions National Finance Commission for securing just distribution between the Federation and the Provinces of taxes etc.; ART. 119 which safeguards inter-provincial trade; ART. 199 which mentions the formation of a National Economic Council; and ART. 216 which describes the procedure for effecting amendments to the Constitution: would seem to be the Articles that deal with matters in which the Provinces are vitally interested and any change in those provisions is likely to affect their interests. The Constitution, therefore, requires that these provisions can only be amended after the amendments in question have been duly ratified by the Province or Provinces, as the case may be, in the manner provided for in ART. 216.

The National Parliament of Pakistan thus has constituent powers in certain restricted fields and can act as a Constituent Assembly provided it can muster up the majority required by ART. 216 for effecting changes in those well-defined portions of the Constitution. In respect of the Articles mentioned in the proviso to Clause (1) of ART. 216, its constituent powers are encumbered by a further constitutional requirement, namely, that a resolution must be passed by the Federal Units ratifying constitutional Bills amending those provisions. In respect of certain matters, e.g., Schedules other than the Fifth Schedule and Part IV of the IV Schedule, its power to amend the Constitution is to be exercised in the same way as though it were engaged in the ordinary law-making activity reserved to it under the Constitution—with, perhaps, the only limitation that Bills to amend those provisions must be expressly described as being Bills for that purpose.

Thus the Constitution of Pakistan is partly flexible and partly rigid, and its rigidity is of varying degrees, as has been shown earlier.

16. Character of English Constitution—no difference between Fundamental and Ordinary Laws

England has a flexible Constitution. In England there is on that account, from the point of view of Constitutional Law, no difference between 'Fundamental' and 'Ordinary' Law. "In England", writes de Tocqueville, "Parliament has an acknowledged right to modify the Constitution; as therefore the Constitution may undergo perpetual changes, it does not in reality exist; the Parliament is at once a Legislative and Constituent body." Professor Dicey on the other hand considers that flexibility of the English Constitution has, in effect, prevented it from being written. He says :

"When a country is governed under a constitution which is intended either to be unchangeable or at any rate to be changeable only with special difficulty, the constitution, which is nothing else than the laws which are intended to have a character of permanence or immutability, is necessarily expressed in writing, or, to use English phraseology, is enacted as a statute. Where, on the other hand, every law can be legally changed with equal ease or with equal difficulty, there arises no absolute need for reducing the constitution to a written form, or even for looking upon a definite set of laws as specially making up the constitution. One main reason then why constitutional laws have not in England been recognised under that name, and in many cases have not been reduced to the form of a statutory enactment, is that one law, whatever its importance, can be passed and changed by exactly the same method as every other law. But it is a mistake to think that the whole law of the English constitution might not be reduced to writing and be enacted in the form of a constitutional Code." (See his Law of the Constitution, p. 90).

The essential thing, then, about the English Law of the Constitution is not that it is unwritten, but that it is flexible. Even a written Constitution could be made flexible by providing therein that it could be changed by resort to the ordinary legislative process. (See Constitution of New Zealand, more particularly the New Zealand Constitution Amendment (Requests and Consent) Act of November 25, 1947 (1947, No. 44), which provides that the New Zealand Parliament may now alter, suspend, or repeal all or any of the Provisions of the New Zealand Constitution Act of 1852.

Professor Herman Finer is of the opinion that the essence of the Constitution is its inflexibility as compared with the ordinary laws. "We might define a constitution", says he, "as its process of amendment. For to amend is to deconstitute and reconstitute. That is the respect in which all other constitutions differ from the British Constitution." (See Theory & Practice of Modern Government, 1950 Ed., p. 127). After reviewing the amendment procedures mentioned in various constitutions the author remarks :

"The chief distinction, then, between constitutions, from the standpoint of form, is in the amending process. Who has the power to alter the constitution is master of the State, and the amending clause gives this power. Everywhere except in England this has been made exceptionally difficult; and difficulty is established to provide the advantages of conservation of a set order of social relationships, and to secure deliberateness, in the hope that from this will issue respect; and both respect and growth are sought for in popular ratification and initiative. . ." (p. 137).

After examining the pros and cons of the advisability of making the amending procedure difficult of achievement, he raises the all-important question, "Is Great Britain the worse off for making no special rules concerning constitutional amendments?" and proceeds to answer it thus :

"Now, any State in which care is not bestowed on the reform of fundamental institutions wastes its well-being, physical and spiritual. Care is fundamental: not writing, nor a difficult amending process. If care, a rational weighing of all factors, is possible and probable without artificial compulsion, then difficulty of amendment is unnecessary. None of the fundamental institutions is, in fact, treated without due circumspection."

Even in England, continues the same writer, "the possibility remains that in abnormal times, when excitement has been roused to an uncontrollable intensity, unwise things may be done, or acts committed which sting by their injustice and leave a mood of smoldering resentment. Occasions may arise like the General Strike of 1926 which produced the Trades Disputes Act of 1927; the law was, in fact, repealed in 1946, but for the nineteen years it lasted it unjustly crippled the financing of the Labour Party. The advantage of the British Constitution is that errors may be reversed by an ordinary majority. What is fundamental, in short, is left to the people to decide, and they are also left to decide whether this shall be amended. They are expected to control themselves rather than to be controlled by the Constitution." (See p. 137 et seq.)

17. Constitution as "Supreme Law of the Land"

What is it that is implied when it is said, "Constitution embodies the Supreme Law of the Land?" The Constitution of the U.S.A., for instance, in ART. VI Para 2, provides: "This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the Supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." There is thus in the Constitution of the U.S.A. an express declaration that the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land. Similar is the case with the Australian Constitution: Covering clause 5 provides that the Act and all laws made by the Parliament under the Constitution shall be binding on the Courts, Judges, and people of every State and of every part of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding anything in the Laws of any State. There is, be it noted, no such express declaration con-

How is the Supremacy of Constitution
conserved.

Supremacy of English Parliament.

English
Parliament cannot delimit the power of the Successor Parliaments—

But this is merely a convention.

1932, 1. K.B.
733

tained either in the Constitution of Pakistan or of India. But despite the total absence of any such expressly worded declaration the Constitution in both of these countries, as will be argued later, is supreme.

By the supremacy of the constitution is meant its fundamentality; so that, in the event of a conflict between the ordinary law and the provisions of the Constitution it is the latter that should prevail.

The essential question for the constitutional lawyer to answer is, How is the supremacy of the constitution maintained? It is maintained in the United States by the courts in the sense that it is they that interpret and apply the supreme law of the land and, in the event of any law made by the Congress coming in conflict with the Constitution, it is the former that is declared by them to be null and void, that is, as being of no legal effect whatever. In some other Constitutions it is by means of "political processes", the precise nature of which will be disclosed in the sequel, that the supremacy of the Constitution is conserved and maintained.

England may be regarded as a typical instance of a country possessing the latter category of Constitutions. In England, constitutional law and the conventions of the Constitution are maintained by means of the doctrine of the supremacy of Parliament. No organ of the English State has the power or the authority to declare an Act of the Parliament invalid, and the Parliament, to the exclusion of any other organ of sovereign power, has the final power to interpret its own enactments. And this it manifestly does when, for example, it passes declaratory legislation, the effect of which is to set aside any judicial determination or decree which may have been passed by a court of law upon the footing of its own interpretation of the words, terms or expressions used by the Parliament. This is what is implied by the dictum that in England it is the doctrine of omnipotence of the Parliament that holds the field. In the words of Blackstone:

"The power and jurisdiction of parliament", says Sir Edward Coke, "is so transcendent and absolute, that it cannot be confined either for causes or persons, within any bounds". "And of this high court," he adds, "it may be truly said "si antiquitatem species, est vetustissima; si dignitatem, est honoratissima; si jurisdictionem, est capacissima." It has sovereign and uncontrollable authority in the making, confirming, enlarging, restraining, abrogating, repealing, reviving, and expounding of laws, concerning matters of all possible denominations, ecclesiastical or temporal, civil, military, maritime, or criminal: this being the place where that absolute despotic power, which must in all governments reside somewhere, is entrusted by the constitution of these kingdoms. All mischiefs and grievances, operations, and remedies, that transcend the ordinary course of the laws, are within the reach of this extraordinary tribunal. . . . It can, in short, do everything that is not naturally impossible; and, therefore, some have not scrupled to call its power, by a figure rather too bold, the omnipotence of parliament." (Blackstone's Commentaries, Vol. I, p. 128—London John Murray 1876).

It is a rule of convention in England that Parliament cannot bind its successor Parliaments by limiting their power of legislation. The growth of a rigid constitution, in the sense that it is incapable of being amended by simple majority vote, is inconceivable so long as this convention is respected. If Parliament were to pass a law limiting the power of the future Parliaments to legislate in respect of a given subject-matter, such a law would be respected by the courts since the courts have not the power to review it and declare it invalid, but the successor Parliaments would not be bound by such a limitation and could repeal the law by means of a simple majority vote.

That no Parliament can bind its successors is amply indicated in the decision reported in Vauxhall Estate v. Liverpool Corporation, 1932, 1 K.B. 733, where it was ruled that a later provision embodied in the Housing Act, 1925, section 46, prevailed, by implication, over the provisions of an earlier Act (Section 7(1) of Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919). The point of the decision is that a statutory provision enacted by a later Parliament repeals, by implication, an inconsistent provision in the law passed by an earlier Parliament.

"... We are asked", observed Avory, J., "to say that by a provision of this Act of 1919 the hands of Parliament were tied in such a way that it could not by any subsequent Act enact anything which was inconsistent with the provisions of the Act of 1919. It must be admitted that such a suggestion as that is inconsistent with the principle of the Constitution of the country. Speaking for myself, I should certainly hold, until the contrary were decided, that no Act of Parliament can effectively provide that no future Act shall interfere with its provisions."

In this connection we may also notice the case of Ellen Street Estates Ltd. v. Minister of Health, (1934) 1 K.B. 590, wherein at p. 597, Maugham L.J. said:

"The Legislature cannot, according to our Constitution, bind itself as to the form of subsequent legislation and it is impossible for Parliament to enact that in a subsequent statute dealing with the same subject matter there can be no implied repeal. If in a subsequent Act, Parliament chooses to make it plain that the earlier statute is being to some extent repealed, effect must be given to that intention just because it is the will of the legislature."

Thus, however paradoxical it might appear, there is a sense in which it is true to say that Parliament is not, legally considered, omnipotent—at least it cannot do anything which would effectively detract from its own continuing sovereignty. The incapacity of Parliament to bind its successors is an argument against its own omnipotence. The basis of legal sovereignty of Parliament in England is not to be traced to the supremacy of the Constitution, but only to the rule that no Act of Parliament could be regarded as being invalid by a Court of Law. The sovereign Parliament's inability to bind its successors is thus an incident of the rule evolved and recognised by Courts of law to the effect that they would not regard any Act of Parliament as being incompetent on any ground, and further that they would give effect to the later Act of Parliament in the event of its conflict with an earlier one on the supposition that the Act, which is later in point of time, reflects the last will of the continuing legal sovereign. (For a critical comment as to the view that this incapacity of Parliament to bind its successors flows from the flexibility of the English Constitution, see Attorney-General for the State of the New South Wales and others v. Trethewan & Others, 44 C.L.R. 1930-31, 394 at p. 427).

(1934) 1 K.B.
590.

Is there a sense in which it could be said the English Parliament is not omnipotent.

18. Doctrine of Judicial Review—The American Experience

The doctrine of judicial review has reference to the all-important method of securing the supremacy of the Constitution by means of judicial recognition and enforcement of the requirements of the Constitution.

So fundamental is this doctrine of the Judicial Review of legislation that a few brief remarks about its genesis and the circumstances in which it rose to the position of its present power would not be out of place. Since the doctrine in its present form was first applied by the U.S. Supreme Court, it would be necessary to recount briefly the various steps by which it came to be firmly established in America. Considerable forensic literature exists which throws a great deal of light on this doctrine of American Constitutional Law—although it must be admitted that the precise tactical principle, in terms of which the controversy which has raged in America as to the Constitutional foundation for the assumption of this power of judicial review by the courts can be settled, has not yet found the general support even with the constitutional historians of that country. According to Professor Finer, "There are two main possibilities: (a) that the Courts at a certain point of time simply took this power and expediency caused its confirmation, and/or (b) the Fathers of the Constitution really intended that there should be a judicial review. The first is demonstrably true. But the question of intention is still obscure . . ." (See his "Theory and Practice of Government", p. 140).

As to what the Founding Fathers intended to accomplish in regard to the problem of conserving the supremacy of the Constitution, the following extract from the Federalist is often relied upon in defence of the view that judicial enforcement of the constitutional limits imposed on the exercise of legislative power was contemplated by at least one of them.

"By a limited Constitution, I understand one which contains certain specified exceptions to the legislative authority; such, for instance, as that it shall pass no Bills of Attainder, no ex post facto laws, and the like. Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice in no other way than through the medium of the Court of justice whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the constitution void." (Alexander Hamilton, in Federalist, No. 78).

The two leading cases that established the doctrine of Judicial Review in the United States of America, are :

- (1) Marbury v. Madison—1 Cranch 137, 2 Lawyer's Edition 60 (1803).
- (2) M'Culloch v. Maryland—4 Wheat., 316, 4 L. Ed. 579 (1819).

The facts of the first case were: One William Marbury and three others claimed title to a commission of the Justice of the Peace, and James Madison, then Secretary of State, refused to deliver the same. Through their counsel, the four men asked the Supreme Court to issue a writ of mandamus ordering the Secretary of State to deliver the commissions. The action had been brought under the Judiciary Act of 1789, passed by the Congress, an Act which had empowered the Supreme Court to issue writs of mandamus to other Courts or officers of the United States. Congress had not the constitutional right to confer this power on the Supreme Court since the power of the Congress was limited to conferring appellate jurisdiction except in four kinds of cases. Chief Justice Marshall rendered the opinion which has since become the foundation for the power of the judicial review, which the Supreme Court has ever since exercised as a part of its judicial power.

The following extracts show the reasoning on the basis of which that opinion was delivered :—

"The question, whether an act, repugnant to the constitution, can become the law of the land, is a question deeply interesting to the United States; but, happily, not of an intricacy proportioned to its interest. It seems only necessary to recognise certain principles, supposed to have been long and well established, to decide it.

"That the people have an original right to establish, for their future Government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it, nor ought it, to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established, are deemed fundamental; and as the authority from which they proceed is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent.

"This original and supreme will organizes the Government, and assigns to different departments their respective powers. It may either stop here, or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.

"The Government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken, or forgotten, the constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction between a Government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed, are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it; or, that the legislature may alter the constitution by an ordinary Act.

Two leading cases considered.

Marbury vs. Madison.

"Between these alternatives, there is no middle ground. The constitution is either a superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it.

"If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act, contrary to the constitution, is not law: if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts, on the part of the people, to limit a power in its own nature illimitable.

"Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and, consequently, the theory of every such Government must be, that an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void.

"This theory is essentially attached to a written constitution, and, is consequently to be considered, by this Court, as one of the fundamental principles of our society. It is not, therefore, to be lost sight of in the further consideration of this subject.

"If an Act of the Legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts, and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be not law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it was a law? This would be to overthrow in fact what was established in theory; and would seem, at first view, an absurdity too gross to be insisted on. It shall, however, receive a more attentive consideration.

"It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each.

"So if a law be in opposition to the constitution; if both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the Court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution; or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law; the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty.

"If, then, the Courts are to regard the constitution, and the constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature, the constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply.

"Those, then, who controvert the principle that the constitution is to be considered, in court, as a paramount law, are reduced to the necessity of maintaining that courts must close their eyes on the constitution, and see only the law.

"This doctrine would subvert the very foundation of all written constitutions. It would declare that an act which, according to the principles and theory of our Government, is entirely void, is yet, in practice, completely obligatory. It would declare that if the legislature shall do what is expressly forbidden, such act, notwithstanding the express prohibition, is in reality effectual. It would be given to the legislature a practical and real omnipotence, with the same breath which professes to restrict their powers within narrow limits. It is prescribing limits, and declaring that those limits may be passed at pleasure.

"That it thus reduces to nothing what we have deemed the greatest improvement on political institutions, a written constitution, would of itself be sufficient in America, where written constitutions have been viewed with so much reverence, for rejecting the construction. But the peculiar expressions of the constitution of the United States furnish additional arguments in favour of its rejection.

"The judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases arising under the constitution.

"Could it be the intention of those who gave this power, to say that in using it the constitution should not be looked into? That a case arising under the constitution should be decided without examining the instrument under which it arises?"

"This is too extravagant to be maintained.

"In some cases, then, the constitution must be looked into by the Judges. And if they can open it at all, what part of it are they forbidden to read or to obey?"

Commenting on the revolution that was wrought by this decision, Mr. Albert J. Beveridge, the famous Biographer of Chief Justice Marshall, says, "By a coup as bold in design and as daring in execution as that by which the Constitution had been framed, John Marshall set up a landmark in American history so high that all the future could take its bearings from it, so enduring that all the shocks the nation was to endure could not overturn it."

Thus it is that the doctrine of Judicial Review in the U.S.A. became a means of conserving the supremacy of the constitution. It is not a substantive power affirmatively granted by the constitution but its existence was inferred from the tenor of the written instrument and was regarded by the Supreme Court as being incidental to the Court's judicial power to interpret the Constitution and the law.

And what is more important, the nation has acquiesced in the exercise of this power by the Judges of the American Courts. As to this, it has been well said by one of the protagonists of the exercise of this power by the Judges, "The glory and ornament of our system which distinguishes it from every other government on the face of the Earth is that there is a great and mighty power hovering over the Constitution of the land to which has been delegated the awful responsibility of restraining all the coordinate departments of governments within the walls of governmental fabric which our Fathers built for our protection and immunity." (Congress Records, Vol. 23, p. 6516).

In the second case, the doctrine of the Judicial Review was reinforced and applied to "the supremacy of the Federation over the States". This case is also important since not only does it affirm this power of Judicial Review but it also enunciates and applies the doctrine of "Implied Powers".

The facts of that case, shortly stated, were the following :—

Maryland Legislature in 1818 taxed banks and bank branches not chartered by the State Legislature. M'Culloch was an employee of the Baltimore Bank that had been established under an Act of the Congress in 1816. He failed to pay $15,000 annual fee, or comply with the alternative requirement by affixing tax stamps to the bank notes issued. M'Culloch appealed against the judgment of the Maryland Court and Chief Justice Marshall opined, being fully conscious of the "awful responsibility in-

Comment on Marbury vs.
Madison.

M'Culloch
vs. Maryland

volved in the determination of the question before him", that Congress had (a) the power to incorporate such a Bank and (b) to that extent the State legislature had not the power to stultify this venture.

There was indeed no clear provision in the Constitution empowering the Congress to establish banks but then this power was, according to the judgment of Marshall, implied in the power "to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to declare and conduct war, to raise and support armies and navies". His argument was "The sword and the purse, all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industries of the nation are entrusted to the nation. It can never be pretended that these vast powers draw after them others of inferior importance merely because they are inferior. Such an idea can never be advanced. But it may with great reason be contended that a Government entrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nations vitally depends, must also be entrusted with the ample means for their execution. The power being given, it is the interest of the nation to facilitate its execution."

As to the main question of the supremacy of the Constitution and of the Laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, vis-a-vis the authority of the Federal units composing the Union, the following observations are important:

"If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this—that the Government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action. This would seem to result, necessarily, from its nature. It is the Government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all. Though any one State may be willing to control its operations, no State is willing to allow others to control them. The nation, on those subjects on which it can act, must necessarily bind its component parts. But this question is not left to mere reason: the people have, in express terms, decided it by saying, 'this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof', 'shall be the supreme law of the land,' and by requiring that the members of the State legislatures, and the officers of the executive and judicial departments of the States shall take the oath of fidelity to it.

"The Government of the United States, then, though limited in its powers, is supreme; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the constitution, form the supreme law of the land, 'anything in the constitution or laws of any state, to the contrary notwithstanding.'

"Among the enumerated powers, we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. But there is no phrase in the instrument which, like the articles of confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers; and which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described. Even the 10th amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, omits the word 'expressly', and declares only that the powers 'not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to these States, are reserved to the States or to the people;' thus leaving the question, whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest has been delegated to the one Government, or prohibited to the other, to depend on a fair construction of the whole instrument. The men who drew and adopted this amendment had experienced the embarrassments resulting from the insertion of this word in the articles of confederation, and probably omitted it to avoid those embarrassments. A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the sub-divisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of a prolixity of a legal code, and could

Marshall's Contribution to Constitutional Jurisprudence.

M. R. Cohen
quoted.

scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would, probably, never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires, that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves. That this idea was entertained by the framers of the American Constitution, is not only to be inferred from the nature of the instrument, but from the language. Why else were some of the limitations found in the 9th section of the 1st article, introduced? It is also, in some degree, warranted by their having omitted to use any restrictive term which might prevent its receiving a fair and just interpretation. In considering this question, then, we must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding."

That John Marshall rendered a great service, in his capacity as Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, to the growth of Constitutional doctrine of Judicial Review, is beyond dispute. But to the lawyer, the argument upon which he built up his conclusions as to the supremacy of judicial power in relation to its competence to strike down unconstitutional legislation, considered purely from the intellectual stand-point, would appear to be open to criticism. That the doctrine of Judicial Review was not his invention is proved by the fact that the classic tradition of juristic thought in which the lawyers and judges of his time were steeped, owed much of its vitality and vogue to the writings of Blackstone whose Commentaries on the Laws of England had been reprinted five years before the Declaration of Independence in America and must have been chewed and digested by a rising generation of lawyers of the day, and right up to the end of 19th century that Book formed the basis of legal education in the country. Further, the contention that the doctrine of Judicial Review as evolved and applied by Marshall in Marbury v. Madison was not based on any cogent premises is fully borne out by the following criticism offered by M. R. Cohen in his book "American Thought" :

"No scholar today will defend either on historical or on logical grounds Marshall's argument in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch. (5 U.S.) 137 (1803), that the section of the Judicature Act of 1789 was unconstitutional. That Act was drawn by several framers of the Constitution and one of them, Ellsworth, became Marshall's predecessor as Chief Justice of the United States. It would certainly require very cogent arguments to prove that these men, the members of the First Congress who passed the Act, and President Washington, who presided at the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention and signed the Act, either were all ignorant of the Constitution or wilfully disregarded it. Logically, Marshall's argument that Congress could not give the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in mandamus proceedings, because this was not mentioned in the second clause of Section 2 of ART. III of the Constitution, rests on the untenable assumption that grants of jurisdiction must be exclusive and that otherwise the clause would have no meaning. But this is quite fallacious. An affirmative grant of jurisdiction to the court may mean that Congress cannot take away that jurisdiction. It does not mean that Congress may not add to it. In fact, the Supreme Court subsequently ruled that the grant of original jurisdiction to it was not exclusive and that it could also be conferred on district courts (in the case of consuls). Marshall's decision in Marbury v. Madison, supra, was a clever trick for escaping from an embarrassing situation, into which the federal courts had become involved when the Federalist Party created judicial offices for its followers after it was defeated in the election of 1800. The trick is obvious when we note that in quoting the Constitution Marshall left out the concluding words of the Second clause of Section 2, ART. III, which gives Congress express power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. For a clear indication of the unfortunate logic of Marbury v. Madison, see Ernest Freund Standards of American Legislation (1917) 276-277." (See page 146)

Lord Bryce
quoted.

Lord Bryce summed up Marshall's main contribution to the development of American constitutional theory as follows:

- (1) Every power alleged to be vested in the National Government must be affirmatively shown to be granted . . . The search for the power will be conducted in a spirit of strict exactitude, and if there be found in the Constitution nothing which directly or impliedly conveys it, then whatever the executive or legislature of the National Government may have done in the pursuasion of its existence, must be deemed null and void.
- (2) Whenever the grant of power by a people to National Government has been established, that power will be construed generously. The people when they confer a power, must be deemed to confer a wide discretion as to the means whereby it is to be used in their service, for their main object is that it should be used vigorously and wisely, which it cannot be, if the choice of the methods is narrowly restricted." (see his American Commonwealth Vol. I p. 378).

With regard to the principle of the case decided by Chief Justice Marshall in M'Culloch v. Maryland, it is pertinent to mention the criticism made upon that decision by President Jackson in his Vetoing Message of 10th July 1832 concerning the renewal of the Charter of the Bank of United States Bill passed by the Congress. The President in the passage quoted below was dealing with the argument that the constitutionality of the Bill he was vetoing had been settled by the decision of the Supreme Court:

"If the opinion of the Supreme Court covered the whole ground of this Act, it ought not to control the co-ordinate authorities of this Government. The Congress, the Executive, and the Court must each for itself be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution swears that he will support it as he understands it, and not as it is understood by others. It is as much the duty of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and of the President to decide upon the constitutionality of any Bill or resolution which may be presented to them for passage or approval as it is of the supreme judges when it may be brought before them for judicial decision. The opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress has over the Judges, and on that point the President is independent of both. The authority of the Supreme Court must not, therefore, be permitted to control the Congress or the Executive when acting in their legislative capacities, but to have only such influence as the force of their reasoning may deserve."

As between the power of Judicial Review exercised by the Supreme Court to declare the Acts of Congress void and its power to declare the laws passed by the States void, the exercise of the latter power, politically speaking, has been of immense service for protecting the Union and it is for this reason that Justice Holmes said :

"I do not think United States would come to an end if we (that is the Judges of the United States Supreme Court) lost our power to declare Acts of Congress void. I do think, however, that the Union would be imperilled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several States." (See his 'collected Papers' p. 295-96).

President
Jackson's protest against Marshall's
views.

Justice Holmes' views on the importance of judicial power declaring State Laws 'void',

19. Origin of the Doctrine of Judicial Review: the English Background

The origin of the doctrine of Judicial Review has been traced back to the dictum of Sir Edward Coke who is regarded as the greatest of the 17th Century authorities on the Common Law of England. He contended that Magna Charta had embodied certain fundamental principles of right and justice, and that the common law contained a further expression of the same principles. Magna Charta and the Common Law, he argued, were, therefore, supreme law having such force that they controlled both the King and the acts of Parliament. In a famous case reported in The English Reports, Vol. LXXVII, p. 638 at 652 (8 Co. Rep. 107a at 118a), more popularly known as Dr. Bonham's case decided in 1610, Sir Edward Coke, then Chief Justice of England, in an appeal, preferred by Dr Bonham charged for having violated the statute, adjudged the appellant to be 'not guilty' upon the ground that the law in question was void, his reasons being:

Dr. Bonham's case.

"And it appears in our books, that in many cases, the common law will control acts of Parliament, and sometimes adjudge them to be utterly void; for when an act of Parliament is against common right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will control it and adjudge such act to be void....."

Commenting on the significance of this decision on the growth of the doctrine of Judicial Review, Kelly and Harbison, the authors of the "American Constitution—its Origins and Development" at p. 46 make the following observations :

"This case upon casual examination appears to be a seventeenth-century application of the doctrine of judicial review. Actually, it may not be so regarded. The modern American concept of judicial review has to do with the power of a court to hold an act of a co-equal legislative body invalid as repugnant to the Constitution. In Coke's day, however, no clear-cut idea of Parliament as being strictly a legislative body had yet emerged, nor had the later notion of the separation of powers any hold upon political thought at the time. Coke was thus upholding the validity of one set of courts, those of the Common Law, as against another, the High Court of Parliament. Notwithstanding this, the case certainly contains the idea that the common law embodies the principles of natural law and natural right, and that it therefore can control the acts of an important agency of the Government.

"Coke became the principle legal authority in colonial America in the eighteenth century, in part because his Institutes and Commentaries on the Common Law were among the very few legal works accessible to colonial lawyers, in part because many colonists studied law at the Inns of Court in London, where Coke's ideas were still given wide currency, even though many of them were no longer generally recognized in English practice. Coke's notion that the common law and Magna Charta reflected natural law and could, therefore, control acts of Parliament thus gained wide acceptance in America, even though the doctrine was generally rejected in England after 1700."

20. Postulates of the Doctrine of Judicial Review

The doctrine of Judicial Review pre-supposes the truth of the following propositions :—

- (1) Constitution is a law which is enforceable by Courts.
- (2) It is a law of higher obligation than the ordinary law.
- (3) In the event of conflict between constitution and ordinary law, it is for the Courts to declare the ordinary law, on the ground of its repugnance to higher law, as void.

This doctrine, in the context of American Constitutional history, has acquired a further implication (which, it is submitted, it cannot conceivably have in so far as its application to the interpretation of our Constitution is concerned), namely that by reason of the principle of the separation of powers, a judicial interpretation of the statutory law and so of the Constitution is final for the determination of the case in which it was rendered.

In the United States, a final opinion delivered by the Supreme Court, pronouncing the invalidity of a law upon the ground that it is beyond the law-making power of a subordinate and non-sovereign organ like the Congress or the State Legislature, cannot be set aside by any Legislature by means of a declaratory Act. The only way to dispose of the situation created by the decision of the Court, is to amend the Constitution and take power to re-enact the impugned law. In England, on the other hand, all that the Courts can do is to accept the law passed by the Parliament and proceed to interpret it and apply it. In our country, if a piece of legislation is struck down as being inconsistent with the Constitution, it is not clear if the appropriate Legislature would be competent to set aside the decision of the court by means of a declaratory Act and support the validity of the legislative process upon the footing of an argument that the meaning and effect of a certain Act passed by it has been misunderstood by the Court that has declared it as invalid. It is true that it is for the Courts in this country to interpret and apply the Constitution, but it is not clear whether the power to interpret and apply the ordinary law is exclusively vested in our judiciary. In the scheme of our Constitution, and from the historical background of the law which must be pre-supposed to have been perpetuated by ART. 224 thereof (which speaks of the continuance of the existing laws in force immediately before the Constitution Day), it is clear that the Legislature is also empowered to interpret its own legislation and give effect to such an interpretation by enacting a declaratory Act, thereby virtually annulling the decision of the Court which had been rendered on the footing of an incorrect interpretation given by it to an ordinary law. No such case has arisen, so far as this author is aware, even in India, and the problem posed here may thus be regarded as an open question, that is, as a matter which is yet res integra.

In amplification of what is said above with regard to the competence of the legislative organ of the State to interpret its own enactments, it is necessary to refer to a Canadian case, Beauharnois Light, Heat & Power Co. Ltd. v. The Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario (1937) O.R. 796, where the Court of first instance declared a certain provincial statute that purported to make null and void an agreement for Electric Power which the Plaintiff Company sought to enforce, as being ultra vires despite the fact that the Court's competence to do so was disputed in so far as the consent of the Attorney-General for the commencement of the action, which was required to be taken under a statutory provision, was not taken. Before the case could reach the stage of hearing in the Court of Appeal, the Legislature passed a statute which explained the meaning and effect of the provision as to consent and declared that the meaning thus declared was at all times the meaning of that provision.

The Court of Appeal declined to take notice of the legislative declaration of the meaning of the provision as to consent because "the rights of the parties had already passed into judgment and the legislation has no effect upon this action." But the Court of Appeal went still further: it said,

"The Legislature in matters within its competence, is unquestionably supreme, but it falls to the courts to determine the meaning of the language used. If the Courts do not determine in accordance with the true intention of the Legislature, the Legislature cannot arrogate to itself the jurisdiction of a further appellate court and enact that the language used in its earlier enactment means something other than the Court has determined. It can, if it so pleases, use other language expressing its meaning more clearly. It transcends its true function when it undertakes to say that the language used has a different meaning and effect to that given it by the courts, and that it always has meant something other than what the courts have declared it to mean. Very plainly is this so when, as in this case, the declaratory Act was not passed until after the original Act had been construed, and judgment pronounced."

How are we to understand the principle upon which the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case quoted above turned? In the first place, the 'Appeal Court' has to rehear and retry the issues that are struck before the trial court and has to take notice of the law as it actually exists at the time of its own decision on the case. It would be different if the same court were to exercise a power of review: the law that would be considered by a Court of review would be the law as it was at the time it rendered the judgment and not, as it came to be, afterwards. In this case, the Court of Appeal was competent to give effect to the intervening enactment that had been passed by the Legislature after the judgment was given by the trial Court. The real question then is: Is it open to the Legislature to give to its own Acts a meaning which is at variance with the meaning given to it by the Courts—and thereby, in effect, interfere with the judicial function which it is for the courts to discharge? Is it right, in the words of the Judge to say "that the Legislature transcends its true function when it undertakes to say that the language used in a statute has a different meaning and effect to that given to it by the courts." If we rigidly go by the 'Theory of separation of powers' there is much to be said for the view that the legislative power cannot intermeddle with the function of the judiciary—which is to interpret and apply the law. If a Legislature passes a law which, as judicially interpreted, is beyond its competence, does it lie with the same Legislature to explain, by means of a post facto legislation, the true meaning and effect of the impugned legislation so as to show that it was competent to enact it?

In yet another Canadian case, a Legislature declared by means of a retro-active legislation the effect of its own enactment by saying that that enactment was not intended to implement or carry into effect the recommendation or findings of any report and, more or less, directed that in construing that enactment no reference to any such report should be made. After the passing of this explanatory Act, the question arose of giving effect to this declaration of legislative intent in a case before the Court wherein an injunction had already been given upon the assumption that the enactment sought to be subsequently explained by the Legislature had a meaning which was different from the one that was attempted to be read into it by the Legislature. The court ignored this retro-active post facto declaration by the Legislature of the meaning and effect of the previous enactment observing, "a mere assertion, even by the Legislature, does not make that a fact which is not a fact". [See Home Oil Distributors Ltd. v. Attorney-General for British Columbia (1939), 1 W.W.R. 449 (B.C.C.A.)]. This view was defended by the Court of Appeal upon the ground that "the Court regarded the interlocutory enactment as ineffective to curtail the unassailable jurisdiction of the Courts of Canada to adjudicate upon constitutional questions under the British North America Act and under the circumstances before us, we regard it as not of much weight in other respects". [See (1939) 2 W.W.R. 419-20 (B.C.C.A.). See also the Canadian Bar Review for 1941 at p. 45, for a critical appraisal of the argument involved in the decision of these Canadian cases].

Judicial Power
and the Constitution.

In Article III of the Constitution of the United States, it is provided: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish . . .". In Section 2 of the same Article, it is further provided, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority. . .". The combined effect of these provisions is to make it clear beyond all controversy that the judicial power is vested in one Supreme Court, even as the legislative power is vested in the Congress [composed of (a) The House of Representatives plus (b) the Senate] and the Executive Power is vested in the President.

Under our Constitution, as has been remarked earlier, there is no express declaration to the effect that the Constitution is the Supreme Law of the Land. In certain special cases, however, in effect, although not in terms, it is provided that certain portions of our Constitution embody the supreme law of the land.

21. Doctrine of Judicial Review of Legislation and our Constitution

Our Constitution in ART. 4 provides that any existing law or any custom or usage having the force of law, in so far as it is inconsistent with the provisions of Part II (which deals with Fundamental Rights) shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void. It also imposes restriction upon the State and forbids it from making any law or taking any administrative or executive action which takes away or abridges any or all of the Rights conferred by Part II, and proceeds to decree that any law which is made in contravention thereof, shall be void. It, however, saves laws relating to the members of the armed forces or forces charged with the maintenance of public order from a challenge based on ART. 4.

To that extent then, it could be said that the provisions of the Part relating to Fundamental Rights are expressly declared to be the Supreme Law of the Land. In the same part of our Constitution,—to be precise, in ART. 22,—the right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of the rights conferred by the said Part, is guaranteed. The right to move the Supreme Court for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights is thus itself a Fundamental Right. The combined effect of ARTs. 4 and 22 is to confer on the Supreme Court the Power of Judicial Review of State action (be it in the sphere of law-making or law-executing) and of declaring it to be of no effect whatever in case it appears to it to contravene any of the provisions of Part II, or is inconsistent therewith. This right has also been conferred on the High Courts of our country (ART. 170).

The species of cases where the power of Judicial Review, for the purpose of the present analysis, would be exercisable by our Courts may be subdivided into two main categories:

- (A) Cases where there is an absolute prohibition to pass certain laws or to act in a certain way, as, for instance, 'No person shall be deprived of life or liberty or property save in accordance with law, [(ARTs. 5(2), 15(1), etc.)]
- (B) Cases where although there is no absolute prohibition to act in a certain way or pass a certain type of law there is a qualified limitation on State action, as, for instance, in ARTs. 8, 9, 10, and 11, we have rights of citizens like freedom of speech, freedom of association, freedom of movement, freedom to hold and dispose of property etc., guaranteed "subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law".

What is and what is not a reasonable restriction would, in each case, depend upon the judgment of the forum in which the question of the enforcement of any of the fundamental rights in question is raised and, regarded in the abstract, it could be safely asserted that this judgment itself would depend on the Courts' appreciation of the existing economico-political situation in the country, and the judgment would, to that extent, be capable of being determined by appeal to evidence. In substance, therefore, the question, whether or not any restrictions imposed by law upon these rights are reasonable, would be, in the language of jurisprudence, a question of fact, and would be decided upon the state of evidence that might be disclosed to the Courts or upon such other facts of which the Courts, under the law relating to evidence, are entitled to take judicial notice.

22. Courts of our Country—Are they Super-Legislatures ?

The latter species of the power of Judicial Review, in effect, invests the courts of law in this country with the character of being super-legislatures, for it confers upon them what might be characterised as the power of veto upon the legislation passed by the law-making or law-executing organs within the state. But it must be remembered that, strictly speaking, it is a power of veto, which could only be exercised by our Courts upon a case being presented to them for adjudication. It is only in cases where the question of the enforcement of the relevant fundamental rights guaranteed by Part II of the Constitution is involved, that the exercise of this power of the Courts would manifest itself.

Legislation void if the Legislature enacting it is incompetent.

Next we may turn to cases where a Legislature passes Laws when it has not the power to pass a law upon a given subject matter. In ARTs. 105, 106 and 110 we have an account of the limitations imposed upon the law-making power of the Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures in respect of matters mentioned in the Federal, Concurrent and Provincial Lists (see the 5th Schedule). In the event of any Legislature passing a law in defiance of these limitations, there would, in the language of law, be manifestly a lack of initial competence on the part of the relevant legislature to pass the impugned law, and the courts of law in our country, on being of the opinion that a given Legislature has trespassed into the field of law-making activity reserved to another Legislature under the Constitution, would proceed to ignore the law in question and not give to it any effect whatever, that is to say, they would declare it as ultra vires of its legislative powers.

23. Power of Courts to give full effect to Constitution

We may notice in this connection the power of courts to give effect generally to the provisions of the constitution. Unless there is a clear constitutional provision prohibiting the interference by the courts, all constitutional processes prescribed under the Constitution are capable of being enforced by our courts of law, and any result which has been reached by violation of or non-compliance with any of these provisions would be declared by them as invalid. Illustrations of the cases bearing upon express exclusion of the general power of the judiciary to interfere in these cases would be met with in diverse parts of our Constitution. For instance :

- (a) in ART. 32(3) it is provided, "The validity of the election of the President shall not be questioned in any court; or
- (b) in ART. 37(2) it is provided "The question whether any, and if so, what, advice has been tendered by the Cabinet, or a Minister or Minister of State, shall not be enquired into in any court"; or
- (c) in ART. 56(1) it is provided, "The validity of any proceedings in the National Assembly shall not be questioned in any court; or
- (d) in ART. 58(3) it is provided, "Every Money Bill, when it is presented to the President for his assent, shall bear a certificate under the hand of the Speaker that it is a Money Bill, and such certificate shall be conclusive for all purposes and shall not be questioned in any court"; or
- (e) in ART. 142(5) it is provided: "The validity of anything done by or under the authority of the Delimitation Commission shall not be called in question in any court."

The very fact that, in several parts of our Constitution, the power of courts to interfere has been expressly excluded, lends itself to the interpretation that in regard to the enforcement of the remaining parts of the Constitution (as, for instance, where a certain appointment is to be made under certain conditions or a certain legislative or executive action has to be initiated in a certain way) that power of interference by Courts exists: this construction tends to show that, if there is any disregard of any of the constitutional requirements, the result can, subject only to the prohibitions imposed by the express constitutional provisions on the judicial power of the courts, always be attacked as being contrary to the Constitution and therefore of no legal effect, and our Courts would be duty bound to give effect to a well directed challenge on this score.

The whole of our Constitution thus appears to be designed to create a kind of polity which is law-dominated, and all the authorities and organs of the State-Power and the specific modes in which they are to act and inter-act in the discharge of the duties assigned to them, are all matters that are liable to be controlled in the manner provided for in the Constitution, and the courts of law, in the exercise of their professed power of interpreting the written word of the Constitution, in effect, become, subject to certain well-defined limitations mentioned in the Constitution itself, final authorities in the adjudication of questions relating to the constitutionality of governmental acts and omissions.

The Government thus established by the Constitution may well be described as a Government by the Judges. The powers of the executive and the legislature, as even of the judiciary, being themselves the creatures of the Constitution, must operate within the spheres of their allotted jurisdiction. The authority of the Constitution being superior to the judgment of the authorities it creates, the organ of the sovereign power which is authorised to interpret and apply the Constitution thus, in a qualified sense atleast, becomes superior to other organs and authorities. It is no doubt true that the judiciary, while interpreting and applying the law, must surrender itself at the altar of the obvious constitutional limitations imposed on its general power, but since the determination of questions relating to those limits is once again, in the last resort, a matter of the interpretation of the Constitution, which function is assigned to the judiciary in our Constitution, the Judges in effect become judges of the limits of their own jurisdiction, power or authority.

This is an enormous power indeed! Such a power has been conferred upon the footing of belief that honest and upright Judges could be trusted to act as the 'Custodians' of our Constitution and as the watch dogs of the virtues of all the authorities that have been established under our Constitution. But, then, even honest Judges are only honest men—men of flesh and blood, men who are heir to all the ills that men suffer from, ills to which the whole of mankind is a prey. Extra-judicial factors do sometime operate, and whereas some of these have reference to the besetting sins inherent in the constitution of human mind, there are others that have reference to the nature of the system itself: Judges are called upon to appeal to artificial standards of judgment and in the conflict of views between them it is the majority view that is made to prevail, a view which need not be a valid view to take of the case before the Court. As it has been wisely remarked, "What is the rule or principle which is to be applied in the settlement and adjudication of controversies that come to courts of law in the last resort, depends upon the way in which the majority of the judges who compose the supreme court opine about them." Similarly, it has been said by the same writer, "Now, there is no set rule of construction which will unify the judgment of nine men who at any one time constitute the Supreme Court, or the many inferior judges throughout the country. The logic of construction is created by the Judges; it governs their mind and it is not something external to them. For logic is procedure and no more, but the decision of a judge depends upon the nature of the premises from which he proceeds... There is no indisputably authoritative system of interpretation: nothing which is universally accepted. That which exists is the synthetic production of the commentators and law schools. It is a collection of sayings and reasons extracted from the judgments rendered. But the Judges contradict each other. They contradict themselves—not always on different occasions. Their real motives do not always square with their expressed reasons. Obviously the rules are general and vague: and just as obviously their number complicates the issue and trammels the conscience. A fresh case is liable to call for a fresh rule, or such an application of an old one that it becomes unrecognizable without the services of intricate casuistry, as considerations of some of these rules show." (Professor Herman Finer, Theory & Practice of Modern Governments, p. 145).

Our Polity is Law-dominated.

Government by the Judges.

"Internal limitation and Restraints" on Judicial Power.

24. Role of Judiciary in the English Constitution

The role of judiciary in the English Constitution is radically different from the one that has been discussed above. There, the Judges receive the ordinary as also the constitutional laws passed by Parliament as though they constituted the Supreme Law of the Land, and in relation to which they could not exercise the power of judicial review. They cannot question these legislative acts as having stemmed from a lack of competence in the legislative body that made them nor can they pronounce upon the reasonableness or the wisdom of the courses of conduct they command or forbid. They are there only to interpret and apply the legislative mandates.

Lee vs. Bude.

Repelling the contention that the English Court was competent to ignore the Acts of Parliament that were fraudulently procured, Willes, J. remarked in the case of Lee v. Bude "I would observe as to these Acts of Parliament that they are the Law of this land; and we do not sit here as a Court of Appeal from Parliament. It was once said,—I think in Hobart, (In Day v. Savadge Hob. 87)—that if an Act of Parliament were to create a man Judge in his own case the Court might disregard it. That dictum, however, stands more as a warning, rather than as an authority to be followed. We sit here as servants of the Queen and the Legislature. Are we to act as regents over what is done by Parliament with the consent of the Queen, Lords and Commons? I deny that any such authority exists. If an Act of Parliament has been obtained improperly it is for the Legislature to correct it by repealing it: but so long as it exists as law, the Courts are bound to obey it. The proceedings here are judicial, not autocratic, which they would be if we could make laws instead of administering them." (See Lee v. Bude and Torrington Junction Railway Co. (1871) L.R. 6 C.P., p. 576 at 582).

Principles of statutory interpretation in England.

If the words are unmistakably clear, there is no possibility for judicial bias clouding the issue of their interpretation, and no loophole "for the introduction of extraneous doctrine or philosophy". The function of interpretation in England is regulated by principles of common law and these have been indicated by Keir & Lawson (Cases on Constitutional Law—Oxford 1928—Chap. I). These are :

- "(1) The State is not liable to be sued unless by express legislative provision.
- (2) Fundamental rights are not to be withdrawn by other than direct legislation; thus there is to be no deprivation of the common-law rights of individual freedom, or property without compensation, unless expressly stated, and penal and taxing legislation is to be strictly construed.
- (3) Any change in the process of governments which is the unintentional result of legislation on other matters will not be permitted.
- (4) Wide latitude will be granted to the executive in question on the extent of its powers during periods of national emergency."

Principles of Judicial Interpretation—Position in Pakistan.

It is submitted that although the historical background of the corpus juris of Pakistan has been considerably influenced by these common-law doctrines, now that there is a written constitution which includes in its folds a chapter on fundamental rights, the principles that would apply to the interpretation of our Constitution will have to be evolved by our courts, and it is submitted that the pedigree of these principles will be a some sort of "cross-breed" and would partake of a dual character in that, in some respects, canons of interpretation developed by the British Courts and, in some other respects, canons of interpretation and construction evolved by the American courts will have to be blended with the ultimate result that our judiciary will negotiate a course of interpretation which would be somewhere midway between these two forensic extremes.

25. Supremacy of some Constitutions is secured through means other than that of "Judicial Review".

It becomes necessary in this context to notice how in countries where the doctrine of judicial review does not apply the supremacy of a written Constitution is maintained.

(a) Swiss
Example.

In Switzerland, for instance, the federal judiciary has no power to review the constitutionality of the federal laws. Its powers are confined to adjudicating the constitutionality of the Cantonal laws. The Swiss constitution does not establish any clear-cut division between the executive and the judicial organs of the state power. It is the Federal Assembly that is the final judge of questions involving determination of the respective jurisdictions of the executive and of the federal court. The Judges themselves are appointed by the Federal Assembly (ART. 107) and that, the Federal Court, as an organ of the State power has not to be viewed as being on par with the Federal Assembly. In Part IV of Chapter II (ARTs. 106 to 114) of the Swiss Constitution we have the powers and jurisdiction of federal judiciary defined, but more particularly it is ARTs. 110, 111, 112 and 113 that set-forth specifically the elements of its jurisdiction. It is provided in Article 113, "...in all cases abovementioned the federal tribunal shall administer the laws passed by the Federal Assembly, and such ordinances of that assembly as are of general application. It shall likewise act in accordance with treaties ratified by the Federal Assembly."

Dicey quoted:

"The reason why", says Dicey, "all Acts of the Assembly must be treated as constitutional by the Federal Tribunal is that the constitution itself almost precludes the possibility of encroachment upon its articles by the federal legislative body. No legal revision can take place without the assent both of a majority of Swiss citizens and of a majority of the Cantons, and an ordinary law duly passed by the Federal Assembly may be legally annulled by a popular veto. The authority of the Swiss Assembly nominally exceeds the authority of Congress, because in reality the Swiss Legislative body is weaker than Congress. For while in each case there lies in the background a legislative sovereign capable of controlling the action of the ordinary legislature, the sovereign power is far more easily brought into play in Switzerland than in America. When the sovereign power can easily enforce its will, it may trust to its own action for maintaining its rights; when, as in America, the same power acts but rarely and with difficulty, the courts naturally become the guardians of the sovereign's will expressed in the articles of the Constitution". (Dicey's Law of the Constitution, pp. 170-171).

(b)
French
Example.

In the Constitution of the Fourth French Republic, a special procedure for securing the constitutional validity of laws has been improvised. A study of ARTs. 91, 92 and 93 would exhibit this procedure in all its details. It is for the Constitutional Committee created under ART. 91 of the French Constitution to say whether the laws passed by the National Assembly imply amendment of the Constitution. The Committee is presided over by the President of the Republic and includes President of the National Assembly, the President of the Council of Republic and 7 other members elected by the National Assembly by proportional representation of party groups at the beginning of each annual session. These members are drawn from outside its membership. Likewise, Council of the Republic also elects three other members. Upon receiving a joint request, (namely that it examine the impugned law) from the President of the Republic and the President of the Council of Republic, it proceeds, in the first instance, to bring about agreement between National Assembly and the Council of Republic, but if it does not succeed in accomplishing this, it is required to decide the matter within five days, next after the date on which the request is received. This period could be reduced to two days in cases of emergency. If it holds that the law in question implies amendment of the Constitution, the impugned law shall be sent back to the National Assembly for reconsideration, and if the Parliament adheres to its original vote, the law will not be promulgated until the Constitution has been amended according to the procedure set forth in ART. 90. It would be noticed that interpretation of the constitutionality of the impugned law does not partake either of the method provided in the Constitution of United States (namely by means of judicial review), nor again does it conform to the English Constitutional practice (that is, of rendering the Parliamentary legislative Acts immune from challenge). The French Assembly is not supreme in the sense in which British Parliament undoubtedly is supreme. The Committee created under the Constitution, although its personnel consists of high and responsible persons, cannot claim the independent status of the Judges. By this method, however, before a law can be made effective, delay is bound to intervene. If the law is declared to be unconstitutional it cannot be promulgated as effective law until the compliance with the prescribed procedure and the special majority required for constitutional amendments are complied with. It would also be noticed that the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Committee to declare Acts of the National Assembly unconstitutional, does not extend to the bill of rights—that is, precisely the part in respect of which legislation must in the ordinary course of things suffer the greatest measure of challenge.

Conclusion.

The cases of Swiss and French Constitutions have been referred to by the author in an attempt to show that the procedure of judicial review is not the only device of conserving the supremacy of a written constitution.

Both of these constitutions, that is of Switzerland and France, exhibit appeal to political processes and not to a judicial forum in the matter of determining constitutionality of laws enacted by their legislatures.

26. Meaning of "Unconstitutional Law"

To begin with, the expression "Unconstitutional Law" is a contradiction in terms: if what the Legislature has done is beyond its constitutional powers, the result cannot be law, and if it is law it must be the result of an act done by a Legislature in the exercise of its constitutional authority and cannot, on that account, be dubbed as "Unconstitutional". An unconstitutional law is in reality no law at all: it confers no rights, imposes no obligations, creates no liability—it is of no legal force or effect whatsoever.

Our Parliament unlike the Parliament in England is a non-sovereign Law-making body and its acts would be without any legal force if they did not conform to the requirements of those constitutional provisions which define the limits of its law-making powers. The sovereign power, which under the theory of our Constitution resides in the People, "who have adopted, enacted and given" to themselves "this Constitution", has imposed certain well-defined limitations upon the exercise of law-making functions of the Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures (as also upon the Federal or Provincial Executive) and an exercise of a power by any of the organs of State-power beyond these limits, that is, beyond the powers conferred by the Constitution, would therefore be denounced by Courts as "unconstitutional".

The rule that is to be applied in the determination of the question whether a given law is "void" or "unconstitutional", is precisely the same as the one that is applied by the courts in England when they have to deal with the acts of administrative authorities who have to work within the ambit of only those powers that have been granted to them under the Act of Parliament: as, for example, the powers delegated by Parliament to a Corporation like the English Railway Company, powers in the exercise whereof it makes what are called the bye-laws, and the rule is that any bye-law made by such a corporation which is beyond the powers conferred upon it by the Parliament, is ultra vires of its charter and therefore legally considered, null and void. In short, it is inoperative as Law.

27. Position under Government of India Act compared with the position under present Constitution

The Government of India Act, 1935, as it stood before the coming into being of the two sovereign Dominions of India and Pakistan, could only be amended by an Act of Imperial Parliament. The Federal Legislature (or the Indian Legislature) that the Parliament had set up under its provisions, being a non-sovereign law-making body, could pass only those laws which fell within the ambit of its authority as circumscribed under that Act, and the Indian Courts had the power to denounce a statute enacted by the Legislature as being of no force and effect in case the same was adjudged by them as having been made beyond its law-making powers. The present legal position under the Constitutions framed in India and Pakistan is precisely the same—with the sole difference that the new Constitutions in these countries are ordained and established by the sovereign people instead of the Imperial Parliament in England. The Legislatures that have been set up under either of those Constitutions are non-sovereign law-making bodies. The two Constituent Assemblies, of India and Pakistan, that were set up under the Indian Independence Act, 1947, and charged with the duty of framing the Constitution for the two sovereign Independent Dominions had, under section 6 of that Act, full power to make laws including laws having extra-territorial operation, and in sub-section 6 of the said Section their power to make laws was expressly declared to extend to the making of laws limiting for the future the powers of the Legislature of the Dominion. Both the Indian as also the Pakistan Constituent Assembly have actually imposed limits on the Legislative powers of the law-making organs they have set up under their new Constitutions. The imposition of limits on these powers was necessary in view of the fact that the authority of the Government was to be divided on the basis of Federal principle between the National and Regional Governments. The Constitutions framed by these Assemblies also included chapters relating to Fundamental Rights, and to the extent the framers of these Constitutions recognised the justiciable character of these constitutional rights and guarantees they, in effect, limited the power of the law-making organ of the State to make laws in violation of those rights and guarantees.

Limits to Legislative Power necessarily postulate the existence of some agent or organ within the State, to which is left the duty of recognizing, and if possible enforcing those limits on power. Under our Constitution that power, subject to such express limitations as have been placed upon that power (i.e. power of judicial review), is reposed in the courts of law.

The juristic aspect of this power, as an incident of the American concept of the constitution, being the "Supreme Law of the Land," has been stated by Kent thus: "The Constitution is the act of the people, speaking in their original character, and defining the permanent conditions of the social alliance; and there can be no doubt on the point with us, that every act of the legislative power contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, is absolutely null and void. The judiciary department is the proper power in the Government to determine whether a statute be or be not constitutional. The interpretation or construction of the Constitution is as much a judicial act, and requires the exercise of the same legal discretion, as the interpretation or construction of a law. To contend that the courts of justice must obey the requisitions of an Act of the Legislature when it appears to them to have been passed in violation of the Constitution, would be to

Enforcement of limits on Power requires the existence of an agency charged with the duty of maintaining these limits.

contend that the law was superior to the Constitution, and that the Judges had no right to look into it, and regard it as a paramount law. It would be rendering the power of the agent greater than that of his principal and be declaring that the will of only one concurrent and co-ordinate department of the subordinate authorities under the Constitution was absolute over the other departments, and competent to control, according to its own will and pleasure, the whole fabric of the Government, and the fundamental laws on which it rested. The attempt to impose restraints upon the legislative power would be fruitless, if the constitutional provisions were left without any power in the government to guard and enforce them". Lecture XX (Commentaries on American Law). Vol. I., p. 447, 1889—Philadelphia. The Blackstone Publishing Co.

28. Power to declare laws "Unconstitutional"—not inconsistent with giving effect to the will of the People

When the courts of law hold certain laws to be unconstitutional their declarations cannot be construed as defeating the will of the people as expressed in the legislatures of the country. From what has been said so far it would be apparent that the legal sovereign that ordains and establishes the constitution is the People, but this term ought not to be confused with the people as the voters who have returned their representatives to act as legislators. The people as a historic community must be distinguished from the People as a community of the entire living population with their predecessors and successors. "The people, acting solemnly and deliberately", says Professor Willoughby in his book on The Constitution of the United States, "in their sovereign capacity, declare that certain matters shall be determined in a certain way. These matters, because of their great and fundamental importance, they reduce to definite written form, and declare that they shall not be changed except in a particular manner. In addition to this they go on to say, in substance, that so decided is their will and so maturely formed their judgment, upon these matters, any act of their own representatives in legislature inconsistent therewith, is not to be taken as expressing their true will. Therefore, when the courts declare void, legislative acts inconsistent with constitutional provisions, the Judges are giving effect to the real will of the people as they have previously solemnly declared it (p.9)".

Thus, in effect, in declaring laws unconstitutional the Judges are administering the real will of the legal sovereign—a will, which having regard to the view they take of the impugned law, has been thwarted by the representatives of people considered as a historic Community.

(a) The case of U.S.A. Constitution.
Walter Lippmann quoted.

It is interesting to recall some facts which have a bearing upon the question as to in what sense was it right for the Founding Fathers to say, "We the people of United States... ordain and establish this Constitution". On the best evidence that is now available as to the number of persons who could be said to have become party to that document, it is by now well-settled that the vote was under 5 per cent of the whole population. Here is what Walter Lippmann has to say on this aspect of the question relating to the Constitution having been ordained and established by the People of America. "On September 17, 1787, about forty members signed the draft on which they had been working since May 25, for one hundred and sixteen days. In ART. VII of their text they stipulated that if and when conventions in nine States had ratified it, then for those nine States The People of the United States would have ordained and established the Constitution. In this context a majority of the delegates elected to nine State conventions were deemed to be entitled to act as The People of the United States.

"The inhabitants of the United States who were qualified to vote for these delegates were not a large number. They included no slaves, no women and, except in New York,

Power to declare laws "Unconstitutional"—not inconsistent with giving effect to the will of the People only such adult males as could pass property and other highly restrictive tests. We do not have accurate figures. But according to the census of 1790 the population was 3,929,782. Of these, 3,200,000 were free persons and the adult males among them who were entitled to vote are estimated to have been less than 500,000. Using the Massachusetts figures as a statistical sample, it may be assumed that less than 160,000 actually voted for delegates to all the ratifying conventions; and of those voting, perhaps 100,000 favoured the adoption of the Constitution.

"The exact figures do not matter. The point is that the voters were not—and we may add that they have never been and can never be—more than a fraction of the total population. They were less than 5 per cent when the Constitution was ordained. They were not yet 40 per cent in 1952 when, except under the special conditions in the South, we had universal adult suffrage. Manifestly, the voters can never be equal to the whole population, even to the whole living adult population.

"Because of the discrepancy between The People as voters and The People as the corporate nation, the voters have no title to consider themselves the Proprietors of the Commonwealth and to claim that their interests are identical with the public interest. A prevailing plurality of the voters are not The People. The claim that they are, is a bogus title invoked to justify the usurpation of the executive power by representative assemblies and the intimidation of public men by demagogic politicians. In fact demagoguery can be described as the sleight of hand by which a faction of the People as voters are invested with the authority of The People. That is why so many crimes are committed in the people's name." See his Public Philosophy (pp. 32-33) Boston 1955.

It is on the basis of this very realization that Herman Finer is of the opinion that the People of the United States did not, in any real sense, give to themselves the Constitution. It is only metaphorically true that the People established the constitution. The delegates to the Convention were chosen without any popular awareness of what they were to accomplish. Beard has called the convention's resolution, that the constitution go into effect when 9 of the States had ratified it, as a sort of coup d'état, a remark which is strongly reminiscent of Hume's description of the making of Glorious Revolution in England of 1689 by the majority of 700. (Charles Beard—Economic Interpretation of Constitution. N.Y. 1913, p. 16).

What has been said about the meagre vote in support of the United States Constitution is equally true of the Revolutionary Constitution of France. Anyone examining the nature and extent of the popular support, which the Revolutionary Constitution of 1871 secured from the people's will, would be amazed to discover the extremely unrepresentative character of the Constituent Assembly that was responsible for its enactment. Even the question, whether France should have a constitutional monarchy on the lines of English pattern or it should have a republican form of government, which was decided in January, 1875, was itself adopted by majority of one vote (353 to 352), and even this extremely meagre margin was secured by a shift of 26 voters from moderate monarchists who were afraid that a further delay in the installation of a Constitution would provoke radical disorder in the country. The later vote on the same test brought the affirmative votes upto 425 though some of the converts voted in the hope that the republic would fail.

Even the Constitution of Fourth French Republic of 1946 could hardly, considered in the light of well known facts, be said to have been ordained and established by the People of France. The position of the party alignments indicative of the strength of voting for the Constituent Assembly of October 21, 1945, was as follows :—

Communists	26·1%
M.R.P.	23·9%

(b)
Case of French
Constitution:
Revolutionary
Constitution.

(c)
Case of French
Constitution
of 1946.

(d) Cases of Weimar and Soviet
Constitution.

(e) Case of our Constitution.

Lippmann quoted.

Austin's View.

Socialists	23.4%
Left Association, including Radical Socialists	10.6%
Conservatives and various other small groups	15.2% and the basic question, whether the Assembly should be constituent, which was referred to the people, was settled by a narrow margin of votes: 15.66 million for, over half a million against, and 8 million abstentions. The position of the parties remained roughly the same in the Constituent Assembly of June 2, 1946. The first draft prepared by it was rejected by 52.8% of the votes at the referendum. In the referendum of October 13, 1946, a slightly amended draft was approved only by 35.9% of the electorate. Out of a total of 26.2 million, 9.25 million said 'yes', to the Constitution; 8 million said 'no', and 8.5 million did not even vote. (See Finer's Theory and Practice of Modern Govts. pp. 123-124)

Instances of the Weimar Constitution of Germany, and of course of the Soviet Constitution could be more adequately pressed in the service of the argument to show that the thesis that it is the people who establish the institutional fabric of the Government under the written constitution is just a useful fiction and at best only a convenient metaphor.

A student of constitutional history would, therefore, not be amazed at the thought that the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan, that gave this Constitution to the country, did not have much popular support, and that its representative character is open to grave doubt. After all a House of 80 members is supposed to have represented a Nation of 76 million. The election of these members to the Constituent Assembly was secured indirectly by the Legislatures of the various provinces of Pakistan. And what is worse, those electoral colleges by then had no mandate from the people to vote for any representatives to constitute the New Constituent Assembly. The Constitution when adopted was rejected by the opposition which consisted of nearly 30 per cent of the total vote of the members present in the House. And what is more, it was rejected by a majority of the representatives of a major province of Pakistan, namely East Bengal.

29. Usefulness of the fiction of Sovereign People establishing the Constitution

But all the same, in the ultimate analysis it is, "The People" who ordain and establish the Constitution, speak on behalf of the nation. And it is for the purposes of practical politics important that they should speak in the name of the 'people' understood as a corporation, that is, as an entity which lives on while individuals come into it and go out of it. This is because, in the words of Walter Lippmann, "This invisible, inaudible, and so largely non-existent community gives rational meaning to the necessary objectives of Government. If we deny it, identifying the people with the prevailing pluralities who vote in order to serve, as Bentham has it, 'their pleasures and their security', where and what is the nation; and whose duty and business is it to defend the public interest? Bentham leaves us with the state as an arena in which factions contend for their immediate advantage in the struggle for survival and domination. Without the invisible and transcendent community to bind them, why should they care for posterity? And why should posterity care about them, and about their treaties and their contracts, their commitments and their promises? Yet, without these engagements to the future, they could not live and work; without these engagements the fabric of society is unravelled and shredded." (See Walter Lippmann's "Public Philosophy" 1955).

30. Meaning of "Sovereignty"

We are now in a position to consider the precise meaning of the term "sovereignty". John Austin in his lectures on "The Province of Jurisprudence Determined etc." examined the concept of sovereignty strictly from the point of view of the limited purpose which he had set before himself, namely: How to explain the main characteristics which distinguish positive laws from other kinds of laws—like the moral law etc. It would be recalled that, according to him, laws proper or properly so-called are commands; laws which are not commands are laws "improperly so-called". In his opinion, the essential feature of a positive law stems from the fact that it is in the nature of a command issued by a sovereign person or a sovereign body of persons to a member or members of the independent political society wherein that person or body of persons is sovereign or supreme. A command, according to Austin, has a peculiar meaning: "If you express or intimate a wish that I shall do or forbear from some act, and if you will visit me with an evil in case I comply not with your wish, the expression or intimation of your wish is a command... Being liable to evil from you if I comply not with a wish you signify, I am bound or obliged by your command, or I lie under a duty to obey it. If, in spite of that evil in prospect, I comply not with the wish you signify, I am said to disobey your command, or to violate the duty which it imposes. Command and duty are thus correlative terms... The evil which will probably be incurred in case a command be disobeyed or (to use an equivalent expression) in case a duty is broken, is frequently called sanction, or an enforcement of obedience. Or (varying the phrase) the command or the duty is said to be sanctioned or enforced by the chance of incurring the evil." (See Lecture 1, of The Province of Jurisprudence Determined).

He distinguishes sovereignty from other superiority or might, and society "political and independent" from society of other descriptions. In words that are memorable and may as well be quoted, (See pp. 220 et seq. of Lecture VI of Province of Jurisprudence Determined. London—John Murray—1911) he stated his thesis as follows :

"The superiority which is styled sovereignty, and the independent political society which sovereignty implies, is distinguished from other superiority, and from other society, by the following marks or characters:—1. The bulk of the given society are in a habit of obedience or submission to a determinate and common superior: let that common superior be a certain individual person, or a certain body or aggregate of individual persons. 2. That certain individual, or that certain body of individuals, is not in a habit of obedience to a determinate human superior. Laws (improperly so called) which opinion sets or imposes, may permanently affect the conduct of that certain individual or body. To express or tacit commands of other determinate parties, that certain individual or body may yield occasional submission. But there is no determinate person, or determinate aggregate of persons, to whose commands, express or tacit, that certain individual or body renders habitual obedience.

"Or the notions of sovereignty and independent political society may be expressed concisely thus—If a determinate human superior, not in a habit of obedience to a like superior, receive habitual obedience from the bulk of a given society, that determinate superior is sovereign in that society, and the society (including the superior) is a society political and independent."

Austin defines independent Political Society as consisting of a Sovereign. The relation between subject and sovereign is one of power: the sovereign cannot be said to have legal rights against his subjects and to that extent, it cannot be said that the sovereign is bound by any legal duties. It is necessary that this contention of Austin should be clearly understood.

It is of the essence of a legal relationship that it can subsist between two parties only when, transcending them both, there exists a sovereign who will enforce the breach of the rule of law or the vinculum juris which ties up the two parties together. Thus regarded, the subject matter of Constitutional Law may be divided into two parts: in the words of Professor G. W. Paton, "As against the sovereign body as a whole, constitutional law is great and bestows morality enforced by moral sanctions alone; but it may be regarded as positive law in so far as it binds particular members of the sovereign body. Collectively considered, the sovereign is above the law, but a member of the House of Commons is individually bound by an act of Parliament though he is a member of the body which creates the law. If the Sovereign consists of only one person, Constitutional Law is only positive morality". See p. 132 of his "A Text Book of Jurisprudence".

Austin's definition of sovereignty has been criticised mainly on the ground that it is based on a generalisation resting on the concept of the sovereign as it is known to the English Constitution, and that, as applied to the States established by written Constitutions with their clear-cut distribution of sovereign power, the characteristics formulated by Austin as being distinctive of the concept of sovereignty do not seem to be there to present themselves. For instance, in those systems of constitutional law and practice where the final court of appeal is a judicial forum and where the Legislature is bound by the constitution as interpreted by the courts, it is really courts that are repositories of the ultimate Sovereign power of the State. And it is difficult in such situations to identify the relationship between the Sovereign and subject much less to hold it as being of any practical consequence whatever. "In order that a society may form a society-political", says Austin, "the bulk of its members must be in the habit of obedience to a certain Common Superior. But in order that a given Society may form a Society, political and Independent, that certain Superior must not be habitually obedient to a determinate human superior" (p. 224). It is difficult to see how this test, for example, can validly apply to a country having a republican form of Government established by a Written Constitution. There is no determinate human superior in such society as all power relations here are controlled by the constitutional processes.

If, however, this mode of criticising the theory of sovereignty, as applied to States having written constitutions, is examined further, it would be noticed that it is based on a misunderstanding of the concept of the sovereignty as formulated by Austin himself. The sovereign, in the case of a country having a Republican Constitution, may well be the People, that is, that legal entity that formulates and establishes the written constitution, and having established it, as it were, retires in the background. Thereafter, the sovereign power within the State is exercised by the principal organs set up in the Constitution. The Courts that interpret the Constitution do so only because they have been charged with the duty of confining, by recourse to their interpretative functions, the several organs set up by the Constitution to the sphere of their allotted jurisdiction. The principal organs and authorities thus established represent the power-relations within the State and so long as they conform to the constitutional arrangements prescribed in the Constitution, they reflect the exercise of the sovereign power in the manner indicated in the Constitution itself. Even a court of law that has, as for instance in a Federal system like the one that obtains in the United States of America, the power to decide whether a particular statute is constitutional or not, could not be said to be a sovereign for the simple reason that, to begin with, its power in effect is negative only, since it can reject but not initiate legislation, and secondly, the ultimate power of amending the Constitution continues to be vested in the political sovereign and can be exercised only in the manner provided for by that sovereign in the Constitution itself. The position which the Parliament occupies in the system of English Constitutional Theory and Practice is in a sense one of absolute dictatorship, if only because it is in reality a Constituent Assembly and all its enactments, in that sense, become Fundamental Laws; but the same position in a Written Constitution of the kind we are considering is exercised, in the first instance, by the political sovereign who enacts the Constitution and who, whenever the need arises, interferes with the Constitution and amends it in the light of changing conditions under which a given politically independent society lives, moves, and has its being. It is in this sense that people are the true sovereign—"For the true legislator is he, not by whose authority law was first made but by whose authority it continues to be a law." (Adopted from Hobbes and quoted by Austin p. 193).

31. Contemporary Thought on the subject of "Sovereignty"

In a recent paper, (by W. J. Rees) the theory of sovereignty has been reconstituted in the light of what has been said about it by modern jurists. Sovereignty in the legal sense has been used by some as equivalent to supreme legal authority. It has been used by others to mean some legal authority in so far as it is also a completely moral authority. And yet for another group of philosophers, the word is meant to indicate a "supreme coercive power exercised by a determinate body of persons possessing a monopoly of certain instruments of coercion." And finally, it has also been used as equivalent to a supreme coercive power exercised habitually and co-operatively by all, or nearly all the members of the community. Mr. Rees considers that the first version of sovereignty is rendered by John Austin and by lawyers of the Austinian School; the second by writers like Rousseau and the Hegelians like Bernard Bosanquet; the third is illustrated in the case of a determinate body of persons capable of enforcing decisions against any likely opposition, no matter who makes or otherwise carries out those decisions, and the use of the concept, in this sense, is implied in Lord Bryce's idea of the "Practical Sovereign," which he defines as "the strongest force in the State, whether that force has or has not any recognised legal supremacy"; and in the final sense, reference is made to the representative thinkers of the school of thought like Locke and others who speak of this supreme coercive power as "the force of the community", "the force of the majority" and "the force of all the people" in such a way as to imply a distinction between this and the exercise of power of a professional police or a standing army. "Where there is constituted a commonwealth", says Locke, "there can be but one supreme power which is legislative, to which all the rest are and must be subordinate, yet the legislative power being only the fiduciary power to act for certain ends, there remains still in the people a supreme power to remove or alter the legislative when they find the legislative power act contrary to the trust reposed in them." (See his Treatise para 149).

Austinean theory of sovereignty reflects a generalisation based upon the distinctive feature of English Constitution, viz the supremacy of the Parliament. Under the English Constitution, Parliament does represent the Sovereign strictly in accordance with Austin's conception of what sovereignty ought to denote. This is the reason why Professor A. V. Dicey regards the Austinean theory of sovereignty as, in main, having been influenced by the peculiar history of the English constitutional law. Besides, all this, there is, all along, a confusion in the writings of Austin resulting from his indiscriminate use of the word 'Sovereign'—a word which as used by him sometimes is suggestive of the concept of 'legal sovereignty' and at other times that of 'political sovereignty.'

That body of persons is politically sovereign or supreme in a State, the will of which is, as a matter of fact, obeyed by the citizens of the State. In cases of rebellion, for instance, the legal sovereign—that is the body of persons recognised by law as sovereign—suffers a setback and the de facto political sovereign who may have usurped power comes up prominently to the fore-front. It is important to bear this distinction between the legal and political sovereign clearly in view. It is for this very reason that Dicey is of the opinion that Austin uses the term 'sovereignty' as a mere legal conception implying the power of law-making unrestricted by any legal limit, and he proceeds further to observe:

"If the term 'sovereignty' be thus used, the sovereign power under the English constitution is clearly 'Parliament'. But the word 'sovereignty' is sometimes employed in a political rather than in a strictly legal sense. That body is 'politically' sovereign or supreme in a state the will of which is ultimately obeyed by the citizens of the state. In this sense of the word the electors of Great Britain may be said to be, together with the Crown and the Lords, or perhaps, in strict accuracy, independently of the King and the Peers, the body in which sovereign power is vested. For, as things now stand, the will of the electorate, and certainly of the electorate in combination with the Lords and the Crown, is sure ultimately to prevail on all subjects to be determined by the British Government. The matter indeed may be carried a little further, and we may assert that the arrangements of the constitution are now such as to ensure that the will of the electors shall by regular and constitutional means always in the end assert itself as the predominant influence in the country. But this is a political, not a legal fact. The electors can in the long run always enforce their will. But the courts will take no notice of the will of the electors. The judges know nothing about any will of the people except in so far as that will is expressed by an Act of Parliament, and would never suffer the validity of a statute to be questioned on the ground of its having been passed or being kept alive in opposition to the wishes of the electors. The political sense of the word 'sovereignty' is, it is true, fully as important as the legal sense or more so. But the two significations, though intimately connected together, are essentially different, and in some part of his work, Austin has apparently confused the one sense with the other." (See Dicey's Law of the Constitution P. 73.)

Applying the distinction between the political and legal sovereign within the framework of power relations established by our Constitution, if we disregard for the time being the assertion contained in the preamble, namely that all sovereignty belongs to Allah, one could say that (a) the legal sovereign is the Constitution itself, in that the several organs and authorities established under its mandate are controlled in the exercise of the power vested in them by the very limitations contained in the Constitution, and that (b) the political sovereign is the 'people' who in the exercise of their 'constituent power' can change the Constitution itself. The juristic implication of the declaration contained in the first paragraph of the preamble, namely, that the sovereignty over the entire universe belongs to Allah Almighty alone, and the authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him as a sacred trust, will be dealt with in the last chapter of the present study. But suffice it to say that this declaration is totally irrelevant to the judicial interpretation of our Constitution and this, for the obvious reason that even this declaration is made by the very people of Pakistan who have given to themselves the present Constitution.—(See the last paragraph of the preamble.) Besides, the true nature of authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him, is incapable of being judicially interpreted and determined for the simple reason that there is no indication anywhere in the Constitution as to the nature and extent of the limits imposed thereon to which reference is made, nor again is there a reference to the means by which these limitations are to be enforced as operative part of the constitutional processes that have been sanctioned by our Constitution.

32. Paradox of the relative priority of Law and the Constitution

It is often the indiscriminate use of these "legal" and "political" meanings of the word sovereign, this incapacity to discriminate between the competing versions of the notion of sovereignty that gives rise to a paradox which has been posed by Salmond thus: If constitutional law is to be regarded as "the body of those legal principles which determine the constitution of State—which determine, that is to say, the essential and Fundamental portions of the state's organisation—we have here to face an apparent difficulty and a possible objection. How, it may be asked, can the Constitution of a State be determined by Law at all?

There can be no law unless there is already a State whose law it is, and there can be no State without a constitution. This is how Salmond puts the case in his "Jurisprudence".

"The State and its constitution are therefore necessarily prior to the law. How, then, does the law determine the constitution? Is constitutional law in reality law at all? Is not the constitution a pure matter of fact, with which the law has no concern? The answer is, that the constitution is both a matter of fact and a matter of law. The constitution as it exists de facto underlies of necessity the constitution as it exists de jure. Constitutional law involves concurrent constitutional practice. It is merely the reflection, within courts of law, of the external objective reality of the de facto organisation of the State. It is the theory of the constitution, as received by courts of justice. It is the constitution, not as it is in itself, but as it appears when looked at through the eye of the law. The constitution as a matter of fact is logically prior to the constitution as a matter of law. In other words, constitutional practice is logically prior to constitutional law. There may be a State and a constitution without any law, but there can be no law without a State and a constitution. No constitution, therefore, can have its source and basis in the law." (p. 140)

It is interesting to observe that both the constitutions of Pakistan and India have a legal basis in so far as they have admittedly been enacted by the two Constituent Assemblies set up by the departing political sovereign on the eve of the establishment of the two independent sovereign States with power to make provision for the constitution of the new dominions. The state of subjecthood of the Indian peoples came to an end when the British Parliament ceased to be responsible, as a legal and political sovereign, in respect of the governance of India and declared the independent and sovereign character of the two Dominions that were brought into being under the aegis of the Indian Independence Act of 1947. In respect of the constitution of Pakistan and India it would not, therefore, be correct to say that they have no source and basis in the law. By the contention of Sir John Salmond, "No constitution, therefore, can have its source and basis in the law," all that is implied is that the revolutionary constitutions, say the Constitutions like those of U.S.A. and France of the 18th Century, Constitutions which came into being after the status quo was disrupted by the people who rebelled against the monarchical institutions of the day, were not the constitutions that had a source and basis in the law, i.e. law considered as a command that was habitually being obeyed by these peoples. But to pose the problem thus, as it would be apparent now, is to confuse the issue: and the confusion arises, be it noted, due to the failure to carefully distinguish between the meanings of the term "law", in the varying contexts in which that term occurs in the argument. If the sovereignty is defined as that ultimate authority which sanctions law, then by the coming into being of revolutionary constitutions all that does take place is that the locus of sovereignty shifts from a determinate body of persons, whose commands were habitually being obeyed, to another determinate body of persons whose commands will hereafter be obeyed. Politically, a sovereign continues to sanction the existence of the legal order in both the cases and even the revolutionary constitution is thus, from this point of view atleast, founded in law, upon the will of the political sovereign. The political sovereign manifests its existence by the very extent to which it is able to coerce an independent political society to submit to its decrees. The ruling ideas of the revolutionary era, which began at the close of 18th Century, therefore, did not give rise to any contradiction of the sort to which reference has been made in the extract quoted from Salmond's Jurisprudence.

CHAPTER II

SOME OUTSTANDING CHARACTERISTICS OF OUR STATE

Virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of government... Promote then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

George Washington
(from Farewell address 1796).

There are three juridical attributes that inseparably belong to citizens by right.

These are

- (1) Constitutional freedom, as the right of every citizen to have to obey no other law than that to which he has given his consent or approval.
- (2) Civil equality
as the right of the citizen to recognise no one as superior among the people in relation to himself....,
- and (3) Political independence
as the right to owe his existence and continuance in society not to the arbitrary will of another but to his own rights and powers as a member of the Commonwealth.

Immanuel Kant

Representative institutions are of little value, and may be a mere instrument of tyranny or intrigue, when the generality of electors are not sufficiently interested in their own government to give their vote, or if they vote at all, do not bestow their suffrages on public grounds but sell them for money or vote at the beck of some one who has control over them, or whom for private reasons they desire to propitiate.

J. S. Mill

I know no safe depository of the ultimate powers of society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them but to inform their discretion by education.

Thomas Jefferson

SOME OUTSTANDING CHARACTERISTICS OF OUR STATE

33. Pakistan—Islamic Republic of Pakistan

ART. 1 of the Constitution establishes Pakistan as a Federal Republic and gives to it the name of "Islamic Republic of Pakistan". Throughout the Constitution the name "Islamic Republic of Pakistan" is not repeated as the Article itself says that "Pakistan", wherever used in the Constitution, stands for the name it has received. This distinction between the existential character of our polity, namely that it is a Federal Republic, should be carefully distinguished from what, after all, is the name of our State, namely that it is to be known as the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. The ideological and political implications of the name given to the State of Pakistan would be dealt with in another chapter (See the last chapter of this Book). But from the strictly legal standpoint, the adoption of this name does not, in any manner, alter the character of our polity, nor can it even so much as influence, in any manner whatever, the interpretation of our Constitution.

It should be noted that in one and the same Article Pakistan is declared to be a Federal Republic and it is announced that it is to be known as the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. It makes all the difference in the world what the legal character of the State established by the Constitution is, and it makes little or no difference from the point of view of Constitutional Law what name is given to a State. As in life, so in law, one may well ask with Shakespeare, "What is there in a name?"

34. Pakistan—A Federal Republic

What then is implied by the statement "Pakistan shall be a Federal Republic"? It would be fruitful if a few words were said about the term Republic before the expression "Federal Republic" could be appreciated and understood.

The term Republic has nowhere been defined in the Constitution, and it is permissible, as a rule of construction, to investigate what the ordinary meaning of that term is, and this is so because, a Legislature must be presumed to use the term which it has not defined, in its ordinary sense.

"By the Republican form of Government", says Judge Cooley, "is understood a Government by representatives chosen by the people; and it contrasts on one side with a democracy in which the people or community as an organized whole wield sovereign powers of Government, and, on the other, with rule of one man as King, Emperor, Czar or Sultan or with that of one class of men, as an aristocracy". (See Chapt. XIX of his Principles of Constitutional Law). It should be observed, in the first place, that though the institution of representative Government regarded as a necessary condition for the exercise, by the people, of their sovereign power is no doubt essential to the idea of Republican form of Government, it should be remembered that this is not a necessary presupposition of its existence—for a State may be governed directly by the people and could yet be Republican in form. The ancient Athenian Democracy was, in a sense, Republican in character, although there were no representatives chosen by the people in the manner that we do in our own day. In the second place, the principle of Republicanism enjoins that the whole body of the people (and by this is necessarily meant the whole body of adult and competent persons) should be admitted to political privileges irrespective of any consideration based on caste, colour, creed, race, status etc. It is for this reason that the idea of equality is the foundation of any Republican form of Government.

Meaning of the term "Republic".

In ART. 208 of our Constitution it has been provided that no title, honour or decora-

Art 208 of our Constitution.

tion shall be conferred by the State on any citizen, although the President has the power to award decorations in recognition of distinguished military or public service. No citizen of Pakistan can accept any title, honour, or decoration from any foreign State except with the approval of the President. This provision is in accord with the principle of Republicanism which enjoins that all men are equal before the law and it is the law itself and not the humour or whim of an irresponsible autocrat that determines the qualifications for admission to elective office or franchise.

A Republican form of Government necessarily implies that sovereignty resides in the people and that all the constitutional processes within the State are regulated and controlled by such decisions as the people take or might wish to take. It is obvious that the entirety of the total population of a country cannot directly participate in its administrative or political set-up; so also for reasons that are obvious, children or persons suffering from demented dispositions cannot be allowed to play any role in the political life of the State. Similarly, in some Republican States, adult women are not permitted to vote, and this limitation on franchise, since it is prescribed by the law, is not regarded, from the point of view of constitutional theory, as in any manner being incompatible with the principle of Republicanism.

35. State of Pakistan and the Federal Principle

As to the meaning of the term federal its proper comprehension demands, as a first step, that we determine the limits within which the federal principle is said to operate.

Federalism may be broadly described as a device by which a system of double government is made to operate in one and the same State. It envisages a scheme of securing division of power between the National Government, on the one hand, and the Regional Governments, on the other, in such a way that, both of them discharge their law-making and executive functions strictly within the sphere of their allotted jurisdiction. It is one of the important characteristics of the federal constitutions that they invariably contain a well defined procedure for resolving conflicts and clashes of authority, between the two governments thus established within the framework of one and the same State. The two governments accommodated within the framework of a Federal polity are of co-ordinate authority and work independently of each other in the spheres marked out for them. So far as the external appearances go, a Federal State is like any other State, and can hardly be distinguished from what the constitutional lawyers describe as a Unitary State: but it is the internal division of power that gives to it the character of a composite State. Federal Government operates upon the whole of the territory of the State in respect of matters over which it has the authority given to it under the Constitution, whereas the 'Regional' or 'Local Government' although it has exclusive authority in respect of the subjects consigned to its care and control operates only upon the limited territory defined for it by the Constitution.

Distinction between Federation and Confederation.

Professor Wheare's Views
referred to.

A Federal Government differs from a Confederal Government in one essential particular: the authority of the Confederation does not directly reach over to and operate upon the people. It operates through the intermediary Governments which stand, as it were, midway between the people and itself.

Professor K. C. Wheare, in his recent book on "Federal Government" defines "federal principle" thus: "By 'federal principle' I mean the method of dividing powers so that the General and Regional governments are each, within a sphere, coordinate and independent." (p. 11). He admits that there would be many students of the subject who would like to further qualify the statement of the principle attempted by him, in that, they would insist that, the residuary powers, as they are called, must lie with the Regional Governments. It would be their view that a government is not Federal if the powers of the Regional Governments are specified and the residue is left over to the General Government.

It is, however, unnecessary to so define the Federal Principle as to limit its application only to those States where the residuary powers lie with the Regional Governments. It is true that the leading example of federalism, namely the Constitution of the United States of America of 1787, conforms to this test in that, it merely enumerates the powers which shall be exercisable by the Federal Government and leaves the remaining powers to the States. (See Sections 8 and 9 of ART. I of the Constitution of the United States). Not only that, but in the Tenth Amendment, with regard to residuary powers, it is provided, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." But there are some Federations that depart from this principle and repose the residuary powers in the National Government.

While defining the federal principle generally we ought to be contented in noticing its essential characteristics. It would serve no useful purpose if some accidental traits of some of the leading federal constitutions of the world are unnecessarily mixed up with the essential characteristics of Federalism. Nor again do we have to set-forth in the definition of Federal principle, information as to the manner in which some Federal Governments have been established—for to do that would be to confuse the history of an institution with the logic of its existing constitutional processes.

Thus, for example, in the observation of Lord Haldane in the case Attorney-General for Commonwealth of Australia v. Colonial Sugar Refining Co. Ltd., reported in 1914 (1914 Appeal Cases 237, 253): 83 L.J.154 (PC), we have the following account of what is a Federation stricto sensu.

"The British North America Act of 1867 commences with the preamble that the then Provinces had expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion with a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. In a loose sense, the word 'federal' may be used as it is there used to describe any arrangement under which self-contained States agree to delegate their powers to a common Government with a view to entirely new Constitutions even of the State themselves. But the natural and literal interpretation of the word confines its application to cases in which these States, while agreeing on a measure of delegation, yet in the main continue to preserve their original Constitutions. Now as regards Canada the second of the Resolutions passed at Quebec in October, 1864, on which the British North America Act was founded, shows that what was in the minds of those who agreed on the resolutions was a general government charged with matters of common interest, and new and merely local governments for the provinces. The Provinces were to have fresh and much restricted constitutions, their Governments being entirely remodelled. This plan was carried out by the Imperial Statute of 1867. By the 91st section a general power was given to the new Parliament of Canada to make laws for the peace, order, and good Government of Canada without restriction to specific subjects and excepting only the subjects specifically and exclusively assigned to the Provincial legislatures by S.92. There followed an enumeration of subjects which were to be dealt with by the Dominion Parliament but this enumeration was not to restrict the generality of the Power conferred on it. The Act therefore departs widely from the true Federal model adopted in the Constitution of the United States, the 10th Amendment which declares that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to their people. Of the Canadian Constitution the true view appears, therefore, to be that, although it was founded on the Quebec Resolutions and so must be accepted as a treaty of Union among the then provinces, yet when once enacted by the Imperial Parliament it constituted a fresh departure and established new Dominion and Provincial Governments with defined powers and duties both derived from the Act of Imperial Parliament which was their legal source."

1914 App.
Cases. p. 237.

Applying the foregoing test, Lord Haldane declared that Canada was not a true Federation, because the British North America Act created not only a new National Government but also new Provincial Governments with powers defined in the Act: on the other hand, he thought, the United States and the Australian Constitution were truly Federal because they merely created the General Governments without substantially altering the powers of the component units, except in so far as they themselves had surrendered such powers as were necessary for the creation of the National Government in question.

Here again it would be noticed that the emphasis is on the accidental traits and not upon the essential characteristics of a Federal system of Government. Confining our attention to the essentials, we note that in a Federal Constitution there are really two governments working side by side, and the operation of each one of them, within the limits defined by the Constitution, is independent of the control by the other. They are co-ordinate, independent organs of sovereign power, each being a master in the sphere of its own allotted jurisdiction. How this co-ordination between the two well-defined organs of sovereign power is achieved, what in particular is the measure of authority of each one of them, to what organ of the State power or type of procedure conflicts between the two governments are to be referred for adjudication or resolution, where the residuary powers are made to lie—all these are mere matters of detail, and although information as to these matters is of considerable importance to the student of political science, they are not, by any means, to be construed as constituting the essential traits of a Federal Polity.

Federation involves Supremacy of Constitution which must be a written one.

Observation shows that, by and large, adoption of federal principle involves the supremacy of the Constitution. The constitution must not only be in writing but it must be supreme. A Federal State can only be brought into being by a compact and must derive its existence and powers from a written instrument which defines the authority of the Regional and General Governments, and also provides for a method for resolving conflicts between them. A Federal Government may be formed by a compact between a number of sovereign and independent States for the purpose of creating a National Government, a government which should administer subjects that are of general interest and affect the whole of the State or it may be the result of decentralisation of the power of a central government in a State and the resulting devolution of those powers from the National Government to the several component States that are created by its Constitution. United States of America is an example of the first mode of the creation of Federal Government, and India and Pakistan of the second. The case of Canada falls into a class by itself, and although its Constitution, as shown by Lord Haldane in the passage from Privy Council judgment cited above, has resulted from a compact, the actual form it has taken is somewhat anomalous indeed.

36. India & Pakistan—Are they Federations?

Whether India and Pakistan can strictly be regarded as Federations is a matter on which there are bound to be conflicting opinions. The fact, however, remains that if they are at all to be regarded as Federations stricto sensu, the emergence of this form of government must be regarded as falling in the latter category of the two modes described above by means of which Federations could be formed. A study of Constitutional development of India would show that its progress in the direction of federalism has been made by means of securing progressive decentralisation of the central governmental power. It was really the Imperial Act of 1935 which, for the first time, emphasized the scheme of Federal Government for India, for the Act of 1919 gave to India a Constitutional Government of a Unitary type, as the several provinces under the Government of India Act, 1919, were not autonomous Provinces but local Governments, that is, they were mere administrative units completely subordinate to the Central Government. (See further discussion on this point on pp 178-9)

The Constituent Assembly of India had initially, in its objectives resolution, desired to locate the residuary powers within the States, that is, in the regional governments. This approach was further modified later on when Pakistan was conceded and actually came to be. The relevant paragraph of the objectives resolution passed by the Constituent Assembly of India on the 22nd January, 1947, reads as follows:—

"(3) WHEREIN the said territories, whether with their present boundaries or with such others as may be determined by the Constituent Assembly and thereafter according to the law of the Constitution, shall possess and retain the status of autonomous units, together with residuary powers, and exercise all powers and functions of Government and administration, save and except such powers and functions as are vested in or assigned to the Union, or as are inherent or implied in the Union or resulting therefrom."

But, in the draft constitution which was published in February 1948, authors of the draft departed from this mandate contained in the objectives resolution in that they consigned the residuary powers not to the States but to the Union of India. This was a step calculated to make the Union Government strong "now that the State of Pakistan had been erected quite close to the compound wall of India."

Constitution of India does not use the word 'federal' in its text. In its preamble the relevant words are that India is to be a Sovereign Democratic Republic, and in its ART. 1, it is stated, "India, that is Bharat, shall be a Union of States." It is true that upon a careful examination, the constitutional relationship between the Union and the States turns out to be one which could be called as "quasi-federal" in character. Part XI of the Indian Constitution deals with relations between the Union and the States, and the Seventh Schedule contains three lists of subjects—the Union List, State List and the Concurrent List. The power of the National Parliament to make laws as also the power of State Legislatures to make laws is controlled by ART. 246. In ART. 249, however, the power of Parliament to legislate with respect to the State List has been provided as follows:

"(1) Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this Chapter, if the Council of States has declared by resolution supported by not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting that it is necessary or expedient in the national interest that Parliament should make laws with respect to any matter enumerated in the State List specified in the resolution, it shall be lawful for Parliament to make laws for the whole or any part of the territory of India with respect to that matter while the resolution remains in force.

(2) A resolution passed under clause (1) shall remain in force for such period not exceeding one year as may be specified therein:

Provided that, if and so often as a resolution approving the continuance in force of any such resolution is passed in the manner provided in clause (1), such resolution shall continue in force for a further period of one year from the date on which under this clause it would otherwise have ceased to be in force.

(3) A law made by Parliament which Parliament would not but for the passing of a resolution under clause (1) have been competent to make, shall, to the extent of the incompetency, cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of six months after the resolution has ceased to be in force, except as respects things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said period."

Residuary Powers in Indian Union lie with the National Govt.

India, a Union of States—not a Federation but a quasi-Federal Govt.

Over and above this power is the power of the Parliament to legislate with respect to matters in the State List if a proclamation of emergency is in operation. (See ART. 250). By ART. 248 the residuary powers of legislation are exclusively vested in the Parliament. Under ART. 254, inconsistency between laws made by Parliament and laws made by the Legislatures of States are resolved, in the manner indicated in that Article. The appointment of the Governors of the Part 'A' States, under ART. 155, is to be made by the President.

Thus from the foregoing analysis of the provisions of the Indian constitution it would be observed that if the Constitution of India lays a claim to being considered as a Federal Constitution at all, the same can be substantiated only if the federal principle enunciated earlier is appropriately re-defined to cover this case. It is for this reason that Professor K. C. Wheare considers that the Constitution of India is really quasi-federal in character. (See page 28 of his book on Federal Government). According to him, "This Constitution established a Union of States, organized out of the former provinces of British India and the Indian States, and operating at the centre and in the States (with certain exceptions) the system of responsible cabinet government much like that in Canada. But just as in Canada the federal principle was modified by unitary elements in the form of control by the general government over the provincial governments, so also in the Indian Constitution—but much more so—the central government is given powers of intervention in the conduct of the affairs of the state governments which modifies the federal principle. The Constitution does not indeed claim to establish a Federal Union, but the federal principle has been introduced into its terms to such an extent that it is justifiable to describe it as a quasi-federal Constitution. Whether, in its operations, it will provide another example of federal government remains to be seen."

No territorial Integrity of Provinces
guaranteed by the Indian
Constitution.

Finally, we might notice that there is no guarantee contained in the Indian Constitution that the States are at all immune in so far as their territorial integrity is concerned, for the Parliament by means of an ordinary law under ART. 3 can form a new State by separation of a territory from any State, or by uniting two or more States or parts of States or by uniting any territory to a part of any State. It can increase the area of any State, diminish the area of any State, alter the boundaries of any State or the name of any State. This power is subject to the condition that no bill for the purpose shall be introduced in either House of Parliament except on the recommendation of the President, and in cases where the proposal contained in the bill affects the boundary of any States, or States specified in Part A or Part B of the First Schedule, or the name or names of any such State or States, the views of the Legislature of the States, or as the case may be of each of the States, both with respect to the proposal to introduce the bill and with respect to the provisions thereof have been ascertained by the President. It would thus appear that it is comparatively easy in India to secure the reorganization of the States. This power of reorganization of States in India had been availed of by the Indian Parliament in 1956.

Art. IV. S. 3
(1) of the U.S.
Constitution.

This should be contrasted from the position as it obtains in a real Federal polity like that of the United States. Under ART. IV, Sec. 3 of the United States Constitution it has been provided, "...But no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress." There is thus an absolute guarantee in the United States Constitution that the territorial and juristic integrity of the States in the Federal system is inviolable.

Federal Principle and our State.

Art. 109.

Sufficient has been said to indicate the considerations that have to be kept in view in adjudging the question whether or not a given State is federal in character. We might now consider the application of federal principle to our State. The State of Pakistan has been declared as a Federal Republic in the first Article of the Constitution. The residuary powers under our Constitution are vested in the provinces (ART. 109). It is true that so very exhaustive is the enumeration of subjects in the three Lists mentioned in the Fifth Schedule of our Constitution that hardly any subject remains which could conceivably constitute a significant addition to the contents of the residuary field that has been vested in the Federal Units. But one important constitutional implication, which flows from the fact that the residuary powers of legislation have been assigned to the provinces, is that the Courts of Law when called upon to interpret the entries in the several Lists of the V Schedule will start with the presumption that unless a matter falls strictly within the federal field or the concurrent field it must be deemed to be within the exclusive legislative competence of the province. The Indian courts will, on the other hand, raise this presumption in favour of a subject being covered by the Federal or Concurrent List unless it can be shown that the matter is strictly covered by the Provincial List.

Both in India and in Pakistan enumeration of several subjects which form the subject matter of Federal and Provincial Lists is so comprehensive that, except for the rule of interpretation referred to above, very little by way of practical result has been achieved by the residuary powers being concentrated, in the case of India in the federal field, and in the case of Pakistan in the provincial field.

There is no provision of the kind contained in ART. 3 of the Indian Constitution (which provides for the formation of New States and alteration of areas, boundaries or names of existing States by means of the Act of Parliament) in our Constitution: the effect of this omission is that the territorial integrity of the provinces of East Pakistan and West Pakistan has been duly safeguarded. The provinces of East and West Pakistan cannot be annihilated, say, for the purpose of making Pakistan a Unitary State, otherwise than by an amendment of the Constitution. And the amending procedure with respect to this matter is abnormally difficult: for over and above the amending bill being passed by a majority of the total number of the members of the National Assembly and by the votes of not less than two-thirds of the members of the Assembly present and voting, there must be, before such a bill is assented to by the President, an approval of such a bill by the two Provincial Assemblies. Amendment of ART. 1 of our Constitution thus being, comparatively speaking, more difficult to achieve, there is a substantial guarantee of the inviolability of the territorial integrity of the two provinces that compose the Federation.

37. Doctrine of Dual Sovereignty has no place in our Constitution

In our Constitution there is no recognition extended to the doctrine of the dual sovereignty. The federal units do not represent any distinct part of the sovereignty of the people of Pakistan. The federal units are in no sense sovereign although they are, in a significant sense, independent, subject of course to certain well-defined constitutional limits, within their own field. There is no such thing as dual citizenship known to our Constitution. The 14th Amendment of the American Constitution, for example, provides, "All persons born or naturalised in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." Thus the 14th Amendment recognizes that there is a citizenship of the United States and also citizenship of the several States and this dual legal character may co-exist in the same person. According to Cooley, "Both Governments (i.e. Federal and State Governments) owe a duty of protection to the persons who are subject to their jurisdiction, and both are entitled to the allegiance of such persons, and may punish breaches of this allegiance." (See his Principles of "Constitutional Law", p. 319, 1931 Ed. Boston). The Pakistan Citizenship Act does not recognize the co-existence of dual citizenship or the duty of a citizen owing allegiance to the federal units and to the State of Pakistan. The people who compose the State of Pakistan have to owe allegiance only to the State of Pakistan as established by Constitution and the Law.

Residuary
Powers in the Provinces leading to a rule of Construction.

Enumeration of subjects in the Fifth Schedule of our Constitution
exhaustive.

Territorial integrity of Provinces of Federation under our Constitution has been duly safeguarded.

38. No Dual System of Courts under our Constitution

Nor again is there a dual system of Courts in our Country. In America, as is well known, there are State Courts and Federal Courts. The Federal Courts derive their jurisdiction from ART. III Sec. 1 of the Constitution which refers to "one Supreme Court and such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

The power of Federal Courts as derived from ART. III, Sec. 2 of the United States Constitution, is described as follows:

"Judicial Power shall extend to all cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority;—to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;—to controversies to which the United States shall be a party;—to controversies between two or more States;—between a State and citizens of another State—between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States and between a State or the citizens thereof and Foreign States, citizens or subjects.

"In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public Ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact with such exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

The judicial powers of the State Courts in America is defined by the State Constitutions.

In our Constitution, however, we have no dual system of judiciary. The Federal principle makes no inroads upon the distribution of judicial power between the Federation and the Provinces. One and the same Court takes cognizance of the Federally made or Provincially enacted laws and enforces them irrespective of any consideration based on questions like the nature of agency by which actions have commenced or offences have been committed etc.

39. Federal Principle: Territorial Extent of the Federal and Regional Governments

The territories of Pakistan comprise of (a) the territories of the provinces of East and West Pakistan, (b) the territories of States which are in accession with or may accede to Pakistan, (c) the territories which are under the administration of the Federation but are not included in either Province and (d) such other territories as may be included in Pakistan. (See ART. 1).

The President of Pakistan has the power, by Order, to make provision for the government of and administration over the territories of Pakistan other than the territories of the two provinces. (See ART. 2).

40. Federal Capital

The Federal Capital at Karachi, although a part of the Province of West Pakistan (See Expl. to ART. 1 and S. 2 of the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955), is a federally administered area, and its administration is vested in the President, who may, by order, make such provision as he may deem necessary or proper in respect of matters enumerated in ART. 211. The administration of the Federal Capital is controlled by the Federal Capital Order, dated 23.7.1948, (G.G.O. No. 15), passed by the Governor-General in pursuance of a Resolution passed by the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan, and continued as Law by ART. 224 of our Constitution.

The Parliament has the power to make laws for the Federal Capital with respect to matters enumerated in the Provincial List and matters not enumerated in the Provincial List and matters not enumerated in any List in the Fifth Schedule, other than matters relating to the High Courts. (See ART. 211(3))

It would appear that the provisions of ART. 211, clauses (2) and (3), are anomalous. It is doubtful if the President can be validly made a "recipient" of delegated authority "to make such provisions as he may deem necessary or proper with respect to the laws which are to be in force in the Federal Capital." This would ordinarily be a clear case of delegated legislation but since it is sanctioned by the Constitution, a Court of Law may not have the jurisdiction to annul this grant of the law-making powers. Anyhow, it seems somewhat out of place to confer legislative and administrative powers upon the President, i.e. the Federal Executive and not even make these laws and decrees amenable to being interfered with and controlled by the National Parliament. There is no obligation on the President to place the Orders issued by him under ART. 211 before the Parliament for its ratification, as he is duty bound to do in case he made an ordinance in the exercise of his powers under ART. 69. It is further doubtful if this power can co-exist with the power of the Parliament to pass laws in respect of "matters appearing in the three Lists of the Fifth Schedule and matters not enumerated therein other than matters relating to the High Courts." In other words, clauses (2) and (3) appear to create a situation in which the President by an administrative order can interfere with the laws passed by the Parliament, but he is under no obligation to have those laws ratified by it at a later date. He can even act when Parliament is in Session,—a thing he cannot do if he legislated by means of an Ordinance, under ART. 69.

Provisions of Art. 211
are anomalous

The President also has, over and above this power of making orders under ART. 211, the power of law-making conferred on him by ART. 69. This power of ordinance-making is available only when (a) the National Assembly is not in session and (b) the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render immediate action necessary. An ordinance made by the President shall be laid before the National Assembly, and shall cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the next meeting of the Assembly, or if a resolution disapproving it is passed by the Assembly, upon the passing of that resolution.

The ordinances thus made and promulgated have the force of law as though these enactments had been passed by the Parliament and further they can be controlled or superseded by an Act of the Parliament.

It would thus appear that orders issued by the President under clause (2) of ART. 211, with respect to the laws which are to be in force in the Federal Capital, are perpetual and there is no requirement under the Constitution that they be placed before the Parliament for its ratification and acceptance. This power to issue orders includes even the power to issue an order authorising expenditure from the revenues of the Federation. It would seem that even the budget with regard to the administration of Karachi need not be voted by the National Assembly.

Equally anomalous is the provision that the Parliament shall not have the power to pass laws with regard to matters relating to High Courts. Now, "High Courts" are matters within the Provincial List of 5th Schedule as entry No. 2 says, "Administration of Justice; constitution and organization of all courts, except the Supreme Court, . . ." In other words, the Provincial Legislature, subject only to the Constitutional provisions relating to the constitution and jurisdiction of High Courts, can effectively deal with matters relating to High Courts, and since the Provincial List has been made a part of the field of legislation competent to the Parliament in respect of the Federal Capital, ordinarily it will have the power to deal with matters relating to the High Court (Karachi Bench). But since the power to deal with High Courts has been expressly taken away, the Parliament would not be competent to deal with "matters relating to High Courts" although the President, under ART. 211 (2) (c), can issue an order with respect to "the jurisdiction, expenses or revenues of any court exercising the jurisdiction of a High Court in the Federal Capital." It is difficult to understand the wisdom of the limitation appearing in clause (3) of ART. 211, which says that matters relating to High Courts cannot be legislated upon by the Parliament. This reservation is in conflict with the power of the President given to him under sub-article (2) (c) of ART. 211, which says that he can make an order with respect to the jurisdiction, expenses or revenues of any court exercising the jurisdiction of a High Court therein. It may be that the framers of the Constitution desired that the powers of the Provincial legislature of West Pakistan be kept intact in respect of the High Court of West Pakistan, Karachi Bench Division included. As it is, representatives from Karachi occupy a fair number of the seats in the Legislature of the Province of West Pakistan—but the anomaly is that they cannot legislate in respect of the area of the Federal Capital in regard to matters that fall in the Concurrent or the Provincial List. It would appear to be anomalous in the extreme to give the Provincial Legislature of West Pakistan power to legislate in respect of High Courts but not the power to control the jurisdiction, expense or revenue of any court exercising the powers of a High Court in the Federal Capital—and yet, curiously enough, even the Parliament cannot pass laws about the High Court of West Pakistan. (See ART. 211(2) (c) and (3)). It is submitted with respect that the whole Article (more particularly its clauses (2) and (3)), is clumsily drafted: some of the difficulties that have been pointed out above have arisen only because some provisions of the original Government of India Act and of the Federal Capital Order have been indiscriminately brought into the Constitution without due regard being shown for the fact that some of them, after the passing of the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955, have become absolutely unnecessary and redundant. (For the purpose of enabling the student to analyse these conflicting provisions the relevant provisions of the Government of India Act as also the Federal Capital Order have been set forth in the Appendix. (See S.290/A, and Federal Capital Order, dated 13.7.1948). (See also Remington Rand v. Pakistan, (1957) PLD. S.C. Pak. 170).

Art. 211.
contd:
Determination of the Area of Federal Capital.

The determination of area of the Federal Capital can be provided for by ordinary law passed by Parliament. But such a law is restricted specifically to the narrow question of determining the area of the Federal Capital. It is doubtful whether by the law which can be made under clause (1) of ART. 211, any changes can be brought about in the constitutional set-up or in the administrative powers as envisaged in clauses (2) and (3) of ART. 211. In order to change the constitutional set-up it would be necessary to amend ART. 211, clauses (2) and (3) in the manner provided for in ART. 216. Besides all this, the language employed in ART. 211(1) is defective if the legislative intention be to give power to the Parliament to change the location of the Federal Capital. The change of location of the Federal Capital is not the same thing as the "determination of the Area of the Capital." The one refers to the idea of a shift of the Federal Capital to some other place in Pakistan and the other has reference merely to the extent to which the area of the capital can be increased or decreased.

41. Pakistan—A Parliamentary Democracy

What is a Parliamentary Democracy?

Our Constitution envisages a form of government which students of Politics and Constitutional Law call "Parliamentary Democracy". By a Parliamentary Democracy is understood a form of government in which the executive is responsible to and drawn from the Legislature. The Prime Minister of Pakistan, under ART. 37(3) is to be appointed by the President in "his discretion" from amongst the members of the National Assembly. He is to be a person who, in the opinion of the President, "is most likely to command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly." The Prime Minister is to be the Head of the Cabinet of the Ministers and the Cabinet of Ministers is to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions (ART. 37(1)). The Cabinet, along with the Ministers of State, is collectively responsible to the National Assembly (see 37(5)). Other Ministers are to be appointed and removed from office by the President. They have either to be members of the National Assembly at the time of their appointment or they have to seek election and be returned as members within a period of six consecutive months from the date of their appointment. Under ART. 37(8), "A Minister who for any period of six consecutive months is not a member of the National Assembly shall, at the expiration of that period, cease to be a Minister, and shall not before the dissolution of that Assembly be again appointed a Minister unless he is elected a member of that Assembly."

Curiously enough, although a Minister can be appointed for six months at least despite the fact that he is not a member of the National Assembly, Prime Minister, Minister of State and Deputy Minister cannot be so appointed even for a day unless the person to be so appointed is a member of the National Assembly.

Similar position obtains in the Provinces. Cabinet is drawn from and is responsible to the Provincial Legislature and Governor takes the place of the President. (See Chapter 1 of Part V, of our Constitution). The only difference between the Federal and Provincial set-up is that whereas in the former the executive head of the Government is elected, in the latter he is appointed.

So much is the structure of Provincial Government identical with that of Federal Government that, on that account, no separate discussion of the provisions of the Constitution (ARTS. 70 to 75) is necessary. Observations made with regard to the nature and character of the Federal Government are to be applied mutatis-mutandis to the Provincial Government.

Sufficient has been said to show that the Cabinet which is under our Constitution to be the repository of executive power has to be drawn from and is collectively responsible to the Legislature. If the Prime Minister who is to be at the Head of the Cabinet and who is to command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly before he can be appointed, loses that confidence, he is liable to dismissal or in the language of clause (6) of ART. 37, "he shall cease to hold office." If the President is satisfied that the Prime Minister does not command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly, he can exercise his power under this clause, and when he does exercise that power, the consequence will be that the Prime Minister will cease to hold his office. This shows that it is a condition precedent for the continuance of a Prime Minister in office that he, at all material times, is able to command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly. Whether the President exercises his power under this clause or as a result of any legislative process the Prime Minister is thrown over by the National Assembly, the resulting situation arises from the principle of Parliamentary Democracy—namely, that the executive envisaged by the Constitution is dependent on the continued support of the majority of the members of the National Assembly.

42. Presidential Pattern of Democratic Government

This form of Government—Parliamentary Democracy—should be distinguished from the Presidential form of Democratic Government in which we have an 'irremovable' and an 'irresponsible' executive. The President in the American Constitution, for instance, has the executive power of the Union vested in him. He has a Cabinet which he appoints upon his entering the office of the President but these persons are not members of the Legislature. There is no such thing as 'motion of no confidence', or a parallel procedure known to the U. S. Constitution as a result of which the Legislature can throw over the Prime Minister,

Minister
of State,
Deputy Minister, or Parliamentary Secretary must be members of the legislature before they can be so appointed.
Observations about Federal Government apply to Provincial set-up also.

executive in the United States. The executive there is completely independent of the Legislature. Of course, if the President acts unconstitutionally he can be impeached by the Congress, but that is not the same thing as saying that the President and his Cabinet must either continue to enjoy the confidence of the majority of the members of the Congress, or vacate their office as such President and Cabinet.

The student of Constitutional Law is not very much interested in the political implications of the two rival forms of Democracy, that is the Parliamentary and the Presidential, but a few remarks of a somewhat general nature upon this subject may not be out of place in this context even for the student of Constitutional Law, and these are offered in the belief that their grasp would help comprehension of the nature of Government that has been envisaged and established by our Constitution.

The relation between 'executive' and 'legislature' under the Parliamentary Democracy is radically different from that which obtains under the Presidential form of Government. The Parliamentary Democracy is based on the theory of the comparative supremacy of Parliament, i.e. of the Legislature: there the Government is really by the Parliament, the Cabinet being merely the Executive Committee of the Parliament. It is not entirely correct to assert, as does Sir Ilbert in his book on Parliament (Home University Library 1950), "Parliament does not govern and is not entitled to govern". Of course it is to some extent true that the modern English Cabinet influences the Parliament in that the bulk of the legislation is sponsored by the Cabinet in the first instance, and what is more, it has exclusive control of the House in the matter of initiating financial legislation. Due to well organised party system in England, much of the initiative in the matter of making laws has passed on to the Cabinet, and there is hardly any appreciable legislative activity to be noticed in the Parliament that may have been sponsored or moved by private members. Essentially much of the business transacted by the House of Commons is Cabinet-sponsored business. But despite this increasing influence which Cabinet exerts on the Parliament, it remains ever true that Cabinet is the creature, and therefore remains all through completely at the mercy, of the majority in the Legislature. And the rule by the Cabinet is really rule by the Parliament.

43. Presidential form of Govt. is based on the Theory of Separation of Powers

As opposed to this, the Presidential form of Government is based on the theory of separation of powers, which among other things enjoins that the Executive will be, to the extent to which it can, independent of the Legislature. It is true that the text of the American Constitution does not anywhere show that the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Departments stand on completely independent and separate grounds, but the very arrangement of several Articles relating to these departments and the total scheme underlying the Constitution make it abundantly clear that the Founding Fathers were to a not inconsiderable extent influenced by the theory of Separation of Powers as it is to be found stated in the writings of Montesquieu's "Spirit of Laws". Witness for example the following Provisions of the U.S. Constitution :

(a) Section 1, ART. I. "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives",

(b) Section 1, ART. II. "The executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States of America. . ." and,

(c) Section 1, ART. III. "The judicial Power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish . . ."

This mode of distributing sovereign power into several well defined organs of the State machinery shows that the theory of separation of power is the implicit underlying assumption in the light of which the constitutional framework of the government of the United States of America is to be perceived.

Numerous indications are discoverable in the text of the United States Constitution which tend to show that certain internal checks and balances have been improvised therein; and it appears that, all this became necessary, not only because the Founding Fathers had distrust in the public functionaries who were to exercise the political power within the State, but also because the three principal departments of the Government had been erected by them on a distinct and well defined basis and, in the total absence of those controlling constitutional links that are reflected in the system of checks and balances designed by the Founding Fathers, not only would the Government have lacked in unity and in that coherency of construction, without which no vigorous lead can be given in the management of public affairs, but also the day-to-day working of the governmental organisation would have been involved in a wasteful friction.

Here are the wise words of Madison taken from Federalist No. 47, which show what really was at stake. "No political truth is certainly of greater intrinsic value, or is stamped with the authority of more enlightened patrons of liberty, than that on which the objection is founded. The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny."

44. There is no 'Cabinet' in the U.S. System of Government

The Constitution of the United States is silent with regard to the formation of a Cabinet "to aid and advise" the President; and in fact, what does correspond to our notion of the Cabinet, in the United States is a creature of convention and has emerged as a result of the operation of historical factors. Despite the emergence of the Cabinet in the U.S. as a Governmental institution, the executive responsibility continues to lie with the President and it is merely the Heads of various executive Departments who are appointed by the President that are collectively spoken of as the Cabinet. It is an advisory body responsible to the President and it is not in any manner constitutionally responsible either to the Legislature or to any one else.

45. Powers of the U.S. President

The President has, what is called, the veto-power to overrule within well-defined limits, legislation passed by the Congress. By the Veto Power all that is meant is that no bill passed by the two Houses can become law until the President signs it in token of his approval. The President may, however, instead of approving the proposed legislation return it together with a statement of his objections, to the House in which it was initiated. But if upon the bill being thus re-examined and reconsidered the two-thirds of the House concerned resolve to pass the bill in the form in which it is, it will be sent to the other House whereafter, if it is approved by the two-thirds of that House, it shall become law. (S. 7 of Art. I of the U.S. Constitution).

The President must send back the bill within ten days or else it will become a law having full effect as though he had signed it. The Congress may, however, decide to adjourn before the conclusion of the ten days within which the President must return the bill for reconsideration if he means to do so—thus facilitating the lapsing of the legislation passed by it. This limited power of stultifying legislative measures or of delaying the passage of a bill passed by the Congress from becoming a law, gives to the President of the United

U.S.
Constitution—
"A system of Checks and Balances."

(a) Veto-Power of the U.S.
President.

Distinction between Veto-Power exercised in Parliamentary democracy and Presidential form of Government.

(b) President's Power to send Messages to Congress.

(c) His other powers.

The Position of the President in U.S.A. Constitution—Pear quoted.

States of America some manner of control over the legislative activity of the Congress.

In a Parliamentary form of Government too, several Constitutions provide for the power of the Constitutional Head to withhold his approval and to return the legislation for being reconsidered, but it should be observed, that if a law has been passed in the Parliament, the venture could have been consummated only as a result of the support which Government of the day gave to that measure, and it is once again the same Government which will have to advise whether or not a bill shall be immediately assented to by the Constitutional Head or postponed for the purpose of having it reconsidered by the Legislature. The competence or the power of the executive Government in a Parliamentary Democracy to delay the bill becoming law stands on a different footing than does the power of the President of the United States of America to veto legislation. The President, in the theory of the United States Constitution, need not have a majority in the Legislature and if in fact he does happen to have some influence there, this is largely by reason of the existence of the two well-organised political parties in that country, to one of which, the President, in the nature of things, is bound to belong.

Besides all this, the President can send messages to the Congress wherein he does not only inform the two Houses of the economico-political state of the Union or report to it upon any question in which the Nation is vitally interested, but he may recommend to them the measures which, in his considered opinion, it is necessary for the Congress to pass into law.

In cases of emergency he can convene both or either of the Houses of the Congress, and in the event of there being differences between them in regard to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such date as he considers fit and proper.

The American President has enormous power of patronage in that it is he who makes appointments to high offices within the State. (See Sec. 2 of Art. II of the U. S. Constitution).

A recent writer (Richard H. Pear) delineates comprehensively the relationship of the American Cabinet to the Legislature in the following extract which is taken from his book "American Government".

"An American Cabinet is a different institution from a Cabinet in a parliamentary system of government. In America while Cabinet unanimity is desirable from a public relations viewpoint, Cabinet solidarity is not an essential constitutional principle. Cabinet members do differ, sometimes publicly, in their attitudes towards matters of current importance. No Cabinet Minister feels that he has to rush to the defence of a colleague or a President who is under attack, and resignation is not the inevitable price paid for disagreement with the President. Cabinet members sometimes resign when the President repudiates their statements of policy, but the point of contrast with the British system is that they do not have to resign, and it is the President who will ask them to do so if he thinks the matter sufficiently important. Neither Congress nor the public consider that public disagreement constitutes grounds for automatic resignation, for the Cabinet members are responsible neither to Congress nor the people, but only to the President. This may be, from some points of view, an administrative advantage, since being the President's servants, in charge of departments for whose actions he holds final responsibility, the President can insist that his point of view prevail even if he is in a minority in Cabinet discussions. But the disadvantage of the Presidential position is that as the Cabinet does not share in a collective responsibility for executive action, the President may be a lonely and worried man unable to feel the support of other shoulders at the wheel when he faces serious crisis. In practice, he may try and lean upon his Cabinet Officers for advice and encouragement, but they may not wish to be leaned on in that way. The responsibility (to give the supreme example) for deciding upon the use of the atom bomb in war is, by American law, the President's responsibility, a responsibility which he cannot share with his administration. This, it is suggested, is not the sort of responsibility which should be thrust upon any one man, however great his courage or his wisdom." (p. 75).

46. Cabinet Government: Walter Bagehot on the merits of Parliamentary Executive

Walter Bagehot, who according to Professor Laski, "first revealed the nature of Cabinet to the Englishmen", saw the main virtue of the English Constitution, namely, its efficiency "in the close union, a nearly complete fusion of the executive and legislative powers." He proceeded to observe, "No doubt by the traditional theory, as it exists in all the books, the goodness of our Constitution consists in the entire separation of the legislative and executive authorities, but in truth its merit consists in their singular approximation. The connecting link is the Cabinet. By that new word we mean a Committee of the legislative body selected to be the executive body. The Legislature has many committees, but this is the greatest. It chooses for this, its main committee, the men in whom it has most confidence. It does not, it is true, choose them directly; but it is nearly omnipotent in choosing them indirectly." He characterises the Cabinet as a Board of Control chosen by the Legislature, out of persons whom it trusts and knows, to rule the nation. He saw in the Cabinet the "fusion of the legislative and executive functions", and he contrasted it from the Presidential system, the main features and characteristics of which, according to him are, "that the President is selected from the people by one process, and the House of Representatives by another. The independence of the legislative and executive powers is the specific quality of the Presidential Government, just as the fusion and combination is the precise principle of the Cabinet Government." (See Chapter on "The Cabinet" in Walter Bagehot's book "The English Constitution", in the World's Classics Series, Oxford, 1955).

We are at present not engaged, it should be noted, in commenting on the relative merit or superiority of the two rival forms of Government we have been considering, for such questions are incapable of being decided in the abstract, and their specific relevance to a given country and a people depends considerably on the historical setting in which a particular form of Government comes to be reflected. The importance of a form of Government has also much to do with the genius of a people.

What, however, in this context, it is pertinent to point out, is the fact that under the Constitution of Pakistan we have established a Parliamentary Democracy and this distinguishing feature of our Government should not be lost sight of when we come to interpret those provisions in our Constitution that deal with this aspect of our polity. It would not be out of place to refer, for further elucidation and comprehension of the two rival patterns of Democratic Government, to the observations of late Earl of Balfour made by him in his Introduction to Walter Bagehot's book, by way of 'a very summary comparison of my own.' They are as follows:—

"Under the Presidential system the effective head of the national administration is elected for a fixed term. He is (practically) irremovable. Even if he is proved to be inefficient, even if he becomes unpopular, even if his policy is unacceptable to the majority of his countrymen, he and his methods must be endured till the moment comes for a new election.

"He is aided by Ministers who, however able or distinguished, have no independent political status, have probably had no congressional training, and are by law precluded from obtaining any during their term of office.

"Under the Cabinet system everything is different. The head of the administration, commonly called the Prime Minister (though he has no statutory position), is selected for the place on the ground that he is the statesman best qualified to secure the support of a majority in the House of Commons. He retains it only so long as that support is forthcoming. He is the head of his Party. He must be a member of one or other of the two Houses of Parliament; and he must be competent to 'lead' the House to which he belongs. While the Cabinet Ministers of a President are merely his officials, the Prime Minister is primus inter pares in a Cabinet of which (according to peace-time practice) every member must, like himself, have had some parliamentary experience, and gained some parliamentary reputation."

Earl of Balfour on Presidential and Cabinet—Government.

Earl of Balfour considered Cabinet Government after the British model to be a more closely knit system than the Presidential Government after the American model—and this is not because America is a Federal country while Britain is a Unitary one, but because: "the great men who founded the Republic deliberately preferred a system in which the task of conducting national affairs was entrusted to three independent organs of Government, dissimilar in character, chosen at different times, for different periods, with different duties, by electorates differently constructed, each justly claiming to be the choice of the people. There is no constitutional reason why the President, the Senate and the House of Representatives should co-operate to carry out any common policy; and it is easy to imagine cases in which they would be reluctant to do so. If these were to occur when unity and rapidity of national action were required, the country would have to trust to the political genius of its people rather than to the formal machinery provided for it by the Constitution." Further, to quote his words:

"The weaknesses of the British Constitution are of a very different character. Whatever be its faults, it certainly does not suffer from too elaborate a system of checks and balances. The House of Commons need not keep a Government in office a day longer than it likes. But if the majority decide to keep it, evidently they have every inducement to provide the money and pass the laws which the policy of that Government requires."

47. The Theory of Separation of Powers

The theory of separation of powers may be regarded from at least two broad points of view:

Theory of Separation of Powers: its origin and development.

(a) As laying emphasis upon the principle that the same person or body of persons, should not be the repository of the powers of the legislature, executive and judiciary or of any two of them.

(b) As enjoining that any of the three principal activities of Government, namely legislation, execution and adjudication, should each be independent of the others and that there should be, as far as possible, absence of control or interference by one over the other.

These two principal elements of the theory of the separation of powers must be kept steadily in view: the rationale or the wisdom of keeping the powers distinct and not permitting one and the same person or authority to exercise any two or more of these powers is ultimately traceable to the distrust that practically all the political theorists and the sociologists show in the human nature. "All power corrupts", said Lord Acton, and "absolute power tends to corrupt absolutely." The only way to ensure that power will not be abused is to limit it, that is, to make power a check upon power. That is why Woodrow Wilson used to say, 'History of Liberty is the history of limitations on the Power of the Government'. If the dignity of the individual and his freedom to grow and to evolve along the lines of his personal development, have to be at all accommodated within the framework of a Government established under the Constitution, care has to be taken to minimise the possibility of abuse of power, for the abuse of the State Power is practically unavoidable regard being had to the fact that those that have power, will not only strive to maintain their right to exercise it but also try to grab more power. Human history, like Nature, appears red, tooth and claw, if only because power seekers have no other way to go about except the way of violence. That is why down the ages, the history of man has been, "dull, nasty, brutish and short". The sure way to avoid abuse of power by the governmental agencies is to divide the political power and vest it into the hands of diverse persons so that there is effective check on power by power. "The doctrine of Separation of Powers", said Mr. Justice Brandeis in his dissent in "Myers v. United States" 272 U. S. 52, 71, L.Ed. 160, "was adopted by the Convention of 1787, not to promote efficiency but to preclude the exercise of arbitrary power. The purpose was not to avoid friction, but, by means of the inevitable friction incident to the distribution of the governmental powers among three departments, to save the people from autocracy." (at p. 242 of L. Ed.).

While answering one of the principal objections "inculcated by the more respectable adversaries" to the United States Constitution, namely "its supposed violation of the political maxim that the legislative, executive and judicial departments ought to be separate and distinct", Madison had very trenchant and wise observations to make. He attempted to expound "the sense in which the preservation of liberty requires that the three great departments of power should be separate and distinct." He also attempted to show that the theory of separation of powers as enunciated by "the oracle who is always consulted and cited on the subject"—that is the celebrated, Montesquieu—"did not mean that these departments ought to have no partial agency in, or no control over, the acts of each other. His meaning, as his own words import, and still more conclusively as illustrated by the example in his eye, can amount to no more than this, that where the whole power of one department is exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another department the fundamental principles of a free constitution are subverted." (See Federalist No. XLVII).

He then examined cases of several State Constitutions in the light of these principles and concluded his thesis by saying that "the charge brought against the proposed Constitution of violating the sacred maxim of free government is warranted neither by the real meaning annexed to that maxim by its author, nor by the sense in which it has hitherto been understood in America."

Those who defend the doctrine of the separation of powers take their stand, whether they explicitly say so or no, "upon a distrust of any sovereignty of the one, the few or the many unchecked by formal restraints." But even the most ardent protagonists of this doctrine realise only too well that a clear-cut division of power, the rigid boundaries set to it under the Constitution, can become a wasteful obstacle to those who have to face urgent demands of the people.

In countries where the democratic tradition is not well founded and where the rule of law has not become an article of faith, countries, "especially those where the leaders are in a hurry of reformative passion", it is observed that there is an increasing concentration of power in the hands of a few people, and sometimes the doctrine of separation of powers is obeyed more in its breach than in its acceptance. Situations have arisen in such countries when constitutional scruples have been thrown to the winds and even the right of waging constitutional opposition to the Government in power has been construed as an act of sabotage calculated to overthrow the State.

"A mere demarcation on the parchment of the constitutional limits", says Madison, "is not a safeguard against those encroachments which lead to a tyrannical concentration of all the powers of Government in the same hand." And so Montesquieu himself remarks in his Spirit of Laws, "But constant experience shows us that every man vested with power is apt to abuse it and to carry his authority unless he is confronted with limits. Is it not strange that we are obliged to say that virtue itself has need of limits?" To achieve this,

Madison's
views.

Distribution of Power in the U.S. Constitution:—Finer quoted.

i.e. to prevent this abuse it is necessary that "power should be a check to power." According to him "a constitution may be such that no one shall be compelled to do things to which he is not obliged by law and to do things which the law permits." Law should, therefore, impose restraints on instrumentalities and agencies of power and thus regulate the machinery of Government in such a way that the individual liberty, far from being smothered, is preserved and perpetuated.

Thus influenced by the writings of Montesquieu, the framers of the United States Constitution brought about a wise distribution of power and integrated the principal departments of governmental activity by a system of checks and balances; they kept the legislative, executive and judicial powers as separate from and independent of each other "as the nature of a free government will admit; or as is consistent with that chain of connection that binds the whole fabric of constitution in one indissoluble bond of unity and amity." (See The Federalist, No. 47).

The scheme of the distribution of power as embodied in the United States Constitution may be described in the words of Herman Finer. (See "Theory & Practice of Government", p. 101.).

"Legislative powers were vested in Congress, the executive power in the President, and the judicial in the Courts. Congress was divided into two bodies, each elected for different periods and by different modes, the first having a biennial tenure with complete renewal, the second six-yearly tenure with partial renewals every two years. Their powers are different and check each other. The executive was to be dependent upon neither the Legislature nor the people, nor was it to be fortified by popular election: hence a special electoral college was created. His own sphere was not to be his alone, for the Fathers feared the executive, specially a national executive. Hence, the power of appointment of the chief officials was to be shared by President and Senate. Nor was the executive to have a free hand in treaty-making; hence the assent of the Senate was required thereto. War and peace were to be declared by Congress. Officers with a place of profit under the United States Government were excluded from membership of Congress; and though the executive may appoint officers who may act as Cabinet to him, neither he nor they may, by a convention of the Constitution, appear on the floor of the Congress."

Despite these wise restrictions on power, all the same, numerous devices have had to be resorted to for the purpose of securing the harmonious operation of the three great departments of the United States Government. Cases of friction, of the conflict of jurisdiction and clash of authority are not the only sources of internal strife and tension which are perceptible in the history of the constitutional development of the United States. The clash of authority between the executive and the legislature is very much dependent upon the personal equation which the President may have or come to sustain with the Congress, and if the two of them happen to belong to different parties, all kinds of stalemates are likely to be reached—deadlocks which can only be resolved by not an altogether dignified kind of compromise. Here is what Harold Laski has to say about the actual working of the American constitutional relationship between the President and the Congress.

"But with the Americans, the Congress may have a different party complexion from that of the President and his Cabinet colleagues; or he may have a majority in one House of Congress and not in another. Even with a majority in both, he need not have his way. He cannot control either House directly. He has no power to dissolve it. He can persuade, cajole, threaten, bribe. But the life of the American legislature continues independently of his will. He sends it his proposals; the Congress makes up its own mind what it will do with them. It is an authority of equal legal standing with him in the determination of policy. If he cannot secure what he wants from its members, he has no way of appealing to the electorate against their decision. He can advise Congress; he cannot coerce it. And Congress, in its turn, cannot coerce him, unless a two-thirds majority of its members is prepared to override any veto he may impose.

Views of Harold Laski on the actual working of U.S. Constitution.

"Even when the President's party has a majority in both Houses, he has no certainty that he will have his way. His defeat does not create a crisis in his party; the loss of his prestige may not, necessarily, even injure it. Congress, as it were, is organised for action independently of his power. It broke President Wilson over the Treaty of Versailles; in 1937 it inflicted a heavy defeat over President Roosevelt on his proposals for the reform of the Supreme Court. Managing Congress is an art, in fact, quite different from the art of managing the House of Commons. The one is built on the assumption of distrust in the executive; the other in confidence in him. And this explains, in some degree, the difference in the process of choosing a President in the United States and choosing a party leader in Great Britain. There is no permanence in the first; everyone knows that, at the end of eight years at most, his day is over. The loyalties he can evoke are, therefore, quite different loyalties from those a party leader is likely to evoke in Great Britain. The President can influence his party profoundly while he is in office; some of his Cabinet may, by their personal qualities, influence it also. But they are not necessarily party leaders, or even men of considerable party experience. The result is that there will always be in Congress itself a little group of men who, in fact even if not in form, are a kind of alternative Cabinet of their own, a Cabinet the special credit of which must not be over-looked in the making of policy. It requires a President of quite exceptional quality to centralize public opinion round himself for this reason. The separation, in a word, makes for the confusion of responsibility. There is not necessarily a clear direction of policy, because there is always more than one interest competing for the right to direct it; and the fact that the President may be compelled to give way means that, even within the ranks of his own party, there will always be cabals to force him to give way. This senator controls this committee, that congressman another; the President must in some degree compromise with them both. It is not improbable that even so outstanding a President as Franklin Roosevelt has never got a bill through Congress in exactly the shape he desired; he has had to sacrifice this clause, soften the burden of that, to meet the will of one or another in Congress with an authority that could rival his own. And since he cannot effectively appeal to the electorate against these candid friends, he is always having to put up with something he may keenly feel to be a second-rate compromise.

"This, moreover, is much more likely to be the case in his second term than in his first. The sands of his authority begin to run down. Those who dislike him cannot help remembering that, in four years at most, there will be another occupant of the White House. Something he does arouses fierce criticism; an influential member of Congress may easily think that to head this criticism is to give him a chance of the succession. Another may feel that the time has come to hedge; the President has attacked, it may be, the public utilities, and they are powerful in his State; it will do him no harm in his State to display his independence. The President, to put it briefly, when he deals with Congress is always dealing with a quasi-independent empire his hold over which is never certain. His position is like that of a minority Government in the House of Commons without an appeal to the electorate as the contingent sanction of its policy. The time he needs to think out his measures is largely taken up with maintaining a power which ought not to admit of question. And every time he suffers a major defeat, the ability to repeat that defeat is intensified by the loss of prestige he suffers." (See Parliamentary Government in England pp. 223-5).

48. Theory of Separation of Powers and Our Constitution

Enough has been said by way of pointing out the principal points of comparison and contrast between the Cabinet or Parliamentary system of Democratic Government on the one hand, and the Presidential pattern of Democratic Government on the other. It is now necessary to conclude consideration of the doctrine of separation of powers with a few general remarks upon its application to the system of power relations that our Constitution has established between the three principal organs of the State.

(a) Pakistan being a Parliamentary Democracy, the executive is drawn from and is responsible to the Legislature. (See ART. 37).

(b) The executive has considerable initiative in the matter of legislation, summoning, prorogation and dissolution of the Legislature. In the matter of legislation having financial implications, Cabinet has an absolute monopoly of initiating the legislation and no money bill can be introduced by a private member except with the prior approval of the Cabinet. The money bill is defined in ART. 58 and in ART. 59. We have a clog imposed on the introduction in the National Assembly of "any bill or amendment which makes provision for any of the matters specified in clause (1) of ART. 58, or any bill or amendment which if enacted and brought into operation would involve expenditure from the revenues of Federation", except on the recommendation of the President. And be it noted, the President can make such a recommendation or decline to make it only on the advice of the Cabinet. In addition to this, under ART. 57, the power of the President, and therefore of the Cabinet, to veto legislation passed by Parliament is mentioned. In effect, the Cabinet can, by having recourse to this Veto-Power, compel the National Assembly to pass the measure by either two-thirds majority of the members present and voting (and this happens when the President signifies that he withholds his assent in respect of a bill) or to require that it should have support of the majority of the total number of members of the Assembly, (and this happens to any bill other than a money bill, if it is returned to the Assembly with a message requesting that the bill or any specified provision thereof be reconsidered before the proposed measure can become law).

Besides all this, the power of the President to make and promulgate ordinances is in reality the power of the executive to make law during the recess of the Legislature (ART. 69). The scheme of our Constitution is that when the Legislature is not in Session, the power to legislate in the interregnum period is transferred to the Cabinet, and the latter can make and unmake laws precisely in the same manner in which the Legislature can itself do. This law-making power of the Cabinet is of course subject to the limits provided in the Constitution. For instance, the Budget or the Appropriation Bill can be passed only by the National Assembly, and as to this subject the President has no right to exercise the ordinance-making Power. The precise nature of these limitations, however, will be considered in the Chapters relating to 'judiciary' and 'executive'. All these powers are in the nature of a controlling influence which the executive exerts in matters relating to legislation.

(c) The personnel of the judiciary is appointed by the executive, subject to the requirement as to consultation provided for in the provisions relating to the appointment of the Judges contained in Part IX of the Constitution. The jurisdiction of the superior courts like the Supreme Court and the High Courts is set forth in the various provisions of the Constitution, and to that extent, their jurisdiction or authority cannot be curtailed by a simple majority support that any proposed measures in that behalf might have in the legislature. The change in the law relating to jurisdiction of the courts can be made by ordinary law only to the extent to which Constitution does not provide for that jurisdiction. These matters will be dealt in some detail in the Chapter relating to 'jurisdiction' and 'authority' of Superior Courts.

Judiciary, of course, has to interpret and apply the law, and since our polity is law-dominated it has, in effect, enormous powers indeed. And the only check against that power is its own self-restraint resulting from a conscientious approach to the problem of the extent of its own authority and jurisdiction. This is the more so, since it is the only organ of the State that has the power to determine, consistently of course with the Constitution and law, the limits of its own jurisdiction. To what extent the Legislature can override judicial determination of cases will be dealt with in the sequel. Suffice it to say that it is the view of the present writer that under our Constitution enormous powers have been vested in the judiciary, and that a faithful and due discharge of those powers and the corresponding obligation to exercise them judicially, will ensure that the executive and the Legislature would move in the spheres of their allotted jurisdiction and not encroach upon the rights of the citizens relating to their liberties, their lives, their properties, etc. The importance of a strong and independent judiciary, in the scheme of a written Constitution that sets up a Federal system of Government and guarantees to the people of our Country certain Fundamental Rights, cannot possibly be over-estimated.

In our Constitution, therefore, there is no such thing as an absolute or unqualified separation of powers in the sense conceived of by Montesquieu. There is, however, a well marked and clear-cut functional division in the business of the Government in that, three distinct bodies or organs have been set up to perform the functions of the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. And although the responsibility to discharge these functions is primarily lodged in these organs of Sovereign Power, care has been taken to see that the due discharge of these functions by them combines a sense of responsibility with the due maintenance of an efficient system of administration.

The judiciary is, under our Constitution, completely independent of the executive. Good care has been taken to minimise the possibility of either the legislature or the executive attempting to over-awe or dominate the judges, and the precise methods and techniques that have been prescribed in the Constitution to achieve this end, will be dealt with at some length in an effort to show that they do reflect a sincere desire on the part of the Constitution-makers to make our judiciary independent of all alien interference. As to the responsibility of the Judges and the role that they play under a system of Written Constitution, it would suffice for the present to reproduce an extract from MacIver's 'The Modern State', which sums up the extent of their power and defines the limits of their authority admirably.

"It must suffice to remark that the business of judging both demands and admits an unusual independence, on the part of the judge, from the engrossments and fortunes of party politics. He sits apart, to interpret and to pronounce, and the limits of his function are set for him, not by the policies of the hour but by the spirit of the code and of a great profession trained in its study. An ultimate safeguard is even here necessary. None can be entrusted with power without some guarantee against its abuse. A judge, within the limits of his jurisdiction, can be a petty and irascible tyrant. But the right of appeal is a restraining influence, and in the last resort the judge may be made subject to the general power of government, exercised through the legislature or through the combined action of legislature and executive. This final guarantee can be secured in such a way that political expediency is not suffered to touch the authority or effect the status of the appointed judge." (See p. 373, Oxford University Press).

49. The impact of the Theory of Separation of Powers on the Interpretation of Australian Constitution

Their Lordships of the Privy Council in a recent case Attorney-General of Australia

In our Constitution there is no clear-cut division of power.

1957 (2)
A.E.R. 45

v. Reginam, (1957) 2 All E.R. p. 45, had occasion to interpret the provisions of the Australian Constitution with a view to determining the question relating to the validity of the Conciliation and Arbitration Act, 1904-52. The challenge against the Federal Act was that contrary to the requirement of the Australian Constitution it had combined the judicial power of the Court with its administrative, arbitral, executive and legislative powers. The theory of separation of powers and its impact upon the making and, therefore the interpretation, of the Constitution of Australia came in for a comment in words that follow:

"The Constitution was enacted and established by an Act of the Imperial Parliament (63 and 64 Vict. c. 12)—(The Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, 1900, 6 Halsbury's Statutes, 2nd Edn. 268). The Act recited that the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland and Tasmania had agreed to unite in one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth under the Crown of the United Kingdom and under the Constitution thereby established and, by s. 9, enacted that the Constitution of the Commonwealth should be as therein followed. Some weight has been attached to the fact that the Act was an Imperial Statute, but it is difficult to see how this can affect its interpretation. It can safely be assumed (and it is the historical fact) that in convention after convention in Australia the terms of the Constitution were hammered out by members of the several states who were profoundly conversant with the political systems of the United Kingdom and the United States and were, in particular, well aware both of the advantages of the separation of powers in a federal system and of the danger of a too rigid adherence to that theory. It is with this background that the Constitution must be interpreted, and their Lordships find it equally easy to accept as general propositions the statement of the appellants that, whereas under the United States Constitution there is a complete separation of powers, in the Australian Constitution which in some aspects follows the British model, the doctrine is not strictly followed, and on the other hand the statement of the respondents, founded on the highest authority, that 'the Constitution is based on a separation of the functions of Government and the powers which it confers are divided into three classes—legislative, executive and judicial'. Both these statements are true, but both are subject to the qualifications which are to be found in the Constitution itself.

Scheme of the Australian
Constitution.

"That the Constitution is based on a separation of the functions of government is clearly to be seen in its structure, which closely follows the model of the American Constitution. By s. 1, which is contained in Chapter I 'The Parliament', it is provided that the legislative power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament, and the following fifty-nine sections deal broadly with its composition and powers. It is only necessary at this stage to refer to s. 51, which provides that the Parliament shall, subject to the Constitution, have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to (amongst other matters)

'(xxxv) Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes extending beyond the limits of any one state.'

By s. 61, which is the first section of Chapter II, 'The Executive Government', it is provided that the executive power of the Commonwealth is vested in the Queen and is exercisable by the Governor-General as the Queen's representative, and extends to the execution and maintenance of the Constitution, and of the laws of the Commonwealth. The following nine sections of Chapter II deal with the exercise of executive power. By s. 71, which is the first section of Chapter III, 'The Judicature', it is provided that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other federal courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with federal jurisdiction. The following nine sections of Chapter III deal with the appointment of judges, their tenure of office and remuneration, the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court, appeals to the Queen in Council, the original and additional jurisdiction of the High Court, the power of the Parliament to define jurisdiction and certain other matters.

"Such is the bare structure of the Constitution, and it will be necessary to look more closely into some of its provisions. But enough has been said to suggest that, in the absence of any contrary provision, the principle of the separation of powers is embodied in the Constitution. Section 1, which vests legislative power in a Federal Parliament, at the same time negatives such power being vested in any other body. In the same way, s. 71 and the succeeding sections, while affirmatively prescribing in what courts the judicial power of the Commonwealth may be vested and the limits of their jurisdiction, negatives the possibility of vesting such power in other courts or extending their jurisdiction beyond those limits. It is to Chapter III alone that the Parliament must have recourse if it wishes to legislate in regard to the judicial power. That chapter is, in its terms, detailed and exhaustive, and their Lordships dissent from the contention sometimes explicitly, sometimes implicitly, advanced that, inasmuch as there is no express prohibition of other legislation in this field, it is open to the Parliament to turn from Chapter III to some other source of power."

Having said that much their Lordships proceeded to look more closely into some of the provisions of the Constitution Act and rounded up their discussion of the central question in the appeal before them (How far, under the Australian Constitution, by means of a Federal Act judicial and non-judicial power can be united in the same body) by a significant remark :

"But, first and last, the question is one of construction, and they doubt whether, had Locke and Montesquieu never lived nor the Constitution of the United States ever been framed, a different interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth could validly have been reached. Their Lordships would adopt the words of Dixon, J., in Victorian Stevedoring and General Contracting Co. Pty., Ltd. v. Dignan (3) (1931), 46 C.L.R. 73 at p. 96) :

"But an independent consideration of the provisions of the Commonwealth Constitution unaided by any such knowledge (i.e. knowledge of the Constitution of the United States) cannot but suggest that it was intended to confine to each of the three departments of government the exercise of the power with which it is invested by the Constitution'."

50. Pakistan—and the Democratic Principle

In the preamble to our Constitution we have a reference to the declaration by the framers of the Constitution that:

(a) the State of Pakistan, in the words of its Founder, would be a "democratic State" and its authority and powers are to be exercised through the chosen representatives of the people, and further, that

(b) the State would observe the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam.

The State would also guarantee Fundamental Rights including rights such as equality of status and of opportunity, equality before law, freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship and association; social, economic, and political justice, subject to law and morality. The State would also make provision for minorities freely to profess and practise their religion and develop their culture.

To what extent the text of the Constitution which represents the supreme law of the land reflects these high and noble ideals and affirms these principles upon which the future governance of this country is to be based, would be dealt with in detail in the Chapters entitled as Rights and Fundamental Rights as also in Pakistan, as an Ideological State. But while considering the leading features of our Constitution, it is desirable at this stage to refer to that aspect of our Constitution which has reference to the operation of democratic principle—a principle which, in the opinion of the writer, is the very life and soul of the State that has been established under our Constitution.

How shall we define this democratic principle? Is there any agreed definition of this doctrine? In order to answer these questions we need not undertake an examination of the historical development of the form of government which could appropriately be called democratic. Right from the Athenian days of direct democracy to the eve of the French Revolution we, as students of political History of Mankind, witness numerous variations on the theme of democracy considered as a mode of organising the government of the people. Nor is it absolutely essential that the several historic manifestations of the democratic principle be recapitulated, for here, as elsewhere, the history of the institution is no substitute for the analytic understanding of the grammar of its present day operations. Suffice it to say, that the theory and practice of democracy, as it is reflected in the present day governmental institutions, derives its inspiration from the example of French Revolution. France has since the days of Revolution believed, and has, by her practical example, taught the rest of the world to believe, in the principle of national sovereignty. The first step it took was to reject resolutely the principle and practice of autocraticism, absolutism and irresponsible rule,—whether that rule was to be conceived of as being the rule of one person or group of persons, or of a tyrannical oligarchy. She repudiated her Bourbon rulers who were claiming through Louis XIV “L'Etat, c'est moi,” and demonstrated to them that the slogan, “L'Etat, c'est la Nation” was a more sacred slogan for the freedom-loving people of that great country. Equality, liberty and fraternity thus became the watch-words of those diligent crusaders to whom goes the credit of having, for the first time in History, dismantled the foundations upon which arbitrary rule (that is, rule based on coercion and not on the consent of those who were to be ruled) had been erected. These slogans themselves, however, were not fabricated by the French Revolutionaries as if in a fit of absent mindedness, but they had a history of their own, a record of a prolonged period of gestation. The inspiration that led to their formulation as recent scholarship has established, was at least an eleven hundred years old affair.

What was the contribution which the Assembly that gave the French Constitution of 1791 made to the development of democratic method of organising the political life of the people? It taught the people to believe that the principal organ of the nation is the place where they can meet and discuss the affairs of their country and take decisions in terms of which the efficient management of those affairs can be secured for the benefit of all.

The word ‘parliament’ dates back to the French word parle which means to talk. The word ‘parliament’ still bears the stresses of this French word. “The word struck root in England”, say Sir Courtenay Ilbert and Sir Cecil Carr in their book on Parliament, “and was soon applied regularly to the national assemblies which were summoned from time to time by Henry’s great successor, Edward I, and which took something like definite shape in what was afterwards called the Model Parliament of 1295. The word, as we have seen, signified at first the talk itself, the conference held, not the persons holding it. By degrees it was transferred to the body of persons assembled for conference, just as the word ‘conference’ itself has a double meaning. When Edward I was holding his parliament, institutions of the same kind were growing up in France. But the body which in France bore the same name as the English Parliament had a different history and a different fate. The French parlement became a judicial institution, though it claimed to have a share in the making of laws.” The parliament thus derives its authority from the people and the mechanisms for the derivation of this authority are “open and free elections”, held periodically to recruit persons to fill in the Parliament. Such a body of men, who are freely elected, can well claim to be the repositories of legal sovereignty for they are the trustees authorised by the nation to speak, and act on its behalf and in its interest.

What is the theory upon which the institution of Representative Government which goes by the name of “parliamentary democracy”, is founded, may well be stated in a few words. “Man, in his essence”, says Ernest Barker, “is a rational being. His freedom consists in the exercise of his reason. He is himself, and free, when he is exercising his reason. What, then, is the reasonable method—the method according to reason; the method of freedom, since reason and freedom are like the two sides of a coin—for the conduct of the affairs of men in a human society?

“How do men act—or rather, how do they plan and determine their action—when they are an organised body, forming some sort of group, and bound to act as a group? The answer is that they ‘get together’. They pool their minds: each puts forward his point of view, and all discuss and compare their different points of view. That is what happens in a family council: that is what happens in a meeting of the members of a company: that is what happens everywhere, in any living, reasoning, free society.” (Essays on Govt. p. 67)

It is the extension of this principle of taking decisions by discussion as applied to the great society called the Nation, which presents to us, the tactical principle of modern democratic governments. Since it is not possible to collect the entire nation at one place and thereby create a common meeting ground for the purpose of free exchange of opinion, the only practical method of achieving the same thing, be it even so indirectly, is to procure by means of a system of representation, a body of selected men who derive their just authority from the consent of those who have returned them to sit in that body and thus entrusted to them the difficult duty of taking decisions on behalf of the whole nation. To quote Sir Ernest Barker again:

“Representation is a very great thing. It is, in fact, a multiple thing. You may think it a simple thing that a great society should elect representatives to deliberate and decide on its behalf. In fact, it is far from simple. Four things are involved, as men have slowly and gradually discovered during the centuries, whenever you embrace the idea of a system of representation. The first of the four is an electorate—an electorate organised in constituencies, with regular methods of voting—which will duly, carefully and wisely elect its representatives. The second is a system of parties—national parties, each reflecting some general trend of thought pervading all the society—which will submit to the electorate a number of candidates for its choice; and not only so, but will also submit, along with the candidates, the programmes of policy for which the candidates stand. Such a system of national parties is a necessary part of any system of representation: it provides the electorate with the organized data of choice—alike in candidates and programmes—without which it would choose in the void. Granted an organized electorate and a system of national parties, the third of the four things involved in the idea of representation—the central and cardinal thing—will naturally follow. This third and cardinal thing is the parliament of the elected candidates, the parliament of the Word, which debates and discusses the alternative programmes of policy reflected in the nature of its own membership and seeks to discover the elixir of a common policy true to the thought of the whole society. But even that is not the whole of the matter. There is still a fourth thing which is necessary—as necessary as any of the other three—so necessary, indeed, that the other three may labour in vain if it is not present. This fourth and vitally necessary thing is a guiding cabinet—a cabinet guiding parliament, and yet at the same time guided by parliament (so fine and delicate is the adjustment of the whole machinery of the representative system of government)—which adds the final touch to the representative system. The cabinet was the last of the four elements of representation to be added, in the course of its slow and gradual development. It began to be added in the eighteenth century; it was finally added in the nineteenth. With its addition the system of representation—the system of parliamentary government—may be said to have assumed its final form.” (Essays on Government p. 69-70).

Equality, Liberty and Fraternity.

The watchwords of the French Revolution, namely Equality, Liberty and Fraternity, have been woven into the very texture of modern political institutions. They are the principles which are reflected in the theory and practice of modern Democratic Governments and continue to be the dynamic principles of their growth and adaptability. Let us observe the relationship between these three prismatic facets of the thing called democracy. Equality comes first. Unless all citizens are equal in status and are free citizens they cannot hope to meet together to discuss problems of political organisation that affect the entire nation. In order that each one of them may be able to express himself courageously, he should have the liberty to utter his opinion, to seek in concert with his fellow men, the realisation of that opinion. Since the possibility of the clashes of opinions in regard to the wisdom of the proposed course of action sponsored by certain groups within the folds of a community are bound to occur, having regard to the fact that we are disposed to react differently to identical situations, law must step in to define the sphere of individual liberty in such a way that the liberty of each may be accommodated within the framework of the life of whole community. Care is to be taken to ensure that liberty of one man may not enslave his neighbour, and there would thus be some essential freedoms which each one of the members of the community will have to be guaranteed so as to preclude the possibility of the State eventually encroaching upon these preserves. Equality and liberty thus are interlinked and in fact lead up to the third: fraternity—the brotherhood of man must be reared not on the precarious sands of the shifting loyalties to petty interests of the privileged few but upon a system of governance inspired by the belief that all men are equal and have therefore the right to express themselves freely in relation to any course of conduct which in their considered opinion is likely to contribute to the greatest good of the entire nation.

Rule of Majority.

These reflections also suggest the justification for accepting the doctrine of rule by the majority: since all men are equal, the only method of resolving conflicting view-points after a general discussion is held, is to determine by appeal to the majority-principle on what side the weight of the national opinion is. It is a good working definition of democratic principle to say that it embodies the belief in the capacity of the average man to establish a system of institutions and procedures whereby political decisions could be amicably reached: Democratic method enables its votaries to secure political decisions by resorting to some well established procedures for resolving conflicts in the viewpoints of the members of the State. “A government by the people, for the people and of the people” is the definition of Democracy offered by one of the greatest democrat of all times—Abraham Lincoln—and none has been offered since the day he first voiced it which could be said to have improved upon it. “A majority”, said he in his first Inaugural Address, “held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations, and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments is the only true sovereign of the people”. It was in much the same spirit that Jefferson, in his first Inaugural Address (March 4, 1801) had stated as one of the “essential principles” of U. S. Government the demand that there be “absolute acquiescence in the decisions of majority, the vital principle of republics from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism”. Should the majority itself behave unreasonably and assail the rights that the individual could claim under the constitution, the courts of law would intervene and declare its decisions as void and inoperative.

Although all are agreed in regard to the aims and ideals which democratic societies ought to pursue, the question in regard to the establishment of appropriate institutions for the realisation of these aims and objectives still remains a controversial one. Modern democracies do not present any homogeneous scheme or identity of constitutional structure concerning the distribution of sovereign power within the State, much less do they disclose any stereotype pattern in the warp and woof of the Governments they establish. If generalization can at all be made about the essentials that go to distinguish a democratic system of governance from those that are not, we might adopt the approach of Professor MacIver for the enunciation of the cardinal features of democratic Governments. “The Growth of democracy”, says he in his book on Web of Government, “has always been associated with the free discussion of political issues, with the right to differ concerning them, and with the settlement of the difference, not by force majeure, but by resort to the counting of votes. It has always been associated with the growing authority of some assembly of the people or of the people’s representatives, such as Greek Ecclesia, the Roman Comitia, the English Parliament. The right to differ did not end with the victory of the majority but was inherent in the system. It was a necessary condition of democracy everywhere that opposing doctrines remained free to express themselves, to seek converts, to form organizations, and so to compete for success before the tribunal of public opinion. Any major trend of opinion could thus register itself in the character and in the policies of Government.” (PP. 198-199)

Disparity between ideals
and institutional duties in democratic governments.

The Brazilian Constitution has made some unusual provisions for the safeguarding of “democratic regime” from the assaults that usually are made upon it by political ideologies that support one party rule with a view to establishing a monolithic state. These provisions are contained in Chapter 11 of the Brazilian Constitution, which is headed as “Individual Rights and Guarantees”. Some of these are:

- “ART. 141 (12) Freedom of Association for legitimate purposes is assured. No Association may be compulsorily dissolved except by virtue of judicial sentence.
- (13) The Organisation, registration, or functioning of any political party or association whose programme or action may be contrary to the democratic regime based upon plurality of parties and guaranty of the Fundamental Rights of Men, is prohibited.”

In its very first Article, the Brazilian Constitution proclaims:

- “ART. 1. The United States of Brazil maintain, under the representative system, the Federation and the Republic.

All Power emanates from the people and shall be exercised in its name.”

It is obvious that the Communist Party would not be allowed to function under the Brazilian Constitution. The Brazilian Supreme Court is known to have cancelled, on the premises of Art. 141 of the Constitution, the election of some Communists who were returned to take their seats in the Legislative Chambers of the Brazilian Government.

Brazilian device of Safeguarding Democratic Regime based on pluralities of Parties.

If State could be described in terms of the two great functions that it fulfils, namely: (a) the administration of justice in domestic matters, and (b) the conduct of external relations in the field of foreign affairs,—then, the democratic Government may well be defined functionally, as being the Government which is based on politically organized opinion of the people who compose the State for the advancement of the foregoing purposes. The coercive apparatus of power, to the use of which State justifiably claims a monopoly, has, in

Democratic
principle defined.

Burke quoted.

the democratic governments, itself to be resorted to only in the interest of the people in accordance with the constitutional processes established upon the footing of the free consent of those people. In other words, it is the theory of democracy that the ultimate source of the authority or power of the Government must be traced back to the people. Democratic Governments are Governments that are carried on with the free consent of the people to be governed. The sole justification for the existence of representative institutions is to make the articulation of public opinion on matters concerning the business of political society, possible. Representative institutions are manned by persons who have returned triumphant from the election polls. The democratic principle is realised by means of these representative institutions.

51. Delegation vs. Representation

The theory of representative Government can best be stated by saying that persons who are elected, are not the delegates of their constituents, but that they are the representatives of the people as a whole. A representative is bound, of course, to weigh and consider every political problem from the view-point of his constituents but the important thing to remember is that while so doing he has not to turn a blind eye to the interests of the nation as a whole. In the words that Burke spoke to his electors of the Bristol Constituency (November 1774), we have the real role of the Representative of the People described to us :

"Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitting attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfactions, to theirs; and above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own. But, his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion."

'My worthy colleague says his will ought to be subservient to yours. If that be all, the thing is innocent; if government were a matter of will upon my side, yours, without question, ought to be superior. But government and legislation are matters of reason and judgment, and not of inclination; and what sort of reason is that, in which the determination precedes the discussion; in which one set of men deliberate, and another decide; and where those who form the conclusion are perhaps three hundred miles distant from those who hear the arguments?

'To deliver an opinion, is the right of all men; that of constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear, and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions, mandates issued, which the member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey, to vote and to argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience—these are things utterly unknown to the laws of the land, and which arise from a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenor of our constitution.'

'Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests; which interests each must maintain, as an agent, and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation, with one interest, that of the whole; where, not local purposes, not local prejudices, ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a member indeed; but when you have chosen him, he is not a member of Bristol, but he is a member of parliament."

The ideas to which Burke gave expression in regard to the relationship which ought to subsist as between a representative in the Parliament and his Constituents outside, were in no sense new; for, we find a reference to the same kind of relationship outlined in Coke's IVth Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England where it is stated :

"Though one be chosen for one particular county or borough, yet when he is returned, and sits in Parliament, he serveth with the whole realm, for the end of his coming thither as in the writ of his election appeareth, is general."

The position of a parliamentary representative came in for a judicial comment in the case of Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants v. Osborne reported in 1910 Appeal Cases p. 87. In this case, which is incidentally a leading authority on law relating to trade unions, the facts were that a certain Trade Union entered into an arrangement with certain candidates whose election it undertook to finance on the condition that they sign and accept the mandate of the Labour Party and be subject to their whip. The candidates were asked to give a pledge to the effect that they would do all that they were asked to do by the Party. Lord Shaw in his speech in the House of Lords considered such an arrangement illegal and observed:

"A member of the Parliament is not to be the paid mandatory of any man or organisation of men nor is he entitled to bind himself to subordinate his opinions on public questions to others, for wages, or at the peril of pecuniary loss; and any contract of this character would not be recognised by a court of law either for its enforcement or in respect of its breach."

These observations were based on the realization by the learned Law Lord that employment of funds by certain organisations to bind the hands of Parliamentary representatives would deprive them of their moral independence and such a device would gravely imperil the success of a Parliamentary Democracy.

Quite apart from the question affecting the legality involved in the shift of loyalty from one party to another, there is the moral problem which confronts those who, after they have been returned on a certain Party Ticket, decide to change their Party allegiance. In such a case there can be no question of bringing about the cancellation of the mandate given to a certain Party candidate much less of insisting upon his recall. But cases are not unknown in English Political History when conscientious politicians while changing Party allegiance have felt themselves honour-bound to resign their seats in the Parliament. In each case, however, the primary question is one of political morality and not of law; and one of the important considerations which would certainly weigh in the assessment of the situation resulting from shifting Party allegiance is to find out whether or not the actual issue, which led to the abandonment of Party allegiance on the part of the Parliamentary representative, was the one which was an essential part of the election manifesto at the time his election took place. If it was not, the representative would be justified in case he did not resign his seat. In February 1931, for instance, Sir Oswald Mosley and five other members of the Labour Party deserted the Labour Party and formed a new one, and, despite the fact that their conduct was strongly condemned by their constituencies, they did not resign their seats in the Parliament.

In our country, however, where Democratic tradition is not, as yet, firmly laid, the cases of, what is called, representatives "crossing the floor" are not infrequent and there is a considerable opinion in our country that some constitutional method should

Observations
of Lord Shaw in the case
rep. in 1910
A. C. 87.

Shifts in Party Allegiance

Our Country and the Democratic Tradition.

Political Parties.

be designed to compel persons, who change their Party allegiance after they have been returned successful on a given Party ticket, to resign their seats. But, as would be obvious, any imposition of legal sanction of the kind that is suggested in this country is likely to undermine the moral and intellectual independence of the representatives of the people. The only wholesome weapon wherewith to smite the deserters from Party fold is to relegate them to the rigour of public opinion. With the passage of time it is expected that obedience to Party discipline would become a deep-seated habit with the politicians, and the cases of changing political loyalties would be visited with such an amount of social disapprobation that they would become rare occurrences, if not a thing of the past.

Modern democratic Governments are controlled by organised political parties: a voter does not in fact vote for a particular individual who offers himself as a candidate; in reality he votes for the party in whose programme and leadership he has been persuaded to repose his confidence. Situations however do arise when the majority of members in the legislature, however paradoxical it may appear, do not represent the majority of the electors in the country.

Although in a parliamentary democracy, executive is continually responsible to the legislature, there is a sense in which it is true to say that, after the general elections once the Government is formed, the executive has a controlling voice in the administration of public affairs, and in the conduct of the business of the legislature. The details of these relationships, with particular reference to the mechanism of a parliamentary system of governance, would be set forth in the chapter that follows; but it is pertinent to point out, in the context of the present statement of the democratic principle, that even the Leader of the House, namely the Prime Minister, although he is directly elected by the majority group in the Legislature, is not their delegate in the sense that he must at all times move within the orbit of their mandate or conduct the affairs of the State within the sphere of a prescribed political programme. He is in fact the representative of the whole country and that is why, he is, in situations in which he conscientiously feels that on any given issue his party is not taking a correct stand, entitled, as a matter of convention, to ask for the dissolution of the House, just to be able to make an appeal to the country. Of course, the mandate of his party is a matter of paramount consideration with him, but its dictates do not transcend that higher loyalty he owes to the total national order. In the theory of representative Government, elections are a mere means for selecting persons who are to exercise political power, but the party programmes upon the basis of which these elections are fought, are not to be construed as being in any sense the fetters that bind the hands of those who are called upon to take important political decisions. Elections are constitutional processes—so are the motions of no-confidence or the exercise of the powers of the dissolution of the Legislature—and they are all calculated to minister to that dominant purpose of discovering what the will of the people on a given issue is—and apart from the fulfilment of that purpose, they have no other meaning.

Enough has been said to underline the importance of the existence of constitutional opposition to the Government in power. In England, not without reason, the Opposition is characterised as His Majesty's opposition. In fact, the working of democratic institutions is inconceivable without the existence of constitutional opposition to the programmes, policy and the administrative initiative sponsored by the Government of the day.

A democratic State presents a difficult form of Government precisely because it is delicately poised upon the ever-unstable fulcrum of public opinion. But it is on that very account the best form of Government. Its chief merit consists in this that it does not do any violence to our sense of dignity as individuals, as men and women who are all responsible for working that Government. A good Government, it has been said, is no substitute for self-

Difficulties of Democratic Government.Importance of public education.

government. The success of democratic institutions would, therefore, depend on the kind of public education that is imparted to the people. "I know of no safe depository of the ultimate powers of Society", said Thomas Jefferson, "but the people themselves and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them but to inform their discretion by education." To the same effect are the observations of George Washington contained in his famous Farewell Address of 1796: "Virtue or Morality", said he, "is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of government . . . Promote then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened."

If it is the people who must rule themselves they must know the limits within which that self rule is possible. Constitutions are in reality nothing but mere devices, contrivances through which limits on political power are imposed so that men may be left free within some well-defined grooves of human thought and belief to pursue their self-development. Democracy is the only form of Government in which the individual can play a creative role, where his individuality will not be dwarfed and where his capacity for personal growth and expansion will not be surrendered at the altar of collectivistic and irresponsible regimentation. But care must be taken to remember that no constitutional devices, however perfect they be, can be of any avail where the right to vote is itself not properly exercised. "Representative Institutions", said J.S. Mill in a well-known book of his, "are of little value and may be a mere instrument of tyranny or intrigue, when the generality of voters are not sufficiently interested in their own government to give their vote, or if they vote at all, do not bestow their suffrages on public grounds but sell them for money or vote at the beck of some one who has control over them, or whom for private reasons they desire to propitiate. (See his "Representative Government").

Democratic
governments—
its virtues.

We might conclude these considerations on the nature of democratic principle by quoting an extract from Maclver's Web of Government, which sums up these thoughts admirably and points out the conditions that make for the successful working of democratic institutions—and, in effect, brings out the contours of the concept of democracy into a sharp focus:

MacIver's
view quoted.

"Democracy has proved to be unworkable where the majority of the people are politically inert, uneducated, unconscious of their unity or of any binding common interest. It is a question rather of the level of interest than of the level of intelligence. It is particularly difficult to introduce a democratic system into any large country that has been accustomed to a more authoritarian Government, especially if economic standards are low and the means of communication are undeveloped. This has, for example, been the situation in China where the Manchu dynasty was overthrown in 1912 and a republic inaugurated. Within three years the first president of the republic, Yuan Shih-Kai, was plotting to make himself emperor and there followed a series of internal wars and grave dissensions between one part of the country and another that not even the Japanese invasion could bring to an end.

When a democratic system is for the first time set up, it is subject to particular perils. The infant mortality of these new democracies is high. The struggle of the new democracy to survive against the forces of the older order is sometimes long and hard. This has been true of France, where after its initiation democracy several times fell and rose again and where even to the present counter-revolutionary forces have continued to challenge the Republic." (See p 190, 191. Macmillan Co. New York)

52. Contents of the Constitution

What are the matters that should be appropriately included in the written constitution of a country, is a question that is incapable of being answered in terms of any principle. As a matter of experience, one observes that the different written Constitutions of the world show different kinds of topics in regard to which provisions are made in those documents. Whether the constitution should contain a few essential provisions or it should be one which should have reference to even the unessential aspects of State-craft is really a question for the Political Scientist to answer.

Our Constitution is prefaced by a long preamble which is, in substance, a reproduction of the objectives resolution passed by the Constituent Assembly on 12.3.1949, in which it had defined the goals and the ends which the framers of the Constitution were to set before themselves when drawing up the Constitution; it includes a Chapter on Fundamental Rights (Rights which are justiciable), and another on Directive principles of State policy (Directives which are not justiciable); it also contains elaborate provisions with regard to the setting up of several commissions and councils which are not of any fundamental importance to the life of the State and which could well have been set up by means of ordinary legislation. It also establishes the machinery of Federal and Provincial Government, provides for the Constitution of Federal and Provincial Legislatures and sets forth the Constitution and Authority of the Supreme Court and the High Courts of our Country. It also makes provisions in the Part relating to Temporary and Transitional provisions for a change over from the sort of Constitutional Government which was in existence under the provisions of Government of India Act, 1935, as adapted in Pakistan, to the government envisaged by the Constitution.

P.L.D. 1956
Federal Court, p. 200.

In the case of The Punjab Province v. Malik Khizar Hayat Khan Twana, reported in PLD 1956 Federal Court 200 at p. 205, the highest Court of this country when faced with the problem of defining the nature of a constitutional provision stricto sensu declared that that was an impossible task: Chief Justice Munir delivering the Judgment of the Court observed:

"In law there is no precise definition of the matters that may be included in a constitution, and the range of the subjects that may be so included is so wide that what is a constitutional matter according to one constitution may not at all be a constitutional matter according to another, though for the purposes of political science or constitutional philosophy it may be possible to enumerate the matters that may properly be provided in a constitution. No Judge, lawyer or writer, however, has ever ventured to assert that certain matters cannot as a matter of law be enacted in a constitution Act. Thus while the constitution of one State may provide that its nationals shall or shall not wear a particular dress or shall or shall not be entitled to certain rights, that of another may completely omit such matters and confine itself only to the distribution of governmental powers among the various organs of the State. Indeed a constitution may say no more than this that all sovereign powers of the State shall vest and be exercisable by a particular person who shall not only be the law-giver of the State but also the executive head and the Chief Justice of that State. It seems to me, therefore, to be perfectly plain that if a body is invested with the power of making provision as to the constitution of a State, it is on any general principle or theory of constitutional law impossible to circumscribe its constituent powers. If it decides to say that a certain provision has to be considered as a constitutional provision, that is the end of the matter and the legality of that provision cannot be questioned on the ground that it did not properly fall within the domain of constitutional law as understood by constitutional lawyers or writers."

The prolixity in the provisions of our Constitution as also in that of the Constitution of India is due to the evil example of the Government of India Act, 1935, an Act upon which both of them have been modelled. Government of India Act, 1935, taken by itself, is undoubtedly one of the most elegantly drafted enactment of the United Kingdom Parliament: but it had to include variegated details of Administrative Machinery because of the highly complex character of the political problem it had to deal with. Our Constitution could have been made brief and the frame work of the Government it intended to establish could have been set forth in a more simple document—and in the bargain it would have served the purpose for which Constitutions are designed much more effectively than it does today. As it is worded, it gives every appearance of having been drawn up by two verbose lawyers who have had to compromise upon the settlement of the rival claims of their highly sensitive and suspicious clients!

CHAPTER III
MECHANISMS OF PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY

MECHANISMS OF PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY

There is a tendency to misunderstand the British Parliamentary system because of the historic misunderstanding for which a great Frenchman, Montesquieu, who was a great admirer of the British Constitution, was responsible in his Esprit des Lois. I refer to the doctrine of the separation of the powers—legislative, executive and judicial—which Montesquieu thought he saw in England. As a contribution to political analysis it is still valuable, but it has very serious dangers if it is not realized that in practice there is never the clear demarcation between the legislature and executive which Montesquieu envisaged. Nor is it desirable that there should be. What Montesquieu failed to see was that, as was already the case when he wrote and is very much truer now, the British system is based upon a close partnership between the executive and the legislature.

One of the consequences of the emphasis which since Montesquieu's day has so often been placed on the separation of powers is that we all of us tend to think of Parliament first and foremost as the legislature. It is of minor account that this ignores the share of the Government in framing legislation, and the existence of extra-Parliamentary legislation. It is of greater account that it obscures the fact that legislation is only one of the functions which Parliament performs, and it is arguable that it is not the principal one.

Rt. Hon. Herbert Morrison, M.P.
(on British Parliamentary Democracy)

Now it is one of the fundamental axioms of political science that we must distinguish sharply between state and government. The latter is but the agent of the former; it exists to carry out the purposes of the state. It is not itself the supreme coercive power; it is simply the mechanism of administration which gives effect to the purposes of that power. It is not, we are told, sovereign in the sense in which the state is sovereign; its competence is defined by such authority as the state may choose to confer upon it; and if it oversteps that authority it may, where such provision exists, be called to account. The idea of a government responsible for the commission of acts beyond its allotted powers is the central idea of every state where legal rule has replaced arbitrary discretion as the basis of political action. Louis XIV could, not unjustifiably, identify his private purpose with the will of the state; but even a ruler so powerful as the President of the United States must find authority for the exercise of his will either in the constitution or in some power legally granted to him thereunder by the Congress of his country. There are even countries, of which the United States is itself an example, in which the state expressly forbids its government, by the Constitution under which that government must act, to take certain types of power or to exercise others in certain ways.

Harold J. Laski
(The State in Theory and Practice)

53. Legislature and Executive under our Constitution

Priority of Legislative Power.

Of all the three principal departments within which the sovereign power of our State is distributed, namely the Legislature, Executive and Judiciary, it is the Legislature that is logically prior to the remaining two. Considering that our Constitution establishes a "parliamentary" pattern of democratic Government, treatment of that State-organ of the sovereign power, that is of Legislature, should precede the discussion of the remaining two. After all, there must be laws, before they could be acted upon and executed. The Executive Government must derive its authority from the Constitution and the law and, in fact, the power of Executive to administer is co-extensive with the power of Legislature to make laws, for it is provided in ART. 39 that the executive authority of the Federation shall extend to all matters with respect to which Parliament has power to make laws. This principle is repeated in the sphere of Provincial administration in clause (2) of ART. 73. The executive authority of the Federation is, no doubt, vested in the President and is to be exercised by him directly or through the officials subordinate to him in accordance with the Constitution, but even the President is elected by the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, and the Civil and the Armed Services and other officers who constitute the agencies through which the executive authority operates, derive their capacity to act as channels of executive power only from the Constitution and the law. Primacy of the Constitution and Law, in fact, follows from the fact that we have a written Constitution. The State itself is the creature of law and its several organs must act in accordance with law. Laws, under our Constitution are to be made by Parliament or Provincial Legislatures. And what is more, even the Executive is to be drawn from the Legislature—all this once again confirms the view that Legislature is logically prior to the Executive.

Parliament of Pakistan.

The legislative organ of the Federal Government is the Parliament which under ART. 43 is to consist of the President and one House, to be known as the National Assembly. The President is not a Member of the National Assembly but his relation to that body is practically analogous to the one which the English Crown bears to the Parliament. Laws in England too are made by the King-in-Parliament. This method is also the basis of our Constitution and corresponds to the one employed in the Constitution of India where under ART. 79, the President and two Houses (known respectively as the Council of States and the House of the People) constitute Parliament for the Union. This idea is also repeated in the Provincial set-up, for under ART. 76 of our Constitution the Provincial Legislature consists of the Governor and one House, to be known as the "Provincial Assembly". The President, therefore, is the constituent part of the Parliament as even the Governor is of the Provincial Legislature, although both of them are not Members of National or Provincial Assemblies respectively.

Federal Legislature under the Government of India Act, 1935 and other Constitutions.

The Government of India Act, 1935, in S. 18, provided for the constitution of the Federal Legislature in the following words :—

"18(1)—There shall be a Federal Legislature which shall consist of His Majesty, represented by the Governor-General, and two Chambers, to be known respectively as the Council of State and the House of Assembly . . ."

Similarly, under the Australian Constitution, it has been provided :

"The legislative power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament, which shall consist of the Queen, a Senate, and a House of Representatives, and which is hereinafter called "The Parliament" or "The Parliament of the Commonwealth". (See S.1 of the Australian Constitution (1900).) S.17 of the British North America Act also makes the Parliament for Canada consist of the Queen and an Upper House styled as Senate and the House of Commons. Similarly, S.19 of the Union of South Africa provides that the legislative power of the Union is vested in the Parliament of the Union which shall consist of the King, a Senate and a House of Assembly. To the same effect we have in S.65 of the Constitution of Burma (1947) the legislative power of the Union vested in the Union Parliament which consists of the President, a Chamber of Deputies and a Chamber of Nationalities. S.7 of the Ceylon (Constitution) Order in Council of 1946 provides for "a Parliament of the Island which shall consist of His Majesty and two Chambers, to be known respectively as the Senate and the House of Representatives".

Head of the State—as a Part of Parliament.

Uni cameral Legislature & Federalism.

All Parliamentary Democracies thus make the constitutional Head of the State a part of the Legislature, the sole exception being the Constitution of the Fourth French Republic which, although it adopts the Parliamentary System of Government, does not make the President as a constituent part of the Legislature, nor does it give to him the power to suspend or veto legislation passed by the Parliament. In its 5th Art. the French Constitution provides for Parliament which shall be composed of two Houses—the National Assembly and the Council of the Republic. (See also ART. 36.)

It will also appear that in one essential particular at least the Legislature established by our Constitution is unique; this unique feature of our Constitution is somewhat irreconcilable with the juristic notion of a Federal State in that, representation has not been separately given to the Units of the Federation. Ordinarily, it is to be observed that in no Federation do we have a uni-cameral, that is one House-Legislature, the principle generally accepted being that every Federal Legislature should have two Houses—representation in the Lower House should be given to the people on the population basis and in the Upper House representation should be given to the Units of which the Federation is composed. In American Constitution, for example (ART. 1, S.1.) it is provided.

"All legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives."

Representation in the Senate is given on the basis of equality to all the Federating States, large or small, and representation in the House of Representatives is given to the people of the United States according to the population quota determined by the Act of Congress.

Pakistan is the only Federal State that has departed from the Federal principle in that it has only one House for its Federal Legislature.

54. President of the Republic

The functioning of a Parliamentary Democracy postulates the existence of a constitutional Head who becomes the guardian of the Constitution in so far as it provides for the control of power-relations between the Executive and the Legislature. It is a sine qua non of the high and august office of the President that the holder of it must, like Caesar's wife, be above distrust, suspicion and reproach. This, in terms of practical politics, means that he should transcend the party strifes and conduct the constitutional operations of the State machinery without being animated by any prejudice against or bias for any political party or personality.

The entire scheme of the Constitution presupposes for its orderly implementation, existence of an upright, benevolent and just occupier of the high office of the President of the Republic. He like the King in England is required to represent the executive power of the State, not of course in its efficient sense but only in relation to its dignified aspect—the expression "efficient" and "dignified" aspects of the political power being understood in the sense in which Walter Bagehot uses them in his treaties on English Constitution. "If the Cabinet reflects the efficient part of the English Constitution", says Bagehot, "the Crown is the repository of its dignified part". Crown is "its dignified part, in that he is the fountain of honour, the symbol of the Majesty and dignity of the English nation as a whole". According to Walter Bagehot, "the Queen is only at the head of the dignified part of the Constitution. The Prime Minister is the head of the efficient part". Little later he observes, "the use of the Queen in a dignified capacity is incalculable. Without her in England, the present English Government would fail and pass away". (p. 30)

Within the framework of republican form of government there can be no such thing as hereditary office of Kingship, for here all are equal before law: every one is equal in every conceivable sense of that term. But here too it is the President, who becomes, by virtue of his office as the constitutional head, the symbol of a country's national pride, of its dignity, of its honour. He is required to play the role of a balance wheel in the total mechanism of State-machinery. There is nothing expressly affirmed in the Constitution in relation to this aspect of the role of the President, but the spirit underlying the Constitution and the scheme and arrangement of its provisions that repose so much of constitutional authority and power in the hands of the President make it perfectly plain that that is the role which the framers of the Constitution have assigned to the President of the Republic.

It is for this reason, perhaps, that he is to be a Muslim [ART. 32(2)], for in a State which lays claim to being called "Islamic" Republic, its constitutional head, so runs the argument, must be a person who should owe allegiance to the faith and who must reflect the character, which is enjoined by Islam. If this argument were valid, would it not be strange that our Constitution should permit the Speaker of the National Assembly, even though he be a non-Muslim, to act as the President in circumstances mentioned in ART. 36?

The President has, in addition to the above requirement, to be a person who must fulfil the following qualifications :—

- (a) He should not be less than forty years of age.
- (b) He must be qualified for election as a Member of National Assembly, and
- (c) He must not be a person who has previously been removed from the office of President by impeachment under ART. 35 [See ART. 32 (2)].

He has to be elected by an electoral college consisting of the members of the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, in accordance with the provisions contained in the First Schedule [ART. 32(1)].

The juristic implications of these provisions will be dealt with in the Chapter relating to Nature, Structure and Reach of Judicial Power (see Judiciary and the Election Law) but it is sufficient for our present purpose to note that the Chief Election Commissioner is under the Constitution to be the Returning Officer for the election of the President, and it should be remembered that the appointment of the Chief Election Commissioner is to be made by the President in his discretion [see ARTs. 37(7) and 137(4)]. When the President acts under the Constitution in his discretion he acts on his own, that is, he is not required to take advice of the appropriate Minister. Considering that the President has been made eligible for holding office for two terms [ART. 33(2)] it is a practical possibility that the same Chief Election Commissioner who has been appointed by the President in "his discretion", may have to be the Returning Officer who in his turn, should the President offer himself for the second term for being elected to the same office of the President, is to conduct his election. This anomaly in the Constitution acquires some sinister significance if regard is had to the provision which says, "the validity of the election of the President shall not be called in question in any court" [See ART. 32(3)]. What are the limits of this sweeping

Role of President in a Republican Constitution

Our President must be a Moslem.

His other qualifications.

President's Election to Office.

Validity of President's Election can not be questioned in any court. ART. 32(3).

prohibition, issued by the Constitution, as a result of which the courts are to be precluded from questioning the validity of the election of the President, will be dealt with in another place (see the Chapter relating to "Nature, Structure and Reach of Judicial Power"), but in the context of the present considerations it is pertinent to point out the political implications that must flow from a method of election designed by the Constitution whereby a person is to be elected to the high office of the President by the very person who has been appointed by the President himself—and such an election is not even challengeable in a court of law!

Presumably, this immunity was extended to the Presidential election for avoiding controversies with regard to his being a real Muslim or not—a question which may have to be raised in courts of law if the validity of the election of the President could be challenged by means of judicial proceedings. But if this was the intention, sufficient care has not been taken to give to it a precise legal formulation; for the legal attack upon any person who has been elected as President on any of the grounds relating to his lack of qualifications mentioned in ART. 32(2) is not saved by the kind of language in which the prohibition has been couched in ART. 32(3) of our Constitution. It is the validity of the election (i.e. of the several steps in the electioneering process), which is saved, and it is doubtful if the constitutional requirements that go to make up the qualifications of a person to offer himself as President constitute "steps in the electioneering process", the validity of which cannot be enquired into a court of law. If the person is, to take an extreme example, of less than forty years of age or is not qualified for election as a Member of the National Assembly, or he has previously been removed from the office of President by impeachment, he cannot conceivably be elected as President under the Constitution. And it is submitted that want of any of these qualifications can validly constitute sufficient ground for a challenge and thus form the subject-matter of adjudication by competent courts, and for an enquiry being instituted into the alleged want of qualifications—and this manner of proceeding is not in any sense within the prohibition mentioned in ART. 32(3). A possible argument against this view could be, that no judicial process can change the situation as it cannot reach the President, for in ART. 213 is provided the protection to the President and the Governor. The words of this Article are, "Neither the President nor the Governor of a Province, shall be answerable to any court for the exercise of powers and performance of duties of his office, or for any act done or purported to be done in the exercise of those powers and performance of those duties: Provided that nothing in this Article shall be construed as restricting the right of any person to bring appropriate proceedings against the Federal Government or a Provincial Government." But it is doubtful if a writ of quo warranto against a person who was lacking in qualifications prescribed by ART. 32(2) can be resisted by appeal to the language of ART. 213. The immunity extended by that Article specifically relates to President being answerable in any court for the exercise of his powers or performance of duties of his office or for acts done or purported to be done in the exercise of those powers and performance of those duties. The immunity does not extend to an action to challenge his status as President—for even before the immunity can be claimed under ART. 213 it must be shown that the person claiming the protection is a validly elected President.

Relevance of Immunity under
ART. 213.

His resignation etc.

Impeachment
ART. 35.

The President may cease to become President if he resigns his office by writing under his hand addressed to the Speaker of the National Assembly [ART. 33(3)], or if he holds any office of profit in the service of Pakistan or any other position carrying the right to remuneration for the rendering of service [ART. 34(1)], and finally, if he is successfully impeached on a charge of violating the Constitution or gross misconduct.

The procedure in relation to the impeachment of the President is outlined in ART. 35 which is as follows :

"(2)—No such charge shall be preferred unless not less than one-third of the total number of Members of the National Assembly give to the Speaker of that Assembly notice of their intention to move a resolution for the impeachment of the President, and no such resolution shall be moved in the Assembly unless fourteen days have expired from the date on which notice of such resolution is communicated to the President.

(3)—The President shall have the right to appear and be represented during the consideration of the charge.

(4)—If, after the consideration of the charge, a resolution is passed by the National Assembly, by the votes of not less than three-fourths of the total number of Members, declaring that the charge has been substantiated, the President shall vacate his office on the day on which the resolution is passed.

(5)—Where the Speaker of the National Assembly is exercising the functions of the President under ART. 36, the provisions of this Article shall apply subject to the modification that the reference to the Speaker in clause (2) shall be construed as a reference to the Deputy Speaker, and that the reference in clause (4) to the removal from office of the President shall be construed as a reference to the removal of the Speaker from his office as Speaker; and on the passing of a resolution such as is referred to in clause (4) the Speaker shall cease to exercise the functions of President."

The term of office for the President is five years [ART. 33(1)], and the term begins from the date on which he enters upon his office, and notwithstanding the expiration of his term, he is to continue to hold his office until his successor enters upon the office. He is eligible to hold office for one more term. In this last mentioned respect, the constitutional provision in India enables the Indian President to offer himself for re-election for any number of terms. In the Constitution of the United States there was, to begin with, no bar against re-election and most of the Presidents have been elected for two consecutive terms and President Roosevelt successfully ran for the third term. In the 22nd Amendment to the Constitution, however, which was adopted on 27th February 1951, it is now expressly provided that no person shall be elected for the office of President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of the President or acted as President for more than two years of the term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once.

Our Constitution provides in ART. 33(2), "No person shall hold office as President for more than two terms." It does not in express terms confer entitlement upon a person to hold office for two consecutive terms.

The principle underlying this restriction to hold the office of President for more than stated number of terms appears to be that the continued exercise of power by a person paves the way for the same person to successfully contest for the ensuing term and prevents, on grounds other than merit, other persons from stepping into the office.

When clause (2) of ART. 33 enjoins that 'No person shall hold office as President for more than two terms' does it mean that the President can hold office for two successive or consecutive terms? It is submitted that analysis of ARTs. 32(2); 33(2); 34(2); and 143 (1) (c) would seem to suggest that there must anyhow be a break between the two terms for which any one person under the Constitution can hold office of President. Following argument is submitted in support of this view:

(a) Under ART. 32(2) it has been clearly provided that a person shall not be qualified for election as President unless he is a Muslim; nor shall he be so qualified if he is not qualified for election as a member of the National Assembly ART. 32 (2) (b)).

(b) Under ART. 34(1) the President shall not be qualified for election as a member of

The term of President's Office.

Comment on
ART. 33(2).

the National or a Provincial Assembly; and if a member of any such Assembly is elected as President his seat in that Assembly shall become vacant on the day on which he enters upon his office.

The combined effect of the foregoing two provisions is too obvious to need any detailed analysis. Once a person holds office as President, by the sheer force of that circumstance alone, and so long as he holds that office, he shall not be qualified for election as a member of the Provincial or a National Assembly. And so long as he is not qualified to become a member of Provincial or National Assembly he will be disqualified for being elected under ART. 32(2) (b) as President.

It would seem to follow from this that if a person who is elected to become the President, means to qualify himself for being re-elected for a second term, he must step down from office at the conclusion of that term and acquire qualification for re-election as President. If this view is correct, it must inevitably follow that, as a matter of constitutional necessity, there has to be a break in between the completion of the first term of Presidential Office held by a person and his re-election to the same office for a second term.

One of the qualifications for being elected as President postulated by ART. 32 (2) (b) is that the person seeking election to Presidential office must be qualified for election as a member of the National or a Provincial Assembly. In order to determine whether or not a person is so qualified reference will have to be made to ART. 45 which in terms enjoins that among other qualifications the person in question must be qualified for being a voter under ART. 143. And strangely enough, both ARTs. 45 and 143 are subject to the consideration that it is not enough to be so qualified to be a voter; he must not be further disqualified for being a member by the Constitution or Act of Parliament'. [See ARTs. 45(2) and 143 (1) (c)]. And this limitation on a person's qualification to be re-elected as President would at once attract the provisions of ART. 34(2) already referred to above, with the result that as long as he is in office he is not qualified to be re-elected even for a second term.

There is thus no escape from the conclusion that no person can maintain absolute and unqualified continuity between the two terms of his office as President. Some sort of interruption must take place in order that any one who may have completed his first term be at all qualified for re-election. The policy behind these provisions of our Constitution that make this state of things inevitable may well have been to make the election of the President available only to a person, who is not, on the eve of his election, in office as such President—the constitutional provisions that sanction this course may well have been calculated to avoid the possibility of any one in office exploiting the position which a Presidential Office must confer upon him to his advantage, in the matter of influencing the result of re-election in his favour.

The action of impeaching the President "for the violation of the Constitution or gross misconduct" is designed to operate as a brake on the natural disposition, inclination or desire of the person holding office of the President, to act in a high-handed and unconstitutional manner or to otherwise misconduct himself. The procedure for the commencement of impeachment proceedings has been designedly made difficult, in that one-third of the total number of members of the National Assembly must combine to make a request to the Speaker of the Assembly for the commencement of proceedings, and an additional safeguard is that the resolution impeaching the President can only be moved after the expiration of fourteen days from the date on which notice of such resolution is communicated to the President. At the stage of consideration of the charges against him, President has the right to appear and be represented for making his defence, and there has to be a three-fourths majority of the total number of the members of the National Assembly before a declaration that the charges have been substantiated can be constitutionally made.

Purpose of Impeachment.

After the declaration by the National Assembly that the charge has been substantiated, the President "shall vacate his office on the day on which the resolution is passed."

The proceedings-in-impeachment have not to be lightly commenced: there must exist a strong case against the delinquent President before he could be summoned at the bar of National Assembly to answer the charge upon which his impeachment is to be based.

In S. 4 of Article 2 of the Constitution of U.S.A., a provision is made for the impeachment of the President, Vice-President and all civil officers of the United States and the grounds on which impeachment could be made include treason, bribery and other high crimes and misdemeanours. The House of Representatives has the sole power of initiating impeachment [ART. 1, S. 2, cl. (5)], and when the President of the United States is tried, the trial takes place before the Senate, with Chief Justice presiding. Conviction follows a concurrent vote of two-thirds of the members present [ART. 1, S. 3, cl. (6)].

Impeachment
under the U.S.
Constitution.

The persons liable to impeachment under the American Constitution include civil officers of the United States, and it would appear that all officers, excluding Military officers, are liable to impeachment. It would have been wise for the Pakistan Constitution-framers to have made a similar provision in the Constitution so as to have included in it not only the President but all persons holding office in any capacity whatsoever. This is the more so, because the punishment is not merely the removal from office which the person impeached may be holding at the time of his conviction, but it also operates as disqualification for the holding of any public office in future.

The constitutional history of the United States shows that there have been very few impeachments indeed: So far down these 170 years that the U.S. Constitution has endured, only one President has been impeached but he too was acquitted. This was the case in which President Johnson was tried in 1868. It would appear that the utility of the provision relating to impeachment lies in its existence and the resort to it can only be made in very grave and serious cases of dereliction of official duty—for the object is not so much to punish the delinquent holder of the public office as to make an example out of him for the purpose of purifying public life in the country.

55. Types of Executive

Regarded from the point of view of political principle, the "Executive" may be looked at from the following perspective:

(1) Single or Plural Executive—Executive is single or plural according as the final control of it rests with one individual or a plurality of them, as in a Council or Cabinet. The United States Constitution presents a single individual as being the sole repository of its Executive Power and the British System shows that the executive power is vested in an Executive Committee of the House of Commons.

(2) Removable or Irremovable Executive—Parliamentary Executive is removable by the Legislature at any time it loses the confidence of the majority in the House, whereas Presidential Executive is irremovable in the sense that it is appointed for a fixed term. Apart from the question of the proved misbehaviour of American President, he is irremovable from his office for the term of years which is fixed by the Constitution.

The Swiss Constitution makes for a compromise between these two types of Executive and combines the merits of both the systems and avoids their corresponding disadvantages. Under the Swiss Constitution supreme executive power is vested in the Federal Council, which is composed of 7 Members who are elected by the joint session of the two Houses. The following provisions make the constitutional position of Swiss Executive plain.

Swiss Constitu-tion—a compromise between the Removable & Irremovable
Executive.

Mechanisms of Parliamentary Democracy

"ART. 95. The supreme directing and executive authority of the Confederation is exercised by a federal council composed of seven members.

ART. 96. Members of the Federal Council are appointed for four years by the councils in joint session, and are chosen from among all Swiss citizens eligible for the National Council. No more than one member of the Federal Council may, however, be chosen in the same canton.

The Federal Council is completely renewed after every renewal of the National Council.

Vacancies arising during the period of four years are filled at the next meeting of the Federal Assembly, for the remainder of the period of office.

ART. 97. The members of the Federal Council may not, during their term of office, occupy any other position, either in the service of the Confederation or of a canton, or engage in any other calling or profession.

ART. 98. The President of the Confederation shall preside over the Federal Council. A vice-president shall be appointed.

The President of the Confederation and the vice-president of the Federal Council are nominated by the Federal Assembly for one year from amongst members of the council.

An outgoing president cannot be elected president or vice-president for the following year.

The same member cannot occupy the position of vice-president for two consecutive years.

ART. 99. The President of the Confederation and the other members of the Federal Council shall receive an annual salary from the federal treasury.

ART. 100. The Federal Council may not deliberate unless at least four members are present.

ART. 101. Members of the Council have the right to speak, but not to vote, in both divisions of the Assembly, as well as the right of proposing motions on subjects under discussion.

ART. 102. The powers and duties of the Federal Council, within the limits of the present Constitution, are more particularly the following:

- (1) It directs federal business in accordance with the laws and ordinances of the Confederation.
- (2) It insures the observance of the Constitution, the laws and ordinances of the Confederation and the provisions of federal concordats. It takes the necessary measures to this end, of its own accord or upon complaint, in such cases as are not included among those which have to be submitted to the Federal Tribunal in accordance with Article 113.
- (3) It enforces the guarantee of the cantonal constitutions.
- (4) It submits drafts of laws and ordinances to the Federal Assembly and reports upon proposals submitted to it by the councils or the cantons.
- (5) It provides for the execution of the laws and ordinances of the Confederation, the judgments of the Federal Tribunal, and the compromises or arbitral awards upon disputes between cantons.
- (6) It makes such appointments as are not assigned to the Federal Assembly, the Federal Tribunal, or other authority.

Types of Executive

- (7) It examines treaties of the cantons between themselves or with foreign countries, and gives its approval thereto if it thinks fit. [Article 85(5)].
- (8) It watches over the interests of the Confederation abroad, paying particular notice to its international relations, and has general charge of foreign affairs.
- (9) It insures the external security of Switzerland and the maintenance of its independence and neutrality.
- (10) It insures the internal security of Switzerland and the maintenance of tranquillity and order.
- (11) In case of urgency arising when the Federal Assembly is not in session, the Federal Council has authority to raise the necessary troops and dispose of them, provided that it convenes the councils immediately if the number of troops raised exceeds two thousand, or if they remain mobilized for more than three weeks.
- (12) It has charge of federal army affairs and of all the other branches of administration which are vested in the Confederation.
- (13) It examines the laws and ordinances of the cantons which are required to be submitted for its approval; it supervises the branches of cantonal administration which are placed under its control.
- (14) It administers the finances of the Confederation, prepares the budget, and renders accounts of receipts and expenditure.
- (15) It supervises the conduct of business by all officials and servants of the federal administration.
- (16) It gives account of its work to the Federal Assembly in each ordinary session, submits to it a report upon the internal condition and foreign relations of the Confederation, and recommends for consideration such measures as it thinks appropriate for promoting the general welfare.

In addition, it makes special reports whenever the Federal Assembly or either division thereof so requests.

ART. 103. The business of the Federal Council is distributed among its members by departments. Decisions emanate from the Federal Council as a single authority.

Federal legislation may authorize departments, or services in connection therewith, to settle certain affairs themselves, subject to a right of appeal.

The cases in which such appeal may be made to a federal administrative court shall be determined by federal legislation."

It would be seen that there is no provision in the Swiss Constitution which enjoins that the members of the Federal Council must be drawn from the National Council; but in practice the Assembly invariably chooses Federal Councillors from amongst its own members. In order to ensure a fair measure of territorial representation, the Constitution provides against any two Councillors from being elected from any one of the Cantons and not more than five are to be chosen from the German-speaking part of Switzerland. The President is elected by the Federal Assembly annually, and he does not have any special authority conferred upon him by any such status—only he becomes the titular head and performs the ceremonial duties as the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Nation. Thus the Swiss Executive is not responsible to the Legislature, but certainly responsive to its mandates, and that friction, which must exist in an irremovable executive of a Presidential form of Government, is reduced to the barest minimum. Its members have the right to speak, but not to vote in, the Legislature. They can, and they do, initiate legislation.

Comment on Swiss Executive—a wise constitutional solution.

However, if the move sponsored by them fails in the Legislature, they do not entail the liability to resign on that account. The matter is simply dropped. They have no office of the Prime Minister, and in fact the Federal Council need not have a majority support in the Legislature, and its members are frequently drawn from splinter groups with different political programmes represented in the House. They are able to work together because of the 'political sense' with which Swiss, as a people, are richly endowed.

56. Extent of Executive Authority of the Federation and the Federal Units

Before we study the nature of Parliamentary Executive which our Constitution has established for our country, it is necessary to understand the principle upon which the distribution of Executive power between the Federal and Provincial Governments has been made, as also the meaning of expression 'Executive Authority'.

The structure of executive authority of the State of Pakistan, having regard to the federal principle upon which it has been distributed between Federation and Provinces, is as follows :

The executive authority of the Federation is vested in the President, which he has to exercise upon advice of the Ministers, the advice having been declared under ART. 37 as being, except in certain well defined cases, constitutionally binding upon him. This sphere of executive authority is coextensive with the sphere of Federal Legislature to make laws, and its details would be found set forth in the entries that are mentioned in the Federal and the Concurrent Lists of the Fifth Schedule of our Constitution. The executive authority in relation to federal units, that is of the two Provinces, is vested in the Governors acting upon advice of the Provincial Ministers. (See ART. 71 which is analogous to ART. 37). The Governors are to be appointed by the President upon advice, and are to hold office for 5 years from the date they enter upon their office subject of course to President's pleasure (ART. 70). The extent of the executive authority of the Provinces is on par with the competence of the Provincial Legislature to make laws, and a reference to the Provincial and the Concurrent Lists would indicate the subjects in regard to which legislation to the Provinces is permissible (see ART. 73). Of course, items not mentioned in any of the Lists of the V Schedule, which are called "residuary subjects", are to be administered and legislated upon by the Provinces (ART. 109).

As to the relation of the Federation to the Provinces in regard to the concurrent field of administration and legislation, much will be said in the chapter dealing with that subject. Suffice it to say that the provisions governing these relations are contained in Part VI of our Constitution (ARTs. 105 to 119).

57. The Constitutional Scope of 'Executive Authority' under our Constitution.

What are we to understand by the expression 'executive authority' that has been used in the Constitution?

To begin with, it should be noted that the Executive is charged with the duty of executing laws passed by the appropriate Legislature, and, broadly stated, the power to do this would include the power to transact the entire business of the Government. Since there is a rule of law in this country, Executive must act within the permitted range of the authority that is prescribed by the Constitution and the law. The executive action is not above law and must derive its support from law. The two principal functions of the State are : (a) administration of the laws within the State in order to maintain public order and do justice between man and man, and (b) to do all acts necessary to sustain and promote ideals of international community of States. (This in legal phraseology would mean obedience to treaty obligations and implementation of the articles of international conventions to which a given State is a party. All civilized States endeavour to play an honourable role in maintaining international peace, and this is sought to be achieved by securing just relations between the States that compose the international community).

All these functions primarily devolve upon the Executive Organ of the Government. Of course there must be laws to regulate the conduct of the business of Government, if the executive action is to be justified in cases where it conflicts with the rights of the citizens, more particularly in cases where the State action has the effect of exposing the individuals, living within or subject to its jurisdiction, to penalties, or of depriving them of their lives, liberties or properties.

But, in the matters affecting foreign policy, for instance, the Executive has full initiative and, if and when the pursuit of any of its policies brings it in conflict with the organised public opinion, as it articulates itself through the Legislature, there is bound to be a severe criticism of, if not, a motion of no-confidence against, the Government sponsoring it. The result of this can be that the Government may fall. Thus the only sanction to secure conformity of the policy of Government, in relation to its conduct of foreign relations with the politically organised public opinion, is political in character.

From the foregoing account it would be noticed that the 'Executive' is practically indistinguishable from 'Government' and may well be regarded as a sort of short and convenient term within which are to be subsumed all those functions the performance of which is necessary for the carrying on of the business of managing the affairs of the country. It is for this reason that in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 7 p. 187 (3rd Ed.) we find Government described as "the exercise of certain powers and the performance of certain duties by public authorities or officers together with certain private persons or Corporations exercising public functions. The structure of the machinery of government, and the regulation of the power and duties which belong to the different parts of this structure, are defined by the law, which also prescribes to some extent, the mode in which these powers are to be exercised or these duties are to be performed." As to these executive functions we find at p. 192 of the same volume the following: "Executive functions are incapable of comprehensive definition, for they are merely the residue of the functions of Government after legislative and judicial functions have been taken away. They include in addition to the execution of laws, the maintenance of public order, the management of Crown property and nationalised industries and services, the direction of foreign policy, the conduct of military operations and the provision or supervision of such services as education, public health, transport, and state assistance the insurance."

Political scientists also draw a distinction between executive and administrative action. The scope of the executive power, it is said, is wider than that of the mere administrative power—the latter being construed as involving merely the execution of laws and the general administration of the affairs of the Government. The other species of the executive power are :—

- (a) the power to conduct foreign affairs,
- (b) the power to organize armed forces and conduct war,
- (c) the power to summon, prorogue or dissolve the legislature, etc.

But when all is said and done, broadly considered, the administrative power really is the same thing as the executive power of the State. Our Constitution does not seem to make any such distinction, and from the legal stand-point the making of such a distinction, at any rate, does not appear to be necessary or relevant.

Machinery of Govt: Report of Haldane Committee quoted.

58. Rules of Business

The President has the power to make rules for the allocation and transaction of the business of the Federal Government [see ART. 41 (3)]. These rules are technically called Rules of Business, and they provide for the establishment of various ministries and the inter-departmental procedures. The Rules of Business invariably are embodied in a confidential document which is not available to the public, nor can evidence be led in a court of law for showing that a particular administrative action was not taken in accordance with the Rules of Business prescribed by the Government.

In a report submitted by the Machinery of Government Committee, which had been set up in England in 1918, to enquire into the responsibility of the various departments of the Central Executive Government, and to advise in what manner the exercise and distribution by the Government of its functions should be improved, we have furnished to us some instructive observations on the subject of "governmental functions", and the report is relevant for our purposes in Pakistan, since the scheme underlying the functioning of the Secretariat in our country has been borrowed from the English practice.

The Cabinet, according to the Report, "is the main spring of all the mechanism of Government. Its constitution and the methods of its procedure must depend to a large extent on the circumstances of the time, on the personality of the Prime Minister and on the capacities of his principal Colleagues". The main functions of the Cabinet are stated in the report to be the following :—

- (a) the final determination of the policy to be submitted to Parliament;
- (b) the supreme control of the national executive in accordance with the policy prescribed by Parliament; and
- (c) the continuous co-ordination and delimitation of the activities of the several Departments of State.

For the due performance of these functions the following conditions are considered as essential, (or, at least, desirable) :—

- "(i) The Cabinet should be small in number—preferably ten or, at the most, twelve;
- (ii) it should meet frequently;
- (iii) it should be supplied in the most convenient form with all the information and material necessary to enable it to arrive at expeditious decisions;
- (iv) it should make a point of consulting personally all the Ministers whose work is likely to be affected by its decisions; and
- (v) it should have a systematic method of securing that its decisions are effectively carried out by the several Départments concerned."

With regard to the formulation of policy the following remarks were made :—

"12.—We have come to the conclusion that in the sphere of civil government the duty of investigation and thought, as preliminary to action, might with great advantage be more definitely recognised

"14.—(We) urge strongly :—

- (a) that in all Departments better provision should be made for enquiry, research, and reflection before policy is defined and put into operation;
- (b) that for some purposes the necessary research and enquiry should be carried out or supervised by a Department of Government specially charged with these duties, but working in the closest collaboration with the administrative Departments concerned with its activities"

59. Summary Statement of President's Powers

Following are some of the important executive and administrative powers which under the Constitution are to be exercised by the President :—

1. He appoints the Prime Minister in his discretion. He terminates his appointment in his discretion. The Constitution expects him to take these actions upon being of the opinion, in the case of the appointment of a person as Prime Minister, that he is likely to command the confidence of the majority of members in the National Assembly, and, in the case of his dismissal, that the Prime Minister no longer enjoys the confidence of the majority of members in the National Assembly. (ART. 37)

2. He exercises the executive powers of the Federation upon advice which is binding on him [ART. 37(7)]; in the language of the Constitution "the executive authority of the Federation shall vest in the President and shall be exercised by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him, in accordance with the Constitution" [ART. 39(1)]. The executive authority of the Federation extends to all matters with respect to which Parliament has power to make laws [ART. 39(2)]. The executive action of the Government shall be expressed to be taken in the name of the President [ART. 41(1)]. The President shall by rules specify the manner in which orders and other instruments made and executed in his name shall be authenticated. The courts are precluded from questioning the validity of any order or instrument so authenticated on the ground that it was not made or executed by the President.

3. In him is vested the supreme command of the armed forces and the exercise thereof by him shall be regulated by law. Until Parliament makes a provision by law in regard to the exercise of the supreme command of the armed forces vested in the President, he shall have the power to raise and maintain the Naval, Military and Air Forces of Pakistan and Reserves of such forces; to grant commissions in the Army, Navy and Air Forces and to determine their salaries and allowances. It would be noticed that this power is exercisable by him on advice from the relevant Ministers (ART. 40).

4. It is the right of the President to be informed (and corresponding duty of the Prime Minister, to keep the former informed) about the decisions of the Cabinet relating to the administration of the affairs of the Federation and proposals for legislation; to furnish him such information relating to the administration of the affairs of the Federation and proposals for legislation as the former may call for, and, if the President so requires, to submit for the consideration of the Cabinet any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Cabinet. (ART. 42).

5. His power to declare, by a Proclamation, that a grave emergency exists in the country by reason of which the security or economic life of Pakistan or any part thereof is threatened by war or external aggression or by internal disturbances beyond the power of the Provincial Government to control, and while such proclamation is in operation, to have and exercise the powers mentioned in ART. 191. Similarly, he has the power to issue Proclamation on receipt of a report from the Governor of a Province on being satisfied that a situation has arisen in which the Government of the Province cannot be carried on in accordance with the Constitution; to assume to himself or to direct the Governor of the Province to assume on his behalf the powers and functions under ART. 193 of the Constitution. He has also the power to revoke these Proclamations of emergencies (see ART. 195). It may be noted that the validity of any Proclamation issued or order made pursuant to the provisions of Part XI of our Constitution cannot be questioned in any court.

Appointment and dismissal of Prime Minister—in his discretion.

All Federal Executive Authority is vested in the President.

Supreme Command of the Armed Forces.

President's Right to be informed.

Power to issue Proclamations of Emergency

6. The President has the power :
- to appoint Advisory Boards for the Post and Telegraph Department (see ART. 200);
 - to constitute National Economic Council to review the overall economic position of the country, to formulate plans in respect of financial, commercial and economic policies of the Federal and Provincial Governments with a view to ensuring that uniform standards of economic development are attained in all the parts of the country. (ART. 199);
 - to appoint a Commission to investigate the conditions of Schedule Castes and backward classes in Pakistan and make recommendations as to the steps to be taken and the grants to be made by the Federal or Provincial Governments with a view to improving their conditions (see ART. 206);
 - to appoint a Special Officer for Schedule Castes and backward classes in Pakistan who is to report upon the extent to which recommendations of the Commission appointed under ART. 206 are carried out and to report his findings to the President etc. (see ART. 207).
 - to appoint Islamic Law Commission (ART. 198), and to set up Organisation for Islamic Research and Instruction in Advanced Studies (ART. 197).

7. Power of the President to award decorations in recognition of Military or Public services (see ART. 208).

8. The pardoning power of the President conferred on him by the Constitution is in the following terms :

"The President shall have power to grant pardons, reprieves and respites, and to remit, suspend or commute any sentence passed by any court, tribunal or authority established by law." (see ART. 209).

The American Constitution bestows (Section 2 of ART. II) an identical power upon the President in the following terms :

"... he shall have Power to Grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment."

The Governor of a Province has no pardoning power under our Constitution analogous to the power of the Indian Governor of a State (see ART. 161 of the Indian Constitution).

The power given by S. 401 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is in the following terms :

"When any person has been sentenced to punishment for an offence, the Provincial Government may at any time without conditions or upon any conditions which the person sentenced accepts, suspend the execution of his sentence or remit the whole or any part of the punishment to which he has been sentenced."

The same power is vested in Governor-General (now the President) under S. 402-A. Similarly, in S. 402, the Provincial Government and under S. 402-A, the Governor-General (now the President), have the power, without the consent of the person sentenced to commute the sentence from death to transportation or from either to rigorous imprisonment for a stated term etc.

It would thus appear that the power under Criminal Procedure Code strictly relates to the competence of the Provincial Government or the President to remit or to wipe out a sentence pronounced by a criminal Court either unconditionally or upon any conditions which the person affected thereby accepts.

The power to commute under the Criminal Procedure is absolute and unqualified and takes effect regardless of the consent of the person sentenced.

The power of the President, however, under the Constitution is much wider and includes the power to grant pardon, reprieves and respites in addition to the power of remitting, suspending or commuting any sentence passed by any court, tribunal or authority established by law. As to the distinction between commutation and remission, it is sufficient to say that remission is reduction in the quantum of punishment without the character of the punishment being changed. Sentence of death is commuted to one of life-imprisonment whereas a sentence of ten years imprisonment may be reduced to five in which case what has taken place is the remission of a sentence. Reprieve is the temporary postponement of the execution of a sentence imposed by court till such time as the decision either to commute or to remit is taken, or if taken, till such time, as a formal document is drawn up to give effect to the decision. It really means no more and no less than the suspension of the sentence temporarily as a first step towards the goal of exercising the prerogative of mercy.

As to the nature of this pardoning power, reference could usefully be made to a case decided in 1833 by the Supreme Court of the United States (United States v. Wilson 7 Pet page 150). Chief Justice Marshall, speaking on behalf of the Court, found it permissible to understand the nature of this pardoning power by appeal to the English system of jurisprudence and said:

"As this power had been exercised from time immemorial by the executive of that Nation whose language is our language, and to whose judicial institutions ours bear a close resemblance; we adopt their principles respecting the operation and effect of a pardon, and look into their books for the rules prescribing the manner in which it is to be used by the person who would avail himself of it."

He then proceeded to observe:

"A pardon is an act of grace, proceeding from the power intrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual on whom it is bestowed from the punishment the law inflicts for a crime he has committed. It is the private, though official act of the executive magistrate, delivered to the individual for whose benefit it is intended, and not communicated officially to the Court."

Justice Marshall felt that pardon is a deed to the validity of which delivery is essential and delivery is not complete without acceptance. "It may then be rejected by the person to whom it is tendered; and if it be rejected, we have discovered no power in a Court to force it on him." The basis of his reasoning was that "A pardon is a deed, to the validity of which delivery is essential, and delivery is not complete without acceptance." A subsequent decision, however, of the United States Supreme Court, has taken a contrary view and has maintained that the right of the President to commute a sentence of death to one of life-imprisonment cannot be defeated by the obdurate will of the prisoner. The argument in this case was : "A pardon in our days is not a private act of grace from an individual happening to possess power. It is a part of the Constitutional scheme. When granted, it is the determination of the ultimate authority that the public welfare will be better served by inflicting less than what the judgment fixed." [See Biddle v. Perovich, (1927) 274 U.S. 480].

The last mentioned case was decided by no less a jurist of eminence than Holmes J., but he appears to have lost sight of an important distinction that exists between the power of tendering an absolute and unqualified pardon to an offender and the power to commute a sentence inflicted on him; with respect to the first, the assent or acceptance of the pardon is not material, but with respect to the second, where the question involved is that of substituting another kind of punishment for the one sought to be commuted, it goes without saying that a different set of principles would apply. Nobody has a right to inflict upon the convict a type of punishment other than the one inflicted upon him by a court of law, without his consent, although it be, in some sense, a lesser punishment than the one provided by law. This view of Holmes J. has been criticised in an article entitled "Conditional Pardons and the Commutation of Death Sentences" by Mr. Peter Brett, who is a senior Lecturer of Law in the University of Melbourne (see Modern Law Review Vol. 20, p. 131 at p. 141).

This is how the learned author proceeds to deal with the argument of Mr. Holmes:

"I approach the task of criticising the opinion of the great American jurist with the utmost reluctance and diffidence. But I am bound to submit that on this occasion his reasoning is illogical and does not carry conviction. He begins by discussing the nature of the pardoning power, and as we have already seen holds that it is an act of State, not a private act of grace. He then points out, quite rightly, that a prisoner cannot refuse to accept a reduction of a term of imprisonment or of the amount of a fine. But if the prisoner's consent is not necessary in such cases, it is hard to see, he says, how it should become necessary in the case of commutation from death to life-imprisonment, for by common understanding the latter is a less penalty than the former. It would be anomalous to hold that the President may grant a remission of a sentence of imprisonment or a fine but that he is bound 'to permit an execution which he had decided ought not to take place unless the change is agreed to by one who on no sound principle ought to have any voice in what the law should do for the welfare of the whole.' [Biddle v. Perovich, (1927) 274 U.S. 480 at p. 487]. For these reasons, he concluded, the principle of Burdick v. United States (1915) 236 U.S. 79, should not be extended to the present case.

"This is a curious argument. Like his predecessors on the court, the judge begins by analysing the nature of a pardon, and from the results of that analysis he ultimately draws his conclusion. The earlier judges held that a pardon is a private act of grace, which in their view implied a need for its acceptance by the grantee; Holmes holds that it is an act of State, and this in his view carries the indication that the grantee's assent is not required. It is, however, dangerous to reason in this way when dealing with legal problems. In so doing, Holmes was led to overlook the crucial question, which is, does the executive branch of government possess a power to imprison a man for life? Holmes never discussed this question. Instead, he set up a false dilemma—either the President can never pardon, conditionally or unconditionally, without the grantee's consent, or he always can do so. The action of the Supreme Court of Canada (In re Royal Prerogative of Mercy 1933 S.C.R. 269) in refusing to be driven to make a choice between these two extreme positions was, it is submitted, a wise one.

"It would appear that Holmes was prepared to make one qualification to his doctrine that pardons are self-enforcing; a conditional pardon is valid without consent, he says, at any rate when it substitutes a lesser penalty for that imposed by the court. But who is to decide which of the two penalties is the lesser? Is a moderate whipping a lesser penalty than a long term of imprisonment? Is a moderate fine a lesser penalty than a short term? In discussing this problem Holmes refers to the 'common understanding.' He is probably right in saying that most people regard life imprisonment as less than death; though it is strange to find it so unquestioningly assumed, in a country the bulk of whose citizens are at least nominally Christian, that death is the worst of all evils that can befall a man. But what is to be done, in cases of commutation of non-capital sentences, to ascertain the common understanding as to the relative severity of the original and the substituted punishment? Are the judges to act on their own views, on the assumption that these embody the common understanding? Or are they to postpone their decision in order to enable a Gallup poll to be taken?

"In truth, the 'inarticulate major premise' of Holmes J.'s decision is that the President ought to have power to commute death sentences. And to arrive at a decision that the President has such a power he was prepared to overthrow, in fact if not in theory, the earlier decision of the court. We may perhaps forgive him for his action when we reflect that the President's powers in this regard depend on the United States Constitution, which is notoriously difficult to amend. But we must, I submit, express disapproval of his final remarks, quoted above, which seem to suggest that a convicted prisoner is a man without rights, at the mercy of the public welfare. It is unguarded expressions of this kind which have in recent years led extremist critics (from whose views I emphatically dissent) to see in Holmes a man whose opinions were not far removed from those which found favour with Adolf Hitler.

"It is submitted that the law on this matter is quite clear—the Crown has not now, and never has had, the power to substitute a penalty of a different character from that imposed by the court, by means of conditional pardon, unless the prisoner consents to such substitution. Nor has it any power other than that of conditional pardon, by which such a substitution can be made. In saying this we are not, as Holmes thought, committed to holding that all pardons are ineffective without the grantee's consent. The true position in commutation cases is that the prisoner's consent is required, not to the grant of pardon, but to the performance of the conditions without compliance with which the pardon is, in terms, invalid."

With regard to the effect of a pardon, it is by now well established that "it reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offence and the guilt of the offender, and when the pardon is full it releases the punishment and blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of law the offender is as innocent as if he has never committed the offence". [see the case of Ex Parte Garland (1867) reported in 4 Wall p. 333]. This was a case in which one Garland who had received from President Johnson a full pardon for all offences committed by him during the Civil War—arising from his participation direct or implied in the rebellion—found himself confronted with a limitation on his right to practise in a Federal Court imposed by an Act of the Congress passed in the year 1865. This Act had laid down, in effect, that before any person could be permitted to practise in a Federal Court he must swear upon oath that he had never voluntarily borne arms against the United States nor had given aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States. The question before the Court was whether the pardon given by the President had the effect in it indirectly of annulling the limitation imposed by this Act of Congress upon the right to practise in Federal Court on the part of one who had admittedly taken part in the Civil War. The decision turned on the interpretation of the effect of the pardoning power reserved by the Constitution to the President, as opposed to the denial of a right to practise mentioned in an Act of the Congress; and the decision in the case was that the pardon with which Garland had been armed, entitled him to all the privileges of a full citizen and had the effect in it of removing all the disabilities that normally should have attached to him under the law, had the pardoning power of the President not been exercised in his favour.

Although, therefore, our Constitution does not expressly provide for the pardoning power of the President being effective, irrespective of the will of the person pardoned, it must follow that, any order passed by the President under ART. 209 would take effect regardless of the consent of the person affected thereby. The order granting pardon, if it is properly worded, will have the effect in it of removing all stigma on the person in whose favour it is exercised, with the result that in the eye of law he would be deemed to be a person who had neither been prosecuted nor punished for the offence in respect of which the pardon had been extended to him.

Effect of
pardon.

9. President's power to administer Federal Capital (see ART. 211).
10. The power of the President to constitute Election Commissions or Delimitation Commissions is exercisable by him in his discretion (see ARTs. 137 and 142).
11. Power to appoint and dismiss or recall Provincial Governors and to deal with Provincial Administration in cases that are reported by the Governors for action. (See ARTs. 70 & 193).
12. Power to appoint
 - (a) The Judges of the Supreme and the High Courts (see ARTs. 149 and 166).
 - (b) Comptroller and Auditor-General of Pakistan (see ART. 120).
 - (c) Members of the Pakistan Public Services Commission (see ART. 186). This power is exercised by the President in his discretion (see ART. 186).
 - (d) Attorney-General (see ART. 38).

A general Review of the Nature of Presidential Authority.

We have reviewed so far the powers which are exercisable by the President under the Constitution, and we have indicated earlier that although the Constitution refers to these powers as powers of the President, in fact, by reason of a clear injunction of the Constitution contained in 7th clause of ART. 37, they are the powers of Cabinet for, in the exercise of these functions, the President shall act in accordance with the advice of the Cabinet or appropriate Minister, or Minister of State, as the case may be, except in cases where he is empowered by the Constitution to act in his discretion and except as respects the exercise of this power under clause (6) of the same Article, namely, the power of terminating his pleasure during the continuance of which the Prime Minister holds office and the Constitution directs that this termination of his pleasure will not take place arbitrarily but is contingent upon his satisfaction that the Prime Minister does not command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly. Of this situation he is the sole judge and the only restraint on the possible abuse of this abnormal power is his conscience, and his loyalty to the oath of his office.

Quite apart from the fact that the power of appointing and removing the Prime Minister is by itself a power of considerable political importance, the normal exercise of Executive power by the President must be exercised by him under ministerial advice which has been declared, except in matters specifically provided for in the Constitution, as being binding on him. [See ART. 37(7)].

The Constitutional position in England.

The binding value of ministerial advice can also be seen in the conventions of the English Constitution which prescribe that the Crown cannot act except upon advice of his Ministers and, as a careful study of the constitutional history of modern Britain will show, for the last two hundred years or so the Crown has, as a matter of fact, acted only upon advice in the matter of taking such important decisions as the dismissal of Government or the dissolution of Parliament.

By thus surrendering itself at the altar of the advice of his Ministers in the matter of exercising its prerogative, the Crown has withdrawn itself from the pale of political controversies in which it is liable to be involved in case there is no responsible Minister upon whose advice the course that the Crown might wish to take could be justified.

There may be situations in which, however, the prerogative of the Crown may have to be exercised contrary to or in the absence of advice and should such a situation arise, the crown could act on its own and its action would be perfectly legal. However, the existence of Crown initiative in the exercise of this prerogative power by itself ensures the orderly working of parliamentary System of Government.

As a matter of law the power of the Crown to dismiss a Government or to dissolve the House is unlimited and though, as a matter of fact, the Crown has down these last two hundred years disdained to exercise this power, the power to do so exists and is available for exercise should appropriate situation ever arise for the Crown to act for the good of the country. Due to the non-exercise of this personal power or authority by the occupants of the Throne of England, the foundations of constitutional monarchy in England have been strengthened, and increasingly the Crown has tended to become a venerable symbol and an invaluable safeguard for the continuity of the constitutional processes in England.

The framers of our Constitution have, for reasons that are totally irrelevant from the point of view of the analytic study of the provisions of our Constitution, reduced this indefinable sort of convention of the English Constitution to the form of an express statutory proposition. But the impact of the existence of this provision on the fabric of the rest of the Constitution has not, so it seems to the present writer, been fully realised by the Framers of our Constitution. Should, however, the President act despite, or apart from, or in the absence of advice in the sphere of the constitutional power vested in him in cases where he is bound to take advice, there is nothing that the courts of law can do about it for "the question whether any, and if so what, advice has been tendered by the Cabinet or a Minister or a Minister of State shall not be enquired into in any court" [ART. 37(2)]. The saving is prima facie sufficiently comprehensive not only to put a mantle of secrecy for the purposes of court proceedings over the content of the advice but even over the factum of any advice at all having been tendered: the court of law is thus constitutionally prohibited from prying into this affair.

The only sanction which must be presumed to operate upon the President to submit to ministerial advice is the fear that in the event of his violating the Constitution he may be summoned at the Bar of the Legislature for being impeached. But this fear in the world of political intrigues that are incidental to the game of power-politics, is not, after all, such an effective brake upon the designs of an irresponsible President.

In England, of course, the necessity to obtain advice is practically unavoidable, for many actions in the matter of exercising Crown Prerogatives cannot even be initiated except by the acquiescence of the Ministers. For example, for a dissolution to be ordered in England there must issue an Order-in-Council and it is the Lord President who must accept the responsibility for summoning the Council. Similarly, a proclamation to that effect as also the writs of summons for the meeting of Parliament under the Great Seal must issue and it is the Lord Chancellor who must accept responsibility for same. (See Keith's British Cabinet System, p. 297). That is why it is said that a King in England cannot directly bring about a dissolution without advice, and if the Ministers refuse to give such advice, he cannot do more than dismiss them but then, he should get some other Ministers in their place who must take the responsibility of advising him accordingly.

There is, however, no such safeguard so far as our Constitution is concerned: for an instrument declaring that Government have taken a certain decision to be constitutionally valid, it is not necessary that it should bear the counter-signature of the relevant Minister, and under ART. 41 all executive actions of the Federal Government "shall be expressed to be taken in the name of the President." There is thus no constitutional requirement that for any decisions to be valid the same must be taken under a seal or sanction of a Minister who is responsible to Parliament and through it to the people. Besides, the President is not amenable to court for anything done in his official capacity. It is, therefore, clear that the disregard of ART. 37(7) by the President can only be dealt with outside the judicial forum—presumably, in the legislative chamber during impeachment proceedings against the President.

Ministerial Advice binding under ART.37 (7) of Constitution.

Sanction for the violation of ART. 37 (7) is not legal—but political.

60. The President, the Prime Minister and the Cabinet

ART. 37 is a self-contained Code which tells us all the Constitution has to say about :—

- (a) the Cabinet,
- (b) the position of the Prime Minister who is to be its Head;

(c) the choice or the selection of the Prime Minister by the President, the change of the Prime Minister when he, in the opinion of the President, "no longer commands the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly", in short the power of the President in the matter of choosing and dismissing the Prime Minister, and finally

(d) the relationship that the personnel of the Cabinet sustains to the National Assembly whose members they have to be and to which they owe responsibility and on whose continued goodwill their very survival as ministers, in the last resort, depends.

With the possible exception of ARTs. 22 and 170, which mention the powers of the Superior Courts in this country, like the Supreme and High Courts "to issue high prerogative writs" and enforce other remedies provided therein, there is no other Article of comparable importance in the whole Constitution of Pakistan. It is necessary, therefore, that the Article be appreciated in that perspective: the Article, as has been remarked above, enunciates the relationship which is to subsist between the President, the Prime Minister and the Parliament. A few words by way of preface, however, are necessary to throw the substance of this Article into bold relief.

It was Walter Bagehot who was the first constitutional analyst to point out the important role that Cabinet plays in the management of political affairs in England. He found in the English Cabinet that connecting link between the executive and the Legislature in which lay that efficient secret of the English Constitution on which he has expatiated a great deal: Cabinet, says he, shows the close union, the complete fusion of the Executive and Legislative Powers of Government. He characterised Cabinet as the knuckle-joint of the Constitution. In the same strain, Mr. Gladstone describes the Cabinet:

"Like a stout buffer-spring it receives all shocks, and within it their opposing elements neutralise one another. It is perhaps the most curious formation in the political world of modern times, not for its dignity, but for its subtlety, its elasticity and its many-sided diversity of power . . . it lives and acts simply by understanding, without a single line of written law or constitution to determine its relation to the monarch, or to the Parliament, or to the nation; or the relations of its members to one another or to their head."

Prime Minister is the pivot of the whole system of Parliamentary Government.

As a leader of the majority party in the Legislature he is responsible for much of what the Legislature does by way of making laws or in the matter of exerting financial control over the administration of the country. And as the Captain of the Cabinet he is responsible for taking important political decisions affecting the country. He, in short, is the Head of what Bagehot would term the efficient part of the executive. Sir Ivor Jennings in his book "Cabinet Government" characterises him as the keystone of the arch of the constitution. He is in our Constitutional System the link between the Cabinet and the President on the one hand and the Cabinet and the Legislature on the other.

Prime Minister has to be keenly responsive to the public opinion as it manifests itself in the party alignments in the Legislature, and he is by his personality and initiative to provide creative leadership to the Nation. In no single person does the Constitution of our country vest so much power and, therefore, responsibility as it does in the Prime Minister. He is the Leader of the House, Captain of the Cabinet and man at the wheel of the ship of the State. In fact, prestige and influence of the office of the Prime Minister depend so much on his personality that virtually it is the man and not the office that ultimately becomes decisive in the conduct of the affairs of the country's administration. In the words of Harold J. Laski, "Obviously indeed, the office of Prime Minister varies enormously in the character of the man who holds it."

If the Prime Minister has the support of the Parliament he can virtually enjoy the powers of a Dictator. He derives his strength from the Legislature. If for any reason he gets involved in a situation in which the majority in the House does not give him the support that he needs in order to give a lead in matters affecting public administration, no matter what his policy and programme be, he cannot be effective. It is no doubt true that his resourcefulness, his mastery of the details of the administration, his capacity to place crucial issues confronting the Government before the public in a telling, clear-cut and forceful manner, will stand him in good stead and will enable him to secure the support of his party and the confidence of the people at large outside the House. But it should not be forgotten that in the world of power-politics, personal ambitions of his scheming colleagues, as even the designs of those who constitute the "official opposition", are some out of the many factors which he must always be ready to reckon with and be perpetually vigilant about. He should have the capacity to sense the least treachery in the political atmosphere. His ear should be on the ground. He must know how to re-act to the pulse beat of the body-politic. He should be imaginative enough to design decisive action for combating political mischief. Above all he must have the courage to take prompt decisions—before others take the decision to replace him.

In these days, when the means of disseminating one's views, thanks to the advancement of modern science, are so effective, it is possible for a wise leader to put across without much difficulty his point of view to the teeming millions: the press, the wireless, the television and such other media of audio-visual publicity are capable of being used as serviceable weapons for counteracting any adverse political move that should come from any quarter.

The Prime Minister in this age of democracy should learn to look at the public questions as they present themselves to the ordinary man-in-the-street. And if he is satisfied that the man in the street should look at these problems in the way in which, consistently with the interest of the country, they ought to be looked at, he should have the tact, the talent and the tenacity to work up the mass emotion in support of his viewpoint. Because he is the Leader he must learn to follow the direction which public opinion might give in relation to the decision of those political questions that are confronting his government. But this is not to say that he must slavishly submit to the demands of the opinion of the vulgar. For to do that would mean substitution of Mobo-cracy for the Rule by the Democratic method. Democracy requires creative leadership and the Prime Minister must supply that leadership.

The management of the Party is the most important task which falls to the lot of the Prime Minister. It is not only during the electioneering campaign that his powers of conducting party propaganda are sorely tested. He is throughout the term of his office to keep the party well in hand. For

" . . . in the last resort", says Sir Ivor Jennings, "his power depends upon his party. For he goes to the country not as an individual but as the leader of his party. His personal prestige is one of the elements that make for party cohesion. Loyalty is one of the political virtues. His prestige is, too, one of the elements that make for party success. But, without his party, he is nothing." (p. 186 Cabinet Government Cambridge 1951 Ed.)

After reviewing the capacities and talents of the seventeen British Prime Ministers who have held office during the last one hundred years, Sir Ivor Jennings in his book on Cabinet Government sums up the main qualities and points out the factors that make for a successful Prime Minister in a Parliamentary Democracy:

"It will be seen from this examination of the methods of our Prime Ministers that much depends on the personality of the man himself, the support that he enjoys in his Cabinet, the personalities of the other members of the Cabinet, the strength of its party in the House of Commons and the country, and the political conditions of the time. Given a solid party backing and confidence among party leaders, a Prime Minister wields an authority that a Roman Emperor might envy or a modern dictator strive in vain to emulate . . ." (pp. 182, 183 Cabinet Government Cambridge 1951 Ed.)

What is the relationship of the Prime Minister to his colleagues in the Cabinet?

To begin with, he is the First amongst equals, primus inter pares. He is the centre around whom the entire constellation of Cabinet revolves and it is by the elixir of his personality that Cabinet team works as one and an indivisible whole. He can insist at any time upon the resignation of any of his colleagues and bring in any other member in his place—provided always that he retains such influential colleagues in his Cabinet as are able to secure him the majority support he needs in the Legislature.

Prime Minister
and his "Cabinet Colleagues."

Collective Responsibility of the Cabinet.

Under our Constitution the Cabinet is collectively responsible to the National Assembly for what it does and no Minister can arrogate to himself the pretence of being in disagreement with the policy of his Cabinet Colleagues; for, the moment he gives expression to a conflicting viewpoint he, by that very act, creates a situation in which that collective responsibility which Constitution enjoins upon the Cabinet is at an end. Of course, a Cabinet Minister is entitled during the course of discussions in the Cabinet Meetings (which are, be it noted, held in camera and the proceedings whereof are not available either to the public or to the Press and so much is the secrecy of Cabinet discussion important that any violation of the Cabinet secret would be an offence under the Official Secrets Act), he is free to express his viewpoint even though he be in the minority of one. He must, to begin with, endeavour to secure agreement of his colleagues by persuasion. But if he fails to carry his Cabinet colleagues with himself he must accept the decision in good grace and fall in line with the Cabinet mandate. Of course, if the issue before the Cabinet is of such an importance that he cannot, consistently with his loyalty to the country, lend to it his support, it is his duty to resign and place before the country the reasons that have prompted him to withdraw from the Cabinet.

In short, the collective responsibility of the Cabinet implicates a Cabinet Minister in all the decisions taken therein, and if he does not resign he has no right afterwards to say, "I agreed in one case to a compromise while in another I was persuaded by my colleagues."

Lord Morley in his Life of Walpole stated the implications of this doctrine of 'Collective Responsibility of the Cabinet' in words that have become classical :—

Morley on Collective Responsibility
of the Cabinet.

"As a general rule every important piece of departmental policy is taken to commit the entire Cabinet and its members stand or fall together. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may be driven from office to office by a bad dispatch from the foreign office and an excellent Home Secretary may suffer for the blunders of a stupid Minister of War. The Cabinet is a unit—a unit as regards the Sovereign and a unit as regards the Legislature. Its views are laid before the Sovereign as if they were the views of one man. It gives its advice as a single whole, both in royal closet and in the hereditary or representative Chambers . . . The first mark of the Cabinet, as that institution is now understood, is united and indivisible responsibility."

The Cabinet thus must stand united as though it were one individual. A Cabinet, like a house divided against itself, cannot stand for long. Every Minister is pledged to maintain the solidarity of the Cabinet and the secrecy of its proceedings and decisions.

The Government of India Act, 1935, did not use the word Cabinet in its Ninth Section: it, instead, used the expression, "Council of Ministers to aid and advise the Governor-General in the discharge of his functions". The framers of the Indian Constitution have retained this expression [See ART. 75(3), which says, "The Council of Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the House of the People"]. But even there, the fact remains that collective responsibility is enjoined by the Indian Constitution and the expression "Council of Ministers" virtually becomes synonymous with, if not indistinguishable from, the "Cabinet".

Position
under the Govt. of India
Art 35

There is yet another aspect of the doctrine of collective responsibility which needs some explanation. Here, of course, the emphasis is on the word responsibility, rather than on collective.

Meaning of
"Collective Cabinet Responsibility"

A government is bound to resign in case there is a vote of 'no confidence' passed against it in the House, or while introducing or piloting a Bill as a party measure, it finds that the Bill is thrown out. Sometimes the Bill, or what might be called 'proposed measure', is deliberately, at the time of its introduction in the Legislature, described as being one with respect to which every member of the House is free, regardless of his party loyalty, to vote as he likes. In such a case, the rejection of the proposed measure by the House does not amount to a declaration by the House that the Government have lost its confidence.

As a matter of practice, however, it has been observed that in all Parliamentary Democracies, rejection of every and any measure sponsored by the Cabinet does not entail any necessity for it to resign; for much depends on the nature of the issue that is presented in the proposed measure. If the Bill is vital or of substantial importance, in that, let us say, it contains a measure without which Government cannot hope to carry on its duty of administering the Country, it must follow, in such a case, that the Government ought to resign. Sometimes again there is, what is called a snap vote decision, which goes against the Government. But in such cases it cannot be said that the Government is duty bound to resign. It might be that due to lack of vigilance by the party whips or due to the neglect of individual party members to be present in the House, the Bill has not had the majority support in the House, but that situation cannot be construed to mean that Government has lost the majority support in the House. In these circumstances, the Government is entitled to ask for a resolution of confidence being passed by the House, and if it has a majority in the House it will have no difficulty in securing a declaration to that effect in its favour.

When the Government resigns it resigns as a whole and the resignation of the Prime Minister is construed as a resignation for and on behalf of the whole of the Cabinet.

But the doctrine of 'collective responsibility' is not one of universal application. There are Constitutions which also provide for "individual responsibility" of a Minister. A reference to ART. 48 of the French Constitution of 1946 in this context would appear to be instructive. It provides, "The Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the National Assembly for the general policy of the Cabinet and individually responsible for their personal actions. They shall not be responsible to the Council of the Republic". It thus combines individual and collective responsibility of the Ministers in, of course, diverse spheres of

Doctrine of Collective Responsibility and the French
Constitution

their public life, i.e. sphere of the policy of the entire Cabinet and the sphere of individual responsibility for personal actions. It is quite conceivable then that in French National Assembly there can be moved a vote of 'no confidence' in an individual Minister, provided it is sought to be substantiated on the basis of personal misconduct of an individual Minister. In ART. 50, again, some safeguards are provided before the motion of censure by French National Assembly can automatically result in the collective resignation of the Cabinet. These safeguards include the following :—

- (1) The motion of censure cannot be taken until one full day after it has been made.
- (2) It must be taken by a roll call.
- (3) It can be adopted only if there is a support for it from an absolute majority of the Deputies in the Assembly.

Under ART. 49 of the French Constitution, the Government, i.e. the Council of Ministers, can ask for a vote of confidence which can only be put in through the President of the Council. Such a vote is subject to the same limitations as a vote on motion of censure, namely :—

- (a) that one day must elapse after it has been put before the Assembly;
- (b) it has to be taken by roll-call, and
- (c) the vote can be refused only by absolute majority of the Deputies in that Assembly.

When the refusal takes place after compliance with these conditions it results automatically in the collective resignation of the Cabinet.

These provisions, it would appear, are calculated to minimise the possibility of the proverbial frequency with which the French Cabinets fall.

With regard to the oath of secrecy, which a Cabinet Minister has to take before he enters upon the duties of his office, the Indian Constitution makes an express provision in clause (4) of ART. 75, and provides in its Third Schedule the form of the oath which he is required to take. There is no parallel provision in our Constitution, and it is presumed that the oath of secrecy will continue to be administered under the provisions of the Official Secrets Act, much in the manner in which such oath used to be taken in the pre-Constitution days under the Government established by the Government of India Act, 1935.

Over and above the Ministers who have, what is called Cabinet rank, our Constitution recognises the office of the Ministers of State and the Deputy Ministers. It is not clear whether the Minister of State or Deputy Minister is a member of the Cabinet, but having regard to the ordinary usage, Cabinet may be regarded as being composed of full fledged Ministers, and the Ministers of State and Deputy Ministers taken along with other members of the Cabinet may be said to form the Ministry. Ministry is wider than Cabinet. If this opinion is correct, the title to ART. 37 should have been "Ministry" and not "Cabinet". Having regard to clause (2) of ART. 37, it is the Cabinet, or a Minister, or Minister of State whose advice, if tendered to the President, shall not be enquired into in any court. From this it is possible to infer that a Deputy Minister cannot directly advise the President but a Minister of State can; and yet curiously enough clause (1) of ART. 37 talks of 'Cabinet of Ministers with the Prime Minister as its head': in other words it expressly excludes Minister of State from being considered as Cabinet Minister. Similarly clause (5) mentions that the Cabinet together with the Minister of State shall be collectively responsible to the National Assembly, obviously implying thereby that Cabinet consists of full fledged Ministers and yet, curiously enough, the collective responsibility is predicated not only of the Cabinet Ministers but also in respect of Cabinet plus the Ministers of State. It is difficult to comprehend why a Minister of State was included in the group of Cabinet Ministers (that is

Minister's Oath of Secrecy.

Ministers of State and Deputy Ministers.

Ministers sitting in the Cabinet) as being collectively responsible to the National Assembly.

The Minister of State and the Deputy Minister must, at all times, be members of the National Assembly when such Assembly is in existence. [See ART. 37(4)]. It is only the Ministers of the Cabinet who could be appointed as such Ministers for six months even though they are not, at the time of their appointment, Members of the National Assembly. [See ART. 37(8)]. But when the appointments of Prime Minister, Minister of State or Deputy Minister come to be made at the time when the National Assembly is non-existent, the position is governed by ART. 37(9). ART. 37(9) says :

"Nothing in this Article shall be construed as disqualifying the Prime Minister or any other Minister, or a Minister of State or Deputy Minister, for continuing in office during any period during which the National Assembly stands dissolved, or as preventing the appointment of any person as Prime Minister or other Minister, or as Minister of State or Deputy Minister, during any such period."

Clause (9) thus talks of certain persons not being disqualified for continuing in office during any length of time when the National Assembly stands dissolved, or preventing the President or the Prime Minister, as the case may be, from making or advising the appointment of any person to the office of Prime Minister, Minister of State or Deputy Minister during any such period. The net result is that when National Assembly has been dissolved Prime Minister, Minister of State and Deputy Minister can continue being in office, or can be appointed during that period.

The question that arises for consideration is, whether the President would be justified in appointing some one as the Prime Minister after the dissolution of the Legislature in place of one who was Prime Minister on the eve of dissolution and who, by reason of what is contained in ART. 37(9) is not disqualified for continuing in office during such period as the Assembly stands dissolved. The only situation in which this would be done would be when the Prime Minister has fallen ill and cannot carry on his duties, or resigns or dies. The only limitation that is removed by clause (9) of ART. 37 is that any person can, despite Art 37 (3), during the period when the Assembly has been dissolved, be appointed as the Prime Minister. This, however, does not mean that the President will have, in such a situation, the power to dismiss the Prime Minister in his discretion. This is because the basis of his action of dismissal, namely that in his opinion the Prime Minister no longer enjoys the support of the majority of members in the House, would be unavailable: it would be, in effect, a conclusion which he cannot validly reach if the House itself is not in existence. ART. 37(9) over-rides other clauses of ART. 37 only in so far as they are inconsistent with the question of appointment of Prime Minister, Deputy Minister or Ministers of State, and it cannot be regarded as, by any means, widening the power of the President to dismiss the Prime Minister when the House itself is dissolved and of appointing another at his sweet will and pleasure. That power remains subject to the fetters imposed upon it by the 6th clause of ART. 37. The power of dismissal is a specific power, available to the President in certain specified circumstances and there is nothing in ART. 37(9) which derogates from that power—so that to the extent of conflict, the content of the proviso—and 9th clause is a Proviso—should prevail. The possible argument viz. that by reason of an unfettered power having been vested in the President to appoint any one during the period of dissolution of the National Assembly as Prime Minister, the Constitution might be construed as indirectly giving him a power to displace the Prime Minister, who has advised dissolution, by the very act of making an appointment in his place, would appear to be misconceived in so much as the dissolution being in itself in the nature of an appeal to the political sovereign, the Prime Minister who advised dissolution would be denied his right to appeal to the people in case he be removed by another nominee of the President.

Can President appoint a Prime Minister during the period when Assembly is dissolved.

This consideration would seem also to govern the case of dissolution of the House by reason of efflux of time. The Prime Minister, who, after the dissolution of the Assembly, becomes the Captain of care-taker Government is not disqualified from continuing as such Prime Minister, and any indirect method of replacing him by another nominee of the President would be unconstitutional, for the simple reason that such an appointment under the power given by ART. 37(9) would itself be bereft of a democratic basis—for how shall the President at all decide to appoint such a person—and on what consideration?

61. Dismissal of Cabinet and Cabinet Ministers and their Resignations

The English Practice upon the question of dissolution.

In England the Crown in the exercise of its prerogative power can dismiss the Cabinet or any one of the Cabinet Ministers, but in actual practice the power to remove an individual Minister is now exercised by the Prime Minister who in the case of any of his colleagues, on being convinced that his continuance in office is not in the interest of the country, may ask him to resign—in which case, the Minister is duty bound to resign.

Position under our Constitution.

Under our Constitution it would appear that Ministers, Ministers of State and Deputy Ministers shall be appointed and removed from the office by the President on advice. [See ART. 37(4)]. Thus, virtually, it is the Prime Minister's advice which is constitutionally binding upon the President in the matter of appointment of Cabinet Ministers, Ministers of State and Deputy Minister.

The Cabinet Ministers can resign their office under a writing addressed to Prime Minister who would then advise the President to accept the same. There is no provision under our Constitution for the right of the Minister to resign but it is to be presumed that he is entitled to resign whenever he feels inclined to do so.

Every Government must resign immediately after the general election in case it is not able to secure the support of majority of the members of the new Parliament. It is not necessary for it to wait till the actual meeting of the Legislature if the results at the poll establish that result. It must also resign after its Parliamentary defeat. Of course, the defeated Government must carry on till the Leader of the Opposition is called upon to take over the duties of the Government and form a Cabinet. If the official Opposition succeeds in defeating the Government and thus bringing about its resignation, it is its duty to provide alternative Government or to advise the President as to the alternative course of conduct that should be pursued in order to secure the formation of alternative Ministry. Similarly the Prime Minister by his resignation can precipitate a situation in which the Government is automatically thrown out of office: this can happen even though, as a matter of fact, the Prime Minister enjoys the confidence of the majority members in the Legislature. His resignation ipso facto has the effect of dissolving the Cabinet.

Caretaker Governments.

Sometimes it becomes necessary for some one to form a Government till such time as the House may be reconstituted after its dissolution or after the completion of the period of its office. Such Governments are called "Caretaker Governments", and it is expected of such Governments that they should not initiate any important policies or make commitments of a broad and sweeping nature during the period they have undertaken to take care of the affairs of the Government. Invariably, the Prime Minister in office at the time of the dissolution of the Legislature or the termination of its constitutional life, carries on the administration of the Country as Head of the Caretaker Government.

62. Role of the President Vis-a-Vis Legislature

The study of the Constitutional relationship which the President, as the repository of Executive Power, sustains with the Legislature, can be studied under the following scheme :—

- (a) His power to give or withhold assent to the bills duly passed by the National Assembly or to return certain bills. (ART. 57).
- (b) His power to address National Assembly or to send messages to it. (ART. 52).
- (c) His power to appoint Election Commission and Delimitation Committee for constituting Legislative Bodies, that is, the National and Provincial Assemblies. (ART. 137 (2) and 142(2)).
- (d) His power to summon, prorogue or dissolve the National Assembly. (ART. 50).

63. President's Power to give or withhold assent to bills and his power to return certain bills.

In the first place, under ART. 57, when the Bill has been passed by the National Assembly it shall be presented to the President who shall within 90 days :—

- (a) assent to the Bill; or
- (b) declare that he withholds his assent therefrom; or
- (c) in the case of a Bill, other than the Money Bill, return the Bill to the Assembly with a message requesting that the Bill, or any specified provision thereof, be reconsidered, and that any amendments specified by him in the message be considered.

Upon the assent being withheld as in (b) above, the National Assembly may reconsider the Bill and it may pass the same with or without amendments but this time, the requirement of the Constitution is that the Bill can only be passed by votes of not less than 2/3rds of the members present and voting. When this happens the President is bound to give his assent to the Bill (ART. 57 (2)).

The procedure, in the event of the President returning the Bill to the National Assembly, is somewhat different in that, if the same is passed by majority of the total members of the Assembly, the President is bound to give his assent thereto.

It would thus appear that with the sole exception of Money Bills the President has the right of qualified veto; he can overrule the majority, and by declaring that he withholds the assent, he puts the National Assembly to the necessity of giving to the Bill a support of two-thirds of the members present and voting, and in the event of the bill being returned a support of majority of the total members of the Assembly (i.e. not a simple majority of the persons present and voting but an absolute majority, i.e. more than half of the total strength of the National Assembly) before it can become law.

It should be noted that President can return a Bill, or withhold assent only upon advice: in other words, the power of the President to veto the Legislation is really the power of the Cabinet. This is then how Executive can control the fate of legislation in the National Assembly.

In England, once the bill is passed by the Parliament the King assents to it as a matter of course. This he does in obedience to the conventions of the English Constitutional practice. He does not withhold the assent or return the bill thereby creating a situation under which extraordinary majority of the Parliament should support the measure before it can become a law. In law, however, the Crown in England in the exercise of its prerogative can veto the legislation. But this power has become obsolete ever since 1707. "The necessity of refusing the Royal assent", says E. May, "is removed by the strict observance of the constitutional principle, that the Crown has no will but that of its Ministers, who only continue to serve in that capacity so long as they retain the Confidence of Parliament." (See His Par. Practice p. 569, 15 Ed.). It is the Cabinet which tackles the problem of

ART. 57.

Veto-Power—
The Position
in England.

securing the passage of appropriate legislation in the Parliament. The relations between the two Houses of Parliament in the matter of passing the legislation are to-day controlled by the Parliament Act of 1911 as amended in 1949. The Royal assent would be given as a matter of course once the measure is passed by the Parliament and the exercise of the Prerogative of the Crown to veto the measure although legal would be unconstitutional.

In India the position is governed by ART. 111, which provides as follows :—

"When a Bill has been passed by the Houses of Parliament, it shall be presented to the President, and the President shall declare either that he assents to the Bill, or that he withholds assent therefrom :

Provided that the President may, as soon as possible, after the presentation to him of a Bill for assent, return the Bill if it is not a money Bill to the Houses with a message requesting that they will reconsider the Bill or any specified provisions thereof and, in particular, will consider the desirability of introducing any such amendments as he may recommend in his message, and when a Bill is so returned, the House shall reconsider the Bill accordingly, and if the Bill is passed again by the Houses with or without amendment and presented to the President for assent, the President shall not withhold assent therefrom."

It would be noticed that although the power to withhold assent from a Bill passed by the two Houses of Parliament is given to the President, should he be so advised as to return the Bill, the Parliament can compel him to give the assent by passing the Bill a second time by ordinary majority. Thus the veto-power of the Indian President is absolute and not qualified one as that of our President—but if he should choose to return the Bill and the same is passed by the Parliament he has not then the power to withhold assent therefrom. No time-limit is prescribed in the Indian Constitution within which the President must act, that is either declare that he gives assent or withholds it. He can keep the Bill in a state of suspended animation and for his consideration for as long a period as he likes. This is his Pocket-veto.

In the United States the President, who represents the executive power of that State, has a power of veto given to him under Para 2 of s.7 of ART. 1, of the Constitution :—

"Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by *Yea*s and Nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevents its return, in which case it shall not be a law."

The analysis of this section shall show that when the Bill is presented to the President :—

- (a) if he approves it he shall sign it,
- (b) If he does not approve it he shall return it with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated who will then reconsider it,

(c) if after reconsideration, two-thirds of that House pass the Bill it shall be sent together with the President's objections to the other House,

(d) after it is reconsidered by the other House and if approved by the two-thirds of the House it shall become law,

(e) if, however, the Bill is not returned by the President within ten days, Sundays excepted, after it shall have been presented to him, it shall become law in the manner as if he had signed it unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

In ART. 36 of the Constitution of the Fourth French Republic, we have the following :—

"The President of the Republic shall promulgate the laws within 10 days after the text, as finally adopted, has been sent to the Government. This interval may be reduced to 5 days if the National Assembly declares an emergency.

Within the time limit fixed for promulgation of a law, the President of the Republic may, in a message, stating his reasons, ask that it be reconsidered by both Chambers; this reconsideration may not be refused.

If the President of the Republic does not promulgate a law within the time limit fixed by the present Constitution, the President of the National Assembly shall promulgate it."

It would be noticed that the French Constitution provides that the President shall promulgate the law within ten days, after its text, as finally adopted, has been sent to the Government, and within this time-limit, which can further be reduced, if National Assembly declares an emergency, to five days, the President of the Republic in a message, stating his reasons, may ask that it may be reconsidered. When this request is received the reconsideration would take place, but if the President of the Republic does not promulgate the law within the time-limit fixed by the Constitution, the President of the National Assembly shall promulgate it. The only power, therefore, the President has is what may be called power of 'suspensory veto' for ten days, but if the Parliament upon reconsideration passes the Bill, the President must promulgate it.

Under ART. 58 of the Constitution of Burma, the President is obliged to sign every Bill passed by the two Chambers of Parliament. He has no option in the matter. He can, however, withhold his signature only for seven days after the date of presentation, after the expiry of which period the Bill becomes law despite the fact that it has not been signed by him. (See ARTs. 58 and 111).

The foregoing review of the provisions contained in the Constitutions of various countries referred to above shows that power of veto is invariably given to the President in a parliamentary democracy although the kind of the veto-power, whether it is merely of a suspensory nature or absolute or again one which compels reconsideration by the legislature and the passing of the relevant Bill with either two-thirds or absolute majority, is a mere matter of detail.

64. President's Power to send Messages to or address the Assembly

The President can send messages or himself address the National Assembly. (See ART. 52). The object of this provision is to enable the executive to make a policy statement through the Head of the State, and this opportunity is usually taken at the commencement of the Parliamentary session immediately after the general elections. The making of the policy statement is a useful device of focusing the attention of the people upon the main targets that the Government, which has taken office immediately after the general election, proposes to pursue.

Mechanisms of Parliamentary Democracy

Right to send message:
The Position in England.

This provision in ART. 52 is based on the English Parliamentary Practice: in England, "in every Sessions but the first of a Parliament as there is no election of a Speaker, nor any general swearing of Members, the Sessions is opened at once by the King's Speech, without any preliminary proceedings in either House." (May's Parliamentary Practice p. 275, Fifth Edition). And when the King is not personally present, opening is made by Commission and the Royal Speech is read by the Lord Chancellor to both the Houses.

After the King's Speech is read an address in answer thereto is moved in both the Houses to which His Majesty makes an answer.

Right to address or send message:
The Position in India.

In ARTs. 86 and 87 of the Indian Constitution we have the same provision:—

"86(1) The President may address either House of Parliament or both Houses assembled together, and for that purpose require the attendance of members."

(2) The President may send messages to either House of Parliament, whether with respect to a Bill then pending in Parliament or otherwise, and a House to which any message is so sent shall with all convenient despatch consider any matter required by the message to be taken into consideration."

"87(1) At the Commencement of the first Session after each general election to the House of the People and at the commencement of the first Session of each year the President shall address both Houses of Parliament assembled together and inform Parliament of the causes of its summons.

(2) Provision shall be made by the rules regulating the procedure of either House for the allotment of time for discussion of the matters referred to in such address"

Under ART.87, it is obligatory for the Indian President at the commencement of the first session after each general election to the House of People and at the commencement of the first session of each year to address both the Houses of Parliament assembled together whereas under ART.86 the matter is optional.

President's Power to send Message:
The position in U.S. Constitution

In the Constitution of United States in section 3 of ART. II, the President has the power from time to time to give to the Congress information of the state of Union and command to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. He has no right to attend or to address the Legislature.

Appointment of Election Commission and Delimitation Commission—Discretion of the President.

65. The President and the Appointment of Election Commission for Organising and Conducting Elections to National and Provincial Assemblies.

The President in the exercise of his functions under the Constitution is bound to act upon the advice received from the Prime Minister and the Cabinet, except in cases where he is required under the Constitution to act in his discretion or when he is appointing or dismissing the Prime Minister. [ART.37(6)]. When the President acts in his discretion he acts all on his own and the only constraining influence, if any such exists in the world of practical politics, is his loyalty to the oath of the office which requires of him to maintain and defend the Constitution. This power to act in his discretion has been given to the President inter alia in respect of:—

(a) the formation of Election Commission which is to consist of a Chief Election Commissioner who shall be the Chairman of the Commission and such other number of Election Commissioners as the President may determine [ART. 137 (1)], and

(b) the constitution of Delimitation Commission, consisting of a Chairman, who is or has been a Judge of High Court and 2 other members who shall not be members of the National or Provincial Assemblies with powers "to delimit territorial constituencies for election to the National and Provincial Assemblies." [See ART. 142(3)].

The President and the appointment of Election Commission for organising and conducting Elections to National and Provincial Assemblies.

He may after consultation with the Election Commission appoint such Regional Election Commissioners as he may consider necessary, to assist the Election Commission in the discharge of its functions stated in Part VIII of our Constitution [ART.137(3)]. The duties of the Election Commission are mentioned in ART. 140 and these include, inter alia, preparing electoral rolls for elections to the National and Provincial Assemblies, and revising such rolls annually; and organising and conducting elections to the National and the Provincial Assemblies.

The President also, as remarked earlier, acts in his discretion in constituting a Delimitation Commission, which is to consist of Chairman, who is or has been a Judge of a High Court, and two other members who shall not be members of the National Assembly or of a Provincial Assembly. The Chairman and other members of the Delimitation Commission "shall be appointed by the President for such period as the President may fix, shall hold office during the pleasure of the President, and shall be entitled to such remuneration and privileges as may be determined by the President (in his discretion)." The Delimitation Commission has the duty cast upon it of delimiting territorial constituencies, and anything done by the Delimitation Commission is sacrosanct in the sense that anything done by it or anything done under its authority cannot be called in question in any court (see provisions of ART. 142).

The power of the President to act in his discretion in the foregoing matters appears to have been vested in him upon the basis of a belief that if such a power were to be given to the Executive, i.e. to the President acting on advice, there is every likelihood of that power being abused by Government in office for the purpose of advancing its own ends. The President is expected under the Constitution to act impartially, and be above party-politics since he represents, as has been stressed earlier, the dignified aspect of the executive power. He is not supposed to take sides with any one party. It would be noticed that the President has this power not merely in respect of Federal but also in respect of Provincial Elections.

The framers of the Indian Constitution, in Part XV thereof, have also vested the superintendence, direction and control of the preparation of the electoral rolls for and the conduct of all elections to Parliament and to the Legislature of every State and of elections to the offices of the President and Vice-President of India, including the appointments of election Tribunals for the decision of doubts and disputes arising out of election to Parliament and the Legislatures of the State, in the Election Commission, but the appointment of the Election Commission is, however, made by the President not in his discretion but upon advice which, under the conventions of the English Constitution that are being followed in India, is of a binding character. The framers of our Constitution have, however, in their wisdom ordained and established a method of constituting the Election Commission in such a way that the person responsible for its constitution, namely the President, being above party politics, is authorised to make appointments to it, so as to give an impression that there would be free and impartial elections held in the country, that the electors shall not be influenced by any threat or coercion or beguiled by direct or indirect corrupt inducement into helping the party in power in retaining its office for another term.

How far the decision taken is correct is a question which it is for the future historian of this country to deal with in the light of experience which the working of the Election Commission may have to provide to him. But, on the face of it, does it not look somewhat unusual that this crucial power to appoint Election Commission and Delimitation Commission should have been given to one man who, human nature being what it is, could not, for all times to come, invariably be a person "immune from the corrupting taint of favouritism and intrigue".

The position in India.

Wisdom of Conferring Power of appointment in the discretion of the President.

The power of appointment to these important bodies does appear to be decisive and the likelihood of its being abused is very great indeed. The appointment of persons to these bodies, being within the gift of the President, the conferment of this power virtually tantamounts to giving to the President the power of showing patronage. Men appointed by him are least likely to be independent of his influence, and if such should turn out to be the case, there would be no method of calling the President to order; for, if by the mere abuse of this extra-ordinary power he should succeed in bringing any party, in which he is interested, to power he would not even be impeached by the Assembly. But if he does not succeed in getting his party to power he would not any longer be the President for the next term—in which case too he would escape being impeached. To make the entire phenomenon of the formation of National and Provincial Assemblies, a matter entirely within the special care of Election Commission, the appointment to which is controlled by one man, is not the way to ensure a fair and impartial election in a country where democratic traditions are as yet not so far firmly laid. Even the constitution of the Election Tribunals for the decisions as to the validity of elections, which is to be provided by an Act of Parliament, cannot be construed as providing any effective means of counteracting the possibility of abuse of the abnormal powers vested in the President in relation to the appointment of the Election Commission and Delimitation Commission. Election Tribunal can interfere only post facto, that is, after the mischief is done, and from the nature of the case the party that emerges triumphant at the polls, thanks to the widespread and large-scale indulgence in corrupt practices by it, is least likely to appoint men of independent character to decide questions relating to the validity of those elections.

If the Election Commission had been brought directly under the control of the government of the day, the possibility of the Ministry responsible for its upkeep and maintenance prejudicially influencing its decisions in its own favour would undoubtedly have been the e—but then the Minister or the Cabinet responsible for the conduct or misconduct of the commission would have been accountable in the Legislature in that behalf; and questions could have been asked from the responsible Minister to explain the conduct or misconduct of the Members of the Election Commission.

Besides all this, it is a grave defect in the Constitution that no qualifications have been prescribed in the Constitution which ought to be fulfilled before a person could be appointed to those high and responsible posts. As it is, now almost any one could be appointed to be a member of election commission by the President in his discretion.

Election Commission is an Independent
and Autonomous Body.

The framers of the Constitution, in order to ensure that elections shall be conducted freely and fairly, have set up an independent and autonomous body called the Election Commission and, as has been pointed out earlier, charged it with the duty of :—

- (a) preparing electoral rolls for elections to the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies and revising such rolls annually; and
- (b) organising and conducting elections to the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies. (See ART. 140).

The expression "organizing and conducting elections" would seem to include the taking of all steps that might be deemed necessary for securing the return of the candidates from constituencies.

The Constitution further requires that a general election for the re-constitution of the Provincial and National Assemblies shall be held not later than six months from the date of dissolution, and any casual vacancy occurring in any of these Assemblies would be filled in by means of a by-election which would be held to fill the said vacancy within three months from the date of the occurrence of the vacancy. In suitable cases, particularly where climatic conditions so require, this period of 3 months can be extended by three additional months by the Chief Election Commissioner. (See ART. 141). It would appear that it is for the Election Commission not only to prepare electoral rolls but also to take all the steps to see that elections are held within the specified time. And in all cases where the Election Commission fails to perform these constitutional duties, a writ of mandamus would lie against it compelling it to carry out the mandate of the Constitution.

The President and the appointment of Election Commission for organising and conducting Elections to National and Provincial Assemblies.

The autonomous character of the Election Commission is secured not only by means of conferring power on the President to make appointments to the Commission in his discretion, but also by making the salaries and other remuneration payable to the members of the Election Commission a charge upon the Federal Consolidated Fund. Similarly, the administrative expenses, including the remuneration payable to the officers and servants of the Election Commission, have also been declared to be expenditure charged upon the Federal Consolidated Fund. (See ART. 64). And the implication of this is that although so much of the Financial Statement as relates to the expenditure charged upon the Federal Consolidated Fund could be discussed in the National Assembly, the same is not to be submitted to the vote of that Assembly. It forms thus a non-votable item of expenditure.

Similarly, under ART. 139 it has been enjoined that all executive authorities in the Federation and in the Provinces are to assist the Election Commission in the discharge of its functions, and for this purpose the President may, after consultation with the Election Commission, issue such directions as he may consider necessary. The Election Commission could ask the Federal or Provincial Government for such staff as it may consider necessary for the discharge of its functions, and it shall be the duty of the Federal Government and of each Provincial Government to make such staff available for the purpose; and in the event of any disagreement as to what staff is necessary for this purpose, the question is to be referred to the President who is required under the Constitution to decide it in his discretion. (See ART. 139).

From the foregoing provisions it would appear that the Election Commission is not an attached department of the Government but has a constitutional status which makes it an autonomous and an independent body, a body which is in no sense subservient to the demands or dictates of any responsible minister. It is the ministers who are charged with the duty of extending assistance to the Election Commission, and any wilful non-compliance with this requirement would amount to a breach of constitutional duty and is liable to involve the Government to be indicted by means of a censure motion.

66. President's Power to dissolve the National Assembly

ART. 50 expressly confers upon the President the power to summon, prorogue or dissolve the National Assembly and, when summoning the Assembly, to fix the time and place of its meetings.

Under ART. 37(7), the President in the exercise of his functions "shall act in accordance with the advice of the Cabinet or the appropriate Minister or Minister of State, as the case may be". There are two exceptions to this rule when the President can act in his discretion but they are not relevant in this context. Considering, therefore, that it is virtually the Prime Minister and his Cabinet who will advise the dissolution, a question of considerable constitutional importance remains to be discussed. That question may be formulated as follows: Would the Prime Minister's advice to dissolve the Parliament in each case be considered by the President as constitutionally binding?

The question acquires some importance for the reason that any Prime Minister who finds himself deserted by a majority of National Assembly Members would necessarily desire that the House be dissolved and appeal allowed to be made by him to the electors in the country, with a view to obtaining a majority support in the new Legislature for the proposed measure or programme.

ARTs.
50 & 37.

Our Constitution is silent on this most momentous of all constitutional questions and it is to be presumed that the conventions of the English Constitution and the well-established practices that prevail in the Parliamentary Democracy of the civilised countries of the world would be followed in this country.

The Position in England.

In England it is the prerogative of the Crown to dissolve the Parliament at any time; but the exercise of this prerogative like any other, has come to be regulated by certain well established conventions. It is necessary, therefore, that the principles on which, having regard to the English constitutional precedents the Crown may be said to be within the rule of constitutional propriety in refusing a dissolution to a defeated Ministry, should be carefully borne in view. A standard text book on the "Constitutional Law" has this to say on the point :

Chalmers and Hood Phillips quoted.

"Though the King can dissolve Parliament when he likes, his conduct though legal would be unconstitutional if he did so without the consent of his Ministers. It has been the uniform practice for more than a century that the sovereign should not refuse a dissolution when advised by his Ministers to dissolve." (Chalmers and Hood Phillips on Constitutional Law, page 51, 1946 Edition).

The prerogative is thus exercised upon advice. The question, however, is one of unusual difficulty and may be formulated thus: Since the defeated Cabinet or the Prime Minister is invariably disposed to advising the Crown to dissolve the Parliament, what are the circumstances in which, the advice when tendered, may be considered as an improper advice ?

Anson quoted.

Anson in his book 'Law and Custom of the Constitution' appears to be of the opinion that in cases when advice to dissolve Parliament is found to be improper, the Crown would be justified in refusing to accept that advice. (See Anson's Law and Custom of the Constitution, Vol. I. p. 325 to 328, 1922 Ed. Oxford).

Controversy on the Home Rule Bill.

For instance, it would be a clear case of advice tendered to the Crown to dissolve Parliament being considered as improper, if a defeated Ministry, whose advice to dissolve the Parliament having been accepted finds itself in a minority in the newly constituted Parliament and then proceeds to advise that the House be dissolved a second time. Of course, so far in England no such preposterous advice has been tendered but the extreme case is visualised to illustrate the principle that is involved in the constitutional propriety of the Crown accepting or rejecting the ministerial advice.

George Cave's Views.

In Appendix IV of his book on Cabinet Government, Sir Ivor Jennings has collected useful material from the pages of the Times for September, 1913, on the question of the prerogative of dissolution. The discussion in the Press took place before the Home Rule Bill became Law under the Parliament Act of 1911. It would be recalled that earlier, Home Rule Bill had been passed by the House of Commons in two successive sessions but each time it was rejected by the House of Lords in those sessions. Following extracts will assist comprehension of the principles in terms of which the theory and practice concerning the question relating to the constitutional relation between the executive and the Parliament could be contemplated.

(1) Mr. George Cave in his letter to the Times of 6th of September, 1913, suggested that the way out of the constitutional crisis "if Ministers prove obdurate" was that "the Sovereign will exercise his undoubted right and dissolve Parliament before the commencement of the next session". This course was to be preferred to the alternative course, namely the refusal of Royal assent to the Home Rule Bill for such refusal "might, no doubt, be represented as a challenge to democracy; but no such reproach could be levelled against a decision of the sovereign to satisfy himself, before the House of Commons is finally committed to a decision which must change the history of his kingdom, that that House does indeed represent the democracy of to-day".

The editorial comment of the Times of 8th September, 1913, was as follows :

"The author of the suggestion admits that his proposal is hardly constitutional; but he falls back on the 'undoubted right' of the Sovereign to dissolve Parliament before the next session begins. Legally there is no question that under the Constitution there are certain reserved rights of the Crown; but they are atrophied by long disuse. In spite of this, Mr. Cave thinks that the policy of the Government justifies their re-assertion after the lapse of centuries. It is, however, in our judgment, inconceivable that the Sovereign should contemplate a step which might lead to an apparent disagreement between the occupant of the Throne and the majority of his people."

The reason in support of this view was "a dissolution of Parliament by an exercise of a Royal prerogative, proprio motu regis, might be followed by a vindication at the polls of those very Ministers whose advice had been set aside. The proposal, in fact, has only to be stated with its implications for its constitutional absurdity to be revealed. It is the first principle of our Constitution that the King acts solely on the advice of his Ministers. Ministers, therefore, must bear on their own shoulders complete responsibility for the advice they give."

(2) Sir William Anson, the author of the Law and Custom of the Constitution, in his letter which was published in the Times of 10th September, 1913, summed up the position :

"It really comes to this, that if the King should determine, in the interests of the people, to take a course which his Ministers disapprove, he must either convert his Ministers to his point of view, or, before taking action, must find other Ministers who agree with him."

(3) While accepting "the undisputed rule of Constitution that the sovereign must never act upon his own responsibility" but must have advisers who will bear the responsibility of his acts, Lord Hugh Cecil, in his letter of the same day, remarked :

"But this does not mean that he must always automatically accept the advice of those who are his Ministers at a given moment. What is constitutional is determined in our country by precedent and by authority; and the theory that the Sovereign must act automatically will find no support in precedent, nor, I think, from any authority of acknowledged weight. The doctrine—sustained, I believe, both by precedent and authority—is that the Sovereign may refuse the advice of his Ministers, though that refusal should involve their resignation, and may even (in an extreme case) dismiss his Ministers; but that these powers are in practice closely restricted by the condition that he must find advisers to bear the responsibility of his action who have the confidence of the House of Commons; or can obtain that confidence after a general election."

(4) Professor Dicey's letter to the Times published on 15th of September, contains the reiteration of the views expressed by him in his 7th edition of the Law of the Constitution, pages 428-434. And he claimed that the constitutional doctrine therein expounded "has been repeated and defended during the last 28 years in every edition of my book." He was of the opinion: "The safety and prosperity of the United Kingdom absolutely demand a speedy dissolution". With regard to the refusal to give Royal assent to the bill, he quoted with approval the language of Burke:

Sir William Anson.

Hugh Cecil's Views.

Professor Dicey's Views.

Asquith quoted.

"The King's negative to Bills is one of the most undisputed of the Royal prerogatives, and it extends to all cases whatsoever. I am far from certain that if several laws which I know had fallen under the stroke of that sceptre the public would have had a very heavy loss. But it is not the propriety of the exercise which is in question. Its repose may be the preservation of its existence, and its existence may be the means of saving the Constitution itself on an occasion worthy of bringing it forth."

On this problem of the powers of the English Crown to dissolve Parliament it would be useful to reproduce an extract from a speech delivered by Mr. H. H. Asquith at the National Liberal Club on 18th December, 1923. (See Selected Speeches on the Constitution by C. S. Emden, p. 53). Mr. Asquith claimed to speak 'with some experience on this matter'. He said :

"And now let me say here, by way of parenthesis, there seems to be a great deal of confusion in the public mind on the subject of the power of dissolution. I may claim to speak, I won't say with authority, but with some experience, on this matter, for I am the only person now living who has felt it his duty to advise the Crown to dissolve Parliament twice in a single year—the year 1910 . . . I need hardly tell you there is absolutely no analogy between that case and the circumstances of the present time. The dissolution of Parliament is in this country one of the prerogatives of the Crown. It is not a mere feudal survival, but it is part, and I think a useful part, of our constitutional system, for which there is no counter-part in any other country . . . It does not mean that the Crown should act arbitrarily and without the advice of responsible Ministers, but it does mean that the Crown is not bound to take the advice of a particular Minister to put its subjects to the tumult and turmoil of a series of General Elections so long as it can find other Ministers who are prepared to give it a trial. The notion that a Minister—a Minister who cannot command a majority in the House of Commons, but who is in minority of 31 per cent.—the notion that a Minister in those circumstances is invested with the right to demand a dissolution is as subversive of constitutional usage as it would, in my opinion, be pernicious to the general and paramount interests of the nation at large . . ."

Reference to Viscount Haldane's Views.

Viscount Haldane speaking in the House of Lords on 8th August 1911 (9 H. L. Debates, 5 s., 849 ff.) speaking in defence of Asquith Ministry in regard to the advice it had tendered to the Sovereign to create more Peers made observations on the relation of the Sovereign and his Ministers that may be usefully referred to in this context :

" . . . there were two ways only of dealing with the problem. One was for Ministers to resign and leave the Sovereign to choose other Ministers, who would go to the country. That would be a very proper and natural course under certain circumstances; but it was neither a proper nor natural course in the circumstances which occurred here. We were desirous throughout to keep the Crown out of this controversy. There is a great deal of confusion about the position of the Crown in this matter. The Crown is not a mere piece of machinery. The Crown is a very important element in the Constitution; but the Crown always acts upon the advice of Ministers, and always will so act as long as our Constitution remains what it is. If that be so, the Crown must have Ministers who have a reasonable chance of possessing the confidence of the country, and, if the Crown has Ministers who could not hold their office for a week and who, if they went to the country, would be defeated—it is not advisable that the Crown should be placed in that position.

"The other alternative was the alternative which has actually been adopted. It was to tender advice to the Crown, and that advice was tendered only on the footing that there was to be a reference to the country and a reference is the only constitutional way." (See Selected Speeches on the Constitution. P. 50)

Similarly, the observation of Harold Laski in his book on Parliamentary Government in England, pp. 409 to 412, 1952 Ed., may be referred to in this context with considerable advantage :

"The problem of the prerogative of dissolution is more complicated. It is agreed that the Monarch should not dissolve, or refuse to dissolve, save on the advice of Ministers; the problem is, however, whether the King may refuse a dissolution that is asked for, or insist upon one that his Ministers do not desire. Though the books are emphatic that the decision must rest with the Crown, that this prerogative is, therefore, a living thing, it is difficult to share this view. For, in the first place, it is well over a hundred years since a dissolution was refused; the revival of so rusty a precedent would be a very delicate operation. And, secondly, if the Government which asked for a dissolution and was refused was a majority government, it would obviously resign because its advice was disregarded. Its successor, being in a minority, would sooner, rather than later, be forced to ask for a dissolution; and the King would then be in the delicate position of refusing to one Prime Minister what he agreed to grant to his successor. The precedents, indeed, make it clear that no government which wishes to consult the electorate will be prevented from doing so if, at the time of its request, it has a majority in the House of Commons. Were it otherwise, the Crown would inevitably subject itself to the accusation of discriminating between parties.

"Is the situation different where the Government is in a minority in the House of Commons? Mr. Asquith, in 1923, took the view that it was. The Labour Government of 1924 was in a large minority in the House of Commons; it held only 191 out of 615 seats and, were it to be defeated, Mr. Asquith, as Liberal Leader, was prepared to take office in his turn. When, however, the Labour Government was defeated and the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, asked for a dissolution, the King agreed to his request. And it is difficult to see how it could well be otherwise. For had the King refused and invited Mr. Asquith to form a Government, the latter, being head of a party even smaller than that of Mr. MacDonald, would have been bound, in course of time, to be defeated also, and to have requested a dissolution. To have granted it would have evoked, once more, the accusation that the King was discriminating between parties. To grant a dissolution automatically is to place the responsibility for the government squarely upon the shoulders of the electorate, where, in the circumstances, it ought to lie. The emphasis upon the automatism of this prerogative is the surest way to the preservation of royal neutrality . . .

"The right to compel a dissolution is on a different footing. There have been two occasions in the last thirty years in which a Government dissolved at the express desire of the King: over the Budget in 1910, at the desire of Edward VII, and over the power of the Lords in the same year, at the desire of George V. In each case, however, the Minister, however, reluctantly, acquiesced in the King's desire, and the dissolution was, accordingly, amply surrounded by the cloak of ministerial responsibility; though the King took the initiative in pressing a dissolution upon the Government, in each case, also, the Government accepted the advice. What would be the position if the King urged a dissolution and the Ministry refused to agree? Clearly, I think, if the King insisted, the Government would have no alternative but to resign; a new Government would be formed and would at once go to the country. We know, from the memoirs of the time, that George V was constantly pressed to compel a dissolution in this way during the Ulster crisis of 1913-14. He refused; and the onset of the War led to the shelving of the problem of whether he would accept the consequences of the Home Rule Bill. The precedent, however, is of outstanding importance, if only because, in an ultimate way, it is indecisive upon the matter."

Harold Laski's Views.

From what has been stated above it would be apparent that the subject of the dissolution of Parliament, as it is known to the English Constitution, is highly complex: as one recent writer has complained, 'any adequate examination of the historical side of the problem is likely to lead one into labyrinths of confusion and in some of the dark caverns of disagreement, and no path which leads inexorably to one definite conclusion may be found'. (See The Office of the Prime Minister by Byren E. Carter-Faber, p. 273). Although the power to dissolve the Parliament flows undoubtedly from Crown Prerogative, several questions not of law, but of constitutional morality, do raise the dust of controversies. Can the Crown refuse dissolution to his responsible Ministers? If so under what circumstances may he do so. When can the Crown force a dissolution—should his undoubted power to 'warn' and to 'persuade' fail him.

The answers to these questions are incapable of being satisfactorily furnished, and even amongst the well known constitutional writers of the fame of B. Kieth, Evatt, Wade, Jennings, Anson and others there is no unanimity in regard to even some of the most important aspects of these vexed questions.

The theoretical side of the problem posed by the power of dissolution has reference to the peculiar nature of the institution of "Parliamentary Democracy". To begin with, it is the Parliament, or to be more precise the House of Commons, that is the repository of all Legislative and in a sense even of the Executive power. It reflects the general will of the people of England as that will manifest itself periodically, each time the general election is held: and of the representatives who are returned to take their seats in the House of Commons, the majority in the House of Commons has a right to form Government on the view that it represents the feeling in the country upon the questions that are confronting the administration of the day. Prime Minister and his colleagues in the Cabinet are, after all, a committee of the House of Commons that administer the country in the name of the majority party in the House; and the moment either the Cabinet or the House of Commons gets out of touch with the public opinion in the country, the reason for their being in office vanishes. Each time, therefore, it is the question of sacrificing either the Cabinet or the Legislature in order to secure the conformity of either the one or the other to the wishes of the political sovereign, the electorate.

The consideration which is practically decisive of the choice which the Crown must make in this behalf is the appreciation by the Crown of the political situation in regard to the measure of public support which is available or may be forthcoming for the policies of the Government. That the Government is to be responsible to the House of Commons, is no doubt the most important factor involved in the decision upon the question whether the Government be dismissed—but what if, the House itself does not reflect the opinion in the country in regard to some important policy or legislative measure which the government intends pursuing or implementing. If such should turn out to be the case, must not the House itself be dissolved? The rule that Crown would not act except upon the advice of responsible Minister in the matter of ordering dissolution of the House is calculated to create the impression that the King is above party-politics, and this procedure in itself prevents any public controversy being set afoot in that behalf.

The foregoing statement of the theory and practice of Parliamentary Governments in so far as it makes intelligible to us the principles underlying the, constitutionally speaking, wise exercise of the power of dissolution, may be stated in the words of Burke which are as follows :—

"It is the undoubted prerogative of the Crown to dissolve Parliament, but ... it is, of all the trusts vested in his majesty, the most critical and delicate, and that in which this House has the most reason to require, not only the good faith but the favour of the Crown ... We are to inquire and accuse; and the object of our inquiry and charge will be for most part persons of wealth, power and extensive connections. If we should see a House of Commons, the criticism of its zeal and fidelity, sacrificed by his Ministers to those very popular discontents ... excited by our dutiful endeavours... no other consequence can result ... but, ... in future, the House of Commons consulting its safety at the expense of its duties and suffering the whole energy of the State to be relaxed will shrink from every service which however necessary, is of a great and arduous nature—or will exchange independence for protection and will court a subservient existence through the favour of those Ministers ... who ought themselves to stand in awe ... of the Commons of this realm. A House of Commons respected by his Ministers is essential to his majesty's service; it is fit that they should yield to Parliament, and not that Parliament should be new-modelled until it is fitted to their purposes. If our authority is to be held up when we coincide in opinion with his majesty's advisors, but is to be set at nought the moment it differs from them, the House of Commons will shrink into a mere appendage of administration and would lose that independent character which . . . enables us to afford a real, effective and substantial support to his government (Burke ... Little Brown. (1901), Vol. II, p. 554.)

The conventions of the English Constitution have one thing for their ultimate object. The object is to see that the Parliament or the Cabinet shall in the long run give effect to the will of that power which in modern England is the true political sovereign in the State—viz., the majority of the electors or the nation.

A ministry placed in a minority by a vote of the Commons has, in accordance with received doctrine, the right to demand a dissolution of Parliament. On the other hand, there are certainly combinations of circumstances under which, the Crown has a right to dismiss a ministry despite the fact that it is able to command a Parliamentary majority and to dissolve the Parliament by which the ministry are supported.

A dissolution is in its essence an appeal from the legal to the political sovereign. A dissolution is allowable or necessary, whenever the wishes of the Legislature are, or may fairly be presumed to be, different from the wishes of the people.

No modern constitutionalist will dispute that the authority of the House of Commons is derived from the philosophy which maintains that it represents the will of the Nation and that the chief object of a dissolution is to ascertain whether or not the will of Parliament coincides with the will of the Nation.

Sufficient has been said to indicate the theory and practice, as it prevails in England, on this vexed question of the proper and improper exercise of the power of the Crown to dissolve the Parliament. It would be noticed that in the last resort the whole matter is regulated by that fragile and ill-defined something called the Conventions of the English Constitution.

With these observations as an introduction, we are now in a position to look at the combined effect of ARTS. 50 and 37(7) to see what is the constitutional position in our Country on this question.

What complicates the constitutional problem, in so far as the interpretation of the relevant provisions of our Constitution relating to the President's power to dissolve

Burke quoted.

National Assembly is concerned, is the somewhat unusual step which the framers of the Constitution took in reducing some of the conventions of the English Constitution to the forms of express statutory provisions. The present case will illustrate the difficulty with which the judiciary in this country is likely to be confronted.

By enumerating only some of the conventions of English Constitution and not others, the framers of the Constitution have lost sight of the argument well known to lawyers in the matter of interpreting the statutory or enacted law, namely, that matters that should have been but are not provided for in the written statutory instrument are deemed to have been deliberately excluded from the pale of Legislative recognition. Besides, conventions of the Constitution that were being followed under the administration established by the Government of India Act, not being Law, are not even saved by ART. 224, which provides for the continuance of the "existing laws" despite the repeal of the Government of India Act, the Indian Independence Act and the several Acts amending the same.

In ART. 37 the rule of the convention of the English Constitution concerning the advice of the Ministry being binding on the Crown has been reduced to the form of an express declaration, namely, "in the exercise of his functions the President shall act in accordance with the advice of the Cabinet or the appropriate Minister . . ." That the provision is unequivocally clear and express, is further borne out by the fact that only two express exceptions to the rule have been stated—that is, cases when the advice would neither be sought, nor if forthcoming, be followed by the President. These cases are (a) where he is required under the Constitution to act in his discretion, or (b) when he proceeds to appoint the Prime Minister or terminate his pleasure during the continuance of which the Prime Minister is to hold office. In other words, quite apart from these two exceptions, the rule of our Constitution is that the President must act under advice. This rule read in conjunction with the power given to him under ART. 50 of ordering the dissolution of the National Assembly, in effect, means in theory at least, the absolute power of the Prime Minister to insist, whenever he feels inclined so to do, that the National Assembly which is obdurate, or where he does not have a clear majority, should be disbanded. To take an extreme case, the same Prime Minister can advise dissolution, not once, but as many times over, as he likes. The constitutional requirement contained in clause (2) of ART. 50, namely, "Whenever a Prime Minister is appointed, the National Assembly, if, at the time of the appointment, it is not sitting and does not stand dissolved, shall be summoned so as to meet within two months thereafter", is irrelevant to the present constitutional question posed here for comprehension, since that clause relates merely to compelling the Cabinet that is in office to summon the National Assembly in the circumstances mentioned therein.

The constitutional doctrine on the basis of which the power of dissolution, at the instance of the Cabinet, is justified, may be briefly stated as follows: When the Prime Minister, who has been in office as a Leader of the majority party in the Parliament, is confronted with a situation where, let us say, because of his support for a policy which he thinks is in the interest of the country, he has precipitated a crisis and lost the support of the majority party in the Parliament, it is in complete conformity with the principle of democracy (which enjoins that the ultimate court of appeal is the will of the people) for him to insist that the Parliament be dissolved and he be allowed to appeal to the country.

"In fact", says Anson in his Law and Custom of the Constitution at p. 327, "the power of dissolution is a formidable disciplinary weapon in the hands of the Prime Minister and becomes more formidable as the rapidly changing opinions of the modern electorate make the prospect of a general election more unwelcome to the member who values his seat. The Prime Minister can always use this power as a threat and thus influence 'waverers' in an approaching party division or followers who are slack in attendance and support."

In practice, this power operates as a brake on the designs of those elements in the Parliament who desire to be negative and reactionary and who keep up, on that account, throwing overboard Ministry after Ministry, just for the sake of creating a situation in which the orderly working of the Parliamentary Democracy might become well nigh impossible. But since in all the Parliamentary Democracies this right of the Prime Minister to advise the Head of the State to dissolve the Parliament is controlled not by any express provision of the Constitution but by conventional constitutional morality, the Prime Minister would never advise a dissolution unless he knew that the same would be accepted.

The difficulties that beset the making of a satisfactory statement concerning the Constitutional principles that govern the grant or refusal of dissolution can be illustrated from a recent case that arose from the working of the British North America Act, a case which shows, by way of contrast with our Constitution, how, even where the framework of the Constitution of a Parliamentary Democracy has been reduced to writing, its provisions can afford room for the operation of conventional political morality in much the same way as in England. Section 11 of the British North America Act contains provisions with regard to the establishment of a Council of Ministers to aid and advise Governor-General in the government of Canada, and enjoins that the persons who are to be the members of that Council shall be, from time to time, chosen and summoned by the Governor-General, and may also be removed by him. There is not a word in that Act with regard to the advice of the Ministers being binding on the Governor-General and not even in regard to their being responsible to the Legislature. But in practice the advice is ordinarily followed and the Ministers are responsible to the Legislature. This is so because the British North America Act was the creature of an Act of British Parliament and in its preamble it was expressly stated to be a Constitution "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom". In Section 50 of the British-North America Act the power of the Canadian Governor-General to dissolve the Parliament is mentioned. The text is as follows :—

"Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor-General) and no longer."

The language is reminiscent of the British Septennial Act, 1715 (1 Geo. 1. Stat. 2.C. 38), as amended by S.7 of the Parliament Act of 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. 5. c. 13) where it is provided that a Parliament "shall at any time hereafter be called, assembled, or held, shall and may respectively have continuance for five years and, no longer, to be accounted from the day on which by the writ of summons . . . (such Parliament) shall be appointed to meet, unless (such Parliament) shall be sooner dissolved by His Majesty, his heirs or successors."

In 1926, Mr. Mackenzie King advised the Governor-General to dissolve the House of Commons. The Governor-General refused to accede to this request to dissolve the House and called upon the Leader of the Opposition to form a Ministry. It was another matter that Mr. Meighen, who was called to form a Ministry, failed to secure the necessary majority support with the ultimate result that the Governor-General was obliged to dissolve the House. The refusal of the Governor-General to accede to the request of Mr. Mackenzie King to dissolve the House could be constitutionally defended on the ground that it is the duty of the Constitutional authority charged with the duty of working Parliamentary Democracy as its Constitutional Head, to explore avenues of forming alternate Ministry and not readily grant request for dissolution if the formation of alternative government is a practicable possibility. This is so because the Parliament being the legal sovereign should be given a reasonable opportunity of presenting an alternative government.

W. L. Mackenzie King, in his speech at Ottawa delivered on July 23, 1926, exposed the hollowness of the arguments that had been advanced to defend the Governor-General's refusal to accede to his request for dissolution. His contention was not that there were no powers with the Governor-General to refuse dissolution, but only that, in view of the fact that Mr. Meighen had no majority in the Commons wherewith to carry on the work of running the administration of the country, the Governor-General ought not to have refused his request for dissolution. He further said :

(a) Written Constitution—Illustration of the Principle from Canada.

The Canadian Controversy of 1926.

"As to my right to dissolution, all I wish to say is that not for over one hundred years in Great Britain, and never since Confederation in Canada, has a dissolution been denied a Prime Minister who has requested it. It is true the prerogative of dissolution is a royal prerogative, and as such is rightly assumed to attach to the sovereign's representative in a self-governing Dominion. But as with other royal prerogatives, the discretionary power of the Crown, with respect to dissolution, is supposed to be exercised upon the advice of a responsible ministry, and the Sovereign who would be unwilling to accept advice so tendered him would, unless he wished to place his crown and throne in jeopardy, have to be very certain of finding to a Prime Minister who could not only be willing, but also would be able to take the responsibility for his refusal of the advice tendered. That would mean, in the case of a refusal of dissolution, a Prime Minister who not only was willing, but who was able to demonstrate his ability when Parliament was in session to carry on its proceedings. As Prime Minister, Mr. Meighen, was unable to carry on the proceedings of the late Parliament for the space of three days. The moment the right to existence of his ministry was challenged, that moment its every member foresaw its inevitable doom."

Mr. Mackenzie admitted in this speech that there might be circumstances in which a Governor-General might find subsequent justification for a refusal to grant a dissolution of Parliament. In his words :

"Such might be the case, where Parliament is in session and the leader of another party having accepted the responsibility of a refusal of dissolution demonstrates after compliance with all constitutional obligations that he is able to carry on the business of Parliament by the majority he is in a position to command in the House of Commons."

(b) Illustrations from written Constitution—Position under the Australian Constitution.

Under the Australian Constitution the language of Ss. 62 and 63 makes it clear that Federal Executive Council advises the Governor-General in the conduct of the affairs of the Government of the Commonwealth and that, reference in the Constitution to the Governor-General would be construed as reference to the Governor-General-in-Council. Thus the Australian Governor-General is, in effect, to act on the advice of the Federal Executive Council. Upon a plain interpretation of these two provisions then, it is clear that Governor-General must under the Constitution only act in accordance with advice. Despite this, cases have occurred when in the matter of dissolution of the Legislature the Governor-General has acted in the exercise of his independent discretion. The one exception to this rule (that is the rule which enjoins the Governor-General to act in all matters on the advice of his Ministers) arises, says Nicholas in his book, the Australian Constitution, 1952 Edition, "when the Prime Minister refuses to give advice, as Mr. Hughes refused in 1918 when he resigned after the defeat of a conscription referendum in accordance with a pledge given before the referendum was taken, or, when the Prime Minister was too ill to give advice, as was Mr. Lyons at the time of his fatal illness. There are three instances prior to 1914 of the refusal by a Governor-General of his Minister's request for a dissolution of the House of Representatives. In 1904 Lord Northcote refused a dissolution to Mr. Watson and in 1905 to Mr. Reid. In 1909 Lord Dudley refused a dissolution to Mr. Fisher (Evatt, The King and His Dominion Governors, page 50)."

It would be noted that the language used in the Australian Constitution does not import the idea of advice being compulsorily followed by the Governor-General, but in our Constitution, ART. 37(7) makes the advice absolutely binding upon the President.

How the breach of this provision would be actionable is an altogether different and difficult matter to resolve. "What advice, if any, was tendered to the President, shall not be enquired into in a court of law", [ART. 37(2)], constitutes an absolute prohibition—not only in regard to the content but the very fact of advice—and the matter cannot be, therefore, adjudged in courts. There are numerous difficulties that beset the interpretation of the scope and implications of this prohibition, for it is conceivable that, upon the legal argument being submitted to court, namely that it is only in cases where the President acts within the Constitution that the immunity contained in ART. 37(2) is afforded to the secrecy of the advice tendered, and that where he has acted completely outside the Constitution the prohibition loses all its force, a court of law might be confronted with a somewhat unusual problem for its adjudication. At any rate, a disregard of the advice, assuming it is not actionable in a court of law, would constitute a ground for the impeachment of the President provided the necessary support for such an action is forthcoming from the Legislature. Sanction for the enforcement of advice is thus not legal but political in nature.

A comment on Art. 37(2).

The Irish Constitution on this question has been very wisely framed. The President under Article 13(1) is bound to exercise his powers only on the advice of the Government, but ART. 13(2) provides for the absolute discretion of the President to refuse to dissolve D'ail Eireann on the advice of Taoiseach (the Head of Government or Prime Minister) who has ceased to retain the support of a majority in the D'ail Eireann. This absolute discretion has been vested in the President because the Prime Minister in Ireland must be directly nominated by the lower House of Legislature, and the President has no discretion in the matter but to appoint the person so nominated as the Prime Minister. Even other Ministers, though, selected by the Prime Minister must get the approval of the lower House before they are appointed. [See ART. 13(1) of the Constitution of Ireland, 1937].

(c) The case of Irish Constitution.

The constitutional position in India may now be briefly adverted to : ART 74 of the Indian Constitution provides for a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at the head to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions. There is no provision corresponding to ART. 37(7) of our Constitution which makes that advice constitutionally binding upon the President. The fact, however, remains that the rules of the English convention that make it absolutely imperative for the Crown to act in accordance with advice would be, and in fact are being, followed in India. The only sanction for the disregard of this convention is the probability, if not the certainty, of the constitutional deadlock in case the convention is disregarded—if the Prime Minister, who enjoys the confidence of the majority party in the House of the people, is not listened to and his advice is not accepted by the President, he is likely to resign in protest and the President will then be put to the necessity of having to secure an alternative Ministry which would necessarily involve his falling back on the wishes of the majority party in the Legislature. The Indian Constitution enjoins that the President cannot act except on advice and he, therefore, cannot stay within the frame-work of constitutional arrangements established by the Indian Constitution even for a moment without getting some Ministers to carry on the work of administration. The resignation of a popular Minister may create a situation in which no such alternative Ministry can be formed by the President, or if formed it may not be able to carry a majority support in the Legislature. [The dissolution of the House of the People in the Indian Constitution is controlled by ART. 85(2) (b)].

(d) The Constitutional position in India.

There is thus, in India, a glaring disparity between the position as it is reflected in the letter of the Constitution, on the one hand, and the actual working of that Constitution, on the other. The President of India has the legal power to do what he likes to the Cabinet, to the Parliament, to impose emergency rule, to suspend the operation of 'fundamental rights' guaranteed by the Constitution; but, as a matter of convention, he does not and, indeed, will not, do those things, as he is, in fact, a mere head of the State, as opposed to the head of the executive, a symbol of the Nation, in short, a nominal figure head with no discretionary powers whatever. His discretionary powers, if at all, lie in a very restricted field. He appoints the Prime Minister under ART. 75(1), and the cases when such an appointment would take place in his discretion are conceivable—as when, for instance, after the general elections on the eve of the formation of the new Government he so appoints him. Similarly, the President can call for information relating to administration of the Union, and it is the duty of the Prime Minister to supply such information under ART. 78. The Prime Minister holds his office during the President's pleasure, and the pleasure can be terminated at the pleasure of the President. The executive power of the Union is vested in the President and under the Constitution this power is exercisable by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him in accordance with the Constitution. (See ART. 53). The Constitution merely says: There shall be a Council of Ministers...to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions (see ART. 74). This advice is not declared by the Constitution to be binding on the President.

To-day in India, with a powerful Congress Party in the saddle, the President of India has to submit to the advice of the Cabinet but to-morrow, with the change in the climate of political opinion, this docility may give way to a more aggressive outlook and at least one of the well known Commentators on the Indian Constitution, of the fame of Alan Gledhill, has little difficulty in contemplating the possibility of the Indian President becoming a dictator by disregarding the very convention of constitution which makes the advice of his Ministers binding on him and thus succeed in bringing about within the letter of the Constitution a Coup-d'état. In his words :

"It is possible to contend that the Constitution does not sufficiently guard against the President becoming a dictator. The best protection against this possibility is the method of election. If the members of the electoral college are sufficiently vigilant to reject a candidate who is not clearly to be trusted to observe the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution, no such contingency can arise, but let us suppose the election of a President who has successfully concealed his ambition to establish an authoritarian system of government, and examine how far he can proceed towards achieving this ambition without violating the Constitution. Let us assume that one-fourth of the members of a House of Parliament, suddenly aware of the danger, have given notice of a resolution to impeach the President. The resolution cannot be moved until fourteen days have elapsed, and in the meantime, the President may dissolve Parliament. A new House of the People must be elected, but it need not meet for six months. He may dismiss the Ministers, and appoint others of his own choice; for six months it is not necessary that they should be members of Parliament. The President may issue Ordinances, which will be as valid as Acts of Parliament for six months. The situation would probably be such as to justify a Proclamation of Emergency, which the courts would find difficult to hold invalid, so that he could legislate on any subject, and deprive the States of the right to their share in Income Tax and other distributable sources of revenue. He could suspend the Fundamental Rights, and their remedies. He could issue directions to States of a kind calculated to provoke disobedience, and then suspend the States' constitutions. He could proclaim a financial emergency; he could promulgate Ordinances giving himself extensive powers of preventive detention, and imprison his political opponents. As Commander-in-Chief, he could use the armed forces 'in support of the civil power.' He might ensure the election of a House of the People who would support him. The preservation of the Constitution might depend on the fortitude of the Council of States, but that is half the size of the House of the People, and, in case of conflict between the Houses, it would not be necessary to subject many members of the Council of States to preventive detention in order to secure a majority for the President at a joint sitting.

"This may seem a nightmare, but it is not dissimilar to the way in which the Weimar Constitution was destroyed. It is possible to set out a list of things the King of England could constitutionally do, things which would have ruinous consequences, and dismiss them with the comment that, as matters of practical politics they could not be done. Can the same be said of what has been set out in the last paragraph? Possibly the danger is averted by recognising it, but one must remember that the personal ambitions of an English King would always be controlled by devotion to the dynasty and the monarchial principle, factors not available to curb a President. Again, the English people have been conditioned by their history to recognise and combat attacks upon their liberty, and the flexibility of the British Constitution gives larger ground for manoeuvre in resisting attacks upon it. The vast Indian electorate will have to develop a proper regard for the sanctity of the Constitution before its stability can be assured." (See Vol. 6 Republic of India in the British Commonwealth Series, pp. 108-109).

Should the Indian President thus wreck the Constitution he cannot even be successfully impeached. The Courts cannot intervene in the matter since all his actions would be strictly legal—although unconstitutional and undemocratic. If ever he should be summoned at the bar of the Legislature to be impeached he could well defend himself by asking a simple question of his accusers, "What provision of the Constitution have I violated?" He may well contend that an infringement of the convention of the Constitution is not "violation of the Constitution" within the meaning of ART. 61 of the Constitution.

Although the President under the Pakistan Constitution is bound by the advice of the Prime Minister to dissolve the House he could, if he be so minded, effectively circumvent the difficulty by falling back on his powers of dismissal under ART. 37(6), and instead of dissolving the Legislature he can dismiss the Prime Minister, since, in effect, by such an advice, the Prime Minister would be furnishing to him just the sort of ground which is visualised by ART. 37(6), for his own exit from office.

The combined effect of these provisions, namely ART. 37(6), 37(7), and 50, may now be summed up as follows :

- (a) The President is ordinarily bound to act in accordance with the advice of the Prime Minister before he can dissolve the Legislature. [ART. 37(7) and 50].
- (b) But it is optional with the President, if he is so satisfied, to dismiss the Prime Minister instead of dissolving the House on the ground that the Prime Minister does not command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly, [ART. 37(6)]. This, he would ordinarily do, in case he believes that alternative government can be constituted and would be such as can face the National Assembly within two months next after the date of the appointment of the new Prime Minister. [ART. 50(2)].
- (c) But in the event of his following the course as in (b) above, he must have some one to form the Government, for the President cannot exercise his functions, unless he is aided and advised by the Cabinet. (Art. 37 (1))
- (d) The person to be called upon to form the Government must be one who has, at the time of his appointment, in the opinion of the President, the support of the majority of the members of the National Assembly—unless of course such a person is called upon to form a Government during the period the House stands dissolved. [ART. 37(9)].

(e) If no such person is forthcoming the advice of the Prime Minister to dissolve the Legislature would be followed by the President as a matter of constitutional necessity.

It would thus appear that the President is in a position, under the Constitution, to apply to one and the same situation different provisions of the Constitution: whether he will grant dissolution under Article 50, or dismiss the Ministry under ART. 37(6), appears to be a matter solely within his discretion—a power that may well tempt its owner to use it tyrannically—and be it noted, this unhappy and anomalous predicament results from the conflict between the power of the Prime Minister to advise dissolution of the Assembly and the power of the President to dismiss the Prime Minister, if he is of the opinion that he no longer enjoys the confidence of the majority of Members in the House. Our Constitution does not contain any express provision by resort to which the problem posed by the encounter between two constitutional situations before the President as being presented by an identical state of facts—clash, for instance, between his duty to act under advice to dissolve the House and his duty to act in his discretion to dismiss the Prime Minister who no longer enjoys the confidence of the House he is asking the President to dissolve—could be resolved. If ART. 37(7) were strictly construed, the right of the President to be kept informed about the Cabinet decisions, for instance, about “the administration of the affairs of the Federation and proposals for legislation” as the President may call for under ART. 42, cannot avail him unless he is advised to do so by his Prime Minister. This power of the President is not declared exercisable by the Constitution in his discretion nor is it a power under ART. 37(6)—hence the President must be deemed bound to exercise it under advice. But it would seem that the actual working of the Constitution will have something to do with the personal equation between the President and the Prime Minister, and rigid adherence to the letter of the Constitution would not be demanded by the dictates of practical politics.

The foregoing analysis of ARTs. 50 and 37 represents the strict requirements of the Constitution: but the all-important question, whether party alignments would not be radically revolutionised, subsequent to the unconstitutional and arbitrary exercise of power by the President relating to the dismissal of the Prime Minister, is one which is incapable of being settled in the abstract. Constitutional safeguards are important, but they are no proof against the possibility of their abuse by scheming and unscrupulous autocrats or irresponsible politicians. The possibility of the abuse of power is inherent in the scheme of things and that is why it is said, no constitutional safeguards are an effective guarantee that the power will not be abused or that the constitution itself will not be thrown overboard by resort to revolutionary methods on the part of those who do not believe in the philosophy of Constitutionalism.

Power to summon and prorogue the National Assembly may now be considered.

The Legislature cannot meet qua Legislature for the exercise of its constitutional authority and power reserved to it under the Constitution unless it is summoned by the President to do so. The House is the master of its own Procedure and the members by a majority vote can adjourn their meetings from time to time during the continuance of the Sessions. The President has, however, the power to prorogue the House, that is, terminate its right to transact business. The prorogation takes place on advice.

It would thus appear that the Executive i.e. the Prime Minister and his Cabinet has considerable control of the Legislature—for it can neither meet nor continue to transact business after it is summoned to meet, without their approval.

“Session of Parliament” connotes the idea of the period of time between the meeting of a Parliament—whether after dissolution or prorogation—and the termination of its meetings by an order of prorogation or dissolution. The interval

President's Power to summon, prorogue
National Assembly.

between the prorogation of Parliament and its reassembly in a new session is termed a “recess”.

ART. 50 gives to the President the power to summon, prorogue or dissolve the Assembly, and while summoning the Assembly it is he, of course under advice, who has to fix the time and place of the meeting. Constitution requires that at least one of the Sessions of the National Assembly in each year shall be held at Dacca. [See the Proviso to ART. 50(1)]. But this requirement is subject to the power of the President expressly mentioned in ART. 192(2) to suspend the operation of the proviso to Cl. (1) of ART. 50, during the period of proclamation of “grave emergency” under ART. 191.

Under ART. 51, it has been provided that there shall be at least two sessions of the National Assembly in every year and six months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Assembly in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

Under ART. 141 it has been provided that whenever National or a Provincial Assembly is dissolved, a general election for the reconstitution of the new Assembly shall be held not later than six months from the date of dissolution. There are indications that during atleast the period, when the proclamation of grave emergency is in force, the strict obedience to these requirements may be relaxed, for it is provided in the sixth clause of ART. 191 that the proclamation issued under that Article shall be laid before the National Assembly “as soon as conditions make it practicable for the President to summon the Assembly.”

67. Constitution of the National Assembly

ART. 44
Article 44 lays down the composition of National Assembly. It shall consist of 300 Members, half of whom shall be elected by constituencies in East Pakistan and the other half by constituencies in West Pakistan. Over and above these seats, for a period of ten years from the Constitution Day, ten seats will be reserved for women members only, five from each Province of Pakistan. These constituencies are called “Women’s Territorial Constituencies”. The period of ten years refers to the period of election to the Assembly, so that if a woman is a member at the expiration of the ten years for which extra seats have been reserved for women, she will not cease to be a member until the Assembly of which she is a member is itself dissolved.

The number of members of the National Assembly is a matter that can be determined by Parliament by means of ordinary legislation—subject, however, to the conformity of such law with the overriding principle of parity which enjoins that the equality of representation between the two provinces of Pakistan is anyhow preserved. Similarly, Parliament is entitled to pass a law providing for the representation in the National Assembly of any territory, which is included in the province after the Constitution Day, subject to the Constitutional limitation that thereby the number of members to be elected by the constituencies in that province cannot be altered to disturb the principle of parity of representation between the two provinces. Obviously this has reference to internal adjustment of territorial constituencies.

ART. 45.
Qualifications
and disqualifications of persons to be elected to National Assembly.
ART. 45 prescribes the qualifications of a person to be elected to the National Assembly and the disqualifications for membership. For a person to be elected to the National Assembly, he shall not be less than 25 years of age and must have the qualifications prescribed under Article 143 for being an elector, namely, that he should be a citizen of Pakistan, he is not declared by a competent court to be of unsound mind, he has been resident in the constituency for a period of not less than six months immediately preceding the 1st day of January in the year in which the preparation for revision of electoral roll commences, and he is not otherwise disqualified under a law passed by the Parliament. If a question should arise whether a member has after his election become subject to any

ART. 46.
Bar against double membership.

disqualification, the Speaker of the National Assembly shall obtain the opinion of the Election Commission; and if the opinion is that the member has incurred any disqualification, his seat shall become vacant. If any person sits or votes in the National Assembly knowing that he is not qualified for, or is disqualified for membership thereof, he shall for every day he so sits or votes be liable to a penalty of Rs. 500 which will be recoverable from him as a debt due to the Federation. (See ART. 45).

ART. 46. imposes a bar against double membership: no person can be a member from two or more constituencies in the National Assembly, although he can offer himself and can be elected for any number of constituencies, more than one, provided he, within 30 days of the declaration of result in respect of the constituencies by which he has been elected last, makes a declaration in writing addressed to the Speaker specifying the constituency which he wishes to represent. Failing this all his seats shall become vacant and as long as he has not sent in the declaration intimating what constituency in particular he wishes to represent, he shall not be entitled to sit and vote in the Assembly. If, however, he is already a member of National Assembly for one constituency and then permits himself to be nominated as a candidate for election from another constituency for a seat to the Assembly, his first seat shall become vacant.

ART. 47. Under ART. 47, if a member of National Assembly is absent from the Assembly, without leave of the Assembly, for 60 consecutive sitting days, his seat shall become vacant.

ART. 79. Under ART. 79, there is a prohibition against double membership of one and the same person in the National Assembly as well as in the Provincial Assembly. If a person is elected at the same time as a member both of National Assembly and of a Provincial Assembly and does not within 30 days of his election to the Assembly, to which he has been elected last, resign one of his seats, his seat in the Provincial Assembly shall become vacant. Similarly, if a person has been elected to both the Provincial Assemblies and does not within 30 days of his election to the second Assembly resign one of his seats, both of his seats in the two Assemblies shall become vacant.

ART. 48. Under ART. 48, a member of the National Assembly is required to make and subscribe an oath or affirmation in the form prescribed in the second Schedule within the period of six months from the date of the first meeting of the Assembly after the election. Failure to do so shall render his seat vacant unless the Speaker, before the expiration of that period for a good cause shown, extends the period.

ART. 49. Under ART. 49, a member of the National Assembly may resign his seat by notice in writing under his hand addressed to the Speaker. The resignation will become effective upon the Speaker receiving the resignation.

68. Constitution of the Provincial Assemblies

The Provincial Assemblies have been fashioned upon the model of National Assembly, a model the outline of which, has already been delineated while dealing with the Constitution of National Assembly. The relevant provisions in this behalf are to be found in ARTs. 76 to 82. The Provincial Assembly comprises of one House which taken together with the Governor of the Province becomes the Provincial Legislature for the Federal Unit. Like the strength of the National Assembly, its strength consists of 300 members and there are analogous provisions with regard to the reservation of ten seats for women members for a period of ten years immediately after the Constitution Day. ART. 77, which describes the composition of Provincial Assembly, in its 5th clause, makes a reference to the number of seats from the former Province of Punjab (i.e. Punjab of the pre-Establishment of West Pakistan province complexion) namely, that they shall not be more than two-fifths of the total number of members of that Assembly till 14th day of October, 1965. This has been done because on the eve of the merger of Punjab, Sind, N.W.F.P., and Baluchistan, in October 1955, an assurance was given by the political leaders of the Punjab that they will not, by reason of their overwhelming numbers, bring about a domination of the Punjabis in the administration of West Pakistan. An assurance was also given that for ten years immediately after the establishment of One Unit to be called "The Province of West Pakistan", they will claim only 40 per cent of the seats reserved to its Provincial Assembly—although their claim to the number of the seats according to their population quota should have been 56 per cent.

The qualifications and disqualifications for membership to the Provincial Assembly are set out in ART. 78 and they are in terms identical with what is contained in ART. 45.

69. Franchise

ART. 143 describes the qualifications of an elector—that is of a person qualified to vote—and these are :—

- (1) that he is a citizen of Pakistan;
- (2) that he is not less than twenty-one years of age on the first day of January in the year in which the preparation or revision of the electoral roll commences;
- (3) that he is not declared by a competent court to be of unsound mind;
- (4) that he has been resident in the constituency for a period of not less than six months immediately preceding the first day of January in the year in which the preparation or revision of the electoral roll commences ;
- (5) that he is not subject to any disqualification imposed by the Constitution or Act of Parliament.

Some additional provisions relating to elections are also contained in the Fourth Schedule but they are temporary and transitional provisions in the sense that they are liable to be amended by an Act of Parliament. In Part II of the Fourth Schedule are set-forth the qualifications in respect of a person who shall be "deemed to be a resident in a constituency": if a person ordinarily resides in that constituency, or owns or is in possession of a dwelling house therein, he will be deemed to be a resident for the purpose of being considered an elector. The words "ordinarily resides", appearing in the second paragraph of the Fourth Schedule may be compared and contrasted with the words "actually and voluntarily resides", appearing in Ss. 16 and 20 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There are, however, two provisos mentioned in this paragraph that create exceptions in favour of any person who holds the office of Minister of the Federal or Provincial Government, or Speaker or Deputy Speaker of the National or a Provincial Assembly, or a person who holds a public office or is in the service of Pakistan; such person shall be deemed, during any period in which such an office is held, to be resident in the constituency in which he would have been resident if he had not held such office. The benefit of these exceptions is also given to his wife if she be otherwise qualified, with the result that upon a person being qualified to have his name entered in the electoral roll of a constituency under proviso to para 2, his wife automatically becomes so qualified. (See the second sub-para).

The right of a person to be elected to the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly is dependent upon his name appearing on the electoral roll of any constituency of that Assembly [see paragraph 3 of the Fourth Schedule], and his being of 25 years of age [see ART. 45(a), and 78(a)]—unless such a person is disqualified for being elected or for being a member of any of these two Assemblies as provided for in ART. 143,—an article which read in conjunction with ART. 217, for such period as Parliament does not by law provide otherwise, takes us to the provisions of the fourth paragraph of the said Schedule. These disqualifications are:—

- (a) if he is of unsound mind, and stands so declared by a competent court;

Qualification of an elector

Art. 217
and the Fourth Schedule.

Fourth Paragraph of Fourth Schedule.

(b) if he is an undischarged insolvent;

Provided that this disqualification shall cease after the expiration of ten years from the date on which he has been adjudged insolvent;

(c) if he holds any office of profit in the service of Pakistan;

(d) if he has been convicted or has, in proceedings for questioning the validity or regularity of an election, been found guilty of any offence or corrupt or illegal practice relating to elections which has been declared by law to be an offence or practice entailing disqualification for membership of the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly, unless such period has elapsed as may be specified in that behalf by the provisions of that law;

(e) if having been nominated as a candidate for election to the National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly, or having acted as election agent to any person so nominated, he has failed to lodge a return of election expenses within the time and in the manner required by law:

Provided that this disqualification shall not take effect until one month after the date on which the return ought to have been lodged, or until such time as the President in the case of a return relating to an election to the National Assembly, and the Governor, in the case of a return relating to an election to a Provincial Assembly, may allow;

Provided further that this disqualification shall cease when—

(i) five years have elapsed from the date on which the return ought to have been lodged; or

(ii) the disqualification is removed by the President, in the case of a return relating to an election to the National Assembly, and by the Governor, in the case of a return relating to an election to a Provincial Assembly;

(f) if he has been convicted of any offence before the date of the establishment of the Federation by a court in British India, or on or after that date by a court in Pakistan, and sentenced to transportation or to imprisonment for not less than two years, unless a period of five years, or such less period as the President in the case of election to the National Assembly, and the Governor in the case of election to a Provincial Assembly may allow in any particular case, has elapsed since his release;

(g) if he has been dismissed for misconduct from the service of Pakistan on the recommendation of the Supreme Court, or a Public Service Commission;

Provided that this disqualification shall cease after the expiry of five years from the date of the dismissal, or may, at any time within that period be removed by the Governor in the case of dismissal from a service of a Province, and by the President in any other case;

(h) if he has ceased to be a citizen, or has voluntarily acquired the citizenship of a foreign State, or has made a declaration of allegiance or adherence to a foreign State.

(2) For the purpose of clause (c) of sub-paragraph (i) of this paragraph, the Judges of the Supreme and High Courts, and the Comptroller and Auditor-General shall be deemed to be holding offices of profit in the service of Pakistan.

In Article 144 is provided the power of the Parliament to make laws for :—

(a) the delimitation of constituencies, the preparation of electoral rolls, the determination of objections and the commencement of electoral rolls;

(b) the conduct of elections and election petitions; the decision of doubts and disputes arising in connection with elections;

(c) matters relating to corrupt practices and other offences in connection with elections; and

(d) all other matters necessary for the due constitution of the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies.

It would thus appear that the Provincial Legislature has no power to make provision with regard to any of the foregoing matters and that the electoral laws can only be made by the Parliament. Thus the entirety of the law relating to franchise, (even in respect of franchise as affecting Provincial Legislatures,) is taken out of the legislative competence of Provincial Legislature and has been made an exclusive preserve of the Parliament.

70. Principle of Franchise—Joint and Separate Electorates

In ART. 145, the principle of electorate (namely whether it would be separate or joint), is left to be determined by Parliament. The Article provides, "Parliament may, after ascertaining the views of the Provincial Assemblies and taking them into consideration, by Act provide whether elections to the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies shall be held on the principle of joint electorate or separate electorate, and may in any such Act provide for all matters incidental and consequential thereto". It is a matter of controversy whether this power which has been conferred by the Constituent Assembly on the Parliament is such as may be construed as empowering the latter to provide for separate electorate for one Provincial Assembly and joint for another, or that even in respect of the Parliament itself it is competent for the Parliament to pass a law enabling one Province to return representatives on the basis of joint electorate and the other on the basis of separate electorate. The Parliament, in fact, did pass legislation making provision for separate electorate in respect of West Pakistan and joint electorate in respect of East Pakistan (see Act XXXVI of 1956). Considering that it is a power which has been expressly conferred upon the Parliament by the framers of the Constitution to decide the principle of electorate after ascertaining the views of the Provincial Assemblies and taking them into consideration, the exercise of that power must be shown to be strictly in accordance with the directions contained in ART. 145. (The case of A.K.M. Fazl-ul-Quader Chowdhry v. The State which upholds the constitutionality of Act XXXVI of 1956 may be seen in PLD 1957 Dacca, page 342. It may, however, be noted that this Act was later on amended by Act XIX of 1957, and a uniform principle of electorate has been now provided. The elections to the two Provincial and the National Assemblies would now take place on the principle of joint electorate).

At this stage, it is necessary to briefly refer to some political aspects of the principle of joint and separate electorates so that the resulting implications can be seen by the student in their true perspective.

ART. 145.

Political implications of the Principle of Electorate.

Minorities in a State may be of various kinds: national, racial, religious, etc. In any State that professes to be democratic, minorities have to be allowed their proper share in the making of laws, as also they have to be allowed a full voice in the management of the affairs of the State. These denominational minorities may thus participate at the time of elections in returning their representatives and when the legislatures are fully recruited, to have, through these representatives, their opinion articulated and counted in the making of laws. The one way of giving them adequate share in the number of seats fixed for a given legislature is to provide for the election of the minority representatives on the basis of proportional representation. This proportional representation may be designed to take effect, either by means of a single transferable vote or by means of, what is called, the list system. The technique invariably adopted in either case is to form multi-member constituencies: but whereas under the system of single transferable vote the voter is given his right to vote for certain number of candidates in order of his preference, under the list system each party prepares a list of names and the voter is called upon at the time of election to vote for the list he likes as opposed to his voting for a given candidate, and after this is done, the seats are divided among the rival parties in proportion to the number of votes secured at the polls in support of each list.

The chief merit of the proportional representation is that it ensures a just measure of representation to every group in the Legislature in proportion to the strength of that group according to population figures. But the chief vice of the system is that it fails to secure on the part of elected representatives homogeneity of outlook on questions of common concern to the nation—an outlook which, as any one can see, it is essential to have before Legislature could be expected to provide a homogenous team of representatives who could form the personnel of a Cabinet which may then efficiently operate as an instrument for handling the affairs of Government. Certain isolated interests, no doubt, get reflected if elections are held in accordance with the principle of proportional representation, but that overall unified outlook, which ought to characterise the elected representatives before they could be expected to function as Government, is often seen to be conspicuous by its absence.

The other alternative is to secure what is called communal representation through the adoption of the system of separate electorate where the voters belonging to different minority communities vote separately only for the candidates of their own group.

Separate or what is called compartmental electorates have been designed by political theorists to enable the minorities to secure their due share of representation in the Legislatures of the country. Under this system separate electoral rolls are maintained for separate racial, religious or ethnic communities, and there are separate constituencies allotted for the purpose of giving full scope to the members of different communities to contest the seats reserved for them. The result of this arrangement invariably is that the differences between the several communities get accentuated and become more pronounced. A Muslim, for instance, would like to exploit the religious susceptibilities of his voters and with that end in view subscribe to a manifesto of political programme which would be such as would exclude from its purview any programme which would help the members belonging to the other group or denomination. Thus it is that under separate electorate the overall interest of the country does not become a predominant feature in the manifestoes of the various political parties: instead, we have undue emphasis laid upon accidental attributes of public policy, if only because thereby, the needs of a given religious group or denomination of people as opposed to those of the rival group would be brought into the forefront.

Now the basic thing to remember about separate electorate is that, being the machinery improvised for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of the minorities, it cannot conceivably be imposed upon them by a majority, should the minority itself declare its unwillingness to take advantage of this device. The religious minorities that do not find themselves as an altogether insignificant element in the country, as happens for instance to be the case in respect of the minorities in East Pakistan, feel advised to have joint electorate instead of separate electorate for they know that they would thereby be in a better position to effectively influence politically the administration of public affairs in the country. They will be, at all material times, in a position to tilt the balance between the two contending groups within the majority community and thus use their vote as a bargaining counter for getting their demands in matters of policy or legislation conceded. This in fact has been the thinking of the representatives of the minorities in East Pakistan. They have for this very reason been all the time crusading for the recognition of the principle of joint electorate. The minorities in West Pakistan, however, are so much scattered about and constitute such an insignificant proportion to the total population of West Pakistan that, with the imposition of joint electorate upon them, there is no possibility of any of these communities successfully sending in even a single representative to take a seat in the Legislatures of the country. The result of this predicament in which the minorities in West Pakistan find themselves is that they have been opposing the joint electorate principle tooth and nail.

The unequal distribution of the population of minorities in Pakistan does create a very unusual problem indeed, and it is difficult to offer a satisfactory solution to the political problem posed by the demographic factors that are involved in the determination of this major constitutional issue of our time.

The majority community in Pakistan, however, has been insisting upon the recognition of the principle of separate electorate for an altogether another reason. The argument they have advanced is that Pakistan itself being an offspring of the phenomenon of separate electorate upon which the Musalmans of undivided India took their stand, cannot be now suffered to provide in its Constitution the principle of joint electorate, for to do this would be to deny to the minorities what the Muslims themselves, when in minority in undivided India, had claimed as their political right.

Besides all this, emphasis upon the principle of separate electorate is placed by the majority community also with a view to supporting the claim of Pakistan as being an Islamic Republic. It is urged that the representatives, who will sit in the Legislatures and form governments, cannot adequately represent the ideological standpoint of the Muslim State if they represent not only the Muslims but also other non-Muslim religious minorities. The argument is somewhat fallacious in that, even on the assumption that separate electorate is to be the means for securing representation to the Houses of the Legislatures, the fact remains and is to be duly considered that the Head of the State must, under our Constitution, be elected by all the members (Muslims and non-Muslims alike) sitting in the Provincial and the National Assemblies; and what is more, even the Leader of the Party in power could, under our Constitution, become a Head of a Coalition between some of the splinter groups within the majority community, on the one hand, and the group of representatives of the minority community, who have been returned to the Legislatures on the basis of separate electorate, on the other.

Joint electorate emphasises the political importance of and the need for admitting the religious minorities fully within the political life of the State. Separate electorate recognises the existence of the plurality of religious groups with their inalienable right to return representatives in the Legislature but does not provide for the growth of healthy national consciousness. It keeps minorities in a state of perpetual separate-hood; makes no contribution to the problem of absorbing the minorities in the body-politic of the State. Under a system of separate electorate the viewpoints of the various religious groups will, from the nature of the case, continue to be irreconcilable.

The argument in favour of separate electorate is that in countries where religious minorities are so very much divided in outlook on the problems connected with the management of affairs of the State as to be unable to consider the interests of any but their own, it is in keeping with the dictates of prudence and common sense that they be allowed to secure their representation through candidates who belong to their own religious faith. Where there is distrust between the religious groups, it is impossible to expect that representatives elected on the basis of joint electorate would be able to do justice to the interests of the community to which they do not belong.

71. Adult Suffrage and Representative Government

Representative government is a modern device of organizing popular control over the conduct of governmental affairs by means of elected representatives. In this regard, representative government is distinguishable from the principle of direct democracy in that, unlike the latter institution, the personnel of government is secured by means of representatives elected by the people during the periodic elections.

In most of the modern governments adult suffrage is regarded as an adequate foundation upon which the political processes must work. Every adult citizen is entitled to record his preference during the elections in favour of a particular party or candidate. In this respect the doctrine of political equality is satisfied in so much as all persons of a certain age irrespective of any other considerations, e.g. wealth, educational qualifications etc., are entitled to have their viewpoint counted and their voice reckoned in the management of public affairs. They are, in fact, given a chance of selecting their rulers. If a citizen is at all to be rendered liable to pay the taxes, to be conscripted during the time of war, if he is justly and fairly to be required to obey laws passed by the State, he is entitled to have his opinion counted in the making of a government. And the only effective way to do this in modern times, when most of the States are composed of several millions of people, is to give to each adult a periodic chance of showing his support for, or condemnation of, a given political programme by means of the exercise of his power of vote. However, there are many critics of the political theory that advocates the system of adult suffrage, and several arguments have been advanced by them to show that this method of recruiting government is unsatisfactory, if not dangerous in the extreme. Even J. S. Mill, it would be recalled, emphasised that the universal education should precede universal franchise. Sir James Stephen thought that universal suffrage inverted the true and natural relation between wisdom and folly. It is argued by these critics that complicated questions of state-craft, affecting the conduct of intricate and highly controversial issues like the economic policies of a modern State or the management of its foreign affairs, cannot be understood by the "vulgar multitude". It is futile to make these issues as the subject-matter of election campaigns—for the average man, as opposed to the microscopic minority who compose the aristocracy of talent or the intellectual proletariat, could not be expected to be in a fit position to record his views by indicating preferences one way or the other in relation to these questions. Some manner of check, it is suggested, in the form of a minimum educational qualification and experience, would seem to be an indispensable prerequisite before the right to vote can be safely conferred. Some have even suggested the importance of imposing minimum property qualification, upon the view that a person who has property has some manner of vested interest or stake in society and is likely, on that account alone, to exercise his right of vote in a responsible and judicial manner.

72. Women's Right to Vote

Similarly, whether or not franchise be extended to women is another controversial matter. The legal and social status of women in most of the countries very much depends upon the conferment of this political right to vote, and in all highly advanced industrial countries the woman has already begun claiming equality with man in the matter of political rights. The early pioneers who advocated the enfranchisement of women, like J. S. Mill and Charles Bradlaugh, felt that it was essential for the successful working of democratic institutions that the woman should be entitled to vote at the elections, and further that it was not enough that they should be represented in this respect merely by their husbands or by their brothers or fathers, as the case may be. The battle for the Women's Right to vote on the same terms as men ended in U.S.A. with the passing of 19th Amendment on 26th August, 1926, and by the Act of 1928 in England. Of course, New Zealand was the first country that recognised Women's Right to vote (1895), and by now about 15 Nations or so still remain to acknowledge the right of women to vote and a country like Switzerland is one of them.

In Pakistan, of course, the right to vote has been conceded in favour of the woman as much as it has been in favour of man—and if there is a discrimination at all it is in favour of the woman, in that for a period of ten years from the Constitution Day ten additional seats in the National Assembly have been reserved for women members only, of whom five shall be elected by constituencies in East Pakistan and five by constituencies in West Pakistan [see ART. 44(2)]. Likewise, in the Provincial Assemblies similar provision of reservation of ten additional seats for women has been made in ART. 77(2). It goes without saying that, in every general constituency, a woman is entitled to vote and, subject to the disqualifications mentioned in paragraph 4 of Fourth Schedule, she is entitled to offer herself as a candidate at the election. Experience of the working of the several Legislatures in modern democratic countries shows that women members have "everywhere shown special interest in health, housing, temperance, social security, education, equality of economic conditions for the two sexes, international peace and the abolition of white slave traffic." The framers of our Constitution have thus taken a step in the right direction.

It may be noted that the Framers of the Constitution of Pakistan have established a proper example of progressive and scientific outlook in the matter of securing suffrage for the women. Some time back, to be precise, on 12th June 1952, a 'Fatwa' was issued by the 'Al-Azhar' University in Cairo, which is believed—a belief in the sharing of which the present author is not guilty—to be the leading intellectual, theological and educational centre of the Muslim World, to the effect that women should not be allowed to vote or to sit in the Legislatures: the grounds in support of this view are that women are likely to be swayed more by emotion than men and that they would thus be of an unstable judgment. And further that women, if they are allowed the right to vote, will have to attend public meetings, speak in public and engage themselves in constant journeys which would be unseemly and undignified, and finally that their right to participate in political processes was inconsistent with the authority of the Islamic law. (Keesing's Contemporary Archives 1952-54, pages 123-131, quoted by Appadorai in his Substance of Politics, p. 506, 8th Edition). The faulty psychology of women depicted in this 'Fatwa' ought to be obvious to any one who knows anything of that science and as to the allegation that the giving of 'the Right to vote to a woman is inconsistent with the authority of Moslem Law', something will be said in the Final Chapter of this Book. Suffice it to say that the present author does not consider this Fatwa to be of any importance upon the question it so pretentiously professes to settle.

73. Officers of the National and Provincial Assemblies

In ARTs. 54 and 87 we have provisions for the election of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker for the National and a Provincial Assembly respectively. The election takes place immediately after these Assemblies are formed or as often as these offices fall vacant. These officers shall vacate the office if they cease to be members of their respective Assemblies or if they resign their office by writing in their hand addressed to the President in the case of Federal, and to the Governor in the case of Provincial, Assembly. They can be removed from office if a resolution in that behalf is passed by a majority of the total members thereof. No such resolution can be moved unless at least 14 days notice has been given of the intention to move the resolution. The Speakers of the two Assemblies, that is National and Provincial, do not by virtue of the dissolution cease to be the holders of the office of the Speaker and they do not vacate their office until immediately before the first meeting of their respective Assemblies after the dissolution. There are elaborate provisions made in regard to the capacity of the Deputy Speaker to perform the duties of the Speaker when the office of the Speaker is vacant, or the Speaker is acting as President, and in the event of the office of the Deputy Speaker also lying vacant, by such member of the Assembly

Speaker and Deputy Speaker.

as the President in the case of Federal Assembly, and the Governor in the case of a Provincial Assembly, may appoint for the purpose. During the absence of the Speaker from any sitting of the Assembly, the Deputy Speaker, and if he is also absent, such person as may be determined by the rules of Assembly, shall act as Speaker. [See ARTs. 54(3) and 87(3)].

Importance of the Office of the Speaker.

The office of the Speaker is of considerable constitutional importance and this would be borne out fully if the powers which he enjoys under the Constitution, as also the privileges that are attached to his office, are appreciated. He is the officer who is empowered to certify whether or not a bill is a money bill and such certificate shall be conclusive for all purposes and shall not be called in question in any Court. [See ARTs. 58(3) and 91(3)]. He has several duties cast on him which flow from the English Parliamentary usage. It is his duty to see that the House is properly constituted before it proceeds to business. Following is the statement of the duties of Speaker as given by May in his "Parliamentary Practice":—

"Duties of the Speaker under Usage.—It is the duty of the Speaker to see that the House is properly constituted before it proceeds to business. He preserves the orderly conduct of debate by repressing disorder when it arises, by refusing to propose the question upon motions and amendments which are irregular, and by calling the attention of the House to bills which are out of order (and securing their withdrawal). He rules on points of order submitted to him by Members on questions either as they arise or in anticipation, but any notice of a question seeking a ruling must be notified to him privately and not placed upon the paper. The opinion of the Speaker cannot be sought in the House about any matter arising or likely to arise in a Committee. The Speaker is always ready to advise Members of all parties who consult him privately whether upon any action which they propose to take in the House or upon any questions of order which are likely to arise in its proceedings. Such private rulings of the Speaker generally settle the questions at issue, but they may, if necessary, be supplemented by rulings given from the Chair."

"The Speaker's rulings, whether given in public or in private, constitute precedents by which subsequent Speakers, Members, and Officers are guided. Such precedents are collected and in course of time may be formulated as principles, or 'ancient usage'. It is largely by this method that the modern practice of the House of Commons has been developed.

"A few examples may be given of motions and bills which for some irregularity the Speaker has not allowed to proceed.

Motions.—A motion which would create a charge upon the people and is not recommended by the Crown; a motion touching the rights of the Crown, which has not received the royal consent; a motion which anticipates a matter which stands for the future consideration of the House, or which raises afresh a matter already decided during the current session—these are examples of motions upon which the Speaker refuses to propose a question.

Bills.—The Speaker has ruled a private bill out of order on the ground that it should have been introduced as a public bill, and has directed the withdrawal of a public bill which should have been introduced on the report of a resolution of a Committee of the whole House, or which has gone beyond its title. Similarly he has directed the recommittal of a bill to a standing committee when clauses affecting public money have been introduced without the necessary authority."

[May's Parliamentary Practice (XV Ed.) p. 235.]

The Speaker of the National Assembly by virtue of his office acts as the President of the Republic of Pakistan if a vacancy occurs in the office of the President or if the President is absent from Pakistan or is unable to discharge the duties of his office owing to illness or any other cause. (See ART. 36). When presiding the sessions of the Legislature the Speaker does not vote. He does so only when there is equality of votes and that is called the right of the Speaker to exercise a casting vote. [See ARTs. 55(b) and 88(b)].

74. Privileges of the Members of the National and Provincial Assemblies

ARTs. 56 and 89 set forth the privileges of the members of the National and Provincial Assemblies respectively. There are certain well defined rights which the members of the Legislature exercise and some of these are expressed in statutes or enacted laws and others are inherent in their status as members of the Legislature. Similarly, the Legislature as a whole or its committees enjoy certain privileges. The English Parliament, for instance, has the power to commit for its own contempt and in the exercise of its privileges has complete control over its internal proceedings.

ARTs. 56
and 89.

The Position in England.

In England, the privileges of the Parliament can be discovered not only from the enacted law but also from immemorial customs and the usages of Parliament. "Parliamentary Privilege is part of the common law and, therefore, neither House can create any new privilege, but must justify its claim on the authority of precedent. The Courts, while reluctant to enquire into the exercise of privilege, so far as it concerns the internal proceedings of either House or their relation with one another, will not admit of its extension at the expense of the rights of the subject. For to do so would involve recognising that one House could change the law by its own resolution." (Constitutional Law, p. 119, by Wade and Phillips). "Parliamentary Privilege is to some extent", we read in another book, "analogous to royal prerogative, except that the prerogative is part of the Common Law while Privilege is the law and custom of Parliament" (Chalmers and Hood Phillip's "Constitutional Law of Great Britain, British Empire and Commonwealth", p. 98, 6th Edition).

There is a long and eventful history of the clash of the jurisdiction of courts on the one hand and authority of the Parliament claimed by it for the exercise of its privileges on the other. The outstanding of the earlier cases, a case which throws considerable light on the nature of the privilege, is that of Stockdale v. Hansard (1839), 9 Ad. & E. 1.; 8 L.J.Q.B. 294; 3 St. Tr. (N.S.) 723.

Stockdale vs. Hansard.

The facts of that case were that in a certain report printed and sold by the firm of Hansard under the order of the House of Commons, a certain medical book published by Stockdale, was described as "disgusting and obscene". An action for libel was brought by Stockdale against Hansard who, in defence, urged that the alleged libel could not form subject matter of an action in that having been published under the authority of House of Commons it became part of its proceedings and could not validly form the subject of action in a court of law. Repelling this contention Lord Denman, C.J., observed (at p. 850):—

"The supremacy of Parliament, the foundation on which the claim is made to rest, appears to me completely to overturn it, because the House of Commons is not Parliament, but only a co-ordinate and component part of the Parliament. That sovereign power can make and unmake the laws; but the concurrence of the three legislative estates is necessary; the resolution of any one of them cannot alter the law, or place anyone beyond its control. The proposition is, therefore, wholly untenable, and abhorrent to the first principles of England.

"The next defence involved in this plea is, that the defendants committed the grievance by order of the House of Commons in a case of privilege, and that each House of Parliament is the sole judge of its own privileges . . .

"Parliament is said to be supreme; I most fully acknowledge its supremacy.

It follows, then, as before observed, that neither branch of it is supreme when acting by itself. It is also said that the privilege of each House is the privilege of the whole Parliament. In one sense I agree to this: because whatever impedes the proper action of either impedes those functions which are necessary for the performance of their joint duties. All the essential parts of a machine must be in order before it can work at all. But it by no means follows that the opinion that either House may entertain of the extent of its own privileges is correct, or its declaration of them binding . . . ”

And further at page 851, it was observed :—

“That Parliament enjoys privileges of the most important character, no person capable of the least reflection can doubt for a moment. Some are common to both Houses, some peculiar to each; all are essential to the discharge of their functions. If they were not the fruit of deliberation in aulia regia, they rest on the stronger ground of a necessity which became apparent at least as soon as the two Houses took their present position in the State.

“Thus the privilege of having their debates unquestioned, though denied when members began to speak their minds freely in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and punished in its exercise both by that Princess and her two successors, was soon clearly perceived to be indispensable and universally acknowledged. By consequence, whatever is done within the walls of either assembly must pass without question in any other place. For speeches made in Parliament by a member to the prejudice of any other person, or hazardous to the public peace, that member enjoys complete impunity. But it is said that the courts of law must be excluded from all interference with transactions in which the name of privilege has been mentioned because they have no means of informing themselves what these privileges are. They are well known, it seems to the two Houses, and to every member of them, as long as he continues a Member; but the knowledge is as incomunicable as the privileges to all beyond that pale. It might be presumption to ask how this knowledge may be obtained, had not the Attorney-General read to us all he had to urge on the subject from works accessible to all, and familiar to every man of education. The argument here seems to run in a circle. The Courts cannot be entrusted with any matter connected with privilege, because they know nothing about privilege; and this ignorance must be perpetual, because the law has taken such matters out of their cognizance. The old text-book writers, indeed, affirm the law and custom of Parliament, although a part of the lex terrae, to be ab omnibus quaesita, a multis ignorata. This and other phrases, repeated in the law books, have thrown a kind of mystery over the subject, which has kept aloof the application of reason and common sense.”

The case of Stockdale v. Hansard as even the earlier case Burdett v. Abbott decided in (1811), 14 East p. 1: 104 English Reports, p. 501 (this last mentioned case provides one of the principal authorities for the power of the House of Commons to commit for contempt as the case of Lord Shaftesbury does for Lords, see 6 State Trials 1269 (1677)), made it clear that some of the claims to jurisdiction made by the House of Commons in the name of privilege were untenable in courts of law. The position taken up by the courts was that the law of the Parliament was a part of the general law and that its principles were not beyond the judicial knowledge of Judges and that it was the duty of the common law courts to define its limits. There was, however, a counter-claim acknowledged by the courts themselves that there was a certain sphere within which the jurisdiction of the House exercised in the name of privilege was absolute and exclusive.

In the case of Bradlaugh v. Gossett (1884), 12 Q.B.D. 271, it was decided that the House of Commons is not subject to the control of the courts in the administration of that part of law which relates to its internal proceedings only and that even if its interpretation of a statute prescribing rights within its walls is erroneous, the court has no power to interfere. The facts of this case were as follows: Charles Bradlaugh who had been elected as a member of the Parliament was not being allowed by the House to take the oath and a resolution was passed by the House in the following terms :—

Bradlaugh
vs. Gossett.

“That the Serjeant-at-Arms do exclude Mr. Bradlaugh from the House until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House.”

Mr. Bradlaugh agreed to give this undertaking but was further told that he would be excluded until he engaged not to attempt to take the oath in disregard of the resolution of the House. Mr. Bradlaugh tried to enter the House but was forcibly ejected by Serjeant-at-Arms (Gossett). Bradlaugh approached the court for an injunction to prevent Mr. Gossett from enforcing the order of the House and for a declaration that the order was void. On behalf of the defendant it was pleaded that the plaintiff's case was not founded on any cause of action known to law. The legal question that arose in the case was formulated by Stephen J. as follows :—

“Suppose that the House of Commons forbids one of its members to do that which an Act of Parliament requires him to do, and, in order to enforce its prohibition, directs its executive officer to exclude him from the House, by force if necessary, is such an order one which we can declare to be void and restrain the executive officer of the House from carrying out?”

The Court held that it had no such power and observed, “I think that the House of Commons is not subject to the control of Her Majesty's Courts in its administration of that part of the statute law which has relation to its own internal proceedings, and that the use of such actual force as may be necessary to carry into effect such a resolution as the one before us is justifiable . . . ”

The real point of controversy in the above mentioned case that arose for determination was, whether a resolution passed by the House of Commons could be allowed to abrogate the Act passed by the Parliament—that is the Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866 which prescribes the course of proceedings to be followed on the occasion of the election of members of the Parliament. The court dealt with this argument in the following words:

“In order to raise the question now before us, it is necessary to assume that the House of Commons has come to a resolution inconsistent with the Act; for, if the resolution and the Act are not inconsistent, the plaintiff has obviously no grievance. We must, of course, face this supposition, and give our decision upon the hypothesis of its truth; but it would be indecent and improper to make the further supposition that the House of Commons deliberately and intentionally defies and breaks the statute law. The more decent, and, I may add, the more natural and probable, supposition is that, for reasons which are not before us, and which we are therefore unable to judge, the House of Commons considers that there is no inconsistency between the Act and the Resolution. They may think there is some implied exception to the Act. They may think that what the plaintiff proposes to do is not in compliance with its directions. With this we have nothing to do; but whatever may be the reasons of the House of Commons for their conduct, it would be impossible for us to do justice without hearing and considering those reasons; but it would be equally impossible for the House, with any regard for its own dignity and independence, to suffer its reasons to be laid before us for that purpose, or to accept our interpretation of law in preference to its own. It seems to follow that the House of Commons has the exclusive power of interpreting the statute, so far as the regulation of its own proceedings within its own walls is concerned; and that even if that interpretation should be erroneous this Court has no power to interfere with it, directly or indirectly. . . .

Meaning of the expression
"Internal Proceedings of the House."

"It would, as I have already said, be wrong for us to suggest or assume that the House acted otherwise than in accordance with its own view of the law; and, as we know not what that view is, nor by what arguments it is supported, we can give no opinion upon it. I do not say that the resolution of the House is the judgment of a Court not subject to our revision, but it has much in common with such a judgment. The House of Commons is not a Court of Justice; but the effect of its privilege to regulate its own internal concerns practically invests it with a judicial character when it has to apply to particular cases the provisions of Acts of Parliament. We must presume that it discharges this function properly and with due regard to the laws, in the making of which it has so great a share. If its determination is not in accordance with law, this resembles the case of an error by a Judge whose decision is not subject to appeal. There is nothing startling in the recognition of the fact that such an error is possible"

The important question for the determination of the courts in each case that is likely to present some difficulty is to determine what are and what are not internal proceedings of either House. The guidance that can be furnished from a study of the several cases on this question may be briefly stated as follows:

(1) If there is a matter concerning the proceedings of the House 'confined within its own walls' it is a matter over which courts have no jurisdiction.

(2) There may be a situation in which the act complained of might be a crime in which case the privilege cannot be claimed: in respect of such an act it could hardly be claimed that it is an act done in the course of internal proceedings of the House.

(3) But where the proceedings of the House affect prejudicially the rights of person exercisable outside the House, the person who acts as the agent of the House of Commons in giving effect to its decisions or orders, would be amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts and whenever the order of the House is pleaded in defence the courts would be competent to enquire into the question whether the House was entitled to make such an order and thus in fact decide whether the privilege claimed by the House is one which it would recognise in justification of the act of the person proceeded against.

The expression "proceedings in Parliament" has nowhere been defined. Having regard to its ordinary meaning the expression ought to embrace the action taken by the House which it is competent to take in relation to the business entrusted to it and would include the entirety of the process by which it reaches the decision which it is entitled to take. This would include the means by which members influence the decision in the House, i.e. by speeches, by actual voting, by giving notices of motion, by presentation of the reports of the committees etc. The persons who would be protected in relation to such acts are not merely the members of the Parliament but would include strangers who take part in those proceedings by way of giving evidence before it or who are a part of its organization established for the purpose of carrying out its orders. The remarks of the Canadian Judge, O'Connoer, in Rex v. Bunting, 7 Ontario Reports (1884-5), p. 563, indicate the nature and extent of the limits within which a Member of the Parliament is deemed not to be amenable to the ordinary courts for anything he may say or do in the Parliament.

"I desire it to be understood, however", says the learned Judge, "that I do not hold that a member of Parliament is not amenable to the ordinary courts for anything he may say or do in Parliament. I merely say he is not so amenable for anything he may say or do within the scope of his duties in the course of parliamentary business, for in such matters he is privileged and protected by lex et consuetudo parliamenti."

Having regard to the observations of Mr. Justice Stephen in the case of Bradlaugh v.

Gossett referred to above, namely that he "knew of no authority for the proposition that an ordinary crime committed in the House of Commons would be withdrawn from the ordinary course of criminal justice", it would appear that in England a distinction is drawn between criminal speech in the House which cannot form the subject-matter of an action in court outside the Parliament and other criminal acts which can form the subject-matter of adjudication by courts of law. This distinction appears to have been drawn in deference to the language of ART. 9 of the Bill of Rights, which extends unqualified and absolute immunity to the Members in respect of their right of free speech during "the course of transacting parliamentary business." It is on this account that English Courts will decline jurisdiction in cases of action connected with a criminal speech to which a Member in the House of Parliament is party as distinguished from his other criminal acts which it would be within the competence of courts to enquire into and adjudicate. "But this rule", says Erskine May in his Parliamentary Practice, "is not without exception, and both the rule and the exception will be found to depend upon whether the particular act can or cannot be regarded as a proceeding in Parliament." (p. 65).

With regard to the immunity attaching to "proceedings in Parliament" as covering matters arising outside Parliament by virtue of their specially close relation to the proceedings in Parliament, the question stands on entirely a different principle altogether. In this connection we might notice the case reported in (1935) 1 K.B., p. 594, Rex v. Graham-Campbell and others, ex parte Herbert, which has some relevance to the issue under consideration. This was a case in which the members of the Kitchen Committee of the House of Commons, who were controlling the arrangements in the refreshment department of the House, and the Manager of the Refreshment Department were sought to be summoned upon an application made by Mr. Herbert for answering a charge of having violated provisions in s.65(1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, in that they had sold intoxicating liquors which they had not been duly licensed to sell. The Magistrate refused to issue summons holding that he had no jurisdiction and the King's Bench Division upheld his decision. Chief Justice Lord Hewart delivering the judgment of the court remarked as follows :

"I do not propose to review the long line of cases which have been cited to us. It seems to me that the authorities relied upon by the Attorney-General are much in point, in particular, Burdett v. Abbott (14 East 1); Stockdale v. Hansard (9, A. & E.1); and Bradlaugh v. Gossett (12 Q.B.D., 271). It was manifest to the Magistrate, as well from the documents which were before him as from the argument offered to him, that he was being called upon to deal with the House of Commons, acting by means of its Kitchen Committee and the Manager of the Refreshment Department. To pass over many other authorities, I think the decision of Lord Denman C.J., in Stockdale v. Hansard is sufficient for the present purpose; in the course of his judgment he said this (8 L. J., Q.B., at p. 298; 9 Ad. & E., at p. 115): 'The Commons of England are not invested with more of power and dignity by their legislative character than by that which they bear as the grand inquest of the nation. All the privileges that can be required for the energetic discharge of the duties inherent in that high trust are conceded without a murmur or a doubt.' Here, as it seems to me, the learned Chief Magistrate was entitled to say upon facts which were established that, in the matter complained of, the House of Commons was acting collectively in a matter falling within the ambit of the internal affairs of the House, and, that being so, any tribunal might well upon the authorities, feel a quite invincible reluctance to interfere. To take the opposite course might conceivably be, in proceedings of a somewhat different character from these, after the various stages of those proceedings had been passed, to make the House of Lords the arbiter of the privilege of the House of Commons.

Rex vs.
Graham
Campbell.

"More than that, with the greatest respect to the observations of my illustrious predecessor, Lord Russel of Killowen, C.J., in Williamson v. Norris, (1899) 1 Q.B. 7, 12) it appears to me that the bulk of the provisions of the Licensing Acts are quite inapplicable to the House of Commons. It was conceded candidly enough by counsel that if there were no jurisdiction to adjudicate in a case brought against the Members of the Kitchen Committee it followed there was no jurisdiction to adjudicate in a case against the Manager of the Refreshment Department.

"For these reasons, I am clearly of the opinion that these rules ought to be discharged."

Having considered the attitude of the English Courts to the question relating to the privileges of the Parliament in England, it now remains, briefly, to notice the content or the substance of the actual privileges that are enjoyed by the members individually and the Parliament collectively.

The Bill of Rights, 1689, guarantees to the members of the Parliament absolute freedom of speech for debates and proceedings in the House. Similarly, disclosures made in Parliament which amount to violation of Official Secrets Act 1911-39, cannot be a subject-matter of prosecution. It is possible by law to provide that the violation of any secret even during the course of parliamentary proceedings would not be immune from becoming the subject-matter of an action in the court of law, for, in such cases the Parliamentary privilege becomes expressly subservient to the law of the land. Within these limits words spoken in connection with the performance of the duties as a member of the House are protected. Similarly, there is the right of the House to publish its own proceedings and also to restrain others to undertake publication of its proceedings. This right was recognised in England by the Parliamentary Papers Acts, 1840 to undo the effect of the decision in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard (9 A & E.1), wherein it was decided that the publication of the proceedings of the parliament under its own authority did not save a publisher from common law actions relating to libel etc.

Then there is a privilege of freedom from arrest which a member of the Parliament enjoys. This privilege is available only in the case of civil proceedings for a period extending from a point of time 40 days before the meeting of the parliament until the expiry of 40 days period after the last meeting. The criminal charges for indictable offences are not saved by this privilege nor can the orders relating to the detention of the members by competent authorities passed in pursuance of its powers, be rendered ineffective in the face of such privilege.

75. Privileges of the Members of the Assemblies: The Constitutional Position in our Country.

For the proper understanding of the provisions of our Constitution relating to the privileges of the members of the legislature—National and Provincial—as also the privileges of the Houses themselves and of their officers, it is necessary to carefully examine the text of the two articles mentioned earlier as also to bear in view the legislative history of these provisions.

Under ART. 56 (5), we have the following :

"Subject to this Article, the privileges of the National Assembly, the committees and members thereof, and the persons entitled to speak therein, may be determined by Act of Parliament."

In other words, Article 56 does not give exhaustive enumeration of the privileges of the persons and authorities mentioned therein but it only contains what might be called the 'fundamental privileges' and leaves the matter of providing the remaining privileges to be consummated by means of an Act of Parliament.

Under ART. 224 of our Constitution all existing laws, save those that have been repealed under ART. 221, have been continued with the result that the provisions of Constituent Assembly (Proceedings and Privileges) Act, 1955, are still valid law. S. 4 of this Act (which received the assent of the Governor General on the 28th July, 1955, and was published for general information in the Gazette Extraordinary, dated the 6th August 1955), provided as follows :—

(1) Subject to the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, in its application to the Federal Legislature and to the rules of procedure of the Assembly, there shall be freedom of speech in the Assembly.

(2) No member of the Assembly shall be liable to any proceedings in any court in respect of anything said or any vote given by him in the Assembly or in any committee thereof, and no person shall be so liable in respect of the publication by or under the authority of the Assembly of any report, paper, votes or proceedings.

(3) The validity of any proceedings in the Assembly shall not be called in question on the ground of any alleged irregularity of procedure.

(4) No officer or other member of the Assembly in whom powers are vested by or under any law for regulating procedure or the conduct of business, or for maintaining order, in the Assembly shall be subject to the jurisdiction of any court in respect of the exercise by him of these powers.

(5) In other respects, the powers, privileges and immunities of the Assembly, and of the members and committees thereof, shall be those of the Commons' House of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of its members and committees at the date of commencement of this Act.

(6) The provisions of this section shall apply to persons who have the right to speak in, and otherwise to take part in the proceedings of the Federal Legislature or any committee thereof, as they apply to members of the Assembly.

(7) This section shall apply to the Assembly when functioning under sub-section (1) of S. 8 of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, and when functioning as Federal Legislature, and Ss. 28 and 41 of the Government of India Act, 1935, shall be repealed."

It will be seen from the 7th clause of the above quoted section that the privileges mentioned in the section were available to the Federal Legislature as well as to the Constituent Assembly and that the previous statement of privileges, which was contained in sections 28 and 41 of the Government of India Act, 1935, had been repealed by it. Prior to the coming into force of the Constituent Assembly (Proceedings and Privileges) Act, 1955, sections 28 and 41 of the Government of India Act, 1935, contained the law relating to the privileges of the Federal Legislature. In the 5th clause of this section reference was made to the application of the powers, privileges and immunities of the Assembly, of its members and committees "in other respects" shall be similar to those of the House of Commons of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of its members and committees at the date of the commencement of this Act.

In view of the fact that the present legal position with regard to the privileges of the National Assembly and its members would be deducible from the combined operation of ART. 56 of our Constitution and S. 4 of the Constituent Assembly (Proceedings and Privileges) Act, 1955, it would seem to follow that the law relating to the privileges, powers and immunities of the Assembly, its members and its committees, would be the same as was in the text of ART. 56 of our

Comment on
Constitution.

force on the date of the coming into force of this Act in England in respect of the House of Commons, its members and committees. (See also para 6 of the Fourth Schedule).

A few words by way of comment on the text of ART. 56 would serve to show the precise nature of the privilege that has been constitutionally guaranteed to the members of the National Assembly. The first clause renders immune "the validity of any proceedings in the National Assembly from being questioned in any court." The legislative predecessor of this clause is the third clause of 4th section of the Constituent Assembly (Proceedings and Privileges) Act, 1955, which had confined the immunity to the validity of any proceedings from being called into question only on the ground of any alleged irregularity of procedure. In S. 41 of the Government of India Act, which was replaced by the present clause, the language employed was: "the validity of any proceedings in the federal legislature shall not be called in question on the ground of any alleged irregularity of procedure." The Federal legislature under the Government of India Act comprised of one Chamber and the Governor-General, as under our Constitution to-day it comprises of National Assembly and the President. The words "on the ground of any alleged irregularity of procedure" in the section were words of limitation, and were designedly put into the section for the purpose of enabling a challenge being made on the constitutional validity of the laws passed by the Federal Legislature. Now, of course, ART. 56 gives the immunity to the proceedings not of the Parliament but of the Federal Assembly, but makes the immunity sweeping and absolute.

Ahmad Saeed
Kirmani vs.
Fazal Ellahi
and others.

The principal point for judicial interpretation that arose in the case of Ahmad Saeed Kirmani v. Fazal Ellahi and others (See PLD (1956) Lahore, p. 807) was whether High Court in the exercise of its powers under ART. 170 concerning its competence to issue prerogative writs, orders and directions etc., could go into the allegations made by the petitioner which had reference to the validity of the election of the Speaker that took place in the interim Provincial Assembly of West Pakistan. The leading judgment was delivered by Chief Justice Rahman, and there are two concurrent judgments delivered by Mr. Justice Kayani and Mr. Justice Shabbir Ahmed, that seem to proceed on a somewhat different approach to the legal problem that arose for Their Lordships' determination on the following facts:

On 20th of May, 1956, the Interim Assembly of West Pakistan met in the Assembly building under the Chairmanship of Mr. Mumtaz Hasan Qizilbash, who had been appointed to discharge the function of the temporary Speaker by the Governor. The main business before the Assembly was the election of the Speaker. Two names were proposed for the office—one that of Mir Ghulam Ali Talpur from the Muslim League Party and the other that of Ch. Fazal Ellahi from the Republican Party. There was a division and ultimately it was found that there was a tie between the two candidates. The Chairman by his casting vote declared Chaudhry Fazal Ellahi to be the elected Speaker of the Assembly. In a petition for a writ of qua warranto, mandamus or any other appropriate writ, order or direction the validity of these election proceedings was challenged. One of the grounds alleged was that at least two of the persons, who were elected members of the House, were not freely able to exercise their right to vote for the candidate of their choice, in that some members of the opposite party did not allow them to vote and that coercion had been used. On these facts the question arose whether it was open to the High Court to question the validity of election proceedings and ART 89 of our Constitution came in directly for interpretation. Different interpretations of this Article were pressed upon the attention of the Court during the course of argument. The view of the matter taken in the leading judgment delivered by Chief Justice Mr. Rahman may be gathered from the following extract (at p. 815):—

"I am conscious of the fact that the language of ART. 89 is general and contains no words of limitation. Full effect, therefore, must be given to the language employed by the Legislature, and, as contended by Mr. Brohi, if the text is explicit, it should be regarded as conclusive alike in what it directs and what it forbids. As has been observed above, however, Mr Brohi himself recognised exceptions in certain instances which would justify the issue of a writ to a Speaker of the Provincial Assembly, notwithstanding the provisions of ART. 89. I am unable to assent to the intractable proposition advanced by the learned Attorney-General of Pakistan that the jurisdiction of this Court is ousted completely and absolutely, in all circumstances, in respect of proceedings, of whatever character, in the Provincial Assembly, even if the objection taken may not directly affect the formal validity of the proceedings but may involve an indirect challenge to its legal effect. The learned Attorney-General evidently would regard the 'proceedings' in the Assembly to be sacrosanct, though they may amount to nothing more than decisions obtained at pistol point, by a coterie of adventurous politicians. I have formed the opinion that in a proper case the writ jurisdiction of this court could be legitimately invoked where, for instance, the so-called proceedings in the Assembly are really outside the purview of the Constitution Act. The complete ouster of jurisdiction of Civil Courts is not to be readily inferred from special legislation. Under section 9 of the Civil Procedure Code jurisdiction is vested in civil courts to try all questions of a civil nature except those whose cognizance is either expressly or impliedly barred. For the purpose of this case, however, it appears to be unnecessary to indicate the precise limits within which the jurisdiction of this court must be confined, consistently with ART. 89 of the Constitution. On the facts as they appear from the material on record before us, the instant case is not a suitable one for that jurisdiction to be exercised."

Mr. Kayani, J., however, regarded the matter somewhat differently. His Lordship desired to take a more definite attitude towards the jurisdiction of High Courts. His Lordship proceeded (much in the manner in which Lord Hewart began his book "New Despotism") to observe (at 818):

"The question here is not so complex as in the poem beginning with 'O! what's the matter? what's the matter?' For my part I was at no stage afflicted with any doubt. The matter is simply this: on the one hand, the High Court has transcendent power under ART. 170 of the Constitution—not subject to any other provision, and notwithstanding the powers of Supreme Court under ART. 22—to issue to any person or authority, directions, orders or writs for the enforcement of the 'Fundamental Rights, and for any other purpose.' On the other hand, ART. 89 requires that the validity of any proceeding in the Provincial Assembly shall not be questioned in any court'..."

The learned Judge held that in his view the election of the Speaker is undoubtedly a proceeding in the Assembly, and if the matter were confined to the mere validity of the election, the Court will have no jurisdiction, but the learned Judge proceeded to observe:—

"...but the proceedings in the Assembly may be so vitiated by something repugnant to the principles of natural justice or antagonistic to a fundamental right or perhaps even shocking to recognised procedure that it loses the right of being called a proceeding.

"Mr. Nazir Ahmad Khan illustrated the point by introducing two members who make others vote for a measure at the point of guns. The gunmen need not be members; they may be goondas sitting in the distinguished visitors' gallery. As the members proceed to the lobbies, they look at the gunmen and change their direction. The measure is voted by an ostensible proceeding in the Assembly. But, is that a proceeding? Mr. Fayyaz Ali says it is, and Mr. Brohi says it is not."

The essential question before the Court was to interpret the Constitution and to give effect to the prohibition contained in ART. 89. To construe that Article as empowering courts to determine whether or not, upon certain allegations as to what had actually taken place in the Assembly, was a proceeding of the protected category, would be to rob it of the whole of its content. With all respect to the learned Judge, it is submitted that upon a plain construction of that Article there is no room for an argument that a Court of Law is at all competent to go behind the proceedings just to be able to determine whether or not by reason of the existence of fraud, mala fides and coercion, proceedings in the Assembly have been vitiated. ART. 170 is confined to remedies and has nothing to do with the rights that have to be enforced. It is ART. 89 that had to be interpreted to see the full effect of prohibition contained in it.

Following observation of the learned Judge needs careful consideration, for it sets forth the basis of his approach to the principles of interpretation of our Constitution (p. 821) :

"Let our fondness for drawing parallels be subdued for once we cannot conscientiously compare our democratic institutions and their privileges to countries like England and America. Our growth has not been natural. We have had winters, when there was no growth at all; and we have had rainy seasons, with plenty of mushroom growth. The people in their very wise wisdom have chosen to give their institutions only a few limited privileges, and in their wisdom they have thought it fit to invest the High Court to issue directions 'for any... purpose.' It is, therefore, proper that we should not allow these privileges to exceed their purpose."

It is submitted with respect that expression "any other purpose", appearing in ART. 170 can only be read ejusdem generis and has reference to the enforcement of rights. There must be a right of some sort before its invasion can be made the subject matter of complaint in a court of law and ART. 89 has been expressly designed to say that no such right exists. The appeal, if any, must therefore lie in a forum other than a court of law. It is submitted that the approach to the interpretation of Constitutional instruments adopted in the words just quoted is not in accord with the previous state of the law on the subject and for this reference should be made to the Chapter, "Nature, structure and reach of judicial power".

No study of the case would be complete without making a reference to the following observation of Justice Shabbir Ahmad (p. 828): "What is protected is the proceedings of the Assembly and to say that all that is done in the Assembly Chamber is the proceeding of the Assembly is an interpretation which no one will accept."

The learned Judge then proceeded to observe:

"Now clause (b) of ART. 88 of the Constitution enjoins that the decisions of the Provincial Assembly shall be taken by the majority of the persons present and voting. If a Bill had been declared by the Speaker to have been passed by the Assembly not because there had been voting on it but because the members present had agreed to the matter being decided by the result of a boxing bout between the Leader of the House and the Leader of the Opposition and this fact were established, will the Court of Law be powerless and be bound to accept the proceedings as valid though they were in contravention of the procedure of the Constitutional itself?"

In the opinion of the present writer even in the case visualised by the learned Judge the Court would not have the power to enquire into the validity of the proceedings. There is no provision in our law which enables the Courts to enforce the Constitution in the teeth of prohibitions contained in the Constitution itself debarring them from doing so. ART. 170 does not confer a general power upon the Courts to become the Grand Inquest of the Nation: remedies sanctioned by it are available subject to the express provisions of the Constitution to the contrary effect. And ART. 89, is only one such provision.

National Assembly—and its Power to commit for contempt.

It now remains to be considered whether and, if so, to what extent, the National Assembly has the power to commit persons for contempt of its authority. It should be remembered that ART. 218 expressly declares that "Court" does not include the National or a Provincial Assembly or any committee of such Assembly" clearly suggesting that the Assemblies set up under the Constitution are not Courts—and therefore have not the powers of Courts to punish contempts of their authority. The Government of India Act, 1935, in the 3rd and 4th clauses of S. 28 had provided as follows :—

"(3) Nothing in any existing Indian Act, and notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this section, nothing in this Act, shall be construed as conferring or empowering the Federal Legislature to confer, on either Chamber or on both the Chambers sitting together or on any Committee or Officer of the Legislature, the status of a Court, or any punitive or disciplinary powers other than a power to remove or exclude persons infringing the rules or standing orders or otherwise behaving in a disorderly manner.

"(4) Provision may be made by an Act of Federal Legislature for the punishment, on conviction before a court, of persons who refuse to give evidence or produce documents before a Committee of a Chamber when duly required by the Chairman of the Committee so to do;

Provided that any such Act shall have effect subject to such rules regulating the attendance before such Committees of persons who are, or have been, in the service of the Crown in India, and safeguarding confidential matter from disclosure, as may be made by the Governor-General exercising his individual judgment."

This clear prohibition which was contained in the Government of India Act excluded the possibility of the exercise of any powers for punishing contempts being assumed by the Federal Legislature (or by the Provincial Legislature for which see the 3rd and 4th clauses of S. 71). Upon the creation of Pakistan, as a result of the coming into force of the provisions of Indian Independence Act, 1947, the Government of India Act was adapted by the then Governor-General and considerable number of modifications of a rather far-reaching character were made in its text in order to make it serve as the Provisional Constitution of the new Dominion of Pakistan. The 3rd and 4th clauses of S. 28 and their counterparts in section 71 were eliminated in 1947 at the time the Act was adapted, but it would appear that right up to the passing of Pakistan Constituent Assembly (Proceedings and Privileges) Act, 1955, no provision had been made to invest the Federal Legislature with any powers by resort to which it could punish contempts. As has been remarked earlier in the 5th clause of S. 4 of the said Act, this provision was made and the powers, privileges and immunities of the Federal Legislature, and even of the Constituent Assembly that passed this law, were placed on par with those enjoyed at the commencement of that Act by the House of Commons of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of its members and committees. Presumably, this provision was copied from ART. 105 of the Indian Constitution which by then had been passed; for, the language employed in the 3rd clause of that Article is practically the same as the one employed in the 4th clause of S. 4 of the Pakistan Act.

The result, therefore, is that by reason of the continuance of this law by virtue of ART. 217 read with 6th para of the Fourth schedule and ART. 224, the National Assembly has now the power to punish contempt much in the manner in which the Parliament in England would have been able to do on the day of the commencement of that Act, namely on 28th July, 1955.

Could it be validly argued that the power to punish contempts cannot be affirmed in favour of the National Assembly since that Power being a judicial power (and the enjoyment of which power even by Parliament in England belongs to it by reason of its being a Court) would seem to be excluded by reason of the fact that our National Assembly is not a Court. The present writer is, however, of the opinion that this contention is not a sound one for the reason that there are many bodies that exercise judicial power but are not courts stricto sensu. The reason why in ART. 218, the word "Court" has been defined to exclude Assemblies, National or Provincial, or any of their Committees, is to save their proceedings against the application of those constitutional prohibitions which are aimed at excluding the power of the Courts to inquire into certain matters. For instance, during impeachment proceedings, which are undoubtedly judicial proceedings, the President may plead that ART 37(2) bars evidence being led as to the nature of advice tendered to him on the ground that the Assembly was a court for all practical purposes. ART. 218 is aimed at meeting that kind of objection—and not that the Assembly cannot enjoy powers of punishing contempts.

In the context of this constitutional position it becomes necessary to discover the precise extent of this power of the House of Commons in England to punish contempts. For a full discussion of the problem posed here reference should be made to the statement of law contained in Sir T. Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, (p. 109-149) and Halsbury's Laws of England, second Edition, Vol. 24, pp. 344 to 359.

Re Sheriff of Middlesex.

In the case of the Sheriff of Middlesex reported in (1840) 11, A and E 273—Queen's Bench, power to commit for contempt was considered. This case was a sequel and arose out of the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, to which reference has been made earlier. The Sheriff of Middlesex in pursuance of the authority from the Court of Queen's Bench, attached the property of Messrs. Hansard who had been adjudged guilty of having defamed Stockdale. The House of Commons committed this Sheriff for contempt. Upon a petition to court for a writ of habeas corpus having been lodged, the court directed the return of that writ and the Serjeant-at-Arms made a return to the effect that detention of the Sheriff had taken place under the warrant and authority of the Speaker of the House of Commons. Lord Denman C.J., during the course of judgment in the case observed, "In the present case I am obliged to say that I find no authority under which we are entitled to discharge these gentlemen from their imprisonment". The basis of this decision can be gathered from the following words appearing in the judgment:—

"There is something in the nature of the Houses themselves which carries with it the authority that has been claimed; though, in discussing such questions, the last important decision is always referred to. Instances have been pointed out in which the Crown has exerted its prerogative in a manner now considered illegal, and the Courts have acquiesced; but the cases are not analogous. The Crown has no right which it can exercise otherwise than by process of law and through amenable officers; but representative bodies must necessarily vindicate their authority by means of their own; and those means lie in the process of committal for contempt. This applies not to the Houses of Parliament only, but (as was observed in Burdett v. Abbott, 1811, 14 East, p. 1), to the Courts of Justice, which, as well as the Houses, must be liable to continual obstruction and insult if they were not entrusted with such powers. It is unnecessary to discuss the question whether each House of Parliament be, or be not, a Court; it is clear that they cannot exercise their proper functions without the power of protecting themselves against interference. The test of the authority of the House of Commons in this respect, submitted by Lord Eldon to the Judges in Burdett v. Abbott (1817), 5 Dow, 199, was, whether, if the Court of Common Pleas had adjudged an act to be a contempt of Court, and committed for it, stating the adjudication generally, the Court of King's Bench, on a habeas corpus setting-forth the warrant, would discharge the prisoner because the facts and circumstances of the contempt were not stated. A negative answer being given, Lord Eldon, with the concurrence of Lord Erskine (who had before been adverse to the exercise of jurisdiction), and without a dissentient voice from the House, affirmed the judgment below. And we must presume that what any court, much more what either House of Parliament, acting on great legal authority, takes upon it to pronounce a contempt, is so."

It would be noticed from this judgment that Lord Denman C.J., placed a great deal of reliance in the observation made by Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in the case of Burdett v. Abbot, (1811, 104 E.R. 501: 14 East 1). Following extract from the judgment is reproduced to enable the student to appreciate the argument: (at p. 554)—

"The privileges which belong to them seem at all times to have been, and necessarily must be, inherent in them, independent of any precedent; it is necessary that they should have the most complete personal security, to enable them freely to meet for the purpose of discharging their important functions, and also that they should have the right of self-protection; I do not mean merely against acts of individual wrong; for poor and impotent indeed would be the privileges of Parliament, if they could not also protect themselves against injuries and affronts offered to the aggregate body, which might prevent or impede the full and effectual exercise of their Parliamentary functions. This is an essential right necessarily inherent in the supreme legislature of the kingdom, and of course as necessarily inherent in the Parliament assembled in two Houses as in one. The right of self-protection implies, as a consequence, a right to use the necessary means for rendering such self-protection effectual. Independently, therefore, of any precedents or recognised practice on the subject, such a body must a priori be armed with a competent authority to enforce the free and independent exercise of its own proper functions, whatever those functions might be. On this ground it has been, I believe, very generally admitted in argument, that the House of Commons must be and is authorised to remove any immediate obstruction to the due course of its own proceedings. But this mere power of removing actual impediments to its proceedings would not be sufficient for the purpose of its full and efficient protection; it must also have the power of protecting itself from insult and indignity wherever offered, by punishing those who offer it. Can the High Court of Parliament, or either or the two Houses, of which it consists, be deemed not to possess intrinsically that authority of punishing summarily for contempts, which is acknowledged to belong, and is daily exercised as belonging to every superior court of law, of less dignity undoubtedly than itself? And is not the degradation and disparagement of the two Houses of Parliament in the estimation of the public, by contemptuous libels, as much an impediment to their efficient acting with regard to the public, as the actual obstruction of an individual member by bodily force, in his endeavour to resort to the place where Parliament is holden? And would it consist with the dignity of such bodies, or what is more, with the immediate and effectual exercise of their important functions, that they should wait the comparatively tardy result of a prosecution in the ordinary course of law, for the vindication of their privileges from wrong and insult? The necessity of the case would, therefore, upon principles of natural reason, seem to require that such bodies, constituted for such purposes, and exercising such functions as they do, should possess the powers which the history of the earliest times shows that they have in fact possessed and used."

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case reported in Kielley v. Carson, 4 Moore's P.C. 63 (over-ruling Beaumont v. Barrett in 1 Moore's P.C. 59 but See also Fenton v. Hampden, 11 Moore's P.C. 347), had occasion to deal with the question relating to the power of a Colonial Legislature to punish for contempts committed outside the House. It was held that in the absence of express grant no such power could be claimed on behalf of the Colonial Legislative Bodies since they were the mere creatures of the Parliamentary Acts; Burdett vs. Abbott.

Privy Council on the inherent power of the Colonial Legislatures to Commit for Contempt.

Colonial Legislatures, in the absence of express grant, could not claim a power which belonged to the Parliament as a result of immemorial usages, customs and prescription. The point, however, is now academic because the powers of the National Assembly, and its privileges and immunities are the same as those of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom Parliament and it would necessarily have the power to commit for contempts committed outside the House. It should be remembered that the power of the Provincial Assembly to punish contempts would be controlled by the provisions of ART. 89(5), which is in the following terms:—

“Subject to this Article, the privileges of a Provincial Assembly, the committees and members thereof, and the persons entitled to speak therein, may be determined by Act of the Provincial Legislature; but such privileges may not exceed those conferred on the National Assembly, its committees and members, and the persons entitled to speak therein.”

Consequently, Provincial Assemblies by an Act of Provincial Legislature would be able to confer upon themselves the powers analogous to those enjoyed by the National Assembly. As far as the writer is aware, no such legislation so far has been passed by any of the two Provincial Assemblies of Pakistan. Whatever be the state of the enacted law, all non-sovereign Legislative Bodies at least have the power of removing obstruction offered by any one who obstructs the deliberation or proper action by it during the course of transacting official business.

In the case of Thomas William Doyle and others v. George Charles Falconer (1866), 4 Moore's P.C. cases (N.S.) 203, their Lordships of the Privy Council dealt with the question whether in the absence of an express grant, the British Colonial Legislature set up by an Act of Imperial Parliament had the power to punish and commit for contempts, acts committed in its presence upon the ground that the existence of such a power is necessary for the proper functioning of legislative bodies. Their Lordships distinguished between a power to punish for a contempt which is a judicial power, and a power to remove any obstruction offered to the deliberations or proper action of a legislative body during its sittings, which last power is necessary for its self-preservation, and observed:—

“If a Member of a Colonial House of Assembly is guilty of disorderly conduct in the House whilst sitting, he may be removed, or excluded for a time, or even expelled; but there is a great difference between such powers and the judicial power of inflicting a penal sentence for the offence. The right to remove for self-security is one thing, the right to inflict punishment is another. The former is, in Their Lordships' judgment, all that is warranted by the legal maxim that has been cited (Quando lex aliquid concedit, concedere videtur et illud, sine quo res ipso esse non potest), but the latter is not its legitimate consequence.”

No statement of the relationship of the courts to the powers, privileges and immunities of the National and Provincial Assemblies, of their members and committees would be complete without making reference to the total lack of power on the part of the courts of law in this country to direct the legislature by way of mandamus to perform its statutory duties. Courts have no power to issue mandamus, any writ or direction either under ART. 22 or 170, or S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act to the Legislature. All they can do is, subject, of course, to the express prohibitions imposed upon Courts' power to enquire into certain proceedings and acts, to declare its acts as void if they are not in accordance with the Constitution. In the case of Chotey Lal v. The State of Uttar Pradesh, reported in 1951 Allahabad, page 228, para. 13, equivalent to ILR (1951) 2 Allahabad, p. 505, it was observed:

“It is necessary to understand exactly how and in what circumstances Courts declare laws invalid or unconstitutional. Until a bill has become law, the legislative process not being complete, courts do not come into the picture at all. It is not the function of any Court or Judge to declare void or directly annul a law the moment it has been promulgated. Courts are not a supervisory body over the legislature. Their approval or disapproval is not needed for an act passed by the legislature to have the force of law. Their function is interpretative. In other words, upon any particular case coming before them in which the right of any party is involved, they decide whether the Act or any part of it is to be disregarded on the ground of its incompatibility with the Constitution.”

No Mandamus lies against a Legislature.

ART. 175(2) lays down that “Subject to ART. 151, the conduct of a Judge of a Supreme Court or of a High Court shall not be discussed in the National or a Provincial Assembly.” This is a clear prohibition on the privilege of the members of these Houses, and if they proceed to adversely comment upon the conduct of the judges of these superior courts in this country, they will be contravening the Constitution and would not be in a position to invoke the aid of the provisions relating to the privileges of the members to express themselves freely in the Assembly.

76. The Limits on the Executive Power

Our Constitution is not based on any rigid adherence to the principle of separation of powers but nevertheless the language employed in its several Articles shows that the powers of the executive, legislature and judiciary have been more or less clearly defined. Our Constitution talks of the “executive authority of the Federation”, the “executive authority of a Province” (see ARTs. 39 and 73), and vests these authorities in the President of the Republic and the Governor of a Province respectively.

What is the nature of this executive power or authority? There is no definition of executive power or authority in the Constitution itself and it is to be presumed that the framers of the Constitution used it in its ordinary political sense. According to the Wharton's Law Lexicon, “Executive” is “that branch of Government which puts the laws into execution as distinguished from the legislative and judicial branches. The body that deliberates and enacts the law is legislative. The body that judges and applies the laws in particular cases is judicial, and the body that carries the laws into effect, or superintends the enforcement of them, is executive.”

Considering that the power of the Federal executive shall extend to all matters with respect to which Parliament has power to make laws, it would not be wrong to say that the business of the executive is not merely to carry out the laws made by the Legislature but that it also extends to such matters as are within the competence of the Legislature to make laws. Thus it would seem the executive can do all that is not forbidden by the Constitution and law. The difficulty will arise only when any of its actions is challenged as being violative of any of the rights which have been conferred upon the individuals either by the Constitution or by the law. The executive is not above law and it must, when called upon to defend its action, show the legal authority whence it derives the source of its power. If, however, it is not able to show this, its acts, in so far as they conflict with legally protected interests of individuals or groups, must be declared by courts as being beyond its jurisdiction and authority.

To illustrate this constitutional position we might refer to some of the provisions that impose limitations on the State action. Nobody can be deprived of his life, liberty or property, says the Constitution, save in accordance with law. (See ARTs. 5 and 15). Similarly, no taxes could be imposed for the purpose of Federation except by or under the authority of an Act of Parliament (see ART. 60), nor can a tax be levied for the purpose of Province except by or under the authority of the Act of Provincial Legislature (see ART. 93).

The Executive and the Law.

If any acts of the executive that take away people's life, liberty, property, or the acts of the Federal Government imposing taxes, or of a Provincial Government imposing taxes are at all to withstand an attack in courts of law they must be such as can be justified as being those for which legal authority exists in the shape of some provision of the Constitution or the law passed by appropriate legislative organ of the State.

A very interesting problem concerning the constitutional limits of the executive power came up for consideration before a Full Bench of Allahabad High Court in the case Moti Lal and others v. U.P. Government, reported in (1951) Allahabad, p. 257. The question therein raised was whether the Government of a State under the Indian Constitution had the power to carry on trade or business like running a Government Bus Service in the total absence of a legislative enactment authorising the said Government to engage itself in such trade or business. There was a minority judgment that held that the State Government, in the absence of some law enabling it so to do, had not the power to carry on trade or business. The majority decision proceeded upon the view which in the words of Malik C. J., was the following p. (266):

"As regards the right of the State to carry on business or trade without legislative sanction it must be remembered that the State is entitled to hold property and business can mean management of the property or putting it to such use as might yield an income. There is no reason why the State should not have the right to manage its own property and carry on such trade or business as a citizen has right to carry on so long as such activity does not encroach upon the rights of others or is not contrary to law. If money is needed for such an enterprise and the legislature provides funds for it by passing the Appropriation Act and the Finance Act, there is no reason why the State should not be allowed to buy buses and put them on public roads and ply them for hire. If in the interest of the general public and to provide them with transport amenities the Government decides to run transport buses, it would only be discharging one of its primary duties."

The case of Blackpool Corporation v. Locker, (reported in (1948) All E. R. p. 85, : (1948) 1 King's Bench, p. 349,) was held not to be contrary to this principle since in that case the action of the public authority affected prejudicially the right of the citizens which could only be done under the sanction of law.

"It is difficult", said Malik C. J. "to define what is 'Executive Power'. The easiest definition is to say that what is not legislative power or judicial power is executive power, though even this definition is imperfect as the executive can have even judicial and legislative powers. Where there is no written Constitution what is 'executive power' must always depend upon the form of the State and with the change in the form the concept of executive power must also change. In a written Constitution the executive power must be such power as is given to the executive or is amplified, ancillary or inherent. It must include all powers that may be needed to carry into effect the aims and objects of the Constitution."

The expression 'Executive Authority' was also attempted to be explained in the common judgment delivered by Mootham and Wanchoo, JJ., who observed (at p. 281):

"The expression 'executive authority' which is used in the Government of India Act, 1935, is also not there defined, but there can, we think, be no doubt that by that expression was meant those powers which by Section 33 of the earlier Government of India Act, 1915, were conferred on the Governor-General, namely, 'the superintendence, direction and control of the civil and military Government of India.' The question is, as we have said, by no means free from difficulty, but upon the whole we think that we may reasonably infer that the words 'executive power' in the Constitution have substantially the same meaning as 'executive authority' in the Act of 1935, and that it is the superintendence, direction and control of the civil Government of a State which is vested in the Governor of the State. It follows, therefore, we think, that although an executive act by a State Government may not be authorised by legislative enactment it will nevertheless be within the executive power of the State if :

- (i) it is not an act which has been assigned in the Constitution of India to other authorities or bodies such as the legislature, the judiciary or the Public Service Commission ;
- (ii) it is not contrary to the provisions of any law, and
- (iii) it does not encroach upon or otherwise infringe the legal rights of any member of the public . . .

"It has not been shown to us that the act of the State in putting its own buses on the roads is contrary to any law, or that, taken by itself, that act infringes the legal rights of any member of the public. We see, therefore, nothing illegal per se in the State Government running a bus service on the public highway."

The minority judgment of Aggarwala, J., however, proceeded upon the following basis (p. 329) :—

"The Indian Constitution is a written Constitution. Any powers that the different organs of Government enjoy must have their source in that Constitution or in what is necessarily implied from what is stated therein. Thus it may be laid down that the executive powers of the Governments in India must be confined to :

- (a) powers expressly conferred by the Constitution;
- (b) powers expressly conferred by the legislature, and
- (c) implied powers.

Implied powers are also of two kinds :—

- (i) those which vest in the Government by virtue of what is called 'its primary and inalienable functions', or sovereign power, i.e. defending the State against external and internal enemies and maintaining law and order, and
- (ii) those which are necessary for the exercise or performance of a general power conferred or duty enjoined by the Constitution or statutory enactments."

It is submitted, with respect, that Aggarwala, J., in the extract cited above takes a somewhat narrow view of the scope of executive power.

In the case of Rai Sahib Ram Jawaya Kapur and others versus the State of Punjab, decided by the Supreme Court of India, reported in 1955 S.C. (p. 549,) the views of Aggarwala J., referred to above, have been disapproved and considered as "narrow and unsupportable." Mukherjea J., while delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court in the case, remarked: "It may not be possible to frame an exhaustive definition of what executive function means and implies. Ordinarily, the executive power connotes the residue of governmental functions that remain after legislative and the judicial functions are taken away." He further went on to say that (p. 556):

"The Indian Constitution has not indeed recognised the doctrine of separation of powers in its absolute rigidity but the functions of the different parts or branches of government have been sufficiently differentiated and consequently it can very well be said that our Constitution does not contemplate assumption, by one organ or part of the State, of functions that essentially belong to another. The executive indeed can exercise the powers of departmental or subordinate legislation when such powers are delegated to it by the Legislature

"The limits within which the executive government can function under the Indian Constitution can be ascertained without much difficulty by reference to the form of the executive which our Constitution has set up. Our Constitution, though Federal in its structure, is modelled on the British Parliamentary System where the executive is deemed to have the primary responsibility for the formulation of governmental policy and its transmission into law, though the condition precedent to the exercise of this responsibility is its retaining the confidence of the legislative branch of the State."

"The executive function comprises both the determination of the policy as well as carrying it into execution. This evidently includes the initiation of legislation, the maintenance of order, the promotion of social and economic welfare, the direction of foreign policy, in fact the carrying on or supervision of the general administration of the State."

Thus while the Court upheld the right of Government to do business without there being any law passed by the Legislature expressly authorising it so to do, the Court added:

"Specific Legislation may indeed be necessary if the Government require certain powers in addition to what they possess under ordinary law in order to carry on the particular trade or business. Thus when it is necessary to encroach upon private rights in order to enable the government to carry on their business, a specific legislation sanctioning such course would have to be passed."

The Steel Seizure case (1951)

We may, in this connection notice the case of Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. vs. Sawyer (1951) 343, U.S. 579 (also called the Steel Seizure case) where the nature of executive power which the President of U.S. could exercise consistently with the Constitution came in for consideration at the hands of the Supreme Court of that country. The case arose out of an Executive Order passed by President Truman directing the Secretary of Commerce to take possession of and to operate, most of the steel mills throughout the country and to promulgate additional rules and regulations consistent with the policy proclaimed therein. The President claimed that he had the power to act in the way he did in order to avoid national catastrophe which in his judgment must result from carrying into effect the threat of strike that had been given by the Union of the employees of the Steel Industry. Admittedly, there was no statutory authority for the President to seize public property in this fashion, and the question that arose for adjudication was whether an American President had any inherent executive authority to act in the way Truman did in order to meet the emergency.

The Court rejected the contention that the President had any such authority.

"The President's Power", said Mr. Justice Black who wrote the Opinion of the Court, "if any, to issue the order must stem either from an Act of Congress or from the Constitution itself. There is no statute that expressly authorises the President to take possession of property as he did here. Nor is there any Act of Congress to which our attention has been directed from which such a power can fairly be implied... It is clear that if the President had authority to issue the order he did, it must be found in some provision of the Constitution. And it is not claimed that express constitutional language grants this power to the President. The contention is that Presidential power should be implied from the aggregate of his powers under the Constitution. Particular reliance is placed on provisions in ART. II, which say that 'The executive power shall be vested in a President' ; that 'he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed'; and that he shall be 'Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.'

The Court gave reasons for saying that none of these provisions by itself, nor again taken in conjunction with the remaining ones, furnished any basis for defending the existence of such a power in favour of the President. Mr. Justice Jackson put forward the objection tersely when he repudiated the suggestion that the words "the executive power" occurring in ART. II meant grant of all the executive powers of which the government is capable, in words that follow:

"The example of such unlimited executive power that must have most impressed the forefathers was the prerogative exercised by George III, and the description of its evils in the declaration of independence leads me to doubt that they were creating their new executive in his image. Continental European examples were no more appealing. And if we seek instructions from our own times, we can match it only from the executive powers in those governments we disparagingly describe as totalitarian. I cannot accept the view that this clause is a grant in bulk of all conceivable executive power but regard it as an allocation to the presidential office of the generic powers thereafter stated." (See p. 641).

The fundamental question whether in all cases executive action to be immune from a challenge in the Law Courts must necessarily flow from a legal source (whether that source is conceived to be the Constitution or law) must, therefore, be answered in the negative. It is not correct to say that the executive is entitled to do only that which it is expressly empowered by the Legislature to do. The limitation on the scope of executive action, which identifies it with the field of legislative competence, primarily appears to have been due to the operation of the federal principle: the paramount purpose, which was thus sought to be realized by this means, was to avoid clashes of jurisdiction between the Provincial and the Federal executive action. It is true that powers of the several organs set up under the Constitution must be derived from the language of the Constitution, but there is no provision in the Constitution which expressly limits the executive action to being confined only to the implementation of the laws. The right to challenge administrative action accrues to the subject only in those cases where as a necessary result of such an action his rights are invaded. It is in those cases that the executive must justify its action by appeal to the existence of some legal source whence its power to act in a particular manner could be said to flow. The Latin tag Salus Populi suprema lex cannot be used by government as an excuse for pursuing its own idea of the public interest without regard for legality. Substantially, therefore, it would be correct to say that the executive is the repository of all power which it is necessary to have in order to run the administration of the country and to promote the purposes for which Governments are established, and it is only in respect of matters that are forbidden to it by or under the constitutional provisions that its authority must be declared to be confined within those limits. The Executive action cannot override the Constitutional limitations nor can it be suffered to violate the legal rights of any person. Where a law directs the executive to do certain things it is duty bound to carry out that mandate; but this is not the same thing as saying that unless there is express provision of the law enabling the executive to do certain things it cannot do those things.

The modern executive, however, is increasingly becoming despotic. There is an attempt to concentrate not only an enormous amount of administrative but also the legislative and judicial powers in the hands of the executive, with the result that the power of the executive has swelled to unusual proportion and has upset the equilibrium of power-relations in the modern States. "The democratic method of law-making by a representative Assembly", says M. A. Sieghart in his book 'Government by Decree', "is being superseded in many fields by the autocratic method of Governmental legislation. Though this legislation is delegated and controlled by Parliament, it can no longer be described as 'subordinate', as it is usually equipped with the force of law. Owing to the wide discretionary power conferred by the instrument of authority, it also enjoys to a great extent immunity from judicial control. The Government is thus being instituted as the second legislature and the ordinance changed into a law. Whatever are the reasons for these changes, it would be futile to minimise the dangers which result from the present lack of constitutional balance. These dangers are real dangers, despite the fact that they are so far not of actual, but of a potential character only. Though it is true that upto the present no British Government has made full use of all the powers which confident Parliaments have bestowed upon it, these powers exist and their very existence may—in changed circumstances—constitute a serious threat to the democratic foundation of the British Constitution." (P. 147.)

A summing up and conclusion.

Modern Executive tends to be despotic.

This tendency to acquire more and more powers for the Executive has been described somewhat forcibly by the caption, "Road to Moscow", under which it has been dealt with by Professor G. W. Keeton in his recent book, "The Passing of Parliament". (1954, Second Ed. Ernest Benn. Ltd. London).

Lord Hewart wrote in 1929 a very stimulating and provocative dissertation on the menace of delegated legislation and called it "New Despotism". The book coming as it did from the Chief Justice of England had a profound influence on the legal thought in the country. Several other books have endeavoured to do the same thing: of these mention may be made of books like (1) "Robson's Justice and Administrative Law", (2) C. K. Allen's "Bureaucracy Triumphant", "Law and Orders," (3) Dr. Port's "Administrative Law" and (4) Mr. Gileson Robinson's "Public Authorities and Legal Liability." Some of these books underlined the thesis that had been advanced so ably by Lord Hewart, namely, that there was a serious threat to the rule of law and parliamentary sovereignty and that the ever increasing encroachments and assaults directed against these main pillars of the Liberty of the Individual ought to be resisted. It was largely due to the influence wrought on the public mind by this type of crusade that the Lord Chancellor, Lord Sankey, in 1929, in response to the state of public feeling upon the subject, appointed the Ministers' Powers Committee. And of the report of this committee something will be said later in this book.

Lord Hewart's complaint was directed not so much against the concept of delegated legislation as against the tendency to concentrate arbitrary power in the hands of the executive to such an extent that the courts of law are rendered helpless "to maintain the rule of law". This, he said, had produced "Administrative Lawlessness." "When it is provided that the matter (which affects rights of citizens) is to be decided by the Minister, the provision really means that it is to be decided by some official, of more or less standing in the department, who has no responsibility except to his official superiors. The Minister himself in too many cases, it is to be feared, does not hear of the matter or the decision, unless he finds it necessary to make enquiries in consequence of some question in Parliament. The official who comes to the decision is anonymous, and, so far as interested parties and the public are concerned, is unascertainable. He is not bound by any particular course of procedure, unless a course of procedure is prescribed by the department, nor is he bound by any rules of evidence, and indeed he is not obliged to receive any evidence at all before coming to a conclusion. If he does admit evidence, he may wholly disregard it without diminishing the validity of his decision. There is not, except in comparatively few cases, any oral hearing, so that there is no opportunity to test by cross-examination such evidence as may be received, nor for the parties to controvert or comment on the case put forward by their opponents. It is, apparently, quite unusual for interested parties even to be permitted to have an interview with anyone in the department. When there is any oral hearing, the public and the press are invariably excluded.

Finally, it is not usual for the official to give any reasons for his decision." (pp 43-44)

This procedure in the opinion of Lord Chief Justice was one in marked contrast with the usual procedure which is followed in courts of law. The ingredients that constitute the essence of judicial procedure are the following :—

- (1) that the Judge is identified and is personally responsible for the decision;
- (2) the result is formed by the uniform application of the principles which are known and established, and finally,
- (3) that all the parties to the controversy are present and fully heard.

In other words, a decision of a court in every important respect sharply contrasts with the edict, however benevolent of some hidden authority, however capable, depending upon the process of reasoning which is not stated, and the enforcement of a scheme which is not explained. The administration of the law of the land in the ordinary courts pre-supposes, at least, personal responsibility, publicity, uniformity and the hearing of parties.

It was as a result of this crusade, that was carried on by some of the greatest of the constitutional lawyers of England, that Mr. Dingle Foot on 27th of January, 1937, moved a somewhat unusual motion in the House of Commons: "That in the opinion of this House, the power of the executive has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." He explained the two aspects of the subject to which his motion related. The first was the continuous encroachment of the Executive at the expense of the House of Commons with the result that "this House becomes more and more subservient to the Government of the day." The second was the attempt that has been deliberately made in Statute after Statute in recent years to invest Government Departments with completely arbitrary powers. (See House of Commons Debate, 27th January 1937; Official Report, cc. 1026 seq.).

On 17th of May, 1944, another Member of Parliament, Mr. Molson, moved a resolution asking for the setting up of a Select Committee to carry on a continuous examination of all Statutory Rules and Orders and other instruments of delegated legislation presented to Parliament. He stated in his speech some of the reasons that tended to show why delegated legislation is not only desirable but necessary. In the first place, it economises the time of the legislature. It is flexible in that it can limit the application of legislation by time, location, ownership, age or otherwise, and all these limitations are capable of being changed at short notice. The value of the delegated legislation further lay in the fact that in sudden emergencies, it enables the legislature to dispense with long deliberations and to arm the Executive with the special powers that are, having regard to the exigencies of practical politics, necessary. In view of the changed conditions, legislature is forced to influence the economic life of the country by physical measures, and when this happens powers of this kind are almost inevitable. When we are to regulate the economic life of the State by such devices, as imposition of import duties, fixation of quotas, issuing of licences, award of bounties and by several such other expedients, it is obvious that some power has to be given either to the Treasury or the Tariff Advisory Committee to give effect to the policy of Parliament. He pointed out that courts were helpless to protect the people's liberty wherever in pursuance of the powers of delegated legislation any one was threatened by its indiscriminate and irresponsible use. "The courts are only suited for the purpose of determining what is legal and what is illegal. What we are primarily concerned about are Orders and Regulations issued by the Executive which are perfectly lucid and legal, but which are bureaucratic, vexatious, embarrassing and harassing to the subject. Whether or not this House should approve an Order of that kind is a political decision which only a legislature is competent to make."

On 21st June, 1944, the House of Commons in a resolution passed by it, ordered "That a Select Committee be appointed to consider every Statutory Rule or Order (including any Provincial Rule made under Section 2 of the Rules Publication Act, 1893) laid or laid in draft before the House, being a Rule, Order, or Draft upon which proceedings may be taken in either House in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, with a view to determining whether the special attention of the House should be drawn to it on any of the following grounds :—

* * * * * * * * * * * *

(2) that it is made in pursuance of an enactment containing specific provisions excluding it from challenge in the courts, either at all times or after the expiration of a specified period;

(3) that it appears to make some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the Statute under which it is made;

(4) that there appears to have been unjustifiable delay in the publication of it; and

(5) that for any special reason, its form or purport calls for elucidation.

These and such other attempts have been made in England to exercise all the care and caution which human ingenuity can suggest to counteract the mischief which is likely to result if delegated legislation is not kept within a well defined sphere of its operation.

It would be instructive for any student of Constitutional history of the working of Parliamentary Institutions in England to read the report of the Select Committee on Delegated Legislation, dated 27th October, 1953. This was the Committee that had been appointed by resolution of the House of Commons on 18th December, 1952, to consider "in what respects the existing procedure, by which the control of this House of Commons' delegated legislation is exercised, needs to be improved and supplemented and by what means this can be achieved." The report contains useful material and the following extracts reproduced therefrom, throw a considerable light on the political and legal aspect of delegated legislation:

"(4) Your committee have been asked, in the first place, to consider the existing procedures by which the control of this House over delegated legislation is exercised.

(5) The power to legislate, when delegated by Parliament, differs from Parliament's own power to legislate: Parliament is supreme and the power of the Queen in Parliament to legislate is unlimited. On the other hand, the power of legislation as granted by Parliament to another body or persons is limited by the exact extent of the delegated power so granted; the purported exercise of power beyond the extent so granted will be ultra vires and ineffective.

(6) The legality of an Act of Parliament cannot be challenged in or by the Courts of Law, but the question whether subordinate legislation is within the power delegated by Parliament can be and is challenged in and by the Courts of Law.

(7) Frequently, subordinate legislation is issued in the form of an Order-in-Council, that is an Order expressed to be made by Her Majesty by and with the advice of Her Privy Council and signed by the Clerk of the Council.

But not every instrument so issued is an enactment of subordinate legislation under a power delegated by Act of Parliament. Orders-in-Council are of two kinds and they differ fundamentally in constitutional principle. The two kinds are :—

- (a) those made in virtue of the Royal Prerogative, and
- (b) those which are authorised by Act of Parliament.

The Royal Prerogative is that which remains of the original sovereign power of the Crown to legislate without the authority of Parliament, e.g. power to declare a rigid blockade of enemy territory in time of war.

This power is in no sense delegated and Orders-in-Council issued in exercise of "this power are not subordinate; they are original legislation. Your Committee are not concerned with them in this report."

Before, however, we could properly deal with the problem of Delegated Legislation as it affects the interpretation of our Constitution, we may, with advantage, first study the important duties and functions of Legislature and then see how far it would be constitutionally justified in delegating its power of law-making to the executive.

77. The Functions of the Legislature

The main function of the Legislature, in a parliamentary democracy, is to produce the personnel of the Cabinet to form the Government so that the administration of the country in accordance with its mandates should be carried on.

Speaking in the House of Commons on the 10th of November, 1951, Mr. Harold Macmillan summed up the other important functions of the Parliament as follows :

"Parliament has of course three main purposes; first, to vote supplies; second, to deal with legislation, mainly that put forward by the Government of the day; but third and of equal importance what Mr. Asquith (Sic.) used to call 'Grand Inquest of the Nation' I think all of us know what it means; it means chivvying the Ministers."

The business of the Legislature thus falls into three broad categories, legislative, financial and critical: it has to pass laws, to vote supplies and keep the conduct of Government under the searchlight of public criticism.

In modern times, when the concept of the social welfare state has invaded the realm of public administration, the work of the Legislature has increased considerably. Much of the legislative activity, however, is directed in passing Government bills. Hardly any time is given to the consideration of what are called private members' bills. During emergency, like wartime or other abnormal periods in the life of the state, the policy of the Government is to narrow down the initiative of private members to put through legislation. Government has practically the command of the parliamentary time. In Pakistan so far, ever since its inception, not a single private member's bill has reached the status of a law.

The legislative procedure of the Houses, and the requirement as to the mode of taking decisions by majority vote etc. are mentioned in Art. 55 in the case of the National Assembly, and in ART. 88 in the case of a Provincial Assembly. The decision is to be taken by a majority of the members present and voting, and the person presiding is not entitled to vote except when there is an equality of votes, in which case "he shall have and exercise a casting vote". The National, and also the Provincial, Assembly has the power to act notwithstanding any vacancy in the membership thereof, and the proceedings of the Assembly are not to be rendered invalid only for the reason that some person who was not entitled to vote sat or voted or otherwise took part in the proceedings, and the quorum is fixed at not less than 40 members being present during the meetings of the Assembly, and a duty has been cast upon the person presiding, when his attention is drawn to the fact that less than 40 members are present, either to adjourn the Assembly or to suspend the meeting until at least 40 members are present. Subject to these constitutional provisions, both the National and Provincial Assemblies are masters of their procedure and can prescribe by rules the kind of procedure in accordance with which they would like to transact the business assigned to them under the Constitution.

The procedure by which legislative business, as any other business of the National Assembly, is to be transacted is regulated by the rules framed by it [See ART. 55(a)]. These rules of procedure and standing orders are designed to bring about expeditious disposal of legislative business and to enable the members to exercise effective control over the business of Government. Due to the importance that attaches itself to the rules of Legislature, the rules in force governing the business of the National Assembly have been included in the Appendix, and all that is necessary in the present context is to outline the broad features of the procedure concerning the passage of a bill from its various readings in the House till it is finally passed by the Legislature and becomes Law.

The first step is taken when notice of a motion for leave to introduce the bill is given. A copy of the bill along with the statement of objects and reasons is made available within the prescribed time before the motion "that the bill be taken into consideration", can be put before the House. If the motion is passed, we reach the second phase and at that stage the principle of the bill is discussed and the question that the bill be read a second time, is thereafter put and if the motion is carried, the second reading of the bill is said to have taken place. After this, usually the bill is sent to a Select Committee (which is invariably presided over by the Minister of Law,) for a detailed examination of its provisions and for the consideration of any amendments that may have been moved in the House, to modify the bill. The Select Committee is required to examine the bill in the light of the discussion that might have taken place in the House and then to submit its report. The bill is then, along with the report of the committee, sent back to the House, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill as amended by the Select Committee, and this time the discussion takes place mainly with a view to bringing about suitable alterations of language in the text of the bill. It is usually not open at this stage for any member to deal with the principle of the bill or to oppose it. After full discussion of any amendments that may have been tabled, the Speaker takes up the bill clause by clause and thereafter puts the bill as a whole to the House. If it is passed by the House it is then sent to the President for his assent.

What actually happens in the House, during the course of the discussion, affords little information about the real extent of the work which has been put in "behind the scenes" for preparing the ground to initiate legislation. The first step, after the Cabinet has decided to have a measure put through the House, is for the Government draftsman to prepare the bill. Invariably when the bill in the draft form comes to the Cabinet for consideration, a committee of the Cabinet deals with it in order to give effect to the viewpoints of several Ministers that may be interested in the provisions or principle of the bill. Expert opinion is made available in the light of which the provisions of the bill are finally formulated by the Draftsman.

Inside the House, of course, it is the Minister incharge of the Bill who has to face the 'turns' and 'twists' of the debate with a view to securing the passage of the bill during the course of its various stages. He is, as the expression goes, there to pilot the bill. The following extract fairly depicts the situation with which the Minister who is piloting the bill is confronted : (See 'Parliament' by Sir Courtney Ilbert, p. 63)

"Inside the House the Minister is battling with amendments, some from enemies anxious to make the Bill unworkable or to reduce its operations to a minimum, others from indiscreet friends. Amendments are often framed hastily, without reference to grammar, logic, consistency or intelligibility. They are apt to be crowded in at the beginning of each clause or sentence, with the view to obtaining precedence in discussion. The language of a law ought to be precise, accurate, and consistent, but the atmosphere of a crowded or heated assembly is not conducive to nicety or accuracy of expression. Decisions often have to be taken on the spur of the moment, and in view of the possibility of a snap division. At last the amendments are cleared off the paper; the new clauses, often raising the same questions, are disposed of; and the much-buffed craft, with tattered sails, the deck encumbered with wreckage, and with several ugly leaks in her hold, labours heavily into a temporary harbour of refuge. There is a short interval for the necessary repairs, and then the struggle begins again at the 'report' stage. There may or may not be a sufficient opportunity for making such formal amendments as are necessary to make the measure decently consistent and intelligible."

The Financial Procedure has been described in our Constitution, in ARTs. 58 to 68, in respect of Federal voting of supplies and the passing of money bills, and in ARTs. 91 to 101 in respect of similar matters in their relation to provincial Administration. It would be useful to describe the substance of these Articles so that the extent to which the Legislature has, under our Constitution, the control over the financial affairs of our country could be appreciated.

The essential thing to remember is that no bill or amendment which, having regard to the definition given in ART. 58 would be considered as a money bill, or which, if enacted and brought into operation, would involve expenditure from the revenues of the Federation, shall be introduced or moved in the National Assembly except on the recommendation of the President (ART. 59), and in the case of the Provincial Assembly except on the recommendation of the Governor (ART. 92). This ensures that private members, not sitting on the treasury benches, have no right of initiating measures that have financial implications, except by procuring, in the first instance, the recommendation of the Federal or Provincial Cabinet. Money bill has been so extensively defined as to include all conceivable cases of measures that have financial implications, and the question whether or not a bill is a money bill is a matter which it is declared by ARTs. 58(3) and 91(3) to be exclusively within the competence of the Speaker to determine, and a certificate under his hand to the effect that a certain bill is a money bill is conclusive for all purposes and shall not be questioned in any court.

ARTs. 61 and 62, as also their counterparts in the Provincial sphere, namely ARTs. 94 and 95, describe the procedure of showing the receipts of the revenues of the Government as also provide for laws being passed by the Parliament and the Provincial Legislature (in relation to their respective spheres) with regard to the matters relating to their custody etc.: the "Federal Consolidated Fund" shows all the revenues received by the Federal Government, all loans raised by that Government and the moneys received by it in payment of any loan. All other public moneys received by or on behalf of Federal Government shall be credited to the public account of the Federation. All matters relating to the Federal Consolidated Fund, such as the payment of moneys into such a fund, the withdrawal of moneys therefrom, the custody of public moneys other than those credited to such a Fund received by or on behalf of the Federal Government, their payment into the public account of the Federation and the withdrawal of moneys from such account and all matters connected with or ancillary to matters aforesaid, can be regulated by an Act of Parliament, and until provision in that behalf is so made, by rules made by the President. The public account of the Federation would include payments made to it of all moneys received by or deposited with any officer employed in connection with the affairs of the Federation in his capacity as such, other than revenues or public moneys raised or received by the Federal Government and any court to the credit of any cause, matter, account or person in connection with the affairs of the Federation.

Similar provisions are mentioned by the Constitution as being applicable to the provincial sphere of Administration.

The Constitution imposes a duty on the President as also on the Governor to cause to be laid before the National and Provincial Assemblies respectively a financial statement in respect of every financial year. This statement must show the sums required to meet the expenditure described by the Constitution as expenditure charged upon the Federal Consolidated Fund in ART. 97, and it must further separately show the sums required to meet other expenditure proposed to be made from the Federal Consolidated Fund in the case of Federal Affairs, and Provincial Consolidated Fund in respect of Provincial Affairs, and the aforesaid Annual Financial Statement shall separately show expenditure on revenue account from other expenditure.

The items of expenditure charged upon the Federal and Provincial Consolidated Fund could be discussed in, but shall not be submitted to the vote of, the relevant Assembly. As to the remaining expenditure it shall be submitted to the relevant Assembly in the form of demands for grants and it is reserved to such Assembly either to assent to or to refuse to assent to any demand or to assent to any such demand subject to reduction of the amount specified therein. (See Arts. 65 and 98). In each case, the demands for grants can only be made on the recommendation of the President or the Governor as the case may be.

The next stage in the financial procedure is for the Government to introduce a bill and provide for the appropriation out of the Consolidated Fund of all moneys required to meet the grants made by the relevant Assembly and the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund, but the moneys thus required to be appropriated shall not exceed in any case the amount shown in the statement previously laid before the relevant Assembly. (See ARTs. 66 and 99). No amendment can be proposed to any such bill which shall have the effect of varying the amount or altering the destination of any grant so made, and the moneys can only be withdrawn from the Federal Consolidated Fund under the authority of the law passed in accordance with the provisions of ART. 66 in relation to Federal Consolidated Fund and ART. 99 in respect of Provincial Consolidated Fund. It is necessary to bear in mind this limitation on the power of Government to appropriate moneys from the Consolidated Fund, for, unless it is able to get the appropriation bill passed, it will not be able to withdraw any amount from the Federal Consolidated Fund, with the result that the affairs of the Government will come to a stand still. ART. 67 makes provision for Supplementary and Excess Grants being made if in respect of any financial year it is found that:

- (a) the amount authorised to be expended for a particular service for the current financial year is insufficient, or that a need has arisen for expenditure upon some new service not included in the Annual Financial Statement of that year, or
- (b) that any money has been spent on any service during a financial year in excess of the amount granted for that service for that year.

The President has also the power "to authorise expenditure from the Federal Consolidated Fund, whether the expenditure is charged by the Constitution upon that Fund or not", and he "shall cause to be laid before the National Assembly a Supplementary Financial Statement, or as the case may be, an Excess Financial Statement setting out the amount of that expenditure". This Supplementary Financial Statement or Excess Financial Statement shall be drawn up in accordance with, and be subjected to the same procedure as applicable to the Annual Financial Statement contained in Arts. 63 to 66. A parallel provision in relation to the administration of Provincial affairs is contained in Article 100.

In Arts. 68 and 101 are mentioned the powers of the relevant Assemblies to make any grant in advance in respect of an estimated expenditure for a part of any financial year, pending the completion of the procedure prescribed under the Constitution for the voting of such grants (ARTs. 65 and 98), and the passing of Authorisation Laws in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution in relation to that expenditure (Arts. 66 and 99). It can even make grants for meeting any unexpected demand upon the resources of the Federation or the Province, as the case may be, when on account of the magnitude or the indefinite character of the service, the demand cannot be specified with the details ordinarily given in an Annual Financial Statement. It can also make an exceptional grant which forms no part of the current service of the current financial year, and the Parliament and the Provincial Legislature shall have the power to authorise by law withdrawal of moneys from the Consolidated Fund for the purposes for which the said grants are made. It should be remembered that in respect of a money bill there is no power with the President to return the same bill within the meaning of ART. 57 (1) (c). He can either assent to the bill or declare that he withholds assent therefrom. But he cannot return the money bill to the Assembly with a message requesting that the bill or any specific provision thereof be reconsidered, and that any amendments specified by him in the message be considered. Although, theoretically, it is possible for the President to declare that he withholds assent from the appropriation bill, he being bound by Ministerial advice, it would be impossible to expect that any advice except that of his assenting to that bill would be tendered to him by the Prime Minister, who is after all keenly interested in getting the money he requires for the purposes of carrying on the administration of the country.

In Chapter III of Part VI are mentioned provisions relating to Audit and Account and a reference to its ARTs. from 120 to 124 would show that the accounts of the Federation and of the Provinces shall be kept in such form as the Comptroller and Auditor-General may with the approval of the President prescribe. The reports of these officers relating to the accounts of the Federation shall be submitted to the President, who shall cause them to be laid before the National Assembly, and the reports relating to the accounts of a Province shall be submitted to the Governor, who shall cause them to be laid before the Provincial Assembly. The Comptroller and the Auditor-General of Pakistan are appointed by the President and their terms and conditions of service, and the term of office, are determinable by an Act of Parliament and until they are so determined, by the rules made by President. In order to ensure their independence, there is a constitutional guarantee extended to the holders of the office of Comptroller and Auditor-General that their removal can only be effected in the manner and on the grounds on which a Judge of a High Court can be removed. In order to ensure that they do not misconduct themselves as a result of any corrupt inducement offered to them, namely that they would be employed after their term of office is over, they have been rendered ineligible for further appointment in the service of Pakistan. It would be noticed that there are no separate Auditors-General and Comptrollers-General for the Federation and Provinces. In this respect, too, the Federal principle has been violated in our Constitution.

We have reviewed the main steps that are involved in the passing of the budget, an event which people living in parliamentary democracies rightly regard as a matter of considerable importance. Its importance lies in the opportunity which such an occasion provides to the representatives of the people to review the financial position of the country and to criticise, wherever necessary, the actual working of the administration.

Students of English constitutional history know that the entire struggle between the Stuart Kings and their Parliaments centred around the question of taxation. The Kings wanted money to carry on the Government and the Parliament refused to vote supplies except in accordance with their notions of what ought to be made available to their kings.

It is not sufficiently realised that the old concept of administration by a king was that he was to "live of his own." The king invariably was the greatest land owner in the country and this constituted the principal source of his income. He carried on the administration of the country through his servants whom he paid for the services they rendered to him. But as with the passage of time the work of the administration increased, the kings were put to the necessity of finding the means for financing the personnel of administration. Much of the wealth of the English kings, for instance, came from the feudal tenants and there were the customary dues that were payable when the eldest son of the king was knighted or his eldest daughter got married. The king was also entitled as of right to accept fees in the courts in which justice was administered, and not infrequently he would sell out his rights of jurisdiction to administer justice to local authorities. The payment of fees in court which is a feature of our contemporary administration is the survival of this, not entirely indefensible, practice which was prevalent during the middle ages. For the first time in the English constitutional history it is with the passing of the Magna Charta, that one sees the attempt being made to impose limits on the right of the King to raise revenue, and this process went on acquiring importance till we come to the Bill of Rights of the year 1688 wherein it was expressly declared that the imposition of taxes without parliamentary authority was illegal. The case of Rex v. Hampden, of the year 1637, reported in 3 State Trial 825, is of much importance precisely on this account: it would be recalled that Hampden had refused to pay the Ship-money Tax which the king had imposed "in exercise of his prerogative." It should also not be forgotten that the Court of Exchequer decided in favour of the Crown's right to impose such a direct tax, and it was only in 1640 that the long Parliament repudiated this right of the Crown to impose direct taxation.

The right to control the purse, the right to vote supplies, has played a decisive role in the making of democratic institutions. No student of History can forget that "No taxation without representation" was the sacred slogan of those warriors who fought the American War of Independence.

If taxation has become a normal feature of our political life, it is essentially because the idea of the role of the modern State has, in our day, undergone complete transformation. The Modern State has to carry on numerous services for the purpose of promoting public welfare and in the fulfilment of this task it must have adequate revenues. As far back as 1874, in England, the income-tax assessed was 3d in the £, and Gladstone sought to justify, as if apologetically the imposition of such a tax because of the existence of war conditions and he promised to the nation that he would soon have it abolished.

The foregoing facts been recounted to explain why courts of law in their interpretation of taxing Acts exercise a great deal of judicial sagacity in construing them strictly and in favour of the subject. Any attempt to avoid payment of taxes, if it is within the law, does not incur any odium or provoke any moral censure. In the words of Lord Sumner, in the case of Levener v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, reported in (1928) A.C. 217: H.L.:—

"It is trite law that His Majesty's subjects are free, if they can, to make their own arrangements, so that their cases may fall outside the scope of the taxing Acts. They incur no legal penalties and, strictly speaking, no moral censure if, having considered the lines drawn by the Legislature for the imposition of taxes, they make it their business to walk outside them."

Similarly, the observations of Lord Tomlin, in the case of Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Duke of Westminster (1936), A.C. p.1, indicate the same approach :—

"Every man is entitled, if he can, to order his affairs so that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be. If he succeeds in ordering them so as to secure this result, however unappreciative the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, or his fellow-taxpayers may be of his ingenuity, he cannot be compelled to pay an increased tax. This so-called doctrine of "the substance" seems to me to be nothing more than an attempt to make a man pay notwithstanding that he has

Mode of Construing Fiscal Acts.

so ordered his affairs that the amount of tax sought from him is not legally claimable. . .

"There may, of course, be cases where documents are not bona fide, nor intended to be acted upon, but are only used as a cloak to conceal a different transaction. No such case is made or even suggested here. The deeds of covenant are admittedly bona fide, and have been given their proper legal operation. They cannot be ignored or treated as operating in some different way because as a result less duty is payable than would have been the case if some other arrangement—called for the purpose of the appellants' argument 'the substance'—had been made."

To the same effect again are the observations of Lord Greene in the case of Lord Howard de Walden v. Inland Revenue Commissioner, reported in 1942, 1 K.B. 389 at p. 397:—

"For years a battle of manoeuvre has been waged between the legislature and those who are minded to throw the burden of taxation off their own shoulders on to those of their fellow-subjects. In that battle the legislature has often been worsted by the skill, determination and resourcefulness of its opponents of whom the present appellant has not been the least successful. It would not shock us in the least to find that the Legislature has determined to put an end to the struggle by imposing the severest of penalties. It scarcely lies in the mouth of the taxpayer who plays with fire to complain of burnt fingers."

The very term 'unlawful' as applied to the conduct of a person who has contravened a provision of revenue law has to be construed somewhat differently. "Now the word 'unlawfully'", observed Griffith C.J. in the case of Lyons v. Smart, (1908) 6 C.L.R. p. 143, "is a word commonly used in statutes creating crimes, misdemeanours and minor offences. and in such acts it is used in two shades of meaning, one when referring to an act which is wrong or wicked in itself—recognised by everybody as wicked—as, for instance, when it is used with reference to certain sexual offences, or with reference to acts which are absolutely prohibited under all circumstances; the other when referring to some prohibition of positive law. The Customs Act of 1901 has nothing to do with what is right or wrong or virtuous. It contains certain arbitrary rules which the legislature lays down. What is wrong is wrong because the Act says so, and for no other reason. The word 'unlawfully' must, therefore, there being no other relevant law, be read in that context as meaning 'in contravention of the provisions of this Act'".

By means of criticism which the legislature has the opportunity to offer during Discussion on Budget, it is able to exercise a great deal of influence on the shaping of political policy as also on the details of administrative organisation of the State.

Over and above this right of the Legislature to review the work of administration annually, any member could ask questions from the Minister-in-Charge of a given department with a view to eliciting information on any matter of public importance. This is the 'Grand Inquest of the Nation', of which Harold MacMillan speaks and it is, as one can readily see, a very useful method of keeping ministerial conduct of public affairs under the perpetual search-light of criticism by members of the Legislature.

Discussion on Budget

(c) Legislature —as Grand Inquest of the Nation.

78. Prohibition against Delegated Legislation

How far can a Legislature under our Constitution abdicate the exercise of its legislative power? To what extent can the Legislature delegate its authority to make laws to the Ministers or to other public functionaries of the executive departments of the Government? How far are the courts in this country entitled to question the validity of legislative powers being exercised by the executive? These questions raise a fundamental issue of considerable importance in the study of constitutional law.

The problem of delegated Legislation may, to begin with, be viewed as being a concomitant result of the acceptance of the theory of separation of powers. The doctrine of the separation of governmental powers means theoretically that there are different departments or branches of Government acting as the agents of the sovereign power, that there are governmental functions corresponding to such branches; and that "each one has its own powers, possessed by no one of the others and which it cannot delegate to any other branch of Government, which cannot be exercised by any other branch of the Government, which it cannot be compelled to exercise by any other department and of which it cannot be deprived by any other branch of the Government; and that it cannot exercise any of the powers of any other branch of Government or deprive such branch of its power or compel it to exercise them."

This passage from Willoughby's Constitutional Law of the United States illustrates the approach which the Judges adopt while examining the extent of the inherent authority of any one organ of the State abdicating its duty to exercise that power. The founders of the American Constitution, as has been pointed out earlier, were very much influenced by the doctrine of separation of powers and the effect they have given to the theory of separation of powers becomes manifest if the language and the scheme of the U.S. Constitution are carefully scrutinised. If the principal organs of the State derive their power from the Constitution, they are by that very circumstance deemed to be charged also with the duty of exercising that power themselves. Negatively, they are debarred from creating, by means of delegation of these powers, other agents for the purpose of discharging the functions which devolve on them by virtue of the mandate contained in the Constitution.

"It is not a correct statement of the principle", says Willoughby in his Constitution of the United States, Second Edition at page 1619, "of the separation of powers to say that it prohibits absolutely the performance by one department of acts which, by their essential nature, belong to another.

"Rather, the correct statement is that a department may constitutionally exercise any power, whatever its essential nature, which has, by the Constitution, been delegated to it, but that it may not exercise powers not so constitutionally granted, which, from their essential nature, do not fall within its division of governmental functions, unless such powers are properly incidental to the performance by it of its own appropriate functions . . .

"Generally speaking, it may be said that when a power is not peculiarly and distinctly legislative, executive or judicial, it lies within the authority of the legislature to determine where its exercise shall be vested."

Increase of the Legislative Business in Modern States.

The Legislatures in the modern States have to perform very many duties, and the amount of legislative work they are called upon to transact is so enormous that if, in some manner, schemes were not designed to delegate at least a part of that work to other subordinate organs and agencies, it would not be possible for them, having regard to the time and information at their disposal, to carry through this stupendous programme of providing for the detailed system of law that is required of them. The necessity to delegate some part of the legislative authority is there; the only question is about the limits within which such an authority could be delegated. Even in America, under the stress of modern conditions, the Legislature finds it necessary to hand over considerable amount of legislative power for being exercised by subordinate agencies. The concept of the welfare state postulates the assumption by the State of the duty of fulfilling functions and duties of a far-reaching character. The growth of the modern technology, the swift progress of the modern States in the industrial and economic fields, have forced Legislatures to delegate a certain type of legislative function to the administration. The dogma, which prohibited the delegation of a legislative authority, has been eaten away by a torrential impact of numerous exceptions which Judges have been constrained to concede: so much is this true that Professor Willoughby sums up the present position by observing "The rule of the dogma has so many exceptions that it is difficult to decide whether the dogma or the exceptions state the true rule."

The constitutional objection to the validity of Delegated Legislation was stated by Cooly in his Constitutional Limitations, as follows (7th Edition, p. 163) :—

"One of the settled maxim in Constitutional Law is that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain, and by that constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom and patriotism this high prerogative has been entrusted cannot relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign post."

In a case decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1944 (Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414, at pages 424-426) the Chief Justice summed up constitutional position with regard to the competence of the Congress to delegate its legislative power to another agency as follows :

"The Constitution as a continuously operative charter of government does not demand the impossible or the impracticable. It does not require that Congress find for itself every fact upon which it desires to base legislative action or that it make for itself detailed determinations which it has declared to be prerequisite to the application of the legislative policy to particular facts and circumstances impossible for Congress itself properly to investigate. The essentials of the legislative function are the determination of the legislative policy and its formulation and promulgation as a defined and binding rule of conduct . . . These essentials are preserved when Congress has specified the basic conditions of fact upon whose existence or occurrence, ascertained from relevant data by a designated administrative agency, it directs that its statutory command shall be effective. It is no objection that the determination of facts and the inferences to be drawn from them in the light of the statutory standards and declaration of policy call for the exercise of judgment, and for the formulation of subsidiary administrative policy within the prescribed statutory framework . . . Only if we could say that there is an absence of standards for the guidance of the administrator's action, so that it would be impossible in a proper proceeding to ascertain whether the will of Congress has been obeyed, would we be justified in overriding its choice of means for effecting its declared purpose . . ."

It would be noticed that, broadly speaking, what the Supreme Court has ruled is that although the Congress cannot delegate its legislative power to another agency it may nevertheless empower another agency to exercise rule-making powers (within considerable range and variety) provided they fall short of being construed as Legislative powers.

What is, and what is not, a legislative power stricto sensu has never been successfully defined. The number of occasions upon which the U.S. Supreme Court has been called upon to lay down a definition of what may be regarded as legislative power is considerable but each time the definition offered by it is different from the earlier ones, at least in so far as the actual decision in the case was concerned. On the whole, however, in America the tendency is to strike down as few Acts as possible on the ground of unconstitutional delegation. Reference must be made, however, to the case of Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, (1935) 293 U.S. 388: 79 L.Ed. p. 446, and United States of America v. A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corporation (1935), 295 U.S. 495: 79 L.Ed. p. 1570, where the United States Supreme Court struck down parts of the National Industrial Recovery Act as being vitiated by unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. The attempt to delegate such a power was denounced in these two cases but no Act ever since 1935 has been held as invalid on this ground. In the former case, the Supreme Court ruled that "a delegation of legislative power to an administrative officer is not brought within the permissible limits of such delegation by prescribing the public good as the standard for the administrative officer's action," and, in the latter, that delegation of power to make Codes for the government of trade and industries by or with the approval of the President of United States without setting up any standards aside from the statement of general rehabilitation, correction, and development of trades and industries was unconstitutional. A congressional legislation that enabled certain trade groups to frame a Code of Fair Competition and that, on approval by the President, it should have the force of law, is unconstitutional delegation because the Act contained no definition of 'fair competition' and, in the words of Justice Cordozo, "the delegated power of legislation which has found expression in this Code is not canalized within banks that keep it from overflowing. It is unconfined and vagrant."

Unconstitutional Delegation of Legislative Power seen under the doctrine of English Constitutional Law.

Case of the Colonial Legislatures.

Hodge vs. Queen.

The background against which prohibition against delegated authority must be viewed in our country is that of the English Constitutional Law.

The English Parliament, constitutionally speaking, is possessed of omnipotent powers, and the courts of law in England have not the jurisdiction to challenge any of its legislative enactments as being in excess of its authority. The dogma of prohibition against delegated authority has not on this very account the kind of importance in England which it undoubtedly has in the American jurisprudence. In England, however, it is only in the sphere of sub-delegated legislation that the doctrine has some relevance: that is, if the Parliament empowers a Minister to do certain things and the Minister, in the purported exercise of the authority thus delegated to him, acts in excess of his powers by doing things which transcend the sphere of authority delegated to him, courts of law in England would denounce his acts on the ground of vires.

Since the Colonial Legislatures set up by the English Parliament under the Acts passed by it were themselves non-sovereign law-making bodies, their Acts on the strength of this principle have been open to challenge on the ground of vires. But the essential thing to notice in this behalf is that the extent to which delegation could be tolerated in America, and in systems of law that have been founded on the English jurisprudence, is one of difference of degree, and not one of difference in kind. We have the British concept of delegated authority which permits delegation, comparatively speaking, to a greater extent than what courts of law, steeped in the American juristic tradition, would be prepared to concede. According to the British concept, as long as the Legislature does not completely divest itself of its legislative authority, in other words, does not efface itself in an attempt to set up another body to exercise legislative powers in its place, there is no constitutional bar to its competence to delegate its legislative authority.

The Privy Council have repeatedly observed in regard to the constitutional status of the Colonial Legislatures that they are not the delegates of the Parliament, and that they have plenary powers within the sphere of legislative authority prescribed under the Acts that have created them. In delegating legislative powers, therefore, such Legislatures do not violate the maxim Delegatus non potest delegare [See the Canadian case of Hodge v. Queen, (1883), 9 Appeal Cases, p. 117].

In the above Canadian case the question was whether the Provincial Legislature of Ontario had the power to entrust the Board of Commissioners the power of making rules under the parent Act, (Liquor Licence Act, 1877), and thereby create offences and sanction penalties for the breaches of those rules. Their Lordships of the Privy Council upheld the power delegated by Ontario Legislature: They observed:

"When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the Province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in S. 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by S. 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion, would have had under like circumstances to confide to a municipal institution or body of its own creation authority to make by-laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, and with the object of carrying the enactment into operation and effect."

In an earlier case of Russell v. Queen, reported in 7 Appeal Cases, 829, of the year 1882, Their Lordships were invited to say if the Canadian Temperance Act was ultra vires of the Dominion Parliament of Canada, in that it had been directed by the Legislature enacting it that it would come into force in any county or city if upon the passing of the vote of the majority of electors of that county or city, the Governor-General declared the Act to be in force. Their Lordships said that this did not constitute a delegation of power to a majority of the voters :

"The short answer to this objection is that the Act does not delegate any legislative powers whatever. It contains within itself the whole legislation on the matters with which it deals. The provision that certain parts of the Act shall come into operation only on the petition of a majority of electors does not confer on these persons powers to legislate. Parliament itself enacts the condition and everything which is to follow upon the condition being fulfilled. Conditional legislation of this kind is in many cases convenient, and is certainly not unusual, and the power so to legislate cannot be denied to the Parliament of Canada when the subject of legislation is within its competency . . . If authority on this point were necessary, it will be found in the case of Queen v. Burah, (3 A.C., p. 889), lately before this Board."

The question relating to the constitutional limitations upon the Indian Legislature's competence to delegate its legislative authority has been discussed at considerable length in the opinion rendered by the Supreme Court of India in 1951 (In re. The Delhi Laws Act, 1912, reported in A.I.R. (1951,) Supreme Court p. 332). The whole of the Report in that case is instructive on the question of delegated legislation and the view taken of the law there is of much assistance in the comprehension of the legal position in relation to the problem of delegated legislation in our country.

The problem which was considered in this case arose out of a reference made by the President of India under Article 143 of the Indian Constitution asking the Court's opinion on the following three questions :

"(1) Was section 7 of the Delhi Laws Act, 1912, or any of the provisions thereof, and in what particular or particulars, or to what extent ultra vires the Legislature which passed the said Act?" (Section 7 of the Delhi Laws Act, mentioned in the question, runs as follows: 'The Provincial Government may, by notification in the official gazette, extend with such restrictions and modifications as it thinks fit to the Province of Russell vs. Queen.

A study of the opinion delivered by Supreme Court of India—in re. Delhi Law's Case.

Delhi or any part thereof, any enactment which is in force in any part of British India at the date of such notification.’)

“(2) Was the Ajmer-Merwara (Extension of Laws) Act, 1947, or any of the provisions thereof and in what particular or particulars, or to what extent ultra vires the Legislature which passed the said Act?” (Section 2 of the Ajmer-Merwara (Extension of Laws) Act, 1947, runs as follows: ‘Extension of Enactments to Ajmer-Merwara. The Central Government may, by notification in the official gazette, extend to the Province of Ajmer-Merwara with such restrictions and modifications as it thinks fit any enactment which is in force in any other Province at the time of such notification.’)

“(3) Is section 2 of the Part ‘C’ States (Laws) Act, 1950, or any of the provisions thereof and in what particular or particulars, or to what extent ultra vires the Parliament?” (Section 2 of the Part ‘C’ States (Laws) Act, 1950, runs as follows: ‘Power to extend enactments to certain Part ‘C’ States.—The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, extend to any Part ‘C’ States (other than Coorg and the Andaman and Nicobar Islands) or to any part of such State, with such restrictions and modifications as it thinks fit, any enactment which is in force in a Part ‘A’ State at the date of the notification and provision may be made in any enactment so extended for the repeal or amendment of any corresponding law (other than a Central Act) which is for the time being applicable to that Part ‘C’ State.’”

From the analysis of the foregoing three questions it would appear to the student that each one of these questions related to the determination of nature and extent of delegated legislation under three different constitutional dispensations: the first raises the question of the legislative power of the Indian Legislature prior to the Government of India Act, 1915; the second, to the phase that followed the coming into force of the Government of India Act, 1935; and the last raises a similar issue in regard to the power of the Indian Parliament under the present Constitution of India. In order to answer these questions it was necessary to advert to the salient features of the constitutional history of India with particular reference to the changing constitutional instruments under which that country came to be governed in the first half of the twentieth century. The nature of the legislative powers under the different constitutional instruments under which Government of India had been at various stages established was stated by Kania C.J., and the following extracts from his judgment are cited as they are of considerable interest to the student of the Constitutional History of this country (p. 335):

“The East India Company first started its operations as a trading company in India and gradually acquired political influence. The Crown in England became the legislative authority in respect of areas which had come under the control of the East India Company. The Indian Councils Act of 1861, Section 22, gave power to the Governor-General-in-Council, with additional nominated members, to make laws. The constitutional position therefore was that the British Parliament was the sovereign body which passed the Indian Councils Act. It gave the Governor-General-in-Council in his legislative capacity powers to make laws over the territories in India under the governance of the Crown. Under the English Constitution the British Parliament with its legislative authority in the King and the two Houses of Parliament is supreme and its sovereignty cannot be challenged anywhere. It has no written Charter to define or limit its power and authority.

“As against this, the Governor-General-in-Council with legislative powers established under the Indian Councils Act stood in a different position. Its Charter was the Indian Councils Act. Its powers were there necessarily defined and limited. That power, again, at any time could be withdrawn, altered and expanded or further curtailed. Moreover, as the powers were conferred by an Act of the British Parliament, the question whether the action of the Governor-General-in-Council in his legislative capacity was within or without its legislative power was always capable of being raised and decided by a Court of Law. In Dicey’s Law of the Constitution, 9th Edition, the author has distinguished the position of a sovereign Legislature and a subordinate law-making body. The distinction is drawn from the fact that the subordinate Legislatures have a limited power of making laws..... It is therefore clear that the Indian Legislature in 1861 and up to 1915 was a subordinate Legislature and not a sovereign Legislature.

“At this stage it may again be noticed that the Government was unitary and not federal. There was no distribution of legislative powers as between the Centre and the different Provinces. Another important factor to be borne in mind is that while the British Parliament was supreme, its executive Government came into power and remained in power so long only as the Parliament allowed it to remain and the Parliament itself was not dissolved. The result is that the executive Government was a part of the Legislature and the Legislature controlled the actions of the executive. Indeed, the Legislature was thus supreme and was in a position effectively to direct the actions of the executive Government. In India the position was quite different if not the reverse. The Governor-General was appointed by the Crown and even after the expansion of the legislative body before the Government of India Act of 1915 in numbers, it had no control over the executive. In respect of the Indian Legislature functioning prior to the Government of India Act of 1915 the control from the Secretary of State was justified on the ground that the Provincial Legislatures were but an enlargement of the executive Government for the purposes of making laws and were no more than mere advisory bodies without any semblance of power. The Executive Government of India was not responsible to the Indian Legislature and the composition of the Indian Legislature was such that the executive officers together with the nominated members constituted the majority in the Legislature. The result was that the Legislative Council was practically a creature of the executive Government of India and its functions were practically limited to registering the decrees of the executive Government....

“The possibility of the Legislature recalling the power given under an Act to the executive against the latter’s consent was therefore nil. Once an Act giving such power (like the Delhi Laws Act) was passed, practically the power was irrevocable. In my opinion, it is quite improper to compare the power and position of the Indian Legislature so established and functioning with the supreme and sovereign character of the British Parliament.

“The legislative power of the Indian Legislature came to be changed as a result of the Act of 1915 by the creation of Provincial Legislatures... Diarchy was thus created but there was no federation under the Act of 1915. Under the Government of India Act, 1935, the legislative powers were distributed between the Central Legislature and the Provincial Legislature, each being given exclusive powers in respect of certain items mentioned in Lists I and II of the Seventh Schedule. List III contained subjects on which it was open to the Centre or the Province to legislate and the residuary power of legislation was controlled by section 104. This Act however was still passed by the British Parliament and therefore the powers of the Indian Central Legislature as well as the Provincial Legislatures were capable of being altered, expanded or limited according to the desire of the British Parliament without the Indian Legislature or the people of India having any voice in the matter. Even under this Act, the executive Government was not responsible to the Central Legislature or the Provincial Legislature as the case may be. I emphasize this aspect because it shows that there was no fusion of legislative and executive powers as was the case with the Constitution in England. The result of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, was to remove the authority of the British Parliament to make any laws for India. The Indian Central Legislature was given power to convert itself into a Constituent Assembly to frame a Constitution for India, including the power to amend or repeal the Government of India Act, 1935, which till the new Constitution was adopted, was to be the Constitution of the Country. Even with that change it may be noticed that the executive Government was not responsible to the Central Legislature. In fact with the removal of the control of the Parliament it ceased to be responsible to anyone."

With this outline of the Constitutional history in the background let us look at the logic of legal reasoning by recourse to which the questions referred to the Supreme Court were answered by its judges :

It was urged during the course of argument by the Attorney-General, on behalf of the President of India, that the legislative power carried with it a power of delegation to any person the Legislature may choose to appoint so long as three tests were fulfilled :

(1) It must be a delegation in respect of a subject or matter which is within the scope of the legislative power of the body making the delegation.

(2) Such power of delegation is not negated by the Instrument by which the legislative body is created or established.

(3) It does not create another legislative body having the same powers and to discharge the same functions which it itself has, if the creation of such body is prohibited by the Instrument which establishes the legislative body itself.

It was also urged that in the case of an unwritten Constitution like that of the British Parliament, there can not be and is not any affirmative limitation or negative prohibition against delegation and therefore the power of delegation is included to the fullest extent within the power of legislation. The British Parliament can efface itself or even abdicate because it has a power to pass the next day a law repealing and annulling the previous day's legislation. When the British Parliament established legislative bodies in India, Canada and Australia by Acts of the British Parliament the Legislatures so established, although in a sense subordinate (because their existence depended on the Acts of the British Parliament), nevertheless are supreme with plenary powers of the same nature as the British Parliament, on the subjects and matters within their respective legislative authority. As the power of delegation is included in the power of legislation, these legislative bodies have also, subject to the three limitations mentioned above, full power of delegation in their turn.

Reliance was placed in support of these contentions upon the cases decided by the Privy Council :

(1) Queen v. Burah (4 Calcutta 172, equivalent to 5 Indian Appeals, p. 178, decided in 1878); and

(2) Emperor v. Benoari Lal Sharma and others (72 Indian Appeals, p. 57).

Kania C.J. summed up the effect of these decisions in the following words (p. 340)—

"A close scrutiny of these decisions and the observations contained therein, in my opinion, clearly discloses that instead of supporting the proposition urged by the Attorney-General impliedly that contention is negated. While the Judicial Committee has pointed out that the Indian Legislature had plenary powers to legislate on the subjects falling within its powers and that those powers were of the same nature and as supreme as the British Parliament, they do not endorse the contention that the Indian Legislature, except that it could not create another body with the same powers as it has, or in other words, efface itself, had unlimited powers of delegation. When the argument of the power of the Indian Legislature to delegate legislative powers in that manner to subordinate bodies was directly urged before the Privy Council, in each one of their decision the Judicial Committee has repudiated the suggestion and held that what was done was not delegation but was subsidiary legislation or conditional legislation. Thus while the Board has reiterated its views that the powers of the Indian Legislature were 'as plenary and of the same nature as the British Parliament', no one, in no case, and in no circumstances, during the last seventy years, has stated that the Indian Legislature has power of delegation (as contended in this case) and which would have been a direct, plain, obvious and conclusive answer to the argument. Instead of that, they have examined the impugned legislation in each case and pronounced on its validity on the ground that it was conditional or subsidiary legislation."

Contentions of the Attorney-General of India stated.

A summing up of the effect of pre-existing case—law.

After reviewing the case law contained in the several judgments of the Supreme Courts of Canada and Australia, and the decisions of the Privy Council that were cited at the bar, the learned Chief Justice came to the conclusion (at p. 345) :

"That while a Legislature, as a part of its legislative functions, can confer powers to make rules and regulations for carrying the enactment into operation and effect, and while a Legislature has power to lay down the policy and principles providing the rule of conduct and while it may further provide that on certain data or facts being found and ascertained by an executive authority, the operation of the Act can be extended to certain areas or may be brought into force on such determination which is described as conditional legislation, the power to delegate legislative functions generally is not warranted under the Constitution of India at any stage. In cases of emergency, like war where a large latitude has to be necessarily left in the matter of enforcing regulations to the executive, the scope of the power to make regulations is very wide, but even in those cases the suggestion that there was delegation of 'legislative functions' has been repudiated. Similarly, varying according to the necessities of the case and the nature of the legislation, the doctrine of conditional legislation or subsidiary legislation or ancillary legislation is equally upheld under all the Constitutions. In my opinion, therefore, the contention urged by the learned Attorney-General that legislative power carries with it a general power to delegate legislative functions, so that the Legislature may not define its policy at all and may lay down no rule of conduct but that whole thing may be left either to the executive authority or administrative or other body, is unsound and not supported by the authorities on which he relies. I do not think that apart from the sovereign character of the British Parliament which is established as a matter of convention and whose powers are also therefore absolute and unlimited, in any Legislature of any other country such general powers of delegation as claimed by the Attorney-General for a Legislature, have been recognised or permitted."

To the three questions formulated in the reference submitted for opinion to the Supreme Court, the different Judges composing the Bench returned different answers. It is not possible to comprehend what in principle was decided by the Supreme Court so that in terms of that principle subsequent litigation involving the determination of limits within which legislative powers could be delegated, could be resolved satisfactorily.

In a subsequent case decided by the Supreme Court of India, Patanjali Sastri, in the case reported in AIR (1952) S.C. p. 123, Kathi Raning v. State of Saurashtra in respect of the principles laid down in the Delhi Laws Act case, observed as follows (at p. 126) :

"While undoubtedly certain definite conclusions were reached by the majority of Judges who took part in the decision in regard to the constitutionality of certain specified enactments, the reasoning in each case was different, and it is difficult to say that any particular principle has been laid down by the majority which can be of assistance in the determination of other cases. I have there expressed my view that Legislatures

Delegated Legislation : Views of Kania, C. J.

No firm conclusions reached by the Court.

1949 F.C.
175 no longer good law in India.

Observations of Das J. in 1951 S.C. 332.

Reference to some decided cases on the problem of Delegated Legislation.

Summary.

in this country have plenary authority to delegate their power to make laws to subordinate agencies of their choice and such delegation, however inexpedient or undesirable politically, is constitutionally competent."

It would now appear that the case decided by the Federal Court of undivided India, Jatandra Nath Gupta and others v. the Province of Bihar and others, in 1949 Federal Court page 175, (in which it was laid down that the power to extend the operation of a temporary Act beyond the period specified in the Act is the exercise of a legislative power which cannot be delegated to any other body and any attempt to confer such delegated authority on the Provincial Government to extend the operation of such a temporary Act beyond its original span of life amounts to unconstitutional delegation of legislative power,) is no longer valid law in view of the decisions recorded by the Supreme Court in the Delhi Laws Act case.

With regard to this case of the Federal Court of India, Das J., in the Delhi Laws Act Case, AIR (1951) S.C. 332 at p. 429, observed:—

"On a perusal of the judgment of the majority of the Federal Court in that case it appears to me that the important questions were not canvassed before them half so strenuously and fully as they have been done before us on this occasion. Indeed, I am led to believe that learned counsel appearing for the Province of Bihar practically conceded that the delegation of the power of modification was not permissible and that his whole case was that that part of the provision was severable and the rest was conditional legislation which came within the principle laid down in Burah's case. The majority of the Court, however, held that the power of modification included in the proviso to section 1(3) was not severable as suggested by counsel and, therefore, the whole of the proviso was ultra vires and consequently the notification issued thereunder was illegal. I feel bound to say, with the utmost humility and for reasons given already, that the observations of the majority of the Federal Court in that case went too far and in agreement with the learned Attorney-General I am unable to accept them as correct exposition of the principles relating to the delegation of legislative power."

Similarly, it has been held in the case of Laxmi Bai v. State of Madhya Pradesh reported in A.I.R. (1951) Nagpur page 94, that a power given to the Provincial Government to put an end to the operation of a temporary Statute is not unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.

The course of decision in India on the problem of delegated legislation can be followed up by the study of the following cases:—

(1) Queen v. Burah (4 Calcutta, page 172; 5 Indian Appeals, page 178; (1878) 3 A.C.

889;

(2) Emperor v. Benoarilal (1945) Privy Council, page 48, 72 Indian Appeals, page 57,

1945 Karachi (PC) 97;

(3) State of Bombay v. Narottam Das (1951, Supreme Court page 69), the case in which decision given by the Bombay High Court in 1951, Bombay page 180, was reversed by the Supreme Court; and

(4) In re. Delhi Laws Act, A.I.R. (1951) S.C. 332.

(5) Edward Mills Co., Ltd., Beawar and Others v. State of Ajmer, 1955, Supreme Court page 25. In this case reference was made to the observation of O'Connor, J. of the High Court of Australia in the case of Baxter v. Ah Way, (1909) 8 C.L.R. 626 at 637;

Summing up the study of the case-law that governs the concept of delegation of legislative power as it has developed in India, it is sufficient to remark that by now it is well settled that the essential legislative power is incapable of being constitutionally delegated. Short of delegating the essential legislative power the Legislature can, within the framework of the policy laid down by it, delegate to a subordinate agency the power to carry into effect by making detailed rules the policy thus laid down. This is the view which in the opinion of the present writer seems to have been firmly established in the decision of the Delhi Laws Act Case. It would not be wrong to say that the following extract from the judgment of Mukherjea, J. (at p. 397) enunciates the correct rule:

"Delegation of legislative authority could be permissible but only as ancillary to, or in aid of, the exercise of law-making powers by the proper Legislature and not as a means to be used by the latter to relieve itself of its own responsibility or essential duties by devolving the same on some other agent or machinery. A constitutional power may be held to imply a power of delegation of authority which is necessary to effect its purpose; and to this extent delegation of a power may be taken to be implicit in the exercise of that power. This is on the principle 'that everything necessary to the exercise of a power is implied in the grant of the power. Everything necessary to the effective exercise of legislation must, therefore be taken to be conferred by the Constitution within that power.' Per O'Connor J. in Baxter v. Ah Way (1909) 8 C.L.R. p. 626. But it is not open to the Legislature to strip itself of its essential legislative function and vest the same on an extraneous authority. The primary or essential duty of law-making has got to be discharged by the Legislature itself; delegation may be resorted to only as a secondary or ancillary measure."

The following statement of the limits on the validity of delegated legislation as summarised by Fazl Ali J. in the Delhi Laws Act Case is of some interest, although not quite helpful, in the matter of assisting the student of law in drawing a line between the class of cases, where legislation, though delegated, is permissible, and where it is a delegation of a kind that is forbidden, because in such cases the Legislature "may be deemed virtually to have abdicated its authority to make laws and brought about its own self-effacement": According to Fazl Ali J. (at p. 355) :—

"(1) The Legislature must normally discharge its primary legislative function itself and not through others.

(2) Once it is established that it has sovereign powers within a certain sphere, it must follow as a corollary that it is free to legislate within that sphere in any way which appears to it to be the best way to give effect to its intention and policy in making a particular law, and that it may utilize any outside agency to any extent it finds necessary for doing things which it is unable to do itself or finds it inconvenient to do. In other words, it can do everything which is ancillary to and necessary for the full and effective exercise of its power of legislation.

(3) It cannot abdicate its legislative functions, and therefore while entrusting power to an outside agency, it must see that such agency acts as subordinate authority and does not become a parallel Legislature.

(4) Therefore, there are only two main checks in this country on the power of the Legislature to delegate, these being its good sense and the principle that it should not cross the line beyond which delegation amounts to 'abdication and self-effacement'."

The language of ART. 105 of our Constitution, in so far as it might conceivably be deemed to assist the determination of the question relating to the extent to which Legislature in our country can validly delegate legislative authority to other bodies, is: "Parliament and a Provincial Legislature may make laws." It would be noticed that there is no express provision which limits the power of the Legislature to delegate the making of rules or regulations that are ancillary to the exercise of this law-making power reserved to it

Statement of the law as attempted by Fazl Ali J.

Delegated Legislation —(Position in our country).

under the Constitution. But since the legislature is primarily charged with the duty of law-making, it cannot evade the performance of that duty by assigning it to another organ of the State power. In each case, therefore, the entire text of the impugned statute has to be scrutinised to see exactly the kind of power that has been delegated to subordinate agencies by the Legislature; and if the courts should come to the conclusion that there is the delegation of essential legislative power in any rule or law, made pursuant to the exercise of such a power, the legislation must be struck down as offending against the limits of the rule that permits delegated legislation. In each case where the question as to the unconstitutional delegation of legislative power is raised, the effort should be made to find out whether or not "essential" legislative power has been delegated.

There are, however, two well-recognized exceptions to the rule that prohibits the delegation of legislative power. And these are (1) conditional legislation, and (2) subordinate legislation.

Conditional Legislation.

When a law is full and complete when it leaves the legislative chamber but only the operation of it is made dependent on the fulfilment of some specified condition, and what is delegated to an outside body is merely the authority to be determined by the exercise of its own judgment whether or not the condition thus specified has been fulfilled, we have a case of what is called 'conditional legislation' having been enacted by the Legislature, and upon the determination of the existence of the condition by the body named therein, the law becomes effective. The principle on which this is said to be permissible is that the Legislature is thereby not delegating its power to make a law but is only delegating the power to determine some facts or state of things upon which the law-making organ makes or intends to make its own action dependent. In the words of an American Judge (see 1873, (13) American Reports 716 at page 722), "To deny this would be to stop the wheels of Government. There are many things upon which wise and useful Legislation must depend, which cannot be known to the law-making power and must, therefore, be a subject of enquiry and determination outside the Halls of Legislature." This was also the principle established in the case of Queen v. Burah, to which reference has already been made. The Privy Council observed in that case, "The proper Legislature has to exercise its judgment as to place, persons, laws, powers; and the result of that judgment has been to legislate conditionally as to all these things. The conditions having been fulfilled the legislation is now absolute."

Power to extend the life of a Temporary Act—not a Conditional Legislation: Sobho Gianchandani v. Crown.

The Federal Court of Pakistan in the case of Sobho Gianchandani v. Crown, reported in P.L.D. (1952) Federal Court, 29, has ruled that the power conferred by the Legislature on the Executive to extend the life of a temporary Act like the Pakistan Public Safety Ordinance of 1949 (which was to remain in force initially for a period of one year from the date of its promulgation, which was 8th October 1949), was not a power in the nature of conditional legislation. The learned Chief Justice Abdul Rashid observed (at p. 37) :—

"There is no analogy between conditional legislation which authorises an outside authority to determine its commencement and the power to determine the life of the Act itself. The power of extending the life of an Act is really a power to bring the Act into existence for a further period, and it is therefore identical with the power of re-enactment. The power to extend the life of an Act cannot be regarded merely as conditional legislation."

This distinction was further elucidated in the following words:

"When a law is made to take effect on the happening of a certain event, the Legislature in effect declares the law but leaves it to an external agency to bring it into force, whenever it considers it expedient to do so. A law may be regarded as inexpedient in certain events, but expedient if certain events should take place. In passing conditional legislation, the Legislature completely performs the duties which are imposed by the Constitution upon it. That is, it places legislation on the Statute Book, and the only function that it delegates to an external authority is to bring the legislation into force if certain events should happen and the enforcement of the legislation should be considered necessary. Even if the legislation is not brought into force it remains on the Statute Book to be utilised, when and if necessary. If, however, a temporary Act is passed by the Legislature for one year, it dies a natural death after the lapse of one year from its commencement. Thereafter, it ceases to be a law. In these circumstances, can it be said that the external authority that gives a new lease of life to an enactment is merely bringing the legislation into force in accordance with the wishes of the legislature? (p. 35)"

It was further laid down :

"It is not a correct proposition that the delegation of legislative powers by a Legislature to an external authority is invalid or ultra vires only if it amounts to 'self-effacement and abdication'."

To the same effect were the remarks made by Akram J. :—

"I think it cannot be denied that a substantial delegation of powers becomes necessary in the ever-growing complexities of a modern State, but the question arises what should be the limits of such a delegation. In my opinion, matters of a fundamental nature or of general policy or of great importance, cannot be delegated, though powers may be assigned within reasonable limits and scope, such as, the determination of time, place, persons, dutiable commodities, etc., so that rules, regulations, schemes and bye-laws may be made by anyone empowered to do so, within the framework of the main legislation; the main legislation itself, however, cannot be dictated or its contents revived under the delegated powers; to say otherwise would virtually amount to permitting an abdication or a surrender of the legislative authority itself reposed in the person delegating it."

Justice Cornelius rested his decision on a somewhat different species of reasoning as the following extracts from his judgment show:

"Prima facie the placing and keeping of a law on the Statute Book, and the removing of a law from the Statute Book are legislative functions."

"The true criterion is whether by an act of an outside authority a change is brought about in the network of laws which have validity in the country and are on the Statute Book. It is axiomatic that these laws inter-act on each other and the provisions of any one of these laws in some respect are operative in addition to parallel provisions in other laws and in some respects in derogation of such provisions. The complete removal of a particular law from the Statute Book creates an effect which goes beyond the mere termination of the particular provisions of such law. There is also an effect upon other laws as well, whose own provisions thereby are either restored to full force or deprived of supplementary force as a result of the disappearance of the repealed law. A repeal has, therefore, a wider effect upon the legislative structure of the country than the mere disappearance of the particular law might appear to produce. It cannot be denied that to act so that such a result is produced is to act legislatively in the fullest sense. There is no difficulty in perceiving the distinction between producing an effect of such a fundamental kind on the one hand and on the other either bringing into operation a statute which is already on the Statute Book or applying the provisions of a law which is on the Statute Book in particular places or to particular persons or things."

"Of the functions which are conferred by a written constitution, the legislative function is by far the most important. I cannot conceive that the constitution making authority when providing for the establishment of a legislature and conferring powers on that legislature, should have intended otherwise than that the powers so conferred should be exercised exclusively by that legislature. The difficulty which, under the increasing complexity of modern conditions, is felt by all legislatures in making provision for every case which may arise within the contemplation of a statute, renders it necessary for some measure of ancillary power to be delegated to executive authorities to make statutory rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of the statute in matters of detail. Delegation to this extent has been universal practice for a great many years, and such provisions will be found in a great number of statutes."

Observations of Cornelius J.

"After the 7th October, 1950, the Ordinance remained on the Statute Book as a result of an exercise of the will, not of the legislating authority, but of the Central Government. What is more, when the first period of extension had been fixed, the power of further extension was derived not from the original Ordinance, but from the Ordinance, as extended, and therefore any further extension would be doubly attributable to the exercise of the Central Government's will. To this extent, at any rate, there was abdication by the legislating authority of its function of keeping the law on the Statute Book. It is also plain that the Central Government's power of bringing the Ordinance to an end and thus removing it from the Statute Book by voluntarily refraining from extending it further, was not subject to control by the legislating authority. Supposing the Ordinance were thus brought to an end, contrary to the wishes of the legislating authority, there would be no power left in the legislating authority, by virtue of the Ordinance itself, to rectify the position but, in order to carry out its will, the legislating authority would have to re-enact the legislation afresh. Therefore in my opinion it is erroneous to regard the acts of the Central Government extending the Ordinance as deriving their efficacy from the will of the legislature."

79. Subordinate or ancillary legislation

It remains now briefly to refer to the concept of subordinate or ancillary legislation. This refers to a situation in which the Legislature lays down the policy in more or less wide terms and gives to some external authority the power to carry out, by framing rules and regulations, the legislative policy so specified. There is always a Section (technically called Rule-making Power Provision) in the Act passed by the Legislature that says generally that some extraneous authority, charged with the duty of administering the Act, should frame rules and regulations 'not inconsistent with its provisions' for the purposes of 'carrying out the objects of the Act.'

In the case of V. M. Syed Mohd. & Co. Ltd., v. State of Madras, reported in A.I.R. (1953) Madras page 105, after a review of some American cases it was observed :—

"The law is well settled and may be summed up in two principles :

- (1) The enunciation of policy is a matter exclusively within the competence of the legislature and incapable of delegation to other bodies.
- (2) It is not unconstitutional to entrust to special bodies the carrying out of the policies declared by the Act, and for that purpose to clothe them with authority to frame regulations within the frame-work of the Act."

This sort of delegation of legislative power took place in India, for instance, during the last war when under the Defence of India Act, 1939, rules were framed by Central Government pursuant to the general powers that had been outlined in S.2. of the Act. That section of the Defence of India Act mentioned a long list of general powers in the exercise of which the Central Government could, by a notification in the official gazette, make 1953 Mad.

105.

"such rules as appear to it to be necessary or expedient for securing defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of war, or for maintaining supplies and essential services to the life of the community." (See further Mahabir Sahu v. Emperor, A.I.R. (1947) Patna page 16, as also Rex. v. Halliday, (1917) Appeal Cases, page 260. In the last mentioned case the regulation issued for securing the public safety or defence of realm, namely Regulation 14(b), (which conferred power on the Secretary of State to intern any person "of hostile origin or association", if on the recommendation of a competent Naval or Military authority it appears to him expedient to exercise such a power for securing the public safety or the defence of the realm), was held to be valid law. See also the case of Institute of Patent Agents v. Joseph Lockwood, reported in (1894) Appeal Cases, page 347, where the validity of legislation made pursuant to very wide powers given to the Board of Trade to make such rules "as are in their opinion required for giving effect to the Section" was upheld. See also Hodge v. Queen, (1883) 9 Appeal Cases page 117, where a Board of Commissioners' authority, to enact regulations under the powers conferred upon it by the British North America Act, 1867, "for the good Government of Taverns", was upheld as valid piece of legislation).

The only requirement of law in such situations is to insist that the subordinate body charged with the duty of making rules and regulations must strictly confine itself within the sphere of its authority for the exercise of its subordinate legislative power, and in each case it is the duty of the courts, in appropriate proceedings, to be satisfied that the rules and regulations so made are :

- (a) by the authority mentioned in the parent Act, and
- (b) that they are within the scope of the power delegated therein.

It is for the courts to give effect to the general intent of the Legislature by ensuring that the particular rules and regulations conform to that intent. Of course, such rules and regulations lapse when the laws that empower their creation come to an end, either by efflux of time or by repeal, or if their life is declared terminable upon the happening of a contingency, upon the happening of that contingency.

Such a subordinate agency also cannot further delegate its power to another subordinate agency unless it is expressly empowered so to do. (See the case of Cantonment Board Poona vs. Western India Theatres Limited, reported in A.I.R. (1954) Bombay page 261).

The extent of judicial control which the Courts of Law in England exercise in respect of "Subordinate Legislation" has been stated by C. K. Allen as follows :

"The enactments of parliament itself are, as every body knows, supreme and beyond question by the Courts; there is no such thing as an unconstitutional statute in our system. But all subordinate legislation is subject to the doctrine of ultra vires The essence of the doctrine is simple enough. Any person affected by delegated powers has the right to complain if they exceed their charter, and it is then for the Courts to decide, as matter of law, whether the impeached order falls within the terms of authority, which is usually a section of a statute. Obviously, the wider the terms of delegation the narrower the opportunities of restriction; and even more obviously, if the delegation is expressed in such manner that the delegate is allowed complete discretion, anything he does is intra vires, and control is excluded. We shall see that in many circumstances judicial supervision in this way is inhibited and the delegate is, for all common purposes, a plenipotentiary. With regard to the bye-laws of local and public authorities, the operation of ultra vires is wider than in its application to Ministerial orders, because the courts in this field are entitled to examine not only the scope of powers, but the reasonableness of the particular bye-law. The reasonableness of a Ministerial order is never in itself subject to review, though it may be prima facie evidence that the order exceeds powers. When the doctrine of ultra-vires is applied, it does not automatically abrogate the sub-legislation which is challenged, but merely decides the individual case which has arisen under it. In effect, however, it paralyses the order or bye-law concerned, which is usually repealed or amended." (See his 'Law and Orders' IV Ed. at p. 61).

Considering that the exercise of ordinary law-making activity of the Parliament or Provincial Legislature in this country is, more or less, in the nature of power exercised by a delegated authority and may well be regarded as being in the nature of a bye-law, the questions that arise for judicial examination are the following: (a) Can the constitutionality of the Acts of Parliament or Provincial Legislature be examined by our courts from the point of view of their reasonableness much in the manner in which bye-laws of public bodies are examined by the English courts. (b) Is the constitutional status of Parliament or Provincial Legislature as established by the Constitution in any way different from that enjoyed by the parallel legislatures established under the Government of India Act, 1935. Would the reasoning in the Privy Council case in Queen vs. Burah, (1878) 5, I.A. p. 178 apply to the case of Legislatures, Federal and Provincial, established by the Constitution, so as to make them not merely delegates but as being invested with powers as large and as plenary as the Parliament itself? These questions do present perplexing difficulties but they have got some day to be settled. The concept of the power of a delegate is radically different from the power of the principal and the logic of a written Constitution demands due recognition of this difference.

"It is very remarkable", says C. K. Allen, "that our Courts (English Courts) have never expressly decided whether the maxim delegatus non potest delegare applies to subordinate legislation. The case of Reg. v. Burah (1878), 3 App. Cas. 889, which concerned the scope of an Indian statute, and which is sometimes cited in this connection, is not really relevant to the general question. On principle, it would seem that a legislative delegate who, without express authority, puts another in his place, is acting ultra vires; (a view taken in Donoughmore Committee Report p. 50) but in the absence of judicial decision it is impossible to speak with confidence, and analogies drawn from the law of agency would be imperfect and unreliable in the constitutional sphere." (See p. 104 of his 'Law and Orders').

However, these questions, have not, as yet, anywhere been conclusively determined and are res-integra. But much would depend upon the manner in which they are settled by the Courts in India and in our country.

The extreme form in which delegated legislation becomes objectionable, not from the view point of constitutional law but as a matter of political principle, has reference to that category of cases where the executive is armed, not with the authority merely of carrying out the purposes of the Act, but also, to pass orders which may modify not only the provisions of the parent Act but any other law "as may appear to the Minister necessary or expedient." It was this extreme type of delegated legislation which evoked the protest of Lord Hewart to which reference has already been made. For example, witness the following two Sections, (66 and 67), which are to be found in the Rating and Valuation Act of 1925 (15 and 16 George) :—

"S.66(1) The Minister (of Health) may by order make such adaptations in the provisions of any Local Act as may seem to him to be necessary in order to make those provisions conform with the provisions of this Act.

(2) Every order under this Section shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament, and if an Address is presented to His Majesty by either House of Parliament within the next subsequent twenty-eight days on which that House has sat after any such order is laid before it praying that the order may be annulled it shall thenceforth be void, but without prejudice to the validity of anything previously done thereunder or the making of a new order.

"S.67(1). If any difficulty arises in connection with the application of this Act to any exceptional area, or the preparation of the first valuation list for any area, or otherwise in bringing into operation any of the provisions of this Act, the Minister may by order remove the difficulty or constitute any assessment committee, or declare any assessment committee to be duly constituted, or make any appointment, or do any other thing, which appears to him necessary or expedient for securing the due preparation of the list, or for bringing the said provisions into operation, and any such order may modify the provisions of this Act so far as may appear to the Minister necessary or expedient for carrying the order into effect:

Provided that the Minister shall not exercise the powers conferred by this section after the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and twenty-nine.

(2) Every order made under this section shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament forthwith, and if an Address is presented to His Majesty by either House of Parliament within the next subsequent twenty-eight days on which that House has sat after any such order is laid before it praying that the order may be annulled it shall thenceforth be void, but without prejudice to the validity of anything previously done thereunder or the making of a new order."

It is with reference to the last of the two sections quoted above that the Divisional Court of the King's Bench, while considering the case presented to it which involved interpretation of these provisions, remarked somewhat sarcastically as follows [The King v. Minister of Health, Ex parte Wortley Rural District Council, (1927) 2 King's Bench, page 229]:—

"The imagination fails to contemplate at one view the extent and variety of power which is given to the Minister under those words. He may by order remove difficulties. He may cut the Gordian Knot in any way that seems best to him..... The legislature not content with arming the Minister with these remarkable and varied and far-reaching powers goes on to provide that 'any such order may modify the provisions of this Act so far as may appear to the Minister necessary or expedient.' For what purpose? For carrying the Act into effect? Not at all—'For carrying the order into effect'. This, I think, though I say it with some hesitation, may be regarded as indicating the high-water mark of legislative provisions of this character. It is obvious that if this Court had taken another view of the case presented to us to-day and had decided to quash this order as having been made ultra vires, the Minister might to-morrow, under the provisions of S.67, have arrived at the same end by making an order and removing the difficulty."

Similarly, in the case, The King v. Minister of Health, ex parte Yaffe, reported in (1930) 2 King's Bench at page 98, the point of constitutional law that arose was:

"When Parliament delegates its powers of legislation to a Minister of the Crown and enacts that, in certain circumstances, he may make 'an order', and that his order 'when made' shall have the effect as if enacted in the Act, is it open to the Judiciary if that alleged order be challenged, to consider whether in fact an order has been made?" (p. 110).

As this case is of considerable importance, it is necessary to analyse the views of the Judges who decided it—not only in the Court of first instance (King's Bench Division of the High Court) but also in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords. The facts that gave rise to the problem posed in that case, were the following:

By S.40(3) of the Housing Act, 1925, it was provided that the Minister of Health in certain circumstances 'May by order' confirm a scheme. The order of the Minister confirming the scheme was brought upon a Rule Nisi issued upon a motion for a writ of certiorari. It was contended that the Court had no jurisdiction to go behind this order because in sub-section (5) of S.40 it was provided that "the order of the Minister when made shall have effect as if enacted in this Act."

The Court of the King's Bench Division was not unanimous; Swift J. holding, upon an argument which would be presently noticed, that the order passed by the Minister in that case be quashed, whereas the other two Judges who made the majority Judgment (Talbot J. and Lord Hewart C.J.), held that the rule be discharged. The basis of their decision was that the scheme when confirmed by the Minister became a part of the Act and could not be successfully challenged in a court of law.

The ground of the decision of Swift J. lay in his attempt to give due effect to the words 'when made' that appeared in S.40(5). He interpreted these words to mean "when made in sequence with events which the Act prescribes shall lead up to them". The steps required under the Act to be taken were the following :

- (1) That an official representation shall have been made to the local authority;
- (2) that the local authority shall pass a resolution to the effect that the area is an unhealthy area and that an improvement scheme ought to be made in respect of the area;
- (3) that after passing such a resolution they shall forthwith proceed to make a scheme for the improvement of the area;
- (4) that maps, particulars and estimates shall accompany such a scheme, S.38(1);
- (5) that as soon as an improvement or reconstruction scheme has been prepared the local authority shall publish and serve the notices prescribed by Section 39.

Swift J. held that if any of these steps required by the Act to be taken are omitted the Minister has not made an order within the meaning of sub-section (3) of section 40 (although indeed he may have purported to do so) and so sub-section (5) of Section 40 will not apply. His argument on these premises could now be studied from his own words :—

"It is admitted by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Minister of Health that the scheme sent to him on April 4 was a scheme which was void and of no effect.... It has been quite recently held in the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of this Court, that a scheme in these terms is not an improvement scheme at all: The King v. Minister of Health, ex parte Davis, (1929, 1 King's Bench, page 619). The Attorney-General admitted that if a writ of prohibition had been applied for before the Minister made what purports to be an Order on November 23, there would have been no answer.

"It seems to me, therefore, that as a matter of fact certain essential steps before the Minister could make an Order were lacking. There was no 'scheme', there was no 'local inquiry' after a scheme had been prepared, and I do not think the time ever came when as a matter of fact he could make an Order.

"Having come to the conclusion that the Minister in this case did not make an Order and never was in a position in which he could make an Order, I am faced by the argument that he has purported to make an Order and that this Court cannot inquire into the validity of what he has done.

"I do not agree

"We are bound, I think as part of the common law of England, to treat the Order of the Minister made under sub-section (5), 'when made' as statutory—but does that justify us in accepting or compelling us to accept his mere ipse dixit that he has made 'an order'? In my opinion, No. If we know, as in this case on the evidence we clearly do know, that he could not have made the Order, I believe that it is my duty to say he has not made the Order

"If once an Order is made it becomes a part of the Act of Parliament. It has all the strength and virtue of the Act, it is incorporated in it and nobody can question it, but in my view it is open to any citizen adversely affected to inquire, 'Is this in truth an Order made under the Act or is it something which has without justification obtained the semblance of such an Order?' And if upon investigation this Court is satisfied that the 'thing' which is purporting to be an Order of the Minister is not, and cannot in fact be, an Order within the meaning of S.40(3) of the Act, ought it not to say so?"

The matter went in Appeal where all the three Judges (Scrutton, L. J., Greer, L.J., and Slesser, L.J.) concurred in allowing the Appeal (see The King v. Minister of Health, Ex Parte Yaffe, (1930) 2 K.B., p. 98, at p. 133). The following observations indicate the basis on which their judgment proceeded:

"The Parliamentary history on this particular subject begins in 1890 (p. 143), (and) shows a gradual increase in the powers of the Ministry, and greater freedom from the control of Parliament. The strongest clause is that repeated in Schedule III, S.2 of the Housing Act 1925, from Schedule I, S.2. of the Housing Act, 1909. That clause runs :

'Shall, save as otherwise expressly provided by this schedule, become final and have effect as if enacted in this Act; and the confirmation by the Minister shall be conclusive evidence that the requirements of this Act have been complied with, and that the Order has been duly made and is within the powers of this Act.'

"This apparently is intended to prevent any question of ultra vires being raised however flagrantly the Order in question may exceed the power of the Act

"The present Act enables a Minister to take away the property of individuals without compensation on certain defined conditions. In my view those conditions must be strictly complied with, and only the very clearest words can give final validity to an Order which does not comply with the prescribed statutory conditions . . . (An) Order which goes beyond the statutory conditions under which alone it can be made, an Order which for that reason the Minister could be prohibited from making, if he announced his intention of making it, is not an Order which when made can by reason of S.40(5), have statutory effect

"I have considered the authorities cited The case which has given me most anxiety is Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood (1894 Appeal Cases 347). It was (there) unnecessary for the House of Lords to determine what would be the position if the rules had been ultra vires

"But as a matter of constitutional importance, I hope that Members of Parliament and Ministers and Parliamentary draftsmen will consider whether this form of legislation is really satisfactory. It may be convenient for Ministers not to have to consider carefully whether the powers they are purporting to exercise are within their statutory authority and the powers delegated to them by statute. Parliamentary draftsmen may have got into the habit of inserting this kind of Star Chamber clause either on the instructions of a Minister, or as a matter of habit without his instructions. Members of Parliament may not trouble to consider what the sections to which they are giving legislative authority really mean, but simply follow the authority of the Minister and the Government Whip. But I cannot think it desirable that when Parliament delegates authority to affect property and persons only if certain statutory conditions are observed, it should then pass clauses which, it may be contended, allow their delegates to contravene these conditions, and make ultra vires orders which cannot be controlled by the Courts which have to administer the laws of the land."

1931 A.C.
494—House of Lords.

As against the decision of the Court of Appeal the matter went to the House of Lords and Viscount Dunedin, in his speech, while not exactly admitting the ground upon which the decision was reached by the Court of King's Bench Division, nevertheless restored their order and declined jurisdiction to quash the Order of the Minister and allowed the appeal. (See judgment in Appeal to the House of Lords, March 23, 1931, Minister of Health v. The King (on the prosecution of Yaffe, House of Lords) (1931) A.C. p. 494, at page 501):—

Viscount Dunedin : "The first question, and it is a very important and far-reaching one, is, therefore, as to the effect of S.40(5). Has it the effect of preventing any inquiry by way of certiorari proceeding of a scheme confirmed by the Minister? It is evident that it is inconceivable that the protection should extend without limit. If the Minister went out of his province altogether, if, for example, he proposed to confirm a scheme which said that all the proprietors in a scheduled area should make a per capita contribution of £5 to the municipal authority to be applied by them for the building of a hall, it is repugnant to common sense that the order would be protected, although, if there were an Act of Parliament to that effect, it could not be touched. Now the high-water mark of inviolability of a confirmed order is to be found in the case of the Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, (1894) A.C. 347. That case arose under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act. By that Act the Board of Trade was empowered to pass such general rules as they thought expedient for the purposes of the Act. Such rules were, "subject as hereinafter prescribed", to be of the same effect as if they were contained in the Act, and were to be judicially noted. The 'as hereinafter prescribed' was that the rules were to be laid before Parliament for forty days, and if, within forty days, either House disapproved of any rule, it was to be of no effect . . . The House of Lords held that the provision as to the rules being of like effect as if they had been enacted in the Act, precluded inquiry as to whether the rules were ultra vires or not.

"Now, there is an obvious distinction between that case and this, because there Parliament itself was in control of the rules for forty days after they were passed, and could have annulled them if motion were made to that effect, whereas here there is no Parliamentary manner of dealing with the confirmation of the scheme by the Minister of Health. Yet I do not think that that distinction, obvious as it is, would avail to prevent the sanction given being an untouchable sanction. I think the real clue to the solution of the problem is to be found in the opinion of Herschell, L.C., who says this: 'No doubt there might be some conflict between a rule and a provision of the Act. Well, there is a conflict sometimes between the two sections to be found in the same Act. You have to try and reconcile them as best you may. If you cannot, you have to determine which is the leading provision and which is the subordinate provision, and which must give way to the other. That would be so with regard to the enactment, and with regard to the rules which are to be treated as if within the enactment. In that case, probably the enactment itself would be treated as the governing consideration and the rule as subordinate to it'. (1894) A.C. 360.

"What that comes to is this: The confirmation makes the scheme speak as if it was contained in an Act of Parliament, but the Act of Parliament in which it is contained is the Act which provides for the framing of the scheme, not a subsequent Act. If, therefore, the scheme as made, conflicts with the Act, it will have to give way to the Act. The mere confirmation will not save it. It would be otherwise if the scheme had been, per se, embodied in a subsequent Act, for then the maxim to be applied would have been Posteriora derogant prioribus. But as it is, if one can find that the scheme is inconsistent with the provisions of the Act which authorises the scheme, the scheme will be bad, and that only can be gone into by way of proceedings in certiorari.

"I doubt if prohibition will ever be found to be an appropriate remedy . . . In the meantime, I only wish to say that I think the Court of Appeal, was right in refusing to decide the case on the ground taken by the Divisional Court.

"Now there arises the second question, and it must be apparent that, in accordance with the opinion which I have just expressed, the limits are narrow within which objections may be found. The respondent . . . can only object with success if he can show that the scheme is a scheme which is not such a scheme as is contemplated and provided for by the Act . . .

"To turn now to the objections urged. They are really two in number. The first is that the scheme, as submitted to the Minister, did not include a lay-out plan, and the second is that in clause (5) of the scheme, as originally presented, the Council was given untrammelled powers, a defect which the Minister had no right to cure . . .

"My view of the matter is that there is no cut and dried form in which a scheme must be propounded. The essentials are that it should clearly show the area which, in its present condition, is treated as the unhealthy area, and that, further, it should show that the municipality have bona fide proposals in sight, but that all particulars, and the precise form that reconstruction may take, are left over for the decision of the Minister, who can impose such conditions as he desires.

"Now, when I apply this view to the facts in the present case, so far from finding something which resembles Davis's case, I find a very definite proposal . . . It is clear, therefore that the Minister was fully aware of the general scheme as to how the cleared area was to be dealt with, when he granted the confirmation . . .

"As confirmed, the scheme seems to be unassailable. (It) is clearly my opinion that, if the Minister finds a good scheme, but disfigured by a blot upon it which would make it possible to call the legality of the scheme in question, he is absolutely entitled to remove that blot . . ."

Thus the Order of the Court of Appeal was reversed and judgment of the King's Bench Division restored.

80. Adaptation of Laws and the Delegation of Legislative Power

A further species of the power, the exercise of which to all intents and purposes partakes of the character of delegated legislation, is the one which enables the Executive to repeal or amend existing statutes. There are cases when it becomes absolutely unavoidable for the Parliament to confer this power. For example, the delegation of this type of power can be defended on the ground that unless the power of "adaptation" of laws is given in situations where there is a change-over from one constitutional framework to another, there is bound to be a great deal of legal chaos. Such a power of adaptation, for example, was given in S. 292, by the Government of India Act, 1935, and has also been repeated in the Indian and Pakistan Constitutions. ART. 224 (2) gives this power to the President in following terms :

"For the purpose of bringing the provisions of any law in force in Pakistan or any part thereof into accord with the provisions of the Constitution, the President may, within a period of two years from the Constitution Day, by Order, make such adaptations and modifications in such law, whether by way of amendment or repeal, as he may deem necessary or expedient, and any Order so made shall have effect from such date, whether before or after the date of the making of the Order, but not being prior to the Constitution Day, as may be specified in the Order."

Art 224.

Clause (3) of Article 224 empowers the President to authorize the Governor of a Province to exercise, in relation to that Province, similar powers as have been conferred upon him in this behalf.

It is necessary to state the reason why this power is conferred on the Executive:

"Our (that is the English) statute-book", says C.K. Allen, "is such a disorderly document that unless some 'floating' power of this kind existed it would be well-nigh impossible to fit the pattern together without an interminable series of dilatory amending Acts. Nor is it a matter of grave constitutional moment that a number of Acts are subject to the 'press-the-button' or 'appointed day' mechanism—that is to say, they do not begin to operate until an Order-in-Council or Ministerial direction calls them into being."

The objection to this category of delegation of power has reference only to the abnormal extent to which sometimes it is conferred. Whenever this takes place there would be a clear case which would exhibit the total surrendering of legislative power to the Executive. There is, in our Constitution, a sample of this species of absolute and unqualified power conferred on the Executive (see ART. 234.)

As if this was not enough, the President now under the exercise of a professed power said to be derivable from ART. 234, has added the following as the 5th clause of ART., 224, thus giving to the Judicial Tribunals the power to adapt the existing laws. (See President's Order XV of 1956, of 13-11-1956) :—

"(5).—Any Court, tribunal or authority required or empowered to enforce a law continued in force under clause (1) shall, notwithstanding that no actual adaptations have been made in such law by an order of the President under clause (2) for the purpose of rendering it consistent with the provisions of the Constitution, construe the law with all such adaptations as are necessary for the said purpose:

Provided that if any question arises regarding the adaptations with which such law should be construed for the said purpose, the question shall be referred to the Federal Government if the law relates to a matter enumerated in the Federal List or the Concurrent List in the 5th Schedule and to the Provincial Government in any other case, and the decision of that Government on any such reference shall be final."

"Removal of Difficulty" clause, ART. 234.

There is in our Constitution a "removal of difficulty" power given to the President which has all the objectionable features that are associated with what has come to be now nicknamed as "Henry the VIII clause". Under ART. 234, the abnormal scope of that power could be seen in this that by means of an executive Order even the provisions of the Constitution can be interfered with. The President has the power "for the purpose of removing any difficulties, particularly in relation to the transition from the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Indian Independence Act, 1947, together with Acts amending or supplementing those Acts, to the provisions of the Constitution, by Order, (to) direct that the provisions of the Constitution shall, during such period as may be specified in the order, have effect, subject to such adaptations, whether by way of modification, addition or omission, as he may deem to be necessary or expedient." This clause is just that instance of "intolerable nuisance", to which Sir William Graham Harrison used to refer whenever Acts of Parliament were modified by Rules and Orders. In England, the Donoughmore Committee in its Report (1932) expressed a grave disapproval of this type of delegation of Legislative Power and quite for some time now ever since 1932, Parliament has not enacted this kind of clause—and this despite the provocation to enact this type of clause that must have been given to it under the stress of numerous legislative measures sponsored by the post-war Labour Government.

There are certain Acts that lay down specifically that after "subordinate" legislation is framed, pursuant to the rule-making power given to an executive agent under the mandate of law passed by Parliament, it should be laid on the table of the House. Sometimes the period within which this has to be done is fixed and sometimes the expression "as soon as may be" is employed in the Act requiring "legislation" to be laid, thereby giving to the delegate a considerable latitude of time within which to lay the document. Although the law upon the subject is that when such rules are made and promulgated, they take instantaneous effect, that is, even during the period they are in "quarantine" in the insulated chamber of the Legislature, certain questions of constitutional importance relevant to these matters deserve to be stated.

The first of these questions is, whether the non-fulfilment of this condition could be regarded as breach of a mandatory as opposed to a directory provision? And it is upon the answer that could be given to this question that the effect of the non-compliance with the "laying-down" clause could be appreciated. If the view were taken that this provision is merely directory, the rules would have the force of law, non-compliance with the laying-down clause notwithstanding. And if it be held that this direction is imperative, non-compliance with it would constitute a condition subsequent on the occurrence of which the rules, although valid when enacted, would cease to have the force of law upon the happening of the "condition subsequent". The second of the two views, in the judgment of C. K. Allen, is a correct view although he confesses that there is very little authority on the point. He refers to the case of Bailey v. Williamson (1873) Law Reports 8 Q.B., page 118, on this point in support of this view, although he is conscious of the fact that the provision of the law that formed the subject-matter of interpretation in that case was couched in negative terms. By S. 9 of the Parks Regulation Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Victoria, Chapter 15), it was provided: "Any rule made in pursuance of the first schedule to this Act shall be forthwith laid before both Houses of Parliament, if Parliament be sitting, or if not, then within three weeks after the beginning of the then next ensuing session of Parliament; and if any such rules shall be disapproved of by either House of Parliament within one month after the same shall have been so laid before the Parliament, such rules, or such parts thereof as shall be disapproved of, shall not be enforced." Section 4 of the said Act directed that the Regulations shall not take effect until the expiration of one calendar month after the passing of the Act. The Court held that by virtue of Section 4, "the regulations, together with the rules if made, took effect one month after the passing of the Act, and could at once be confirmed; and Section 9 imposed a condition subsequent, by which any rule disapproved of by either House of Parliament was not to be enforced after such disapproval."

The next question has reference to the interpretation of the expression "as soon as may be". The expression is incapable of being confined precisely to a stated term and the utmost that could be said about it is that a court of law is likely to interpret it as being synonymous with that other equally elusive and wooly expression "within a reasonable time." In any case, wherever any such phrase occurs, the compliance with the condition in relation to which it is provided, would be regarded as being in the nature of a directory provision and that nothing will turn upon any non-compliance with its terms. Thus the actual validity of the regulations or rules will not depend upon the view that the court should take of the matter before it in coming to the conclusion that the condition has not been complied with.

Effect of Non-compliance with condition subsequent.

Meaning of "As soon as may be"

Ordinance Making Power and Non-Compliance with condition subsequent.

Arts 69 (2)
and 102 (2)

Donoughmore Committee on Ministers'
Powers.

These considerations have some relevance to the problem that arises for our comprehension when we deal with the limits of ordinance-making power of the President and the Governor under our Constitution. This power is on par with the power of the Legislature, National or Provincial as the case may be, to pass laws and is available for exercise at all times when the Legislature is not in session. But it is the requirement of the Constitution that the ordinance shall be laid before the relevant Legislature and shall cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the next meeting of the Assembly, or if a resolution disapproving it is passed by the Assembly upon the passing of that resolution. The question that arises for interpretation upon the language of ART. 69(2) and 102(2) may be stated as follows: Is it the mandatory requirement of the Constitution that the ordinance be laid before the Assembly? What happens if the ordinance is not laid before the Assembly? Does it cease to operate as law on the first day of the Assembly session, or is it that it continues to be the law till six weeks have elapsed from the first date of the meeting of the Assembly next after its promulgation? The answer to this question depends on whether the requirement of the Constitution is regarded as being an imperative or a mere directory provision. It is submitted that in the present author's view, the requirement of the Constitution is mandatory and that every ordinance that is not laid before the relevant Assembly dies on the first day of the session of that Assembly. The period of six weeks' life is admissible to such an ordinance only when it is actually laid before the relevant Assembly.

81. Legislative and Judicial powers of the Executive—A critical Review of Recent Trends.

No study of the problem of Delegation of Legislative and Judicial powers upon the Executive would be complete unless we review some of the broad features of the criticism to which this tendency to arm the Executive with abnormal power has been subjected in recent years.

On 30th of October, 1929, the Lord Chancellor appointed a Committee on Ministers' Powers "to consider the powers exercised by or under the direction of (or by persons or bodies appointed specially by) Ministers of the Crown by way of (a) delegated legislation and (b) judicial or quasi-judicial decision, and to report what safeguards are desirable or necessary to secure the constitutional principles of the sovereignty of Parliament and the Supremacy of the Law." This was a high powered Committee and consisted of men of eminence. The original members of the Committee were: the Earl of Donoughmore (chairman), Sir John Anderson, the Duke of Atholl, the Rev. James Barr, Dr. E. L. Burgin, the Earl of Clarendon, Sir Warren Fisher, Sir Roger Gregory, Professor H. J. Laski, Sir William S. Holdsworth, Sir. W. Ellis Hume-Williams, Sir Leslie Scott, Mr. Gavin Simmonds, Miss Ellen Wilkinson, and Sir John J. Withers. The Countess of Iveagh was appointed as an additional member in January 1930. The Earl of Donoughmore resigned the chairmanship on grounds of health in April, 1931, and was succeeded by Sir Leslie (later Lord Justice) Scott. The Committee published its report in 1932.

The evidence laid before the Committee reflects the view point of some of the eminent English jurists as also of the Parliamentary draftsman, Sir William Graham-Harrison (First Parliamentary Counsel) who, when examined said, he was speaking from practical experience of 27 years as a Draftsman. He said :

"I have no hesitation in saying that it would be impossible to produce the amount and the kind of legislation which Parliament desires to pass, and which the people of this country are supposed to want, if it become necessary to insert in the Acts of Parliament themselves any considerable portion of what is now left to delegated legislation. As classical examples, I would refer to the vast bulk of the National Health Insurance Regula- tions and Special Orders

, which run to more than a thousand pages, and to the eight hundred pages of the Orders setting up Trade Boards."

The witness further explained :

"the superiority in form which, as a result of the different circumstances and conditions under which they are respectively prepared and completed, delegated legislation has over Statutes: in most cases the time available for drafting Bills is inadequate and their final form when they have passed both Houses is generally unsatisfactory. On the other hand, Statutory Rules can be prepared in comparative leisure and their subject-matter can be arranged in a logical and intelligible shape uncontrolled by the exigencies of Parliamentary procedure and the necessity for that compression which every Minister (however much in debate he may use the draftsman as a whipping-boy) invariably demands in the case of a Bill . . ."

More instructive, however, was the evidence tendered by that eminent jurist, W. A. Robson, to whose book on Administrative Law a reference has already been made. In a written memorandum that he submitted he observed: "The Separation of Powers is a legendary conception which has at no period of English history accurately described the actual division of authority between the various organs of Government." He also felt that: "There is no immutable necessity for any particular division of powers. Nor has any organ of government a vested right to exercise a particular function. It is misleading and unscientific to use language which implies such a right. For example, it is common to speak of the 'encroachment' of the Executive on the sphere of the Judiciary. As I shall show, the fields of Jurisdiction, of which complaint is made, concern the newer functions of government. There can scarcely be 'encroachment' on territory which has not previously been settled."

Explaining that the scope and the character of government have changed enormously in the last 50 years, he observed :

"Formerly, government was chiefly regulatory and negative; its main task (apart from defence) was to keep the right and maintain fair play while private interests asserted themselves freely. To-day, government is largely concerned with the administration of social service, and has become positive in a new sense. A century ago, the State acted mainly as policeman, soldier and judge. To-day, the State acts also as doctor, nurse, teacher, insurance organiser, house-builders, sanitary engineer, chemist, railway controller, supplier of gas, water and electricity, town-planner, pensions distributor, provider of transport, hospital organiser, road-maker, and in a large number of other capacities."

In relation to this change over from regulatory or control activities to service activities on the part of Government new forms of administrative authority had therefore to be improvised. The witness further deposed :

"In enquiring into the exercise of judicial powers by Government departments it should not be assumed that the mere existence of legislative enactments conferring powers which preclude review by the Courts of Ministerial determination is evidence of executive tyranny. Clearly the manner in which the powers are used is more important than the mere existence of statutory provisions."

In the opinion of the witness, there were certain limitations as to the suitability of the Courts to act as tribunals of review for certain types of administrative decisions and these arise from various causes such as :

- (a) lack of special knowledge of experience of the subject matter,
- (b) absence of a body of case law appropriate to the circumstances. The result of Evidence tendered by Robson.

this is either a mere transfer of discretion from the executive to a non-expert judicial body unconcerned with functional ends, or a refusal by the Courts to disturb the administrative determination,

- (c) existence of a body of hardened legal doctrine unsuited to the unforeseen circumstances which may now have arisen,
- (d) traditional lack of sympathy with the positive aims of modern government,
- (e) defects in the procedural machinery and legal forms which must be used in order to obtain access to the Courts. For example, such remedies as mandamus, prohibition, certiorari, and ultra vires are in many cases useless for the purpose of getting a review of administrative determinations,
- (f) expense and difficulty of litigation,
- (g) the absence of a body of public law and the concepts appropriate thereto in English jurisprudence, and
- (h) volume of business which would press upon the Courts and produce congestion."

In order to remedy the defects which the witness noticed in the actual working of the Administrative Tribunals, he suggested that following considerations be kept in view if an effort had to be made towards a reform of the procedure of Administrative Tribunals:

"An Administrative Tribunal is the appropriate body for deciding the question in dispute :

- (1) where a new policy of social improvement is being promoted,
- (2) where it is desired to create new standards rapidly in an unexplored field,
- (3) where new or existing standards are to be applied or extended throughout the country, and consistency and co-ordination are required,
- (4) where special knowledge or experience, or departmental information, are necessary for a good decision,
- (5) cheapness and speed are not sufficient justification for an administrative tribunal,
- (6) Administrative Jurisdiction should not extend to matters already dealt with by the Courts of Law. It should normally be concerned with disputes in which one or both parties are public authorities.
- (7) An Administrative Tribunal should always have power to act as a Tribunal of first instance.
- (8) Judicial powers should invariably be exercised by a definite Tribunal consisting of public servants specially nominated for the purpose by the responsible Minister.
- (9) An aggrieved party should always have a right to an oral hearing.
- (10) Administrative Tribunals should have power to call for documents and compel the attendance of witnesses.
- (11) The reasons for a decision and the principles followed should invariably be given. Administrative Tribunals should publish regular reports of their decisions.
- (12) Great attention should be paid to the qualifications, training and experience of the personnel of administrative tribunals.
- (13) The representation of outside interests on the tribunal is desirable in certain circumstances.
- (14) The person or persons who enquire into the facts should in all cases also decide the issue.

- (15) The Ministerial control over the work of an Administrative Tribunal should be strictly confined to directions as to principles to be followed contained in a letter of Reference addressed to the members. This document should invariably be open to the public.
- (16) In important questions an appeal should lie to a superior Administrative Appeal Tribunal.
- (17) The members of Administrative Tribunals should be liable in the ordinary course for malice, negligence, corruption or fraud, committed in the course of their duties.
- (18) Administrative Tribunals should in no circumstances have power to decide questions involving the liberty of the subject."

These recommendations, however, were not accepted by the Committee in their report who observed, "Mr. W. A. Robson has put before us detailed proposals for the establishment of a system of administrative Courts and administrative Law independent of Ministers." The Committee, however, could not recommend their adoption, for in their view "they are inconsistent with the sovereignty of Parliament and the supremacy of the Rule of Law." They further observed :

"A regulated system of administrative Courts and administrative Law, such as Mr. Robson proposes, would involve the abolition of both the supervisory and the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court in matters pertaining to administration; and we believe that it would result in the withdrawal to a great extent of those judicial activities, which are inseparable from administration, from the influence of public opinion."

The whole report of the Committee is a valuable document and merits careful examination by all those who would like to imbibe its wisdom with a view to appreciating the juristic and the political aspects of the problems posed by the conferment of enormous legislative and judicial powers on the modern Executives.

Before leaving the consideration of this topic, it is necessary to emphasise the relevance of the distinction between judicial and quasi-judicial decisions which the Committee has drawn and which distinction has now acquired more than the mere academic importance that should normally have been attached to a statement upon it which is contained in the report, and this is because it has been noticed with approval in several subsequent judicial determinations as also in several Text Books on jurisprudence as representing a correct statement of the Law. A quasi-judicial decision, say the Authors of the report, is one which has some of the attributes of a judicial decision but not all, and a true judicial decision pre-supposes an existing dispute between two or more parties and then involves four requisites :

- "(1) the presentation not necessarily orally of their case by the parties to the dispute;
- (2) if the dispute between them is a question of fact, the ascertainment of the fact by means of evidence . . . ;
- (3) if the dispute between them is a question of law, the submission of legal argument by the parties; and
- (4) a decision which disposes of the whole matter by a finding upon the facts in dispute and an application of the law of the land to the facts so found, including where required a ruling upon any disputed question of law.

"A quasi-judicial decision equally pre-supposes an existing dispute between two or more parties and involves (1) and (2), but does not necessarily involve (3), and never involves (4). The place of (4) is in fact taken by administrative action, the character of which is determined by the Minister's free choice." (See further Chapter VI of this book.)

Recommendations not accepted by the Committee.

Distinction between judicial and quasi-judicial decisions.

In substance the report defended the status quo and recommended no drastic changes. The report of the Committee has not, however, been able to silence the controversy which is still raging in England with regard to the desirability or otherwise of setting up Administrative Tribunals with the kind of powers they have been enjoying in the recent past. In a recent case Rex v. Brighton and Area Rent Tribunal Ex Parte Marine Parade Estates, (1936) Ltd., reported in (1950) 2 King's Bench, page 410, the Court decided that even if the tribunal had acted on its own knowledge and not upon evidence submitted by the tenants, the ordinary courts were unable to give redress to a landlord whose rents were reduced by the tribunal. A recent writer, G. W. Keeton, has reviewed the present unsatisfactory position on this subject in England as follows :

"To-day, in Great Britain we live on the edge of dictatorship. Transition would be easy, swift, and it could be accomplished with complete legality. Already, so many steps have been taken in this direction, due to the completeness of power possessed by the Government of the day, and the absence of any real check such as the terms of a written constitution or the existence of an effective second chamber, that those still to be taken are small in comparison. Moreover, in view of the urgency of our needs in the sphere of rearmament, no mitigation of the existing system is to be expected, but rather an intensification of it. To-day, virtually our only remaining constitutional safeguard is the habit of tolerance and the existence of a powerful political opposition, both of which owe their existence to the Revolution of 1688. If both these safeguards disappeared, our constitutional machinery would forthwith become the instrument of a totalitarian despotism." (See his Passing of Parliament p. 33)

Important cases upon the subject referred.

A student wishing to investigate further the problem of delegated legislation and the extremely limited measure of judicial control that is capable of being exercised by the Courts in England over the Administrative Tribunals, would be well advised to study the Chapter entitled "The Menace of Delegated Legislation", which appears in Mr. Keeton's recent book Passing of Parliament, and the following English cases to some of which reference has been made already, may also be perused with profit :

- (1) Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood (1894), A.C. 347.
- (2) Rex v. Minister of Health; Ex Parte Davis (1929), 1 King's Bench, page 619.
- (3) Minister of Health v. King (on the prosecution of Yaffe) (1931), A.C. 494.
- (4) Errington v. Ministry of Health (1935), 1 King's Bench, page 249. (If a quasi-judicial Tribunal (Minister acting under Housing Act, 1930, while confirming a clearance order) takes into consideration any extraneous matters (in this case other than those mentioned in para 4 of the first schedule) and if it holds a private inquiry to which persons interested are not invited or takes into consideration ex parte statements with which the persons affected by his order have had no opportunity of dealing, it is not acting in accordance with correct principles of justice and its order is liable to be quashed as not being within the powers conferred by the Act).
- (5) Offer v. Minister of Health (1936), 1 King's Bench, page 40.
- (6) Frost v. Minister of Health (1935), 1 King's Bench, page 286.
- (7) Horn v. Minister of Health (1937), 1 King's Bench, page 164.
- (8) E. Robins & Sons Ltd. v. Minister of Health (1939), 1 King's Bench, page 520. (Functions of a Minister or local authority under Housing Act 1936—how far ministerial or judicial).
- (9) Franklin v. Minister of Town and Country Planning (1948), A.C. (H.L.) 87. Minister while considering the Report of the person who has held a public inquiry under Schedule 1, para 3 of the New Towns Act, 1946, after objections have been made to an order under S. 1(1) of the Act, has no judicial or quasi-judicial duty cast upon him with the result that the consideration of questions relating to bias in the execution of such a duty are irrelevant.

(10) Earl Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co. Ltd. v. Minister of Town and Country Planning, (1951) 2 King's Bench, page 284, (more particularly the dissenting judgment of Denning L.J.)

Some of these cases have been considered in detail in the Chapter entitled "Individual and the State—Constitutional Remedies", where the principles regulating the exercise of certiorari jurisdiction have been stated.

82. Temporary and Transitional Provisions

The last part of our Constitution contains provisions (ARTs. 222 to 234) designed to bring about a change over from the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935 (as adapted in Pakistan), as also the Indian Independence Act of 1947 and the several Acts amending them, to the kind of constitutional framework which is envisaged by our New Constitution.

ART. 222 provided for the election of the interim President in accordance with the provisions of the Sixth Schedule. The President was to be elected and inducted into office as such President, on the Constitution Day, which was fixed by the Constituent Assembly to be the 23rd of March, 1956. On the same day, the Constituent Assembly began to function as the National Assembly of Pakistan as required by ART. 223, and by operation of law on that day the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker of the Constituent Assembly became Speaker and Deputy Speaker respectively of the National Assembly. The Provincial Legislatures of East Bengal and West Pakistan became the Provincial Legislatures under the Constitution for the new Provinces of East Pakistan and West Pakistan (see ART. 225). Similarly, the Governors of the two Provinces became, in consequence of the requirement mentioned in ART. 226, Governors of those Provinces under the Constitution. Under Art 227, the Chief Justice and other Judges of the Federal Court began to hold office as the Chief Justice and other Judges of the Supreme Court established under the new Constitution. The Chief Justice and other Judges of the High Court of East Bengal, as also of West Pakistan High Court became the office holders in their respective appointments in the two High Courts of East Pakistan and West Pakistan. The jurisdiction and powers of the two Superior Courts were affirmed to be the same, of course, "without prejudice to other provisions of the Constitution" as were exercisable by the Federal Court and the two High Courts of East Bengal and West Pakistan respectively under the Pre-Constitution Law. In the sixth clause of Art 227, it was specifically provided :

"Subject to the provisions of the Constitution—

- (a) all civil, criminal and revenue courts exercising jurisdiction and functions, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, continue to exercise their respective jurisdictions and functions, and all persons holding office in such courts shall continue to hold their respective offices ;
- (b) all authorities and all officers, judicial, executive and ministerial throughout Pakistan exercising functions, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, as from that day, continue to exercise their respective functions."

It would thus appear that all authorities and officers who were exercising, immediately before the Constitution Day, judicial, executive and ministerial powers, subject of course to the provisions of the Constitution, continue to exercise by virtue of this clause their authority and powers under the present constitution.

ARTS. 222,
223, 225, 226
227.

The entire corpus juris of Pakistan (except of course those provisions of it which became void by reasons of ART 4), was continued under the provisions of ART. 224. It is necessary to offer a detailed comment on this Article and with this end in view the Article is reproduced here below :

"224. (1)—Notwithstanding the repeal of the enactments mentioned in ART. 221, and save as is otherwise expressly provided in the Constitution, all laws (other than those enactments), including Ordinances, Orders-in-Council, Orders, rules, bye-laws, regulations, notifications, and other legal instruments in force in Pakistan or in any part thereof, or having extra-territorial validity, immediately before the Constitution Day, shall, so far as applicable and with the necessary adaptations, continue in force until altered, repealed or amended by the appropriate legislature or other competent authority.

Explanation 1.—The expression 'laws' in this Article shall include Letters Patent constituting a High Court.

Explanation 2.—In this Article 'in force', in relation to any law, means having effect as law whether or not the law has been brought into operation.

"(2) For the purpose of bringing the provisions of any law in force in Pakistan or any part thereof into accord with the provisions of the Constitution, the President may, within a period of two years from the Constitution Day, by Order, make such adaptations and modifications in such law, whether by way of amendment or appeal, as he may deem necessary or expedient, and any order so made shall have effect from such date, whether before or after the date of the making of the Order, but not being prior to the Constitution Day, as may be specified in the Order.

(3) The President may authorise the Governor of a Province to exercise, in relation to that Province, the powers conferred upon him by clause (2) in respect of laws relating to matters enumerated in the Provincial List.

(4) The powers exercisable under clauses (2) and (3) shall be subject to the provisions of any Act of the appropriate legislature."

It would appear that the expression "save as is otherwise expressly provided in the Constitution" has reference to the provisions of ART. 4 whereunder the existing law in so far as it is inconsistent with the provisions of Part II becomes void and inoperative. The scheme underlying the Article is to keep the entire pre-constitution Statute Book of Pakistan intact till such time as any portion thereof is altered, repealed, or amended by the appropriate legislature or other competent authority. Under the authority of ART. 224, all laws other than the laws repealed by ART. 221 (namely the Government of India Act, 1935, the Indian Independence Act, 1947, together with all other enactments amending or supplementing those Acts) are preserved and are deemed to be in force as though enacted under the mandate of the new Constitution. Thus all laws, including Ordinances, Orders-in-Council, Orders, Rules, Bye-laws, Regulations, Notifications or any other legal instruments, in force in Pakistan or in any part thereof or having extra-territorial validity, immediately before the Constitution Day, continue to operate as law as if the new Constitution had not come into force.

It was essential to make this provision because, in the absence of any such provision being made, all these laws would have automatically lapsed in view of the fact that the constitutional instruments like the Government of India Act, 1935, the Indian Independence Act etc. that had sustained them, were themselves being repealed by Article 221 of the Constitution.

Article 224 corresponds to ART. 372 of the Indian Constitution which reads as follows :—

"372. (1) Notwithstanding the repeal by this Constitution of the enactments referred to in ART. 395 but subject to the other provisions of this Constitution, all the law in force in the territory of India immediately before the commencement of this Constitution shall continue in force therein until altered or repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority.

(2) For the purpose of bringing the provisions of any law in force in the territory of India into accord with the provisions of this Constitution, the President may by order make such adaptations and modifications of such law, whether by way of repeal or amendment, as may be necessary or expedient, and provide that the law shall, as from such date as may be specified in the order, have effect subject to the adaptations and modifications so made, and any such adaptation or modification shall not be questioned in any court of law.

(3) Nothing in clause (2) shall be deemed—

(a) to empower the President to make any adaptation or modification of any law after the expiration of three years from the commencement of this Constitution; or

(b) to prevent any competent Legislature or other competent authority from repealing or amending any law adapted or modified by the President under the said clause.

"Explanation I.—The expression 'law in force' in this Article shall include a law passed or made by a Legislature or other competent authority in the territory of India before the commencement of this Constitution and not previously repealed, notwithstanding that it or parts of it may not be then in operation either at all or in particular areas.

Explanation II.—Any law passed or made by a Legislature or other competent authority in the territory of India which immediately before the commencement of this Constitution had extra-territorial effect as well as effect in the territory of India shall, subject to any such adaptations and modifications as aforesaid, continue to have such extra-territorial effect.

Explanation III.—Nothing in this Article shall be construed as continuing any temporary law in force beyond the date fixed for its expiration or the date on which it would have expired if this Constitution had not come into force.

Explanation IV.—An Ordinance promulgated by the Governor of a Province under section 88 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and in force immediately before the commencement of this Constitution shall, unless withdrawn by the Governor of the corresponding State earlier, cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the first meeting after such commencement of the Legislative Assembly of that State functioning under clause (1) of ART. 382, and nothing in this Article shall be construed as continuing any such Ordinance in force beyond the said period."

This device of preserving intact the fabric of pre-existing laws is familiar and has been invariably resorted to in all those constitutional instruments under which the governance of a country is to be secured after the previous constitutional arrangements under which it was being previously administered, are sought to be replaced. For instance, even in the Government of India Act, 1935, S. 292 attempted to achieve the same purpose. [See also Section 18(3) of the Indian Independence Act, 1947]. The general rule is that with the repeal of a statute all the laws that have been made under its authority cease to be valid: this is of course subject to the provision that there is no saving clause to the contrary (1916 i.K.B., page 688, Watson v. Winch). It is for this reason that, invariably, in the repealing

Constitutional Act a provision is incorporated which sanctions the continuance of the pre-existing law despite the repeal of the Constitution Act under which it was originally enacted and kept alive. The pre-existing law thus continues to be in force as though no repeal of the parent Act had taken place. Even the temporary Ordinances that were to lapse as a requirement of the Government of India Act (as when, for instance, they were not placed before the legislature or having been so placed were not re-enacted by the legislature etc.), by the use of specific language have been made to continue as though they were permanent statutes till they are repealed or amended by appropriate legislature. This had necessarily to be so because the old Central and Provincial legislatures had been replaced by the new ones with considerable alterations as to their legislative power. Besides all this the very requirement of the law as to the termination of the life of the Ordinance as contained in Ss. 42 and 88 of the Government of India Act, 1935, had disappeared with the repeal of that Act by ART. 221 of our Constitution. (see Jibendra Kishore's case P.L.D. 1957 S. C. (Pak) 9).

ART. 234.
Removal of difficulties.

The President, that is the Federal Government, has been given the power under ART. 234, "for the purpose of removing any difficulties, particularly in relation to the transition from the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, and the Indian Independence Act, 1947, together with Acts amending or supplementing those Acts, to the provisions of the Constitution, by order, to direct that the provisions of the Constitution shall, during such period as may be specified in the order, have effect, subject to such adaptations, whether by way of modification, addition or omission, as he may deem to be necessary or expedient." This power is available to the President, that is the Cabinet, till the first meeting of the National Assembly constituted after the first general election held under the Constitution (see ART. 234). It is also the requirement of the Constitution that every order passed in the exercise of this power is to be laid before the National Assembly and may be amended or repealed by an Act of Parliament [see ART. 234(2)]. This power of the President to alter and amend the Constitution is undoubtedly an abnormal power, but having regard to the fact that a change-over had to be effected from the old constitutional framework as established by the Government of India Act, 1935, to the new one as envisaged by our Constitution, the grant of this power was deemed strictly necessary for the purpose of arming the executive with the authority to deal with any situation that should arise in case it was discovered that there was any lacuna in the new constitutional instrument. It must be remarked, however, that whether or not an Order has been passed for the purposes mentioned in ART. 234, is a justiciable question, and if it is found upon judicial examination to be an order passed for an extraneous purpose it will not be given any effect by a court of law. This provision corresponds to ART. 392 of the Indian Constitution. The expression "particularly in relation to the transition from the provisions of the Government of India Act" do not restrict but illustrate the scope of the preceding words, namely, "remove any difficulties" (see Shankari Prasad v. Union of India, A.I.R. (1951) S.C. 458).

There are other provisions in this Part like those contained in ARTs. 228, 229, 230, 231 and 232 that do not call for any detailed comment. ART. 228 empowers the continuance of legal proceedings initiated earlier than the Constitution Day against the Federation of Pakistan. ART. 229 deals with the continuance in office of the Chairman and other members of Federal or Provincial Services Commission. ART. 231 describes succession to property and assets, rights, liabilities and obligations of the present Government of the two provinces and the Federation of Pakistan. ARTs. 232 and 233 guarantee that subject to the provisions of the Constitution certain classes of persons shall continue to hold their office on the same terms and conditions as were applicable to them immediately before the Constitution Day. (For an appreciation of the scheme of the constitutional provisions see the opinion rendered by our Supreme Court on the Reference made to it by the President under ART. 162 in P.L.D. (1957) Supreme Court p. 219.).

CHAPTER IV

FEDERALISM AND THE PROBLEM OF LEGISLATIVE AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMPETENCE

FEDERALISM in its broadest and most general sense is a principle which conceives of the federation as the ideal form of social and political life. It is characterized by a tendency to substitute coordinating for subordinating relationships or at least to restrict the latter as much as possible; to replace compulsion from above with reciprocity, understanding and adjustment, command with persuasion and force with law. The basic aspect of federalism is pluralistic, its fundamental tendency is harmonization and its regulative principle is solidarity.

Max Hilderbert Boehm

If the new developments in the older federations are considered together with the new characteristics of the post-war federations, it seems clear that federalism has entered a new phase. Perhaps this may conveniently be called the phase of co-operative federalism. For whereas the guiding principle of eighteenth—and nineteenth—century federalism was the independence of state and federal authorities, the guiding principle of mid-twentieth-century federalism is the need for co-operation between them. The difference is clear; the question remains whether it is great enough to require a rephrasing of the definition of federal government.

Perhaps such a rephrasing is required, but it need not be radical. The classical definition, which was formulated towards the end of the last century by Freeman, Dicey, and others, and has been most carefully explained and justified by Professor Wheare, comprises a number of points: there must be a division of powers between one general and several regional governments, each of which, in its own sphere, is co-ordinate with the others; each government must act directly on the people; each must be limited to its own sphere of action; and each must, within that sphere, be independent of the others. The last two of these points seem inappropriate at the present time, for the older federations have developed practices, and the postwar federations have constitutions, which are clearly incompatible with these conditions. Some may prefer to retain the definition and to admit that these practices do not fit it; and Professor Wheare has suggested that the Indian Constitution should be regarded as quasi-federal and that the Australian system of government is becoming quasi-federal. The alternative is to broaden the definition, and this can be done simply by shortening it.

The following definition may now be adequate: a federal system of government is one in which there is a division of powers between one general and several regional authorities, each of which, in its own sphere, is co-ordinate with the others, and each of which acts directly on the people through its own administrative agencies.

A. H. Birch
(Federalism, Finance and Social Legislation, in Canada, Australia and the United States).

FEDERALISM AND THE PROBLEM OF LEGISLATIVE AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMPETENCE

83. Introductory—Division of Legislative Power

One of the most important problems which has to be faced in the study of any Federal Constitution is to understand the implications of those Constitutional provisions that define the bounds of legislative authority reserved to the Federation on the one hand and to the Federal Units on the other. If a double Government is at all to operate in one and the same territory in relation to one and the same people, limits have got to be prescribed in the Constitution not only as to the territorial operation of the laws passed by the Federal Units but also upon the area of legislative activity admissible to the Federal and Regional legislatures in so far as the subject-matter of legislation is concerned, so that clashes between inconsistent laws with respect to these matters might be avoided. These limitations upon the legislative power are of the essence of a Federal polity and as they are imposed by means of Constitutional provisions, comprehension of the legal significance of these provisions must form the subject-matter of the special industry of the lawyer. That is also one of the reasons why it is said, "Federalism is legalism."

As this aspect of the study of our Constitution raises questions of considerable importance, it is proposed that a critical study of ARTS. 105 to 111 (Articles that deal with the definition and scope of the legislative powers that have been conferred on the Parliament and Provincial Legislatures) should be taken together, and the principles on which they are founded, appreciated in the light of parallel provisions in the Government of India Act, 1935, and the case-law which has interpreted and applied those provisions. Considerable assistance in the matter of understanding the grammar of the legislative relations between the Federation and the Provinces can also be derived by making a comparative study of the provisions of our Constitution with those of other Federations like the United States, Canada, Commonwealth of Australia and India. After this is done, we will briefly review the constitutional relationship which obtains between the Federation and the Provinces on the Administrative side.

84. Territorial Extent of Legislative Power

So far as the territorial extent of the operation of Federal and Provincial laws is concerned ART. 105 provides the answer as follows :

Art. 105.

"Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, Parliament may make laws, including laws having extra-territorial operation, for the whole or for any part of Pakistan, and a Provincial Legislature may make laws for the Province or any part thereof."

This Article is a replica of S. 99 of the Government of India Act, 1935, with the only difference that the legislature visualised by that Act did not have conferred upon it, in express terms, absolute competence to enact laws having extra-territorial validity.

S. 99 of the Govt. of India Act, 1935.

Extra-territorial jurisdiction had, no doubt, been affirmed in S. 99, but it was encumbered by the limits mentioned in the five sub-clauses that had been tacked on to its second sub-section. S. 99 of the Government of India Act, 1935 reads as follows :—

"99. (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Federal Legislature may make laws for the whole or any part of British India or for any Federated State, and a Provincial Legislature may make laws for the Province or for any part thereof.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by the preceding sub-section, no Federal Law shall, on the ground that it would have extra-territorial operation, be deemed to be invalid in so far as it applies—

- (a) to British subjects and servants of the Crown in any part of India; or
- (b) to British subjects who are domiciled in any part of India wherever they may be; or
- (c) to, or to persons on, ships or aircraft registered in British India or any Federated State wherever they may be; or
- (d) in the case of a law with respect to a matter accepted in the Instrument of Accession of a Federated State as a matter with respect to which the Federal Legislature may make laws for that State, to subjects of that State wherever they may be; or
- (e) in the case of a law for the regulation or discipline of any naval, military, or air force raised in British India, to members of, and persons attached to, employed with or following, that force wherever they may be."

When the Government of India Act 1935 was adopted, after the passing of Indian Independence Act, 1947, extra-territorial jurisdiction of the Federal Legislature of Pakistan was expressly affirmed and Section 99, as adapted, assumed the following form;

(Section 99) Extent of Federal and Provincial Laws :

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, Federal Legislature may make laws including laws having extra-territorial operation for the whole or any part of Pakistan, and a Provincial Legislature may make laws for the Province or for any part thereof."

It is not essential that laws to have constitutional validity must necessarily have territorial predication. The legislature is competent to pass a law even in respect of one person, and although in that case it could not be said to be a law for Pakistan or part thereof, it may yet be a valid law. Such a law was passed, for instance, when immediately after the establishment of Pakistan, the Governor of Sind, under an Ordinance, had set up a Court of Enquiry to try certain allegations of misconduct and maladministration that had been made against the Chief Minister of the former Province of Sind, Mr M. A. Khuhro. The Provinces, of course, can only make laws that have operational value within the territorial limits defined by the boundaries of the Provinces: negatively, the Provinces have not the power to pass laws having extra-territorial operation (see the case of B. Ojha v. President of Bihar State Board, reported in A.I.R. (1954) Patna p. 262, where it was declared that the State of Bihar (which is a Federal Unit in the Union of India) had no power to make laws which would have extra-territorial operation or which could affect a decree of a Court which is located outside its jurisdiction).

The laws made by a legislature normally have only intra-territorial operation, that is, they would apply to all persons and things which are situate, or, to acts and omissions which take place, within the territory over which a given legislature has jurisdiction to legislate. By extra-territorial jurisdiction is meant the capacity or the competence of legislature to pass a law which may validly operate upon persons or things or acts and omissions outside the territory over which it has direct jurisdiction.

Now the general rule is that a sovereign legislature has the power to make laws having extra-territorial validity. We must, however, distinguish between the extent of legislative competence to enact valid laws having extra-territorial jurisdiction and their enforceability. In the case of British Columbia Electric Railway Company Limited v. The King, reported in (1946) Appeal Cases, p. 527 (at p. 542), their Lordships of the Privy Council observed:

"What is here in issue is the extent of legislative power of a Dominion Legislature having regard to the language of the Statute of Westminster. This is not the same question as the question whether legislative power is so used as to extend beyond what will prove to be effective. A legislature which passed a law having extra-territorial operation may well find that what it has enacted cannot be directly enforced, but the Act is not invalid on that account, and the courts of this country must enforce the law with the machinery available to them."

Their Lordships, be it noted, were interpreting S. 3 of the Statute of Westminster 1931, which says :

"It is hereby declared and enacted that the Parliament of a dominion has full power to make laws having extra-territorial operation."

Their Lordships concurred with the view expressed by Kerwin J. of the Supreme Court of Canada, who in his judgment under appeal stated the Rule as follows:

"... by head 3 of s. 91 of the British North America Act (the Canadian) Parliament was authorised to make laws with reference to 'the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.' As long as Parliament legislates with reference to such matters the permitted scope of the legislation is not restricted by any consideration not applicable to the legislation of a fully sovereign state. Such a state may tax persons outside its territory. Here it is clear that it has done so and the Canadian courts must obey the enactments."

Much of the case-law that has arisen in recent years has reference to the problem posed in relation to the power of a legislature to impose taxes over persons subject to its jurisdiction (whether corporate or incorporate) in respect of income derived in foreign territories. We might notice in this context the case reported in Broken Hill South Co. Ltd. v. The Commissioner of Taxation (N.S.W.) (1937) 56 CLR 337, at 356. There, the Chief Justice of the Australian High Court observed :

"A resident of New South Wales can be taxed in New South Wales in respect of his income wherever derived, his property wherever situated, or of any other circumstance. The property in New South Wales of any person can be taxed in such manner as the Parliament of New South Wales determines. The law imposing any of the taxes mentioned would clearly be a law for the peace, welfare and good government of the New South Wales. But it does not follow that any relation to or connection with New South Wales can be utilized as a basis for any taxation . . ." (See also the case of Commissioner of Stamp Duties (N.S.W.) v. Millar, (1932) 48 CLR, p. 618, and Colonial Gas Association Limited v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation, (1934) 51 CLR 172, referred to in the above case).

In the Government of India Act 1935, it is S.99 that deals with the question of territorial jurisdiction and in sub-section (2) are laid down, by way of enumeration, the items in respect of which legislature is expressly declared to be competent to give extra-territorial effect to its laws.

The interpretation of S. 99 sub-section (2) as given by the Federal Court is to be found in the case of Governor-General-in-Council v. Raleigh Investment Co. Ltd. reported in A.I.R. (1944) F. C. p. 51. The Court repelled the contention that Indian Legislature was not competent to impose tax upon a person not resident within British India in respect of property which was not situated within British India, since that provision was in the nature of extra-territorial legislation not specifically provided for in any of the clauses of sub-section (2) of S.99, and on the facts of that the Court held (at p. 60) :

"In the circumstances of the present case, we are of the opinion that the 'source' of dividends paid to the plaintiff-company by the sterling companies was British India and that in making them liable to income tax on that basis the Indian Legislature is not giving its law any extra-territorial operation."

The Federal Court, however, upon the assumption that the provision complained of had extra-territorial operation proceeded to say that even in such a case such a provision of law would not be ultra vires of the Indian Legislature. Chief Justice Spens said (at p. 61):

"The lines on which sub-section (2) of S. 99 has been framed are even more significant. In the High Court, the learned Judges have read this sub-section as conferring power upon the Federal Legislature to exceed the territorial limits in certain cases and they accordingly limit this power to the five cases specified in that sub-section. This seems to us, with all respect, to be a misreading of the Section. Unlike clauses (b) and (c) of S. 65 of the Government of India Act of 1915, sub-section (2) of S. 99 is worded not as a provision 'conferring power to make laws' but a provision which assumes that the preceding sub-section is capable of being read as including the power to make laws even in respect of the matters specified in the five cases dealt with in sub-section (2). This is made clear both by the opening words of sub-section (2), namely, 'without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by the preceding sub-section,' and also by the tenor of the sub-section which only purports to obviate objection on the ground of extraterritorial operation."

Clauses (b) and (c) of S. 65 of the Government of India Act of 1915, to which by way of comparison their Lordships of the Federal Court made a reference in this case, were in the following terms :

"65.—The Indian Legislature has power to make laws:

- (a) for all persons, for all courts, and for all places and things, within British India; and
- (b) for all subjects of His Majesty and servants of the Crown within other parts of India; and....
- (c) for all native Indian subjects of His Majesty, without and beyond as well as within British India; and
- (d)
- (e)
- (f)"

Their Lordships felt that the reason for stating in sub-section (2) of S.99 by way of enumeration the extra-territorial powers of law-making was the following :

"If it should be asked what necessity there was, in this view, for specifying particular cases in that sub-section, the answer would be that it was probably thought that the simple omission of the corresponding provisions found in the Act of 1915 might lead to the impression that the power to deal with those matters had been taken away from the Federal Legislature."

They proceeded further to remark :

"Even the language of Section 99(1) involves some limitation and it might have been considered safer to avoid all risk of any difference of opinion as to its scope, so far as the topics specified in sub-section (2) were concerned."

Their Lordships gave one more ground for holding that the power of the Federal Legislature in respect of extra-territorial legislation was not limited to the cases specified in clauses (a) to (e) of sub-section (2) to S. 99, by making a reference to Entry No.23 of List I of Seventh Schedule, relating to 'fishing and fisheries beyond territorial waters'—and they proceeded to add :

"It would not be right to derive the power to legislate on this topic merely from the reference to it in the List, because the purpose of the Lists was not to create or confer powers, but only to distribute between the Federal and Provincial Legislatures the powers which had been conferred by Sections 99 and 100 of the Act. Nor can the power be inferred from the doctrine of accessory or necessary powers, for, it cannot be said that the other powers conferred on the Federal Legislature cannot be made effective without the right to legislate in respect of fisheries beyond territorial waters. The power so to legislate was obviously understood to have been conferred by sub-section (1) of Section 99."

This case went in appeal to the Privy Council, but their Lordships of the Privy Council disposed of the matter upon an entirely different basis—that is, on the basis of S.67 of the Income Tax Act, which bars the jurisdiction of the civil court to try civil suits instituted to set aside or modify an assessment made under that Act. [See Raleigh Investment Co. v. Governor-General, reported in (1947) Privy Council, p. 78].

Before taking leave of the above case decided by the Federal Court of India, it is necessary to remark that the entire judgment was allowed to be controlled by a consideration of the constitutional theory and practice in regard to the concept of extra-territorial jurisdiction of a Dominion Legislature as it obtains in the dominions of the Commonwealth, and more particularly by the proceedings of the Sub-committee of the Imperial Conference of 1926 "which reported that the subject was full of obscurity and there was conflict in legal opinion as expressed in the courts and in the writings of jurists both as to the existence of the limitation itself and as to its extent." Their Lordships of the Federal Court referred to the provisions of Section 3 of the Statute of Westminster and the decisions reported in Croft v. Dunphy, (1933) A.C. 156, and British Coal Corporation and others v. The King, (1935) A.C., page 500.

It is submitted with respect that all these materials constitute a basis which is clearly inadmissible for interpreting the express language of a constitutional instrument of a country to which the statute of Westminster did not apply, and the very fact that Section 99 did not expressly confer upon the Legislature the power to pass laws having extra-territorial validity was by itself sufficient to reach the conclusion that its law-making power could only be availed of within the limits imposed by that Section itself. Section 3 of the Statute of Westminster (as it has so often heretofore been judicially determined), was designed to secure the conferment of specific investment of extra-territorial power and was calculated to remove the generally accepted limitation on colonial legislative jurisdiction, a limitation which the Courts of the Colony in which the issue came to be raised, were bound to recognise. And it is only after its enactment that that jurisdictional inadequacy no longer hampers the legislative freedom of a country like Canada that has the status of a full-fledged Dominion (see McLeod v. Attorney General for New South Wales (1891) A.C., page 455). On the premises of this reasoning, it is submitted with respect, that the decision in Governor-General v. Raleigh Investment Company, (1944) F.C., p. 51, does not accord with the correct principles of constitutional interpretation and that, to that extent, the decision mis-construes and mis-applies the second clause of Section 99 of the Government of India Act.

We may in the end also notice the case reported in 1948, Privy Council, p. 118 (Wallace Brothers & Co. Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income Tax Bombay), where also the provisions of the Income Tax Act authorising inclusion of foreign income for the purposes of income tax were challenged as being ultra vires on the ground that they had extra-territorial operation contrary to the provisions of S.99. Their Lordships of the Privy Council left open the question whether the Indian Legislature had, or had not extra-territorial powers of legislation but held on the facts of that case that the power to tax foreign income was inherent in the power to tax the income of a person subject to the jurisdiction of Indian Legislature and for this they referred to the general conception as to the scope of legislative practice in the United Kingdom with regard to income tax. Their Lordships observed (at. p. 120):

"Where Parliament has conferred a power to legislate on a particular topic it is permissible and important in determining the scope and meaning of the power to have regard to what is ordinarily treated as embraced within the topic in the legislative practice of the United Kingdom. (See 1933 Appeal Cases, p. 156, at p. 165). The point of reference is emphatically not to seek a pattern to which a due exercise of the power must conform. The object is to ascertain the general conception involved in the words used in the enabling Act." Their Lordships further held that, "the derivation from British India of the major part of its income for a year gives to a Company, as respects that year, a territorial connection sufficient to justify the Company being treated as at home in British India for all purposes relating to taxation on its income for that year from whatever source that income may be derived. If it is so at home in British India it is a person properly subject to the jurisdiction of the Central India Legislature."

Relevance of the Concept of Extra-territorial Jurisdiction in sphere of provincial Legislative Authority.

All these cases have been referred to by the present writer in an attempt to throw the entire concept of extra-territorial jurisdiction of the Indian Legislature (which was a non-sovereign law-making body) into bold relief. Its pragmatic relevance is still available in the domain of Provincial legislative jurisdiction although, as is obvious, it is no longer relevant for the determination of the scope of the legislative jurisdiction of our Parliament, since that legislative body has now expressly conferred upon it extra-territorial jurisdiction by ART. 105. But the Legislatures in the Provinces do not have extra-territorial jurisdiction and the case-law referred to above may well afford a guidance for the determination of any legal problem that might arise in connection with the operation of laws passed by the Provinces that fall within the ambit of the concept of extra-territorial legislative jurisdiction dealt with above.

If a Province were to make laws affecting persons or relating to a subject-matter with which it has no clear and unambiguous territorial nexus such a law will be void (see A.I.R. (1956) Bombay, p. 1 State of Bombay vs. R.M.D. Chamarbaughwala. If a law, to take one example, relating to preventive detention, has been passed by a Province, the warrant of detention issued by the competent authority under its provisions can have legal force only within its boundaries, and if any attempt is made to execute it in any other part of Pakistan it could be successfully challenged as being an act beyond its legislative and administrative competence. For any law made by a Province to affect matters or persons outside its boundaries, it must be shown that there is a discernible territorial nexus between the State and the matter or person sought to be affected thereby. [See (1955) Bombay 439, Radhabai v. The State of Bombay].

^{1891 A.C. 455.} We might further notice the case of Macleod v. Attorney-General for New South Wales reported in (1891), Appeal Cases, p. 455, decided by the Privy Council on appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales upon the question relating to the limits of the legislative power of a Province in a Federal polity. This was a case in which the Colony of New South Wales in its 54th Section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1883, had provided: "whosoever being married marries another person during the life of the former husband or wife, wheresoever such second marriage takes place, shall be liable to penal servitude for seven years." On the face of it, the Statute covered all cases of second marriage by a person irrespective of the place where the second marriage takes place, that is, within or without the New South Wales Colony. This wider interpretation was not accepted by the Privy Council and Lord Halsbury, L.C. remarked as to this, "Therefore, if their Lordships construe the statute as it stands, and upon the bare words, any person, married to any other person, who marries a second time anywhere in the habitable globe, is amenable to the criminal jurisdiction of New South Wales, if he can be caught in that Colony. That seems to their Lordships to be an impossible construction of the statute; the Colony can have no such jurisdiction, and their Lordships do not desire to attribute to the Colonial Legislature an effort to enlarge their jurisdiction to such an extent as would be inconsistent with the powers committed to a colony, and, indeed, inconsistent with the most familiar principles of international law." Their Lordships further observed, that in the case of an alleged offender who had committed this offence by marrying a second time outside New South Wales, there would be no jurisdiction to try him under the New South Wales Code. The wider construction could not be accepted because it would have been beyond the jurisdiction of the Colony to enact such law. "Their jurisdiction is confined within their own territories, and the maxim which has been more than once quoted Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur, would be applicable to such a case. Lord Wensleydale, when Baron Parke, advising the House of Lords in Jefferys v. Boosey, (1854) 4 H.L.R. 815, expresses the same proposition in very terse language. He says (at page 926): "The Legislature has no power over any persons except its own subjects, that is, persons natural born subjects or resident, or whilst they are within the limits of the kingdom. The Legislature can impose no duties except on them; and when legislating for the benefit of persons, must prima facie, be considered to mean the benefit of those who owe obedience to our laws, and whose interests the Legislature is under a correlative obligation to protect . . . All crime is local. The jurisdiction over the crime belongs to the country where the crime is committed, and, except over her own subjects, her Majesty and the Imperial Legislature have no power whatever . . . It appears to their Lordships that the effect of giving the wider interpretation to this statute necessary to sustain this indictment would be to comprehend a great deal more than Her Majesty's subjects; more than any person who may be within the jurisdiction of the Colony by any means whatsoever; and that, therefore, if that construction were given to the statute, it would follow as a necessary result that the statute was ultra vires of the Colonial Legislature to pass."

The case of Royal Bank of Canada v. The King, reported in (1913) Appeal Cases, p. 283 also indirectly affirms the proposition that the Provinces of Canada cannot pass laws having extra-territorial operation although the decision of the Privy Council in that case appears really to proceed on the view that the subject-matter of the impugned legislation passed by the Province fell outside the sphere of its competence with respect to the subject-matter in that, "the effect of the Statute of 1910, if validly enacted, would have been to preclude the Bank from fulfilling its legal obligation to return their money to the bond-holders, whose right to this return was a civil right, which had arisen and remained enforceable outside the Province. The Statute was on this ground beyond the powers of the Legislature of Alberta, inasmuch as what was sought to be enacted was neither confined to property and civil rights within the Province nor directed solely to matters of merely local or private nature within it."

^{1913 A.C. 283.}

^{ART. 107.} If it ever becomes necessary for the two Provincial Assemblies of West Pakistan and East Pakistan that any of the matters enumerated in the Provincial List or in respect of any matter not enumerated in any list in the Fifth Schedule, should be regulated in the Provinces by an Act of Parliament, they could pass resolutions to that effect and upon the passing of such a resolution it shall be lawful for the Parliament to pass the necessary legislation regulating the matter in question. But then such a legislation in regard to its operation and effect in any province or part thereof could also be amended or repealed by an Act of the Provincial Legislature of the Province concerned in amending or repealing it. (See ART. 107).

85. Retrospectivity of laws

Competence to enact laws retrospectively. Although there is no affirmative provision in

Retro-active Legislation and Penal Laws.

the Constitution which confers upon the legislatures of our country power to pass, what are called, retro-active laws, it cannot be seriously disputed that such a competence is a concomitant correlate, if not an inherent attribute of the powers of the Legislature to make laws. In the case of The King v. Kidman and others (1915) 20 C.L.R., p. 425, Higgins J. at p. 451 remarked:

"The British Parliament, admittedly, has power to make laws retro-active; and, I know of no instance in which a legislature created by the British Parliament has been held to have over-stepped its powers by making legislation retro-active. There are plenty of passages that can be cited showing the inexpediency, and the injustice, in most cases, of legislating for the past, of interfering with the vested rights, and of making acts unlawful which are lawful when done; but these passages do not raise any doubt as to the power of the Legislature to pass retro-active legislation, if it see fit." (See also L'Union St. Jacques de Montreal v. Belisle, (L. R. 6 P.C. 31).

But we must note, however, that there is one constitutional limit upon this power to make ex-post facto laws in respect of penal legislative measures: ART. 6 offers protection against the making of retro-active offences or the infliction of enhanced punishments, and the power to make laws under ART. 105 being itself "subject to the provision of the Constitution", gives place to ART. 6, which directs that no person shall be punished for an act which was not punishable by law when the act was done, nor shall any person be subjected to a punishment greater than that prescribed by law for an offence when the offence was committed. Subject to this limitation, Legislature has the fullest plenitude of power to interfere with vested rights and can even pass extremely unconscionable fiscal measures and give to them retrospective effect.

A court is not entitled to sit in judgment over the propriety or otherwise of the decision by the Legislature to give retrospective effect to certain laws. For instance, as has been mentioned earlier the retroactive operation of the Finance Act of 1936 (Ch. 34), S. 18(3) was upheld in the case of Howard De Walden (Lord) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1942) 1 All E. R. p. 287. Lord Greene M.R., who delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal, observed (at p. 290):

"The fact that the section has to some extent a retro-active effect again appears to us of no importance when it is realised that the legislation is a move in a long and fiercely contested battle with individuals who well understand the rigour of the contest."

Does the power to legislate retrospectively extend to cover pre-constitution acts and omissions. Union of India vs. Madan Gopal.

It has been held in India that the Legislatures that have been created by the Constitution have the power to enact retro-active laws so as to reach even matters in the pre-Constitution period. (See A.I.R. (1954) Supreme Court, p. 158, the case of Union of India v. Madan Gopal). It would, however, be noticed upon the perusal of the judgment in that case that although some observations have been made in support of the proposition that the Legislatures established under the Indian Constitution have the power to pass legislation touching and concerning pre-Constitution matters, it was held, on the facts of that case, that the impugned legislation, namely the Finance Act of 1950 was not, as a matter of construction, a retro-active piece of legislation. The Court remarked that the Act was prospective in operation in that it levied a certain charge of income-tax and super-tax at specified rates for the year beginning on the 1st of April, 1950: it said, "The case is thus one where the statute purports to operate only prospectively, but such operation has, under the scheme of the Indian Income Tax Law, to take into account income earned before the statute came into force. Such an enactment cannot, strictly speaking, be said to be retro-active legislation, though its operation may affect acts done in the past." Their Lordships of the Supreme Court relied on the case of Queen v. St. Mary, Whitechapel (1848) 12 Q.B., 120: 116 E.R. 811 in support of this view. If this view as to what retro-active legislation is, be regarded as correct, the dicta referred to above would become obiter since the reason for deciding the case will then be entirely a different one altogether.

It is the view of the present writer that the Legislatures established by the Constitution cannot pass laws affecting acts and omissions that have taken place before the coming into force of the Constitution. And before such an abnormal power could be suffered by courts to be assumed by the Legislatures, it must be shown that it was expressly conferred upon them. Once it is conceded that the Legislatures established by the Constitution are new legal institutions deriving their powers from the terms of the Constitution itself, it would be difficult to justify the assumption of the power by such newly created institutions to pass laws affecting acts and omissions countenanced by subjects during the pre-Constitution period.

For the student of Law an important feature of retro-active legislation to understand is the rule of construction which courts have evolved in regard to the interpretation of the retro-active effect of legislation upon what are called 'vested rights.' The all-important rule in this respect is the one which says that all legislation is presumed to be prospective unless by express words or necessary intendment the court finds that the legislation in question is calculated or is designed to have retrospective effect and then too, no more effect by way of retrospective operation would be given to it, than is absolutely necessary. Bowen L. J. observed in the case of Reid v. Reid (1886) 31 Ch. p. 402 at p. 408 :

"It seems to me that even in construing an Act which is to a certain extent retrospective and in construing a Section which to a certain extent is retrospective, we ought, nevertheless to bear in mind that maxim (omnis nova constitutio futuris formam imponere dilect non practeritis) as applicable whenever we reach the line at which the words of the Section cease to be plain. That is a necessary and logical corollary of the general proposition, that you ought not to give a larger retrospective power to a Section, even in an Act which is to some extent intended to be retrospective, than you can plainly see the legislature meant."

(See also Gardner v. Lucas (1878), 3 A.C. 582 at 601, Hough v. Windus (1884) 12 Q.B.D., p. 224.)

In the case of John Lemm v. Thomas Alexander Mitchell (1912) A.C. p. 400, the effect of prior determinations by courts resulting in the accrual of vested rights was considered by their Lordships of the Privy Council. In this case the respondent succeeded in obtaining a decree for damages in his favour on the allegation that appellant was guilty of "criminal conversation" with his wife. In the proceedings the appellant defended himself by saying that the same action brought by the respondent had been thrown out by the Court on the ground that under the law of Hong Kong (as gathered from a certain Ordinance) the common law offence of criminal conversation did not exist and he contended that the new Ordinance No. 20 of 1908, which had restored and revived the right of action for criminal conversation in Hong Kong did not expressly set aside the judgment that had duly been passed in his favour. The Ordinance had undoubtedly an express retrospective effect to the extent of enabling action to be brought in respect of criminal conversation during the period when the right of action had ceased to exist in the Colony, but the question to be determined was whether it further operated to annul a valid and subsisting judgment as between parties whose rights had been duly determined under and in accordance with the law which existed before the new Ordinance was passed. The respondent assumed that it did and the lower Court accepted his case. Their Lordships set aside the judgment observing:

"The substance of the question then tried was whether or not the law of the Colony gave the plaintiff a remedy on the facts alleged. It was decided that it did not

Rules of Interpretation in regard to the Retrospective operation of laws.

Reid vs. Reid.

Retro-active laws and Res-judicata.
John Lemm v. Thomas A. Mitchell.

and the defendant thereupon became entitled on those allegations to a judgment dismissing the whole claim. This result was not due to any defect in the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court which was ample but to a short-coming in the law in general. In the absence of appeal, the judgment was final determination of the rights of the parties and the ordinary principle that a man is not to be vexed twice for the same alleged cause of action applies unless it be excluded by Legislature in explicit and unmistakable terms. This is not the case here."

Their Lordships further observed :

"It would require a language much more explicit than that which is to be found in the Ordinance of 1908 to justify a Court of Law in holding that a legislative body intended not merely to alter the law but to alter it so as to deprive a litigant of a judgment rightly given and still subsisting."

Hedderwick vs. Federal Commissioner.

In short, the court would lean against any construction of legislation which is to have the effect in it of making statute retrospective so as to affect vested rights. The following extracts from the judgment of the Australian High Court would be of much assistance to the student in understanding the limits of this rule. [Hedderwick and others v. Federal Commissioner of Land Tax (1913) 16 C. L. R. p. 27 (at p. 36)]:

"As to the rule applicable to changes in the law pending litigation I read from Hardcastle on Statutes, 2nd ed., p. 374:—'In Main v. Stark 15 App. Cas. 384 at pp. 387-388, Lord Selborne said: 'Their Lordships, of course, do not say that there might not be something in the context of an Act of Parliament, or to be collected from its language, which might give to words, prima facie prospective, a larger operation; but they ought not to receive a larger operation unless you find some reason for giving it.' And, 'Words not requiring a retrospective operation, so as to affect an existing Statute pre-judicially, ought not to be so construed.'

"It is a well 'recognized rule that Statutes should be interpreted, if possible, so as to respect vested rights.' For it is not to be presumed that interference with existing rights is intended by the Legislature, and if a Statute be ambiguous the Court should lean to the interpretation which would support existing rights."

"It is hardly necessary to remark that the Crown's vested rights are to be respected as much as are the rights of private persons.

"Again, at p. 375, the learned author says :—

"In Gardner v. Lucas 3 App. Cas. 582, at p. 603, Lord Blackburn stated this rule of law in the following way with regard to the effect of a Statute upon a transaction past and closed, where the effect would be to alter a transaction already entered into. 'Where,' said he, 'the effect would be to make that valid which was previously invalid, to make an instrument which had no effect at all, and from which the party was at liberty to depart as long as he pleased, binding—I think the prima facie construction of the Act is that it is not to be retrospective, and it would require strong reasons to show that it is not the case.' In Moon v. Durden 2 Ex., 22, an action to recover a sum of money alleged to have been won upon a wager, was commenced in June 1845. In August 1845, the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 was passed, which enacted, in sec. 18, that 'no suit shall be brought or maintained for recovering 'any' such sum of 'money', and the question was whether that enactment was retrospective so as to defeat an action already commenced. It was held that it was not retrospective, and Parke B., in his judgment, said :—'It seems a strong thing to hold that the legislature could have meant that a party who under a contract made prior to the Act had as perfect a title to recover a sum of money as he had to any of his personal property, should be totally deprived of it without compensation.' So also, in Couch v. Jeffries 4 Burr., 2460, a verdict was obtained for a penalty for not paying stamp duty. After the verdict, 9 Geo. III. c. 37, was passed, which enacted, in sec. 4, that 'if the duty before neglected to be paid shall be paid by September 1, 1769, the person who had incurred the penalty by the omission shall be discharged from the said penalty.' In pursuance of this Statute the defendant had paid the duty which he had before neglected to pay, and thereupon moved that judgment should not be entered up against him. 'But,' said Lord Mansfield C.J., 'here is a right vested, and it is not to be imagined that the legislature could by general words mean to take it away from the person in whom it had so legally vested, and who had been put to expense in prosecuting'..... 'It is a general rule, said Jessel, M. R., in Re Joseph Such & Co. 1 Ch. D., 48, at p. 50. 'that when the legislature alters the rights of parties by taking away or conferring any right of action, its enactments, unless in express terms they apply to pending actions, do not affect them.' But there is an exception to this rule, namely, where enactments merely affect procedure, and do not extend to rights of action."

[See also :

- (1) Gardner and Co. Ltd. v. Cone (1928) 1 Ch., p. 955,
- (2) Lord Suffield v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (1908) 1 K.B.D., p. 865,
- (3) In re Joseph Such & Co. Ltd. (1875), 1 Ch. D., p. 48, and
- (4) Alexander Cowan & Sons Ltd. v. Nicholas Lockyer (1903-4), 1 C.L.R., p. 460.
- (5) Observations of Sullaiman J. in (1941) F.C. 16, Atiqá Begum's case; and in (1953) S.C. of India 221 (Hossein Kasam Dada's case).

86. Distinction between Procedural Law and Substantive Law

As to the distinction between procedural law and substantive law, no rules exist by recourse to which a clear-cut line of demarcation can be drawn between them. And, in fact, in no case have any tests been formulated in any of the several cases that have been decided by the Courts in England or elsewhere which can be regarded as being of any practical assistance to the student in the matter of defining the province of substantive as opposed to adjectival law. But for the purpose of understanding the theoretical basis of the distinction between these two branches of law, it should be useful to turn to the statement of the principle in terms of which Sir John Salmond regards the problem:

"It is no easy task to state with precision the exact nature of the distinction between substantive law and the law of procedure (for a fuller discussion of the topic see W.W. Cook, 'Substance' and 'Procedure' in the Conflicts of Laws (1933), 42 Yale L.J. 333.) and it will conduce to clearness if we first consider a plausible but erroneous explanation. In view of the fact that the administration of justice in its typical form consists in the application of remedies to the violations of rights, it may be suggested that substantive law is that which defines the rights, while procedural law determines the remedies. This application, however, of the distinction between jus and remedium is inadmissible. For, in the first place, there are many rights (in the wide sense) which belong to the sphere of procedure; for example, a right of appeal, a right to give evidence on one's own behalf, a right to interrogate the other party, and so on. In the second place, rules defining the remedy may be as much a part of the substantive law as are those which define the right itself. No one would call the abolition of capital punishment, for instance, a change in the law of criminal procedure. The substantive part of the criminal law deals, not with crimes alone, but with punishment also. So in the civil law, the rules as to the measures of damages pertain to the substantive law, no less than those declaring what damage is actionable; and rules determining the classes of agreements which will be specifically enforced are as clearly substantive as are those determining the agreements which will be enforced at all. To define procedure as concerned not with rights, but with remedies, is to confound the remedy with the process by which it is made available.

"What, then, is the true nature of the distinction? The law of procedure may be defined as that branch of the law which governs the process of litigation. It is the law of actions—jus quad ad actiones pertinet—using the term action in a wide sense to include all legal proceedings, civil or criminal. All the residue is substantive law, and relates, not to the process of litigation, but to its purposes and subject-matter. Substantive law is concerned with the ends which the administration of justice seeks; procedural law deals with the means and instruments by which those ends are to be attained. The latter regulates the conduct and relations of courts and litigants in respect of the litigation itself; the former determines their conduct and relations in respect of the matters litigated.

"A glance at the actual contents of the law of procedure will enable us to judge the accuracy of this explanation. Whether I have a right to recover certain property is a question of substantive law, for the determination and the protection of such rights are among the ends of the administration of justice; but in what courts and within what time I must institute proceedings are questions of procedural law, for they relate merely to the modes in which the courts fulfil their functions. What facts constitute a wrong is determined by the substantive law; what facts constitute proof of a wrong is a question of procedure. For the first relates to the subject-matter of litigation, the second to the process merely. Whether an offence is punishable by fine or by imprisonment is a question of substantive law, for the existence and measure of criminal liability are matters pertaining to the end and purpose of the administration of justice. But whether an offence is punishable summarily or only on indictment is a question of procedure. Finally, it may be observed that, whereas the abolition of capital punishment would be an alteration of the substantive law, the abolition of imprisonment for debt was merely an alteration in the law of procedure. For punishment is one of the ends of the administration of justice, while imprisonment for debt was merely an instrument for enforcing payment.

"So far as the administration of justice is concerned with the application of remedies to violated rights, we may say that the substantive law defines the remedy and the right, while the law of procedure defines the modes and conditions of the application of the one to the other." (See his "Jurisprudence" Ed. p. 475-6).

The distinction between substantive law and adjectival law becomes at times highly important for the purpose of judicial interpretation: an adjectival law is presumed to be retrospective on the theory that nobody has a vested right in procedure, but the substantive law is presumed to be prospective upon the footing of the rule evolved by the courts viz.: that the legislature does not intend to prejudicially affect the rights of the subjects and when it does so intend, it makes its intention manifest by means of appropriate words in the statute.

87. Territorial Extent of Provincial Legislation

We have already seen that if a Province were to make laws affecting persons or relating to a subject-matter with which it has no clear and unambiguous territorial nexus such a law will be void. Thus the competence to legislate (territorially considered) is specifically confined to the extent of there being a territorial nexus between the subject-matter and the area of the Province or part thereof. If a person affected by the legislation were to challenge it on the ground that he is affected by the legislation, although he or his business or the transaction in which he is engaged or involved has no connection with the State at all, then it would be open to the Court to say that the legislation is extra-territorial in its effect and therefore ultra vires of the powers of the Provincial Legislature.

In the American Constitution, as also in the Canadian and Australian Constitutions, the Federal Units do not possess any extra-territorial legislative powers. (See (1914,) 232 U.S. 299, at 305-6: 58 L. Ed. 612, United States v. Bennett; (1913) Appeal Cases, p. 283, Royal Bank of Canada v. The King; (1891) Appeal Cases, p. 455 MacLeod v. Attorney-General for New South Wales.)

88. Legislative Authority in relation to foreigners

In its operation every law passed by the National Parliament of Pakistan, in the absence of statutorily enacted exceptions to the contrary, will apply to all persons, foreigners not excluding, within the territory of Pakistan to which the Act has been made applicable.

This, a somewhat broadly stated rule, as to the legislative competence of Parliament to pass laws affecting foreigners, is subject to the ordinary rules of private and public international law concerning diplomatic and consular immunities enjoyed by foreign missions and their representatives stationed within the territory of the State. There is also the rule of construction which has been evolved by English Courts, by recourse to which, recognition is extended to the principle viz., that in respect of crimes committed abroad the State exercises jurisdiction only with respect to its own subjects. A law will therefore always be so construed as not to make its enactment applicable to foreigners in respect of acts committed outside the State. In the case of The Queen v. Jameson, (1896) 2 Q.B. 425 it was observed:

"... One other general principle of construction is this that if any construction otherwise be possible, an Act will not be construed as applying to foreigners in respect to acts done by them outside the dominions of the sovereign power enacting. That is a rule based on international law by which one sovereign power is bound to respect the subjects and the rights of all other sovereign powers outside its own territory".

The reason why the diplomatic privileges and immunities are granted to foreign envoys is no other than the one founded on rules governing international morality. These rules demand that the municipal law of the receiving States should extend to the foreign representatives the status and position which is due to the sovereign States whose agents they are: In the words of Oppenheim :

"The reasons why these privileges must be granted are that diplomatic envoys are representatives of States and of their dignity, and, further, that they could not exercise their functions perfectly unless they enjoyed such privileges. For it is obvious that, were they liable to ordinary legal and political interference like other individuals, and thus more or less dependent on the goodwill of the Government, they might be influenced by personal considerations of safety and comfort to a degree which would materially hamper them in the exercise of their functions." (L. Oppenheim's International Law, 1948 Ed. p. 706).

It is perfectly competent to the National Parliament to pass a law which is applicable to acts done or omissions made by Pakistani subjects, no matter where they may be residing at the time when those acts and omissions took place. (See S.4 of the Pakistan Penal Code, as also S. 188 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

89. Concept of the territory of the State

The territory of the State is that portion of the earth's surface which is in its exclusive possession and control and includes not only the column of superincumbent air but also the territorial waters which under the Public International Law extend to three miles from the coast. (See Vol. 1 of Oppenheim's International Law, 7th Ed., p. 415, 444, and the case reported in A.I.R. (1954) Madras, p. 291, A.M.S.S.V.M. & Co. v. State of Madras). Similarly, it is a well-known principle of International Law that for certain purposes like Police, Revenue, Public Health, Fisheries, a sovereign State may enact laws affecting the seas surrounding its coast to a reasonable distance which may exceed the ordinary limits of its territorial waters. In A.I.R. (1933) Privy Council, p. 16, E.R. Croft v. Sylvester Dunphy, it has been held, for instance, that the Canadian Parliament has the power to pass a legislation, authorising the forfeiture of dutiable goods found in vessels "hovering within a distance of 12 miles from the coast of Canada." This was because, "the States can legislate effectively only for their own territories. To what distance sea-ward the territory of a State is to be taken as extending is a question of international law.... Whatever the limits of the territorial waters in the international sense, it has long been recognised that for certain purposes . . . a State may enact laws affecting the seas surrounding its coasts to a distance sea-ward which exceeds the ordinary limits of its territory."

90. Legislative Competence as to subject-matter

In so far as legislative competence is to be determined with regard to the subject-matter that is constitutionally admissible to Federal and Provincial Legislatures, ART. 106 of our Constitution provides as follows :—

"106.—(1) Notwithstanding anything in the two next succeeding clauses, Parliament shall have exclusive power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Federal List.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in clause (3), Parliament, and subject to clause (1) a Provincial Legislature also, shall have power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List.

(3) Subject to clauses (1) and (2), a Provincial Legislature shall have exclusive power to make laws for a Province or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Provincial List.

(4) Parliament shall have power to make laws with respect to matters enumerated in the Provincial List, except for a Province or any part thereof."

This Section is a verbatim reproduction of S.100 of the Government of India Act, 1935, which was in the following words:

"100.—Subject-matter of Federal and Provincial Laws:

(1) Notwithstanding anything in the two next succeeding sub-sections, the Federal Legislature has, and a Provincial Legislature has not, power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List I in the seventh Schedule to this Act (hereinafter called the 'Federal Legislative List').

(2) Notwithstanding anything in the next succeeding sub-section, the Federal Legislature, and, subject to the preceding sub-section, a Provincial Legislature also, have power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List III in the said Schedule (hereinafter called the 'Concurrent Legislative List').

(3) Subject to the two preceding sub-sections the Provincial Legislature has,

Legislative Competence as to subject-matter and the Federal Legislature has not, power to make laws for a Province or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List II in the said Schedule (hereinafter called the 'Provincial Legislative List').

(4) The Federal Legislature has power to make laws with respect to matters enumerated in the Provincial Legislative List except for a Province or any part thereof."

Section 100 of the Government of India Act has also been adapted as ART. 245 in the Indian Constitution.

Sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act have a great deal of importance for us, not only because the scheme of those sections was responsible for the phraseology which the framers of the Government of India Act 1935 adopted in that Act, but also because, numerous decisions of the Privy Council that have interpreted the provisions of the Canadian Constitution are of considerable assistance to us in the matter of comprehending the precise scope of the powers of the Federal and the Provincial Legislature in regard to their competence to enact laws affecting certain well-defined species of subject-matter that have been made admissible to them by ART. 106 of our Constitution: Sections 91 and 92 are as follows :—

"91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing terms in this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

1. The Public Debt and Property.
2. The Regulation of Trade and Commerce.
- 2-A. Unemployment Insurance.
3. The raising of money by any Mode or System of Taxation.
4. The borrowing of Money on the Public Credit.
5. Postal Service.
6. The Census and Statistics.
7. Militia, Military and Naval Service, and Defence.
8. The fixing of and providing for the Salaries and Allowances of Civil and other Officers of the Government of Canada.
9. Beacons, Buoys, Lighthouses, and Sable Island.
10. Navigation and Shipping.
11. Quarantine and the Establishment and Maintenance of Marine Hospitals.
12. Sea Coast and Inland Fisheries.
13. Ferries between a Province and any British or Foreign Country or between two Provinces.
14. Currency and Coinage.
15. Banking, Incorporation of Banks, and the Issue of Paper Money.
16. Savings Banks.
17. Weights and Measures.
18. Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes.
19. Interest.

20. Legal tender.
21. Bankruptcy and Insolvency.
22. Patents of Invention and Discovery.
23. Copyrights.
24. Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians.
25. Naturalization and Aliens.
26. Marriage and Divorce.
27. The Criminal Law, except the Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the procedure in Criminal matters.

28. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Penitentiaries.
29. Such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the Enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

"And any matter coming within any of the Classes of Subjects enumerated in this Section shall not be deemed to come within the Class of Matters of a local or private Nature comprised in the Enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces."

Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures.

"92.—In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say—

1. The Amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the Constitution of the Province, except as regards the Office of Lieutenant-Governor.
2. Direct Taxation within the Province in order to the raising of a Revenue for Provincial Purposes.
3. The borrowing of money on the sole Credit of the Province.
4. The Establishment and Tenure of Provincial Offices and the Appointment and the Payment of Provincial Officers.
5. The Management and Sale of the Public Lands belonging to the Province and of the Timber and Wood thereon.
6. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Public and Reformatory Prisons in and for the Province.
7. The Establishment, Maintenance and Management of Hospitals, Asylums, Charities, and Eleemosynary Institutions in and for the Province, other than Marine Hospitals.
8. Municipal Institutions in the Province.
9. Shop, Saloon, Tavern, Auctioneer, and other licences in order to the raising of a Revenue for Provincial, Local or Municipal purposes.
10. Local Works and Undertakings other than such as are of the following Classes:—
 - (a) Lines of Steam or other Ships, Railways, Canals, Telegraphs and other Works and Undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the Limits of the Province;
 - (b) Lines of steam ships between the Province and any British or Foreign Country;
 - (c) Such Works as, although wholly situate within the Province, are before or after their Execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the General Advantage of Canada or for the Advantage of two or more of the Provinces.

Legislative Competence as to subject-matter

11. The Incorporation of Companies with Provincial objects.
12. The Solemnization of Marriage in the Province.
13. Property and Civil Rights in the Province.
14. The Administration of Justice in the Province, including the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of Provincial Courts, both of Civil and of Criminal Jurisdiction, and including Procedure in Civil matters in those Courts.
15. The Imposition of Punishment by Fine, Penalty, or Imprisonment for enforcing any Law of the Province made in relation to any Matter coming within any of the Classes of Subjects enumerated in this Section.
16. Generally all Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province."

Analysis of Sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act would reveal the following main propositions, in the light of which, the distribution of legislative powers between the Canadian Parliament and the Provincial Legislature, could be understood:

(1) It is lawful for the Dominion Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters other than those assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the Provinces, (and for this reference would be made to S.92, where 16 heads have been mentioned with respect to which the Provincial legislature has exclusive power to make laws). It would seem to follow from this, that if upon an enquiry by a court, directed upon the question whether a particular enactment is one which comes under the purview of S.92, it is found that the answer is in the negative, then the impugned enactment must be deemed to fall within the scope of legislation competent to the Dominion Parliament under S.91. (Alberta Debt Adjustment Act, reference Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada (1943) A.C. 356, at p. 371).

(2) Such subjects as have been mentioned in section 91 have been specified merely to secure greater certainty in the matter of defining the sphere of Dominion Legislation. And care must be taken not to restrict the generality of power expressly asserted in favour of Dominion Legislature in the opening clause of S.91,—the statutory language being "to make laws for peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislature of the Provinces, and for greater certainty but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of the section". It would appear that this provision is not in the nature of a vesting provision for the power is affirmed broadly and then illustrated to provide greater certainty in the matter of fixing boundaries of the legislative power of the Dominion legislature. (See Citizens Insurance Company of Canada v. William Parsons, (1881) 7 A.C. p. 96). In other words, the heads of subjects enumerated in section 91, merely exemplify the species of general power admissible to the Dominion Legislature, "to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada."

(3) In the last paragraph, a caution has been administered by way of an express declaration that any matter enumerated in S.91 shall not be so construed as to enable the Dominion Parliament to enact laws of a local or private nature in respect of matters which have been reserved exclusively to the legislature of the Provinces.

The question, "What is legislation which is of a local and private nature, comprised in the enumeration of subjects given in S.91", is a difficult question to answer in the abstract : A close study of the case-law upon the point tends to show that no firm test has been evolved by the courts by appeal to which this question can be satisfactorily answered, and the judicial determination of these limits has not gone beyond the afore-mentioned admonition.

Broad features of the Federal principle as it operates in Canada.

In these cases it is the duty of the Courts, however difficult it may be, to ascertain in what degree and to what extent, authority to deal with matters falling within these classes of subjects exists in each legislature, and to define in the particular case before them the limits of their respective power. It could not have been the intention that a conflict should exist; and, in order to prevent such a result, the two sections must be read together and the language of one interpreted and, where necessary, modified by that of the other. In this way it may, in most cases, be found possible to arrive at a reasonable and practical construction of the language of the Section, so as to reconcile the respective powers they contain and give effect to all of them. In performing this difficult duty, it will be a wise course for those on whom devolves the difficult duty of fixing the frontiers of Federal and Provincial powers to decide each case which arises as best they can, without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the statute than is necessary for the decision of the particular question in hand. (Citizen's Insurance Co. of Canada v. William Parson)—(1881) 7 A.C. 96.

In the case of Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for British Columbia, reported in (1930) A.C. page 111, the following four propositions have been laid down as indicative of the structural pattern of the legislative powers competent to the Dominion Parliament and the Provincial Legislature:

(a) The Legislation of the Parliament of the Dominion, so long as it strictly relates to subjects of legislation expressly enumerated in s. 91, is of paramount authority, even though it trenches upon matters assigned to the Provincial legislatures by s. 92. (See Tennant v. Union Bank of Canada, (1894) A.C. p. 31).

(b) The general power of legislation conferred upon the Parliament of the Dominion by s. 91 of the Act in supplement of the power to legislate upon the subjects expressly enumerated must be strictly confined to such matters as are unquestionably of national interest and importance, and must not trench on any of the subjects enumerated in s. 92, as within the scope of Provincial legislation, unless these matters have attained such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion. (See Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney General for the Dominion (1896) A.C. 348).

(c) It is within the competence of the Dominion Parliament to provide for matters which, though otherwise within the legislative competence of the Provincial legislature, are necessarily incidental to effective legislation by the Parliament of the Dominion upon a subject of legislation expressly enumerated in s. 91. (See Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for Dominion, (1894) A.C. 189, and Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Dominion, (1896) A.C. 348).

(d) There can be a domain in which Provincial and Dominion legislation may overlap, in which case neither legislation will be ultra vires if the field is clear, but if the field is not clear and the two legislations meet the Dominion legislation must prevail. (See Grand Trunk Railway of Canada v. Attorney-General of Canada. (1907) A.C. 65).

In this case (which is known as Regulation of Fish Canneries Case), a critical review of most of the decided cases was attempted by Lord Tomlin before he laid down these four propositions. It must, however, be observed that although in subsequent decisions of the Privy Council these propositions have, generally speaking, been accepted, they came in for a lot of criticism at the hands of the authors of the Report on the British North America Act. [(See (1.) in re Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada, Reference (1932) A.C. 54; (2) in re Silver Bros. Ltd. (1932) A.C. 514; (3) Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Attorney-General for British Columbia and Attorney-General for Canada, (1950) A.C. 122. and (4) the on Report the British North America Act, pp. 20, 21 and 51)].

The Australian Constitution Act of 1900 also embodies a scheme of distribution of legislative powers which is somewhat analogous to the one which has been embodied in our Constitution. There is, however, one important difference. The States within the Commonwealth of Australia occupy a dominant position in that, under Section 51 of that Constitution, where subjects have been enumerated, both the Centre and the States have concurrent legislative powers with respect to these subjects and whenever there is inconsistency in the actual legislation enacted by the Federal and the State Legislature it is the Federal Law which prevails (S. 109). The exclusive field admissible to the Centre is of meagre dimensions and a reference to S. 52 of the Constitution Act would show that there are only three subjects mentioned therein in regard to which the Federal Legislature has exclusive competence to make laws. Residuary powers are vested in the Federal Units.

Sections 51 and 52 of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, 1900, are reproduced below for convenience of reference :—

"51.—The Parliament shall, subject to this Constitution, have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to :—

- (i) Trade and commerce with other countries, and among the States;
- (ii) Taxation; but so as not to discriminate between States or parts of States;
- (iii) Bounties on the production or export of goods, but so that such bounties shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth;
- (iv) Borrowing money on the public credit of the Commonwealth;
- (v) Postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and other like services;
- (vi) The naval and military defence of the Commonwealth and of the several States, and the control of the forces to execute and maintain the laws of the Commonwealth;
- (vii) Lighthouses, lightships, beacons and buoys;
- (viii) Astronomical and meteorological observations;
- (ix) Quarantine;
- (x) Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits;
- (xi) Census and statistics;
- (xii) Currency, coinage, and legal tender;
- (xiii) Banking, other than State banking; also State banking extending beyond the limits of the State concerned, the incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money;
- (xiv) Insurance, other than State insurance; also State insurance extending beyond the limits of the State concerned;
- (xv) Weights and measures;
- (xvi) Bills of exchange and promissory notes;
- (xvii) Bankruptcy and insolvency;
- (xviii) Copyrights, patents of inventions and designs, and trade marks;
- (xix) Naturalization and aliens;
- (xx) Foreign corporations, and trading or financial corporations formed within the limits of the Commonwealth;
- (xxi) Marriage;

- (xxii) Divorce and matrimonial causes; and in relation thereto, parental rights, and the custody and guardianship of infants;
- (xxiii) Invalid and old-age pensions;
- (xxiii-A) The provision of maternity allowances, widows' pensions, child endowment, unemployment, pharmaceutical, sickness and hospital benefits, medical and dental services (but not so as to authorize any form of civil conscription), benefits to students and family allowances.
- (xxiv) The service and execution throughout the Commonwealth of the civil and criminal process and the judgments of the Courts of the States;
- (xxv) The recognition throughout the Commonwealth of the laws, the public Acts and records, and the judicial proceedings of the States;
- (xxvi) The people of any race, other than the aboriginal race in any State, for whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws;
- (xxvii) Immigration and emigration;
- (xxviii) The influx of criminals;
- (xxix) External affairs;
- (xxx) The relations of the Commonwealth with the islands of the Pacific;
- (xxxi) The acquisition of property on just terms from any State or person for any purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws;
- (xxxii) The control of railways with respect to transport for the naval and military purposes of the Commonwealth;
- (xxxiii) The acquisition, with the consent of a State, of any railways of the State on terms arranged between the Commonwealth and the State;
- (xxxiv) Railway construction and extension in any State with the consent of that State;
- (xxxv) Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes extending beyond the limits of any one State;
- (xxxvi) Matters in respect of which this Constitution makes provision until the Parliament otherwise provides;
- (xxxvii) Matters referred to the Parliament of the Commonwealth by the Parliament or Parliaments of any State or States, but so that the law shall extend only to States by whose Parliaments the matter is referred, or which afterwards adopt the law;
- (xxxviii) The exercise within the Commonwealth, at the request or with the concurrence of the Parliaments of all the States directly concerned, of any power which can at the establishment of this Constitution be exercised only by the Parliament of the United Kingdom or by the Federal Council of Australasia;
- (xxxix) Matters incidental to the execution of any power vested by this Constitution in the Parliament or in either House thereof, or in the Government of the Commonwealth, or in the Federal judicature, or in any department or officer of the Commonwealth.

52.—The Parliament shall, subject to this Constitution, have exclusive power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to—

- (i) The seat of government of the Commonwealth, and all places acquired by the Commonwealth for public purposes;
- (ii) Matters relating to any department of the public service the control of which is by this Constitution transferred to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth;

(iii) Other matters declared by this Constitution to be within the exclusive power of the Parliament.”

Section 109 of the Australian Constitution provides:

“When a law of a State is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth, the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of inconsistency, be invalid.”

That section taken in conjunction with covering clause 5 of the Constitution (which says: This Act, and all laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth under the Constitution, shall be binding on the Courts, Judges, and peoples of every State and of every part of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding anything in the laws of any State; and the laws of the Commonwealth shall be in force on all British Ships, the Queen's Ships of War excepted, whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth) argues for the constitutional supremacy of the federal laws. In the exercise of concurrent powers the law of the Commonwealth is supreme but the concept or the doctrine, by appeal to which inconsistency between the Commonwealth law and the State law is resolved by giving effect to Federal law, is not one of ultra vires: in other words, in the theory of Australian Constitutional Law, the State Law to the extent of inconsistency with Federal law becomes inoperative but is not ultra vires. Its legal status, that is, its authority, as law, is thrown in a state of suspended animation and is restored back to life the moment Commonwealth law, by virtue of whose existence it has been rendered inoperative, ceases to be as and when it expires or is repealed. The State law, inoperative by reason of its conflict with Commonwealth Law, revives if the Commonwealth law happens to vacate itself from the concurrent field. (See the case of Carter v. Egg and Egg Pulp Marketing Board, (Vict.) (1942) 66 C.L.R. 557, at 573).

The inconsistency as between the Federal and the State law might be gathered from the conflict in the actual terms of the competing statutes. And if there be no such direct conflict, the State law might yet give way to Commonwealth law, if the latter is intended to be a complete and exhaustive code upon the subject or there might be a case in which inconsistency might arise if the competing State and the Commonwealth laws seek to legislate in respect of an identical subject-matter. (For an instance of the first type of inconsistency see King vs. Licensing Court of Brisbane, (1920) 28 C.L.R. page 23; as to the second, see Clyde Engineering Company, Limited v. Cowburn, (1926), 37 C.L.R. 466; and as to the last see Wenn v. Attorney-General, (Vict.) (1948) 77 C.L.R. 84).

The principle of Federalism, as adopted in America, is realised in the division which the Constitution purports to effect in the matter of the exercise of political powers between two levels of Government. The Federal Government obtains its powers by way of a grant, and the remaining powers, unless expressly denied to the states, are expressly declared to be vested in the States and the people (see the Tenth Amendment). There is a clear-cut division of authority between the Federal and State Governments, and it should be remembered that powers granted to one or the other of two Governments are not necessarily exercised exclusively by either. There is a field common to both Governments which is administered concurrently; the grant of taxing power to the Congress does not amount to the denial of this power to the States. It was certainly intended that both Governments should be able to use such a power.

The position has been summed up by Robert K. Carr in his book, “The Supreme Court and Judicial Review” as follows:

“As a result of this exercise of concurrent powers the line between central and state power becomes somewhat blurred. However, the resulting uncertainty, so far as our description has gone, is not too serious a matter. It is true that many of the powers granted to Congress are not exclusive and may be considered in the technical sense as belonging to the state governments as well. But there is, at this point, a subsidiary constitutional principle providing for the supremacy of federal law. The Constitution clearly states that the laws of the United States, which are made in pursuance of the Constitution, shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the laws of the states to the contrary notwithstanding. In other words, a state may perhaps in certain ways regulate inter-state commerce but only in so far as such regulations are consistent with, or permissible under, the policy Congress may have chosen to establish. In those fields, then, where both federal and state Governments may sometimes be active, federal law is supreme."

The relationship of the Federal to the State governments within the framework of U.S. Constitution, has been admirably summed up in the case of United States v. James Gordon Bennett, 58 L. Ed. p. 612. The controversy presented to the court in this case was with regard to the taxing power of the United States as compared with the power of the States to tax property. It was observed that one State could not tax property in another without violating the Constitution, for where the power of one ends the authority of the other begins. But it was pointed out that this principle had no application to the Government of the United States so far as its taxing power was concerned: that power "... is co-extensive with the limits of the United States; it knows no restriction except where one is expressed in or arises from the Constitution, and therefore embraces all the attributes which appertain to sovereignty in the fullest sense. Indeed, the existence of such a wide power is the essential resultant of the limitation restricting the states within their allotted spheres, for if it were not so, then government in the plenary and usual acceptation of that word would have no existence. Because the limitations of the Constitution are barriers bordering the States and preventing them from transcending the limits of their authority, and thus destroying the rights of other states, and at the same time saving their rights from destruction by the other states, in other words, of maintaining and preserving the rights of all the states, affords no ground for constructing an imaginary constitutional barrier around the exterior confines of the United States for the purpose of shutting that government off from the exertion of powers which inherently belong to it by virtue of its sovereignty."

The Supreme Court thus declined to entertain objection based on due process clause of the Fifth Amendment to the effect that the attempt by the United States to tax the property of a citizen residing within its jurisdiction but whose property is beyond the territorial limits of the United States was unconstitutional and regarded it as being an objection which was opposed to the principles of justice and "was inconsistent with every conception of representative and free government." Thus the Constitution, although it is the instrument which effects grant of power in favour of the United States and to that extent cuts down the power of a state, has been so construed as not to operate as a limit upon the sovereign power of the United States as a nation, and its relation to its citizens, and their relation to it.

The position in the United States is thus radically different in that States possess every power that Government has anywhere exercised except only those powers which their own Constitution or the Constitution of the United States explicitly or by plain inference withhold. They are the ordinary Governments of the country; Federal Government is its instrument only for particular purposes.

Article 106 of our Constitution must be read in conjunction with the Fifth Schedule which in fact is a part of that Article. ART. 106 does not in terms make a reference to the Fifth Schedule, but there can be little doubt that the Fifth Schedule which itself makes a reference to ART. 106 and contains the Federal, Provincial and the Concurrent Lists is an integral part of ART. 106. Besides, interpretation clauses of ART. 218 in terms refer us to the Fifth Schedule. (See the definition of Federal, Concurrent and Provincial Lists in ART. 218).

A critical comment on Articles 106 & 110. of our Constitution.

This Article imposes limitations on the legislative powers of the Federal and Provincial legislatures and its analysis would reveal the following essentials:

(1) Parliament, that is the Federal Legislature, has exclusive power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Federal List. This power is not encumbered by anything contained in clauses (2) and (3), for these clauses themselves are expressly limited by and made subject to the non-obstante clause (1) of ART. 106. The combined effect of this assessment of the provisions contained in ART. 106 is no more and no less than this: that in respect of any matter falling within all the three Lists, the Parliament has exclusive power of legislation.

(2) The Provincial Legislature has, in respect of the territory within its jurisdiction, the power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the concurrent list and has exclusive power to make laws for the same territory or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Provincial List (ART. 106, clauses (2) and (3)]. The Provincial Legislature has the exclusive power also to make laws with respect to any matters not enumerated in any list in the Fifth Schedule (ART. 109).

(3) Both the Parliament and the Provincial legislatures have concurrent powers of legislation with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the concurrent List [(ART. 106—clause (2))].

(4) Parliament has also the power to make laws enumerated in the Provincial List, but in relation to their territorial application they cannot have any operation either for the whole or any part of the Province.

ART. 110 provides the guidance for :

- resolving inconsistencies between laws made by Parliament and the laws made by a Provincial Legislature, and
- the laws made by a Provincial Legislature and "existing laws", with respect to matters falling in the concurrent list.

That Article reads as follows :—

"110.—(1) If any provision of an Act of a Provincial Legislature is repugnant to any provision of an Act of Parliament, which Parliament is competent to enact, or to any provision of any existing law with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List, then, subject to the provisions of clause (2), the Act of Parliament, whether passed before or after the Act of the Provincial Legislature, or, as the case may be, the existing law, shall prevail and the Act of the Provincial Legislature shall, to the extent of repugnancy, be void.

(2) Where an Act of a Provincial Legislature with respect to any of the matters in the Concurrent List contains any provision repugnant to the provisions of an earlier Act of Parliament or an existing law with respect to that matter, then, if the Act of the Provincial Legislature, having been reserved for the consideration of the President, has received his assent, the Act of the Provincial Legislature shall prevail in the Province concerned, but nevertheless Parliament may at any time enact any law with respect to the same matter, amending or repealing the law so made by the Provincial Legislature."

The analysis of this Article would show that :

(1) If the Provincial law is found repugnant to any provisions of an Act of Parliament which it is within latter's competence to enact, then, the Act of Parliament whether passed before or after the Act of the Provincial Legislature, shall prevail and the Act of the Provincial Legislature shall, to the extent of the repugnancy, be void. But if the same Provincial Act having been reserved for the assent of the President has received his assent, it will, within the Province, prevail over the Federal Law.

A summary of the combined effect of ARTS. 106 and 110.

(2) Where the conflict between the Provincial law and the existing law is to be found with respect to matters falling in the concurrent list; then, if the Act of the Provincial Legislature having been reserved for the assent of President, has received the assent of the President, the Act of the Provincial Legislature shall prevail in the territory of the Province or part thereof; but it is competent to the Parliament to enact any law with respect to the same matter amending or repealing it. In the absence of such assent the existing law will prevail over the Provincial Law.

Let us now sum up the combined effect of Articles 106 and 110:

Competence to legislate is provided for in ART. 106. If any legislature in Pakistan is at all to pass a constitutionally valid law it must, to begin with, show that it is competent to do so by appeal to the provisions of ART. 106. Where there is a lack of initial competence, the question of resolving inconsistencies between the law passed by that legislature with that passed by another legislature by appeal to ART. 110, does not arise. ART. 110 postulates the existence of laws passed by competent legislatures in the manner provided by ART. 106, and proceeds to say how conflicts discoverable between those laws are to be resolved. ART. 106 deals with the powers of rival legislatures inter se to make laws; ART. 110 declares the principles by resort to which clashes between laws passed pursuant to powers conferred under ART. 106 are to be dealt with.

It is essential to keep this difference between the two Articles always in view or else confusion is likely to result in the matter of applying the provisions of the two Articles in determining the constitutionality of the laws passed by the two rival Legislatures in Pakistan. ART. 110 talks of repugnancy of Legislation resulting from conflicts of competently exercised jurisdictions by the Federal and Provincial Legislatures to pass laws in the spheres of authority reserved to them by Article 106. ART. 106, in effect, distributes legislative authority between the Federal and Provincial Legislatures by marking the boundaries subject-wise.

Although a resolute attempt had been made by the British Parliament, while enacting the Government of India Act, 1935, to bring about a sharp and clear-cut division of legislative jurisdiction between the two Legislatures subject-wise, it was all the same felt that there was every likelihood of laws competently enacted by the two rival Legislatures in conformity with the requirement of S. 100 (corresponding to ART. 106) nevertheless being found repugnant to each other. Parliament, therefore, provided in S. 107 (corresponding to ART. 110) the technique by resort to which certain types of repugnancies could be resolved.

It would appear that in ART. 110, only two types of repugnancies have been taken care of :

(1) Conflict of Provincial law with Federal Law (irrespective of the fact whether or not the Federal law has been passed before or after the passing of Provincial law).

(2) Conflict of Provincial law with existing law with respect to a matter in the concurrent list.

And the answer it has given to each of these cases is that in both of these cases the Federal law and the existing law will prevail unless the Provincial law having been reserved for the assent of the President has received the assent of the President, in which case, of course, it will be the Provincial law that will prevail in the Province concerned although the Federal Legislature will, thereafter, be competent, at any subsequent stage, to modify or repeal such provincial law.

This is then the effect of ART. 110 of our Constitution.

It must be clearly borne in mind that the existing law whose conflict with Provincial Law is visualised by ART. 110, must be with respect to any matter in the concurrent list: if it is not some such law, then, ART. 110 will not assist in the resolution of repugnancy and one must then resolve the problem by appeal to other principles, as, for instance, it could then be said on general principle, that the Provincial law being a later law will prevail, etc.

The case-law in India and Pakistan, that has a bearing on the interpretation of Ss. 100 and 107 of the Government of India Act, 1935, would in terms apply to the interpretation of ARTs. 106 and 110, as it must equally apply to ARTs. 246 and 254 of the Indian Constitution—and this for the simple reason that all these constitutional provisions are couched in almost identical language.

What happens if a case arises in which there is repugnancy between two laws passed by competent Legislatures for the resolution of which ART. 110 of the Constitution does not provide an answer? It is the view of the present author that in such a case the only way to resolve the problem would be to fall back upon ART. 106 and see whether or not the pith and substance of the impugned law falls within the permitted field exclusively reserved to a given Legislature: if it does, then the extent to which it invades the forbidden field would be condoned upon the doctrine of "incidental trespass".

91. Limitations upon competence to enact laws

In the matter of interpreting the competence of the two rival Legislatures in Pakistan to enact laws there are three distinct questions that arise for determination:

(1) Is legislation competently enacted under ART. 105, which talks of territorial jurisdiction of the two Legislatures? (A question of territorial competence).

(2) Is it competently passed by appropriate Legislature within the meaning of ART. 106, which talks of legislative competence in relation to the matters mentioned in the three Lists in the Fifth Schedule? (A question of competence as to the subject-matter).

(3) If it survives all these tests, the last question would be: Are there still repugnancies discoverable in the exercise of these legislative jurisdictions?

If the answer to the third question be in the affirmative, one has then to go to ART. 110, to see if the kind of repugnancy that has arisen is the one which is visualised by that Article. In such a case ART. 110 will govern the situation. But if that Article does not apply in terms, in that, the repugnancies that have arisen cannot be resolved by appeal to its provisions, we will have to fall back upon other principles for resolving these conflicts.

It is the view of the present writer that the doctrine of 'incidental trespass' or of 'pith and substance' has no relevance once the repugnancy that has arisen is embraced by the kind of repugnancies for the resolution of which ART. 110 has been designed.

92. Review of some decided cases

These principles are illustrated by some of the cases decided by Privy Council in the pre-partition days of India and considerable light is shed upon the question relating to their application by such case law as has developed in the two countries even after the partition.

The rules relevant for the interpretation of ARTs. 106 and 107 have received certain well defined nomenclatures and these are:

- (1) The doctrine of pith and substance.
- (2) The doctrine of incidental trespass.
- (3) The doctrine of occupied field.
- (4) The doctrine of implied powers.
- (5) The doctrine of the original package.

Limitations upon competence to enact laws.

These principles are illustrated in some of the cases decided by the Privy Council etc.

Re C.P. Motor Spirit Act.

These doctrines will be illustrated by an analysis of some of the important cases. The first two doctrines will be lumped up together and discussed as such in one and the same argument whereas the remaining three would be discussed separately.

In the case of C.P. Motor Spirit Act, reported in A.I.R. (1939) F.C. 1, which reflects the opinion delivered by the Federal Court of India upon a reference made to it by the Governor-General, the question was: Is the Central Provinces and Berar Sales of Motor Spirit and Lubricant Taxation Act, 1938, or any of the provisions thereof, and in what particular or particulars, or to what extent, ultra vires of the Legislature of the Central Provinces and Berar?

We have furnished to us in this case, a concise statement of the principles which we are to apply to the interpretation of provisions that bear on the question of conflicts between the Central and Provincial legislative powers, and this guidance is given to us by no less a person than the Chief Justice of India, Sir Maurice L. Gwyer, who was before his appointment in India as its First Chief Justice, serving as His Majesty's Procurator-General and Treasury Solicitor and had a great deal to do with the actual drafting of the Government of India Act, 1935.

The distinctive feature of the Government of India Act, 1935, according to the learned Chief Justice, lay in the attempt that had been made in that Act to avoid a final assignment of residuary powers by an exhaustive enumeration of legislative subjects. This was a unique feature of the Act indeed and "whether this elaboration will be productive of more or less litigation than in Canada, where there is also a distribution by enumeration, time alone will show; at least this Court will not be confronted with the additional problems created by the interlacing provisions of Ss. 91 and 92, British North America Act, and the distribution of powers not only by the enumeration of specified subjects, but also by reference to the general or local nature of the subject matter of litigation." The Chief Justice then proceeded to notice "two decisions of the Judicial Committee which in his opinion had laid down most clearly the principles which should be applied by Courts in the matter of deciding upon the competence of the two rival legislatures that had been set up under the Indian Federal system.

Those cases were summarised by the Learned Chief Justice as follows (at p. 5):—

"In (1912) A.C. 571 (Attorney-General for the Province of Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada), at page 583, the Committee observed that in the interpretation of the British North America Act, if the text is explicit, the text is conclusive, alike for what it directs and what it forbids. When the text is ambiguous, as for example when the words establishing two mutually exclusive jurisdictions are wide enough to bring a particular power within either, recourse must be had to the context and scheme of the Act.

"In the earlier case in (1882) 7 A.C. 96, The Citizens Insurance Company v. William Parsons, at page 108, the same principle had been more fully expounded. After pointing out that with regard to certain classes of Dominion (or Central) subjects, generally described in S. 91, British North America Act, legislative power may nevertheless reside as to some matters falling within that general description in the legislatures of the Provinces, under Section 92, the Committee proceeded thus:

"In these cases it is the duty of the Courts, however, difficult it may be, to ascertain in what degree, and to what extent, authority to deal with matters falling within these classes of subjects exists in each Legislature, and to define in the particular case before them the limits of their respective powers. It could not have been the intention that a conflict should exist; and in order to prevent such a result, the two Sections must be read together and the language of one interpreted, and, where necessary, modified by that of the other. In this way it may, in most cases, be found possible to arrive at a reasonable and practical construction of the language of the sections, so as to reconcile the respective powers they contain, and to give effect to all of them. In performing this difficult duty it will be a wise course for those on whom it is thrown, to decide each case which arises as best as they can, without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the statute than is necessary for a decision of the particular question in hand."

With regard to the interpretation of the non obstante clause appearing at the commencement of S. 100, the position was stated as follows (at p. 10):

"It is a fundamental assumption that the legislative powers of the Centre and Provinces could not have been intended to be in conflict with one another and, therefore, we must read them together, and interpret or modify the language in which one is expressed by the language of the other."

The learned Chief Justice further remarked (p. 11):

"In discussing the possible overlapping of the federal and provincial jurisdictions, I assumed for the moment that a tax on the retail sales might be the duty of excise: Whether it is so or not must depend upon the circumstances

"In all cases of this kind the question before the Court," according to the learned Chief Justice is not "how the two legislative powers are theoretically capable of being construed, but how they are to be construed here and now in the Constitutional Act. This is a very different problem and one on which cases decided under other Constitutions can never be conclusive."

Following were the principles that were laid down in a concurrent opinion delivered by Jayakar J., principles that may be deemed as useful guides to the proper elucidation of the points involved in this reference:

"(1) That the provisions of an Act like the Government of India Act, 1935, should not be cut down by a narrow and technical construction, but, considering the magnitude of the subjects with which it purports to deal in very few words, should be given a large and liberal interpretation, so that the Central Government, to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, may be mistress in her own house, as the Provinces, to a great extent, but again within certain fixed limits, are mistresses in theirs. (See Henrietta Muir Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, reported in (1930) A.C. 124, at pp. 136 and 137).

"(2) In an enquiry like the one before us in this Reference, the Court must ascertain the true nature and character of the challenged enactment, its pith and substance; and not the form alone which it may have assumed under the hand of the draftsman: (See Attorney-General for Ontario v. Reciprocal Insurers reported in (1924) A.C. 328 at p. 337).

"(3) Where there is an absolute jurisdiction vested in a Legislature, the laws promulgated by it must take effect according to the proper construction of the language in which they are expressed. But where the law-making authority is of a limited or qualified character, obviously it may be necessary to examine, with some strictness, the substance of the legislation, for the purpose of determining what it is that the Legislature is really doing: (See (1924) A.C. 328 at p. 337).

"(4) Even where there has been an endeavour to give pre-eminence to the Central Legislature in cases of a conflict of powers, it is obvious that, in some cases where this apparent conflict exists, the Legislature could not have intended that powers exclusively assigned to the Provincial Legislature should be absorbed in those given to the Central Legislature."

We may next observe, in this context, some of the remarks contained in the case of State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara decided by Supreme Court, AIR (1951) p. 318. This was a case in which the Bombay High Court had declared certain parts of the Bombay Prohibition Act, 1949, as unconstitutional legislation. The judgment in that case contains a concise and clear enunciation of the principles in the light of which the legislative powers of the Federal and Provincial Legislatures are to be understood and applied. Justice Fazl Ali summed up the principles which govern the interpretation of legislative lists after making a careful study of all the prior cases, e.g. (1) United Provinces v. Atiqa Begum, 1940 Federal Court Reports p. 110 at 134: A.I.R. (1941) F.C. 16; (2) In re the Central Provinces and Berar Act No. XIV of 1938, reported in (1939) Federal Court Reports, p. 18: A.I.R. (1939) F.C. 1, as also (3) Governor-General-in-Council v. Province of Madras, reported in 1945 Federal Court Reports, page 179, at 191: A.I.R. (1945) Privy Council 98) etc.

Observations
of Jayakar J.

These principles are :—

- (1) "that none of the items in each list is to be read in a narrow or restricted sense, (F.C.R. 1940 p. 110);
- (2) "that where there is some seeming conflict between Provincial and Federal Lists an attempt should be made to see whether the two entries cannot be reconciled so as to avoid a conflict of jurisdiction, (1939 F.C.R. 18);
- (3) "It is well settled that the validity of an Act is not affected if it incidentally trenches on matters outside the authorised field, and therefore it is necessary to enquire in each case, what is the pith and substance of the Act impugned. If the Act, when so viewed, substantially falls within the powers expressly conferred upon the legislature which enacted it, then it cannot be held to be invalid, merely because it incidentally encroaches on matters which have been assigned to another legislature". (See Gallagher v. Lynn, (1937) A.C. 863 at 870, and also the cases of (1) Ralla Ram v. Province of East Punjab, (1948) Federal Court Reports, p. 207 at 225; and (2) Miss Kishori Chetty v. The King, in (1949) Federal Court Reports, p. 650, at 655).

In determining what is the pith and the substance of an impugned Act, we have to look at the essential burden of Legislation and not merely the form of legislation much less the name given to it by the Legislature A.I.R. [(1955) Supreme Court of India, p. 504 the case of Amar Singhji v. State of Rajasthan]. This can only be done by examining the provisions of the impugned Act in an effort to see what it is that the legislature has attempted to achieve.

Closely allied to the rule of pith and substance is the doctrine of what is called incidental trespass: if on the view of the statute as a whole you find that the substance of the legislation is within the express powers, then it is not invalidated if incidentally it affects matters which are outside the authorised field. Limitation upon the application of this rule is that legislation must not, under the guise of dealing with one matter, in fact be designed to encroach upon the forbidden field. (See Gallagher v. Lynn, (1937) A.C., p. 863) In this case reliance was placed on the observations contained in the case of Russel v. Queen, (46 Law Times, p. 889), to the effect that the true nature and character of the legislation in each particular case under discussion must always be determined in order to ascertain the class of subjects to which it really belongs.

All colourable legislation must be carefully X-rayed in order to discover the real object underlying its enactment. Cases may arise in which several Acts in their totality may be interpreted to give rise to the inference that the Legislature is endeavouring to contravene some constitutional limitation upon its power, although each Act taken by itself out of this totality may appear to be an innocuous and harmless legislation. A case in point is the one reported in (1940) Appeal Cases, p. 838, W. R. Moran Proprietary Ltd. v. Deputy Commissioner of Taxation for New South Wales. In this case, the problem presented to the Doctrine of Pith and Substance.

Incidental Trespass.

Colourable Legislation would be struck down.

Court was the following. It was alleged that the two impugned Acts together with several other Acts were passed to give effect to a scheme agreed between the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth of Australia and the Premiers of the six States, and the object and purpose of which scheme was to ensure that the wheat-growers of all the States got a payable price for wheat and to raise the necessary sum to do this, a tax was imposed upon flour sold in Australia for home consumption. The Premiers on behalf of the States undertook to co-operate in the scheme by passing Acts in the States fixing prices for flour sold for home consumption and providing for the distribution of the proceeds of the tax among wheat-growers in proportion to the quantities of wheat respectively produced by them. In Tasmania, however, where the quantity of wheat grown was relatively insignificant the result of the scheme would have been that while having to bear the excise duty on flour by paying an increased price for bread and other wheat products, the people of Tasmania would receive very little advantage from the distribution of the proceeds of the taxes which were being imposed on flour. That difficulty was, by agreement, met by a scheme to provide that the tax on flour was to be levied on flour consumed in Tasmania at the same rate as flour consumed in the other States, but provision was to be made for the relief of Tasmania as a State to an amount not greater than the tax on flour collected in Tasmania.

It was contended by the appellants that the several Acts passed by the Commonwealth Parliament taken in conjunction with certain State Acts were "part of a scheme of taxation operating, and intended to operate, by way of discrimination between Tasmania and the other States, and that such Acts and taxes were contrary to the provisions of S. 51(ii) of the Constitution which had provided that the Commonwealth Parliament's power would not be used to pass discriminatory laws between States or parts of States." It was contended that the arrangement was that while the Commonwealth would, by their taxing Acts, impose an equal tax on all flour consumption whether in Tasmania or in the other States, the tax so collected was to go to the Central Fund and out of that Fund there was to be refunded to Tasmania a special sum for distribution by the Tasmanian authorities to the tax-payers. Thus it was simply giving back to the tax-payer the money which the Central Government had collected. It was submitted that the legislation must be looked as a whole, as a part of a scheme, and looking at its substance and real nature, looking behind the form to the reality, the Commonwealth Government were clearly imposing what purports to be a uniform tax but what in effect was a tax upon flour in all States other than Tasmania—thus virtually contravening the prohibition contained in Section 51 against discriminatory legislation. Cases of Attorney General for Ontario v. Reciprocal Insurers, (1924) A.C. 328; and Ladore v. Bennett, (1939) A.C. 468, were relied upon in support of the proposition that one must look behind the form at the reality of the impugned legislation in determining its constitutionality.

The Full Court of High Court of Australia, with one of its Judges dissenting, held that the taxation Acts were not discriminatory. [See Deputy Federal Commissioner of Taxation (N.S.W.) v. R. Moran Proprietary Ltd. (1938-39) 61 C.L.R. p. 735], and upon appeal their Lordships of the Privy Council found that what had been done by the Commonwealth Parliament under S. 51(ii) and S. 96 of the Constitution was correct and constitutional but made certain observations which are significant. Their Lordships observed (1940) 63 C.L.R. 338, at 349) :—

"In coming to this conclusion their Lordships wish to make it clear that, as at present advised, they do not take the view that the Commonwealth Parliament can exercise its powers under S. 96 with a complete disregard of the prohibition contained in S. 51 (ii), or so as altogether to nullify that constitutional safeguard. The prohibition

Doctrine of Incidental Trespass :
Prafulla Kumar
v.
Bank of Commerce of Khulna.

is of considerable importance; and the Constitution should be construed bearing in mind that it is the result of an agreement between six high-contracting parties with, in some respects, very different needs and interests. Cases may be imagined in which a purported exercise of the power to grant financial assistance under S. 96 would be merely colourable. Under the guise or pretence of assisting a State with money, the real substance and purpose of the Act might simply be to effect discrimination in regard to taxation. Such an Act might well be ultra vires the Commonwealth Parliament. Their Lordships are using the language of caution because such a case may never arise, and also because it is their usual practice in a case dealing with constitutional matters to decide no more than their duty requires. They will add only that, in the view they take of the matter, some of the legislative expedients—objected to as ultra vires by Evatt J. in his forcible dissenting judgment—may well be colourable, and such Acts are not receiving the approval of their Lordships."

In an earlier case (Ladore v. Bennett, (1939) A.C. 468, at p. 482), Lord Atkin emphasised the same principle: "It is unnecessary to repeat", said he, "what has been said many times by the Courts in Canada and by the Board, that the Courts will be careful to detect and invalidate any actual violation of constitutional restrictions under pretence of keeping within the statutory field. A colourable device will not avail." And this approach of the Courts is based upon the view that it is a familiar principle that you cannot do that indirectly which you are prohibited from doing directly. (See Madden v. Nelson and Fort Sheppard Railway Co. (1899) A.C. p. 626).

The problem posed by the doctrine of incidental trespass was lucidly and comprehensively stated by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Prafulla Kumar v. Bank of Commerce Ltd., Khulna, [A.I.R. (1947) P.C. 60]. This was a case in which their Lordships had also the occasion to consider by way of comparison the provisions of British North America Act and the Australian Commonwealth Act, that are analogous to S. 100 of the Government of India Act in order to determine the validity of the argument advanced at the Bar, namely:—

- (a) whether in cases where entries in the Legislative Lists overlap each other the Courts were duty-bound merely to apply the rule of priority stated in S. 100, and further
- (b) whether there was any legislative sanction for supporting the view that the Court must try, and if it can reconcile them by giving interpretation to some of the entries which is narrower than is warranted by the words used by the Legislature.

This was a case in which S. 107 of the Government of India Act also formed the subject-matter of their Lordships' consideration. The facts in that case were that a Provincial Act, (The Bengal Money Lenders Act) had limited the amount recoverable by a money lender on his loans for principal and interest, and had prohibited the payment of sums larger than those permitted by the Act. The Provincial Legislative List, item 27, enabled the Provincial Legislature to make laws with respect to "Trade and Commerce within the Province... money lending and money lenders." The contention in the case was that this legislation was in conflict with the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Legislature, in that, Items 28, 33 and 38 provided for "cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes and other like instruments, Corporations; banking and the conduct of banking business." The Courts in India considered the Bengal Money Lenders Act to be one that dealt in pith and substance with the money lenders and money lending, a view with which their Lordships agreed, but as this was not sufficient in their Lordships' opinion to dispose of the controversy before them, they proceeded to deal with the following two questions (that is Nos. 2 and 3).

- (1) Does the Act in question deal in pith and substance with money-lending?
- (2) If it does, is it valid though it incidentally trenches upon matters reserved for the Federal Legislature?

(3) Once it is determined whether the pith and substance is money-lending, is the extent to which the Federal field is invaded, a material matter?

They addressed themselves to question numbers (2) and (3) as follows (at p. 64): (Question No. 1, as has been stated above, was conceded in the course of the argument, namely that the impugned Act did deal in pith and substance with money-lending).

"(2) The second is a more difficult question and was put with great force by Counsel for the respondents. The principles, it was said, which obtain in Canada and Australia have no application to India. In the former instances either the Dominions and Provinces or the Commonwealth and States divide the jurisdiction between them, the Dominion or as the case may be the States retaining the power not specifically given to the Provinces or the Commonwealth. In such cases it is recognised that there must be a considerable overlapping of powers. But in India, it is asserted, the difficulty in dividing the powers has been foreseen. Accordingly three, not two lists, have been prepared in order to cover the whole field and these lists have a definite order of priority attributed to them so that anything contained in List I is reserved solely for the Federal Legislature, and however incidentally it may be touched upon in an Act of the Provincial Legislature, that Act is ultra vires in whole or at any rate where in any place it affects an entry in the Federal List.

"Similarly, any item in the Concurrent List if dealt with by the Federal Legislature is outside the power of the Provinces and it is only the matters specifically mentioned in List II over which the Province has complete jurisdiction, although so long as any item in the Concurrent List has not been dealt with by the Federal Legislature the Provincial Legislature is binding.

"In their Lordships' opinion this argument should not prevail. To take such a view is to simplify unduly the task of distinguishing between the powers of divided jurisdictions. It is not possible to make so clean a cut between the powers of the various legislatures: they are bound to overlap from time to time.'

"Moreover, the British Parliament when enacting the Indian Constitution Act had a long experience of the working of the British North America Act and the Australian Commonwealth Act and must have known that it is not in practice possible to ensure that the powers entrusted to the several legislatures will never overlap. As Sir Maurice Gwyer C.J. said in (1940) F.C.R. 188 (Supra) at page 201:

'It must inevitably happen from time to time that legislation though purporting to deal with a subject in one list, touches also upon a subject in another list, and the different provisions of the enactment may be so closely intertwined that blind adherence to a strictly verbal interpretation would result in a large number of statutes being declared invalid because the Legislature enacting them may appear to have legislated in a forbidden sphere. Hence the rule which has been evolved by the Judicial Committee, whereby the impugned statute is examined to ascertain its pith and substance, or its true nature and character for the purpose of determining whether it is legislation with respect to matters in this list or in that.'

"Their Lordships agree that this passage correctly describes the grounds upon which the rule is founded, and that it applies to Indian as well as to Dominion Legislation. No doubt experience of past difficulties has made the provisions of the Indian Act more exact in some particulars and the existence of the Concurrent List has made it easier to distinguish between those matters which are essential in determining to which list particular provisions should be attributed and those which are merely incidental. But the overlapping of subject-matter is not avoided by substituting three lists for two or even by arranging for a hierarchy of jurisdictions.

"Subjects must still overlap and where they do the question must be asked what in pith and substance is the effect of the enactment of which complaint is made and in what list is its true nature and character to be found. If these questions could not be asked, much beneficent legislation would be stifled at birth, and many of the subjects entrusted to provincial Legislation could never effectively be dealt with."

"(3) Thirdly, the extent of the invasion by the Provinces into subjects enumerated in the Federal List has to be considered. No doubt it is an important matter, not, as their Lordships think, because the validity of an Act can be determined by discriminating between degrees of invasion, but for the purpose of determining what is the pith and substance of the impugned Act. Its provisions may advance so far into Federal territory as to show that its true nature is not concerned with Provincial matters, but the question is not, has it trespassed more or less, but is the trespass, whatever it be, such as to show that the pith and substance of the impugned Act is not money-lending but promissory notes or banking? Once that question is determined the Act falls on one or the other side of the line and can be seen as valid or invalid according to its true content.

"This view places the precedence accorded to the three lists in its proper perspective. No doubt where they come in conflict List I has priority over Lists III and II and List III has priority over List II, but, the question still remains, priority in what respect? Does the priority of the Federal Legislature prevent the Provincial Legislature from dealing with any matter which may incidentally affect any item in its list or in each case has one to consider what the substance of an Act is and, whatever its ancillary effect, attribute it to the appropriate list according to its true character? In their Lordships' opinion the latter is the true view."

A comment on the doctrine of incidental trespass in the light of Privy Council case (1947) P.C. p. 60.

It would be noticed that their Lordships of the Privy Council looked at the problem of incidental trespass or invasion of the forbidden field not as a primary consideration relevant for determining the validity or otherwise of an impugned Act but merely for the purpose of determining the pith and substance of the impugned Act. The crucial question in their Lordships' words is not, "Has the Provincial Legislature trespassed more or less, but is the trespass, whatever it be, such as to show that the pith and substance of the impugned Act is not money lending but promissory notes or banking?"

It is, however, not clear from the judgment of the Lordships of the Privy Council whether this approach on the basis of which their Lordships decided the case is admissible only for the purpose of determining the question of competence under Section 100 (corresponding to our ART. 106), or is it also relevant for the purpose of applying the principle of S.107 (which corresponds to our ART. 110). This is a very important question and in the Indian case law at least there seems to be no unanimity in the judicial pronouncement upon any particular mode of construing these Sections.

One view is that Section 100 merely talks of the competence of the Legislature to enact law "with respect to" any matter appearing in the relevant List. To that extent it is permissible to apply the rule of pith and substance and since the doctrine of permissible incidental trespass is a mere variant of the rule of pith and substance, the question of incidental trespass is examined merely with a view, once again, to finding out whether or not a certain subject, which has been legislated upon, substantially falls in a given List. Those who hold this view deny that the rule of pith and substance has any application when they proceed to consider the question of repugnancy between the Provincial law on the one hand and the Federal law or the existing concurrent law with which it is in conflict, on the other. The doctrine of pith and substance or incidental encroachment, it is claimed, has restricted application: that it applies only in relation to the interpretation of the expression "with respect to" occurring in S.107 of the Government of India Act, but not in relation to interpretation of the concept of repugnancy mentioned therein. Here, that is, in the latter case, conflict no matter how trivial, must be given full effect to. This was, for instance, the view of Veradachariar J. in the case of Megh Raj v. Allah Rakha, reported in A.I.R. (1942,) Federal Court page 27, (at p.30) where it was observed :

"In the judgment of the High Court there is some discussion of the question of the 'pith and substance' of the Act, but that question does not arise when objection is taken not under S.100, Constitution Act, but under S.107(1). Counsel for the appellant made it clear that it was not his contention that any of the provisions in the impugned Act were beyond the competence of the Provincial Legislature, because he recognised that it made no difference on the question of competence, whether the subject-matter fell under List II or under List III of the Seventh Schedule. But he contended that the High Court erred in holding that the subject matter of the Act was wholly covered by List II."

Then his Lordship proceeded to deal with that contention which was based not on the question of competence but of repugnancy. Although the remarks cited above are obiter on the point and anyhow proceeded upon the concession made by the Counsel who appeared in the case, they seem clearly to show that the doctrine of pith and substance cannot be resorted to in meeting an argument based on the ground of repugnancy of a Provincial law either with the Federal law or existing law "with respect to matter in the Concurrent List."

From the case of Prafulla Kumar v. Bank of Commerce, Khulna A.I.R. (1947) P.C., p. 60] it would appear that the case was disposed of by appeal to the doctrine of pith and substance in relation to the competence of Legislature to pass the relevant law under S.100. The conflict in that case was really between the Provincial law and an existing Indian law which fell under the category "with respect to matter in the Concurrent List." The Bengal Act had actually received the assent of the Governor-General under clause (2) of S.107, therefore, the question of repugnancy under S.107 was not a matter in issue. By process of elimination, the only other ground on which the case could have been disposed of was to determine by appeal to the rule of pith and substance whether or not the subject matter of impugned legislation was competently enacted under S.100. Their Lordships laid down, as we have seen already, that the question of incidental trespass is not directly relevant in the determination of that question but is so only in so far as it assists in applying the rule of pith and substance.

In another case of the Privy Council, Megh Raj v. Allah Rakha A.I.R. (1947) P.C., p. 72] it was laid down that Section 107 has no application in a case where the Province could show that it was acting wholly within its powers under the Provincial List and was not relying on any power conferred on it by Concurrent List and accordingly questions of repugnancy do not arise in such a case.

In that case the main points of objection to the validity of the Punjab Restitution of Mortgaged Lands Act [IV of 1938], were based on Ss. 100 and 107, and upon the arguments made at the Bar both the parties according to their Lordships, "rightly construed S.107 as having no application to a case where the Province could show that it was acting wholly within its powers under the Provincial List and was not relying on any power conferred on it by the Concurrent List."

The question that arises in this context is whether even if a Provincial law survives the test of competence on the grounds contained in S.100, it is open to a further ground of attack based on the provisions of S.107 in a situation where it is in conflict with a law which Federal Legislature has passed or which is an existing law with respect to one of the matters in the Concurrent List.

In other words, for a constitutionally valid law both the tests of competence under ART. 106 and freedom from conflict of the kind visualised in ART. 110 must be fulfilled. There would be cases in which although a law is competently enacted it would fail (and fail only to the extent of its repugnancy) on the ground of repugnancy. The "offending repugnancy", as remarked above, is between the Provincial law and the law which the Federal Legislature is competent to enact on the one hand, and between the Provincial Law and the existing law on the other. This conflict will be immaterial if the law having been reserved for the assent of the President has received the assent, in which case ART. 110 will be thrown out of gear.

92. Analysis of ART. 110

The problem stated:

Confining our attention now to the textual analysis of ART. 110, following problem arises for our consideration. In the salutary clause of ART. 110 we read the following:—

"If any provision of an Act of a Provincial Legislature is repugnant to any provision of an Act of Parliament, which Parliament is competent to enact, or to any provision of any existing law with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List"

The Article goes on to say that if that condition be fulfilled certain consequences will follow. Now, must the repugnancy of any provision of an Act of Provincial Legislature be in regard to "any provision of an Act of Parliament, which Parliament is competent to enact", or must it be confined to the cases where there is a "provision of an Act of Parliament, which Parliament is competent to enact with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List." Textually, if we were to omit the comma after the word "enact", appearing in ART. 110, and proceed to apply the usual rules of grammatical construction, it would be permissible to construe the expression "with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List" as limiting and qualifying not only the existing law but also "any provision of an Act of Parliament, which Parliament is competent to enact."

It would be recalled that in the case of Atiqa Begam v. Maghni, reported in A.I.R. (1940) Allahabad p. 272, the repugnancy under S.107 of the Government of India Act, 1935, was construed to have been provided for between the Provincial Law and a law passed by the Federal Legislature with respect to a matter in the Concurrent List. It was there said (at p. 277):

"Sec. 107 affects the relations between the Federal Legislature and Provincial Legislature where the laws passed by the two Legislatures are among the subjects in the Concurrent Legislative List and are repugnant to each other. It has no application to cases of repugnancy due to overlapping found between the Provincial List on the one hand and the Federal and Concurrent Lists on the other. If such overlapping exists in any particular case the Provincial Legislation will be ultra vires because of the non obstante clause in sub-sec. (1) of S.100 read with the opening words in sub-ss. (2) and (3) of S.100. In such cases the Provincial Legislation will fail not because of repugnance to Federal Law but in consequence of being repugnant to the Constitution itself. In the present case, however it is not argued that there is any repugnance between a law passed by the Federal Legislature (which according to S.316 Constitution Act, means the present Indian Legislature) and a Provincial law, and, as such, the question decided in the Patna case does not arise. I am, therefore, relieved from the necessity of giving my reasons at length for the view that the repugnance contemplated by sub-section (1) of S.107 between Federal and Provincial law is only concerning matters in the Concurrent List."

This view taken of the scope of S.107 is in conflict with the view taken by the

Analysis of ART. 110. The problem stated

Patna High Court in Sadanand Jha v. Aman Khan, A.I.R. (1939) Patna 55 at p. 65, where it was observed by Dhavle J. as follows :—

"It has been urged for the appellant that the words following 'an existing Indian law' in sub-sec. (1), namely, 'with respect to one of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent Legislative List', should also be read with the expressions 'any provision of a Provincial law' and 'any provision of a Federal law' occurring earlier in this sub-section; and the reason given is that the expression 'subject to the provisions of this Section' in the same sub-section, has, so it is argued, the effect of making the repugnancies dealt with in sub-sec. (1) identical with those dealt with in sub-sec. (2). The construction contended for is opposed to the plain grammar of the sub-section, and there is nothing in the scheme of legislation laid down in the Act to indicate that Parliament intended it. As we have already seen, the enumeration of items in the three lists itself makes it far from improbable that conflicts of legislative provisions would arise in other fields no less than in the concurrent field; and there is no reason to suppose that Parliament intended to leave the former to the operation of S.100 alone with its qualifications of 'notwithstanding' and 'subject to'. Further, if Parliament had intended to provide in sub-sec. (1) of S.107 for conflicts in the concurrent field alone, it could easily have done so by adopting the language of sub-sec. (2) which is unmistakably confined to action in the concurrent field. Nor can I agree that the expression 'subject to the provisions of this Section' in sub-sec. (1) has the effect of confining the conflicts dealt with in this sub-section to conflicts in the concurrent field. That expression no doubt refers to sub-sec. (2), which is confined to legislation in the concurrent field. But is the provision of this exceptional procedure for the concurrent field any reason for supposing that Parliament either was not aware of or decided to ignore possible conflicts between Provincial legislation in the exclusive field and Federal or the existing Indian law in the concurrent field? As we have seen already from S.100, the powers of the Provincial Legislatures are subject to the powers of the Federal Legislature. S.107 may be regarded as a supplement to that provision. In sub-sec. (1) it deals with the effect of repugnancies between Provincial and Federal legislation (whenever passed) without any reference to the fields to which the conflicting enactments may relate; and it also deals with repugnancies between Provincial legislation and the existing Indian law which has not been referred to in S.100 and is here in the concurrent field only put on the same footing as Federal law irrespective of whether this relates to its exclusive or the concurrent field.

"The sub-section provides in effect that in either case the Provincial Law shall, to the extent of repugnancy (and no more) be void. To this general rule the second sub-section provides an exception limited to Provincial, Federal, and existing Indian Legislation, all in the concurrent field. That the exception is limited, in my opinion, affords no reason for restricting the scope of the general rule."

Which of the above two conflicting interpretations will apply to the language of ART. 110 of our Constitution, which is a verbatim reproduction of S.107, plus, of course, one comma which appears in it after the word 'enact', but which does not appear in S.107? Quite apart from any importance that might or might not be given to the presence of comma after the word 'enact' in ART. 110, it is a matter for serious consideration if the repugnancy could at all be confined to conflicts only between Provincial and Federal Law in the Concurrent field, that is, in the way in which it was looked at in the Allahabad case.

The argument in favour of the contrary view may be stated as follows. The expression "any provision of law which Federal Legislature is competent to enact with respect to one of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent Legislative List" might in effect be construed to mean as involving a suggestion or inference that the Parliament is competent to enact laws only with respect to some of the matters mentioned in the Concurrent List. It would, therefore, appear that the words of limitation, namely, "with respect to one of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent Legislative List" control only the expression 'existing law' and not expression 'any provision of law which Federal Legislature is competent to enact.'

But if the doctrine of pith and substance is to be given a due place in any scheme of interpretation of ARTs. 106 and 110 we ought not to confine the operation of ART. 110 to cases of conflict of Federal and Provincial laws only to the Concurrent Field. If a Provincial Law in its pith and substance falls in the Provincial List and only incidentally trespasses into the forbidden Federal Field, two courses of action would, in principle, be available to Courts: either to say that to the extent to which it trespasses into the federal field it is void—and the rest of the law is saved,—or to say that, since ART. 110 does not avail to render the offending portion as void, the impugned law as a whole must go as being contrary to ART. 106 (upon the view that clause 3 of that article is subject to clause 1 thereof) for there is no method of saving the part that is valid by appeal to ART. 106 itself.

Besides, even the title of the S.107 was 'inconsistency between Federal Laws and Provincial or State Laws', and not 'inconsistency between Federal Laws and Provincial or State Laws in respect of matters in the Concurrent List.' It is true that the title does not materially affect the construction of the Section, the principle involved being the one which says that title is no part of the Section. But neither is the punctuation in a statutory language of much relevance in the analysis of a Section. Their Lordships of the Privy Council said in A. I. R. (1929) P.C. 69 at p. 71 (Lewis Pugh v. Ashutosh Sen) that statute must be read without the comma appearing in its provisions, for it is no part of the statute.

There is, however, one more argument in favour of the view that repugnancy visualised by ART. 110 is one between Federal and Provincial Law in regard to the matters mentioned in the Concurrent List, which might be stated as follows: it is no doubt true that the expression "Any provision of law which Federal Legislature is competent to enact", would also include reference to matters mentioned in the Federal List, but if the whole Article is read it would be seen that that Article is expressly made subject to clause (2) which makes reference to repugnancy in the field of Concurrent List—in other words, if clause 2 is to be the guide in the determination of the scope of clause (1) the repugnancy between the Federal and Provincial law must be taken to refer only to the Concurrent field.

But in principle there is no valid reason why clause (2) should at all be allowed to cut down the plain meaning of the first clause which does not limit itself to repugnancy between Federal and Provincial Laws to the concurrent field. That is why Dhavli J. in the Patna case felt that that is not a conclusive argument—there is no warrant for taking clause (2) to be providing for all the conflicts mentioned by clause (1) and it may well be that the Federal laws would all the same prevail ("assent" or "no assent") if they are in conflict with a Provincial Law in respect of matters mentioned in the Federal List.

In the end, in order to appreciate the primacy of Federal Parliament's jurisdiction we might notice the case of A.L.S.P.P.L. Subrahmanyam Chettiar v. Muttuswami Goudan, reported in A.I.R. (1941) F. C. p. 47, where it was observed the pith and substance of the Madras Agriculturists' Relief Act cannot be said to be legislation with respect to negotiable instruments or promissory notes: it is quite immaterial that many, or even most, of the debts with which it deals are in practice evidenced by or based upon such instruments. That is an accidental circumstance which cannot affect its validity. The validity or invalidity of the Act cannot be affected by the money-lenders' practice of evidencing the debts of those to whom they lend money.

Subrahmanyam
Chettiar v.
Muttuswami Goudan.

Analysis of ART. 110. The problem stated

The Act cannot be challenged as invading the forbidden field of List I of Schedule VII, Government of India Act and, therefore, is intra vires of the Provincial Legislature. (The following cases were relied on :—

- (1881) 7 AC 96 Citizens Insurance Co. of Canada v. Parsons.
- (1882) 7 AC 829 Russel v. The Queen.
- (1899) AC 580 Union Colliery Company of British Columbia v. Bryden.
- (1930) AC 111 Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for British Columbia.,
- (1940) AC 513 Board of Trustees of Lethbridge Irrigation District v. Independent Order of Foresters.

Section 100 of the Government of India Act, which corresponds to ART. 106 of our Constitution contains a warrant for upholding the primacy of the Federal Legislature; it was held in this Federal Court case that the maxim generalibus specialia derogant cannot be applied to the three competing Lists I, II and III of the 7th Schedule. "In its fullest scope" said Sullaiman, J., "S. 100 would then mean that if it happens that there is any subject in List II which also falls in List I or List III, it must be taken as cut out from List II. On this strict interpretation there would be no question of any real overlapping at all. If a subject falls exclusively in List II and no other list, then the power of the Provincial Legislatures is supreme. But if it does also fall within List I, then it must be deemed as if it is not included in List II at all. Similarly, if it also falls in List III, it must be deemed to have been excluded from List II. The dominant position of the Central Legislature with regard to matters in List I and List III is thus established. But the rigour of the literal interpretation is relaxed by the use of the words 'with respect to' which as already pointed out only signify 'pith and substance', and do not forbid a mere incidental encroachment. But, even if such an incidental encroachment may be ordinarily permissible, the field may not be clear. There may be competency and yet repugnancy also. The question is how to prevent a clash if the trespass is on a field already occupied by a central legislation." As regards the principles upon which S.107 was drawn up, Sullaiman J, rightly observed that they reflected an acceptance of what in Canada had been done by the Judges to solve the problem of repugnancy. The doctrine which had been evolved by those who have judicially interpreted the provisions of the British North America Act is that if the encroachment is merely incidental then there is no defect so long as the trespass is upon an unoccupied field. Engrafted upon the doctrine of incidental encroachment is the doctrine of unoccupied field. (See (1) 1894 A.C. 189, Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada, (2) 1907 A.C. 65, Grand Trunk Railway of Canada v. Attorney-General of Canada)

93. S. 104 of the Govt. of India Act and ART. 109 of our Constitution

It is necessary to note that under Section 104 of the Government of India Act, the Governor-General had the power to empower either the Federal Legislature or the Provincial Legislature to enact a law with respect to any matter not enumerated in any of the lists in the 7th Schedule of that Act. Instead of this section our Constitution has designed ART. 109 to provide for the residuary power of the legislature being exercised by the Provincial Legislature. On comparing the two provisions it would appear that since in our Constitution exclusive legislative power has been given to the Provincial Legislature to pass laws with respect to any matter not enumerated in any list of the Fifth Schedule, the rule for interpretation laid down in the Federal Court case would not strictly apply: The rule of construction applicable to the Government of India Act was that for the purpose of

S. 104 of the Govt. of India
Act, and
Art. 109 of our Constitution.

determining the category in Lists I, II and III, with respect to which the subject matter of a particular Act of the Provincial Legislature falls, resort to the residual power under S.104 should be the very last refuge. "It is only when all the categories in the three lists are absolutely exhausted that one can think of falling back upon a the nondescript." (See Sulaiman's judgment in Subramanyan vs Mutterswami AIR 1941. F. C. 47 at p. 55).

It is a matter which yet remains to be decided by courts in Pakistan whether in view of the residuary field of legislation having been now reserved exclusively to the Provincial Legislature, the strict rule, viz., of regarding the Provincial Legislature to be supreme only in respect of cases where the pith and substance of the legislation falls in the Provincial List, would still apply. It is true that the countervailing consideration which will not be lost sight of would be to take notice of the primacy of the laws passed by Parliament, in that the field of legislation in respect of matters which, although covered both by the Provincial List as well as by the Federal List, is nevertheless, having regard to the non obstante clause in sub-section (1) of Art. 106, to be deemed to be within the exclusive competence of the Federal Legislature. But the problem is no longer as simple as it was under the scheme of the Government of India Act where the method of settling the constitutionality of a Provincial Law as stated by Sulaiman was as follows (at p. 54):

"So long as it can be shown that all the provisions contained therein (in a Provincial Law) fall within List II or List III (that is Provincial List and the Concurrent List respectively), the Province would have prima facie an authority to legislate, unless it can be shown that it is with respect to any matter in List I, or is void on account of any repugnancy."

Under our Constitution, a Province can also legislate in the undefined reserved field and the approach to the question of settling the constitutionality of a Provincial Law would on that account be somewhat different.

The enumeration of the various subject-matters of Legislation in the Fifth Schedule is fairly exhaustive, and the existence of a matter not covered by any of the cases is not to be lightly inferred, but this is not to say that residuary field reserved by ART. 109 for Provincial Legislature is an illusory or a non-existing entity. It is the view of the present writer that ART. 109 will, to a considerable extent, dominate the interpretation of entries in the Fifth Schedule when the rule relating to pith and substance is sought to be applied to discover whether a given subject-matter of legislation falls within the Provincial List or Federal List, and to that extent, considering that the residuary powers of legislation in the Indian Constitution are vested in the Indian Parliament, even the interpretation of ART. 246 by the Indian Courts, which corresponds to our ART. 106, is bound to be somewhat different from that conferred upon parallel sections of the Govt. of India Act, 1935.

In the very same case which has been referred above, it is further observed with regard to the interpretation of S. 100 of the Government of India Act: (at p. 50) "Hence, though Parliament has no doubt done its best to enact two lists of mutually exclusive powers, it has also provided, ex majori cautela, that if the two sets of legislative powers should be found to overlap, then the Federal Legislation is to prevail. And the reason for this is clear. However, carefully and precisely lists of legislative subjects are defined, it is practically impossible to ensure that they never overlap; and an absurd situation would result if two inconsistent laws, each of equal validity, could exist side by side within the same territory".

But the principle of the priority of the legislative power of Federal Legislature should be invoked only as a last resort. A support for this preposition could be derived from a case reported in A.I.R. (1945) Privy Council p. 98, Governor-General in Council v. Province of Madras. While admitting that the effect of words "notwithstanding anything in the two next succeeding sub-sections", and the opening word of section 100(3), "subject to the two preceding sub-sections" argue for the primacy of the power of the Federal Legislature, their Lordships proceeded to observe (at p. 100):

"But it appears to them that it is right first to consider whether a fair reconciliation cannot be effected by giving to the language of Federal Legislative List a meaning which, if less wide than it might in other context bear, is yet one that can properly be given to it, and equally giving to the language of the Provincial Legislative List a meaning which it can properly bear."

The moral of this observation may be stated as follows: that in cases of overlapping entries we must concentrate upon the pith and substance of the impugned Act to determine the list into which it falls. If such an examination reveals that the power of the Federal and the Provincial Legislature cannot fairly be reconciled then the latter must give way to the former—unless it can be said that the Provincial Law trenches upon the field only incidentally and that also in the unoccupied area of the forbidden field of legislation, when of course it would be allowed to stand.

94. Mode of Construing entries in the Fifth Schedule

While construing the scope of the legislative entries appearing in 5th Schedule, Courts will bestow upon their language a broad and liberal interpretation. Viscount Haldane in the case (John Deere Plow Company Ltd. v. T.F. Wharton), reported in A.I.R. (1914) Privy Council p. 174, discussed the relevant provision of British North America Act, 1867, with reference to the competing powers of the Dominion Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures in Canada. This was the case in which respondent Wharton sued to restrain the plaintiff Company, (appellants in the case) who had been incorporated by letters patent under the Companies Act of the Dominion with power to carry on throughout the Dominion and elsewhere the business of dealing in agricultural implements, from carrying on business till it was licensed to do so under Part VI of the Companies Act of British Columbia. The requisite licence having been refused by the Registrar under S.18, (for the reason that a company had already been registered in the Province under the same name), their Lordships were called upon to decide whether it was competent to the Province to legislate so as to interfere with the carrying on of the business in the Province of a Dominion Company under the circumstances of that case. Referring to the scheme of the British North America Act, their Lordships observed (at p. 176):

"The general power conferred on the Dominion by S.91 to make laws for the peace, order, and good Government of Canada extends in terms only to matters not coming within the classes of subject, assigned by the Act exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces. But if the subject matter falls within any of the heads of Section 92, it becomes necessary to see whether it also falls within any of the enumerated heads of S.91, for if so, by the concluding words of that section, it is excluded from the powers conferred by S.92".

It is hardly necessary to say that broadly considered the same is the scheme of distribution of powers between the Federal and the Provincial Legislature in our Constitution.

Viscount Haldane then refers to the difficulty of the draftsman who is called upon to embody in statutory form the terms of a political agreement:

"Before proceeding to consider the question whether the provisions already referred to of the British Columbia Companies Act, imposing restrictions of the operations of a Dominion company which has failed to obtain a provincial licence, are valid, it is necessary to realize the relation to each other of Ss.91 and 92 and the character of the expressions used in them. The language of these sections and of the various heads which they contain obviously cannot be construed as having been intended to embody the exact disjunctions of a perfect logical scheme. The draftsman had to work on the terms of a political agreement, terms which were mainly to be sought for in the resolutions passed at Quebec in October, 1864. To these resolutions and the sections founded on them the remark applies which was made by this Board about the Australian Commonwealth Act in a recent case, Attorney-General for the Commonwealth v. Colonial Sugar Refining Company, (1914) A.C. 254) that if there is at points obscurity in language, this may be taken to be due, not to uncertainty about general principle, but to that difficulty in obtaining ready agreement about phrases which attend the drafting of legislative measures by large assemblages. It may be added that the form in which provisions in terms overlapping each other have been placed side by side shows that those who passed the Confederation Act intended to leave the working out and interpretation of these provisions to practice and to judicial decision."

Mode of Construing entries in the Fifth Schedule.

The principles that were to apply to the interpretation of Sections 91 and 92 were then stated by their Lordships at p. 177:

"The structure of Ss. 91 and 92, and the degree to which the connotation of the expressions used overlaps, render it, in their Lordships' opinion, unwise on this or any other occasion to attempt exhaustive definitions of the meaning and scope of these expressions. Such definitions, in the case of language used under the conditions in which a constitution such as that under consideration was framed, must almost certainly miscarry. It is in many cases only by confining decisions to concrete questions which have actually arisen in circumstances the whole of which are before the tribunal that injustice to future suitors can be avoided. Their Lordships adhere to what was said by Sir Montague Smith in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Citizens Insurance Co. v. Parsons, (7, Appeal Cases at 109), to the effect that in discharging the difficult duty of arriving at a reasonable and practical construction of the language of the sections, so as to reconcile the respective powers which they contain and give effect to them all, it is the wise course to decide each case which arises without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the Statute than is necessary for the decision of the particular question in hand. The wisdom of adhering to this rule appears to their Lordships to be of especial importance when putting a construction on the scope of the words 'civil rights' in particular cases. An abstract logical definition of their scope is not only, having regard to the context of Ss. 91 and 92 of the Act, impracticable, but is certain, if attempted, to cause embarrassment and possible injustice in future cases. It must be borne in mind in construing the two sections that matters which in a special aspect and for a particular purpose may fall within one of them, may in a different aspect and for a different purpose fall within the other. In such cases the nature and scope of the legislative attempt of the Dominion or the Province, as the case may be, have to be examined with reference to the actual facts, if it is to be possible to determine under which set of powers it falls in substance and in reality. This may not be difficult to determine in actual and concrete cases. But it may well be impossible to give abstract answers to general questions as to the meaning of the words, or to lay down any interpretation based on their literal scope apart from their context."

Their Lordships, upon the interpretation they bestowed on the language of the entry No. 11 of section 92 and the expression 'Civil rights in the Province', and the language of S.91, came to the conclusion that the Parliament of Canada had the power to enact sections relied on in that case in the Dominion Companies Act and the Interpretation Act, but they proceeded to add a word of caution:

"They do not desire to be understood as suggesting that, because the status of a Dominion Company enables it to trade in a province, and thereby confers on it civil rights to some extent, the power to regulate trade and commerce can be exercised in such a way as to trench, in the case of such companies, on the exclusive jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures over civil rights in general. No doubt this jurisdiction would conflict with that of the Province if civil rights were to be read as an expression of unlimited scope. But, as has already been pointed out, the expression must be construed consistently with various powers conferred by Sections 91 and 92, which restrict its literal scope."

This decision was referred to with approval in the case in Re C.P. Motor Spirit Act, A.I.R. (1939) Federal Court p. 1, as being relevant for the purpose of applying the principle of Ss. 100 and 107 of the Government of India Act, 1935—and would equally be of much assistance in understanding and applying the provisions of ARTs. 106 and 110 of our Constitution.

95. Doctrine of Occupied Field

We might now advert more fully to the doctrine of "occupied field". This doctrine is stated in the case of Attorney-General of Saskatchewan v. The Attorney-General of Canada and others, reported in A.I.R. (1949) Privy Council p. 190, where it was observed that if a subject of legislation by the Province is only incidental or ancillary to one of the classes of subjects enumerated in the Provincial List and is properly within one of the subjects enumerated within the Dominion List, its legislation by the Province is competent unless and until Dominion Parliament chooses to occupy the field by legislation. This was a case in which initially there was a reference by the Governor-General-in-Council to the Supreme Court of Canada in which the opinion of the Court was sought on, among others, the following question:

"(1) Is Section 6, Farm Security Act, 1944, being Chapter 30 of the Statutes of Saskatchewan (1944, 2nd session) as amended by section 2 of Chapter 28 of the Statutes of Saskatchewan, 1945, or any of the provisions thereof, ultra vires of Legislative Assembly of Saskatchewan either in whole or in part and if so in what particular or particulars and to what extent?"

And from the opinion delivered by the Supreme Court of Canada, the appeal went to their Lordships of the Privy Council. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that para 3 of sub-section 2 of S.6 was ultra vires of the Provincial Legislature because it was an enactment in relation to "interest", a matter which, by section 91, head 19, of British North America Act is within the exclusive legislative powers of the Dominion Parliament. It was also contended that the impeached provision was in conflict with the provision of the Interest Act of Canada and for that reliance was placed on head 21 of section 91, which confers on the Dominion Parliament the exclusive power to legislate in relation to bankruptcy or insolvency. Their Lordships had no difficulty in rejecting the second point raised on behalf of the respondent. They then proceeded to deal with what they considered was the real difficulty in the way of accepting the appellant's case. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that pith and substance of the impugned provision was "property and civil rights" a matter in relation to which Provincial Legislature had an exclusive legislative power and that, in so far as para 3 affects "interest", it does so only incidentally. Reliance was placed upon the remarks of Lord Atkin in the case of Ladore v. Bennett, (1939) A.C. p. 468: (1939) 3 All E.R. p. 98. Dealing with that contention their Lordships observed as follows (at p. 193):

"A more difficult question is raised by the alternative contention that the legislation is in relation to civil rights in the Province. Contractual rights are, generally speaking, one kind of civil rights and, were it not that the Dominion has an exclusive power to legislate in relation to 'interest', the argument that the Provincial Legislature has the power, and the exclusive power, to vary provisions for the payment of interest contained in contracts in the province could not be overthrown. But proper allowance must be made for the allocation of the subject-matter of 'interest' to the Dominion Legislature under Head 19 of S.91, British North America Act. There is another qualification to the otherwise unrestricted power of the Provincial Legislature to deal with civil rights in Head 18 'Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes'. The Dominion power to legislate in relation to interest cannot be understood to be limited to a power to pass statutes dealing with usury such as were repealed in the United Kingdom in 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 90). So restricted a construction was rejected by the Judicial Committee in Board of Trustees of Lethbridge Irrigation District v. Independent Order of Foresters and Attorney-General of Canada, (1940) A.C. 513: (1940) 2 All E.R. 220, for reasons stated by Viscount Caldecote at pp.530,531. The validity of the Interest Act of the Parliament of Canada (Revised Statutes, c.120) has not been challenged in any particular. Section 2 of this Statute provides:

'Except as otherwise provided by this or by any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever, any rate of interest or discount which is agreed upon.'

"It is, therefore, clear that a provincial statute which varies the stipulation in a contract as to the rate of interest to be exacted would not be consonant with the existence and exercise of the exclusive Dominion power to legislate in respect of interest. The Dominion power would likewise be invaded if the provincial enactment was directed to postponing the contractual date for the payment of interest without altering the rate, for this would equally be legislating in respect of interest.

"There thus remain two questions to be considered: first, does the provincial statute now under consideration operate to the above effect? And secondly, even if it does, can the consequent invalidity be avoided because this result should be regarded as merely incidental to the achievement of the real and valid statutory purpose, so that, although the topic of interest is trenched upon, the subject of interest is not the pith and substance of the Act ?

"The first of these questions must be answered in the light of an established rule of construction in such cases, viz., that regard must be had to the substance and not to the mere form of the enactment, so that 'you cannot do that indirectly which you are prohibited from doing directly' (per Lord Halsbury in Madden v. Nelson and Fort Sheppard Ry. Co., 1899, A.C. p. 626 at p. 627; (68 L.J. P.C. 148)). If, under colour of an arrangement which purports to deal only with the principal of a debt, it is really the contractual obligation to pay interest on the principal which is modified, the enactment should be regarded as dealing with interest."

Having stated these principles their Lordships proceeded to examine the language of the impugned provision in an effort to find out how far it had trespassed upon the forbidden field and whether it was merely an incidental exercise of a valid power:

"These considerations lead their Lordships to confirm the conclusion to which the majority of the Supreme Court has arrived, that para. 3 of sub-s.(2) of S.6 trenches upon the Dominion field. It is obvious that the language used has been ingeniously chosen in an endeavour to avoid a conflict with Dominion powers and legislation, but in the view of their Lordships the endeavour is not successful. This view of the matter renders it unnecessary to determine what would be the correct application of the words used in the difficult situation of successive years of suspension analysed in the judgment of Kellock J.

"Secondly, can the remaining argument be upheld that this interference with the topic of interest none the less remains valid because it is merely incidental to the exercise of a valid power to legislate for a modification of principal debts? On this, it is to be observed that there is not only an exclusive power to legislate in relation to interest vested in the Dominion Parliament, but that such legislation has been enacted in the Interest Act. Viscount Maugham laid it down on behalf of this Board in Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1943, A.C. 356 at p. 370: A.I.R. (1943) P.C. 76), that :

'Since 1894 it has been a settled proposition that, if a subject of legislation by the Province is only incidental or ancillary to one of the classes of subjects enumerated in S. 91 and is properly within one of the subjects enumerated in S.92, then legislation by the Province is competent unless and until the Dominion Parliament chooses to occupy the field by legislation'".

This doctrine of the occupied field applies only where there is a case of clash of jurisdiction between the State Law and the Federal Law and the encroachment is incidental in an unoccupied field. In the words of Lord MacMillan in a Privy Council case, (Forbes v. Attorney-General of Manitoba), reported in (1937) 1 All E.R. p. 249, the scope for the application of this doctrine was stated as follows:

"The doctrine of the occupied field applies only where there is a clash between the Dominion Legislation and Provincial Legislation within an area common to both. Here there is no conflict. Both income taxes may co-exist and be enforced without clashing."

It would thus appear that in substance the doctrine of occupied field just represents the conception which has been statutorily expressed in ART.110(1) of our Constitution.

The doctrine of occupied field as an argument is often pressed in the service of a contention that in the cases of clash between a law passed by the Provincial Legislature, which merely incidentally encroaches upon the forbidden federal field, the Provincial Law be not allowed to be treated as valid law since the forbidden field is not vacant but occupied by the pre-existing law. Once again we see that the doctrine of occupied field, like the doctrine of incidental encroachment, is only another way of discovering what is the pith and substance of an impugned Act. The law would be valid if in pith and substance it falls in the Provincial field but incidentally encroaches upon the forbidden field with the limitation that only to the extent of repugnancy those incidental provisions will be knocked out if they come in clash with the previously enacted law which occupies the forbidden field. The Provincial law will however be fully valid if, in relation to the incidental encroachment upon the forbidden field, it could be said that it has only trenched upon the unoccupied portion of that field. This is precisely what ART. 110 of our Constitution says in respect of conflict between the Provincial Laws and the Federal or Existing Laws with respect to matters in the Concurrent List. The controlling words in ART. 110 are that the Provincial law will be void but only to the extent of repugnancy. The pith and substance rule helps us to determine the competence of the Legislature, but ART. 110 which deals with repugnant laws being void to the extent of repugnancy helps us to determine what portions of the impugned law become void when they clash in the occupied field within the forbidden sphere of the Legislature.

We may in this context notice a recent case of the Supreme Court of India—State of Bombay v. Narottamdas Jetha Bhai and another, reported in A.I.R. (1951) Supreme Court p. 69. In this case the question was whether the Bombay City Civil Court Act of 1948 was ultra vires of the legislature of the State of Bombay and in particular whether section 4 was ultra vires of the State Legislature. It was claimed that the subject-matter of legislation was covered by the entries Nos. 1 and 2 of the Provincial List: (1) Administration of Justice, Constitution and organisation of all courts excepting Federal Court and fees taken therein (2) Jurisdiction and powers of all courts excepting the Federal Court with respect to any of the matters in this list; procedure in Rent and Revenue Courts. As against this, was a counter contention that entry No. 3 of the Federal List which provides for "jurisdiction and power of all courts excepting the Federal Court" and entry 15 of the Concurrent List which provides for jurisdiction and powers of all Courts excepting the Federal Court with respect to any of the matters in this list, covered the substance of the impugned legislation.

The impugned Act had conferred jurisdiction on a Civil Court for Greater Bombay to try and dispose of all suits and other proceedings of a civil nature not exceeding a certain value, subject to certain exceptions, and it was contended that jurisdiction with respect to matters within Federal List, like Promissory Notes etc., had been conferred by the Provincial Legislature by means of the impugned Act and thereby it had trespassed into the forbidden field. The other contention on the footing of which the Act had been attacked was that it constituted a case of unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, in that it had conferred authority on the Provincial Government by means of a notification to confer jurisdiction on that civil court of such value not exceeding Rs. 25,000/- as may be specified in that notification, but that is a contention with which at present we are not concerned. This case came in appeal from the case reported in A.I.R. (1951) Bombay p. 180, in which their Lordships of the Bombay High Court had held that section 4 of the Bombay City Civil Court Act was ultra vires of the Provincial Legislature.

The following observations in the judgment of Das J. at p. 96, have reference to the enunciation of principles of interpreting the legislative entries with which we are here concerned:

"A good deal of argument was advanced before us as to the applicability of the doctrine of pith and substance, and, indeed, the decision of the Bombay High Court in Jagtiani's case, A.I.R. (36) 1949 F.C. 175: (50 Cr. L.J. 897) (Supra) was practically founded on that doctrine. Shortly put, the argument, as advanced, is that under entry 1 in List II, the Provincial Legislature had power to make laws with respect to entry 1 itself, to make laws conferring general jurisdiction and powers on courts constituted and organized by it under that entry; that if in making such law the Provincial Legislature incidentally encroached upon the legislative field assigned to the Federal Legislature under entry 53 in List I with respect to the jurisdiction and powers of Court with respect to any of the matters specified in List I, such incidental encroachment did not invalidate the law, as in pith and substance it was a law within the legislative powers. In my judgment, this argument really begs the question. The doctrine of pith and substance postulates, for its application, that the impugned law is substantially within the legislative competence of the particular legislature that made it, but only incidentally encroached upon the legislative field of another Legislature. The doctrine saves this incidental encroachment if only the law is in pith and substance within the legislative field of the particular Legislature, which made it. Therefore, if the Provincial Legislature under entry 1, had power to vest general jurisdiction on a newly constituted court, then if the law made by it incidentally gave jurisdiction to the Court with respect to matters specified in List 1, the question of the applicability of the doctrine of pith and substance might have arisen. I have already pointed out that, on a proper construction, entry 1 of List II did not empower the Provincial Legislature to confer any jurisdiction or power on the Court and the expression 'administration of Justice' had to be read as covering matters relating to administration of justice other than jurisdiction and powers of court and, if that were so, the discussion of the doctrine of pith and substance does not arise at all. I find it difficult to support the reasoning adopted by the Bombay High Court in Jagtiani's case, A.I.R. (36) 1949, F.C. 175: (50 Cr. L.J. 897) (Supra)."

96. When are Laws said to be Repugnant to each other?

Ordinarily the laws could be said to be repugnant when they involve impossibility of obedience to them simultaneously. (See 8 C.L.R. 465 and 10 C.L.R. 266). But there may be cases in which enactments may be inconsistent although obedience to each of them may be possible without disobeying the other. In an Australian case, (Clyde Engineering Co. Ltd. v. Cowburn (1926) 37 C.L.R. p. 466) it was held that inconsistency is created also when one statute takes away rights conferred by the other. In that case the Federal law prescribed a 48 hours week and by its several provisions established the procedure for payment of overtime on that basis. The State law on the other hand prescribed a 44 hours week. It was ruled that the two statutes were inconsistent with each other. (See the illuminating judgment of Isaacs, J. under "Inconsistency" at p. 489. "If an Act of Parliament", says the learned Judge, "for instance, prescribed 25 lashes for robbery under arms and a later Act prescribed that such an offender should be punished with 20 lashes, it could, of course, with equal truth be said that both provisions could be obeyed, and therefore, applying the suggested test, the offender must receive 45 lashes. But surely the vital question would be: Was the second Act on its true construction intended to cover the whole ground and, therefore, to supersede the first? If it was so intended, then the inconsistency would consist in giving any operative effect at all to the first Act, because the second was intended entirely to exclude it. The suggested test, (namely that both Acts can be obeyed) however useful a working guide it may be in some cases, or in other words, however it may for some cases prove a test, cannot be recognised as the standard measuring rod of inconsistency.")

In another Australian case (ex parte McLean reported in (1930) 43 C.L.R. 472,) yet another test of inconsistency was formulated. Two Statutes could be said to be inconsistent if they, in respect of an identical subject-matter, imposed identical duty upon the subject, but provided for different sanctions for enforcing those duties: as for example in a case where one statute imposed a duty and provided for a sanction of a certain type to secure compliance with that duty, and another statute dealt with the same subject-matter but while imposing the same duty provided a different kind of sanction, the two laws could not stand together as a person obliged to follow one law could not at the same time be expected to submit himself to another. This was a case in which the State law (Master and Servants Act 1902) had prescribed a certain kind of punishment for misconduct towards their employees but the Federal law (Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Act 1904-28) dealt with the same kind of misconduct under a somewhat different sanction. Under S.109 of the Australian Constitution the conflict was resolved and the Commonwealth law was made to prevail over the State Law. (This case has been approved by the Privy Council in the case of Thomas O'Sullivan v. Noarlunga Meat Ltd. (1957) A.C. 1). The principle that was laid down was stated by Dixon J. at p. 483 as follows:

"The inconsistency does not lie in the mere co-existence of two laws which are susceptible of simultaneous obedience. It depends upon the intention of the paramount Legislature to express by its enactment, completely, exhaustively, or exclusively, what shall be the law governing the particular conduct or matter to which its attention is directed. When a Federal Statute discloses such an intention, it is inconsistent with it for the law of the State to govern the same conduct or matter."

In yet a third Australian case of Stock Motor Ploughs Ltd. v. Forsyth reported in (1932) 48 C.L.R. 128, it was laid down that even in respect of cases where two laws impose one and the same duty of obedience there may be inconsistency. The principle as to this inconsistency was explained by Evatt J. who after reviewing all the previous decisions observed (at p. 147):

"It is now established . . . that State and Federal Laws may be inconsistent, although obedience to both laws is possible. There may even be inconsistency although each law imposes the very same duty of obedience. These conclusions have, in the main, been reached, by ascribing 'inconsistency' to a State Law, not because the Federal law directly invalidates or conflicts with it, but because the Federal law is said to 'cover the field'. This is a very ambiguous phrase, because subject-matters of legislation bear little resemblance to geographical areas. It is no more than a cliche for expressing the fact that, by reason of the subject-matter dealt with, and the method of dealing with it, and the nature and multiplicity of the regulations prescribed, the Federal authority has adopted a plan or scheme which will be hindered and obstructed if any additional regulations whatever are prescribed upon the subject by any other authority; if, in other words, the subject is either touched or trenched upon by State authority." [See further (1) (1943) 68 C.L.R. 151, Colvin v. Bradley Bros., (2) (1948) 77 C.L.R. 84, Wenn v. Attorney General (Victoria).]

In an Indian case decided by Madras High Court (in re: Adhilakshmi Ammal) reported in A.I.R. (1941) Madras p. 533, the Full Bench was called upon to decide the question of repugnancy in relation to a Provision of a certain Madras Act, which made possession of ganja punishable regardless of the quantity possessed by the offender, as this was alleged to be in conflict with Abkari Act, which did not punish possession of ganja up to 5 tolas. The question involved interpretation of section 107 of the Govt. of India Act, 1935, and the contention was that as the Madras Act was not reserved for the assent of the Governor-General, it could not prevail over Madras Abkari Act. It was held:

"Consequently S.4 (1) (a) Madras Prohibition Act is completely ultra vires the Provincial Legislature in so far as it relates to 'dangerous drugs' and, therefore, Madras Abkari Act and rules made thereunder remain in force in relation to dangerous drugs such as ganja."

This was a case of conflict of Provincial Law with that of an existing Indian Law.

Repugnancies between special procedural laws, whether civil or criminal, with respect to matters in the concurrent field must be carefully scrutinised in view of the fact that in the Codes of Civil as also Criminal procedure the provisions exist that have expressly made the entire content of those Codes yield place to special and local laws. In the criminal Procedure for instance we have the following:

"S.1. This Act may be called the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898; and it shall come into force on the 1st of July, 1898.

"(2) It extends to all the provinces and the Capital of the Federation of Pakistan; but in the absence of any specific provisions to the contrary nothing herein contained shall affect any special or local law now in force, or any special jurisdiction or power conferred, or any special form of procedure prescribed, by any other law for the time being in force."

Similarly, S.5(1). "All offences, under the Pakistan Penal Code shall be investigated, enquired into, tried, and otherwise dealt with according to the provisions herein-after contained.

(2) All offences, under any other law shall be investigated, enquired into, tried, and otherwise dealt with according to the same provisions, but subject to any enactment for the time being in force regulating the manner or place of investigating, inquiring into, trying or otherwise dealing with such offences."

From the foregoing provisions it would be seen that the rule of priority in favour of the special or local procedurable law is enacted in the Code itself. Consequently the validity of a special or local procedural law, even if it is in conflict with the code of criminal procedure would not be dependent upon the assent of the President, for that assent is necessary to save the provincial law only in cases of "repugnancies", not merely apparent but real repugnancies. This view has been followed in the decisions of pre-partition cases by the Courts of un-divided India and has received the support of the Supreme Court of our Country in the case of Chief Secretary, East Pakistan v. Moslemuddin Sikdar, P.L.D. (1957) S.C. (Pak.), p. 1. After referring to Ss.1(2) and 5(2), Cornelius J., who delivered the judgment of the Court remarked in that case as follows (at p. 8):

"The wording of these two sub-sections make it clear that nothing in the Code of Criminal Procedure Code can be deemed to be repugnant to any law providing for jurisdiction and powers of Courts, and for the procedure in the trial of offences, where such law relates to a special subject, which in this case is the Control of Movement and Distribution of Foodstuffs. We are satisfied that the provisions of S.11, 12(2) 13, 14 and 18 of the Ordinance to which particular reference has been made by the learned Judges constitute special law relating to a special subject, and as such, there is no question of these provisions having 'to give way to the Code of Criminal Procedure' for the simple reason that that Code itself provides that its provisions shall not apply to such a case."

Similar reasoning would apply to a case where the repugnancy complained of is between a Provincial Special or Local Procedural Law on the one hand and the Code of Civil Procedure, which is a subject in the concurrent field, on the other. For this see the cases of Atiqa Begam, A.I.R. (1940) All. p. 272, at 277, and Megh Raj v. Allah Rakha, A.I.R. (1942) F.C. 27 (30).

97. Doctrine of implied powers

Powers may be divided into: (1) express powers, and (2) implied powers. Express powers are those that are expressly provided for by a statute and implied powers are those which are implied or derived from the powers expressly granted or conferred by a statute. For the proper exercise of a statutory power there are certain incidental or implied powers which must be assumed to have been conferred on the donee of the power. In the words of that great American Chief Justice, Mr. Marshall, (whose statement on the American law relating to the doctrine of implied powers has come to be regarded as locus classicus), uttered by him in the famous case of Marbury v. Madison, : "This provision (referring to the express power) is made in a Constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which the Government should in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change, entirely, the character of the instrument, and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur" (See p. 26 Supra). In the case of M'Culloch v. Maryland (1819), (4 Wheat 316, 4 Law. Ed. 579), the same Chief Justice observed as follows(at p. 605):

"We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

Now it must be remembered that the Congress in the United States has no doubt conferred upon it "enumerated powers" which have been listed in S.8 of ART. I, under 17 heads, but in the last clause of that section we have the following power expressly affirmed by the Constitution:

"to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers listed by this Constitution in the Government of United States or in any department or office thereof."

It was largely as a result of appeal to this provision that United States Supreme Court has been able to give to the doctrine of implied powers a somewhat abnormal content in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, (1819) 4 Wheaton 316: 4 L.Ed. 579. In this case it was urged that this clause, though not in terms, a grant of power which might otherwise be implied, conferred power merely of selecting means for executing the enumerated powers. This argument, however, did not find much favour with the learned Judges:

"The result of the most careful and attentive consideration", said the Court, "bestowed upon this clause is, that if it does not enlarge, it cannot be construed to restrain the powers of Congress, or to impair the right of the legislature to exercise its best judgment in the selection of measures to carry into execution the Constitutional powers of the Government. If no other motive for its insertion can be suggested, a sufficient one is found in the desire to remove all doubts respecting the right to legislate on that vast mass of incidental powers which must be involved in the Constitution, if that instrument be not a splendid bauble.

"We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are Constitutional. . . ."

Nine years later Marshall, C.J., introduced yet another concept, "Resulting Powers", that is of powers that result from the whole mass of the powers of National Government and from the nature of political society. (See Storey on Commentaries ART. 1256. See also United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, (1936) 299 U.S. 304.)

The United States Supreme Court by resort to this widely defined doctrine of implied powers has been able to find warrant in the legislative list contained in the 8th section of Art. I for upholding the validity of several legislative measures which in the strict rule of interpretation known to our jurisprudence it would have been difficult to do.

In a recent case of United States v. S.E. Underwriters Association decided in the year 1944 (322 U.S. 533) we have, what may be regarded as, the high-water mark of the reach of the doctrine of implied powers in the United States. This was a case in which the United States had obtained an indictment against S.E. Underwriters Association on the basis of the allegation that that Association had violated the provision of the Sherman Act. In the District Court the defence "that business of the insurance is not commerce either intrastate or inter-state", was accepted. The United States appealed from this decision to the Supreme Court. Mr. Justice Black began his judgment by acknowledging that for seventy-five years, whenever the question has been presented, it has been held by the Supreme Court that the Commerce Clause of the Constitution does not deprive the individual states of power to regulate and tax specific activities of foreign insurance companies which sell policies within their territories. But he proceeded to draw distinction between all prior determinations and the case before him upon the ground that "Not one of all these cases, however, has involved an Act of Congress which required the Court to decide the issue of whether the Commerce Clause grants to Congress the power to regulate insurance transactions stretching across state lines. To-day for the first time in the history of the Court that issue is squarely presented and must be decided." (p.534).

He then went on to observe, (at p.539): "Ordinarily courts do not construe words used in the Constitution so as to give them a meaning more narrow than one which they had in the common parlance of the times in which the Constitution was written. To hold that the word 'commerce' as used in the Commerce Clause does not include a business such as insurance would do just that. Whatever other meanings 'commerce' may have included in 1787, the dictionaries, encyclopaedias, and other books of the period show that it included trade: business in which persons bought and sold, bargained and contracted. And this meaning has persisted to modern times. Surely, therefore, a heavy burden is on him who asserts that the plenary power which the Commerce Clause grants to Congress to regulate 'Commerce among the several States' does not include the power to regulate trading in insurance to the same extent that it includes power to regulate other trades or businesses conducted across state lines."

The learned Judge then dealt with the case law cited at the bar and observed:

"Our basic responsibility in interpreting the Commerce Clause is to make certain that the power to govern intercourse among the states remains where the Constitution placed it. That power, as held by this Court from the beginning, is vested in the Congress, available to be exercised for the national welfare as Congress shall deem necessary. No commercial enterprise of any kind which conducts its activities across state lines has been held to be wholly beyond the regulatory power of Congress under the Commerce Clause. We cannot make an exception of the business of insurance." (At page 552).

The result was that the decision of the District Court was upset.

In his dissenting judgment, Chief Justice Stone made no secret of the fact that he was disturbed at the departure from the rule of stare decisis which the authors of the majority judgment were making. In his words:

"To give blind adherence to a rule or policy that no decision of this Court is to be overruled would be itself to overrule many decisions of the Court which do not accept that view. But the rule of stare decisis embodies a wise policy because it is often more important that a rule of law be settled than that it be settled right. This is especially so where as here, Congress is not without regulatory powers. (Cf. Penn Dairies v. Milk Control Comm's, 318 U.S. 261, 271, 275). The question then is not whether an earlier decision should be overruled, but whether a particular decision ought to be. And before overruling a precedent in any case it is the duty of the Court to make certain that more harm will not be done in rejecting than in retaining a rule of even dubious validity." (At page 579).

To the same effect were the observations of Justice Jackson, who in his dissenting judgment remarked:

"The question therefore for me settles down to this: What role ought the judiciary to play in reversing the trend of history and setting the nation's feet on a new path of policy? To answer this I would consider what choices we have in the matter."

After considering what he felt were the choices open in the matter before the Court he proceeded to remark :

"A judgment as to when the evil of a decisional error exceeds the evil of an innovation must be based on very practical and in part upon policy considerations. When, as in this problem, such practical and political judgments can be made by the political branches of the Government, it is the part of wisdom and self-restraint and good government for courts to leave the initiative to Congress." (At page 594).

He further continued:

"Moreover, this is the method of responsible democratic government. To force the hand of Congress is no more the proper function of the judiciary than to tie the hands of Congress. To use my office, at a time like this, and with so little justification in necessity, to dislocate the functions and revenues of the states and to catapult Congress into immediate and undivided responsibility for supervision of the nation's insurance business is more than I can reconcile with my view of the function of this Court in our Society." (pp. 594-595).

These extracts from the dissenting judgment serve to show the extreme reluctance upon the part of the dissenting Judges to upset a consistent and well established course of the decisions which supported the view of the problem taken by the District Court. The majority opinion of the Supreme Court however shows the extent to which the doctrine of implied powers can be stretched in America.

It should be obvious that this doctrine of "Implied Powers", stated in these broad terms, can have no application to the interpretation of the provisions relating to legislative competence of our national and provincial legislatures.

The High Court of Australia no doubt have, at one stage, applied this doctrinal approach but the Privy Council have firmly negatived it.

In an Australian case, H. L. D'Emden v. Pedder, (1904) 1 C.L.R., 91, the question relating to the constitutionality of Tasmanian Stamp Act was considered by the High Court of Australia. The contention was that the Act interfered by way of taxation and consequent control, with a federal agency or instrumentality; that it attempted to impose a condition which must be complied with by the officer before he can receive the salary allotted to him by the Commonwealth; and that such a condition cannot be constitutionally imposed by a State; that the imposition of stamp duty on a receipt for a federal salary is, in effect, taxation of the federal salary, which taxation, it was urged, was not within the compétence of the State. Chief Justice Griffith dealt with these contentions in the light of the provisions of the Australian Constitution Act and stated the principle of interpretation as follows:

"In considering the respective powers of the Commonwealth and of the States it is essential to bear in mind that each is, within the ambit of its authority, a sovereign State, subject only to the restrictions imposed by the Imperial connexion and to the provisions of the Constitution, either expressed or necessarily implied. That this is so as regards the Commonwealth, apart altogether from the express provisions of the Constitution, appears too plain to need elaborate argument. It is only necessary to mention the maxim 'quando lex aliquid concedit, concedere videtur et illud sine quo res ipsa valere non potest'. In other words, where any power or control is expressly granted, there is included in the grant, to the full extent of the capacity of the grantor, and without

The doctrine of implied powers—and our Constitution
The approach of the High Court of Australia.

out special mention, every power and every control the denial of which would render the grant itself ineffective. This is, in truth, not a doctrine of any special system of law, but a statement of a necessary rule of construction of all grants of power, whether by unwritten constitution, formal written instrument, or other delegation of authority, and applies from the necessity of the case, to all to whom is committed the exercise of powers of Government." (At page 109).

He then considered numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and in particular referred reverentially to the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, (1819) 4 Wheaton, p. 316; 4 Lawyer's Ed. page 579:

"We are not, of course," said he, "bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. But we all think it would need some courage for any judge at the present day to decline to accept the interpretation placed upon the United States Constitution by so great a judge and so long ago as 1819, and followed up to the present day by the succession of great jurists who have since adorned the Bench of the Supreme Court at Washington. So far, therefore, as the United States Constitution and the Constitution of the Commonwealth are similar, the construction put upon the former by the Supreme Court of the United States may well be regarded by us in construing the Constitution of the Commonwealth, not as an infallible guide, but as a most welcome aid and assistance." (At page 112).

The learned Chief Justice then stated in his judgment that the view of the law taken in McCulloch's case had been adopted and followed in the interpretation of the Constitution of the Dominion of Canada by the Courts of the Provinces of Ontario and New Brunswick since the year 1878, and that their decisions, though uniformly adverse to the Provincial Governments, have not been made the subject of appeal either to the Judicial Committee or to the Supreme Court of Canada. In the end, he held that the general words of Tasmanian Act ought to be interpreted restrictively, so as to exclude federal officers from the pale of its operations. This Australian case was followed in Deakin v. Webb and Lyne v. Webb 1904, 1 C.L.R. 585, where it was decided that an employee of the federal government was not liable to income-tax under the State Income-Tax Act. The principle of the case formed the subject-matter for the consideration of the Privy Council in the case of Webb v. Outram, (1907) A.C. p. 81, and the doctrine invoked by the High Court of Australia to the effect that where a State law interferes with the free exercise of the legislative and executive powers of the Commonwealth such interference must be impliedly forbidden by the Constitution of the Commonwealth, although no such express prohibition can be found therein, was rejected. Their Lordships saw no warrant in the extension of the doctrine invoked by the Australian High Court to the interpretation of the Australian Constitution Act for there was, in their Lordships' view, no analogy between the two Constitutions just "in the very matter which is under debate".

Their Lordships further observed :

"No State of the Australian Commonwealth has the power of independent legislation possessed by the States of the American Union. Every Act of the Victorian Council and Assembly requires the assent of the Crown, but when it is assented to, it becomes an Act of Parliament as much as any Imperial Act, though the elements by which it is authorised are different. If, indeed, it were repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the colony, it might be inoperative to the extent of its repugnancy. (See the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865), but, with this exception, no authority exists by which its validity can be questioned or impeached. The American Union, on the other hand, has erected a tribunal which possesses jurisdiction to annul a Statute upon the ground that it is unconstitutional. But in the British Constitution, though sometimes the phrase "unconstitutional" is used to describe a Statute which, though within the legal power of the legislature to enact, is contrary to the tone and spirit of our institutions, and to condemn the statesmanship which has advised the enactment of such a law, still, notwithstanding such condemnation, the Statute in question is the law and must be obeyed. It is obvious that there is no such analogy between the two systems of jurisprudence as the learned Chief Justice suggests. The enactments to which attention has been directed do not seem to leave any room for implied prohibition, 'Expression facit cessare tacitum'. And the language of the Commonwealth Act indicates with sufficient clearance that its framers had not overlooked, as indeed it would be impossible to suppose they could have overlooked, the Constitution of each State of the new Commonwealth as declared and enacted by the Statutes under which they were created. It is quite true, as observed by Griffith C. J. in the above mentioned case of D'Emden v. Pedder that:

'When a particular form of legislative enactment, which has received authoritative interpretation, whether by judicial decision or by a long course of practice, is adopted in the framing of a later Statute, it is a sound rule of construction to hold that the words so adopted were intended by the legislature to bear the meaning which has been so put upon them.'

"But it is an extraordinary extension of such a principle to argue that a similarity, not of words, but of institutions, must necessarily carry with it as a consequence an identity in all respects. It is to be observed that the principle is variously stated in two of the cases to which their Lordships were referred as containing the reasons for the judgment under appeal. In D'Emden v. Pedder the learned Chief Justice says:

'We cannot disregard the fact that the Constitution of the Commonwealth was framed by a convention of representatives from the several colonies. We think that, sitting here, we are entitled to assume—what after all is a fact of public notoriety—that some, if not all, of the framers of that Constitution were familiar, not only with the Constitution of the United States, but with that of the Canadian Dominion and those of the British Colonies. When, therefore, under these circumstances, we find embodied in the Constitution provisions undistinguishable in substance, though varied in form, from provisions of the Constitution of the United States which had long since been judicially interpreted by the Supreme Court of that Republic, it is not an unreasonable inference that its framers intended that like provisions should receive like interpretation.'

"The first observation that arises upon this argument is that the Chief Justice does not state what are the provisions 'undistinguishable in substance, though varied in form.' And it is extremely difficult to understand the application of the principle involved unless the comparison is made clear by the juxtaposition of the provisions. The same learned judge, in Deakin v. Webb and Lyne v. Webb, 1 C.L.R. 585 at p. 606, says, as justifying his rejection of the relevancy of the distinction between the governments of the United States and the Constitution of the English monarchy, 'It is a matter of common knowledge that the framers of the Australian Constitution were familiar with the two great examples of English-speaking federations and deliberately adopted with regard to the distribution of powers the model of the United States in preference to that of the Canadian Dominion.'

"Again, it is somewhat difficult to know what it is to which the learned Judge refers, and the only explanation he gives is that 'they used language not verbally identical but synonymous for the purpose of defining that distribution.' It is, indeed, an expansion of the canon of interpretation in question to consider the knowledge of those who framed the Constitution and their supposed preferences for this or that model which might have been in their minds. Their Lordships are not able to acquiesce in any such principle of the interpretation. The legislature must have had in their minds the Constitution of the several States with respect to which the Act of Parliament which their Lordships are called upon to interpret was passed. The 114th section of the Constitution Act sufficiently shows that protection from interference on the part of the federal power was not lost sight of. It is impossible to suppose that the question now in debate was left to be decided upon an implied prohibition when the power to enact laws upon any subject whatsoever was before the legislature. For these reasons their Lordships are not able to acquiesce in the reasoning of the High Court judgments governing the judgment under appeal."

We have however a case of a Written Constitution in which the entries in the several lists are stated in meticulous details and where a great deal of care has been taken to provide a double enumeration of powers. In our Constitution, let it be noted, there are two complementary powers couched in express, precise and definite terms and there can be no valid reason for the acceptance of a broader interpretation of them in the way Supreme Court of America would be justified in bestowing upon them while interpreting the Constitution of that Country. (See the cases in India of—

- (1) Ram Krishna v. Municipal Committee, Kamptee AIR (1950) Supreme Court p. 11,
- (2) Kishori v. King, A.I.R. (1950) Federal Court p. 69;
- (3) Governor-General in Council v. The Province of Madras A.I.R. (1945) Privy Council p. 98. cases which tend to show that the Indian Courts have refused to apply the doctrine of implied powers in such broad terms).

98. Doctrine of incidental or ancillary powers

We have in our jurisprudence instead, however, the doctrine of incidental or ancillary powers, which may be regarded as a mild concoction of the doctrine of implied powers. Constitutional instruments have to be liberally interpreted and they must be deemed to have conferred incidental or ancillary powers in order that the expressed powers that have been enumerated may be effectively availed of. Even in England, in a case Small v. Smith reported in 10 Appeal Cases p. 119, of the year 1884, this doctrine has been invoked in the matter of interpreting the scope of statutory powers: (p. 129)

"Now I entirely adhere", said Earl of Selbourne, "to what was said in this House in the case of Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company, (1880) 5 Appeal Cases 413, that when you have got a main purpose expressed, and ample authority given to effectuate that main purpose, things which are incidental to it, and which may reasonably and properly be done and against which no express prohibition is found, may and ought, prima facie, to follow from the authority for effectuating the main purpose by proper and general means"

There must be for this doctrine to apply such a necessary connection between the expressed power and the power claimed to be implied that it could validly be said that the implied power is such as might reasonably be assumed to be incidental to the execution of the expressed power, or in the words of Earl of Sebbourne, whether the presumed power can be brought in as incidental to the main purpose and a thing reasonably to be done for effectuating it. (See also the Australian case, The Federal Commissioner of Taxation v. Official Liquidator of E.O. Farley Ltd. of the year 1940, reported in 63 C.L.R. 278 at p. 315).

The Privy Council, for instance, in the case reported in 4 Moo. Privy Council p. 203, held that the Colonial Legislature had the power to remove any obstruction offered to its deliberations and not the power to punish members for contempt. The power to punish must be expressly conferred and it cannot be implied as it was not necessary for self-preservation of the Legislature but the power to remove obstruction must be considered as an ancillary power for in the absence of such power the purpose for which Colonial Legislature was constituted will be stultified. (See also the Canadian case of Cushing v. Dupuy, reported in 5 Appeal Cases p. 409, of the year 1880, where it was held that it would be impossible to advance a step in the construction of a scheme for the administration of insolvent estates (Section 91 (2)) without interfering with and modifying some of the ordinary rights of property and other civil rights, Section 92(13), nor without providing some special mode of procedure, Section 92(14), for the vesting, realization and distribution of the estate.)

99. Doctrine of the "original package"

The doctrine of the "original package" in its application to the interpretation of the provisions of the Government of India Act was considered in the case of State of Bombay v. F.N. Balsara by the Supreme Court of India, reported in A.I.R. (1951) Supreme Court p. 318, and it was declared that this doctrine "has no place in this country, having regard to the scheme of legislation that has been outlined in the Government of India Act, 1935, and in the present Constitution, in which the various entries in the Legislative Lists have been expressed in clear and precise language."

This doctrine was stated in an American case, Brown v. Maryland, 1827, 25 U.S. 419 by Chief Justice Marshall. In order to understand the scope of the application of this doctrine in the system of American Constitutional Jurisprudence it is necessary to state the facts of this case:

The State in question required that importers of foreign goods by bale or package and sellers of such goods take out a licence for 50 dollars or pay a penalty. And the point that arose for consideration in the case was whether the legislature of a State could constitutionally require the importer of foreign articles to take out a licence from the State before he shall be permitted to sell a bale or package so imported. Chief Justice Marshall, in the opinion he rendered, affirmed the well known constitutional principle to the effect that there is a presumption in favour of the constitutionality of every legislative Act and remarked that the whole burden lies upon him who denies its constitutionality.

With regard to the interpretation of the U.S. Constitution, which provides that "No State shall without the consent of the Congress lay any imposts, or duties on imports, or exports except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws", Chief Justice Marshall observed :—

"Whether the prohibition to lay imposts, or duties on imports or exports, proceeded from an apprehension that the power might be so exercised as to disturb that equality among the States which was generally advantageous, or that harmony between them which it was desirable to preserve, or to maintain unimpaired our commercial connections with foreign nations, or to confer this source of revenue on the government of the Union, or whatever other motive might have induced the prohibition, it is plain that the object would be as completely defeated by a power to tax the article in the hands of the importer the instant it was landed as by a power to tax it while entering the port. There is no difference, in effect, between a power to prohibit the sale of an article and a power to prohibit its introduction into the country. The one would be a necessary consequence of the other. No goods would be imported if none could be sold. No object of any description can be accomplished by laying a duty on importation, which may not be accomplished with equal certainty by laying a duty on the thing imported in the hands of the importer. It is obvious that the same power which imposes a light duty can impose a very heavy one, one which amounts to a prohibition. Questions of power do not depend on the degree to which it may be exercised. If it may be exercised at all, it must be exercised at the will of those in whose hands it is placed . . . (at p. 439)

"Doctrine of the original package"

"The constitutional prohibition on the States to lay a duty on imports—a prohibition which a vast majority of them must feel an interest in preserving—may certainly come in conflict with their acknowledged power to tax persons and property within their territory. The power, and the restriction on it, though quite distinguishable when they do not approach each other, may yet, like the intervening colours between white and black, approach so nearly as to perplex the understanding, as colours perplex the vision in marking the distinction between them. Yet the distinction exists, and must be marked as the cases arise. Till they do arise, it might be premature to state any rule as being universal in its application. It is sufficient for the present to say, generally, that when the importer has so acted upon the thing imported that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it has, perhaps, lost its distinctive character as an import, and has become subject to the taxing power of the State; but while remaining the property of the importer, in his warehouse, in the original form or package in which it was imported, a tax upon it is too plainly a duty on imports to escape the prohibition in the Constitution . . ." (at p. 441).

Thus in effect it was held that imported goods, as long as they remained the property of the importers and in the original form or package, any state tax imposed in respect of them was an unconstitutional interference with Federal Taxing Power, but that after these same goods had been mixed up with the mass of property in the States they became liable to the incidence of State-taxation power. Even the American writers have pointed out the difficulty which has arisen from time to time in applying the "original package" doctrine, since sometimes very intricate questions arise before the Courts, such as whether the doctrine applied to the larger cases only or to the smaller packages contained therein, or whether it applied to smaller paper packages of cigarettes taken from loose piles of packages at the factory and transported in baskets. (See the case of "Leisy v. Hardin 135 U.S. 100 for a clearer statement of the American Doctrine of the Original Package).

In the case, The Province of Madras v. Boddu Paidanna & Sons (reported in (1942) Federal Court Reports, p. 90), Chief Justice, Maurice Gwyer, referred to the case of Brown v. Maryland but indicated his support not of the view of Mr. Marshall but to the reasoning of Thompson J. contained in the dissenting judgment in that case. The Chief Justice remarked :

"Next, it is to be observed that the American Constitution also provides that Congress alone has power 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes'; and it was held that the Maryland tax was no less repugnant to this provision also. Marshall C. J. asked : 'To what purposes should the power to allow importation be given, unaccompanied with the power to authorise the sale of the thing imported? Congress has a right, not only to authorise importation, but to authorise the importer to sell . . . What does the importer purchase, if he does not purchase the privilege to sell?' On this view of the Commerce Clause, it would indeed be difficult to recognise the right of the State to impose a tax upon the first sale of the commodity, at any rate so long as it remained in the importer's hands. In the Indian Constitution Act no such question arises; and the right of the Provincial Legislatures to levy a tax on sales can be considered without any reference to so formidable a power vested in the Central Government. Lastly, the prohibition in the American Constitution is against the laying of 'any imposts or duties on imports or exports'; the prohibition is not merely against the laying of duties of customs, but is expressed in what we conceive to be far wider terms; and it does not appear to us that it would necessarily follow from the principle of the Maryland decision that in India the payment of customs duty on goods imported from abroad or the payment of an excise duty on goods manufactured or produced in India can be regarded as conferring some kind of licence or title on the importer or manufacturer to sell his goods to any purchaser without incurring a further liability to tax. That was the view which commended itself to the Court in the Maryland case and it was a view adopted and argued before us. The analogy with the American case is an attractive one; but for the reasons which we have given we are wholly unable to accept it." (pp. 106-7).

Justice Mr. Fazal Ali, in the case referred to above (State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara, 1951 S.C. p. 318) after reviewing the case-law in America and India, concluded by observing, as has been indicated earlier, that the "original package" doctrine has no application to this country. "In the United States", he observed, "the widest meaning could be given to the Commerce Clause, for there was no question of reconciling that Clause with another Clause containing the legislative power of the State. Under the provisions of the Government of India Act, a limited meaning must be given to the word "import" in entry 19 of List I, in order to give effect to the very general words used in entry 31 of List II. (Entry 31 in List II reads as follows :—

'Intoxicating liquors and narcotic drugs, that is to say, the production, manufacture, possession, transport, purchase and sale of intoxicating liquors, opium and other narcotic drugs, but subject as respects opium to the provisions of List I, and as respects position and dangerous drugs, to the provisions of List III').

For provision as to the freedom of inter-provincial trade contained in our constitution see Act. 119.

100. Doctrine of Severability

The Doctrine of severability has reference to the practice of the Courts to declare the whole Act as void, if portions of the Act that are clearly shown to be ultra vires are such that when they are struck down the rest of the Act would not be able to survive. This doctrine has been stated in the case Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, in 1947 Appeal Cases p. 503, at p. 518. Their Lordships of the Privy Council in that case observe:—

"The real question is whether what remains is so inextricably bound up with the part declared invalid that what remains cannot independently survive or, as it has sometimes been put, whether on a fair review of the whole matter it can be assumed that the Legislature would have enacted what survives without enacting the part that is ultra vires at all." (at p. 518).

In each case, therefore, it is a question for argument whether or not upon the Court coming to the conclusion that certain portions of the Act are beyond the law-making powers of the Legislature, the whole of the Act will be declared void. The test laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council, in any case is not easy to apply, but that it is the only test that can be applied, appears to be a matter beyond dispute:

See also: (a) A.I.R. (1950) S.C. 27, Gopalan v. State of Madras. (b) A.I.R. (1939) F.C. 74. Shyamakant v. Rambajan (c) A.I.R. (1952) Nag. 111. New Motor Transport Co. v. R. T. Authority; and (d) A.I.R. (1952) S.C. 252. State of Bihar v. Kameshwar Singh.

In an earlier case, Natural Products Marketing Act case, (Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada, (1937) A.C. 377), the question with regard to the application of doctrine of severability arose in the following way:

A certain portion of the Act of Parliament, which provided for the regulation of marketing of natural products, was declared invalid and the question was whether this could be severed and the remaining portion of the Act held valid. Section 9 of the impugned Act purported to deal with provincial or export trade only, and Part II of the Act was attempted to be supported on the basis that it related to criminal law and was therefore valid. There was another provision, namely section 26, which contained an indication of Parliament's intention to the effect that the valid portions should be treated as severable from the invalid provisions. S.26 was in the following terms:

"If it be found that Parliament has exceeded its powers in the enactment of one or more of the provisions of this Act, none of the other or remaining provisions of the Act shall, therefore, be held to be ultra vires, but the latter provisions shall stand as if they had been originally enacted as separate and independent enactments and as the only provisions of the Act; the intention of the Parliament being to give independent effect to the extent of its powers to every enactment and provision in this Act."

Lord Atkin, dealing with the contention that effect should be given to S.26, observed:—

"There appear to be two answers. In the first place, it appears to their Lordships that the whole texture of the Act is inextricably interwoven, and that neither S.9 nor Part II can be contemplated as existing independently of the provisions as to the creation of a Board and the regulation of products. There are no separate and independent enactments to which S.26 could give real existence. In the second place, both the Dominion and British Columbia in their cases filed on this appeal assert that the sections now said to be severable are incidental and ancillary to the main legislation. Their Lordships are of opinion that this is true; and that as the main legislation is invalid as being in pith and substance an encroachment upon the Provincial rights the sections referred to must fall with it as being in part merely ancillary to it."

Reference may also be made to the cases of:

- (1) In re The Initiative and Referendum case, (1919) A.C. 935;
- (2) The Great West Saddlery Company v. The King, (1921) 2 A.C. 91;
- (3) Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Attorney-General for Canada, (1925) A.C. 561 at p. 568; and finally,
- (4) Lymburn v. Mayland, (1932) A.C. 318, and to the following Indian cases:
- (5) Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 27,
- (6) Shyamakant v. Rambajan, AIR (1939) F.C. 74,
- (7) New Motor Transport Co. v. Regional Transport Authority, AIR (1952) Nagpur 111; and
- (8) State of Bihar v. Kameshwar Singh AIR (1952) S.C. 252.

In the case of New South Wales and another v. Commonwealth and another (1915) 20 C.L.R. 54, Isaacs J. recalled the reliance he had placed on the observations of Lopes, L.J. in Kearney v. Whitehaven Colliery Co. in the case reported in (1911) 12 C.L.R.: those remarks are often cited (See (1893) 1 Q.B. 700 at p. 713)) and represent, in the present writer's opinion the best that has been said on that subject:

"Where some of the provisions are legal and others illegal, the illegality of those which are bad does not communicate itself to, or contaminate, those which are good, unless they are inseparable from and dependent upon one another."

See also the case of Muhammad Ali & Sons v. The Chief Commissioner for Karachi PLD (1957) Karachi 320, where doctrine of severability has been discussed by Waheedudin J.

In the case of R.M.D. Chamarbaugwalla v. Union of India, AIR (1957) S.C. 628, the Supreme Court of India has summarised the rules of construction laid down by the American Courts in cases where the question of severability has been the subject of their consideration as follows :

"1. In determining whether the valid parts of a statute are separable from the invalid parts thereof, it is the intention of the legislature that is the determining factor. The test to be applied is whether the legislature would have enacted the valid part if it had known that the rest of the statute was invalid. (Vide Corpus Juris Secundum, Vol. 82, p. 156; Sutherland on Statutory Construction, Vol. 2, pp. 176-177.)

"2. If the valid and invalid provisions are so inextricably mixed up that they cannot be separated from one another, then the invalidity of a portion must result in the invalidity of the Act in its entirety. On the other hand, if they are so distinct and separate that after striking out what is invalid, what remains is in itself a complete code independent of the rest, then it will be upheld notwithstanding that the rest has become unenforceable. (Vide Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, Vol. I at pp. 360-361; Crawford on Statutory Construction, pp. 217-218).

"3. Even when the provisions which are valid are distinct and separate from those which are invalid, if they all form part of a single scheme which is intended to be operative as a whole, then also the invalidity of a part will result in the failure of the whole. (Vide Crawford on Statutory Construction, pp. 218-219.)

"4. Likewise, when the valid and invalid parts of a statute are independent and do not form part of a scheme but what is left after omitting the invalid portion is so thin and truncated as to be in substance different from what it was when it emerged out of the legislature, then also it will be rejected in its entirety.

"5. The separability of the valid and invalid provisions of a statute does not depend on whether the law is enacted in the same section or different sections; (Vide Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, Vol. I, pp. 361-362); it is not the form, but the substance of the matter that is material, and that has to be ascertained on an examination of the Act as a whole and of the setting of the relevant provision therein.

"6. If after the invalid portion is expunged from the statute what remains cannot be enforced without making alterations and modifications therein, then the whole of it must be struck down as void, as otherwise it will amount to judicial legislation. (Vide Sutherland on Statutory Construction, Vol. 2, p. 194.)

"7. In determining the legislative intent on the question of separability, it will be legitimate to take into account the history of the legislation, its object, the title and the preamble to it. (Vide Sutherland on Statutory Construction, Vol. 2, pp. 177-178.)"

101. The Constitutional Relationship of the President with the Governor

Federal Principle and the Executive.

The Governor of a Province is appointed by the President under ART. 70, and holds office during his pleasure. This virtually means that the Governor is a nominee of the Cabinet at the Centre. Governor has certain constitutional responsibilities in the matter of appointment of the Chief Minister, his dismissal etc., and these are to be exercised by him in his discretion. He has practically the same relationship to the administration of Provincial affairs, as the President has to the administration of Federal affairs. Under 7th Clause of ART. 71, it is declared :

"In the exercise of his functions, the Governor shall act in accordance with the advice of the Cabinet or the appropriate Minister, as the case may be, except in cases where he is empowered by the Constitution to act in his discretion, and except as respects the exercise of his powers under clause (6)" (which says that Chief Minister shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor but the Governor shall not exercise his powers under this clause unless he is satisfied that the Chief Minister does not command the confidence of the majority of the members of the Provincial Assembly.)

The question that arises for determination upon the analysis of this provision is : Whether when the Governor acts in his discretion, does he act on his own or is he to act under the superintendence and control of the President, that is the Federal Cabinet ? There is no direct provision in the Constitution one way or the other which may throw light on this problem. The Government of India Act, 1935, as adapted in Pakistan, however, in the 5th clause of section 51 had provided as follows :

"In the exercise of his functions under this section with respect to the choosing and summoning and the dismissal of Ministers the Governor shall be under the general control of, and comply with such particular directions, if any, as may from time to time be given to him by the Governor-General."

The substance of this clause is not reflected in any of the provisions of our Constitution, and the omission to incorporate the principle of it does give rise to the inference that the Governor under our Constitution is not, when acting in the exercise of his discretionary functions, under the directions and control of the Federal Cabinet. He is, while acting within this sphere, immune from interference from any extraneous source whatever. That is the constitutional position. But then, this position is somewhat anomalous in that the Governor holds the appointment at the pleasure of the President and, what is more, unlike the President he is not elected by any electoral College, but appointed under Ministerial advice from the Federal Cabinet. Could it be said under these circumstances that when the Governor is to act in his discretion he is to act all on his own? If that is the case, then he is not responsible to any one save to his conscience and to the oath of office taken by him, which is "To faithfully discharge the duties of the office of the Governor of the Province according to law." He cannot even be impeached in the manner in which the President can be impeached and should he misconduct himself the only thing that can happen is that he would be removed from office.

In such circumstances could it ever be said that the Governor is a delegate of the Federal Cabinet; to be more precise: is he the agent, who derives his authority from and, therefore, owes loyalty to, the Federal Government whose nominee he admittedly is? Consideration of this question is, from the constitutional point of view, of utmost importance, for upon the answer that we give to it, must depend our answer to another question, namely whether or not the Provincial administration in so far as the Governor can deal with it in his discretion is in a subordinate position vis-a-vis the Federal Government.

In the case of "Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. The Receiver-General of New Brunswick", decided in 1892, (1892 A.C. 437), their Lordships of the Privy Council made certain observation with regard to the Constitutional relationship that subsists between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of the province. It is submitted that the case is relevant and may, if applicable to the constitutional position on the same subject in our country, be of the utmost assistance.

In that case, the question was one of determining the relations between the Crown and the Province. The facts of the case were that the Provincial Government of New Brunswick was claiming priority in respect of payment due to itself in preference to other depositors and simple contract creditors of the Maritime Bank of Canada. The Supreme Court of the New Brunswick as also the Supreme Court of Canada held that the claim of Provincial Government amounted to a Crown debt to which prerogative attaches and, therefore, it was entitled to receive a prior recognition. Their Lordships of the Privy Council upheld this decision as being in strict accordance with constitutional law and proceeded to observe :

Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada vs. Receiver-General of New Brunswick.

"The property and revenues of the Dominion are vested in the sovereign, subject to the disposal and appropriation of the Legislature of Canada; and the prerogative of the Queen, when it has not been expressly limited by local law and statute, is as extensive in her Majesty's colonial possession as in Great Britain. In Exchange Bank of Canada v. The Queen, (1886) L.J.R. 55, P.C.C. 5, this Board disposed of the appeal on that footing, although their Lordships reversed the judgment of the Court below, and negatived the preference claimed by the Dominion Government upon the ground that, by the law of the Province of Quebec, the prerogative was limited to the case of the common debtor being an officer liable to account to the Crown for public moneys collected or held by him. The appellants did not impeach the authority of these cases, and they also conceded that, until the passing of the British North America Act 1867, there was precisely the same relation between the Crown and the Province which now subsists between the Crown and the Dominion. But they maintained that the effect of the statute has been to sever all connections between the Crown and the Provinces; to make the Government of the Dominion the only Government of Her Majesty in North America; and to reduce the Provinces to the rank of independent municipal institutions. For these propositions, which contain the sum and substance of the arguments addressed to them in support of this appeal, their Lordships have been unable to find either principle or authority. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to examine, in minute detail, the provisions of the Act of 1867, which nowhere professes to curtail in any respect the rights and privileges of the Crown, or to disturb the relations then subsisting between the sovereign and the Provinces. The object of the Act was neither to weld the Provinces into one, nor to subordinate Provincial Governments to a central authority, but to create a Federal Government in which they should all be represented, entrusted with the exclusive administration of affairs in which they had a common interest, each Province retaining its independence and autonomy. The object was accomplished by distributing, between the Dominion and the Provinces, all powers executive and legislative, and all public property and revenues which had previously belonged to the Provinces; so that the Dominion Government should be vested with such of these powers, property, and revenues as were necessary for the due performance of its constitutional functions, and that the remainder should be retained by the Provinces for the purpose of Provincial Government. But, in so far as regards those matters which, by S.92, are especially reserved for Provincial Legislation, the legislation of each Province continues to be free from the control of the Dominion, and as supreme as it was before the passing of the Act.

"Hodge v. The Queen".

"In Hodge v. The Queen, (1883) 9 A.C. p. 117, L.J.R. 53, P.C.C. 1, Lord Fitzgerald, delivering the opinion of this Board said :—

"When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a Legislature for Ontario and that its Legislative Assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the Province and for Provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in S.92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by S.92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area, the local legislature is supreme and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion.

"The Act places the constitutions of all Provinces within the Dominion on the same level; and what is true with respect to the Legislature of Ontario has equal application to the Legislature of New Brunswick."

"It is clear, therefore, that the Provincial Legislature of New Brunswick does not occupy the subordinate position which was ascribed to it in the argument of the appellants. It derives no authority from the Government of Canada, and its status is in no way analogous to that of a municipal institution, which is an authority constituted for purposes of local administration. It possesses powers, not of administration merely, but of legislation, in the strictest sense of that word; and, within the limits assigned by S.92 of the Act of 1867, these powers are exclusive and supreme. It would require very express language, such as is not to be found in the Act of 1867, to warrant the inference that the Imperial Legislature meant to vest in the Provinces of Canada the right of exercising supreme legislative powers in which the British Sovereign was to have no share.

"In asking their Lordships to draw that inference from the terms of the statute, the appellants mainly, if not wholly, relied upon the fact that, whereas the Governor-General of Canada is directly appointed by the Queen, the Lieutenant-Governor of a Province is appointed, not by Her Majesty, but by the Governor-General, who has also the power of dismissal. If the Act had not committed to the Governor-General the power of appointing and removing Lieutenant-Governors, there would have been no room for the argument, which, if pushed to its logical conclusion, would prove that the Governor-General, and not the Queen, whose Viceroy he is, became the sovereign authority of the Province whenever the Act of 1867 came into operation. But the argument ignores the fact that, by S.58, the appointment of a Provincial Governor is made by the 'Governor-General-in-Council', or, in other words, by the Executive Government of the Dominion, which is, by S.9, expressly declared 'to continue and be vested in the Queen'. There is no constitutional anomaly in an executive officer of the Crown receiving his appointment at the hands of a governing body who have no powers and no functions except as representatives of the Crown. The Act of the Governor-General and his Council in making the appointment was, within the meaning of the statute, the act of the Crown; and a Lieutenant-Governor, when appointed, was as much the representative of Her Majesty for all purposes of Provincial Government as the Governor-General himself was for all purposes of Dominion Government."

If for the word "Crown" occurring in the judgment of their Lordships, we were to substitute the word "Constitution" then, it is the view of the present writer that the constitutional position described by their Lordships as subsisting between Crown and the Lieutenant-Governor of Provinces in Canada would virtually be the same as in our Constitution subsisting between the Constitution and the Governor.

A Governor is not then a delegate of the Federal Government and the administration of the Provincial affairs is no more subordinate to the authority of the Federal Government than is the Lieutenant-Governor of the Brunswick Province under the Canadian Constitution to the Governor-General of that Dominion.

If the view taken of the constitutional relationship visualised by the framers of our Constitution is valid, it would follow that at least one of the essential requirements of the Federal principle would be deemed to have been complied with by the framers of our constitution, namely that the Provinces in normal times at least enjoy an autonomous status in the exercise of the powers (be they legislative or executive) that have been reserved to them under the Constitution.

Both the Federal and the Provincial Governments' sphere of authority, executive and legislative, is controlled by the terms of the Constitution and each within its own sphere is completely independent of the other. Both the President and the Governor are assigned the duty of operating the constitutional mechanism designed by the framers of the Constitution, and the spheres of their authority are distinct and at several points independent of each other. If we see the provisions of Part VII which deals with "Proerty, Contracts and Suits", we see the same position substantiated. All property, for instance, which has no rightful owner or which but for the enactment of the Constitution would have accrued to Her Majesty by escheat or lapse or as bona vacantia for want of a rightful owner, shall, if it is property situate in a Province, vest in the Provincial Government, and shall, in any other case, vest in the Federal Government. The property which at the date when it would have accrued to Her Majesty was in the possession or under the control of the Federal Government or a Provincial Government shall, according as the purposes for which it was then held were purposes of the Federation or of a Province, vest in the Federal Government or the Provincial Government, as the case may be. (See ART. 133). The same principle is affirmed in ART. 134 which acknowledges distinct authority of the Federation and the Provinces to acquire property for their respective purposes, to enter into contracts (ART. 135), sue and be sued in the name of Pakistan and the Government of a Province as the case may be respectively. (See ART. 136).

A unique feature of our Constitution consists in this that in so far as the machinery of election, as also the apparatus of administration, namely the public services, are concerned, they are controlled by the Federal Executive at several points and what is more the judiciary in our country is one and indivisible whole and we have not, in our Constitution any distinction made between the Provincial and the Federal Judiciary in the sense that administration of Provincial and Federal laws have been relegated to diverse and to two separate judicial systems, as is the case in the United States. These provisions make a serious departure from the requirements of the Federal Principle.

102. Immunity of the President and Governors from judicial process

Art. 213

Both the President and the Governor enjoy immunity from judicial process. Under ART. 213 neither the President nor the Governor of a Province "shall be answerable to any court for the exercise of powers and performance of duties of his office, or for any act done or purported to be done in the exercise of those powers and performance of those duties." In other words, the President and the Governor enjoy immunity in respect of those acts or omissions that are connected with the exercise of powers and performance of duties assigned to them by the Constitution. The protection is absolute and unqualified and is not limited to being made available only during the continuance of their office. The formulation of the Article is somewhat awkward and clumsy in that, strictly construed, the protection enjoyable by them is only in respect of their being answerable to any court. There may be quasi-judicial forums and administrative authorities that are not courts stricto sensu, but all the same the liability of the President and the Governor to be proceeded against in respect of the exercise of their powers and performance of their duties could be enforced by them. It is, however, clear that the word 'court' is loosely employed to indicate all judicial authorities that have under the law the power to finally dispose of rights and liabilities of the litigants before them. It is not clear whether the President or the Governor are suable as ordinary citizens in respect of crimes and misdemeanours committed by them. On the plain construction of the Article it would appear that what is protected from being enquired into by courts is a class of acts and omissions which has reference to the exercise, actual or professed, of their powers and performance of their duties and not in respect of their personal acts and omissions like contracting debts and not paying them, or committing offences punishable under law. It would, therefore, appear that the constitutional immunity of the President and the Governor under our constitution is of a restricted variety.

Under the Government of India Act, 1935, in Section 306 (1) it was provided as follows :

"No proceedings whatsoever shall lie in, and no process whatsoever shall issue

Act (S. 306)
1935.

from, any court in India against the Governor-General, against the Governor of a Province, or against the Secretary of State, whether in a personal capacity or otherwise, and, except with the sanction of His Majesty in Council, no proceedings whatsoever shall lie in any court in India against any person who has been the Governor-General, the Governor of a Province, or the Secretary of State in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by any of them during his term of office in performance, or purported performance, of the duties thereof:

Provided that nothing in this section shall be construed as restricting the right of any person to bring against the Federation, a Province, or the Secretary of State such proceedings as are mentioned in Chapter III of Part VII of this Act."

This provision was calculated to render the person of the President and the Governor sacrosanct and inviolable so long as the relevant office was held by them under the Constitution Act, and their liability to be dealt with under the law was expressly made subject to the condition regarding production of sanction of His Majesty in Council for the initiation of any proceedings in respect of anything done or omitted to be done by any of them during his term of office in the performance or purported performance of the duties thereof. Thus in order that acts and omissions committed in their personal capacity could at all be enquired into by a court of law, it was essential that they should not at the relevant time be in office. After they cease to hold office they could be proceeded against as though they were ordinary citizens. But if it was sought to proceed against them in respect of the performance of their official duty, sanction of His Majesty in Council was necessary.

The present Indian Constitution makes elaborate provisions regarding the protection of the President and the Governors of the State apart from giving to them the kind of immunity extended to the President and the Governor in our Constitution. The Indian Constitution further provides that no criminal proceedings whatsoever shall be instituted or continued against the President, or the Governor of a State in any Court during his term of office, and no process for their arrest shall issue from any court during their term of office. (See ART. 361(2) and (3)). In respect of civil proceedings in which relief is claimed against the President or the Governor, it is the requirement of the Indian Constitution that no proceeding shall be instituted against them during their term of office in any court in respect of any act done or purporting to be done by them in their personal capacity, whether before or after they entered upon their office as such President or Governor, until the expiration of two months next after a notice in writing has been delivered to them or left at their office stating the nature of the proceedings, the cause of action therefor, the name, description and place of residence of the party by whom such proceedings are to be instituted and the relief which he claims. (See ART. 361, Cl. (4)).

The position in the American Constitution may now be briefly stated. There is no clear provision in the United States Constitution with regard to the immunity of the President from compulsory judicial process, but the judicial pronouncements of the United States Supreme Court in Marbury v. Madison, (1803) 2 L.Edn. p. 60, referred to earlier as also during the trial of Aaron Burr for treason (see Burr's Trial 111,37, published at Washington, 1807) make it plain that the President enjoys complete immunity from the reach of judicial process. In the case of Mississippi v. Johnson decided in 1867, (4 Wall-475) the basis of the immunity of the President was stated by the counsel as follows :—

"It is not upon any peculiar immunity that the individual has, who happens to be President, upon any idea that there is any particular sanctity belonging to him as an individual, as in the case with one who has royal blood in his veins; but it is on account of the office that he holds that I say the President of the United States is above the process of any court, or the jurisdiction of any court, to bring him to account as President. There

Position
under the U.S.
Constitution.

is only one court, or quasi-court that he can be called upon to answer to for any dereliction of duty, for doing anything that is contrary to law or failing to do anything which is according to law, and that is not this tribunal, but one that sits in another chamber of this Capital. There he can be called and tried and punished, but not here while as President, and after he has been dealt with in that chamber and stripped of the robes of office, and he no longer stands as the representative of the government, then, for any wrong he has done to any individual, for murder or any crime of any sort which he has committed as President, then and not till then can he be subjected to the jurisdiction of the courts. Then it is the individual they deal with, not the representative of the people."

These submissions were made by the counsel who appeared in the above case where a perpetual injunction to restrain the President from executing Reconstruction Acts was sought from the Court on the ground that the Acts, the President was about to execute, were unconstitutional. The argument proceeded on the pre-supposition that there was no allegation that the President was about to do anything of his own motion which as President he was not authorised to do. The allegation which was the foundation of the action was that the President was about to execute certain laws passed by the Congress. The court disposed of the controversy by refusing to issue the necessary writ declaring that "An attempt on the part of the Judicial Department of the Government to enforce the performance of such duties by the President might be justly characterised, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, as 'an absurd and excessive extravagance'. In a later case, Georgia v. Stanton, (6 Wall. 50), a similar prayer to restrain the Secretary of War and other military officers from executing Reconstruction Acts was also turned down by the court.

As to the right of the citizen to proceed against the Government, Provincial or Federal, this Article not only imposes no fetter upon it but makes it clear that the immunity it has extended to the President and the Governor will not be so construed as to restrict such a right as is otherwise available to bring action against the appropriate Government.

103. Administrative Relations between the Federation and the Provinces to 132.

ARTS. 125

ARTS. 125 to 132 provide for the administrative relations between the Federation and the Provinces. The Federal Government has been charged with the duty of protecting each Province against external aggression and internal disturbance, and to ensure, subject to the provisions relating to emergency, that the Government in every Province is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution (ART. 125). It is inherent in the concept of overall responsibility for defence of the country that has been imposed upon the Federal Government that it should also be made responsible in the matter of safeguarding the Provinces against external aggression. Considering that in the Fifth Schedule the defence of Pakistan and any part thereof, and all acts and measures in connection therewith, as also the control over the Naval, Military and Air Forces of Pakistan, are matters with respect to which the Federal legislative and executive authority is empowered to take action, the only provision which ART. 125 makes is that it imposes upon the Federal Government the duty of protecting Provinces against external aggression. Similarly, the requirement that the Provinces be safeguarded against internal disturbances, as being within the legislative and executive authority of the Federation, could be inferred from entry 18 of List I, of Fifth Schedule, which provides for the preventive detention for reasons in connection with defence, foreign affairs, or the security of Pakistan and persons subjected to such detention.

Under Article 126 the Provinces are required to exercise their executive authority in such a manner as to ensure compliance with Acts of Parliament and existing laws which apply to that Province, and further they are directed so to act as not to impede or prejudice the exercise of the authority of the Federal Government. The executive authority of the Federation extends to the giving of such direction to a Province as may appear to the Federal Government to be necessary for confining the executive power of the Province to the limits put upon it by the foregoing provisions. Directions could also be given to Provinces with regard to matters enumerated in sub-clauses (a) to (d) of clause (2) of ART. 126. Provision has also been made to reimburse the Provincial Government in cases where Federal directions are being given under sub-clauses (a) and (b) of clause (2) of ART. 126. Any differences and disputes with regard to the quantum of amounts payable, shall be decided according to the procedure prescribed in ART. 129. The President may, with the consent of the Provincial Government, entrust either conditionally or unconditionally to the Provincial Government, or to any officer thereof, functions in relation to any matter to which the executive authority of the Federation extends. Even by an Act of Parliament such powers could be conferred, duties imposed upon a Provincial officer or authorities thereof, that is, powers and duties in respect of matters outside the normal Provincial legislative and executive competence. In any such event, however, the Provincial Government shall be paid such sums as may be agreed to, and in default of such agreement, procedure under ART. 129 would be resorted to, for the determination of the amounts payable in respect of expenditure incurred by the Province in connection with the carrying out of duties that are thus imposed on the Provincial Government (ART. 127). ART. 128 confers power on the Federal Government to acquire any land situate in any Province provided its acquisition is connected with a matter with respect to which Parliament has the power to make laws. It can also require the Provincial Government to acquire land on its behalf and at the expense of the Federal Government. In the event of any disputes with regard to terms on which this acquisition of land could be secured, procedure prescribed in ART. 129 will be resorted to.

ART. 129 mentions the procedure for resolution of disputes between the Federation and Provincial Governments in respect of matters which under the law or the Constitution are not within the cognizance of the Supreme Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction. The Chief Justice of Pakistan is empowered to appoint a Tribunal to settle the disputes and the Supreme Court has the power, subject to the approval by the President, to make rules regulating the practice of any such Tribunal. The Chief Justice on receiving the report "shall determine whether the purpose for which the Tribunal was appointed has been carried out, and shall return the report to the Tribunal for reconsideration if he is of the opinion that the purpose has not been carried out." If, however, the report is in order he shall forward it to the President, who shall make such order as may be necessary to give effect to the report. Any law made by the Provincial Legislature, which is repugnant to the order of the President, shall, to the extent of the repugnancy be void. The order made by the President may be varied by him in accordance with the agreement made by the parties to the disputes (ART. 129). ART. 131 makes special provision with regard to broadcasting, and ART. 132 provides for the method for the transfer of Railways to Provincial control.

ART. 130 provides for the establishment of Inter-Provincial Council charged with the duty of investigating and discussing subjects in which the Provinces or the Federation and either one or both of the Provinces, have common cause for making recommendations for the better co-ordination of policy and action with respect to that subject. This Council can be established by the President at any time it appears to him that the public interest demands the establishment of such a Council. One fails to understand the necessity of having the ART. 130 at all incorporated in the Constitution—for even in its absence such a Council can always be established by the President in pursuance of the powers of the Federal Government to secure co-ordination in the administrative fields reserved to it and the Provincial Governments under the Constitution.

104. Emergency Relations between Federation and the Province

Part XI of our Constitution should, logically considered, have been included in the Part entitled 'Relations between the Federation and the Provinces', because practically all its provisions have reference to the abnormal powers which, under the stress of emergency proclaimed in the manner required by those provisions, are made available to the Federation with respect to matters that ordinarily fall within the jurisdiction of legislative and executive authority of the Provinces. ART. 196, which empowers the Parliament to pass what are called "Indemnity Acts", does not, strictly speaking, fit in with the scheme of that Part for the simple reason that the competence of the Parliament to pass laws of indemnity has nothing to do with the existence of emergency. Martial Law can supplant the ordinary law although the proclamation of emergency is not in force. Similarly, the provision with regard to the President's power to suspend fundamental rights during emergency period should have been more appropriately located in Part II relating to Fundamental Rights.

There are, under our Constitution, three kinds of proclamations of emergency:—

(1) Proclamation of Emergency arising out of War etc.

To be issued upon the President being satisfied that a grave emergency exists in which the security or economic life of Pakistan, or any part thereof, is threatened by war or external aggression, or by internal disturbance beyond the power of a Provincial Government to control. (ART. 191 (1)).

(2) Proclamation consequent upon the failure of Provincial Constitutional Machinery.

To be issued by the President upon being satisfied on a report from the Governor of a Province that a situation has arisen in which the government of the Province cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. (ART. 193 (1)).

(3) Proclamation of Financial Emergency :

To be issued upon the President being satisfied that a situation has arisen whereby the financial stability or credit of Pakistan, or any part thereof, is threatened. (ART. 194 (1)). This proclamation can issue in the province only after consultation with the Governor of the Province concerned.

Any of the foregoing proclamations of emergency may be varied or revoked by a subsequent proclamation, and the validity of any such proclamation issued or order made under this Part shall not be questioned in any Court. (ART. 195).

The consequences resulting from and the extent of power that gets vested in the Federation in each of the foregoing types of proclamation of emergency are different.

We will take them in the serial order.

(1) First type of Emergency:

(a) While this type of proclamation is in operation, Parliament acquires the power to make laws for a Province or any part thereof with respect to any matter not enumerated in the Federal or the Concurrent List. In other words, the Parliament invades the Provincial field as it is defined by S.105 read with relevant List in the Fifth Schedule as also the residuary field which has been vested in the Provinces under our Constitution. (ART. 191(2) (a)).

The power of the Parliament to make laws for a Province with respect to any matter "shall also include the power to make laws conferring powers and imposing duties, or authorising the conferring of powers and the imposition of duties upon the Federation, or officers and authorities of the Federation as respects that matter." (ART. 191 (3)).

The capacity or the competence of the Federal Legislature to invade the Provincial legislative and executive authority does not prejudice the right of the Provincial Legislature to make any law which ordinarily under the Constitution it has the power to make, but should there be inconsistency between any provisions of Federal law which Parliament enacts in consequence of the proclamation of emergency and the provisions of Provincial Law, the Federal law, no matter whether passed before or after the Provincial law, shall prevail and the Provincial law to the extent of the repugnancy, but so long only as the Federal law continues to have effect, be void. Such a law has the further attribute of remaining alive throughout the period of the existence of emergency and six months after the cessation of the operation of the proclamation of emergency; whereafter it lapses, except in respect of things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said period. (ART. 191 (3), (4), (5)).

(b) The executive authority of the Federation gets extended to the giving of directions to a Province as to the manner in which the executive authority of the Province is to be exercised. (ART. 191 (2) (b)).

(c) The President may by order assume to himself, or direct the Governor of a Province to assume on behalf of the President, all or any of the functions of the Government of the Province, and all or any of the powers vested in, or exercisable by, any body or authority in the Province other than the Provincial Legislature. He can make such incidental or consequential provisions as appear to him to be necessary or desirable for giving effect to the objects of the Proclamation, including provisions for suspending in whole or in part, the operation of any provisions of the Constitution relating to any Body or Authority in the Province. (ART. 191 (2) (c)).

But all this authority is subject to the limitation that the powers vested in or exercisable by a High Court cannot be taken away by the President. (See proviso to ART. 191 (2) (c)).

(d) If a Proclamation issued under ART. 191 is in operation, the President may, by Order, declare that the right to move any court for the enforcement of such of the rights conferred by Part II as may be specified in the Order, and all proceedings pending in any court for the enforcement of any such right, shall remain suspended for the period during which the Proclamation is in force. (ART. 192 (1)).

(e) The President, while the Proclamation is in operation, also has the power to order that the proviso to clause (1) of ART. 50, (which says that at least one session of the National Assembly in each year shall be held at Dacca), shall be suspended. (ART. 192 (2)).

(f) A Proclamation issued under ART. 191 is to be laid before the National Assembly as soon as conditions make it practicable for the President to summon that Assembly, and if approved by the Assembly, shall remain in force until it is revoked, or if disapproved, shall cease to operate from the date of disapproval. (ART. 191 (6)). It would appear that the expression, "as soon as conditions make it practicable", do refer to what might be called a justiciable issue; although the discretion of the President in this behalf that is, his discretion to determine whether or not conditions exist in which the summoning by him of the National Assembly is practicable, would not be lightly disregarded by the Courts. Courts would interfere only in the clearest of cases where it is made to appear to them that the delay made by the President in summoning the National Assembly is indefensible and altogether unjustified.

(g) A Proclamation of emergency declaring that the security of Pakistan or any part thereof is threatened by war or external aggression may be made before the actual occurrence of war or any such aggression, if the President is satisfied that there is an imminent danger thereof. (ART. 191).

(2) Second type of Emergency :

When the Proclamation of the kind mentioned in ART. 193, to the effect that a situation has arisen in which the government of a Province cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, is made, following consequences result:

The President may, by proclamation :

(a) Assume to himself, or direct the Governor of the Province to assume on his behalf, all or any of the functions of the Government of the Province, and all or any of the powers vested in, or exercisable by, any Body or Authority in the Province, other than the Provincial Legislature, as also other than the High Court. (See ART. 193 (1) (a) and the proviso thereto).

(b) Declare that the powers of the Provincial Legislature shall be exercisable by, or under the authority of, Parliament. It would appear that by virtue of this provision Parliament can legislate for the Province or direct another external agency to exercise such legislative functions as may be delegated. It is not necessary that the Parliament should directly exercise the legislative powers vested by the Constitution in the Provincial Legislature; instead, it can by passing a law create the necessary agency and charge it with the duty of exercising the powers of Provincial Legislature. (ART. 193 (1)(b))

(c) Make such incidental and consequential provisions as appear to the President to be necessary or desirable for giving effect to the objects of the Proclamation, including provisions for suspending in whole or in part the operation of any provisions of the Constitution relating to any body or authority in the Province other than the High Court. (ART. 193 (1) (c)).

A Proclamation issued under ART. 193 is to be placed before the National Assembly and "shall cease to operate at the expiration of two months, unless before the expiration of that period it has been approved by a resolution of the National Assembly." The National Assembly can also extend the life of the Proclamation for a further period not exceeding four months. No such Proclamation, however, can remain in force for more than six months, unless of course, during the continuance of such a Proclamation, the National Assembly stands dissolved, in which case, its life gets prolonged until such time as the National Assembly meets and 30 days thereafter. This period of 30 days can be further shortened by a resolution. But such a Proclamation would continue to operate if a resolution approving the Proclamation has been passed by the Assembly. In any case such a period cannot extend the total life of the Proclamation which is six months. That period gets extended only when the National Assembly having been dissolved is not able to prolong the life of the Proclamation, in which case, however, the Proclamation can get indefinitely prolonged and its life would expire only after the expiration of a period of 30 days after its first meeting. (ART. 193 (2))

The language of the second clause of ART. 193 is of doubtful import and incapable of being defended. Obviously there is a great deal of confusion introduced by the idea conveyed in the following words.

A Proclamation . . . shall cease to operate at the expiration of 2 months "unless before the expiration of that period it has been approved by a resolution of the National Assembly."

The ordinary life of the Proclamation of Emergency under this clause is two months: that is understandable—but what is not understandable is the clause that follows: "unless before the expiration of that period it has been approved by a resolution of the National Assembly". Why should this life of 2 months be interfered with by a resolution of approval passed by the Assembly? Is the word "approved" occurring in the second clause not a mistake for the word disapproved? One can see the reason for the pre-mature termination of the period of emergency if the Assembly happens to disapprove it—but not when it approves it.

Besides all this the succeeding part of the sentence does not contribute much towards the understanding of what the intention of the framers of the Constitution could be. If the life of the Proclamation could be extended by 4 months, the total life of the Proclamation would be six months. Why should then the immediately following injunction of confining the life of the proclamation to six months be at all necessary!

Where, by a Proclamation issued under ART. 193, powers of the Provincial Legislature have been declared exercisable by or under the authority of the Parliament, it is competent :—

(a) to the Parliament to confer on the President the power of the Provincial Legislature to make laws;

(b) to Parliament or the President when he is empowered under sub-clause (a) to make laws conferring powers and imposing duties, or authorising the conferring of powers and imposition of duties upon the Federation or officers and authorities thereof.

(c) to the President when the National Assembly is not in session to authorise expenditure from the Provincial Consolidated Fund, whether the expenditure is charged by the Constitution upon the Fund or not, pending the sanction of such expenditure by the Parliament.

(d) to the National Assembly by resolution to sanction the expenditure authorised by the President under sub-clause (c) of ART. 193(3). Any law made in the exercise of the power of the Provincial Legislature by President or Parliament, which such an authority would not but for the issue of a Proclamation under this Article have been competent to make, shall to the extent of incompetency cease to have effect on the expiration of the period of six months after the Proclamation under this Article has ceased to operate, except as to things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said period. (See Art. 193(4))

(3) Third type of emergency

When the Proclamation of financial emergency is issued, the executive authority of the Federation gets extended to the giving of directions to any Province to observe such principles of financial propriety as may be specified in the directions and to the giving of such other directions as the President may deem necessary for securing the financial stability or credit of Pakistan or any part thereof. (See Art. 194)

It would be appreciated from the foregoing analysis of the provisions relating to the various types of the Proclamations of Emergency and the resulting consequences therefrom, that by resort to these provisions the federal character of our polity gets transformed into one of unitary form and that the National Government becomes the paramount and supreme authority within the country. These are certainly abnormal powers but they appear to have been conferred on the executive in conformity with requirements of the pattern of Government that was visualised under the provisions of Government of India Act, 1935. Provisions of section 93 as also the section 102 of that Act reflect more or less the provisions that have been embodied as Articles 193 and 191 in our Constitution. Of course, the provisions of Art. 194 are new in the sense that they were not introduced in the Government of India Act, 1935.

105. Emergency Provisions under other Constitutions

It will be useful to make brief references to the Constitutional provisions relating to emergency measures which prevail in other countries of the world.

In England there are no emergency powers with the executive. The Crown, of course, has the prerogative power of proclaiming emergency. The state of emergency was declared, for instance, during the last two wars. The extraordinary character of the legal measures that were adopted can be seen if a look is had at (1) the Defence of Realm Act,

(a) England.

1914, and (2) Emergency Powers (Defence Act of 1939). During the existence of emergency, like wars and internal disturbances, the laws remain silent and the individual liberty to a considerable extent gets curtailed by reason of the overall control which the Government acquires for the purpose of combating abnormal conditions that supervene in the wake of war or internal civil commotion. In a recent article, Lord Macmillan has observed:

"We have had good reason to realise the truth of Cicero's adage that amidst the clash of arms the laws are silent. The still, small voice of the law is quelled while men kill and destroy in defiance of its dictates. What we have to do is to restore the reign of law, to reseat justice on her throne, to cause right once more to prevail over wrong. The process of re-establishing the rule of law once it has been shattered is slow and difficult; it is so much easier to destroy than to rebuild. But until the world once more becomes law-abiding it cannot hope to regain peace and happiness." (53 Calcutta Weekly Notes p. 133).

During the time of peace the Emergency Powers Act of 1920 enabled, in appropriate cases, the Crown in England to declare a State of Emergency and to issue regulations by Orders-in-Council. The provisions of this Act are as follows :—

1. (1) If at any time it appears to His Majesty that any action has been taken or is immediately threatened by any persons or body of persons of such a nature and on so extensive a scale as to be calculated, by interfering with the supply and distribution of food, water, fuel, or light, or with the means of locomotion, to deprive the community, or any substantial portion of the community, of the essentials of life, His Majesty may, by proclamation (hereinafter referred to as a proclamation of emergency), declare that a state of emergency exists. No such proclamation shall be in force for more than one month, without prejudice to the issue of another proclamation at or before the end of that period.

(2) Where a proclamation of emergency has been made, the occasion thereof shall forthwith be communicated to Parliament, and, if Parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within five days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of Parliament within 5 days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by that proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

2. (1) Where a proclamation of emergency has been made, and so long as the proclamation is in force, it shall be lawful for His Majesty in Council, by order, to make regulations for securing the essentials of life to the community, and those regulations may confer or impose on a Secretary of State or other Government department, or any other person in His Majesty's service or acting on His Majesty's behalf, such powers and duties as His Majesty may deem necessary for the preservation of the peace, for securing and regulating the supply and distribution of food, water, fuel, light, and other necessities, for maintaining the means of transit or locomotion, and or any other purpose essential to the public safety and the life of the community, and may make such provisions incidental to the powers aforesaid as may appear to His Majesty to be required for making the exercise of those powers effective:

Provided that nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorise the making of any regulations imposing any form of compulsory military service or industrial conscription:

Provided also that no such regulation shall make it an offence for any person or persons to take part in a strike, or peacefully to persuade any other person or persons to take part in a strike.

(2) Any regulations so made shall be laid before Parliament as soon as may be after they are made, and shall not continue in force after the expiration of 7 days from the time when they are so laid unless a resolution is passed by both Houses providing for the continuance thereof.

(3) The regulations may provide for the trial, by courts of summary jurisdiction, of persons guilty of offences against the regulations; so, however, that the maximum penalty which may be inflicted for any offence against any such regulations shall be imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term of 3 months, or a fine of one hundred pounds, or both such imprisonment and fine, together with the forfeiture of any goods or money in respect of which the offence has been committed: Provided that no such regulations shall alter any existing procedure in criminal cases, or confer any right to punish by fine or imprisonment without trial.

(4) The regulations so made shall have effect as if enacted in this Act, but may be added to, altered or revoked by resolution of both Houses of Parliament or by regulations made in like manner and subject to the like provisions as the original regulations; and regulations made under this section shall not be deemed to be statutory rules within the meaning of section one of the Rules Publication Act, 1893.

(5) The expiry or revocation of any regulations so made shall not be deemed to have affected the previous operation thereof, or the validity of any action taken thereunder, or any penalty or punishment incurred in respect of any contravention or failure to comply therewith, or any proceeding or remedy in respect of any such punishment or penalty.

It would be noticed that a proclamation issued under S.1, remains in force only for one month in the first instance and when made, the occasion thereof has to be communicated to the Parliament, and in terms of Clause 2 of S.1, Parliament has to be summoned to consider the matter.

In Canada there are no direct provisions enabling the Governor-General of the Dominion to issue proclamation of emergency, but there have been several pronouncements of their Lordships of the Privy Council which tend to show that emergency powers are inherent in the general authority reserved to the Dominion Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good Government of Canada. In the case of Russel v. The Queen, (1882) 7 AC 829, their Lordships of the Privy Council upheld a law which provided for uniform legislation in all the Provinces in respect of traffic and intoxicating liquor, despite the fact that its prohibiting and penal parts were to come into force in any city upon the support of the majority of electors being given to the measure. The reasoning, on which the validity of this law, although it encroached upon the Provincial field, was upheld, is as follows :—

"The manner of bringing the prohibitions and penalties of the Act into force, which Parliament has thought fit to adopt, does not alter its general and uniform character. Parliament deals with the subject as one of general concern to the Dominion, upon which uniformity of legislation is desirable, and the Parliament alone can so deal with it. There is no ground or pretence for saying that the evil or vice struck at by the Act in question is local or exists only in one Province, and that Parliament, under colour of general legislation, is dealing with a provincial matter only. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the considerations which a state of circumstances of this kind might present. The present legislation is clearly meant to apply a remedy to an evil which is assumed to exist throughout the Dominion, and the local option, as it is called, no more localises the subject and scope of the Act than a provision in an Act for the prevention of contagious diseases in cattle that a public officer should proclaim in what districts it should come in effect, would make the statute itself a mere local law for each of these districts. In statutes of this kind the legislation is general, and the provision for the special application of it to particular places does not alter its character." (841-842).

(b)
Canada.

An appreciation of the point made in Russel's case was given by Viscount Haldane in Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, (1925) Appeal Cases p. 396: In this case Lord Haldane was dealing with the question concerning the validity of Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907. The Act was to apply throughout Canada and its object was to enable Industrial Disputes in Canada to be referred to a Board of Conciliation. It was contended that the Act was void as it dealt with "civil rights", which were under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Provinces. Viscount Haldane upheld the contention and explained the remarks in Russel's case as follows:—

"It appears to their Lordships that it is not now open to them to treat Russel v. The Queen, as having established the general principle that the mere fact that Dominion legislation is for the general advantage of Canada, or is such that it will meet a mere want which is felt throughout the Dominion, renders it competent if it cannot be brought within the heads enumerated specifically in S.91. Unless this is so, if the subject-matter falls within any of the enumerated heads in S.92, such legislation belongs exclusively to Provincial competency. No doubt there may be cases arising out of some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada, as a whole, such as the cases arising out of a war, where legislation is required of an order that passes beyond the heads of exclusive Provincial competency. Such cases may be dealt with under the words at the commencement of S.91, conferring general powers in relation to peace, order and good government, simply because such cases are not otherwise provided for. But instances of this, as was pointed out in the judgment in Fort Frances Pulp and Power Co. v. Manitoba Free Press, (1923 AC 695), are highly exceptional. Their Lordships think that the decision in Russel v. The Queen can only be supported to-day, not on the footing of having laid down an interpretation, such as has sometimes been invoked of the general words at the beginning of S.91, but on the assumption of the Board, apparently made at the time of deciding the case of Russel v. The Queen, that the evil of intemperance at that time amounted in Canada to one so great and so general that at least for the period it was a menace to the national life of Canada so serious and pressing that the National Parliament was called on to intervene to protect the nation from disaster. An epidemic of pestilence might conceivably have been regarded as analogous." (at p. 412).

These observations will show that in an emergency the Dominion Parliament of Canada can invade the Provincial field. To the same effect are the views expressed in other cases (Fort Frances Pulp & Power Co. v. Manitoba Free Press Co. Ltd. reported in 1923 Appeal Cases 695, as also in the Board of Commerce case, in re The Board of Commerce Act, 1919, and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, 1919, (1922) 1 A.C. page 191, at 197).

In a somewhat more recent case, Attorney-General for Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation, reported in 1946 Appeal Cases p. 193, where the validity of Canada Temperance Act, 1927, was challenged, their Lordships of the Privy Council, following the principle decided in Russel's case, commented on the appreciation given by Lord Haldane of that case in the Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider as follows:—

"The first observation which their Lordships would make on this explanation of Russel's case is that the British North America Act nowhere gives power to the Dominion Parliament to legislate in matters which are properly to be regarded as exclusively within the competence of the Provincial Legislatures, merely because of the existence of an emergency. Secondly, they can find nothing in the judgment of the Board in 1882 which suggests that it proceeded on the ground of emergency; there was certainly no evidence before that Board that one existed. The Act of 1878 was a permanent, not a temporary, Act and no objection was raised to it on that account. In their Lordships' opinion, the true test must be found in the real subject-matter of the legislation: if it is such that it goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the Dominion as a whole [as for example in the Aeronautics case (Re Aerial Navigation, Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, (1932) AC 54), and the Radio Case (Re Regulation and Control of Radio Communication, Attorney-General of Quebec v. Attorney General for Canada, (1932) A.C. 304)], then it will fall within the competence of the Dominion Parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, though it may in another aspect touch upon matters especially reserved to the Provincial Legislatures. War and pestilence, no doubt, are instances; so too may be the drink or drug traffic, or the carrying of arms. In Russell v. The Queen, Sir Montague Smith gave as an instance of valid Dominion legislation a law which prohibited or restricted the sale or exposure of cattle having a contagious disease. Nor is the validity of the legislation, when due to its inherent nature, affected because there may still be room for enactments by a Provincial Legislature dealing with an aspect of the same subject in so far as it specially affects that province.

"It is to be noticed that the Board in Snider's case nowhere said that Russell v. The Queen was wrongly decided. What it did was to put forward an explanation of what is considered was the ground of the decision, but in their Lordships' opinion the explanation is too narrowly expressed. True it is that an emergency may be the occasion which calls for the legislation, but it is the nature of the legislation itself, and not the existence of emergency, that must determine whether it is valid or not."

In the Constitution of the United States of America, Art. 1, S.9, clause 2, we have the following:

"The privilege of the writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

There are no provisions in the U.S. Constitution conferring the emergency powers on the Federal Government.

Willoughby, in Art. 1057 in the Third Volume of his treatise on Constitutional Law of the United States deals with the power of the President to suspend the writ of Habeas Corpus and after a consideration of the case-law relevant for the determination of that question in America, quotes with approval, the following remarks of Chief Justice Taney in the case of ex parte Merryman:

"With such provisions in the Constitution, expressed in language too clear to be misunderstood by any one, I can see no ground whatever for supposing that the President, in any emergency or in any state of things, can authorise the suspension of the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus or arrest a citizen except in aid of the judicial power. He certainly does not faithfully execute the law if he takes upon himself legislative power by suspending the writ of habeas corpus, and the judicial power also by arresting and imprisoning a person without due process of law. Nor can any argument be drawn from the nature of sovereignty, or the necessity of government, for self-defence in times of tumult and danger. The government of the United States is one of delegated and limited powers. It derives existence and authority altogether from the Constitution, and neither of its branches, executive, legislative or judicial, can exercise any of the powers of Government beyond those specified and granted." (Taney's Reports p. 246).

Thus it would seem that the Bill of Rights contained in American Constitution cannot be suspended, no matter what the emergency may be. Any assumption of police power during the existence of emergency by the executive is a matter for judiciary to control, and cases have arisen when Acts, like the Espionage & Sedition Acts, laws controlling civil supplies and price structure within the country have been upheld by the Courts as being in consonance with the measures necessary to combat the nature of emergency confronting the Administration and Legislature of the Country.

(c)
U.S.A.

106. Proclamations of Emergency—unchallengeable in a court of law

Proclamations of Emergency unchallengeable in a court of law.

Turning now to our Constitution it would appear that a proclamation of emergency issued under Arts. 191, 193 and 194, unlike the constitutional position in the U.S.A., are immune from being challenged in a Court of Law. President is the sole judge of the situation and it is he who has to decide whether or not the proclamation would issue. Of course, as he is bound by the ministerial advice in the field of the exercise of power relating to the issue of a proclamation, his powers under these Articles are virtually the powers of the Federal Government to smother the authority of the Provinces. The validity of the Proclamations can be challenged only on the ground of the mala fide exercise of power—but the proof of circumstances on which the mala fides of Government could be exhibited is necessarily a difficult matter.

While the proclamation of emergency under Arts. 191 and 193 is in force, the Provincial field of legislative authority gets annexed to the federal field, and the ordinance making power of the President under Art. 69 gets pro rata enhanced, with the result that by means of the mere issue of executive decrees, the Government at the Centre can carry on the Administration in the Provinces. The situation can become intolerable in case, either during the continuance of the proclamation of emergency or immediately after its commencement, or at the time of its inception, the National Assembly gets dissolved; for then such indirect measure of control as the National Assembly has over the making of laws during the continuance of emergency proclaimed by the Cabinet also gets considerably diminished, if not practically eliminated.

It is for these reasons that it is idle to think that the federal principle has been retained in the fullness of its scope in our Constitution. To this might be added the consideration that the appointment of the Governor, who is the constitutional Head charged with the duty of directing the operation of constitutional processes in the Provincial field, is himself a person who is a nominee of the Federal Government and holds office at their pleasure. The Federal Government thus, in normal times, as also in times of emergency, has an unusual amount of de facto power over the provincial administration. The Governor may at any time make a report that the constitutional machinery has broken down. It is not clear whether in the making of such a report he is controlled by the advice of his own cabinet, but it does look odd that he should be so bound considering that the object of making a report to the President upon the premises of which the latter has to give a finding that constitutional machinery has broken down in the province, would hardly emanate from the Chief Minister and his Cabinet in the Province. And this for the reason that the Governor might remove the Chief Minister who gave such an advice on the ground that he no longer enjoys the confidence of the legislature.

107. The Legislative Powers of the President and the Governors

ARTS. 69
and 102.
Ordinance—making Power.

The legislative powers of the President are mentioned in Art. 69 and of the Governors of the Provinces in Art. 102 of our Constitution. These powers of making and promulgating Ordinances may well be described as the powers of the Cabinet, both at the Centre as well as in the Provinces, to make laws during the time when National Assembly at the Centre and Provincial Assemblies in the Provinces are not in session. The relevant Articles do not prescribe any "conditions precedent" to exist beyond the satisfaction of the President or the Governor "that circumstances exist which render immediate action necessary", but merely say that upon such satisfaction the power to make and promulgate Ordinances is available. Since the President or the Governors can only act in relation to this power on ministerial advice, the Ordinances issued by them are really Cabinet-made laws. The legal effect of an Ordinance is the same as that of an Act of the relevant Legislature and the power of making these Ordinances is "subject to the same restrictions as the power of the relevant Legislature to make laws." (See Art. 218) Ordinances made in this way can be controlled or superseded by an Act of the appropriate legislature.

The life of the Ordinance made under these Articles is not fixed but the Constitution requires the Ordinances to be laid before the next session of the relevant Assembly and provides that they shall cease to operate at the expiration of the period of six weeks from the first meeting of the relevant Assembly, or if a resolution disapproving it is passed by the Assembly, upon the passing of that resolution.

108. A comment on the implications of the lapsing of Temporary Laws

It would thus be seen that the Ordinances are what are called 'temporary laws', i.e. they die with the efflux of time and contain within their own wombs, 'seeds of their own destruction'. Such laws when they expire have not the kind of posthumous effect which, for instance, is to be predicated of a permanent enactment that is repealed (See Crown vs Haveli A.I.R. (1949) Lahore 191). Under S.6 of the General Clauses Act we have the effect of the repeal of an Act described as follows :—

"6. Where this Act, or any (Central Act) or Regulation made after the commencement of this Act, repeals any enactment hitherto made or hereafter to be made, then, unless a different intention appears, the repeal shall not—

- (a) revive anything not in force or existing at the time at which the repeal takes effect; or
- (b) after the previous operation of any enactment so repealed or anything duly done or suffered thereunder; or
- (c) affect any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued or incurred under any enactment so repealed; or
- (d) affect any penalty, forfeiture or punishment incurred in respect of any offence committed against any enactment so repealed; or
- (e) affect any investigation, legal proceeding or remedy in respect of any such right, privilege, obligation, liability, penalty, forfeiture or punishment as aforesaid; and any such investigation, legal proceeding or remedy may be instituted, continued or enforced, and any such penalty, forfeiture or punishment may be imposed as if the Repealing Act or regulation had not been passed."

To the same effect are also the provisions of S.38 of the English Interpretation Act.

These sections will not apply in cases where the laws lapse of their own accord by the mere efflux of time, i.e. without any external agency competent to repeal them, repealing them. This position may be contrasted from the position that obtains in cases where other kinds of temporary laws, also provided for by the Constitution, lapse. This happens, for instance, when during the continuance in force of a proclamation of emergency, laws are made which, by their very nature, are temporary laws in that they are fated to lapse immediately after the conclusion of a period of six months after the proclamation of emergency ceases to operate. For instance Art. 193 provides with respect to such laws in its 4th clause as follows :—

"Any law made in exercise of the power of the Provincial Legislature by Parliament or the President, which Parliament or the President would not, but for the issue of a Proclamation under this Article have been competent to make, shall, to the extent of incompetency, cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of six months after

"A comment on the lapsing of Temporary Laws".

S. 6 of the General
Clauses Act.

the Proclamation under this Article has ceased to operate, except as to things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said period."

Thus the laws enacted during the period of emergency do not lapse absolutely in the sense in which the laws embodied in the shape of Ordinance, lapse—they only lapse with the reservation, namely, that "things done or omitted to be done" before the expiration of the said period are saved. That is to say, the Ordinances are alive and available for being applied to acts done, or omitted to be done before the expiry of the Ordinance. For instance, if a person is prosecuted in respect of any acts or omissions, which are declared offences by a temporary law, then his prosecution should ordinarily be concluded before the expiration of the temporary law. Thus, in the case of an Ordinance, since the Ordinance lapses on the conclusion of the period specified in the relevant Articles upon the happening of a certain contingency, if the prosecution is not concluded before the due date it cannot be continued thereafter. But in the case of emergency 'temporary laws', this would not happen because Art. 193, clause 4, reserves the posthumous effect of the law with regard to "things done or omitted to be done" before the expiration of the life of that law. In the case of "In re Karumuthu Thiagarayan Chettier and others" reported in AIR 1947 Madras 325, this expression, "things done or omitted to be done", (which also occurs in section 102 of the Government of India Act, 1935), was considered: it was held that the things done or omitted to be done are not to be construed as "things done or omitted to be done" under the Act that has expired. That was a case in which the expiring Act had itself made a provision for the saving of acts done or omitted to be done after its expiration:

"It cannot be disputed", the learned Judge remarked, "that a temporary Act may contain provisions within itself for the consequences that will ensue on its expiration, and in our opinion, the provisions of Ordinance XII of 1946, which are substantially the same as the statutory provisions which govern all repealed Acts, cannot be regarded as extending the Defence of India Act, and the Rules and Orders made under it beyond the date of their expiration any more than Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, extends a repealed Act, beyond the date of its repeal."

The learned Judge thereafter dealt with, what he called was, a vital question:

"The vital question is, therefore, whether the provisions of Ordinance 12 or at any rate those provisions which relate to legal proceedings taken under orders made under S.102, Government of India Act, for it cannot be disputed that some of the provisions will fall within the scope of the words 'things done or omitted to be done' are ultra vires the Government of India Act. Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Aiyar asks, why Ordinance No. 12 should have been promulgated at all if criminal proceedings instituted under an order made under the Defence of India Act with respect to subjects included in the provincial Legislative List could be continued after the expiration of the Defence of India Act under the terms of S.102(4), Government of India Act, itself; and why, if it was intended that provision should be made in respect of the expiration of a law made under S.102(4) similar to the provisions of S.6, General Clauses Act, or S.38(1), English Interpretation Act, the whole of these provisions should not have been included instead of only the words "things done or omitted to be done?" Whether Ordinance No. 12 was necessary or unnecessary, cannot affect the question of the construction of S.102(4), but it may be pointed out that the Defence of India Act and the rules made under it cover matters enumerated in the Central as well as the Provincial Legislative List and to matters enumerated in the Central Legislative List, S.102(4) Government of India Act will not apply. As regards the second question, it seems to us that elaborate provisions with respect to the effect of the expiration of a law made under S.102 would have been out of place. The section gives authority to the Indian Legislature to make laws in respect of provincial subjects in certain circumstances, and the law itself is the place where provision might be expected to be made to govern the effect of its expiration. Moreover S.6, General Clauses Act, and S.38(1), English Interpretation Act, relate to repealed Acts and not to Temporary Acts, which have expired by efflux of time.

We turn, therefore, to an examination of the meaning of the words in S. 102 (4), Government of India Act, that :

'A law.... shall cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of six months after the proclamation has ceased to operate except as respects things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said Act'.

"In this connection Sir Alladi Krishnaswami has referred us to the case in 32 ALL. 33 at p. 43. In that case the question arose, among other things, whether an acknowledgment of liability was a thing done in pursuance of an Act of the Legislature within the meaning of S.6, General Clauses Act of 1868 and it was held that it was not. This decision was confirmed by the Privy Council in 35 ALL. 227. Sir Alladi Krishnaswami argues that an offence committed in contravention of an Act is no more a thing done under or in pursuance of the Act than an acknowledgment of liability is a thing done under the Act. The decisions in the Allahabad cases relating to the construction of an Indian Statute will not of course apply to the construction of an English Act; but in any case the argument seems to us to assume, without justification, that provisions appearing in S.6, General Clauses Act, or in S.38, English Interpretation Act, have been adopted in sub-section (4) of S.102, Government of India Act. As we are dealing with an English Statute it is the English Interpretation Act of 1889 that must be looked at, and the argument is that the words of the saving clause in sub-section (4) of S. 102, Government of India Act, are substantially the same as those contained in the second part of clause (b) of sub-section (2) of S.38, Interpretation Act, which are that the repeal shall not affect 'anything duly done or suffered under any enactment so repealed'. Now, as we have already pointed out we are concerned in these cases with an act and orders made under the Act which have expired and not with an act and orders which have been repealed. A Statute which is repealed, in the absence of provision to the contrary, becomes as if it had never existed, but in the case of a temporary Statute the restrictions imposed and the duration of its provisions after the expiration of the Statute are matters of construction: vide Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd edition, Lord Hailsham Vol. 31 p. 513, See 668. It might, therefore, be expected that, if it was the intention of Parliament to adopt in respect of an Act and Orders which had expired, one only of the provisions of S.38, Interpretation Act, which affect the provisions of repealed Acts while excluding the other provisions, it would have been made clear that this was its intention or that at least the precise words of the second part of clause (b) of sub-section (2) of S.38, Interpretation Act, would have been employed. The words used in sub-section (4) of S.102 are, however, very different. They are that a law made under S. 102

'shall cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of six months after the proclamation has ceased to operate, except as respects things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the said period.'

"In our opinion these words should be construed in their own context and we see no reason why they should be construed with reference to clause (b) of sub-section (2) of S.38, Interpretation Act. Once any presumption in favour of a construction with reference to S.38, Interpretation Act, is removed there seems to us no real difficulty. It would be highly unreasonable to suppose that Parliament intended, while giving power to the Indian Legislature to make laws for Provinces in respect of Provincial subjects in the event of the security of India being threatened by war or internal disturbances, that offences in

The expression
"Things done or omitted to be done."

Re:
Karumuthu
Thiagarayan Chettier & others vs
Rex v.

contravention of such laws should go unpunished unless the punishments had been inflicted before the expiration of the law or that prosecutions instituted should lapse with the expiration of the law, and in our opinion, a construction of sub-section (4) of S.102, according to the ordinary meaning of the words used does not lead to so unreasonable a conclusion. The 'things done or omitted to be done' are not stated to be things done or omitted to be done 'under a law'. They are stated to be things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the law. As regards these things sub-s.(4) provides that the law shall continue to have effect after the period when with respect to other things the law has expired; and it seems to us, on a reasonable construction, that the things done or omitted to be done before the expiration of the period of six months after which the proclamation has ceased to operate are things to which the law applies so that the law will continue to apply after the expiration of the period to things done or omitted to be done to which it applied before the expiration of the period. This construction is in accordance with what may be presumed to have been the intention of Parliament and does no violence to the ordinary meaning of the words used. In this view offences committed before the expiration of the six months' period can be prosecuted after the expiration of the period and proceedings instituted before the expiry of the period can be lawfully prosecuted to a conclusion. As regards prosecutions instituted under a law or order made under S.102, Government of India Act, indeed it can hardly be doubted that they are things done under the law as well as things done before the expiration of the law. The particular prosecutions with which we are now concerned could only have been instituted under the several orders under which they purport to have been instituted." (pp. 327-29)

Rex. Wicks.

In the case of Rex v. Wicks, (1946) 2 All E. R. p. 529, the Court of Criminal Appeal had occasion to interpret S.11 (3) of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, which had provided: "The expiry of this Act shall not affect the operation thereof as respects things previously done or omitted to be done." The question raised was whether notwithstanding the previous expiry of the Act the sub-section could be invoked to justify the conviction of the Appellant. The acts for which the prisoner was charged were committed between April 1943 and January 1944, and the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, expired on February 24, 1946. The trial of the prisoner took place on May 27th and 28th, 1946. Lord Goddard, Chief Justice, summed up the legal position regarding the posthumous operation of repealed, as contra-distinguished from Temporary, Acts, as follows (at pp. 531-32):

"The question is one of some difficulty and the court has had the advantage of very full argument on both sides in which all the relevant authorities have been brought to their attention. The first observation which the court would make is that they are in complete agreement with the decision of the Divisional Court in Willingale v. Norris, (1909) 1 K.B. 57: 14 Digest 203, 1826: 78 L.K.J.B. 69: 99 L.T. 830: 72 J.P. 495) that, where a statute enables an authority to make regulations, a regulation made under the Act becomes for the purpose of obedience or disobedience a provision of the Act. The regulation is only the machinery by which Parliament has determined whether certain things shall or shall not be done. It is, therefore, clear that the regulations must be read as though they were contained in the Act itself. They derive their efficacy solely from the Act and accordingly expire with the Act, but it may be that the legislature has provided that some restrictions or consequences shall remain effective notwithstanding the expiration of the Act.

"Considering the position, first, at common law as to the expiration or repeal of a statute, in our opinion, the position may be taken as now settled. The leading authority is Steavenson v. Oliver, (1841), 8 M & W 234: 42 Digest 774, 2019; 10 L.J. Ex. 338). In that case, Parke B., said (8 M. & W. 234, at p. 241):

'There is a difference between temporary statutes and statutes which are repealed; the latter (except so far as they relate to transactions already completed under them) become as if they had never existed; but with respect to the former, the extent of the restrictions imposed, and the duration of the provisions, are matters of construction.'

"That passage was considered and approved by Roche J. in Spencer v. Hooton, (1920), 37 T.L.R. 280; Digest Supp.), and, in our opinion, is a correct statement of the law. It is worth observing that in Steavenson v. Oliver, there are dicta both by the Chief Baron and by Alderson, B., which go further, and appear to say that in any case where a man offends against a temporary statute he can be convicted and punished after its expiration, but, in our opinion, this is contrary to the older cases which were not cited to the judges, in particular, Miller's Case (1764), 1 Wm. Bl. 451; 42 Digest 773, 20161, 96 E.R. 259), and R. V. McKenzie ((1820), Russ. & Ry. 429; 42 Digest 766, 1932; 168 E.R. 881. At the present day it is most unlikely that any question of this nature will arise where an Act has been repealed because the position is sufficiently dealt with by the Interpretation Act, 1889, S. 38 (2) (c) & (d), which provides that the repeal of an Act passed after the commencement of that Act shall not, unless the contrary intention appears, affect any liability incurred or affect any penalty or punishment incurred in respect of any offence committed against any enactment so repealed, and the section goes on to provide that any legal proceeding or remedy may be instituted, continued or enforced, and any such penalty, forfeiture or punishment may be imposed, as if the repealing Act had not been passed. This section, however, has no application to statutes which have expired, and the question must, therefore, remain one of construction whether the provisions as to expiry are such as to make it impossible for a prosecution or other proceeding to be either instituted or brought to conviction, or whether, on a true construction of the Act, Parliament has provided that legal proceedings, whether of a civil or criminal character, can be prosecuted in relation to matters connected with the Act after it has expired. In the present case, but for the provision in S. 11(3) it could, we think, hardly be contended that a person could be convicted of an offence against the Act after its expiration, and, accordingly, as we have already said, the whole question is in the construction which ought to be placed on S.11(3).

"For the appellant it is argued that the words of that sub-section are insufficient to carry the consequences that would have ensued had the section contained some such provision as it contained in the Interpretation Act, 1889, S.38, or if that section had been made to apply to the expiration as it would have done had the Act been repealed, and that the sub-section must be read as referring only to things done and completed while the Act was in force. The Crown, on the other hand, contends that from its terms it is clear as a matter of construction that Parliament did not intend the sub-section to expire with the rest of the Act, as otherwise it would be meaningless. The court can, therefore, it is said, look at the sub-section and not treat it as expunged from the Statute Book, and, if it finds that an act has been done or omitted to be done before the Act expired, it must allow the Act to operate in respect of that act or omission. It is always presumed that Parliament knows the state of the law at the time when it is legislating. It must also, we think, be presumed that Parliament knows what words are considered apt to effect a particular result. Bearing in mind the length of time that the Interpretation Act, 1889, has been on the statute book, it is certainly true to say that, if the legislature intended the result contended for by the Crown, it has used somewhat elliptical words. Nevertheless, statutes are not usually expressed in terms of art as that expression would be understood by a conveyancer, and if effect can be given by a short clause to what in another Act is achieved by language more comprehensive, there is no reason why this should not be done. If the intention appears, effect to it must be given by the court.

"Now, if this sub-section operates only on matters past and completed, it may well be asked what object there was in enacting it at all. A competent authority or administrator under the Act would not require it for his protection after the Act had expired, provided what had been done or omitted thereunder was authorised by the Act at the time of the act or omission. To take an example, if after the expiration an action of trespass, either to the person or to property, were brought against an officer of the Crown alleging detention without trial or the taking possession of land against the will of the owner, he could plead that, at the time he did the act complained of, it was justified by the law then in force. Accordingly, we do not think that we ought to construe the sub-section as one inserted merely ex majore cautela. While, no doubt, it does cover completed acts or transactions, we think the language is wide enough to make the provisions of the Act apply, or, in the language of the section, to operate, in respect of any act done before the expiration even though not perfected or completed till afterwards. Regulation 2A refers to an act and reg. 2B (2) refers to an omission. If, therefore, it is proved that before the expiration of the Act a person did an act likely to assist the enemy with intent, or omitted to do that which it was his duty to do in respect of matters dealt with in reg. 2B, in our opinion, the Act is to operate notwithstanding its expiry, and it operates by making the act or omission an offence for which the offender is liable to be convicted."

We have considered the posthumous effects of temporary laws in the context of the normal rules of interpretation. But it should be noted that all these observations are subject to the overall rule of limitation—namely that there is no express provision to the contrary. For instance, the Punjab General Clauses Act, 1898, which would apply to the interpretation of a provincial Ordinance, in its 27th section (which describes the application of the provision of that Act to Ordinances) provides the following:—

"The provisions of Section 4 of this Act shall apply on the expiry or withdrawal of any Ordinance promulgated by the Governor under (the Constitution) as if it had been repealed by a Punjab Act."

The natural result of this principle of interpretation would be that the lapsing of an ordinance or its withdrawal would have the same effect as if it had been repealed by another Act—and its lapsing would not have the normal consequences of the sort to which reference has already been made. Could it be argued in such a case that the General Clauses Act was conferring a status upon an ordinance which cannot be read into it by recourse to the words of the Constitution—and that to that extent the General Clauses Act itself is unconstitutional?

(As to the effect of the lapsing of temporary Act or Law upon the provisions it has repealed in the Ordinary Law, see the case Gooderham and Worts v. Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, reported in A.I.R. (1949) Privy Council p. 90).

109. Ordinance-making power available during the period when Assemblies stand dissolved.

This power of Ordinance-making is also available to the President and the Governor during the time when the National and the Provincial Assemblies stand dissolved and, what is more, during such periods the making and promulgation of an Ordinance includes the power to authorise expenditure from the Federal Capital Consolidated Fund; whether the expenditure is charged by Constitution upon that Fund or not pending compliance with the provisions of Arts. 63, 65 and 66 is available to the President in the case of

Ordinance-making power available during the period when Assemblies stand dissolved

Federal affairs and a similar power is available to the Governor in relation to the Provincial affairs. The only constitutional requirement to be complied with in such cases is that any Ordinance promulgated under these circumstances shall be laid before the reconstituted Assembly and the provisions of ARTs. 63, 65 and 66 in the case of Federal Ordinance, and ARTs. 96, 98 and 99 in the case of Provincial Assembly shall be complied with within six weeks from that date.

110. Legislative History of Ordinance-making Power

It is necessary to refer to the legislative history of this Ordinance-making power of the executive in order that such case-law as exists upon the point may be properly understood and applied to the language of ARTs. 69 and 102 of our Constitution. The Government of India Act, 1935, contained two provisions on the subject:

(1) Section 72 of the old Government of India Act, 1919, which was preserved in its 9th Schedule entitled, "Provisions of Government of India Act continued in force with amendments until the establishment of Federation". Section 317 of the Government of India Act 1935 had provided for the administration being carried on in accordance with the provisions of the 9th Schedule till such time the Federation visualised by the Government of India Act, 1935, was established. Section 72 of the 9th Schedule was in the following terms:

"The Governor-General may, in cases of emergency, make and promulgate ordinances for the peace and good government of British India or any part thereof, and any ordinance so made shall, for the space of not more than six months from its promulgation, have the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature; but the power of making ordinances under this section is subject to the like restrictions as the power of the Indian Legislature to make laws; and any ordinance made under this section is subject to the like disallowance as an Act passed by the Indian legislature, and may be controlled or superseded by any such Act."

It would be noticed that the life of the ordinance was to be for six months from the day of its promulgation and there was no obligation cast upon the Governor-General of placing the ordinance before the Indian Legislature upon its first meeting after the promulgation of such an ordinance.

(2) Section 42 of the Government of India Act, 1935, which was in the following terms:—

"42.—(1) If at any time when the Federal Legislature is not in session the Governor-General is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action, he may promulgate such ordinances as the circumstances appear to him to require :—

Provided that the Governor-General—

- (a) shall exercise his individual judgment as respects the promulgation of any ordinance under this section if a Bill containing the same provisions would, under this Act have required his previous sanction to the introduction thereof into the Legislature; and
- (b) shall not, without instructions from His Majesty, promulgate any such ordinance if he would have deemed it necessary to reserve a Bill containing the same provisions for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure thereon.

"(2) An ordinance promulgated under this section shall have the same force and effect as an Act of the Federal Legislature assented to by the Governor-General, but every such ordinance :—

- (a) shall be laid before the Federal Legislature and shall cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the re-assembly of the Legislature, or, if before the expiration of that period resolutions disapproving it are passed by both Chambers, upon the passing of the second of those resolutions;

(b) shall be subject to the provisions of this Act relating to the power of His Majesty to disallow Acts as if it were an Act of the Federal Legislature assented to by the Governor-General; and

(c) may be withdrawn at any time by the Governor-General.

"(3) If and so far as an ordinance under this section makes any provision which the Federal Legislature would not under the Act be competent to enact, it shall be void."

It would be seen that this Section 42 provides a pattern of the ordinance law which has been retained under our Constitution. (See S. 88 for the Provincial Ordinances)

The Constitution of India in its ART. 123 provides for the legislative powers of the Indian President in the following terms :—

"123.—(1) If at any time, except when both Houses of Parliament are in session, the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action, he may promulgate such Ordinances as the circumstances appear to him to require.

(2) An ordinance promulgated under this Article shall have the same force and effect as an Act of Parliament, but every such ordinance—

(a) shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament and shall cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the re-assembly of Parliament, or, if before the expiration of that period resolutions disapproving it are passed by both Houses, upon the passing of the second of those resolutions; and

(b) may be withdrawn at any time by the President.

Explanation: Where the Houses of Parliament are summoned to re-assemble on different dates, the period of six weeks shall be reckoned from the later of those dates for the purposes of this clause.

(3) If and so far as an ordinance under this Article makes any provision which Parliament would not under this Constitution be competent to enact, it shall be void."

III. Some features of Ordinance Law

Following features of the ordinance-law should be carefully noted :—

(a) Whether or not President or Governor is satisfied that circumstances exist for them to take immediate action is a matter which is not a justiciable one and the Courts cannot be called upon to determine its existence by the application of any objective test. (Lakhi Narayan v. The Province of Bihar, (1950) Supreme Court Journal p. 32 and Jnan Prosanna v. The Province of West Bengal, A.I.R. (1949) Calcutta page 1. See also in re: Kalyanam Veerabhadrayya, AIR (1950) Madras page 243, at page 256).

In the case of Emperor v. Benoari Lal, A.I.R. (1945) P.C. page 48, their Lordships of the Privy Council, with respect to the scope of S.72 of 9th Schedule of the Government of India Act, ruled that the Governor-General was the sole judge as to the existence of emergency, and "assuming that he acts bona fide and in accordance with the statutory power, it cannot rest with the Courts to challenge the view that emergency exists." This would imply that mala fide exercise of power is subject to judicial review.

(b) The power of issuing ordinances is an extraordinary power and, as observed in A.I.R. (1950) Patna page 19, in the case Bidya Chaudhary v. The Province of Bihar, its exercise must be jealously guarded. This case contains a comment on section 88 of the Government of India Act, 1935,—which provided for the Governor of a Province to make and promulgate ordinances. The Governor of Bihar in that case had promulgated an ordinance on the 3rd of June when the Provincial Assembly was in session. It was held that in making and promulgating the ordinance the Governor acted beyond the authority conferred on him by section 88 of the Government of India Act, in that the Legislature not having been prorogued was still in session and its adjournment was only an interruption in the course of one and the same session. It was held that where the right or power is challenged, the duty of the Court is to keep close to the words of the constitutional instrument and see first whether the power is granted and second, whether there is anything else which restricts the right so granted. On the authority of 1912 Appeal Cases p. 571, Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada it was observed that if the text is explicit, the text is conclusive alike in what it directs and in what it forbids. Since the session of the Assembly had not been terminated an absolute condition precedent for the exercise of the power of making and promulgating an ordinance had not been fulfilled and, therefore, the ordinance under those circumstances was declared ultra vires and inoperative. The learned Judge quoted with approval the following passage from the opinion of Lord Shaw in Rex. v. Halliday (1917) A.C. p. 260 at p.287:—

"Whether the Government has exceeded its statutory mandate is a question of ultra or intra vires such as that which is now being tried. In so far as the mandate has been exceeded, there lurk the elements of a transition to arbitrary government and therein of grave constitutional and public danger. The increasing crush of legislative efforts and the convenience to the Executive of a refuge to the device of Orders-in-Council would increase that danger tenfold were the judiciary to approach any such action of the Government in a spirit of compliance rather than of independent scrutiny. That way also would lie public unrest and public peril. On all this there is no disputing."

(c) There are observations in the case of Emperor v. Benoari Lal Sharma, 1945 Privy Council p. 48, which tend to show that where a constitutional authority is proved to have acted mala fide in the making and promulgating of an ordinance the Courts of Law would be able to declare the exercise of the power as being invalid in law.

In the case reported in 1949 Calcutta p. 1, (Jnan Prosanna Das Gupta v. The Province of West Bengal), the Provincial Government passed an ordinance (in a case before the High Court of Calcutta in which the arguments were concluded but the judgment had still to be announced) to the effect that S.61 of the Act which was under consideration by the High Court was vitally amended. The section as it originally stood empowered the Provincial Government to make an order of detention if it was satisfied on reasonable grounds with respect to any person that with a view to preventing him from doing any subversive act it was necessary so to do. The words 'on reasonable grounds' had been omitted by means of an amending ordinance from S.61 of the Act. Similarly some other 'vital' amendments were also made and some of these amendments were given retrospective effect: and the result of these amendments was that High Court's jurisdiction had been taken away under the provisions of S.3 of the ordinance which provided, "No order for detention shall be impugned on the ground that the Provincial Government or the officer concerned has no reasonable ground for apprehending the detenu." The effect of these changes was summed up by Chatterjee J. in his judgment when he said, "In substance the view of the Division Bench in Jyoti Basu's case has been given legislative sanction by virtue of executive legislation and the Full Bench is precluded from deciding the questions referred to it by the Division Bench." Upon the question whether such an ordinance could be denounced as emanating from a mala fide exercise of power, the learned Judge observed that it did not :

"On the question of mala fides the materials placed before us create suspicion but it is impossible to hold that there has been any colourable exercise of the power of detention. There is no evidence that any particular Minister had any animus against either of these two detenus or that they have been detained in jail because they were prospective rival candidates of any of the Ministers at an impending bye-election."

The learned Judge further remarked: "It is strange and perhaps without any precedent, that anything should be done to render the deliberations of the Full Bench infructuous in that regard. We cannot agree with the contention that authority so exercised constitutes a fraud upon the Statute. Yet it is a cogent comment that nothing should be done which may tend to bring the authority or the administration of the law into disrespect. The Court has to discharge the function of deciding whether the statutory mandate had been exceeded and nothing should be done to make it difficult or impossible for the highest court of the Province to act as the great umpire on constitutional issues or to undermine the authority of the Court as the protector of the rights which are guaranteed to the citizens by the law of the land."

"The attitude to be expected of the executive towards the law of the land and towards those who have the duty to expound it has more than once been referred to in the Supreme Courts in Great Britain during recent times. Two instances may suffice as illustrative of the principle for which I contend."

His Lordships then dealt with the principle of the case in the King v. Speyer and another, (1916) 1 K.B. 595, in which Lord Chief Justice had observed:

"Although it may be interesting and useful for the purpose of testing the propositions under consideration to assume the difficulties suggested by the Attorney-General, none of them would in truth occur. This is the King's Court; we sit here to administer justice and to interpret the laws of the realm in the King's name. It is respectful and proper to assume that once the law is declared by a competent judicial authority, it will be followed by the Crown."

In the similar strain were the remarks in Eastern Trust Company v. Mc-Kenzie, Mann & Co. Ltd., 1915 A.C. 750,

"It is the duty of the Crown and of every branch of the executive to abide by and obey the law. If there is any difficulty in ascertaining it the Courts are open to the Crown to sue, and it is duty of the executive in cases of doubt to ascertain the law, in order to obey it, not to disregard it."

The ordinance was nevertheless held as having been validly made and promulgated and therefore not vulnerable to the objection grounded on the allegation that it was a mala fide exercise of the power.

(d) Yet one more feature of "ordinance-making power" deserves consideration. When it is said that the "power to make the ordinance" shall be subject to the like restrictions as the power of Parliament to make laws, is it suggested that the President can do, by ordinance-making power, that which the Parliament under the Constitution is competent to do? The question herein raised is not a simple one and it is necessary to see the relevant constitutional provisions somewhat closely.

Legislative competence of the Parliament is provided for in the Article 106 with reference to the entries mentioned in the Fifth Schedule. The Parliament can also in pursuance of its power under other specific Articles of the Constitution pass what are called the organic laws. To illustrate this type of power, reference could be made to Article 144, which says, "Subject to the provisions of the Constitution, Parliament may by Act provide for :—

- (a) the delimitation of constituencies, the preparation of electoral rolls, the determination of objections and the commencement of electoral rolls;
- (b) the conduct of elections and election petitions; the decision of doubts and disputes arising in connection with elections;
- (c) matters relating to corrupt practices and other offences in connection with elections; and

(d) all other matters necessary for the due constitution of the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies;

but no such law shall have the effect of taking away or abridging any of the powers of the Election Commission under this Part."

The question is whether an ordinance can validly be made and promulgated to exercise the power conferred by ART. 144—(Similarly see ART. 145 which mentions "Parliament may, after ascertaining the views of the Provincial Assemblies and taking them into consideration, by Act provide whether elections to the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies shall be held on the principle of joint electorate or separate electorate, and may in any such Act provide for all matters incidental and consequential thereto"). The one view could be that these and such other Articles show that it is the Parliament that has been specifically charged by the Constitution to pass certain laws mentioned therein, and that this power having been specifically conferred upon the Parliament, cannot, by appeal to the provision of ART. 69, be made available to the President. However, the question is as yet res integra and is not free from difficulty. What has complicated the problem is the existence of the last entry in the Federal List contained in the Fifth Schedule viz. all matters which under the Constitution are within the legislative competence of Parliament, and matters incidental thereto. This is a dangerously worded power and is capable of being exploited by an irresponsible Cabinet. It would seem to embrace even the power to amend those provisions of the Constitution which can be amended by an Act of Parliament—that is with the sole exception of those powers of the Constitution which have been declared amendable not by the Parliament alone but by the Parliament with the support of the resolution passed by the Provincial Legislature, like ARTs. 216, 1, 31, 39, 44, 77, 106, 118, 119, 199 (See ART. 216). It would be appreciated that there is no parallel entry to be found either under the 7th Schedule of the Government of India Act, or of the Indian Constitution. The definition of "Act of Parliament" as given by ART. 218, includes in that expression an ordinance made by the President in accordance with the Constitution, and therefore it could very well be argued that what under the Constitution can be done by an Act of Parliament can also be done by an "Ordinance". If this argument were accepted, certain startling results would follow. For instance, the requirement of the Constitution that no tax shall be levied for the purposes of the Federation (ART. 60) and also for the purposes of a Province (ART. 93), except by or under the authority of an Act of relevant Legislature, could be circumvented by the passing of an Ordinance. Appropriation Bills which enable the Government to appropriate money and carry on the work of administering laws could also be passed by an Ordinance.

General Clauses Act, 1897, applies for the purpose of interpreting the Constitution as it applies to a Central Act (See ART. 219). But in the General Clauses Act itself, "Ordinance" has not the same meaning as Act of the Central or National Legislature or Parliament, for under S.30 it is provided:

In this Act, the expression "Central Act" wherever it occurs, except in S.5, and the word "Act" in cl. 9, 13, 25, 40, 43, 52 and 54 of S.3, and in S.25, shall be deemed to include an ordinance made and promulgated by the Governor-General (now President).

Thus certain provisions of the General Clauses Act will not apply to Ordinances made and promulgated by the President and similar position will govern the interpretation of a provincial ordinance made and promulgated by the Governor of a Province under the relevant Provincial General Clauses Act.

112. Administration of Excluded and Special areas

So far we have been dealing with the administrative and legislative distribution of power between the Federal Government and the Provincial Government and have seen how both in the Federal and the Provincial spheres democratic and representative institutions of Parliamentary pattern have been established by the Constitution. It now remains to deal with some anomalous constitutional relationships that subsist between what are described as Excluded and Special Areas by the Constitution and the Provincial and the Federal Government in regard to their administration and legislative control.

ART. 103.
and 104.

ART. 103 of the Constitution deals with Excluded Areas and ART. 104 with Special Areas. Excluded Areas are defined as those areas which were excluded areas immediately before the Constitution Day (ART. 103 (1)). That takes us to the relevant provisions of the Government of India Act as in force immediately before the Constitution Day. In S.91 of that Act the expression "excluded areas" was described to mean as areas that were excluded areas immediately before the establishment of Federation or such areas as may henceforward be declared by the Governor-General to be excluded areas. In S. 92 it was provided that "the executive authority of the Province extends to excluded areas therein but, notwithstanding anything in this Act, no Act of the Federal Legislature or of the Provincial Legislature, shall apply to an excluded area unless the Governor by public notification so directs, and the Governor in giving such a direction with respect to any Act may direct that the Act shall in its application to the area or to any specified part thereof have effect subject to such exceptions or modifications as he thinks fit." The Governor was also empowered to make regulations for the peace and good Government of any area in a Province which was for the time being an Excluded Area and any regulations thus made could even repeal or amend any Act of Legislature or Provincial Legislature or any existing law which was for the time being applicable to the area in question. These regulations were required to be submitted forthwith to the Governor-General and until they were assented to by him, had no effect as law.

It would also be seen from these sections that there were Partially Excluded Areas in addition to Excluded Areas and their administration was carried on under the over-riding powers of the Governor, subject of course to the overall control of the Governor-General.

These Partially Excluded areas as even the Excluded Areas were part of the territory of East Bengal Province and had reference to Chittagong Hill Tracts etc., and other tribal areas. Our Constitution has done away with the Partially Excluded Areas but has retained the concept of the excluded areas and with regard to their administration has provided as follows:—

"ART. 103(2). The executive authority of a Province shall extend to any excluded area therein but, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, no Act of Parliament or of a Provincial Legislature shall apply to an excluded area unless the Governor by public notification so directs, and in giving such a direction with respect to any Act he may direct that the Act shall in its application to the area, or any specified part thereof, have effect subject to such exceptions or modifications as may be specified in the direction.

(3) The Governor may make regulations for the peace and good government of any excluded area in the Province, and any such regulations may repeal or amend any Act of Parliament, or of the Provincial Legislature, or any other law in force in the area:

Provided that no regulation repealing or amending an Act of Parliament shall take effect until it has been approved by the President.

(4) The President may by Order direct that the whole or any specified part of an excluded area shall cease to be an excluded area, and any such Order may contain such incidental and consequential provisions as appear to the President to be necessary and proper."

From an analysis of the foregoing provisions it would seem to follow that the pre-existing constitutional position with respect to the administration of excluded areas has been retained under our Constitution.

Over and above these excluded areas we have also, what are described by the Constitution as, "Special Areas" that have been defined in the interpretation clause (See ART. 218) to mean "The areas of the Province of West Pakistan which immediately before the commencement of the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, 1955, were :—

- (a) the tribal areas of Baluchistan, the Punjab and the North-West Frontier, and
- (b) the States of Amb, Chitral, Dir and Swat;"

In the 2nd Section of the Establishment of West Pakistan Act, in sub-section (iv), the term used was "specified territories" inter alia about "Tribal Areas of Baluchistan, the Punjab and the North-West Frontier, and the States of Amb, Chitral, Dir and Swat". And the term 'special areas' was applied to "the tribal areas of Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier or the State of Amb, Chitral, Dir and Swat" (See S. 2(3) of that Act,) thereby taking out from the ambit of the latter category the tribal areas of Punjab.

It is very hard indeed to find out the real criterion for grouping only some of the "Specified Territories" into "Special Areas", and in fact the exclusion of the tribal territories of the Punjab from "Special Areas" seems to the present writer to be entirely arbitrary. It cannot even be pretended that in the matter of political, economic and educational development the tribal areas of the Punjab represent a higher level of evolution. The standards of living and education in the Tribal Areas of Baluchistan are comparatively much higher than those that obtain in the Baluchistan States Union and are in no way lower than those prevalent in the tribal areas of the former Punjab. Indeed it can, for instance, be confidently asserted that the State of Swat judged by any standard is much more advanced in every material respect than the tribal areas of the former Punjab. And despite this it is a part of Special Areas whereas Tribal Areas of former Punjab are not such areas. Culturally also the people of Special Areas are not homogeneous: they speak different languages, namely Pashto, Baluchi, Brohi, Sindhi etc.

Nor do the people belonging to these areas follow the same custom or rawaj and the patterns of social behaviour and the ideas of tribal loyalty are different in different regions of these Special Areas.

It cannot be even argued that the people in these areas wanted to be treated on a different footing from the rest of the Province of West Pakistan, because to do that would be going counter to the well known facts of Public History of our Country.

The provisions with regard to the administrative arrangements with respect to Special Areas are contained in ART. 104, which is as follows:—

"(1) The executive authority of the Province of West Pakistan shall extend to the Special Areas, but notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, no Act of Parliament or of the Provincial Legislature shall apply to a Special Area or to any part thereof unless the Governor, with the previous approval of the President, so directs, and in giving such a direction with respect to any Act the Governor may direct that the Act shall, in its application to a Special Area, or to any specified part thereof, have effect subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the direction.

(2) The Governor may, with the previous approval of the President, make regulations for the peace and good government of a Special Area, or any part thereof, and any regulation so made may repeal or amend any Act of Parliament, or of the Provincial Legislature, or any other law in force in the Area.

(3) The President may, from time to time, give such directions to the Governor relating to the whole or any part of a Special Area as he may deem necessary, and the Governor shall, in the exercise of his functions under this Article, comply with such directions.

(4) The President may, at any time, by Order direct that the whole or any part of a Special Area shall cease to be a Special Area, and any such Order may contain such incidental and consequential provisions as appear to the President to be necessary and proper:

Provided that before making any Order under this clause, the President shall ascertain, in such manner as he considers appropriate, the views of the people of the area concerned."

It would be noticed that broadly speaking the constitutional status of Special Areas with minor exceptions covering inconsequential points is practically the same as that of Excluded Areas under the Constitution. In the field of judicial administration, however, there are radical departures established as between those citizens of Pakistan who live outside the Special Areas and those who remain within the Special Areas. Excluded Areas have the benefits of normal judicial procedure that is available in the High Court of East Pakistan and in the Supreme Court of Pakistan, whereas the people belonging to Special Areas, as will be apparent from what is stated in the Constitution in ART. 178, are denied this much benefit of a liberal rule established by the law and the Constitution of our country.

Confining our attention, however, to the administration of justice as it now obtains in these Special Areas we notice that before the Constitution Day the administration of justice as it was being worked out in these areas was more or less controlled by Tribal and Jirga System. After the Constitution Day this position continues unaltered.

In the Establishment of West Pakistan Act under its 7th Section the High Court was given complete jurisdiction over all the specified territories but by means of a later Amendment the jurisdiction of the High Court was taken away (see the Establishment of West Pakistan (Amendment) Act, 1955, section 2, which took effect from 14th October, 1955). The result of this Amendment has been that pre-West Pakistan Establishment Act jurisdiction of the Judicial Commissioner of Quetta in certain areas of Baluchistan has now been taken away: to be more specific, the Districts of Loralai and Zhob for instance were always under the jurisdiction of the Judicial Commissioner of Baluchistan, who used to exercise the powers of the High Court under the Code of Criminal and Civil Procedures, but in view of the fact that the West Pakistan High Court which has replaced the Court of Judicial Commissioner of Baluchistan has no jurisdiction in respect of any of the Special Areas, a very anomalous situation has been created indeed; although the West Pakistan High Court has replaced the Judicial Commissioner's Court at Quetta but by reason of constitutional restriction imposed upon its authority by ART. 178 it cannot exercise any jurisdiction even in relation to matters for which the Judicial Commissioner, Quetta, used to exercise judicial power over these territories. In the case of Sher Muhammad vs. State, reported in PLD (1956) Lahore, page 1056, it was held by a Full Bench of the former High Court of Lahore that there is a lacuna in the law and this anomalous position is the result of oversight and is not intentional. The Court has remarked that the Tribal Areas of Baluchistan cannot be placed on the same level with those of the Frontier Province because the Tribal Areas of Baluchistan were always settled areas which were used to a regular judicial system.

The authority, power and jurisdiction of the High Court of West Pakistan, no doubt, continues to be the same as it was before the Constitution (see ART. 165 and ART. 227(5)), except in respect of the additional jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Constitution under ARTs. 170 and 171. But in ART. 178 our Constitution provides: "Notwithstanding, anything in the Constitution, neither the Supreme Court nor a High Court shall, unless Parliament by law otherwise provides, exercise any jurisdiction under the Constitution in relation to the Special Areas." Similarly the jurisdiction of Supreme Court in the exercise of its power under ART. 22 to enforce, by means of appropriate writs, fundamental rights guaranteed under Part II is expressly limited, for that Article mentions in its 4th clause that the provisions of that Article shall have no application in relation to the Special Areas. The result, therefore, is that people belonging to these Special Areas cannot lay claim to the benefits of the constitutional rule. To illustrate this point let us consider the following: if the Orders made by the President under ART. 147 with regard to the representation of the people of Special Areas in the National or the Provincial Assembly are found constitutionally defective, no means exist by resort to which that issue can be brought up in the High Court or the Supreme Court, although it would appear that the issue can be raised by means of a civil suit in the Sub-Judge's or the District Judge's Courts in Zhob and Loralai Districts of Quetta Division. Similarly, the Orders issued under ART. 104 by the President or the Provincial Governor, in so far as they affect Special Areas cannot by reason of the prohibition contained in ART. 178 be challenged in a High Court.

If the Constitution were construed strictly it would appear that even the ordinary appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction of the High Court is taken away by ART. 178, for even that jurisdiction is after all exercised by the High Court under the Constitution. It cannot be said that the High Court when acting say under S.410 of the Criminal Procedure Code, or S.96 of the Civil Procedure Code, (while entertaining appeals from the lower courts in criminal and civil matters) is not acting under the Constitution. In fact ART. 178 prevents the High Court of West Pakistan from exercising any jurisdiction under the Constitution in relation to Special Areas. The result of this could be that a sentence of death cannot be confirmed by High Court nor again can appeals be entertained under the Code of Criminal and Civil Procedure from ordinary Courts situate in Special Areas. The language of ART. 178 is sufficiently wide to exclude the ordinary civil and criminal jurisdiction of the High Court which it exercises under laws continuance of which is sanctioned by the Constitution under its 224th Article.

Even on the political side the situation is anomalous. Although Special Areas can send representatives to sit in the Parliament and the Provincial Assemblies and to take part in legislative proceedings of these Bodies, those legislatures have no right to make laws for the Special Areas. Provincial and National Legislatures, as has been stated earlier, have no power to make laws directly applicable to the Special Areas. That is left to the good will of the President or the Governor and it would appear that in extending laws to these Areas those constitutional authorities would be bound to act on advice tendered to them by the appropriate Minister. So it would seem that the Cabinet which is responsible to the House has the power to advise what laws would be applicable in Special Areas, but the Legislature has no direct power to do so. From the foregoing statement it would seem that the

S o
S t Sj
h b cc fr ta really the "Black Areas" within the territory of Pakistan. The point becomes plain when regard is had to provisions of ART. 147 which takes side the benefit of franchise conferred by Part VIII and hands over their fate who by order is to make such provisions for the representation of the National Assembly and the Provincial Assembly of West Pakistan as Here too, the President would be controlled by advice tendered to him minister. Thus the result can be that even the right of adult franchise to the people of Special Areas. And in fact the actual working of the franchises applicable to Special Areas tends to show that thoroughly unrepresentative Jirgas are called upon to send representatives to sit in the Provincial and the National Assemblies.

To sum up: the people of the Special Areas are denied their fundamental rights if only because they cannot enforce them by resort to the powers of High Court and Supreme Court; they have been denied the political status of the free citizen in the country in that they have no voice in the making and unmaking of Governments by means of the exercise of the right to vote as adult citizens; nor can they have any say in the administration of public affairs in the Special Areas because the laws in the making of which they may participate need not be extended to the areas they represent and for securing the extension of those laws to the areas they come from, the good will of the Provincial or the National Cabinets must be canvassed and obtained.

The population of these Special Areas would be roughly about 60 lakhs of people. Out of this, 50 lakhs are to be found in the tribal area of North-West Frontier Province. This territory is politically controlled by Federal Government through the Political Agent. Internally the area is administered by the people themselves through their archaic systems of tribal Rawaj, and the administration of justice is secured through the Jirga system. There are no civil or criminal courts of the sort that exist in the rest of the country. The Rawaj or customary practices prevalent in these parts are thoroughly un-Islamic and what is more, illiteracy, hunger, poverty and want, continue to menace the lives of these people.

The remaining Special Areas of the Frontier States and former Baluchistan stand on an altogether different footing, and it is hard to find any justification for treating them at par under the Constitution with the unsettled tribal areas of the North-West Frontier Province. As has been remarked earlier, they have always remained settled territories even during the British period of our History. There has been a well organised administration as also a civilised judicial system and procedure prevalent in this part which is almost equivalent to that prevalent in the Peshawar Division. In the tribal areas of Baluchistan the Government has complete control of the administration and political set-up. There are the usual executive as well as judicial officers of the Government of Pakistan who are working the administration in these areas. The Jirga system under the Frontier Crimes Regulation is functioning side by side with regular judicial courts. The Agent to the Governor-General was, before the establishment of the Province of West Pakistan, the final authority under the Frontier Crimes Regulation and he had complete, absolute and unqualified power to revise any order passed by the lower tribunals. The Judicial Commissioner of Baluchistan at Quetta used to perform the duties of a High Court on the regular judicial side. The functions of the Agent to the Governor-General are now performed by the Commissioner, Quetta Division, and although, as has been pointed out earlier, the High Court of West Pakistan has replaced the Judicial Commissioner's Court, its jurisdiction, its exercise of constitutional as well as ordinary judicial powers, has been limited under ART. 178 of the Constitution as it was done even under S.7 of the Establishment of West Pakistan Act of 1955.

CHAPTER V

INDIVIDUAL AND THE STATE (FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS)

INDIVIDUAL AND THE STATE—FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

Rights are not gifts from one man to another, nor from one class of men to another . . .

It is impossible to discover any origin of rights otherwise than in the origin of man; it consequently follows that rights appertain to man in right of his existence, and must therefore be equal to every man.

The principle of the Equality of Rights is clear, simple. Every man can understand it and it is by understanding his rights that he learns his duties; for where the rights of men are equal, every man must finally see the necessity of protecting the rights of others as the most effectual security for his own.

Thomas Paine
(On First Principles of Government 1795)

AT THE OUTSET it may be asked, what is meant by "liberty"? In the nineteenth century there was no difficulty in answering that question. Kant's idea of the liberty of each—the free self-assertion of each—limited only by the like liberty of all, was generally accepted. Liberty was a condition in which free exercise of the will was restrained only so far as necessary to secure a harmonious coexistence of the free will of each and the free will of all others. But I am not speaking of the Kantian idea of liberty, in which my generation was brought up. Whatever "liberty" may mean today, the liberty guaranteed by our bills of rights is a reservation to the individual of certain fundamental reasonable expectations involved in life in civilized society and a freedom from arbitrary and unreasonable exercise of the power and authority of those who are designated or chosen in a politically organized society to adjust relations and order conduct, and so are able to apply the force of that society to individuals. Liberty under law implies a systematic and orderly application of that force so that it is uniform, equal, and predictable, and proceeds from reason and upon understood grounds rather than from caprice or impulse or without full and fair hearing of all affected and understanding of the facts on which official action is taken.

Roscoe Pound
(The Development of Constitutional Guarantees of Liberty.)

History of liberty is the history of the limitations on governmental power not the increase of it. When we resist . . . concentration of power, we are resisting the powers of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties.

Woodrow Wilson
Speech in New York (1912)

113. Definition of 'Right' as a term of Jurisprudence

Sir John Salmond following Jhering defines 'right' as a legally recognised and protected interest. Any interest which law recognises or enforces, whatever be the nature or extent of that recognition or enforcement, is a legal right.

'Right' may also be defined as an interest the violation of which is a wrong. Analysis of the concept of legal right would show that:

- (a) there is a person in whom the right inheres,
- (b) there is the corpus of the right which invariably is either an act or an omission,
- (c) there is the person who, by reason of the fact that a right inheres in some one, becomes bound by a corresponding legal duty to act or refrain from acting in a certain way.

Some of the writers on jurisprudence also enunciate yet another element in the concept of legal right, an element which they describe as being the object of the right. Thus when A has a right to receive payment from B, we notice the following four elements:

- (i) A, the person in whom the right inheres,
- (ii) the corpus of the right which consist of an act to compel payment,
- (iii) the person B, who is duty-bound to make the payment to A, and finally,
- (iv) the object of the right i.e., the thing to which the right relates, namely, the amount of money.

There may be cases in which the object of the right is intangible and incorporeal, as when a person has the right of way over some one's land, or he has a right to his reputation etc.

The statement that 'X' has a right is, for instance, analysed by Professor Hart (see his "Definition and Theory in Jurisprudence" (1954) 70 L.Q.R. 37) as follows:

- "(1) A statement of the form 'X' has a right is true if the following conditions are satisfied :
 - (a) There is in existence a legal system.
 - (b) Under a rule or rules of the legal system some other person 'Y' is, in the events which have happened, obliged to do or abstain from some action.
 - (c) This obligation is made by law dependent on the choice of 'X' or some other person authorised to act on his behalf so that either 'Y' is bound to do or abstain from some action only if 'X' (or some authorised person) so chooses or alternatively only 'X' (or such person) chooses otherwise. (2) A statement of the form 'X' has a right is used to draw a conclusion of law in a particular case which falls in such rules."

A right may thus be broadly defined as a legal relationship between two juristic persons recognised by courts concerning their conduct and, so regarded, it would appear to be the very stuff out of which the legal order is itself built up. It is for this reason that for Professor Holland the essence of a legal right resides in the capacity of its owner "of controlling with the assent and assistance of the State, the actions of others". (See his Jurisprudence 11th Ed. pp. 61, 62). A legal right need not have been created by the State; but it must needs be such that the law courts would recognise it and would give to it the support of their decision, which would then be backed by the force of the State for its enforcement.

Holmes
definition considered too narrow.

Justice Holmes of the Supreme Court of the U.S.A. defines a legal right as "nothing but a permission to exercise certain natural powers and upon certain conditions to obtain protection, restitution or compensation by the aid of the public force" (see his Common Law p. 214 Boston 1951). But it is submitted that this is too narrow a view of the concept of right for the definition of it confines us to acknowledging merely those claims as being rights which enable us to do something; whereas there are rights that enable us to compel others to do certain acts or exercise forbearance from doing certain acts. Holmes' definition narrows down rights to being considered as 'liberties' but then there are certain other interests which law enables us to enjoy which are on the face of them unlawful but are nevertheless allowable in certain circumstances. These are usually called privileges.

C. K. Allen in his Essay on "Legal Duties" says:

"The essence of legal right seems to me to be not legally guaranteed power by itself, nor legally protected interest by itself, but the legally guaranteed power to realize an interest."

The extent of protection which the State affords to the rights of persons is of varying degrees. It may recognise a right without being able to enforce it directly. This happens, when, for instance, a party that is injured by the violation of a right recognised by the law of the State, cannot, in anticipation of such a violation insist upon the enforcement of his right by securing prohibition against the person who threatens the invasion of that right. Certain rights are incapable of being specifically enforced and their violation gives rise to an action only in damages. There are other kinds of rights, again, which the law recognises but for which it does not provide any adequate machinery for enforcement. This happens when, for example, a debt due from A to B becomes time-barred due to the operation of law relating to limitation of actions. Although in such a case the debtor cannot be compelled to make a payment, yet to this extent is the right of the creditor to receive the money recognised, that if the debtor happens to pay the amount due, let us say, under a mistake, he cannot afterwards sue for the recovery of the money on the ground that it was a payment made without consideration. Similarly, if the debtor happens to acknowledge the debt, such an acknowledgement would be regarded, the law relating to limitation of action notwithstanding, as a basis for the inference that the debtor has promised to pay that debt. These rights are called imperfect rights. There are certain other species of rights for the enforcement whereof no adequate provision is made in the Constitution of a country. Professor A. V. Dicey refers to this distinction when he mentions as a special feature of the English Constitution, namely, that it recognises the conventions of the English Constitution which are not enforceable by action in courts of law as opposed to the law of the English Constitution which is so enforceable.

Bentham on Natural Rights

In the statement of the concept of legal right attempted so far, no reference has been made to what are called natural rights, that is, rights that are acknowledged by positive morality or rights which are enforced by religious sanctions, rights which must be assumed to exist as being inherent in the very nature of man. Bentham in his Principles of Legislation denies that there is such a thing as a natural right. All rights, he says, are creatures of law. "Natural rights or natural law", says Bentham, "are two kinds of fictions or metaphors, which play so great a part in the books on legislation that they deserve to be examined by themselves." This remark is strongly reminiscent of the view of Greek Sophists who too asserted that distinction between right and wrong, justice and injustice, is not related to the nature of things but is a matter of convention, that is, a matter of human institution only.

Although in the strict theory of law, the question whether or not a legal right is founded on natural right is a matter of no consequence, nevertheless the fact remains that every legal right in some significant sense would, upon analysis, be found to be grounded on a natural right. In the words of Salmond, "natural and legal wrongs, like natural and legal justice, form intersecting circles". (See p. 227 of Salmond's Jurisprudence 10th Ed. London, 1947). Applying this to the sphere of rights we could with equal justification say: 'moral' and 'natural' rights on the one hand, and the 'legal rights' on the other, form intersecting circles; in other words, there are some moral rights that are not legally enforced and there would be some legal rights that cannot be morally defended—but nevertheless there would be rights which are covered both by moral as well as by legal orders.

Whether or not an interest is legally protected is a question of law and can be resolved by appeal to some provision of a statute or to the principles of common law which have been judicially recognised and enforced. A great deal would be said about this topic of the content of legal right, when a comment on ART. 224 is made.

114. The concept of Fundamental Right

For the present, however, conception of a legal right is set forth with a view only to defining, by way of contrast and comparison, the scope and content of those 'fundamental rights' that have been guaranteed in our Constitution. These rights are called fundamental because no organ of the State power, whether it be Executive or Legislative, can act in violation of them, and they can be taken away only in the manner in which the Constitution provides for their suspension, abridgment or elimination. This result can be achieved either by amendment of the Constitution itself or by the issue of a proclamation of emergency under ART. 191 followed by an order of the President under ART. 192. The effect of the latter kind of order, however, is to suspend the enforcement of the fundamental rights only during the period of proclamation of emergency, but the rights as such are not affected and can be duly enforced after the conclusion of the period of emergency.

115. Notion of the Fundamental Law is foreign to the Law of the English Constitution.

Now, the notion of a fundamental right is foreign to the grammar of the English Constitution which is, as has been remarked earlier, based on the sovereignty of Parliament. Although the doctrine of the sovereignty of Parliament now holds the field, in the sense that it is an indisputable rule of the English Constitution that once Parliament passes the law, no court can override that law and declare it void on any ground whatsoever, there have been, however, periods in the history of the development of English Constitution when this doctrine was not as firmly held as undoubtedly it is being held at the present day. Reference has already been made in Chapter I of this book to the attempts that have been made by some American jurists to read into Dr. Bonham's case (The English Reports Vol. LXXVII p. 638 (8 Co. Rep. 107a)) affirmation of the principle of judicial review of Parliamentary legislation. (See also article by S. E. Thorne "Constitution and the Courts": a re-examination of the famous case of Dr. Bonham in 54 Law Quarterly Review (1938) p. 543). Lord Coke countenanced in that case the existence of a law higher than the one that could be enacted by the Parliament, a law which because of its transcendent status must prevail whenever it came in conflict with parliamentary enactments. In a later case (City of London v. Wood decided in the year 1701) Holt C.J. commented on Dr. Bonham's case as follows :

"And what my Lord Coke says in Dr. Bonham's case . . . is far from any extra-

City of London v.
Wood (1701)
(12 Mod.
Reports p.
669.)

vagancy, for it is a very reasonable and true saying, that if an act of parliament should ordain that the same person should be party and judge, or which is the same thing, judge in his own cause, it would be void act of parliament; for it is impossible that one should be judge and party . . . ; and an act of parliament can do no wrong, though it may do several things that look pretty odd; for it may discharge one from his allegiance to the government he lives under, and restore him to the state of nature: but it cannot make one who lives under a government judge and party. An act of parliament may not make adultery lawful, that is, it cannot make it lawful for A to lie with the wife of B : but it may make the wife of A to be the wife of B, and dissolve her marriage with A."

Rex. v. Earl of Banbury
In yet another case Rex v. Earl of Banbury (Skinner, 527) the same learned Judge observed that the judge's daily business it was to construe and expound the Acts of Parliament and adjudge them to be void.

Different scholars in England and America have, however, taken a different view of the import of these decisions. The English critics, of whom Sir Carlton Allen and Holdsworth might be described as distinguished representatives, have taken the view that the observations in these decisions are all 'scattered dicta' and 'isolated statements' and that they, at no point of English Constitutional history, have been represented as reflecting the law on the subject and may be dismissed as 'gratuitous and nonsensical loose talk.' Professor Maclwain, who might be described as a representative of the American School, in his monumental study concluded in the year 1910, entitled 'The High Court of Parliament' (New Haven: Yale University Press) has, on the other hand, regarded these cases as representing continuance of ideas prevalent in mediaeval England, ideas that were later taken over by the American jurists and perfected into the doctrine of judicial review of legislation, which is the distinguishing feature of American constitutional jurisprudence.

It is true that all the 17th century English Judges and jurists extolled the common law and referred to it as the fundamental law and identified it with the law of the nature. It was, however, in the name of the common law as embodying something higher than what was reflected in the mere transient will of Parliament that limits to Parliament's legislative capacity were sought to be imposed. We may recall how Bacon, for instance, dealt with this question in his speech delivered on Calvin's behalf.

"A law favoureth three things:" said he, "life, liberty and dower".
He went on to argue that

"by the law of nature, all men in the world are naturalized one towards another; they are all made up of one lump of earth, of one breath of God . . . it was civil and natural laws that brought in these words of difference of 'civis' and 'exterus', 'alien' and 'native' and, therefore, because they tend to abridge the law of nature the law favoureth not them but takes them strictly and hardly on any point wherein they abridge and derogue from the law of nature."

It is however during the 18th century that we witness the dawn of enlightenment. This was an age of reason, an era that had been ushered in by the French Diests of that century. Men had, thanks to their philosophical writings, narrowly escaped from being crushed by the dead weight of tradition and authority represented by Aristotle and Bible, and had begun interrogating nature in an attempt to extort the secrets which lay locked in her breast. 'Back to nature' became the watchword of the philosophers and this in turn led to a great deal of emphasis being placed upon the powers of 'rationality'. Thus it was that mankind re-discovered the 'lex eterna' of the Romans. The doctrine of sovereignty of the people was preached with a missionary zeal by philosophers like Locke and Rousseau, and we find Deniel Defoe in his address to the House of Commons saying that:-

"If the House of Commons in breach of the laws and liberty of the people do betray trust reposed in them, and act negligently or arbitrarily or illegally it is the undoubted right of the people of England to call them to account for the same."

It was obvious that this was a challenge to the legislative omnipotence of the Parliament.

This is not the place in which history of the orderly development of these ideas could be traced in any measure of detail, but sufficient has been said to indicate that the notion of fundamental law and of the natural rights of man has inspired the entire development of constitutional history, not only of England but practically of all the civilised countries of the world. The law of nature or the law of God or principles of morality and natural justice have been the spurs that have brought about the development of nearly all our legal institutions.

116. Impact of Natural Law on the English Jurisprudence

The impact of the natural law on the development of English system of jurisprudence could be seen from the study of the manner in which the courts in England approach the questions relating to the enforceability of a 'custom'. The test formulated is that a custom will not be enforced by courts if it is unreasonable; in particular, in each case, the issue to be raised is whether the custom pleaded is such as can be called fair and proper and is such as a reasonable, honest and fair-minded man would adopt it. (Produce Brokers v. Olympia Oil and Coke Co. (1916) 2 K.B. page 296).

The 'law of nature' has found its way into equity jurisprudence.

"Whatever you take Roman equity as administered by the praetors," says Denning L.J. in his paper on 'The Need for New Equity', "or English equity as administered by the Lord Chancellor, in each case, equity involved the principles of natural justice. Equity claimed that these principles had priority over all the laws then existing: and therefore that the principles could be prayed in aid to mitigate their harshness or to soften their rigidity."

Similarly, the rules relating to natural justice are often invoked by courts when exercising their powers of superintendence and control over the inferior judicial and quasi-judicial authorities, as they do when they are invited to issue writs of prohibition and certiorari. The High Court in England exercises judicial control over certain classes of administrative acts, and in appropriate cases, quashes judicial and quasi-judicial decisions of administrative authorities if they are shown to be contrary to rules of natural justice.

In the British system of law when a question arises about the application of foreign law, enquiry is made to see if certain principles of natural justice such as fair trial, freedom of person, freedom of action have been disregarded (Cheshire, Private International Law, 3rd Edition, page 185).

The English courts have also evolved the doctrine of "unjust enrichment" in that they would refuse to permit any person to retain any advantage which he has gained unjustly. Lord Mansfield was the first Judge who attempted to introduce the doctrine in Moses v. Macferlan (1760) 2 Burr p. 1005). The doctrine suffered a decline in the nineteenth century but appears to have been revived by the present day judges and jurists. In the case of Baylis v. Bishop of London (1913) Ch. 127, Hamilton, L. J., no doubt said, : "Whatever may have been the case 146 years ago, we are not now free in the twentieth century to administer that vague jurisprudence sometimes attractively styled 'justice between man and man'." But the later day pronouncements of English Judges tend to show a move in the counter-direction.

The modern law of Quasi-Contract has been founded on the principles of natural

(a) For a 'custom' to be upheld by courts, it must be 'reasonable'

Produce Brokers v.

Olympia Oil and Coke Co. !

(b) Emergence of Equity Jurisprudence

(c) Rules of Natural Justice applied by Courts

(d) Recognition of Foreign Law by Courts

(e) Doctrine of unjust enrichment

(f) Law of

Fundamental Rights

justice. (see Blackstone's Commentaries Vol. III, 161, and the observations of Lord Mansfield in Moses v. Maferlan (1760) 2 Burr. 1005.) So also the growth of the Law Merchant can be explained as having been due to the influence of the principles of natural law.

117. Impact of Natural Law on the American Jurisprudence

The impact of the natural law on the system of American jurisprudence has been immense: we have already seen how the doctrine of judicial review, as it manifests itself in the enforcement of "due process clause" of the U.S. Constitution, reflects the paramountcy and predominance of the natural law, as also how frequently the American Judges invoke the principles of natural justice and make them virtually the foundation of their decisions in these cases. And, in fact, the incorporation of 'Bill of Rights' in the U.S. Constitution and the elasticity with which the clauses relating to 'due process' are interpreted, (an elasticity, illustrations whereof are often to be met with in the American decisions,) are in their turn but the echoes which the rebound of natural law continues to cause in the system of American jurisprudence. The doctrine of natural law did not thrive so much in the countries of their origin as it did in the soil of America. The ideas of the natural law were dominant in England and on the Continent throughout the 17th and 18th centuries and what is more they had received "authoritative form at the hands of Blackstone". But towards the close of the 18th century, however, their claim to being consulted as infallible oracles was suspected at least on the Continent, where the Historical School was gaining ground. And how strange that the twilight hour of the natural law on the Continent should have synchronised with the dawn of a new day in America—for there it was that these ideas in the words of Commager, "took root and flourished; institutionalized in state and federal constitutions, they took on not only sanctity but permanence".

And further, says our author:

"The strength and persistence of natural law concepts is one of the most arresting phenomena in American intellectual history, but it is not inexplicable. Americans inherited those concepts in the eighteenth century, found them wonderfully useful in the struggle against Parliamentary pretensions, and wove them into their own constitutional fabric as a matter of course. The neat formulas of a ready-made system of law, symmetrical in appearance and mechanical in operation, fitted well enough the simple needs of an eighteenth-century society and furnished a convenient solution to what seemed the most pressing of all constitutional problems—the establishment of effective limitations on government. Their precepts erected into constitutional dogma and their authoritative interpretation entrusted to the least democratic branch of the government, they resisted all but judicial modification and frustrated all but extraconstitutional evolution. Their constitutional form gave them sanctity and invested them with a certain immunity from criticism, and the judicial gloss with which judges annotated them shared something of that sanctity: in time criticism of the natural law doctrines which judges read into the Constitution came to be looked upon as an assault upon the Constitution itself. No system of law was better fitted to restrict government to negative functions, to put property rights on a par with human rights, or to invest existing economic practices with legal sanction; and from the beginning the dominant forces of American economy gravitated to the support of natural law: slavery, corporations, and industrial capitalism. It was no accident that corporations should early take refuge in a natural law interpretation of the contract clause, that slavery should find protection in the natural law limitations of the due process clause, and that, after the Civil War, capitalism—speaking through corporation lawyers—should persuade the Court to read into the Fourteenth Amendment natural law restrictions upon the police power of the States.

Impact of Natural Law on the American Jurisprudence

"Along with conservatism in law went veneration for the Law—a veneration which was enjoyed vicariously by its high priests and oracles and even by its acolytes. Americans alone of western peoples made constitutionalism a religion and the judiciary a religious order and surrounded both with an aura of piety. They made the Constitution supreme law, and placed responsibility for the functioning of the federal system upon courts. The Supreme Court, in time, became the most nearly sacrosanct of American institutions—became to Americans what the Royal Family was to the British, the Army to the Germans, the Church to the Spaniards. Criticism was sometimes acrimonious but rarely disrespectful. In the mid-1930's, when conservatives were exhausting the vocabulary of billingsgate against the chief executive, those who criticized the Supreme Court were regarded as tainted with un-Americanism, and the most instructive lesson to be drawn from Franklin Roosevelt's fight for judicial reform was to be found in the outpouring of quasi-religious devotion to the Court which the hearings of the Senate Judiciary Committee evoked." (See pp. 360—361 of his American Mind))

118. English Law and the Concept of Fundamental Rights

In England, of course, there has been no express formulation of the law relating to fundamental rights, in the sense of a law that would limit the legislative powers of the Parliament. But the English Judges have attempted to interfere with parliamentary enactments upon the assumption that the legislature, in the total absence of any clear and express provision to the contrary, does not wish to interfere with the basic and natural rights of the people—rights like right to life, liberty and property. Judges in England do not give effect to the doctrine of the abstract justice by declaring void parliamentary enactments but they, nevertheless, do give effect to these very notions in the matter of interpreting the parliamentary enactments that judicially seem to affect these rights. The clearest case on the subject is the one of Lee and another v. The Bude and Torrington Junction Rly. Co. (1871) L.R. 6 C.P. 567. The remarks of Willes J. in this case, to which reference has already been made, have become classical. "It is further urged," said the Judge, "that the Company was a mere nonentity and there never were any shares or share-holders. That resolves itself into this, that Parliament was induced by fraudulent recitals to pass the Act which formed the Company." And he went on to remark:

"I would observe, as to these Acts of Parliament that they are the law of the land; and we do not sit here as a court of appeal from Parliament. It was once said—I think in Hobart—that if an Act of Parliament were to create a man judge in his own cause, the Court might disregard it. That dictum, however, stands as a warning rather than an authority to be followed. We sit here as servants of the Queen and the legislature. Are we to act as regents over what is done by Parliament with the consent of the Queen, Lords and Commons? I deny that any such authority exists. If an Act of Parliament has been obtained improperly, it is for the legislature to correct it by repealing it: but, so long as it exists as law, the courts are bound to obey it. The proceedings here are judicial, not autocratic, which they would be if we could make laws instead of administering them. The Act of Parliament makes these persons shareholders, or it does not. If it does, there is an end of the question . . . Having neglected to take the proper steps at the time to prevent the Act from passing into a law, it is too late now to raise any objection to it."

Some of the rules of construction evolved and applied by the courts of law, as though they were the implied terms of the statute, with a view to securing 'fundamental' rights and liberties of citizens, are:

(a) The intention to take away property of a subject without giving him the legal right of compensation for the loss of it is not imputed to the legislature unless that intention is expressed in unequivocal terms. (See Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic) v. Cannon Brewery Co. Ltd. (1919) A.C. 744 at p. 752; See also observations of Du Parcq L.J. in Foster Wheeler Ltd. v. E. Green & Sons Ltd. (1946) 1 All E.R. 63 at pp. 66-67). In Chester v. Bateson, (1920), 1 K.B. 829, upon a case stated by Justices for Lancashire, Darling J. while dealing with the question regarding the validity of Regulation 2-A(2) of the Defence of the Realm Regulations (which provided that "no person shall without the consent of Minister take . . . any proceedings for the purpose of obtaining an order or decree for the recovery of the possession of, or for the ejectment of a tenant of, any dwelling house in which a munition worker is living and which is situate in an area declared by order of the Minister of Munitions to be a special area") observed:

"But the Regulation as framed forbids the owner of the property access to all legal tribunals in regard to this matter. This might of course legally be done by parliament; but I think this extreme disability can be inflicted only by direct enactment of the Legislature itself and that so grave an invasion of the rights of all subjects was not intended by Legislature to be accomplished by a departmental order such as the one of the Minister of Munition." (See also remarks of Scruton J. in re Boaler (1915), 1 K.B. 21 at p. 36).

Similarly, Sankey L.J. in the same case observed:

"It is true that the power to make a Regulation to prevent the successful prosecution of War being endangered is of a wide and sweeping character but I decline to hold that Parliament intended by these general words to give the Executive the right to close any of the King's courts against his subjects when they obtained the sanction of the Minister to resort thereto . . . I should be slow to hold that Parliament ever conferred such a power unless it expressed it in the clearest possible language and should never hold that it was given indirectly by ambiguous regulations made in pursuance of any Act."

But it must be carefully noted that in recent years, under the impact of growing need for social legislation, even the English Judges have become increasingly familiar with legislative interference with property rights and the strength of presumption against confiscation of property without compensation is no longer what it used to be and is, any how, frankly conceded to be weaker during times of national emergency (see Edgington, Bishop and Withy v. Swindon Borough Council, (1938) 4 All E.R. p 57). The Lord Chancellor, in the case of Local Government Board v. Arlidge (1915) A.C. 120, in the House of Lords, indicated that the whole trend of legislation was to sacrifice the rights of the few in order to improve the position of the many and at the same time Executive was undertaking functions which until recently were assigned to Judiciary. In his words:

"There is no doubt that the question is one affecting property and the liberty of a man to do what he chooses with what is his own. Such rights are not to be affected unless Parliament says so. But Parliament in what it considers higher interest than those of individuals has so often interfered with such rights on other occasions that it is dangerous for judges to lay much stress on what a hundred years ago would have been a presumption considerably stronger than it is today."

(b) Any legislative Act which purports to curtail the right of personal freedom ought to be construed strictly, (see Rex v. Halliday, ex parte Zadig (1917) A.C. 260 particularly the dissenting judgment of Lord Shaw of Dunfermline).

(c) Where the Act of Parliament is permissive, not imperative, and the power it confers is discretionary, the rule of construction to be adopted is that the discretion shall be so exercised so as to leave the private rights intact (See Metropolitan Asylums Dist. v. Hill, (1881) 6 A.C. 211).

119. Fundamental Rights and our Constitution

Part II of our Constitution entitled 'Fundamental Rights' contains a clear statement in regard to the rights of individuals (whether regarded qua individuals or members of a wider group like a community or a religious denomination), and these rights are fundamental not only in the sense that they have been mentioned in and guaranteed by the Constitution but are such as neither the Legislature nor the Executive can in any manner curtail or diminish. These rights limit legislative and executive power and are a clog on the 'temporary' will of the 'simple' majority in the Legislature. They embody a permanent and paramount law which cannot be disturbed by the will of Legislature or Executive. It can only be undone by the Nation and the People by recourse to the extraordinary method of effecting constitutional amendment as provided in ART. 216 of our Constitution.

It is true that when a proclamation of emergency has been issued by the President under ART. 191, he can also under ART. 192 declare that the right to move the courts for the enforcement of such of the rights conferred by Part II as have been specified in the order, and all proceedings pending in any court for the enforcement of any rights so specified, shall remain suspended for the period during which the proclamation is in force. But this provision in our Constitution is calculated merely to suspend the right to enforce the fundamental rights: fundamental rights themselves are not abrogated by such an order of suspension which can be passed under ART. 192 and in fact after the conclusion of the period of emergency, subject, of course, to the passing of Acts of Indemnity by Parliament under ART. 196, appropriate proceedings can be commenced for the enforcement of the rights which during the period of emergency could not be enforced.

These fundamental rights that have been constitutionally guaranteed operate like a double-edged sword: they not only destroy those portions of 'existing law' which are in conflict with these rights but they operate also to render void any State-action (whether in the legislative or executive field) which after the coming into force of the Constitution has the effect of taking away or abridging any of the fundamental rights. Any law passed in contravention of the rights preserved by Part II of our Constitution, to the extent of such contravention, would be void. (See ART. 4).

The specific mentioning of fundamental rights in constitutional documents owes its genesis and historic orientation to the fashion set in that behalf by the American people. They were the first who emphasized the necessity of incorporating these guarantees in, what they call, the Bill of Rights: a statement of these rights is to be found in amendments to the U.S. Constitution (1 to 10, 13 to 15 and 19), as also in certain other specific provisions that are to be found scattered about in the main text of the original Constitution drawn by the Philadelphia Convention. These provisions from the original Constitution would be found in S. 9 of Art. 1, (. . . privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it. No bill of attainder, or ex-post-facto law shall be passed); in its 10th Section (No State shall . . . pass any bill of attainder ex-post-facto law or law impairing the obligation of contracts . . .); in Section 2 of Art. III (. . . trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment shall be by jury . . .); in Section 2

Examples from other countries

Is it wise to have a Bill of Rights incorporated in the Constitution?

The view of English Jurists

Liversidge v. Sir John Anderson

Mr. Smith's views

of Art. IV (The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States), and in Art. VI (. . . no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States).

The fundamental rights have also been guaranteed by the Swiss Constitution (Arts. 4, 41, 44, 45, 49, 50, 55 to 58, 60 and 65); by the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republic (Arts. 118—121); by the Constitution of Ireland (Arts 40 to 44), and in the Indian Constitution (Part III, Arts. 13 to 35). (For the text of the American Constitution and the Indian Bill of Rights, please turn to Appendix.).

The wisdom of incorporating a chapter on fundamental rights has been gravely doubted by those who have been nurtured in the British tradition of constitutional jurisprudence. Under the English Constitution, as we have seen, there are no guaranteed or absolute rights.

The classical statement on the constitutional position in England with regard to the rights and liberties that are available to English subjects is contained in Dicey's Law of the Constitution, (1952) Ed. p. 197.

"There is in the English Constitution", says this writer, "an absence of these declarations or definitions of rights so dear to foreign constitutionalists. Such principles, moreover, as you can discover in the English Constitution are, like all maxims established by judicial legislation, mere generalisations drawn either from the decisions or dicta of Judges, or from statutes which, being passed to meet special grievances, bear a close resemblance to judicial decisions, and are in effect judgments pronounced by the High Court of Parliament."

"Safeguard of British liberty", says Lord Wright in the case of Liversidge v. Sir John Anderson and others (1942) A.C. 206; (1941) 3 All E.R. 338; 110 L.J.K. 724,—

"is in the good sense of the people and in the system of representative and responsible government which has been evolved".

That was the case in which the interpretation of Regulation 18-B of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, was the subject-matter of their Lordships' determination, and the question relating to the constitutional theory with regard to the liberties of the subjects came in indirectly for consideration.

In Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd Ed., Vol. 6, para 435, following statement would be found on this subject:

"The so-called liberties of the subjects are really implications drawn from the two principles that the subject may say or do what he pleases, provided he does not transgress the substantive law, or infringe the legal rights of others, whereas public authorities (including the Crown) may do nothing but what they are authorised to do by some rule of common law or statute. Where public authorities are not authorised to interfere with the subject, he has liberties. It follows that, apart from the general provisions ensuring the peaceful enjoyment of rights of property, and the freedom of the subject from illegal detention, duress, punishment, or taxation, contained in the four great charters or statutes which regulate the relations between the Crown and people, the liberties of the subject are not expressly defined in any law or code. Further, since Parliament is sovereign, the subject cannot possess guaranteed rights such as are guaranteed to the citizen by many foreign Constitutions. But it is well understood that certain liberties are highly prized by the people, and that in consequence Parliament is unlikely, except in emergencies, to pass legislation constituting a serious interference with them."

In the Yale Law Journal (1924, 34 Yale L.J. 277 at 285-286) Mr. Smith, writing under "Judicial Control of Legislation in the British Empire", observed as follows:

"Broadly speaking, it is true to say that the 'British Commonwealth of Nations' notwithstanding the immense diversity of its constituent elements has been practically unanimous in rejecting the theory that it is the function of the courts to protect the people from the encroachments of Legislature. Whether this theory be right or wrong, it clearly must stand as an original contribution to political thought of distinctly American origin. Under the British scheme of government the general doctrine is that Judges have no control over the policy of Parliament, except when they are called upon to decide between the conflicting clauses of rival legislatures in a federal system. If they hold that the particular statute is ultra vires, then the result automatically follows that it must fall within the proper competence of some other Assembly. The current of law-making power may be diverted, but it cannot be prevented from flowing as soon as it has found a proper channel and the only real correction for legislative folly is that which the suffrage places in the hands of the people themselves."

The real difficulty which is involved in the due maintenance of those constitutional guarantees that are mentioned in written constitutions, in the words of Professor K.C. Wheare, is:

"to define the nature and extent of these rights in such a way that something significant and realistic is achieved".

None of the usual rights or liberties which are recognized in a written Constitution is capable of precise and scientific definition, and there are hardly any rights which can be statutorily set forth in the form of absolute propositions. A declaration of fundamental rights, even if embodied in an absolute form in one of the Articles of Constitution, would be found encumbered by numerous provisos and other qualifying conditions which are calculated to control its scope and its application. Since these rights are justiciable they have to be very rigorously defined, and in the formulation of these rights one would always discover with dismay that what is affirmed so categorically to be an inviolable right in one part of the Constitution has been, in another part, rendered devoid of appreciable content. Professor K. C. Wheare illustrates this difficulty by making a reference to the Constitution of Ireland, and says:

"No realistic attempt to define the rights of the citizen indeed, can fail to include qualifications. Yet when we see the result it is difficult to resist asking the question: what of substance is left after the qualifications have been given full effect? The Constitution of Ireland provides an interesting example of this position. It contains a series of articles—numbers 40-44—enunciating fundamental rights. Consider this statement first: 'No citizen shall be deprived of his personal liberty save in accordance with law.' A little later there follows: 'The dwelling of every citizen is inviolable and shall not be forcibly entered save in accordance with law'. What does this guarantee amount to? The answer must be: 'It all depends on the law'. If wide discretionary powers of arrest and forcible entry are given by the law to the forces of the state, then the right of the citizen will be severely restricted." (See his Modern Constitutions. p. 57).

The difference in the constitutional position resulting from the adoption of the attitude of the English Constitutional Law to these rights and liberties, and the one adopted in those written Constitutions where fundamental rights have been declared as justiciable rights, is thus basically one of 'approach': and it would not be incorrect to say that the English theory of rights is founded on the supremacy of Parliament as opposed to the theory of Judicial Supremacy which reflects itself in the doctrine of 'judicial review' of legislation and which is available under a system of written Constitution only, and that too in a restricted category of cases. In England the courts have no power to declare a law passed by the Parliament as being void on any ground. Parliamentary omnipotence cannot co-exist with judicial supremacy; for one or the other, comparatively speaking, ought to be supreme. The English judiciary has jealously guarded the rights of the individuals against governmental encroachments by adopting a rule of rigorous construction in regard to the interpretation of those statutes under which Executive exercises its power of interfering with people's right to life, to property and to liberty. But the courts in England are helpless in the matter of safeguarding the individual against what may be regarded as legislative tyranny: should the majority in the Parliament decide to pass laws that gravely imperil or take away the rights of the citizens, there is nothing that the courts can do to save the situation. In England the whole matter is left to the good sense of those representatives of the people who sit in Parliament, and it is for them to exercise that wise and tardy self-restraint upon their unfettered power of enacting any and every kind of law, without which the rule by the majority can become a source of grave menace to the rights of individuals and of the political groups that are in minority in the realm.

Difficulty of securing precise formulation of Fundamental Rights
—K.C. Wheare

In those written Constitutions where fundamental rights are guaranteed, the underlying assumption is that the majority rule is likely to seriously interfere with the natural rights of the people. It is the view of some jurists that the Constitution should contain a statement of limitations upon the power of the Executive and Legislature, and further that the Judiciary should have the power, upon a case being presented to it, to decide whether or not the rights thus guaranteed have been abridged or taken away by an executive or legislative action. The written Constitutions, by and large are distrustful of legislative supremacy and have faith in the wisdom and sagacity of the Judges to uphold and defend the constitutional rights of the individuals against the executive and legislative assaults that are likely to be made against them.

Some Constitutions merely mention Fundamental Rights but do not make them justiciable—case of France

But not all the written Constitutions that contain provisions relating to fundamental rights contain provisions in regard to their judicial enforcement. Constitution of France may be cited as an example in this context. The framers of the Constitution of the Fourth French Republic have declared the rights of individuals by giving to them a prominent place in the preamble to their Constitution. They have also set-forth in the preamble a long list of political, social and economic principles upon which the State is directed to conduct its management of public affairs, but they have not provided any machinery for their enforcement in courts of law. Here is the preamble to the Constitution of the French Republic adopted by the National Constituent Assembly on September 28th, 1946:

"On the morrow of the victory of the free peoples over the regimes that attempted to enslave and degrade the human person, the French people proclaims once more that every human being, without distinction of race, religion, or belief, possesses inalienable and sacred rights. It solemnly reaffirms the rights and freedoms of man and of the citizen consecrated by the Declaration of Rights of 1789 and the fundamental principles recognised by the laws of the Republic."

"It further proclaims as most vital in our times the following political, economic and social principles:

"The law guarantees to women equal rights with men in all domains."

"Anyone persecuted because of his activities in the cause of freedom has the right of asylum within the territories of the Republic."

"Everyone has the duty to work and the right to obtain employment. No one may suffer in his work or his employment because of his origin, his opinions, or his beliefs."

"Everyone may defend his rights and interests by trade-union action and may join the union of his choice."

"The right to strike may be exercised within the frame-work of the laws that govern it."

"Every worker through his delegates may participate in collective bargaining to determine working conditions, as well as in the management of business."

"All property and all enterprises that now have or subsequently shall have the character of a national public service or a monopoly in fact must become the property of the community."

"The nation ensures to the individual and the family the conditions necessary to their development."

"It guarantees to all, and notably to the child, the mother, and the aged worker, health protection, material security, rest, and leisure. Every human being who, because of his age, his physical and mental condition, or because of the economic situation, finds himself unable to work, has the right to obtain from the community the means to lead a decent existence."

"The nation proclaims the solidarity and equality of all Frenchmen with regard to the burdens resulting from national disasters."

"The nation guarantees equal access of children and adults to education, professional training, and culture. The establishment of free, secular, public education on all levels is a duty of the State."

"The French Republic, faithful to its traditions, abides by the rules of international law. It will not undertake wars of conquest and will never use its arms against the freedom of any people."

"On condition of reciprocity, France accepts the limitations of sovereignty necessary to the organization and defence of peace."

"France forms with the people of its overseas territories a union based upon equality of rights and duties without distinction of race or religion."

"The French Union is composed of nations and peoples who wish to place in common or co-ordinate their resources and their efforts in order to develop their civilization, increase their well-being, and ensure their security."

"Faithful to her traditional mission, France proposes to guide the peoples for whom she has assumed responsibility toward freedom to govern themselves and democratically to manage their own affairs; putting aside any system of colonization based upon arbitrary power, she guarantees to all equal access to public office and the individual or collective exercise of the rights and liberties proclaimed or confirmed above."

Thus by enunciating these principles the makers of the French Constitution provided a frame of reference within which to appraise the ethics of political behaviour of the Government and Legislature in regard to the determination of questions concerning the transgression of the executive and the legislative authority. But they did not go beyond administering pious admonition to the principal organs of sovereign power they set out to establish: the final Court of Appeal, here as elsewhere, in any democratic state, is the coercive apparatus of public opinion, and the enforcement of these principles has therefore been left to its exclusive care and control.

In our Constitution, as even in that of India, we have several Articles that are in the nature of Directive Principles of State Policy, and it is provided specifically in relation to these principles "The State shall be guided in the formulation of its policies by the provisions of this Part, but such provisions shall not be enforceable in any court." (See ARTs. 23 to 31 of our Constitution and ARTs. 36 to 51 of the Indian Constitution). These provisions then constitute the manifesto of the policies and programmes of the two States as they are adumbrated and visualised by the Founding Fathers and are required to be kept in view by subsequent generations so as to secure continuity in the maintenance of a homogeneous and consistent policy in the matter of handling the affairs of the State.

We might in the context of these considerations point out yet one more difficulty which besets all those who attempt to secure enforcement of fundamental rights by means of judicial process. Considering that the courts of law are called upon to interpret and apply such nebulous and woolly expressions as 'reasonable restrictions on freedom of speech', 'right to assemble peacefully subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of public safety', 'right to form associations subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law', etc., they have, perforce, to embark upon an examination of the political and economic relevance of the legislation that is impeached before them as contravening the avowedly ill-defined rights, with the result that an impression is often created in the public mind that the courts of law are more in the nature of political institutions than independent and impartial tribunals for the enforcement and vindication of people's rights. Any one interested in investigating the kind of complications to which, what is called the 'Doctrine of Progressive Interpretation' of the Constitution has involved the United States Supreme Court, would do well to read cases decided by that court which clearly show that the expressions used in the United States Constitution have been, by a mere fiat of judicial decrees, accorded varying and different content from time to time.

Professor K. C. Wheare illustrates this difficulty by referring to the cases that have a bearing on the interpretation of the word 'liberty': (See his 'Modern Constitutions' pp. 64—67)

"In 1940 the Supreme Court of the United States was asked to decide on the validity of a regulation of a school board in the state of Pennsylvania, which required children attending the state schools to participate in a ceremony of saluting the American flag (Minersville School District v. Gobitis 310 U.S. 586). Some children of parents who belonged to the sect known as 'Jehovah's Witnesses' had refused to salute the American flag on the ground that to do so was in conflict with their religious beliefs. The Supreme Court was asked to declare that the regulation was invalid because it attempted to prohibit the free exercise of religion. The Court decided, with only one dissentient, that the regulation was valid. The argument of the majority was that the regulation, in requiring a ceremony of respect for the flag, was attempting, however unwisely, to strengthen the foundations of American society, and thus, so far from infringing liberty, was supporting the basis upon which it existed. The Court refused to substitute its own judgment of what was desirable in a matter of this kind for the judgment of the legislature. The dissenting Judge, Mr. Justice (later Chief Justice) Stone declared that the regulation was so clear a violation of liberty, both of speech and religion as guaranteed by the Constitution, that the Court was entitled to declare it invalid. In 1942, however, in the course of deciding a case, also brought by the Jehovah's Witnesses, concerning the validity of a requirement in the ordinances of certain American cities that sellers of various articles including books should be licensed, three of the judges of the Supreme Court, Justices Black, Douglas and Murphy, said that they had come to the conclusion that their view in the earlier case involving the saluting of the flag was wrong (Jones v. Opelika 316 U.S. 584 at pp 623-24). A year later, the decision in the case of 1940 was over-ruled, though by a majority. (West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette 319 U.S. 624). It may be mentioned that two new judges sat on the Court in 1943, as compared with the Court of 1940, and that Mr. Justice Stone was now Chief Justice. No one need be surprised that judges find it difficult to agree or to be consistent or certain in their interpretation of words of this kind."

"'Liberty' in the economic sphere may legitimately be used in different senses. One man may say that economic liberty means that a man may sell his labour for what he can get for it and work for as long as he can; another will say that, in the world, as it is, many men will be unable to sell their labour at all unless some restrictions are placed upon maximum hours of labour and minimum rates of wages. The first view we associate with laissez-faire, the second with the age of collectivism. The Supreme Court of the United States has not been unaffected by the changes in opinion in that country during the first half of the twentieth century. In 1905 (in the case of Lochner v. New York 198 U.S. 45), the Court declared that a statute of New York State, which had fixed a maximum of sixty hours per week and ten hours per day for bakers, was invalid, on the ground that it violated the liberty of the citizen to work as long as he liked. The right to sell or purchase labour, the Court said, was part of the liberty which the Constitution guaranteed. But it is interesting to notice that this view prevailed by a majority of five to four—the Court was far from unanimous. In 1908, however, the Court unanimously sustained an act of the State of Oregon fixing a maximum of ten hours a day for women workers in certain employments, (Muller v. Oregon 208 U.S. 412), and in 1917, by a majority of five to three, it sustained an act of the same State extending the maximum of ten hours to men. (Bunting v. Oregon 243 U.S. 426)."

120. Theoretical Basis of the 'Fundamental Rights'

The basis of the fundamental rights, as we have noticed before, is grounded on a philosophy which maintains that there is a higher transcendental law which cannot be undone by legislative will. From this it follows that there is, in existence, a graded scale of values which it is the function of the Court to invoke and apply when giving effect to the statute law.

If this view is correct, we are in a position to understand the difficulties that must be faced if the constitutional limitations which must, from the nature of the case, be embodied in static and petrified provisions are to be made applicable to the changing conditions in a dynamic society. For, here is a fertile ground upon which the judges applying the law are bound to discover the interplay of conflicting axiological notions. Judicial interpretation of fundamental rights or, as a matter of fact, of any other constitutional limitation upon the State power is bound to vary with different Judges, if only because the different judges who are called upon to interpret those provisions, consciously or unconsciously, are influenced by the type of the prevailing economic and social philosophy. The ruling ideas of the age become a fact in issue every time an attempt is made to interpret those constitutional provisions that cannot be understood without making a reference to them. For instance, when the balance between the interest of national security and the right to individual freedom has to be struck, line can only be drawn between these contending values in terms of some social philosophy to which a particular judge might owe his allegiance. This is so because existing economic and political conditions are to be viewed in the light of the scale of values which a judge places before himself as representing the norms against the background of which, in his opinion, judicial process must work. It is for this reason that Professor Friedmann in his book 'Legal Theory' says:

"Natural law thinking in the U.S. undoubtedly inspired the fathers of the Constitution, and it has dominated the Supreme Court more than any other law court in the world. Such thinking has not prevented the court from vacillating, from the unconditional condemnation of legislative regulation of social and economic conditions to its almost unrestricted recognition, from the recognition of almost unrestricted freedom of speech and assembly to the virtual outlawing of a political party, and, on the other hand, from the toleration of the most blatant discrimination against negroes to the strong protection given in recent judgments. Yet the American Constitution gives as near an approach to the unconditional embodiment of 'natural' rights as can be imagined. It is not the weakness or the vacillations of the court which in the face of such provisions have created so much uncertainty. The generality of 'Bills of Rights' and similar provisions can disguise but not eliminate the conflict of values and interests which is ever present. Neither the Australian nor the Canadian Constitutions—which are more easily comparable to the U.S. Constitution than any other—contain Bills of Rights, yet the conflict between economic freedom and State regulation, between the freedom of the individual and the power of self-protection of the State, and other basic conflicts have arisen in much the same manner, though in a different legal form". (p. 67)

As an illustration of the utter impossibility of avoiding the difficult task of interpreting a Constitutional Instrument (which does not include within its provisions a Bill of Rights) without reference to economic and political background of the time, we might refer to the case of Commonwealth of Australia v. Bank of New South Wales (1950) A.C. 235; (1949) 2 All E.R. p.755 where Lord Porter, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, remarks upon the relevancy of political, social and economic factors involved in the interpretation of expression like "trade being . . . free absolutely", occurring in S. 92 of the Australian Constitution (at p. 771):

"It is generally recognized that the expression 'free' in S. 92, though emphasized by the accompanying 'absolutely', yet must receive some qualification. It was, indeed, common ground in the present case that the conception of freedom of 'trade, commerce, and intercourse' in a community regulated by law presupposes some degree of restriction on the individual. As long ago as 1916 in Duncan v. State of Queensland, 22 C.L.R. 573, Sir Samuel Griffith, C.J. said: 'But the word 'free' does not mean extra legem, any more than freedom means anarchy. We boast of being an absolutely free people, but that does not mean that we are not subject to law'. Through all the subsequent cases in which S. 92 has been discussed, the problem has been to define the qualification of that which in the Constitution is left unqualified. In this labyrinth there is no golden thread. But it seems two general propositions may be excepted: (1) that regulation of trade, commerce and intercourse among the States is compatible with its absolute freedom, and (2) that S. 92 is violated only when a legislative or executive act operates to restrict such trade, commerce and intercourse, directly and immediately as distinct from creating some indirect or consequential impediment which may fairly be regarded as remote. In the application of these general propositions, in determining whether an enactment is regulatory or something more, or whether a restriction is direct or only remote or incidental, there cannot fail to be differences of opinion. The problem to be solved will often be not so much legal as political, social, or economic, yet it must be solved by a court of law. For where the dispute is, as here, not only between Commonwealth and citizen but between Commonwealth and intervening States, on the one hand, and citizens and States, on the other, it is only the court that can decide the issue. It is vain to invoke the voice of Parliament."

It is by now admitted on all hands that many of the leading cases in the first decade, after the establishment of the High Court of Australia, arose from challenges, many of them successful, to the fiscal and economic policies of the early Commonwealth Governments. (See The King v. Barger (1908) 6 C.L.R. 41; The Union Label cases (Attorney-General for New South Wales v. Brewery Employes Union of New South Wales (1908) 6 C.L.R. 469; Huddart, Parkar & Co. Proprietary Ltd. v. Moorehead (1908) 8 C.L.R. 330; Owners of Kalibia v. Wilson (1910) 11 C.L.R. 689; Bootmakers' cases (1910) 11 C.L.R. 1 and 311; Osborne v. The Commonwealth and George Alexander Mckay (Commissioner of Land Tax, (1911) 12 C.L.R. 321; The King and the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth v. The Associated Northern Collieries (1912) 14 C.L.R. 387; Adelaide Steamship Co. Ltd. v. The King and the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth (1912) 15 C.L.R. 65; Attorney-General of the Commonwealth v. Adelaide Steamship Co. Ltd. (1913) 18 C.L.R. 30).

It is precisely because of the peculiar role of the American Supreme Court, regarded as a political institution (and the truth of this observation would be apparent to anyone who cares to study the specific modes in which the judges of that court have allowed themselves to be influenced by the prevailing philosophy of the time, by the nature of the political and economic situation with which the country has been confronted), that Mr. Justice Frankfurter in his "Some Reflections on the Reading of Statutes", gives expression to the attitude which must, in his opinion, characterise the approach of those who are charged with the duty of settling questions relating to constitutional and statutory interpretation:

"There are varying shades of compulsion for judges behind different words, differences that are due to the words themselves, their setting in a text, their setting in history. In short, judges are not unfettered glossators. They are under a special duty not to overemphasise the episodic aspect of life and not to under-value its organic processes—its continuities and relationships. For judges at least it is important to remember that continuity with the past is not only a necessity but even a duty.

"There are not wanting those who deem naive the notion that judges are expected to refrain from legislating in construing statutes. They may point to cases where even our three justices apparently supplied an omission or engrafted a limitation. Such an accusation cannot be rebutted or judged in the abstract. In some ways, as Holmes once remarked, every statute is unique. Whether a judge does violence to language in its total context is not always free from doubt. Statutes come out of the past and aim at the future. They may carry implicit residues or mere hints of purpose. Perhaps the most delicate aspect of statutory construction is not to find more residues than are implicit nor purposes beyond the bound of hints. Even for a judge most sensitive to the traditional limitation of his function, this is a matter for judgment not always easy of answer. But a line does exist between omission and what Holmes called 'misprison or abbreviation that does not conceal the purpose.' Judges may differ as to the point at which the line should be drawn, but the only sure safeguard against crossing the line between adjudication and legislation is an alert recognition of the necessity not to cross it and instinctive, as well as trained, reluctance to do so."

It would be seen that the American approach is different from the traditional approach with which lawyers and judges in our country, who are schooled in the British system of legal thought and practice, regard their office when setting out to interpret and apply statutory or constitutional instruments to the solution of questions submitted for their advice or adjudication. (But of this more would be said in the Section of the Chapter on 'Structure, Nature and Reach of Judicial Power' which specifically deal with 'The Principles of Constitutional Interpretation'.)

But the one important reason which inclined the framers of our Constitution to include fundamental rights in the Constitution is that in a country where we have religious minority communities living side by side with the majority community professing the religion of Islam, it was necessary to provide in the Constitution some guarantees against which the legislative and executive rule by the majority party may not prevail. There is no better guarantee against executive and legislative tyranny, particularly where the democratic tradition is not well settled in the body-politic of a country, than the incorporation of fundamental rights in the Constitution.

"The very purpose of a Bill of Rights", says Mr. Justice Jackson in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette (1943) 319 U.S. 624, at p. 638, "was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty, and property, to free speech and a free press,

Reasons why the Bill of Rights was included in our Constitution.

freedom of worship and assembly, and other fundamental rights may not be submitted to vote ; they depend on the outcome of no elections."

Even during the days of our national struggle for independence, the leaders of Indian thought and opinion had frequently, both from the political platform and press, demanded recognition and enforcement of the fundamental rights, and as far back as 1928, in a report which is known as the Nehru Committee Report, it was stated that,—

"Our first care should be to have our fundamental rights guaranteed in a manner which will not permit their withdrawal under any circumstances."

At the Round Table Conference also, this demand was pressed by the Indian leaders. The demand, however, was not accepted for the reason given by the Statutory Commission in its Report, although it recommended a limited number of rights to be placed beyond the reach of the Indian Legislature. Some of the reasons that prompted the authors of the Report to reject the demand for the incorporation of fundamental rights are understandable, for they are the reasons that commend, naturally, themselves to the Englishman.

"We are aware", said the authors of the Report, "that such provisions have been inserted in many Constitutions notably in those of the European States founded after the war. Experience, however, does not show them to be of any practical value. Abstract declarations are useless unless there exist the will and means to make it effective". The Joint Parliamentary Committee, commenting on the extract in the Report cited above, remarked:

"With these observations we entirely agree; and a cynic might indeed find plausible arguments, in the history during the last ten years or more of more than one country, for asserting that the most effective method of ensuring the destruction of a Fundamental Right is to include a declaration of its existence in a constitutional instrument. But there are also strong practical arguments against the proposal, which may be put in the form of dilemma; for either the declaration of rights is of so abstract a nature that it has no legal effect of any kind, or its legal effect will be to impose an embarrassing restriction on the powers of the legislature and to create a grave risk that a large number of laws may be declared invalid by the courts because of inconsistency with one or other of the rights so declared".

The Government of India Act, 1935, did, however, contain constitutional guarantees in its sections 298, 299 and 300 :—

"Section 298.—(1) No subject of His Majesty domiciled in India shall on grounds only of religion, place of birth, descent, colour or any of them be ineligible for office under the Crown in India, or be prohibited on any such grounds from acquiring, holding or disposing of property or carrying on any occupation, trade, business or profession in British India.

(2) Nothing in this section shall affect the operation of any law which—

(a) prohibits, either absolutely or subject to exceptions, the sale or mortgage of agricultural land situate in any particular area, and owned by a person belonging to some class recognised by the law as being a class of persons engaged in or connected with agriculture in that area, to any person not belonging to any such class; or

(b) recognises the existence of some right, privilege or disability attaching to members of a community by virtue of some personal law or custom having the force of law.

(3) Nothing in this section shall be construed as derogating from the special respon-

ss. 298, 299 and 300 of the Government of India
Act, 1935

sibility of the Governor-General or of a Governor for the safeguarding of the legitimate interests of minorities.

"Section 299.—(1) No person shall be deprived of his property in British India save by authority of law.

(2) Neither the Federal nor a Provincial Legislature shall have power to make any law authorising the compulsory acquisition for public purposes of any land, or any commercial or industrial undertaking, or any interest in, or in any company owning, any commercial or industrial undertaking, unless the law provides for the payment of compensation for the property acquired and either fixes the amount of the compensation, or specifies the principles on which, and the manner in which, it is to be determined.

(3) No Bill or amendment making provision for the transference to public ownership of any land or for the extinguishment or modification of rights therein, including rights or privileges in respect of land revenue, shall be introduced or moved in either Chamber of the Federal Legislature without the previous sanction of the Governor-General in his discretion, or in a Chamber of a Provincial Legislature without the previous sanction of the Governor in his discretion.

(4) Nothing in this section shall affect the provisions of any law in force at the date of the passing of this Act.

(5) In this section 'land' includes immovable property of every kind and any rights in or over such property, and 'undertaking' includes part of an undertaking.

"Section 300.—(1) The executive authority of the Federation of a Province shall not be exercised, save on an order of the Governor-General or Governor, as the case may be, in the exercise of his individual judgment, so as to derogate from any grant or confirmation of title of or to land, or of or to any right or privilege in respect of land or land revenue, being a grant or confirmation made before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventy, or made on or after that date for services rendered.

(2) No pension granted or customarily payable before the commencement of Part III of this Act by the Governor-General-in-Council or any Local Government on political considerations or compassionate grounds shall be discontinued or reduced, otherwise than in accordance with any grant or order regulating the payment thereof, save on an order of the Governor-General in the exercise of his individual judgment or, as the case may be, of the Governor in the exercise of his individual judgment and any sum required for the payment of any such pension shall be charged on the revenues of the Federation or as the case may be, the Province.

(3) Nothing in this section affects any remedy for a breach of any condition on which a grant was made."

It would be noticed that these constitutionally guaranteed rights were prospective in their operation and did not affect any existing law which may have been in conflict with them. Nor, again, were any constitutional remedies for the enforcement of these rights provided for in the Government of India Act: they were left to be enforced by resort to ordinary remedies.

121. A Comment on ART. 4

ART. 4, clause (1) of our Constitution declares that "Any existing law, or any custom or usage having the force of law, in so far as it is inconsistent with the provisions of this Part, shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void." Existing law has been defined in ART. 218 as meaning any Act, Ordinance, order, bye-law, rule, regulation or notification, which immediately before the Constitution Day had the force of law in the whole or any part of Pakistan. Thus, in effect, the entire corpus juris of Pakistan existing immediately before the Constitution Day, and any custom or usage having the force of law, survives under

ART. 4.—
Effect of Laws inconsistent with Fundamental Rights in
Part II

ART. 224, which provides for the continuance in force of existing laws, subject to the overriding constitutional limitation contained in ART. 4, with the result that the extent to which any law is inconsistent with the provisions of Part II of our Constitution would be inoperative and void. It would be correct to describe that portion of the existing law which is inconsistent with rights guaranteed by Part II, as being unconstitutional: for this portion of the law, after the Constitution Day would, confer no rights; impose no duties; would afford no protection, and would in effect, not be a legal basis for doing anything. It is as if from that day it had never been on the Statute Book.

It should be clearly borne in view that laws relating to the members of Armed Forces, or Forces charged with the maintenance of public order, for the purpose of ensuring the proper discharge of their duties or maintenance of discipline among them, have been excepted from the operation of ART. 4 by the proviso to that Article.

The Indian Article which corresponds to ART. 4 also employs the same language, (see Indian Art. 13) and the word 'void' appearing therein, has been judicially interpreted in several cases that have been decided in that country. The Supreme Court of India in the case of Keshavan Madhava Menon v. The State of Bombay, AIR (1951) S.C. 128 have commented on Art. 13 (1) (which says, all laws in force in the territory of India immediately before the commencement of this Constitution, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Part, shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void) as follows (at p. 130):

"What Article 13 (1) provides is that all existing laws which clash with the exercise of the fundamental rights (which are for the first time created by the Constitution) shall to that extent be void. As the fundamental rights became operative only on and from the date of the Constitution the question of the inconsistency of the existing laws with those rights must necessarily arise on and from the date those rights came into being. It must follow, therefore, that Article 13(1) can have no retrospective effect but is wholly prospective in its operation. After this first point is noted, it should further be seen that Article 13(1) does not in terms make the existing laws which are inconsistent with the fundamental rights void ab initio or for all purposes. On the contrary, it provides that all existing laws, in so far as they are inconsistent with the fundamental rights, shall be void to the extent of their inconsistency. They are not void for all purposes but they are void only to the extent they come into conflict with the fundamental rights. In other words, on and after the commencement of the Constitution no existing law will be permitted to stand in the way of the exercise of any of the fundamental rights. Therefore, the voidness of the existing law is limited to the future exercise of the fundamental rights. Article 13(1) cannot be read as obliterating the entire operation of the inconsistent laws, or to wipe them out altogether from the Statute Book, for to do so will be to give them retrospective effect which, we have said, they do not possess. Such laws exist for all past transactions and for enforcing all rights and liabilities accrued before the date of the Constitution."

It would be observed that Das J., from whose judgment the above extract has been cited, drew a distinction between inconsistent laws becoming void for future purposes on the one hand and those laws being alive for the purpose of giving effect to past transactions, on the other. He virtually substituted the word 'repeal' with all its implications under S. 6 of the General Clauses Act for the word 'void'. The current effect of 'repeal' is, that as from the date on which repeal of a law becomes effective, the law so repealed ceases to exist, except as to the past transactions which are all saved and in relation to them the law is supposed to be alive: this principle has received statutory expression in S. 38 of the English Interpretation Act, 1889, and S. 6 of the General Clauses Act. It is pointed out, with respect, that when a law is repealed, as opposed to a case when a law lapses, the resulting Meaning of the term "Void"

Keshavan Madhava Menon v. The State of Bombay consequences in each of those two cases are different. In relation to past transactions, a statute having become void on the day on which past transactions are sought to be enforced by appeal to the law as it existed before the day on which it became void, the legal position is not the same as it would be in the case of the same law having been repealed. Ordinarily, for a right to be acknowledged, or liability to be imposed, or an obligation to be enforced, the date on which this can take place must be the date on which the law creating the right, liability, or obligation, as the case may be, is alive. But if in the meanwhile the law has become void, then prior transactions cannot possibly be enforced. When a law is repealed, it is only by the device of artificiality of statutory construction that it is supposed to be preserved in relation to past transactions, and so can be validly invoked for the purpose of justifying enforceability of rights and obligations that result from those transactions. The argument of Das J., it is submitted with respect, confuses the issue by not discriminating between the posthumous effect of a law which has been declared void, and the effect of a law which has been repealed. On this point, it is submitted with respect, the dissenting judgment of Fazal Ali J., states the correct principle. The whole history of the law relating to the interpretation of the effect of void and repealed statutes, has been summed up by the learned Judge with a great deal of forensic ability and skill. After reviewing the case-law in England, Mr Fazl Ali states his view on the question posed by the case before him as follows (at p. 132):

"I shall now proceed to consider what would be the correct legal position, when a provision of an existing law is held to be void under Article 13 (1) of the Constitution. From the earlier proceedings before Constituent Assembly, it appears that in the original draft of the Constitution, the words 'shall stand abrogated' were used instead of 'shall be void', in Art. 13(1), and one of the questions directly before the Assembly was what would be the effect of the use of those words upon pending proceedings and anything duly done or suffered under the existing law. Ultimately, the Article emerged in the form in which it stands at present, and the words 'shall stand abrogated' were replaced by the words 'shall be void'. If the words 'stand abrogated' had been there, it would have been possible to argue that those words would have the same effect as repeal and would attract S. 6, General Clauses Act, but those words have been abandoned and a very strong expression, indeed the strongest expression which could be used, has been used in their place. The meaning of the word 'void' is stated in Black's Law Dictionary (3rd Edn.) to be as follows:

'null and void; ineffectual; nugatory; having no legal force or binding effect; unable in law to support the purpose for which it was intended; nugatory and ineffectual so that nothing can cure it; not valid.'

"A reference to the Constitution will show that the framers thereof have used the word 'repeal' wherever necessary (see Arts. 252, 254, 357, 372 and 395). They have also used such words as 'invalid' (see Arts. 245, 255 and 276), 'cease to have effect' (see Arts. 358 and 372), 'shall be inoperative', etc. They have used the word 'void' only in two Articles, these being Art. 13(1) and Art. 154, and both these Articles deal with cases where a certain law is repugnant to another law to which greater sanctity is attached. It further appears that where they wanted to save things done or omitted to be done under the existing law, they have used apt language for the purpose; see for example Arts. 249, 250, 357, 358 and 369. The thoroughness and precision which the framers of the Constitution have observed in the matters to which reference has been made, disinclines me to read into Art. 13(1) a saving provision of the kind which we are asked to read into it. Nor can I be persuaded to hold that treating an Act as void under Art. 13(1) should have a milder effect upon transactions not past and closed than the

Dissenting Judgment of Fazal Ali J. Supported

"repeal of an Act or its expiry in due course of time. In my opinion, the strong sense in which the word 'void' is normally used and the context in which it has been used are not to be completely ignored. Evidently, the framers of the Constitution did not approve of the laws which are in conflict with the fundamental rights, and in my judgment, it would not be giving full effect to their intention to hold that even after the Constitution has come into force, the laws which are inconsistent with the fundamental rights will continue to be treated as good and effectual laws in regard to certain matters, as if the Constitution had never been passed. How such a meaning can be read into the words used in Art. 13(1), it is difficult for me to understand. There can be no doubt that Art. 13(1) will have no retrospective operation, and transactions which are past and closed and rights which have already vested will remain untouched. But with regard to inchoate matters which were still not determined when the Constitution came into force, and as regards proceedings whether not yet begun or pending at the time of the enforcement of the Constitution and not yet prosecuted to a final judgment, the very serious question arises as to whether a law which has been declared by the Constitution to be completely ineffectual can yet be applied. On principle and on good authority, the answer to this question would appear to me to be that the law having ceased to be effectual can no longer be applied. In R. v. Mawgan (Inhabitants) (1838) 8 Ad. & E. 496: (112 E. R. 927), a presentment as to the non-repair of a highway had been made under 13 Geo. III, C. 78, S. 24, but before the case came on to be tried, the Act was repealed. In that case, Lord Denman C. J. said :

'If the question had related merely to the presentment, that no doubt is complete. But dum loquimur, we have lost the power of giving effect to anything that takes place under that proceeding.'

And Littledale J. added: 'I do not say that what is already done has become bad, but that no more can be done.' In my opinion, this is precisely the way in which we should deal with the present case.

"It was argued at the Bar that the logical outcome of such a view would be to hold that all the convictions already recorded and all the transactions which are closed, should be reopened, but in my opinion, to argue on these lines is to overlook what has been the accepted law for centuries, namely, that when a law is treated as dead, transactions which are past and closed cannot be revived and actions which were commenced, prosecuted and concluded whilst the law was operative cannot be reopened.

"In the course of the arguments, a doubt was also raised as to what would be the effect in the case of an appeal pending when the Constitution came into force, from a conviction already recorded before 26-1-1950. The law applicable to such a situation is well-known and has been correctly summed up by Crawford in these words:

'Pending judicial proceedings based upon a Statute cannot proceed after its repeal. The rule holds true until the proceedings have reached a final judgment in the court of last resort; for that court when it comes to announce its decision conforms it to the law then existing, and may therefore reverse a judgment which was correct when pronounced in the subordinate tribunal from whence the appeal was taken, if it appears that pending the appeal a Statute which was necessary to support the judgment of the lower court has been withdrawn by an absolute repeal.'

"I think I should at this stage deal briefly with two points which were raised in the course of the arguments in support of the opposite view. It was urged in the first place that without there being a saving clause to govern Art. 13(1), it can be so construed as to permit offences committed prior to 26-1-1950, to be punished. The argument has been put forward more or less in the following form. The law which is said to be in conflict "with the fundamental rights was a good law until the 25th January, and, since Art. 13(1) is to be construed prospectively and not retrospectively, every act constituting an offence under the old law remains an offence and can be punished even after the 26th January. It seems to me that the same argument could be urged with reference to matters which constituted offences under a repealed Act or temporary Act which has expired. But such an argument has never succeeded. The real question is whether a person who has not been convicted before the Act has ceased to exist or ceased to be effectual can still be prosecuted under such an Act. The answer to this question has always been in the negative, and I do not see why a different answer should be given in the case of an Act which has become void, i.e., which has become so ineffectual that it cannot be cured.

"The second argument which also has failed to impress me is that if S. 6, General Clauses Act, does not in terms apply, the principle underlying that section should be applied. The answer to this argument is that the Legislature in its wisdom has confined that section to a very definite situation, and though it was open to it to make the section more comprehensive and general, it has not done so. It is well known that situations similar to those which arise by reason of the repeal of an Act have arisen in regard to Acts which have expired or Acts which have been declared to be void, and though such situations must have been well known to the Legislature, they have not been provided for. In these circumstances, I do not see how the very clear and definite provision can be enlarged in the manner in which it is attempted to be enlarged. Besides, I have not come across any case in which the principle underlying S. 38(2), Interpretation Act, or S. 6, General Clauses Act, has been invoked or applied."

The view of the law given in the above extract was concurred in by Mukherjea J. and it is submitted that it represents the correct statement of law on the subject. The majority decision, it is submitted with respect to the four Judges who were party to it, is not good law. When a law is rendered void, it cannot have the same effect as though it had been repealed. And S. 6 of the General Clauses Act does not in terms apply.

The Indian courts have however, drawn a distinction between enforceability of an inconsistent law, which is void on the ground mentioned in Art. 13(1), and the enforcement of such a law by means of an unconstitutional procedure laid down by a statute passed before the coming into force of their Constitution. Thus though in India the rights and liabilities, incurred under those pre-Constitution laws that by reason of their inconsistency with the fundamental rights guaranteed under Part III of the Constitution, have become void, can be enforced, they must be enforced only by resort to a constitutional procedure; and where in a pre-Constitution statute the procedure prescribed is in conflict with any of the provisions in the Constitution, then it is the procedure prescribed in the Constitution which will prevail. It is not a valid objection to the maintainability of any proceedings, or the result of the proceedings, which are justifiable under a pre-Constitution statute to say that they be interfered with merely because the statute in question has become void after the Constitution. (See Qasim Rizvi v. State of Hyderabad, AIR (1953) S.C. 156; Abdul Khader v. State of Mysore, AIR (1953) S.C. 355). The Indian courts have consistently held that the Constitution has no retrospective effect. (See (1) Keshavan Madhava Menon v. State of Bombay, AIR (1951) S.C. 128; (2) Lachmandas Kewalram v. State of Bombay, AIR (1952) S.C. 235; (3) Qasim Rizvi v. State of Hyderabad, AIR (1953) S.C. 156; (4) Habib Mohamed v. State of Hyderabad, AIR (1953) S. C. 287. See also Shree Meenakshi Mills Ltd. v. Visvanatha Sastri and others, AIR (1955) S. C. 13).

122. Meaning of term "Void" in American constitutional law

The meaning of term "void" in American Constitutional Law can be stated as follows: When there is a judicial declaration that a given statute is unconstitutional, in the theory of American constitutional jurisprudence, it is not the same thing as a nullification or abrogation of the statute so as, in effect, to efface, it from the Statute Book. In the case of Shephard v. Wheeling (30 W. Va. 479) it was observed:

"(The court) does not annul or repeal the statute if it finds it in conflict with the Constitution. It simply refuses to recognize it, and determines the rights of the parties just as if such statute had no application. The court may give its reasons for ignoring or disregarding the statute, but the decision affects the parties only, and there is no judgment against the statute. The opinion or reasons of the court may operate as a precedent for the determination of other similar cases, but it does not strike the statute from the statute book; it does not repeal... the statute. The parties to that suit are concluded by the judgment, but no one else is bound. A new litigant may bring a new suit, based on the very same statute, and the former decision cannot be pleaded as an estoppel, but can be relied on only as a precedent. This constitutes the reason and basis of the fundamental rule that a court will never pass upon the constitutionality of a statute unless it is absolutely necessary to do so in order to decide the case before it."

Shephard v. Wheeling

Willoughby quoted

In the words of Willoughby:

"Thus, when any particular so-called law is declared unconstitutional by a competent court of last resort, the measure in question is not 'annulled', but simply declared never to have been law at all, never to have been, in fact, anything more than a futile attempt at legislation on the part of the legislature enacting it. This is a very important point, for did the decision of the court operate as a nullification the effect would be simply to hold that the law should cease to be valid from and after the time such decision was rendered, whereas, in fact, the effect is to declare that the law, never having had any legal force, no legal rights or liabilities can be founded upon it." (See p. 10 of his 'Constitution of the United States', Vol. I).

It is the view of the American jurists that when a court declares a statute unconstitutional with reference to the facts of particular a case, it does so with an implied reservation that it is invalid, "as construed and applied", so that a statute unconstitutional at the time of its enactment may, because of the change of circumstances, become, in its application to those supervening circumstances, constitutional and vice versa.

United States
v.
Realty Co.

Although an unconstitutional statute does not create any rights or impose any obligations, if an individual in good faith should have acted to his detriment under a statute believed to be valid and moral, an equitable obligation on the part of the State may be created, sufficient to support an appropriation of public moneys for their indemnification. [See the case of United States v. Realty Co. (1896) 163 U.S. 427].

The constitutionality of law in several cases depends upon special facts of a particular case. In other words, a statute may not be void on its face, but may be open to the objection, that in its application to the facts of a particular case it violates some constitutional rights and safeguards. In such instances, the declaration that the statute is unconstitutional merely means it is unconstitutional as "construed and as applied".

123. Meaning of "State" in ART 3 of our Constitution

In our Constitution the word 'State' has been extensively defined to include, for the purpose of its application to Part II, "The Federal Government, Parliament, Provincial Governments, the Provincial Legislatures and all local or other authorities in Pakistan." (Art. 3)

It follows from this extensive scope for the application of the term 'State' that not only is it the legislative action, but also the executive and administrative action taken at the instance of any of the agencies mentioned in ART. 3 of our Constitution, that can be challenged on the ground that it is in conflict with any of the fundamental rights guaranteed by Part II.

In the case of Yick Wo. v. Hopkins (1886) 118 U.S. 356: 30 Lawyer's Edition 220, the question before the Supreme Court of the United States was, whether a certain Ordinance (which in its 68th Section had provided as follows) was against the federal guarantee of the due process clause as also the equal protection of law contained in the 14th Amendment.

"Sec. 68. It shall be unlawful, from and after the passage of this order, for any person or persons to establish, maintain or carry on a laundry within the corporate limits of the City and County of San Francisco without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone."

The contentions on behalf of the petitioner, who was a Chinese subject doing laundry business in the city of San Francisco, were stated by Matthews J. as follows (at p. 369):

(a) "that the Ordinances for the violation of which they are severally sentenced to imprisonment are void on their face, as being within the prohibitions of the 14th Amendment, and,

(b) that, "in the alternative, if not so, they are void by reason of their administration operating unequally, so as to punish in the present petitioners what is permitted to others as lawful, without any distinction of circumstances; an unjust and illegal discrimination, it is claimed, which, though not made expressly, by the Ordinances, is made possible by them."

Mr. Justice Matthews, first of all stated some general observations with respect to the constitutional principles involved in the determination of the case :

"When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power. Sovereignty itself is, of course, not subject to law, for it is the author and source of law; but in our system, while sovereign powers are delegated to the agencies of government, sovereignty itself remains with the people, by whom and for whom all government exists and acts. And the law is the definition and limitation of power. It is, indeed, quite true, that there must always be lodged somewhere, and in some person or body, the authority of final decision; and, in many cases of mere administration the responsibility is purely political, no appeal lying except to the ultimate tribunal of the public judgment, exercised either in the pressure of opinion or by means of the suffrage. But the fundamental rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, considered as individual possessions, are secured by those maxims of constitutional law which are the monuments showing the victorious progress of the race in securing to men the blessings of civilization under the reign of just and equal laws, so that, in the famous language of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, the government of the Commonwealth 'may be a government of laws and not of men'. For, the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself."

The impugned Ordinance was adjudged void because the facts of the cases before the Court presented Ordinances in actual operation and the Court remarked that (p. 373):

Yick Wo. v. Hopkins

Fundamental Principles of American
Jurisprudence

"..... the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion that whatever may have been the intent of the Ordinances as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, and thus representing the State itself, with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the State of that equal protection of the laws which is secured to the petitioners, as to all other persons, by the broad and benign provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by a public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution."

University of Madras
v.
Shanta Bai.

In the case of University of Madras v. Shanta Bai, AIR (1954) Madras 67, the words, "local or other authority" appearing in Art. 12 of the Indian Constitution were construed eiusdem generis with Government or Legislature, and it was held that when so construed, the expression "can only mean authorities exercising governmental functions. They do not include persons natural or juristic who cannot be regarded as instrumentalities of the Government". Madras University, although a body corporate created by Madras Act VII of 1923, and a State-aided institution was nevertheless held to be not one "maintained by the State", and therefore, was declared to be one not within the prohibition enacted by Art. 15 (1) of the Indian Constitution. The judgment in the above case also states the legal position as it obtains in America in regard to the distinction between "action by the State authority" and "individual action".

Following extract from the judgment will help comprehension of the legal position (P. 68):

"What is action by the State authority as distinguished from individual action has, in America, come for consideration frequently in connection with the interpretation of the 14th Amendment which prohibits States from enacting certain (specified) classes of legislation. In the Civil Rights Cases,—(1883) 27 Law Ed. 835, the question arose whether bye-laws and rules framed by Railway companies and by proprietors of public restaurants and hotels excluding the coloured races or limiting their rights to get accommodation were within the prohibition enacted in the Fourteenth Amendment. In holding that they were outside the purview of the Amendment, Bradley J. observed :

"It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject-matter of the Amendment."

"It may be possible to hold different opinions as to whether in a particular case the Act complained against is that of the State or of its instrumentalities or not (as to which see—United States of America v. Classic, (1941) 85 Law Ed. 1368 ; the comment thereon of a learned writer M. Pekelis in 'Law and Social Action' at pages 106 and 107 and the later decision of the Supreme Court in — Screws v. United States, (1945) 89 Law Ed. 1495). But the principle that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits only State action is itself not open to argument. That is State action as distinguished from individual action was thus stated by Strong J. in Ex parte; Commonwealth of Virginia (1880) 25 Law Ed. 676 at p. 679 :

"We have said the prohibitions of the 14th Amendment are addressed to the States They have reference to actions of the political body denominated a State, by whatever instruments or in whatever modes that action may be taken. A State acts by its legislative, its executive or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision therefore must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State Government, deprives another of property, life or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's power his act is that of the State.'

"The question has also been considered in America with special reference to Universities. Where the University is maintained by the State any regulation or law made by the University which is repugnant to the 14th Amendment has been held to be unconstitutional and appropriate writs have been issued. Such for example are the decisions in —Missouri Ex rel Gaines v. Canada, (1939) 83 Law Ed. 208,—Sipuel v. University of Oklahoma, (1948) 92 Law Ed. 247,—Sweatt v. Painter, (1950) 94 Law Ed. 1114—McLaurin v. Oklahoma S. Regents (1950) 94 Law Ed. 1149. But where the University is not one maintained by the State, their regulations are not open to attack under the 14th Amendment because such a University cannot be considered to be a State. A case of this kind arose in—People Ex Rel Tinkoff v. North Western University, (1948) 93 Law Ed. 383. The North Western University was incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois in January 1851. It was not maintained by the State, though it received aid from the State. Vide the decision in—North Western University v. People, (1879) 25 Law Ed. 387, where the constitution of the University is set out. The University reserved the right to reject any application for admission to it for any reason which it considered adequate. An applicant who had been denied admission to the college filed a suit against the University to compel it to admit him. In dismissing this action Judge Kiley observed:

"Under its Charter the University had the power to adopt whatever rules it deemed necessary to the proper attainment of the University purpose."

An application to the Supreme Court for the issue of a writ of certiorari against this decision was dismissed. Vide—People Ex Rel Tinkoff v. North Western University (1948) 93 Law Ed. 383. Commenting on this decision a learned American writer Mr. Chambers, observes:

"The outcome, no doubt, will be regarded as a strengthening of the ramparts defending the right of a privately controlled educational institution to select its own students, free from State compulsion. The way is open for the State to provide facilities for higher education for all qualified applicants at its own State universities and colleges.'

"The distinction between State-maintained universities and State-aided universities has also been adopted in several decisions pronounced by the State Courts in America. Thus in—Norris v. Marjor and City Council of Baltimore, 78 F. Supp. 451 (D.Md. 1948), a rule prohibiting admission of Negroes in a private school which received aid from the State, but was not maintained by it, was held not to violate the 14th Amendment; whereas a similar provision in —Kerr v. Enoch Pratt Free Library, 149 F. 2d. 212 (4th Cir. 1945), was held to be void as the school was maintained by the Local authorities (vide 62 Harvard Law Review, pp. 126 to 128) "

124. Does the term "State" as defined in ART. 3 include "Judicial Authorities"

The question that arises in regard to the interpretation of ART. 3 is, whether the definition of the term 'State', (which term is, as has been remarked earlier, indeed, very widely defined to include the executive and legislatures, both of the Federations and the Provinces, and 'all local and other authorities in Pakistan') includes also the 'Judicial authorities'. Does the expression 'all local and other authorities' mentioned in ATR. 3, call for an eiusdem generis interpretation? In which case, of course, it is bound to exclude judicial authorities. But in any other case the term 'other authority' is sufficiently wide to cover the case of courts and other judicial authorities.

If judiciary is to be the guardian of the Constitution, and constitutes the final authority that determines what the law, constitutional or otherwise, is on a given subject, it is difficult to conceive of a case in which the determination by judiciary can itself be subject to any supervision by any agency other than by judiciary itself. In America, the operation of the 'due process' clause is, for instance, sufficiently sweeping to cover those cases where proper judicial procedure has not been followed by subordinate courts. But even there, once the final court, i.e., the United States Supreme Court, declares what the law is, the matter cannot be re-agitated in any other forum upon the footing of an argument that the decision of the Supreme Court is contrary to any of the constitutional guarantees given to the American subjects. To take an extreme case: suppose the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is plainly opposed to one of the rights mentioned in the Bill of Rights, that is Amendments I to IX; would it be possible in such a case by any other court or authority to declare the determination of a question finally made by the Supreme Court, to be unconstitutional? The answer is obviously in the negative: it is true that the matter can be taken up by review before the Supreme Court, but if the Supreme Court itself chooses to be obdurate, and refuses to give any effect to the submission that its decision is contrary to the Constitution, it would not be possible to have the matter agitated anywhere else. This is another way of saying that the judicial pronouncements of the Supreme Court are final even though the judgments given by it be in ignorance or defiance of the provisions of the Constitution.

When a decision of the subordinate court is attacked before a higher or the final court on the ground that the decision is contrary to some fundamental right, such a contention would be based on the ground that the Constitution having been ignored the decision should not be allowed to stand. But it would be seen that this contention would prevail not only in relation to violation of the provisions of Part II of the Constitution but in respect of the entire set of the provisions of the Constitution, except of course, in those cases where jurisdiction of courts has been expressly excluded in respect of challenges based on the violation of the Constitution.

Judiciary under the scheme of our constitution

Judiciary in our Constitution is not, having regard to the scheme and arrangements of its various provisions, made a part of the Government machinery, but has been treated in a separate part (see Part IX). (Chapter I of Part IV of our Constitution talks of Federal Government, and Chapter I of Part V of Provincial Government; similarly Chapter II of Part IV talks of Parliament of Pakistan, and Chapter II of Part V talks of the legislature of the Provinces. The framers of the Constitution could very well have included the provisions relating to judiciary in these Parts (just as the framers of Indian Constitution have done (See the Indian Constitution Parts V and VI which deal with the Federal and Provincial Governments and compare them with Parts IV and V of our Constitution).

The entire Constitution (and not only the chapter relating to fundamental rights) has to be interpreted by the judiciary even as its provisions have to be obeyed by the legislature, executive and judiciary—but it is the judiciary which being the final judge of its own jurisdiction is the final authority upon matters affecting judicial determination of the scope of constitutional provisions. Our Supreme Court is the highest judicial authority and its pronouncements are constitutionally declared binding on all organs and authorities set up under the Constitution, and these cannot be challenged by them on any ground whatsoever—the only way to do this is to commence Review Proceedings before the Supreme Court itself. If this line of reasoning is correct the definition of the word 'State' in ART. 3 would not be so construed as to include 'Supreme Court', within the scope of its application. That view would appear to be in line with the view taken of this matter in some Indian decisions. (See Ratilal v. State of Bombay AIR (1953) Bombay 242 and observations of S.R. Das J. in State of Punjab v. Ajai Singh AIR (1953) S.C. 10)

Does the term "State" as defined in ART. 3 include "Judicial Authorities"

125. Fundamental Rights are exhaustively stated in Part II of our Constitution—The American Constitution contrasted.

It is important to notice that the fundamental rights guaranteed by Part II are exhaustively stated, and since there is no Article, corresponding to the United States Amendment No. 9, in our Constitution, (that amendment says "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people") they are the only rights that are fundamental. Thus although the American courts are not necessarily confined to recognizing rights that are expressly stated in the Constitution as being 'fundamental', our courts are. The American view of the law on the subject herein advanced is supported in the case of Calder v. Bull (1798) 1 Law Ed. 648. The United States Government is one based on the theory of limited powers, that is powers that have been delegated to it by the nation or the people who have expressly retained other rights with themselves. The constitutional principle was stated as follows: (at p. 649)

"The obligation of a law in governments established on express compact, and on republican principles, must be determined by the nature of the power, on which it is founded. A few instances will suffice to explain what I mean. A law that punished a citizen for an innocent action, or, in other words, for an act, which, when done, was in violation of no existing law; a law that destroys, or impairs, the lawful private contracts of citizens; a law that makes a man a judge in his own cause; or a law that takes property from A. and gives it to B. It is against all reason and justice, for a people to entrust a Legislature with such powers; and, therefore, it cannot be presumed that they have done it. The genius, the nature, and the spirit, of our state governments, amount to a prohibition of such acts of legislation; and the general principles of law and reason forbid them. The Legislature may enjoin, permit, forbid, and punish; they may declare new crimes; and establish rules of conduct for all its citizens in future cases; they may command what is right, and prohibit what is wrong; but they cannot change innocence into guilt; or punish innocence as a crime, or violate the right of an antecedent lawful private contract; or the right of private property. To maintain that our federal, or state, Legislature possesses such powers, if they had not been expressly restrained, would, in my opinion, be a political heresy, altogether inadmissible in our free republican governments."

It would be noticed that in the foregoing passage a curious species of reasoning is offered. If an act by its very definition is crime merely because it is declared by the law of the State to be one, the question of changing "innocence" into "guilt" by the legislature or by any one else becomes meaningless—unless of course we read into every crime the violation of some supra-sensuous moral mandate. It is notorious that moral casuistry is not capable of being objectively described, and ethical judgments are admittedly often subjective or of relative validity and are invariably contradictory. This then is the paradox of all legal institutions: if the rightness or wrongness of conduct is to be judged merely from the declarations made in that behalf by the legislature in respect of certain acts and omissions, then the inherent moral implications of those acts and omissions do not so much as arise for judicial consideration. A thing that is directed to be done by law is right and disobedience to the mandate commanding a certain course of conduct is wrong. Rightness or wrongness have no other content in law.

Calder v. Bull

How then is it possible for courts to say in the case of any act or omission defined by law to be a crime, that it is, in fact, not a crime but an innocent act?

126. Difference between "Law Ex-facia being bad" and "The unjust administration of a Law valid on its face, being bad".

When any Act of the Legislature is challenged as being inconsistent with any of the rights and guarantees preserved by Part II of our Constitution, care must be taken to distinguish between the impugned law as such offending against the provisions of Part II from merely the objectionable manner in which some individual officers, who are charged with the duty of administering the law, happen to conduct themselves in the matter of issuing orders or notifications etc. under that law,—a manner of proceeding which violates the fundamental rights of the citizens. If the law ex facia is one which comes in conflict with any of the fundamental rights, these rights must prevail and the law must be declared as unconstitutional. But there may be a case in which what the real complaint is, relates not to the law as such offending against the Constitution but only to the manner in which it has been administered. In the latter category of cases, the court can declare the action of the executive officer as being one which invades the fundamental rights guaranteed by Part II. Such a declaration will not have the effect of nullifying the law but only of annulling the State-action taken under the guise of that law.

These considerations have been set forth in the case of Dhanraj Mills v. B. K. Kocher AIR (1951) Bombay 132, a case wherein their Lordships of the Bombay High Court were considering the question whether a challenge directed against administrative action, and not the law as such, which offends against the right to equality guaranteed by Art. 14, could be regarded as giving rise to a cause of action to enforce a fundamental right under Art. 14. It would be profitable if we could study the facts and the reasoning underlying the decision of that case somewhat closely.

The law under challenge was the Cotton Control Order, and during the course of arguments the grievance that was made on behalf of the petitioner was not that the impugned law directly denied equal protection of law by unfairly discriminating between one section of the public and another, or one class of subjects and another, but the complaint, in substance, was based on the allegation that in the administration of that law, allocations had been made by the authorities charged with the duty of working the law in a manner which showed that there was an unfair discrimination against the petitioner. Chief Justice Chagla then proceeded to consider, what he regarded was, an important question, namely, whether Art. 14, as it is enacted, applies to administrative orders (p. 134):

"There can be no doubt", the Chief Justice observed, "that if a law is so passed as to make discrimination or deny its application equally to all subjects, such a law can be challenged under Art. 226 as offending against Art. 14 of the Constitution. But the matter is not free from doubt when we come to executive or administrative orders. Can a subject say that although the law is perfectly valid, it does not offend against Art. 14 of the Constitution, but an officer in administering the law is acting contrary to the provisions or the principles underlying Art. 14?"

The learned C.J. then remarked (at p. 135):

"Now a clear distinction must be borne in mind between the law and the administration of the law. If the law itself permits discrimination, even though the law may appear to be fair and undiscriminatory, the Court may interfere and say we are more concerned with how the law actually works rather than how it appears in black and white in the statute book. One may even have a case where in exercising the discretion

Dhanraj Mills
v.
B.K. Kocher

Difference between Law Ex-facia being bad and the unjust administration of a Law valid on its face being bad vested in officers under the statute the State may, as a policy of administration, require its officers to exercise the discretion unfairly and unequally. We can imagine that even in such a case the Court may interfere and say that although administrative orders are being challenged, the administrative orders suggest behind them a policy of the State of discrimination. But to our mind the position is different when a subject comes to the Court and challenges a specific act of an individual officer as being in contravention of Art. 14. The officer in acting contrary to Art. 14 is really acting contrary to the law and not in conformity with or in consonance with the law. When the law invests an officer with a discretion, the law assumes that the officer will exercise the discretion bona fide and not dishonestly, arbitrarily or capriciously, and if he exercises the discretion dishonestly, arbitrarily or capriciously, he is really going contrary to the law. In such a case the subject comes to Court not for protection under Art. 14, but for protection against the dishonest, arbitrary or capricious act of the officer. The Court is not powerless to give the subject protection against a dishonest officer, but that protection cannot be sought under Art. 14 or under Art. 226. We are only concerned in this case with the question as to whether the petitioner has a right to maintain a petition against, what he chooses to call, a dishonest exercise of his discretion by an officer. There is no suggestion here that the State as a policy has laid down that licenses should be issued or quotas should be allotted not in a fair manner but in order to benefit a particular class of citizens. As we said and as we repeat, the only charge, and even that is not properly or fully laid, is against respondent I, that he in exercising the discretion to allot has been swayed by certain unfair considerations.

"The authorities on which Mr. Pitt has relied do not support his contention that a specific mala fide act of an officer can be challenged by a petition in support of the fundamental right guaranteed to the citizen under Art. 14. He has relied on two or three American cases, and the leading case on which he has laid considerable emphasis is the case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, (1886) 118 U.S 356; 30 Law. Ed. 220.

"When we look at that case we find that what was challenged in that case was not any administrative or executive order, but an ordinance passed by the City of San Francisco which required all persons desiring to establish laundries in frame houses to obtain the consent of certain municipal officials, and it was found that in giving consent the municipal officials had acted unfairly and that the policy of the administration was directed exclusively against a particular class of persons, viz. the Chinese. On those facts the Supreme Court held that though a law be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is administered by public authority with an evil eye and unequal hand, so as practically to make illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution. Therefore, here we have a case where although the law superficially seemed to be fair and equal, in its actual administration it was found to be unfair and unequal. The other case is the case of Tarrance v. State of Florida, (1902) 188 U.S. 572. That was a case where a coloured person went in appeal to the Supreme Court against his conviction for murder alleging that negroes were discriminated against in the selection of grand and petit jurors, and the Supreme Court took the view that if that fact had been established the negroes would have been denied the protection of equality of law under the provision of the American Constitution corresponding to Art. 14. It is true that in a sense what was challenged here was not any law but the administrative action on the part of the County Commissioners in the State of Florida who prevented negroes from being empanelled as jurors. But the case is clearly distinguishable because it was not

The case of Yick Wo v.
Hopkins reviewed.

Tarrance v.
state of Florida.

on a petition for a writ that the aggrieved party went to the Supreme Court. The aggrieved party went to the Supreme Court in appeal against a conviction alleging that he did not get a fair trial because his right to have a jury in which negroes were represented was denied to him, and even here the judgment of the Supreme Court suggests that before the appellant could succeed the Court would have to be satisfied that it was the policy of the State of Florida to prevent negroes from acting on the jury."

It is submitted that the view in the foregoing extract reproduced from the judgment of the Bombay High Court does not give full effect to the definition of the word 'State' in Art. 13 of the Indian Constitution, which includes administrative action by the Executive. The action complained was certainly not against the law but since it was in violation of the guarantee given by the Constitution, it could have validly been agitated upon a writ petition. The guarantee of equal protection of law, also contains the guarantee that the law, which on the face of it is fair and impartial, will nevertheless be administered impartially. The reasoning of the Bombay case does not do justice to this aspect of the guarantee of equal protection of laws. The mandate is not only addressed to the legislature to pass just and impartial laws — it is also addressed to those charged in that Act with the duty of administering it that they must not apply an Act which is not ex facia discriminatory, with an unequal hand or an evil eye. Unjust and discriminate administration of legislation is thus within the mischief of the prohibition against unconstitutional discrimination given by the guarantee of equal protection of law.

Art. 14 of the Indian Constitution prohibits the State from denying to any person equality before law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India. This gives rise to the fundamental rights of the citizens and other persons not to be subjected to discriminatory laws. An executive officer who discriminates unfairly pursuant to the purported performance of his duties under a law which on the face of it does not show any legislative intent to discriminate is nevertheless denying to the aggrieved person equality before law or equal protection of the law. To that extent, then, the executive officer would be guilty of violating the fundamental right of the subject. Besides, the word 'law' has been given a statutory definition in the Indian Constitution and includes even the orders and notifications "having the force of law" (see Art. 13 (3)). Consequently an order of an administrative agency would be 'law' and if it is discriminatory it is one which offends against the fundamental right guaranteed by Art. 14. It must however be pointed out that the view of the Bombay High Court under criticism has been followed in some other cases in India e.g.

- (a) Dineshcharan v. State of Madhya Bharat, AIR (1953) M.B. 165;
- (b) Kanti Cotton Mills v. State of Saurashtra, AIR (1953) Saurashtra 46;
- (c) Krishna Khandewal & another v. Director of Land Hiring and Disposal Eastern Command & others, AIR (1952) Calcutta 16.

But it is submitted that these cases do not lay down a correct statement of the law even in India in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court in Kathi Raning v. State of Saurashtra AIR, (1952) S.C. 123; Kedar Nath v. State of West Bengal, AIR (1953) S.C. 404; State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali, AIR (1952) S.C. 75; decisions which clearly say that the guarantee of Art. 14 includes in its purview both executive as well as legislative acts.

Nevertheless, the distinction between law being ex facia bad because it is inconsistent with rights guaranteed by Part II of our Constitution as opposed to the mere administration of that law in a manner which violates those rights is fundamental; for in the former case it is the law that is bad, and in the latter it is only the action complained of that will be rendered, by means of a judicial declaration, void and thus deprived of its legal force,

Difference between Law Ex-facis being bad and the unjust administration of a Law valid on its face being bad and the law would continue to stay on the statute book as a valid piece of legislation. This view has found favour with the Supreme Court of our country in the case of Jibendra Kishore and others v. The Province of East Pakistan PLD (1957) S.C. 9, where after considering several American cases including Yick Wo v. Hopkins (1886) 118 US 356, their Lordships of the Supreme Court, while dealing with the constitutionality of S. 3 of the East Bengal Abolition of Zamindari Act, 1950, which had conferred unguided discretion upon the Provincial Government to acquire estates of the Zamindars, observed: (at p. 33)

"The Act challenged in these cases is not discriminatory on the face of it because it does no more than empower the Provincial Government to acquire the interests of such rent-receivers as may be specified in the notification in any district, part of a district or local area, and the Provincial Government could, as it has actually done so far as the present appellants are concerned, acquire the interests of all rent-receivers throughout the Province at one and the same time, and if the law be, as I think it is, that in cases where a statute is not ex facia discriminatory, but is capable of being administered in a discriminatory manner, the party challenging the constitutionality of the statute must show that it has actually been administered to the detriment of a particular class and in a partial, unjust and oppressive manner, the appellants' case must fail because the acquisition challenged is not piecemeal but wholesale, and nobody can have any occasion to complain that he or the class to which he belongs has been singled out for a discriminatory treatment." (per Munir, C.J.)

127. Prohibition of ART. 4 cannot be enforced by means of a Writ of Mandamus to be issued to Legislature.

ART. 4 also prohibits the State from enacting any law, "which takes away or abridges rights conferred by this Part", and declares that "any law in contravention of this clause shall, to the extent of such contravention, be void". (See ART. 4, clause (2)). Despite the fact that the Constitution contains an express prohibition directed against the legislative organs thereby preventing them from making any law which takes away or abridges the rights conferred by this Part, there is no known method whereby the legislature can be prevented from enacting laws, which are inconsistent with the fundamental rights guaranteed under the Constitution. No mandamus can lie to compel the legislature to do or refrain from doing any act. (For an unsuccessful attempt to obtain prohibition against a legislative body see Rex v. Legislative Committee of the Church Assembly Ex-Parte Haynes-Smith (1928) 1 K.B. 411). Besides, when the Bill is introduced in the House it does not become an Act of the Legislature until it has actually been taken through the various stages of law-making and has received the assent of the Governor, if it is a Provincial law, and of the President, if it is a Federal law. It is thus only the completed Act of the Legislature which can be prohibited, and when the Act is actually passed it is no use prohibiting it as it can be declared void by courts. Thus it is not the mere projected adventure by the Legislative Assembly which is calculated to result in the consummation of a law which purports to take away fundamental rights of the citizens that can be prohibited by courts. Every Bill that is moved in the State Legislature can be opposed by any one of its members, and even if its principle is accepted it can be amended and drastically modified. It would thus be worse than useless for any court, assuming it had the jurisdiction to issue mandamus to legislative bodies, to interfere with legislative process when the act of the Legislature is not complete. If the Act, as it finally emerges is in conflict with the fundamental rights, it would ipso facto be void and can be declared as such by our courts.

Jibendra
Kishore
v.
Province of East Pakistan

Rex v. Legislative committee of the Church
Assembly

In support of this view reference could usefully be made to the case of Chotey Lal v. The State of U.P. AIR (1951) Allahabad 228, where it was observed (at p. 231):

"It is necessary to understand exactly how and in what circumstances courts declare laws invalid or unconstitutional. Until a bill has become law, the legislative process not being complete, courts do not come into the picture at all. It is not the function of any court or Judge to declare void or directly annul a law the moment it has been promulgated. Courts are not a supervisory body over the Legislature. Their approval or disapproval is not needed for an Act passed by the Legislature to have the force of law.

"Their function is interpretative. In other words, upon any particular case coming before them in which the right of any party is involved they decide whether the Act or any part of it is to be disregarded on the ground of its incompatibility with the Constitution."

128. Acts Void only to the extent of inconsistency—Doctrine of Severability

If any Act enacted by the legislature comes in conflict with any of the fundamental rights, it becomes void but only to the extent of its inconsistency. The doctrine of 'severability' expounded earlier (see p. 264-6) in connection with the study of legislative competence of the rival legislatures in Pakistan would then apply. When an Act is only partly invalid it cannot be declared entirely invalid if the remaining portion of the Act which is not invalid can stand by itself and is deemed sufficient to carry out the purposes of the Act. (See Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 27, where it was held that the declaration as to the invalidity of S. 14 of the Preventive Detention Act, 1950, did not deprive the rest of the Act or its claim to stay on the statute book. See also State of Bihar v. Kameshwar Singh, AIR (1952) S.C. 252; Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada (1947) A.C. 503 at p. 518:

"The real question" said the Privy Council in the last mentioned case, "is whether what remains is so inextricably bound up with the part declared invalid that what remains cannot independently survive or, as it has sometimes been put, whether on a fair review of the whole matter it can be assumed that the legislature would have enacted what survives without enacting the part that is ultra vires at all".

129. The issue whether an Act is void must be decided by reference to the provisions of the impugned Act.

A statute cannot be declared void on the ground that taken along with another statute it creates an effect which is violative of a fundamental right—unless, of course, the two statutes in their combination appear to be designed in substance to be parts of one law (State of Madhya Pradesh v. G. C. Mandawar, AIR (1954) S.C. 493). The Indian Supreme Court has observed that the power of the court to declare a law void under Art. 13 (which corresponds to our ART. 4) has to be exercised with reference to the specific legislation which is impugned. The Constitution does not allow the courts to strike down the Act of a Provincial Legislature as void on the ground that in contrast with the provisions of another statute it appears to be discriminatory. Nor does it contemplate a law of the Centre or of the State dealing with a similar subject being held unconstitutional by making a comparative study of the provisions of the two Acts.

130. Some Fundamental Rights are for all and others only for citizens

While studying the rights that have been guaranteed under Part II of the Constitution, care must be taken to note whether the right in question is available to a citizen or to a person or to a group of persons, such as a community or religious sect or denomination.

131. Definition of "Citizen"

The word 'citizen' has been defined in ART. 218 as meaning a person who is a citizen of Pakistan according to the law relating to citizenship. Unlike the Indian Constitution, in our Constitution the law relating to citizenship has not a constitutional status. But even under the Indian Constitution, in Art. 11, power has been given to the Parliament to regulate the right of citizenship by law and this power includes the power to make any provision with respect to the acquisition and termination of citizenship and all other matters relating to citizenship. The Indian Parliament has also the power to legislate with respect to naturalization and aliens. It would seem to follow from this that even the definition of word 'citizen' given in ARTs. 5 to 8 can be interfered with by way of amendment at the instance of the Indian Parliament in the exercise of its ordinary law-making functions. The position thus in effect in India and Pakistan with regard to the competence of the Federal Parliament to amend, alter and modify the law with respect to citizenship is practically the same.

The Pakistan Citizenship Act, 1951, (Act II of 1951) was passed on 13th of April 1951 and contains a comprehensive statement of law on the subject of citizenship (see Appendix to this book). In S. 3 of that Act are stated the tests by which the question whether any person at the date of the commencement of the Pakistan Citizenship Act would be deemed to be a citizen of Pakistan is to be answered and S. 4 mentions acquisition of Pakistan citizenship by birth. S. 5 mentions conditions under which citizenship by descent can be acquired and S. 6 provides for cases in which citizenship by migration can be acquired. Power is given to the Central Government to register as "a citizen of Pakistan by migration" any person who after the 12th of April, 1951, and before the first day of January, 1952, has migrated to the territories now included in Pakistan from any territory in the Indo-Pakistan sub-continent, out of those territories, with the intention of residing permanently in those territories. The Central Government is also empowered under S. 8, upon an application made to it in that behalf, to register as a citizen of Pakistan any person who or whose father or whose father's father was born in Indo-Pakistan sub-continent and was ordinarily residing in a country outside Pakistan at the commencement of Pakistan Citizenship Act if such a person, unless he has been exempted, has obtained certificate of domicile. Under S. 9, the Central Government is empowered to grant a certificate of naturalization and register him as a citizen of Pakistan by naturalization. S. 10 makes provision with regard to the status of married women. The Central Government has the power to deprive any person of citizenship under the conditions mentioned in S. 16. The Central Government has framed rules under S. 23 of the Pakistan Citizenship Act (Pakistan Citizenship Rules, 1952).

A citizen of Pakistan retains his citizenship of the Commonwealth despite the fact that with the coming into force of the Constitution, Pakistan becomes a Republic. In view of the fact that Pakistan accepts the Queen of England as the head of Commonwealth, of which family of nations Pakistan has elected to remain a member (see the declaration of the Pakistan Prime Minister) the provisions of the Pakistan (Consequential Provisions) Act, 1956, read with S. 1 of the British Nationality Act of 1948, would continue to make the citizen of Pakistan a citizen of the British Commonwealth of the Nations. This link with the Commonwealth has no constitutional basis—but has been forged by the statement of the Pakistan Prime Minister referred to above. (see Constituent Assembly debates, 1956)

The word 'person' as used in our Constitution will have the same meaning as has been given to that term in S. 3 (sub-section 39) of the General Clauses Act: it includes any company or association or body of individuals whether incorporated or not. All the definitions under the General Clauses Act are subject to the limitation provided in S. 3 of that Act itself, namely, that the definitions in the Act are to prevail unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context. It is obvious that a 'corporation' cannot at any rate, in a vast majority of cases, be regarded as a citizen although it is a person and whether it is or is not a person will depend upon "the intent to be gathered from the context and general purpose" of the statute in which that term has been used. In the case of The Jupiter General Insurance Co., Ltd. v. Rajagopalan, AIR (1952) Punjab 9, the question was whether the term 'citizen' used in Art. 19 of the Constitution of India includes a corporation and the court answered the problem by examining the language of Art. 19 and ruled that a corporation was not a citizen within the meaning of Art. 19. Similarly, the term 'person' appearing in those Articles that guarantee right to life and liberty can only have reference to natural person. Terms and expressions like "Religious Community" or "Religious denomination"; (Art. 13 (2)), "Community" (Art. 13(4)); "Religious denomination or sect thereof" (18)(b), "Any section of citizens having a distinct language or culture"; (Art. 19) will be interpreted by courts and any rights that have been conferred upon them will have to be claimed, only after evidence is led before a court that is called upon to enforce them, that such entities, in relation to the right claimed, exist and their rights or liberties have been abridged or taken away.

The foundation of a cause for the enforcement of the relevant fundamental right must be laid in a petition to the court having jurisdiction, and care must be taken to assert not only that the right in question is invaded, that is abridged or taken away, but that the person in acting or moving for the enforcement of the fundamental right is doing so because he is aggrieved by such invasion. The courts will not entertain petitions addressed to them unless all those constituent elements that go to make up the cause of action of a given petitioner in respect of the enforcement of his fundamental rights are shown to exist. And the burden to do this lies on the petitioner.

132. Analysis of Part II "Fundamental Rights"

Part II of our Constitution in its ARTS. 5 to 22 mentions the fundamental rights which are, under ART. 4, made justiciable. The enumeration of the fundamental rights in the Constitution has not been done in a scientific manner and this was obviously not possible in view of the fact that the rights guaranteed are in some cases qualified and cover a ground which cannot be demarcated with precision in an attempt to avoid overlapping. It would be helpful if, for the purpose of the present study, we follow the following plan :

Section (i) Right to Equality

Some rights may well be regarded as more appropriately covered by the caption "Prohibition against discrimination". In this category fall the following :—

Right of Equality

- (a) All citizens are equal before law and are entitled to equal protection of law. (ART. 5 (1).)

The formulation of this right is the equivalent of the prohibition, namely, that there is no discrimination between citizens and citizens who are all equal before law; nor can discrimination be made in the matter of making law, for, "all are entitled to the equal protection of law".

- (b) The citizen's right not to be discriminated against on the ground only of race, religion, caste, sex or place of birth in respect of obtaining access to places of public entertainment and resort not intended for religious purposes only. This right is subject to any special provision which is made for women. (See ART. 14).

Analysis of Part II "Fundamental Rights"

- (c) Citizen's right not to be discriminated against in the matter of securing admission to any educational institution receiving aid from public revenue on the ground only of race, religion, caste or place of birth. [See ART. 13(3)]. This right is available subject to any provision that may be made by any public authority for the advancement of any socially or educationally backward class of citizens
- (d) No community (consisting of citizens or non-citizen residents) can be discriminated against in respect of the grant of tax exemption or concession to any religious institution. [See ART. 13(4)].
- (e) Right of a resident in Pakistan not to pay any special tax, the proceeds of which are to be spent on the propagation or maintenance of any religion other than his own. (see ART. 21).
- (f) The State is not to discriminate in the matter of extending recognition to religious institutions established by religious communities or denominations on the ground that the management of such institution vests in that community or denomination. This right is not restricted to citizens only. This is equivalent to saying that every religious community has a right to establish and maintain religious institutions of its own choice and the State is prohibited from refusing recognition to them on the ground that such institutions are being maintained by a certain religious community or denomination. [See ART. 13(5)].
- (g) Right of residents in Pakistan not to be discriminated against on the ground of religious prejudice relating to any one being considered as unworthy of social intercourse merely because he is low-born. This right flows from the mandate relating to the abolition of untouchability and a direction to the legislature to declare its practice an offence. (See ART. 20).
- (h) Citizen's right not to be discriminated against in the matter of appointments in the service of Pakistan on the ground only of race, religion, caste, sex, residence or place of birth. This is a qualified right: for fifteen years from the Constitution Day, posts may be reserved for persons belonging to a class or area to secure their adequate representation in the service of Pakistan and further that in the interest of the said Service specified positions in the Service may be reserved for members of either sex. (See ART. 17).

Section (ii) Liberties, (Rights Guaranteeing Freedom to Citizens)

- (a) Citizen's right to freedom of speech and expression is guaranteed subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of security of Pakistan, friendly relations with foreign States, public order, decency or morality, or in relation to contempt of court, defamation or incitement to an offence. (See ART. 8).
- (b) Citizen's right to assemble peacefully and without arms is guaranteed subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of public order. (ART. 9).
- (c) Citizen's right to form associations or unions, subject to reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interests of morality or public order. (ART. 10).
- (d) Citizen's right to move freely throughout Pakistan and to reside and settle in any part thereof is guaranteed subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the public interest. [ART. 11(a)].
- (e) Freedom to acquire, hold and dispose of property is available subject (a) to the right of State to acquire property in the manner provided for in ART. 15,—and

Freedom of Speech

Freedom of Assembly

Freedom of Association

Freedom of Movement

Freedom to acquire and hold and

Fundamental Rights

- dispose of property
- Freedom to Trade or Practise a Profession
- Freedom of Religious Belief and Practice
- Right to Status as a Free Citizen
- Prohibition against Forced Labour
- Right to maintain distinct culture etc.
- Right to the Rule of Law
- Limitation on the State action and the making of Law relating to Compulsory Acquisition or taking of Property (ART. 15)
- (b) to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the public interest. This right is also available only to citizens. (See ART. 11 (b)).
 - (f) Every citizen, duly qualified, has a right to enter upon any lawful profession or occupation subject to such qualifications as may be prescribed by law in relation to that profession or occupation, and every citizen has a right to conduct any lawful trade or business. These rights are guaranteed subject to:
 - (i) the regulation of any trade or profession by licensing system, or,
 - (ii) the carrying of by the Federal or Provincial Government or by a corporation controlled by any such Government, of any trade, business, industry or service to the exclusion, complete or partial, of other persons. (See ART. 12).
 - (g) (i) Right of a person attending any educational institution to refuse receiving religious instructions or to take part in any religious ceremony or attend religious worship other than one's own religion. (See ART. 13(1)).
 - (ii) Right of citizen to profess, practise and propagate any religion subject to law, public order and morality. (See ART. 18 (a)).
 - (iii) Right of the members of a religious community or denomination to provide religious instructions to the pupils of that community or denomination in the religious institutions maintained wholly by them. (See ART. 13 (2)).
 - (iv) The right of every religious denomination and every sect thereof is guaranteed subject to law, public order, morality to establish, maintain and manage its religious institutions. [See Art. 18 (b)].
 - (h) No person shall be held in slavery [(See ART. 16 (1)].
 - (i) Subject to the State requiring compulsory service for public purposes, all forms of forced labour are prohibited by the Constitution [See ART. 16(2)].
 - (j) The right to maintain their distinct culture, language, script is guaranteed to "any section of citizens having distinct language, script or culture". [See ART .19].

Section (iii) Constitutional Limitation on the State Action in regard to deprivation of Life and Liberty and Property of Persons in Pakistan

- Right to the Rule of Law
- Limitation on the State action and the making of Law relating to Compulsory Acquisition or taking of Property (ART. 15)
- (1) Right of persons (both resident citizens and non-resident citizens) not to be deprived of life, liberty or property save in accordance with law. (See ARTs. 15 (1) add 5 (2)).
 - (2) No property shall be compulsorily acquired or taken possession of save for a public purpose, and save by the authority of law which provides for compensation therefor and either fixes the amount of compensation or specifies the principles on which and the manner in which compensation is to be determined and given. [See Art. 15 (2)]
- Nothing in this Article (Art. 15) shall affect the validity of—
- (a) any existing law, or
 - (b) any law permitting the compulsory acquisition or taking possession of any property for preventing danger to life, property or public health, or
 - (c) any law relating to the administration or acquisition of any property which is or is deemed to be evacuee property under any law, or
 - (d) any law providing for the taking over by the State for a limited period of the management of any property for the benefit of its owner.

Analysis of Part II "Fundamental Rights"

In clauses (2) and (3), of Art. 15, "property" shall mean immovable property, or any commercial or industrial undertaking, or any interest in any such undertaking."

- Limitation on state Action on the making of Law relating to Arrest and Detention (ART. 7)
- Limitation on State-action on the making of Penal Laws (ART. 6)
- (3) (1) No person who is arrested shall be detained in custody without being informed, as soon as may be, of the grounds for such arrest, nor shall he be denied the right to consult and be defended by a legal practitioner of his choice.
 - (2) Every person who is arrested and detained in custody shall be produced before the nearest magistrate within a period of twenty-four hours of such arrest, excluding the time necessary for the journey from the place of arrest to the court of the magistrate, and no such person shall be detained in custody beyond the said period without the authority of a magistrate.
 - (3) Nothing in clauses (1) and (2) shall apply to any person—
 - (a) who for the time being is an enemy alien; or
 - (b) who is arrested or detained under any law providing for preventive detention.
 - (4) No law providing for preventive detention shall authorize the detention of a person for a period exceeding three months unless the appropriate Advisory Board has reported before the expiration of the said period of three months that there is, in its opinion, sufficient cause for such detention.
 - (5) When any person is detained in pursuance of an order made under any law providing for preventive detention, the authority making the order shall, as soon as may be, communicate to such person the grounds on which the order has been made and shall afford him the earliest opportunity of making a representation against the order."
 - (4) No person shall be punished for an act "which was not punishable by law when the act was done, nor shall any person be subjected to a punishment greater than that prescribed by law for an offence when the offence was committed."

Section (iv) Enforcement of Fundamental Right—Constitutional Remedies

Right to constitutional remedies for the enforcement of fundamental rights (See ARTs. 22 and 170).

(Sections 1 to 3 are dealt with in this Chapter and as the problems presented by the study of "Constitutional remedies" fall into a class by themselves, the 4th Section of our analysis, has been separately dealt with in Chapter VI)

Section (i)—Right to equality.

133. A Comment on ART. 5. Right to Equality

ART. 5 of our Constitution consists of two clauses, the first of which enjoins "All citizens are equal before law and are entitled to equal protection of law", and the second which is completely unconnected with the first is, "No person shall be deprived of life or liberty save in accordance with law." Similarly, in ART. 15(1) we have, "No person shall be deprived of his property save in accordance with law." The combined effect of ART. 5(2) and ART. 15(1) is to establish that right to life, liberty and property can only be taken away under the sanction of a constitutionally valid law. But of this aspect of rule of law we will deal with a little later (See Section III of our analysis at p. 393 seq.)

Confining our attention to the first clause of ART. 5, we notice that the right to equality is affirmed only in favour of the citizens. The non-citizen resident within the territory of Pakistan cannot claim benefit of this right. In India, however, in Art. 14, it is provided, "The State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India." The right to equality in India is available to citizens and non-citizens alike and the right has been so worded as to impose a clear prohibition on the State "not to deny to any person equality before law or the equal protection of laws". If judicial authorities are covered by the definition of the term 'State' in India, even the judicial procedure must conform to the concept of equality—the right to which has been constitutionally guaranteed—that is to say, the courts must regard all persons being subject to the ordinary law of the land and they should not regard any person or class of persons as being exempt from obedience to law.

But under our Constitution we need not speculate about the conduct of judiciary being subject to the exercise of the constitutional right of equality, affirmed in favour of citizens, that is of their equality before law and their entitlement to equal protection of law; and this, for the simple reason that the word 'State' is no part of the clause relating to equality in the Article in question.

What are the juristic implications of the expression "All citizens are equal before law" and in what essential particulars do they differ from the ideas underlying the expression "All citizens are entitled to the equal protection of law"?

In the case of V. G. Row v. State of Madras AIR (1951) Madras 147, this question was posed before the Full Bench that decided the case, and Mr. Justice Satyanarayana Rao, while dealing with the interpretation of the Indian Art. 14, stated (at p. 158):

"This Article, in my opinion, relates to two different concepts. One is 'equality before the law' and the second 'equal protection of the laws'. Two obligations are cast upon the State, that is, to secure to a person equality before the law and also to give equal protection of the laws to the person. The expression 'equality before the law' is not used in the American Constitution, though 'equal protection of the laws' occurs in the 14th Amendment. The expression 'due process of law' is used in a more elastic sense as to include equality before the law and also equal protection of the laws. Though in the 5th Amendment of the American Constitution, equal protection of the laws is not specifically mentioned it is specifically stated, however, in the 14th Amendment as it was thought that there should be an implication in that direction so far as the State legislation was concerned. Prof. Dicey in his Law of the Constitution treats 'equality before the law' as one of the three meanings of the expression 'rule of law' which formed the fundamental principle of the English Constitution. He defines it at p. 202, 9th Edn. as meaning :

'The equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land administered by the ordinary law Courts; the rule 'of law' in this sense excludes the idea of any exemption of officials or others from the duty of obedience to the law which governs other citizens or from the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals; there can be with us nothing really corresponding to the 'administrative law' (droit administratif) or the 'administrative tribunals' (tribunaux administratifs) of France. The notion which lies at the bottom of the 'administrative law' known to foreign countries is, that affairs or disputes in which the Government or its servants are concerned are beyond the sphere of the civil Courts and must be dealt with by special and more or less official bodies. This idea is utterly unknown to the law of England and indeed is fundamentally inconsistent with our traditions and customs.'

"In other words, this expression implies in my opinion that the Legislature should not make a distinction between the rich and the poor, official and non-officials, and make discrimination on any other basis between one subject and the other."

In yet another Madras case, In re B.N. Ramakrishna AIR (1955) Madras 100, it was observed (at p. 104):

"Equality before law means that among equals the law should be equal and should be equally administered and that the like should be treated alike. Hence, equality before the law does not mean that things which are different shall be treated as though they were the same. What it does mean is the denial of any special privilege by reason of birth, creed or the like and also equal subjection of all individuals and classes to the ordinary law of the land."

It is important to remember that under our Constitution the two ideas 'equality before law', and 'equal protection of law' have been put in one and the same clause of ART. 5. If 'equality before law' is to be the ideal for legislature to attain, it may come in conflict with the notion of 'equal protection of law'—for in a society which is riddled with inequalities of all kinds to insist upon rigid adherence to 'equal protection of law' might, in effect, mean perpetuation of just the sort of inequality which the framers of our Constitution set out to eradicate. 'Equality before law' therefore can have no content other than the one which is compatible with the due maintenance of the guarantee of 'equal protection of law'.

There are, let us note, various kinds of inequalities; inequality emanating, for example, from economic disequilibrium observable in our society, and this inequality in its turn leads up to the denial of equal opportunity for all. Then there is what might be called, political inequality, which leads up to disenfranchisement of a vast section of the people of a given country and thus inevitably involves the deprivation of the right of the people to participate in the political life of the State. The ideal of political equality can only be realised by universal suffrage and free participation in the representative institutions by recourse to which modern democratic states are functioning. Similarly, there is such a thing as social inequality: the growth of humanism has brought about the liberation of people from the thraldom of slavery and the evil of untouchability and such other social abominable practices which deprive people of an honourable place as free citizens in a democratic society. To this list of inequalities might be added the inequality which results from racial pride: this, again, finds its culmination in the dogma that only those who have blue blood in their veins are capable of taking part in the political, civic and economic activities of the State.

Now, it is submitted that the expression 'equality before law' does not directly involve anything more than the idea that there will be within the State equal administration of justice. This principle does not necessarily assume that men are, in any tangible way, alike, but it insists that in the administration of justice between man and man law should not discriminate. That all citizens are equal before law, is an injunction which taken by itself appears to be addressed, not so much to the legislature as to those who are charged with the duty of administering the law and represents more of an ideal than a realistic appraisal of the existing inequality which is discoverable in the economic, social and political condition of our national life.

Historically considered, the notion of human equality has arisen as a protest against the practice of magnifying artificial distinctions between man and man based on considerations like wealth, purity of blood and religious superstition and making these as criteria for determining the status of each individual in the total legal order. If the judicial administrative organs of the State while applying the law were to discriminate between man and man and exercise what may be characterised as arbitrary authority in singling out some persons for discriminatory treatment they would be acting counter to the ideal of equality before law which has been proclaimed by the framers of the Constitution in the first part of the clause of ART. 5—an Article which declares that all citizens are equal before law.

Right to equality available only to citizens.

Why this right of equality was made available only to citizens appears to be incomprehensible, for all individuals who are to be found within the territories of Pakistan, (quite apart from recognising the well-known exceptions laid down by International Law in favour of diplomatic and consular representatives from foreign sovereign States), should be considered equal before law. Law is no respecter of persons. This idea is fundamental to the life of a republican polity and is the corner-stone on which the superstructure of law and order of all the civilised States in the modern world has been reared across the course of the last four hundred years or so.

What, however, complicates the question relating to the interpretation of the first clause of ART. 5 is the juxtaposition in which this right to being considered equal before law is asserted: in the first place, is entitlement to equal protection of law a species of a wider legal injunction which says that all citizens are equal before law? How can citizens be considered equal before law if they are not to receive equal protection from the law? On this point the Irish Constitution offers a more explicit statement of the concept of equality which is relevant for the purpose of jurisprudence. It says in Article 40 as follows:

"All citizens shall, as human persons, be held equal before the law."

"This shall not be held to mean that the State shall not in its enactments have due regard to differences of capacity, physical and moral, and of social function."

In this statement the Irish Constitution affirms the notion of equality before law but also proceeds to limit the operation of that guarantee in the field of law-making activity by expressly enjoining upon the legislature to have due regard to differences of capacity, physical and moral, and of social function.

We have no such limiting provision in our Constitution and the expression 'equal protection of laws' is likely to be interpreted in the light of American constitutional provisions contained in its 14th Amendment. The American decisions that have a bearing on the interpretation of the 'due process' clause of the 5th Amendment and 'equal protection of law' in the 14th Amendment have frequently been referred to in India and there is no denying the fact that they appear to have influenced, to a considerable extent, the interpretation of Art. 14 of the Indian Constitution. The argument in support of taking guidance from the American decisions in India has been that the framers of the Indian Constitution were influenced by the enunciation of the American principle of 'equal protection of laws' and they must be presumed to have intended that the interpretation bestowed on that clause by the American courts was the one which was to be followed in India.

There is, however, an important distinction between the two American Amendments referred to above and the formulation of the Indian Art 14 as even of Article 5 of our Constitution relating to 'equality before law' and 'equal protection of laws.' The point of this distinction, it is submitted with respect, ought to be borne in view for it might be of some relevance in the matter of securing correct interpretation of the relevant Articles.

134. The 14th and the 5th Amendments of the U.S. Constitution

The 'due process' clause of the 5th Amendment was specifically confined to limiting the exercise of federal power: in fact, it was a prohibition directed against the exercise of federal authority: in this Amendment it was ordained that no one shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor "shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation". The 14th Amendment imposes a prohibition on the State power: "Nor shall any State . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of laws." The assertion that all men are equal before law does not find a place in the

The interpretation of the Article is likely to be influenced by American concepts

Distinction between Language of 14th Amendment and our Articles

American Constitution, although it is only too true to say that the whole system of the American Constitution and the law is based upon it, and what is more the fundamental generalisation as to the equality of all men is contained in the Declaration of Independence.

The course of the judicial interpretation of these two Amendments has not been a consistent one and the emphasis which came to be placed upon the due process clause is admittedly a belated phenomenon in the development of American constitutional interpretation.

Justice Miller in the case of Davidson v. Board of Administrators of New Orleans, (1878) 96 U.S. 97: 24 Law Ed. 616, complained about the undesirable manner in which the guarantee of the 14th Amendment, which was designed to protect the negro, was being stretched to cover cases of the abstract opinions of every unsuccessful litigant. Said he (p. 103):

"It is not a little remarkable that while this provision has been in the Constitution of the United States, as a restraint upon the authority of the Federal Government, for nearly a century, and while, during all that time, the manner in which the powers of that Government have been exercised has been watched with jealousy, and subjected to the most rigid criticism in all its branches, this special limitation upon its powers has rarely been invoked in the judicial forum or the more enlarged theater of public discussion. But while it has been a part of the Constitution, as a restraint upon the power of the States, only a very few years, the docket of this court is crowded with cases in which we are asked to hold that State Courts and State Legislatures have deprived their own citizens of life, liberty or property without due process of law. There is here abundant evidence that there exists some strange misconception of the scope of this provision as found in the XIVth Amendment. In fact, it would seem, from the character of many of the cases before us, and the arguments made in them, that the clause under consideration is looked upon as a means of bringing to the test of the decision of this court the abstract opinions of every unsuccessful litigant in a State Court of the justice of the decision against him, and of the merits of the legislation on which such a decision may be founded."

In the case of Smyth v. Ames (1898) 169 US 466: 42 Law Ed. 819, it was held that the requirement as to due process includes to a very considerable extent the guarantee of the equal protection of laws. Attempts have been made to draw a distinction between the two ideas, that is, the one relating to due process clause and the other concerning equal protection of laws clause, but there is no unanimity as yet upon the point, as to precisely what is the ruling judicial opinion on this much vexed question. Justice Taft in his opinion in Truax v. Corrigan (1921) 257 U.S. 312: 66 Law Ed. 254 observed (at p. 332):

"It may be that they (two prohibitions) overlap, that a violation of one may involve at times the violation of the other, but the spheres of the protection they offer are not co-terminus. The due process clause brought down from Magna Charta was found in the early state constitutions and later in the 5th Amendment to the Federal Constitution as a limitation upon the executive, legislative and judicial powers of the Federal Government, while the equality clause does not appear in the Fifth Amendment, and so does not apply to congressional legislation. The due process clause requires that every man shall have the protection of his day in court, and the benefit of the general law,—a law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds not arbitrarily or capriciously, but upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial, so that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. . . . It, of course, tends to secure equality of law in the sense that it makes a required minimum of protection for every-one's right of life, liberty and property, which the Congress or the legislature may not withhold. Our

*Davidson vs.
Board of Administrator*

*Smyth v.
Ames*

*Truax v.
Corrigan*

whole system of law is predicated on the general fundamental principle of equality of application of the law. 'All men are equal before the law'; 'This is a government of laws, and not of men'; 'No man is above the law',—are all maxims showing the spirit in which legislatures, executives and courts are expected to make, execute and apply laws. But the framers and adopters of this Amendment (i.e. 14th Amendment) were not content to depend on a mere minimum secured by the due process clause, or upon the spirit of equality which might not be insisted on by local public opinion. They therefore embodied that spirit in a specific guaranty.

"The guaranty was aimed at undue favour and individual or class privilege, on the one hand, and at hostile discrimination or the oppression of inequality, on the other. It sought an equality of treatment of all persons, even though all enjoyed the protection of due process"

In his dissenting Judgment Mr. Justice Holmes voiced his protest against the view taken by the majority, observing that (p. 342) :

"The dangers of a delusive exactness in the application of the Fourteenth Amendment have been adverted to before now. . . . Delusive exactness is a source of fallacy throughout the law. By calling a business 'property' you make it seem like land, and lead up to the conclusion that a statute cannot substantially cut down the advantages of ownership existing before the statute was passed. An established business no doubt may have pecuniary value, and commonly is protected by law against various unjustified injuries. But you cannot give it definiteness of contour by calling it a thing. It is a course of conduct; and, like other conduct, is subject to substantial modification according to time and circumstances, both in itself and in regard to what shall justify doing it a harm. . . .

"I think, further, that the selection of the class of employers and employees for special treatment, dealing with both sides alike, is beyond criticism on principles often asserted by this Court. And especially I think that, without legalizing the conduct complained of, the extraordinary relief by injunction may be denied to the class. Legislation may begin where an evil begins. If, as many intelligent people believe, there is more danger that the injunction will be abused in labor cases than elsewhere, I can feel no doubt of the power of the legislature to deny it in such cases

"I must add one general consideration. There is nothing that I more deprecate than the use of the Fourteenth Amendment beyond the absolute compulsion of its words to prevent the making of social experiments that an important part of the community desires, in the insulated chambers afforded by the several states, even though the experiments may seem futile or even noxious to me and to those whose judgment I most respect. I agree with the more elaborate expositions of my brothers Pitney and Brandeis, and in their conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed."

The principles bearing on the question of constitutionally permissible legislative classification have been summarised in the case of Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co. (1911) 220 U.S. 61 at 78: 55 Law Ed. 369 at p. 377 :—

"1. The equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment does not take from the state the power to classify in the adoption of police laws, but admits of the exercise of a wide scope of discretion in that regard, and avoids what is done only when it is without any reasonable basis, and therefore is purely arbitrary. 2. A classification having some reasonable basis does not offend against that clause merely because it is not made with mathematical nicety, or because in practice it results in some inequality. 3. When the classification in such a law is called in question, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, the existence of that state of facts at the time the law was enacted must be assumed. 4. One who assails the classification in such a law must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis, but is essentially arbitrary."

Equal Protection of Laws and the question of classification
Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co.

From the foregoing account it would appear that the interpretation of the 14th Amendment has a history to it and it is wise never to forget the reasons that prompted its incorporation in the Constitution. The idea was to protect the newly acquired political and legal rights of Negroes against arbitrary State action. "There is little evidence", say Kelly and Harbinson in their famous 'American Constitution—its Origin and Development', (1955) Edition,

"that the statesmen who wrote the amendment were interested in bringing about the intervention of the Federal Government in the protection of vested rights. Certainly there was nothing to indicate in their time that the due process clause of the 14th Amendment was destined to become one of the most important corner-stone of modern Constitutional Law."

Before 1868 when the 14th Amendment became a part of the American Constitution, by and large, at least till 1850 the due process clause of the 5th Amendment was interpreted as a clog of a qualified character upon the Federal power. It was construed by the Supreme Court as guaranteeing certain protected rights to persons before they could be deprived of life, liberty and property. An examination of the case-law on this point would amply show that the 'due process of law' clause upto that time at least was of significance primarily in criminal cases and the substantive conception of due process, although it appears to have influenced the minds of some of the Judges of the Supreme Court, had not attained any firm recognition in the way it did subsequent to 1870. Various reasons have been assigned by the constitutional historians to account for the way in which the Supreme Court of the United States began steadily to lend its support to the substantive conception of the due process clause. It is important to bear these outstanding facts of American constitutional history in mind while the case-law of that country is being appreciated by our Courts in an endeavour to derive the benefit of the wisdom which has flowed from the Supreme Court in the several decisions which it has given on the construction of the due process and equality clauses of the 5th and 14th Amendments. In the background of these decisions lie 170 years of the economic and political forces that have shaped the course of judicial interpretation of these two Amendments and the considerations that have ultimately prevailed are now frankly being acknowledged by the apologists of the decisions of the Supreme Court on this count to be due less to the logic of strict adherence to judicial interpretation and more due to the pressure of political and economic conditions of the American Social History. The growth of the conception of substantive due process has been explained by appeal to several factors. And some of these, according to Kelly and Harbinson, are: (p. 509)

"First, the whole spirit of the times was against extensive state regulation of the new economic life in America. American industry seemed to be doing very well indeed for itself without the necessity for any governmental interference. Most of America was profiting in one way or another by the tremendous rise in industrial wealth and productive power. True, a few industries and a few men associated with them were amassing fortunes beyond the comprehension of the average person, but the great majority of Americans saw no wrong in the acquisition of wealth; they asked only an equal opportunity to use their own imagination, skills, business sense, and good fortune to enrich themselves. Most Americans despised any suggestion of paternalism in government. The modern idea of the service state had not yet arisen. . . .

"American industry had always been in politics to some degree. After 1880, however, industry and the railroads went into state politics to an extent hitherto unknown. They put forward their own attorneys as candidates for office; they donated funds to political parties; they backed this or that faction in the state legislature. Sometimes less scrupulous industrial leaders resorted to bribery. The eighties and nineties saw a new low in the moral level of the American state legislature. That the seats of assemblymen in Harrisburg or Albany were often for sale was a matter of common knowledge. From the point of view of business these tactics, whether or not they remained within the scope of orthodox political morality, were a matter of practical necessity. State interference with industry might be dangerous. Therefore the state government must be kept out of hostile hands... The judiciary could hardly be expected to remain immune to the 'big business' conception of the role of government in society. Judges, then as now, usually reached their positions through the legal profession. The philosophy of the legal profession, as always, was generally colored by the interests and attitudes of the men it most often represented—that is, industrialists, bankers, and railroad men. The path of corporation lawyers to the bench in the two generations after the Civil War was made easier by the fact that the Republican Party controlled the presidency for all but two administrations between 1868 and 1912. The Republican Party was for the most part a party of big business, and the men its Presidents appointed to the bench were most often corporation lawyers by training. Thus, it is not surprising that the attitude of the Supreme Court, as well as that of the Federal and state judiciaries in general, began to reflect the economic and social attitudes of big business. Judges of this background might be expected to interpret the Constitution in the light of the laissez-faire economic philosophy and to regard the Constitution and the judiciary as bulwarks of property. They did not disappoint these expectations."

The moral of the foregoing reflections on the course of American interpretation of 5th and 14th Amendments may be summed up as follows :

(1) There is no clear-cut distinction between the scope of the 'due process' clause and the 'equal protection of law' clause and that the one has influenced the other and in main it would appear that 'equal protection of laws' clause has been construed as containing a guarantee which was implicit in the due process clause but had to be specifically affirmed due to the desire to accord to the newly liberated Negro citizens some protection against arbitrary action.

(2) That the content of these two clauses appears to have received diverse interpretations from the Supreme Court less as a result of realization by that court of the constitutional significance of these clauses but more out of its deference to the prevailing economic, political and social ideas of the time.

The Indian interpretation has been unduly influenced by the American decisions.

Kameshwar Singh v.
State of Bihar

If we now turn to some of the observations contained in the Indian decisions by the learned Judges who have attempted to construe and apply the provisions of Art. 14, it is interesting to discover that they have taken American decisions as though they were infallible guides, nay invincible oracles—and not as mere transient notes in the grand symphony of the case-law that has been produced by the last 180 years of judicial interpretation under the stress and impact of factors and forces that could not be said to have been within the preview of those who were the authors of American Constitution. It is for this reason that Shearer J, for instance in the case of Kameshwar Singh v. State of Bihar AIR (1951) Patna 91, finds it difficult to understand why Art. 14 was at all put in the Indian Constitution. Said he (p. 99) :

"I must confess that I have found it difficult to understand and have been unable to discover, why Article 14 was inserted in the Constitution. So far as I am aware, there was, in 1950, no class of persons anywhere in India who were subjected to such discrimination before the law, as, in 1867, the victorious Northern States apprehended the negro population of the Southern States might be subjected to. Article 14 occurs at the beginning of the series of five articles which appear under the heading 'Right to Equality' and, having regard to the succeeding articles, I should have been disposed myself to think that what the makers of the Constitution had in mind were potential evils of the mind which the American people aimed at when they adopted the fourteenth amendment. There are a number of articles in the Constitution which rather express the ideals of the makers than aim at existing evils or evils which are likely to arise. The Supreme Court has, however, given to the article the extended interpretation which has been put on the fourteenth amendment in modern times in America. I am bound by that decision and am constrained to hold that the impugned Act is unconstitutional as it transgresses Article 14."

Turning now to the decisions of the Supreme Court of India, one finds that there too, a well marked shift in the emphasis on the scope of Art. 14, as originally defined by it, is observable. The Supreme Court seems to have started with a rather liberal approach to this Article in the determination of its earlier cases, but soon thereafter appears to have taken a somewhat rigorous and, what may well be characterised as, it is submitted with respect, a more tough attitude to this Article.

But before we deal with the Indian cases in an attempt to illustrate the point of the foregoing remarks, let us note a somewhat novel mode of applying the guarantee of equal protection of law that has been suggested by that erudite and philosopher Judge, Bose J., in a dissenting judgment delivered by him in the case of State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali, AIR (1952) S.C. 75, Says the learned Judge (at 101) :

"We are concerned here with Art. 14 of the Constitution and in particular with the words 'equality before the law' and 'equal protection of the laws'. Now I yield to none in my insistence that plain unambiguous words in a Statute, or in the Constitution, must having regard to the context, be interpreted according to their ordinary meaning and be given full effect. But that predicates a position where the words are plain and unambiguous. I am clear that that is not the case here.

"Take first the words 'equality before the law'. It is to be observed that equality in the abstract is not guaranteed but only equality before the law. That at once leads to the question, what is the law, and whether 'the law' does not draw distinctions between man and man and make for inequalities in the sense of differentiation? One has only to look to the differing personal laws which are applied daily to see that it does : to trusts and foundations from which only one particular race or community may benefit, to places of worship from which all but members of a particular faith are excluded, to cemeteries and towers of silence which none but the faithful may use, to the laws of property, marriage and divorce. All that is part and parcel of the law of the land and equality before it in any literal sense is impossible unless these laws are swept away but that is not what the Constitution says, for, these very laws are preserved and along with equality before the law is also guaranteed the right to the practice of one's faith.

"Then, again, what does 'equality' mean? All men are not alike. Some are rich and some are poor. Some by the mere accident of birth inherit riches, others are born to poverty. There are differences in social standing and economic status. High sounding phrases cannot alter such fundamental facts. It is, therefore, impossible to apply rules of abstract equality to conditions which predicate inequality from the start ; and yet the words have meaning though in my judgment their true content is not to be gathered by simply taking the words in one hand and a dictionary in the other, for the provisions of a constitution are not mathematical formulae which have their essence in mere form. They constitute a frame work of Government written for men of fundamentally differing opinions and written as much for the future as the present. They

A study of the indian decisions shows a marked change in the interpretation of Art. 14

State of Bengal
v.
Anwar Ali

Views of Bose
J. of the indian Supreme Court

are not just pages from a text book but form the means of ordering the life of a progressive people. There is consequently grave danger in endeavouring to confine them in watertight compartments made up of ready made generalisations like classification. I have no doubt those tests serve as a rough and ready guide in some cases but they are not the only tests, nor are they the true tests on a final analysis."

The learned Judge thereafter considers the question relating to classification, class legislation, discrimination and comes to the conclusion that the good faith of the legislature in the matter of legislation is not relevant if the Statute is discriminatory.

"I have no doubt", says the learned Judge, "that the motive, except in rare cases, is beyond reproach and were it not for the fact that the Constitution demands equality of treatment these laws would, in my opinion, be valid. But that apart. What material have we for delving into the mind of a legislature?" (p. 102)

The learned Judge then proceeds to observe that there may be cases where there is utmost good faith and classification, scientific and rational and yet the law be invalid.

"Let us take an imaginary case", says he, "in which a State legislature considers that all accused persons whose skull measurements are below a certain standard, or who cannot pass a given series of intelligence tests, shall be tried summarily whatever the offence on the ground that the less complicated the trial the fairer it is to their sub-standard of intelligence. Here is classification. It is scientific and systematic. The intention and motive are good. There is no question of favouritism, and yet I can hardly believe that such a law would be allowed to stand. But what would be the true basis of the decision? Surely simply this that the judges would not consider that fair and proper. However much the real ground of decision may be hidden behind a screen of words like 'reasonable', 'substantial', 'rational' and 'arbitrary' the fact would remain that judges are substituting their own judgment of what is right and proper and reasonable and just for that of the legislature; and up to a point that, I think, is inevitable when a judge is called upon to crystallise a vague generality like Art. 14 into a concrete concept. Even in England, where Parliament is supreme, that is inevitable, for, as Dicey tells us in his Law of the Constitution:

'Parliament is the supreme legislator, but from the moment Parliament has uttered its will as law-giver, that will becomes subject to the interpretation put upon it by the judges of the land, and the judges, who are influenced by the feelings of magistrates no less than by the general spirit of the common law, are disposed to construe statutory exceptions to common law principles in a mode which would not commend itself either to a body of officials, or to the House of Parliament, if the Houses were called upon to interpret their own enactments.'

"This, however, does not mean that judges are to determine what is for the good of the people and substitute their individual and personal opinions for that of the government of the day, or that they may usurp the functions of the legislature. That is not their province and though there must always be a narrow margin within which judges, who are human, will always be influenced by subjective factors, their training and their tradition makes the main body of their decisions speak with the same voice and reach impersonal results whatever their personal predilections or their individual backgrounds. It is the function of the legislature alone, headed by the government of the day, to determine what is, and what is not, good and proper for the people of the land; and they must be given the widest latitude to exercise their functions within the ambit of their powers, else all progress is barred. But, because of the Constitution, there are limits beyond which they cannot go and even though it falls to the lot of judges to determine where those limits lie, the basis of their decision cannot be whether the Court thinks the law is for the benefit of the people or not. Cases of this type must be decided solely on the basis whether the Constitution forbids it.

"I realise that this is a function which is incapable of exact definition but I do not view that with dismay. The common law of England grew up in that way. It was gradually added to as each concrete case arose and a decision was given ad hoc on the facts of that particular case. It is true the judges who thus contributed to its growth were not importing personal predilections into the result and merely stated what was the law applicable to that particular case. But though they did not purport to make the law and merely applied what according to them, had always been the law handed down by custom and tradition, they nevertheless had to draw for their material on a nebulous mass of undefined rules which, though they existed in fact and left a vague awareness in man's minds, nevertheless were neither clearly definable, nor even necessarily identifiable, until crystallised into concrete existence by a judicial decision; nor indeed is it necessary to travel as far afield. Much of the existing Hindu law has grown up in that way from instance to instance, the threads being gathered now from the rishis, now from custom, now from tradition. In the same way, the laws of liberty, of freedom and of protection under the Constitution will also slowly assume recognisable shape as decision is added to decision. They cannot, in my judgment, be enunciated in static form by hide-bound rules and arbitrarily applied standards or tests.

"I find it impossible to read these portions of the Constitution without regard to the background out of which they arose. I cannot blot out their history and omit from consideration the brooding spirit of the times. They are not just dull lifeless words static and hide-bound as in some mummified manuscript, but living flames intended to give life to a great nation and order its being, tongues of dynamic fire potent to mould the future as well as guide the present. The Constitution must, in my judgment, be left elastic enough to meet from time to time the altering conditions of a changing world with its shifting emphasis and differing needs. I feel therefore that in each case judge must look straight into the heart of things and regard the facts of each case concretely much as a jury would do; and yet, not quite as a jury, for we are considering here a matter of law and not just one of fact. Do these 'laws' which have been called in question offend a still greater law before which even they must bow?

"Doing that, what is the history of these provisions? They arose out of the fight for freedom in this land and are but the endeavour to compress into a few pregnant phrases some of the main attributes of the sovereign democratic republic as seen through Indian eyes. There was present to the collective mind of the Constituent Assembly, reflecting the mood of the peoples of India, the memory of grim trials by hastily constituted tribunals with novel forms of procedure set forth in Ordinance promulgated in haste because of what was then felt to be the urgent necessities of the moment. Without casting the slightest reflection on the judges and the Courts so constituted, the fact remains that when these tribunals were declared invalid and the same persons were retried in the ordinary Courts, many were acquitted, many who had been sentenced to death were absolved. That was not the fault of the judges but of the imperfect tools with which they were compelled to work. The whole proceedings were repugnant to the peoples of this land and, to my mind Article 14 is but a reflex of this mood.

"What I am concerned to see is not whether there is absolute equality in any academic sense of the term but whether the collective conscience of a sovereign democratic republic can regard the impugned law, contrasted with the ordinary law of the land, as the sort of substantially equal treatment which men of resolute minds and unbiased views can regard as right and proper in a democracy of the kind we have proclaimed ourselves to be. Such views must take into consideration the practical necessities of government, the right to alter the laws and many other facts, but in the forefront must remain the freedom of the individual from unjust and unequal treatment, unequal in the broad sense in which a democracy would view it. In my opinion, 'law' as used in Article 14 does not mean the 'legal precepts which are actually recognised and applied in the tribunals of a given time and place' but 'the more general body of doctrine and tradition from which those precepts are chiefly drawn, and by which we criticise them.' (Dean Pound in 34 Harvard Law Review 449 at 452).

"I grant that this means that the same things will be viewed differently at different times. What is considered right and proper in a given set of circumstances will be considered improper in another age and vice versa. But that will not be because the law has changed but because the times have altered and it is no longer necessary for government to wield the powers which were essential in an earlier and more troubled world. That is what I mean by flexibility of interpretation.

"This is no new or startling doctrine. It is just what happened in the cases of blasphemy and sedition in England. Lord Sumner has explained this in Bowman v. Secular Society (1917) A.C. 406 at pp. 454, 466, 467 and the Federal Court in Niharendu Dutt v. Emperor, 1942 F.C.R. 38 at p. 42 and so did Puranik J. and I in the Nagpur High Court in Bhagwati Charan v. Provincial Govt. C.P. and Berar, I.L.R. (1946) Nag. 865 at pp. 878 and 879."

This virtually means that judges must act as jurors and give not a legal decision but a verdict on the question whether the guarantee of the equal protection of law has been violated.

What then is to be the attitude of our Courts in the matter of construing ART. 5? What is to happen if in the judgment of the Court the concept of equality before law as an ideal to be attained gets frustrated, if the guarantee of the equal protection of law clause is to be rigidly adhered to? Even if we were to say, following the long line of decisions in America that, what this Article is calculated to forbid is discrimination or "class legislation" but that it does not forbid reasonable classification, we cannot lose sight of the observations of Brewer J. in the case of Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Co., v. Matthews (1899) 174 U.S. 96 at p. 106 : 43 Law. Ed. 909 at 913 :—

"It is the essence of a classification", says the learned Judge, "that upon the class are cast duties and burdens different from those resting upon the general public . . . Indeed, the very idea of classification is that of inequality so that it goes without saying that the fact of inequality in no manner determines the matter of constitutionality."

So also McKenna J. in his dissenting opinion in Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. (1902) 184 U.S. 540 at pp. 566-568 : 46 Law. Ed. 679 at 692 observed:

"It seems like a contradiction to say that a law having inequality of operation may yet give equality of protection. Viewed rightly, however, the contradiction disappears; . . . Government is not a simple thing. It encounters and must deal with the problems which come from persons in an infinite variety of relations. Classification is the recognition of those relations, and in making it a legislature must be allowed a wide latitude of discretion and judgment. classification based on those relations need not be constituted by an exact or scientific exclusion or inclusion of persons or things. Therefore it has been repeatedly declared that classification is justified, if it is not palpably arbitrary."

The test for adjudging a given law as being discriminatory was formed by Patanjali Sastri, Chief Justice of Supreme Court of India, in a minority judgment delivered in the case of State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali AIR (1952) S.C. 75, at p. 79 as follows:

Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Co.
v.
Matthews

Connolly v.
Union Sewer Pipe Co.

A test for adjudging an Act being discriminatory

"First, it has to be seen whether it observes equality between all the persons on whom it is to operate. An affirmative finding on the point may not, however, be decisive of the issue. If the impugned legislation is a special law applicable only to a certain class of persons, the Court must further enquire whether the classification is founded on a reasonable basis having regard to the object to be attained, or is arbitrary. Thus, the reasonableness of classification comes into question only in those cases where special legislation affecting a class of persons is challenged as discriminatory. But there are other types of legislation, such as, for instance, the Land Acquisition Act, which do not rest on classification, and no question of reasonable classification could fairly arise in respect of such enactments. Nor, obviously, could it arise when executive orders or notifications directed against individual citizens are assailed as discriminatory."

The learned Chief Justice of India felt that the view of the law taken by him was in accord with the trend of decisions in America which has had to lean strongly towards sustaining state-action both in the legislative and in the administrative spheres based on hostile discrimination.

Our Supreme Court in the case of Jibendra Kishore and others v. The Province of East Pakistan, PLD (1957) S.C. 9, has interpreted the provisions of ART. 5 of our Constitution. The full facts of the case appear in a comment on ART. 15 in this book at page 418 but it would be sufficient for the purpose of presenting the view of the Supreme Court upon this point merely to say that the argument at the bar with reference to which the application of ART. 5 was invoked was the following: S. 37 of the East Bengal State Acquisition Act of 1950 had classified rent-receivers according to the quantum of net annual income received by them and had proceeded to award compensation to them in an inverse ascending scale. The contention was that S. 37 offended against the guarantee of 'equal protection of law' in that it provided different rates of compensation for rent-receivers with different amounts of net income. After reviewing the law, as it is stated in some of the well-known American decisions, the Chief Justice proceeded to deal with the objection (at p. 37):

". . . . I have little doubt in holding that the classification of rent-receivers adopted by the Act is justified. I do not base this opinion on Article 29 of the Constitution which states one of the directive principles of State policy to be:

(2) to secure the well-being of the people, irrespective of caste, creed, or race, by raising the standard of living of the common man, by preventing the concentration of wealth and means of production and distribution in the hands of a few to the detriment of the interest of the common man, and by ensuring equitable adjustment of rights between employers and employees, landlords and tenants',

"because the Act we are concerned with is a pre-Constitution enactment and was not passed in furtherance of the policy outlined in Article 29, but on the general ground that if the legislature once decides to abolish the system of private landlordism in agricultural land and the resources of the State are not sufficient to compensate the outgoing landlords, some means for the rehabilitation of the expropriated landlords have to be devised, and if in its anxiety to rehabilitate such landlords the legislature takes into consideration the net incomes of the persons whom it is intended to set on their feet, the classification based on such considerations must be considered to be a necessary result of bringing the expropriating provisions of the Act into action. Whatever else the expression 'equal protection of law' may mean, it certainly does not mean equality of operation of legislation upon all citizens of the State. The expression has been borrowed from the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which was intended to secure to the emancipated negroes equal rights to the enjoyment of life, liberty and property. Though in the United States the guarantee of equal protec-

Jibendra
Kishore
v.
Province of
East Pakistan

tion of the laws has been invoked upon more occasions than any other constitutional guarantee, with the possible exception of the due process of law guarantee, also contained in the Fourteenth Amendment, no rule has yet been formulated by the Supreme Court as to what may be regarded as a denial of the 'equal protection of the laws' that will embrace every case and the application of the principle has always depended on the facts of each case as it came before the Court. But notwithstanding the disinclination of the Court to give an all-inclusive definition of the expression, some broad propositions as to its meaning have been enunciated. One of these propositions is that equal protection of the laws means that no person or class of persons shall be denied the same protection which is enjoyed by other persons or other classes in like circumstances, in their lives, liberty and property and in pursuit of happiness. Another generalization more frequently stated is that the guarantee of equal protection of the laws requires that all persons shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed. In the application of these principles, however, it has always been recognized that classification of persons or things is in no way repugnant to the equality doctrine provided the classification is not arbitrary or capricious, is natural and reasonable and bears a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation. It is not for the Courts in such cases, it is said, to demand from the legislature a scientific accuracy in the classification adopted. If the classification is relevant to the object of the Act it must be upheld unless the relevancy is too remote or fanciful. A classification that proceeds on irrelevant considerations, such as differences in race, colour or religion will certainly be rejected by the Courts. Applying these tests to the present case, it cannot but be held that if in consequence of abolishing the system of private rent for agricultural land, it also became necessary to make some provision for the outgoing landlords, the classification of the landlords on the basis of their net incomes at the time of their expropriation was a necessary and not an unreasonable classification."

The principle laid down was explained in a later case by the Lordships of the Supreme Court. This was the case (Waris Meah v. The State, PLD (1957) S.C. 157) in which the question of the validity of Foreign Exchange Regulation (Amendment) Act XXXII of 1956 was considered: the argument against its validity was that inasmuch as three tribunals were brought into existence by the impugned legislation, (namely (1) the ordinary criminal courts functioning under the Code of Criminal Procedure, (2) the Tribunal, and (3) the Adjudication Officer), and that law had not provided any guidance to any authority as to the basis upon which offenders could be tried in any one of these three forums, the impugned law contravened the guarantee of equal protection of laws given by ART. 5 of the Constitution. The Court found the impugned Act ex facie discriminatory because (at p. 167):

"Three tribunals with different powers and procedures have been set up. The Act creating them contains no indication as to which class or classes of cases are to go before a Court and which before the Tribunal and the Adjudication Officer, and it does not impose upon the Central Government the obligation, or expressly confer on it the power, of making rules with a view to classifying the cases to be tried by each of these tribunals. Nor does it define the principle or policy on which such classification may be made by the Central Government or the State Bank."

"The Central Government has not exercised its power of issuing any directions to the State Bank or of making any rules under section 27 for carrying into effect the provisions of the Act. The result, therefore, is that in the present state of the law no person who is alleged to have contravened any provision of the Act can know by which Court he is to be tried, and the question whether on conviction he shall be punished with imprisonment or whether he should be punished with imprisonment and fine which may extend to any amount, or whether he should be let off with a mere penalty of three times the value of the amount involved rests entirely on the action that the Central Government or the State Bank may choose to take".

The Court further found that in the state of the law embodied in the Foreign Exchange Regulation, 1947, the duty of giving effect to the guarantee of equal protection of law could not be performed by the Courts; and it was not possible for them to ensure that:

"a law operates equally in relation to all persons within its mischief, if the law itself provides for differential operation in relation to such persons, not in accordance with any principle expressed or implicit in the law, not on the basis of any classification made by or under the law, but according to the unfettered discretion of one or more statutory authorities." (p. 168)

The scope of the unguided discretion allowed by the law was according to their Lordships, (at p. 168) "too great to permit of application of the principle that equality is not infringed by the mere conferment of unguided power, but only by its arbitrary exercise. For, in the absence of any discernible principle guiding the choice of forum, from among the three provided by the law, the choice must always be, in the judicial viewpoint, arbitrary to a greater or less degree."

135. Difficulty of applying the guarantee of equality

The principles on which the Courts in our country would apply the provisions of ART. 5 have yet to be fully worked out, and even when they are worked out they are bound to be so vague and nebulous that they are least likely to furnish any practical guidance either to the legislature or to the lawyer in the matter of finding out whether or not an impugned law offends against the right of equality guaranteed by our Constitution. Ordinarily, abstract principles are certainly helpful and their formulation has to be attempted by judges and lawyers, for that is the only course that is left open to a rational mind to assist in the interpretation and application of legislative provisions to the facts of a given case. But in the matter of applying ART. 5 abstract principles are really not of much pragmatic value, and this for the simple reason that the judgment of the Courts upon the question, namely whether or not a given statute offends against equality clause, largely depends on the view they take of economic and political conditions of the country in relation to which the constitutionality of the impugned law has to be determined by it. We will first state these principles and then review some of the decided cases in order to illustrate the point of these remarks.

(a) Lord Rottschaefer in his treatise on 'Constitution Law' sums up the principles as they apply in America for determining whether legislation is discriminatory, as follows:

"The validity of a classification thus depends on whether the legislature had reasonable grounds for its restriction of the class upon which burdens are imposed or benefits conferred. The usual objections to a classification made in connection with a regulation that imposes a burden is that it is invalid to limit the burden to the defined class and that, if a regulation of the given character is to be put into effect, it should be extended to others as well. The usual objection to such a classification in connection with a regulation that confers upon some persons benefits that are denied to others is that it is invalid to thus limit those benefits. The grant of benefits is frequently part of a larger plan of regulation in which the benefit conferred consists of immunity from the burden. The second objection is in such case merely a different form of stating the first.

"The crucial point in any case involving the validity of a classification is the existence of differences in treatment between groups. The issue is as to the reasonableness of those differences, and the basis on which the classes are defined is relevant only so far as it bears thereon. There is, accordingly, no basis of classification that is invariably sustained. There are, however, certain principles almost universally applied in this field. The equal protection clause is not violated merely because a State makes an exception which it is required to make by some other provision of the federal Constitution. This has been specifically held in a case involving an exercise of a State's taxing power for reasons that are equally applicable to its police powers (Union Bank and Trust Co. v. Phelps), (1932) 53 S. Ct. 321 : 77 Law. Ed. 687.) It has also been held that an objection that legislation violated the clause because not including certain other persons would not be sustained in the absence of showing that there actually were such others engaged in the business to which the legislation applied:—Pullman Co. v. Knott, (1914) 35 S. Ct. 2 : 59 Law. Ed. 105. The fact that those excepted from a statute regulating carriers by motor vehicle were subject to comparable regulations by local authorities was held a sufficient basis for sustaining the reasonableness of the classification (Continental Banking Co. v. Woodring, (1931) 52 S. Ct. 595 : 76 Law. Ed. 1155.)

"Lord Rott-schaefer's views"

"A classification justifiable by its tendency to promote a legitimate Governmental policy is valid. This is the basis for sustaining the exception from a statute regulating motor vehicles using the public highways of such vehicles as are used by their owner in transporting his own livestock, and of buses employed in carrying children to and from school (See also—Sproles v. Binford, (1931) 52 S. Ct. 581 : 76 Law. Ed. 1167.) No violation of the equal protection clause results from a classification whose effect is to relieve a municipality owned utility from regulation of its rates by a state board actually regulating the rates of a competing privately owned company,—(Springfield Gas & Electric Co. v. Springfield, (1921) 42 S. Ct. 24 : 66 Law. Ed. 131), nor from one that accorded the marketing contracts of co-operatives a degree of protection denied to other contracts (Liberty Warehouse Co., v. Burley Tobacco Growers' Co-operative Marketing Association, (1927) 48 S. Ct. 291 : 72 Law. Ed. 473.)

"The legislature may in adopting a policy recognize an existing situation and adapt its legislation thereto. It is on this basis that the exemption of existing structures from zoning ordinances has been held valid, and that the grant of a preferred position to prior applicants for certificates of convenience and necessity to operate motor vehicles over a given route has been sustained (Bradley v. Public Utilities Commission, (1932) 53 S. Ct. 577 : 77 Law. Ed. 1053.) The validity or invalidity of classification cannot be determined without taking into account all the factors that have a natural and obvious relation to the purposes of the regulation in connection with which they are made and to the differences in treatment made in connection with realizing those purposes. The possible bases of classification are almost unlimited."

(b) The American attitude to the guarantee of 'equal protection of the laws' may further be seen in the following extract from Constitutional Law by Professor H.E. Willis: (1936 Edition pp. 579-580.)

"The guaranty of the equal protection of the laws means the protection of equal laws. It forbids class legislation, but does not forbid classification which rests upon reasonable grounds of distinction. It does not prohibit legislation, which is limited either in the objects to which it is directed or by the territory within which it is to operate. 'It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike under like circumstances and conditions both in the privileges conferred

American view of the scope of "Equal Protection of Laws" Professor Willis quoted

Difficulty of applying the guarantee of equality and in the liabilities imposed.' The inhibition of the Amendment . . . was designed to prevent any person or class of persons from being singled out as a special subject for discriminating and hostile legislation. It does not take from the state the power to classify either in the adoption of police laws or tax laws, or eminent domain laws, but permits to them the exercise of a wide scope of discretion, and nullifies what they do only when it is without any reasonable basis. Mathematical nicety and perfect equality are not required. Similarity, not identity of treatment, is enough. If any state of facts can reasonably be conceived to sustain a classification, the existence of that state of facts must be assumed. One who assails a classification must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis . . . Many different classifications of persons have been upheld as constitutional. A law applying only to one person or one class of persons is constitutional if there is sufficient basis or reason for it."

(Following cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court have more or less adopted the same approach:

- (i) Louisville Gas and Electric Co. v. Coleman, (1928) 277 U.S. 32 : 72 Law. Ed. 770
- (ii) Barbier v. Connolly, (1885) 113 U.S. 27 : 28 Law. Ed. 923.

(c) The expression 'equal protection of law' in India has been interpreted to mean that if a law discriminates for or against a person or a class without evidencing the fact that such a differentiation in the treatment as it has meted out to individuals and classes has some rational relation to the objects of impugned legislation it would be deemed to have offended against Art. 14. This seems to be, in sum and substance, the point of the several decisions pronounced by the Indian High Courts and the Supreme Court. The Indian view on the subject of discriminatory legislation may be taken as it is summarised by Fazl Ali J. in the case of the State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara AIR (1951) S.C. 318:

"1. The presumption is always in favour of the constitutionality of an enactment, since it must be assumed that the legislature understands and correctly appreciates the needs of its own people, that its laws are directed to problems made manifest by experience and its discriminations are based on adequate grounds.

2. The presumption may be rebutted in certain cases by showing that, on the face of the statute, there is no classification at all and no difference peculiar to any individual or class and not applicable to any other individual or class, and yet the law hits only a particular individual or class.

3. The principle of equality does not mean that every law must have universal application for all persons who are not by nature, attainment or circumstances in the same position, and the varying needs of different classes of persons often require separate treatment.

4. The principle does not take away from the State the power of classifying persons for legitimate purposes.

5. Every classification is in some degree likely to produce some inequality, and mere production of inequality is not enough.

6. If a law deals equally with members of a well-defined class, it is not obnoxious and it is not open to the charge of denial of equal protection on the ground that it has no application to other persons.

7. While reasonable classification is permissible, such classification must be based upon some real and substantial distinction bearing a reasonable and just relation to the object sought to be attained, and the classification cannot be made arbitrarily and without any substantial basis."

Equal Protection of Law and special treatment given to a class—The Indian view

State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara

A study of the course of Indian decisions shows that there is no disagreement on the principles upon which the guarantee of equal protection of laws is to be applied. The difficulties do however arise in the matter of answering the one important question which comes up for judicial determination whenever any law is impeached as being discriminatory: that question is, has the impugned legislation the effect in it of discriminating between persons and persons, or classes and classes, in such a way that there is no rational relationship as between the differentiation in the treatment which that law accords to the individuals and classes, and the objects of its legislation? It is the difficulty of answering this crucial question that is attested by almost all decisions of the Indian Courts. One notices a great deal of elasticity of approach in the judgments of one and the same Court in India. A comparative study of the case of (1) State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali, AIR (1952) S.C. 75; (2) Kathi Raning v. State of Saurashtra, AIR (1952) S.C. 123; and (3) Kedar Nath v. State of West Bengal, AIR (1953) S.C. 404, would illustrate this difficulty. All the three cases were decided by the Supreme Court of India in 1952-53, and although there is a close adherence to the abstract principle in terms of which all the three cases have been decided, a close scrutiny of the reasoning of the learned Judges in relation to the application of that principle would tend to show that the same test has been applied with different results by different Judges in all the three cases. All these three cases deal with the contention regarding laws being discriminatory in that they had provided for a system of separate special tribunals side by side with the ordinary tribunals without their containing any provision from which any guidance as to the choice of the forum in which the person accused of a crime is to be tried. It has been suggested in almost every case that has been decided in India that where the legislature does not lay down or indicate any test or standard, by appeal to which the executive could be guided in the matter of administering the law, the law which confers such an absolute, naked and unguided arbitrary power as to the choice of forum where the accused is to be prosecuted, the statute must be deemed to be invalid as offending against Art. 14. This was the principle on the basis of which, the case of State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali, AIR (1952) S.C. 75, was decided and West Bengal Special Courts Act was declared as ultra vires (see AIR, (1952) S.C. 75.) Practically the same question arose in the case of Kathi Raning v. State of Saurashtra, AIR (1952) S.C. 123, but a contrary result was reached by the majority of the Judges that composed the Supreme Court Bench. The authority of the State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali, AIR (1952) S.C. 75, was pressed by the Counsel who appeared in the case as having concluded that matter and at least three of the Judges who decided the Kathi Raning case found it impossible not to apply the principle upon which that case was decided to the facts of Kathi Raning case and they held that the Saurashtra State Public Safety Act (3rd Amendment) Ordinance 49 was invalid as offending against Art. 14. Mr Justice Chandrasekhara Aiyar held that in his view the decision in Anwar Ali's case governed the present case also and that opinion was shared by Bosc J. Mahajan J. too shared that opinion.

Some Indian Cases Reviewed
Ambalal v. Jawarlal

(i) Under Order 37 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a special summary procedure for the trial of suits on promissory notes before the High Court has been provided. Before the Calcutta High Court, in the case of Ambalal Purusottamdas & Co. v. Jawarlal, AIR (1953) Calcutta, 758, this summary procedure was challenged inter alia on the ground that it was discriminatory in that there was no rational classification involved in the different procedures being prescribed by it in the determination of suits relating to Promissory Notes. Why the procedure in the Mufassil Court, as opposed to the one that was to prevail within the Original Jurisdiction of the High Court of Calcutta, be different? The Court repelling the contention held the classification reasonable and observed:

Difficulty of applying the guarantee of equality

"Universal application of the same procedure to all courts is not an unfailing requirement of the Constitutional principle of equality before the law or of equal protection of laws. The fact that Order 37, Civil Procedure Code does not apply to all Courts in the land does not ipso facto make it unconstitutional on that ground. To my mind the basic reason for holding this provision to be constitutional is that it is, in my opinion, still founded on a reasonable and substantial classification which cannot be said to infringe this Constitutional principle of equality before the law. The courts in India are necessarily graded and with varying jurisdictions, powers and procedures. Not all procedures for trial and appeal are common to all the Courts."

(ii) In another Indian case Dhirendra v. Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs to the Government of West Bengal [AIR (1954) S.C. 424] where the question was whether a State notification issued under S. 269(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure directing that the trial of certain offences before any court of Sessions shall be by Jury could be validly revoked in a case in which the accused persons have actually been committed to a court of Sessions, the Court observed:

"It appears to us that the section does not empower the State Government to direct that the trial of a particular case or of a particular accused person shall be by jury while the trial of other persons accused of the same offence shall not be by jury..... The Section does not take notice of individual accused or of individual cases. It only speaks of offences or of a particular class of offences, and does not direct its attention to particular cases or classes of cases and it does not envisage that persons accused of the same offence but involved in different cases can be tried by the Court of Sessions by a different procedure, namely some of them by jury and some of them with the help of assessors."

It was also held that the power of revocation or alteration being co-extensive with the power conferred by the opening words of S. 269(1) the State Government could not pick out a particular case or set of cases and revoke notifications qua those cases only and leave cases of other persons charged with the same offence tried by the Court of Sessions. To that extent the notification was bad in law and void. The notification was in conflict not only with the power visualised by S. 269(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure but also void being repugnant to Art. 14. The Court observed:

"Now it is well settled that though Article 14 is designed to prevent any person or class of persons for being singled out as a special subject for discriminatory legislation, it is not implied that every law must have universal application to all persons who are not by nature, attainment and circumstance, in the same position, and that by process of classification the State has power of determining which should be regarded as a class for purposes of legislation and in relation to a law enacted on a particular subject; but the classification, however, must be based on some real and substantial distinction bearing a just and reasonable relation to the objects sought to be attained and cannot be made arbitrarily and without any substantial basis."

This was thus a case in which not the statute but a notification issued under that statute was repugnant to Art. 14 of the Constitution.

In respect of a Taxing Act that exempts certain classes of persons whom the Legislature does not consider it proper to tax because the cost involved in collecting such

Dhirendra v. Superintendent & R. L. A, West Bengal

United Motors Ltd.

Charanjit Lal v. Union of India taxes would be relatively more onerous than the probable estimated proceeds from taxation, is not void on the ground of discrimination for the simple reason that the differentiation in the treatment accorded to several classes has a rational relationship to the objects of the taxing law (State of Bombay v. United Motors Ltd. AIR (1953) S.C. 252).

(iii) Even a law applying to one person or one class of persons is constitutional if there is satisfactory basis or reason for treating that person or class as a representative type. There may be an individual or class about which legislation may become essential because that individual or class might afford rational basis for being treated as a type. In the case of Charanjit Lal Chowdhury v. Union of India, AIR (1951) S.C. 41, the question whether a law applying to one person could be treated as being repugnant to Art. 14 of the Indian Constitution, came up for adjudication. The Government of India had passed, on 9-1-1950, an Ordinance called the Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Company (Emergency Provision) Ordinance, thereby empowering the Central Government to take over the control and management of that Company and its properties and effects by appointing their own Directors etc. Later on this Ordinance was repealed and was replaced by an Act of Parliament (being Act XXVIII of 1950) which contained similar provisions. The question that arose for adjudication was whether a legislation which was specifically confined to one concern was competent.

The preamble to the repealed Ordinance, it may be noted, had said,

"On account of mismanagement and neglect a situation has arisen in the affairs of the Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Company, Limited, which has prejudicially affected the production of an essential commodity and has caused serious unemployment amongst a certain section of the community and that an emergency has arisen which renders it necessary to make special provision for the proper management and administration of the aforesaid Company".

It was contended that the legislation was directed solely against a particular Company and shareholders and not against any class or category of companies and no question therefore of reasonable legislative classification arose in the case. Patanjali Sastri, who made a minority Judgment accepted the contention on the ground that:

"Legislation based upon mismanagement or other misconduct as the differentia and made applicable to a specified individual or corporate body is not far removed from the notorious parliamentary procedure formerly employed in Britain of punishing individual delinquents by passing bills of attainder, and should not, I think, receive judicial encouragement."

He held that:

"The impugned Act which selects this particular Company and imposes upon it and its shareholders burdens and disabilities on the ground of mismanagement and neglect of duty on the part of those charged with the conduct of its undertaking, is plainly discriminatory in character and is, in my judgment, within the constitutional inhibition of Article 14."

The majority Judgment, however, took a contrary view of the matter. Fazl Ali J. was of the view, that burden lay on the person impugning the Act to show that that Act was unconstitutional and held that in that case the petitioner had made no attempt to discharge the burden of proof. He referred to the background against which legislation had been passed and observed.

"It was against this background that the Act was passed, and it was evident that the facts which were placed before the Legislature with regard to the Sholapur Mill were of an extraordinary character, and fully justified the Company being treated as a class by itself. There were undoubtedly other mills which were open to the charge of mismanagement, but the criteria adopted by the Government which, in my opinion, cannot be said to be arbitrary or unreasonable, is not applicable to any of them. As we have seen, one of the criteria was that a mere allegation of mismanagement should not be enough and no drastic step such as is envisaged in the Act should be taken without there being a complete enquiry. In the case of the Sholapur Mill, a complete enquiry had been made and the revelations which were made as a result of such enquiry were startling." The Honourable Judge further remarked, "Article 14 of the Constitution lays down an important fundamental right, which should be closely and vigilantly guarded, but, in construing it, we should not adopt a doctrinaire approach which might choke all beneficial legislation."

This view was shared by Mukherjea J. who too held that the burden of proof cast upon the petitioner of showing that the legislation was discriminatory, had not been discharged.

It is submitted, with respect, that the view of the two Judges (Patanjali and Das) who made the minority Judgment is sound and is not such as can be controverted by appeal to considerations that formed the basis of majority Judgment. The presumption of the constitutionality of a statute stood rebutted in this case for the simple reason that in the Act the name of the Company was mentioned: if there had been a general power conferred by the Act on the Government in pursuance whereof the Government could have taken over one mill as opposed to several other mills, the burden of leading evidence to demonstrate the discriminatory character of the Government notification could have well been laid on the party impeaching the Act. But once the legislation is directed to one person natural or juristic, by name, there is a prima facie case that the legislation being ex facia discriminatory is unconstitutional and it would be putting an unnecessary burden on a person who was agitating the question of its unconstitutionality to prove by some extrinsic evidence that there were other concerns in existence that fell in the same category as his and that the Government by having taken over the management of only one of them was guilty of discrimination. Observations of Das J., who also wrote a separate minority Judgment on this point are instructive.

"I am not saying", said the learned Judge, "that this particular company and its share-holders may not be guilty of mismanagement and negligence which has brought about serious fall in production of an essential commodity and also considerable unemployment. But if mismanagement affecting production and resulting in unemployment is to be the basis of a classification for making a law for preventing mismanagement and securing production and employment, the law must embrace within its ambit all companies which now are or may hereafter become subject to the vice. This basis of classification, by its very nature, cannot be exclusively applicable to any particular company and its shareholders but is capable of wider application and, therefore, the law founded on that basis must also be wide enough so as to be capable of being applicable to whoever may happen at any time to fall within that classification."

The legislation which deals with a named person without disclosing the reason why that named person has been treated as a class by himself or itself is, ex facia bad and the question of the presumption of constitutionality cannot at all be raised in such a case. The law by its nature must lay down general rules of public conduct and deal with human situations generally in order to sustain the attribute of impartiality. If the Legislature singles out a particular person for a certain type of prejudicial treatment the burden of proving that the law did not unfairly discriminate is on him who wants the Court to give a judgment to that effect.

Criticism of the majority view in the case of "Charanjit Lal"

136. Presumption in favour of the Constitutionality of the impugned law

Where the presumption of constitutionality can be validly drawn, of course a heavy burden is cast upon the party attacking it to produce evidence to dis-establish that presumption. As to the nature of this burden of proof see the following cases decided in United States:

- (1) Lindsay v. Natural Carbonic Co. (1910) 220 U.S. 61 (78) : 55 Law Ed. 369
- (2) Louisville Gas & Electric Co. v. Coleman (1928) 277 U.S. 32 : 72 Law Ed. 770
- (3) Bayside Fish Flour Co. v. Gentry (1936) 297 U.S. 422 (430) : 80 Law Ed. 722
- (4) Bain Peanut Co. v. Pinson (1930) 282 U.S. 499 (502) : 75 Law Ed. 482
- (5) Charleston Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Alderson (1945) 324 U.S. 182 : 89 Law Ed. 857
- (6) Weaver v. Palmer Bros. Co. (1926) 270 U.S. 402 : 70 Law Ed. 654 ; Borden's Farm Products Co. v. Baldwin (1934) 293 U.S. 194 : 79 Law Ed. 281
- (7) State Board of Tax Commrs. v. Jackson (1931) 283 U.S. 527 : 75 Law Ed. 1248
- (8) Pacific States Box & Basket Co. v. White (1935) 296 U.S. 176 : 80 Law Ed. 138

It was observed in the case of Gulf Colorado & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Ellis (1897) 165 U.S. 150 at p. 154 : 41 Law Ed. 666 at p. 668 that

"to carry that presumption to the extent of always holding that there must be some undisclosed and unknown reason for subjecting certain individuals or corporations to hostile and discriminating legislation is to make the protection clause a mere rope of sand."

137. ART. 5 and the Citizen's Right of access to Tribunals of the country

The equal protection of law to which citizens of Pakistan are entitled would include a right of the citizen in the absence of an express constitutionally valid provision taking away such right, to have access to the tribunals and courts of the country where law is administered and to insist that his rights should not be frustrated, nor undue obstacles placed in the way of his getting justice from the courts and tribunals of the country. This necessarily involves the consideration of the questions relating to the conduct of litigation in our courts with particular reference to situations where parties to the proceedings are impecunious and are not able to afford either the payment of court fee required by law or the professional charges of Advocates. If there is a right to sue it should not be encumbered by the kind of limitations necessarily inherent in a sort of society in which we live, a society where some are extremely rich and others are extremely poor.

It is the existence of this discord between the idea of legal equality and the actual state of economic inequality that precludes the possibility of the realisation of that ideal of justice the disregard of which drew a cynical although a solemn protest of Justice Mr. Maule in a bigamy case—decided before the passing of Court of Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857.

"Prisoner at the bar, you have been convicted of the offence of bigamy, that is to say, of marrying a woman while you have a wife still alive, though it is true she has deserted you, and is still living in adultery with another man. You have, therefore, committed a crime against the laws of your country and you have also acted under a very serious misapprehension of the course which you ought to have pursued. You should have gone to the ecclesiastical court and there obtained against your wife

Observations
of Justice Mr. Maule in a Bigamy case

ART. 5 and the Citizen's Right of access to Tribunals of the Country

a decree a mensa et thoro. You should then have brought an action in the courts of common law and recovered, as no doubt you would have recovered, damages against your wife's paramour. Armed with these decrees you should have approached the legislature, and obtained an Act of Parliament, which would have rendered you free, and legally competent to marry the person whom you have taken on yourself to marry with no such sanction. It is quite true that these proceedings would have cost you many hundreds of pounds, whereas you probably have not as many pence. But the law knows no distinction between rich and poor. The sentence of the court upon you therefore is that you be imprisoned for one day, which period has already been exceeded, as you have been in custody since the commencement of the assizes." (Holdsworth, 'A History of English Law' Vol. I, 5th Ed. p. 623 and Fay's Dinco in the Statute Book 1939). See also Tudor Ree's 'Judgement Reserved' p. 216).

The person who can pay for the services of a competent Counsel is certainly in a better position to have his point of view accepted in a legal contest where the other party is so poor that he cannot secure the services of competent Advocates. But it is doubtful if it is within the scope of ART. 5 of our Constitution for any one to insist that the "equal protection of law" to which he is entitled must be so construed as to mean that the State should make available to him the necessary financial resources with which to effectively enter upon a contest involved in the vindication or enforcement of his rights or in the establishment of the plea of "not guilty" if he is charged with criminal liability.

In America, the right to have access to the ordinary courts is said to be substantiated by appeal to the due process clause which, as has been argued earlier, having regard to the interpretation it has received from the American courts, appears to be sufficiently wide in its scope to embrace the concept of 'equal protection of laws'.

It is true that in our country under the Civil Procedure Code a person can sue in forma pauperis provided he is able to satisfy the court as to the existence of conditions mentioned in Order 33, Civil Procedure Code, namely that he is not possessed of sufficient means to enable him to pay the fee prescribed by the law for the plaint in such suit, or, where no such fee is prescribed, that he is not entitled to property worth Rs. 100 other than his necessary wearing apparel and the subject-matter of the suit. (For procedure governing appeals, see Order 44 C.P.C.) Similarly, if a person is charged with a crime punishable with death the Government engages for him what is called a Pauper Advocate to conduct his defence not only in trial court but also in confirmation proceedings before the High Court under S. 471 of the Criminal Procedure Code. But such a professional assistance is not available to a person who is charged with an offence which is punishable with transportation for life or for imprisonment for a lesser term. It is doubtful if a mandamus can lie at the instance of an impecunious person either to the Provincial or Federal Government commanding them to afford 'equal protection of the law' to a person who is not able to arrange for sufficient pecuniary resources to vindicate his fundamental rights or to establish the plea of 'not-guilty' in cases involving criminal prosecution.

138. Comment on some specified aspects of the Right of Equality

Having considered the right to equality, in general, it becomes now necessary to make a few observations in respect of some other Articles falling in Section (I) of our analysis and note a few essential characteristics of these rights.

ART. 14 limits itself to prohibiting any discrimination being made against any citizen in respect of his right to have access to places of public entertainment or resort (places not intended for religious purposes only) on the ground only of "race, religion, caste, sex or place of birth". If there are other grounds on which discrimination has been

No right to Professional assistance

Position in America

ART. 14

made, that is, grounds other than those mentioned in ART. 14, then the case is taken out of ART. 14 and no court will be able to give effect to this species of prohibition against discrimination. What is prohibited by the Article is discrimination no doubt but it should be discrimination based solely on all or any of the grounds mentioned in that Article. In Anjali Roy v. State of West Bengal, AIR (1952) Calcutta 825, the provisions of Art. 15 of the Indian Constitution were interpreted, and since ART. 14 of our Constitution more or less is worded in the same way as Art. 15 of the Indian Constitution, the observations made by the Court with regard to the interpretation of that Article may be of some assistance.

This was a case in which a student applied for admission to a college and her application having been finally refused she moved the High Court for the issue of certain writs in order to enforce what she claimed to be her fundamental right. Art. 15 (1) on which she relied is in the following terms:

"The State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them."

In regard to the interpretation of that Article the High Court observed at p. 829:

"Of paramount importance in clause (1) are the words 'discrimination' and 'only'. What the Article forbids is discrimination and discrimination based solely on all or any of the grounds mentioned in the Article. All differentiation is not discrimination, but only such differentiation as is invidious and as is made, not because any real difference in the conditions or natural difference between the persons dealt with which makes different treatment necessary, but because of the presence of some characteristic or affiliation which is either disliked or not regarded with equal favour but which has no rational connection with the differentiation made as a justifying reason. Next, the discrimination which is forbidden is only such discrimination as is based solely on the ground that a person belongs to a particular race or caste or professes a particular religion or was born at a particular place or is of a particular sex and on no other ground. A discrimination based on one or more of these grounds and also on other grounds is not hit by the Article."

The difference between this ART. 14 and the general ART. 5, which recognizes right of equality, is not to be lost sight of: under ART. 14 if discrimination is shown to have taken place upon any or all of the grounds mentioned in ART. 14, the discriminatory legislative or executive action would be straight away hit by the prohibition contained therein. The equal protection of law given by ART. 5 is, however, examined with an initial presumption in favour of the constitutionality of legislation, namely that the State action is a bona fide exercise of the power of classification (see observations of Patanjali Sastri in the case of Kathi Raning v. State of Suarashtra AIR (1952) S.C. 123).

It would be further noticed that this right is subject to any special provision which is made for women. This proviso is in terms the same as clause (3) of Art. 15. 'Special provision for women' has in India been interpreted to mean 'special provision in favour of women.' The idea underlying the proviso is that if any special provision which amounts to showing discrimination in favour of women as a class has been made it cannot be brought within the general prohibition against the kind of discrimination which has been mentioned in ART. 14. In the case of Anjali Roy v. State of West Bengal, AIR (1952) Calcutta 825, referred to earlier, the Court observed with regard to the true meaning of Art. 15 (3) that the proviso—

"really contemplates provision in favour of women, although grammatically and etymologically, 'for' may mean 'concerning' and although, theoretically, it is possible to think of reasonable discrimination against women and children such as that they shall not be admitted to certain sections of a public museum or an art gallery where exhibits of a certain kind are to be seen. But the ordinary meaning of 'provision for' is certainly 'provision in favour of'. Besides, the command in Art. 15(1), to quote only the material portion, is that the State shall not discriminate against any citizen on the ground only of sex. That means that no discrimination shall be made against any citizen solely on the ground that such citizen is a man or a woman. Then comes clause (3) which provides that nothing in the Article shall prevent the State from making any special provision for women and children. That clause is obviously an exception to clauses (1) and (2) and since its effect is to authorise what the Article otherwise forbids, its meaning seems to me to be that notwithstanding that clauses (1) and (2) forbid discrimination against any citizen on the grounds of sex, the State may discriminate against males by making a special provision in favour of females."

Comment on specialised aspects of Right of Equality

This observation on the construction of ART. 14 would apply to other Articles that are similarly worded, as for instance, ART. 13(3), and ART. 17.

As to the scope of ART. 18, the student may usefully turn to the case of Jibendra Kishore and others v. The Province of East Pakistan, PLD (1957) S.C. 9, decided by our Supreme Court where observations on the meaning of the expression 'subject to law, public order and morality' have been made. (See also p. 386 infra).

SECTION (II): Concept of Qualified Liberties.

139. Introductory Statement

ARTs. 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12, relate to the freedom of citizens but in each case the freedom guaranteed is subject to limits. ART. 8 guarantees freedom of speech and expression subject to any reasonable restrictions of the kind mentioned in that Article.; similarly ART. 9 guarantees freedom of assembly subject to reasonable restrictions. This is also true about the freedom of association, freedom of movement and the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property mentioned in ARTs. 10 and 11. These freedoms too are subject to reasonable restrictions of the kind mentioned in these Articles. The scheme of these Articles and of several others in Section II of our analysis seems to be to determine the legitimate province of the freedom reserved to the citizens and, at the same time, to define this sphere by expressly stating the limits under which it is available. There are two contending interests at stake which are sought to be reconciled by means of two co-ordinates: one asserting affirmatively the right to freedom of the specified kind in favour of the citizens, and another limiting the same, negatively, by setting forth the restrictions within which such a freedom is available. An attempt is made to strike a balance between individual rights and the overall collective interests which are involved in the maintenance of those rights. The collective interests of the society at large are comprehensively indicated in terms like 'security of the State,' 'public order,' 'morality', 'public interest' etc. A citizen has the freedom of speech and expression, of assembly without arms, of forming associations or unions, of residing or settling in any part of Pakistan, of acquiring, holding or disposing of property, but these are all qualified freedoms and are available within the limits prescribed by ARTs. 8 to 12. And in each case it will be for the court, before which the enforcement of any of these fundamental rights comes up for consideration, to say whether or not the restrictions imposed on the enjoyment of these freedoms are reasonable. Individual liberty must be accommodated within the wider social framework so that it may be available to all

Comment on
ART. 18

Introductory statement on the dogma of "Reasonable Restrictions"

the individuals within the State. This can only be achieved by limiting individual liberty. This doctrine has been universally acknowledged.

"Political liberty", said Montesquieu in his 'Spirit of Laws' published as far back as 1748, "does not consist in an unlimited freedom . . . we must have continually present to our minds the difference between independence and liberty. Liberty is the right of doing whatever the laws permit and if a citizen would do what they forbid he would be no longer possessed of liberty, because all his fellow-citizens would have the same power."

In a case decided by the Supreme Court of India, (Ram Singh v. The State of Delhi, AIR (1951) S.C. 270), Bose J., while commenting on the Indian Art. 19, which may be regarded as being the Indian counterpart of our ARTs. 8 to 12, in his dissenting Judgment, at p. 276, observed:

"In every case it is the rights which are fundamental, not the limitations; and it is the duty of this Court and of all Courts in the land to guard and defend these rights, jealously. It is our duty and privilege to see that rights which were intended to be fundamental are kept fundamental and to see that neither Parliament nor the Executive exceed the bounds within which they are confined by the Constitution when given the power to impose a restricted set of fetters on these freedoms, and in the case of the Executive, to see further that it does not travel beyond the powers conferred by Parliament. We are here to preserve intact for the people of India the freedoms which have now been guaranteed to them and which they have learned through the years to cherish, to the very fullest extent of the guarantee, and to ensure that they are not whittled away or brought to nought either by Parliamentary legislation or by executive action."

It is submitted, with respect, that the distinction between the rights being fundamental and not the limitations being fundamental, is an artificial one; and, having regard to the language employed by the Indian Art. 19, it is clear that the nature of the right which is conferred by the part relating to fundamental rights is left to be spelt out by appeal to the totality of the several provisions in the constitution in which that right has been reflected. In other words, there are not the fundamental rights and incidental limitations imposed on those rights. A fundamental right in relation to the freedom of speech, subject to restrictions imposed by law in the interest of security of the State etc., does not mean that there is right to freedom which is fundamental, whereas the restrictions imposed by law are merely its incidental appendages. There is no warrant for looking at the concept of the fundamental rights in this manner. What is guaranteed is freedom subject to reasonable restrictions and it is this one indivisible idea which lies behind these words, that the courts will seek to enforce. The Constitution affirms both the right to freedom and its limitations—and it is the combined effect of these ideas which is the right guaranteed by the part relating to fundamental rights.

The question of 'Burden of Proof'

These considerations are pertinent not only because they bring out prominently the full effect of the language used in the several Articles that guarantee qualified freedoms but also because they throw considerable light on the question relating to the burden of proof. If the distinction drawn between rights being fundamental and limitations being incidental were to be pushed to its logical conclusion, it would follow that the burden of substantiating in a given case the plea that restrictions imposed on the enjoyment of citizens' freedom of speech, of movement, etc., are reasonable would lie on those who wish to defend those limitations as being reasonable. In such a case, therefore, the citizen would not have any onus cast upon him of demonstrating to the court that the limitations imposed on civil liberties are unreasonable. If it is once assumed that there is a fundamental right vested in a citizen to enjoy these liberties, the burden of showing that the restrictions imposed on such a right are reasonable would lie on any side that claims that the restrictions are reasonable. This was in fact the view of the burden of proof taken by Meredith C. J. of the Patna High Court in Brainandan Sharma v. State of Bihar, AIR (1950) Patna 322, where he said:

"There has been a prima facie infringement of that right, and prima facie no law can infringe that right. Therefore, the burden is, in my opinion, on the State to bring that law within the exception contained in Art. 19 cl. (5) which alone can save it."

It is submitted that the above view as to the burden of proof is not correct. The entire burden rests with the citizen to show that the restrictions imposed on his liberties are unreasonable and are not within the scope of the relevant Article. It is he who must show that the impugned legislation or the executive act complained of by him is in conflict with the provisions of the Part relating to fundamental rights.

Without the liberty of the individual being constitutionally guaranteed it is not possible to hope for any progress; and it is the individual who gives the benefit of his thought and action in order that society may be able to adjust itself to the changing needs of the times. But the liberty of the individual must not be allowed to go so far as to stultify itself: the individual must not be allowed to make a nuisance of himself to his fellow-men. In a civilised society a line has to be drawn somewhere in order to confine, by means of regulation and control, the actions of individuals in such a way that they do not come in conflict with the pursuit of an overall interest of the society as a whole.

In Art. 4 of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 26th August, 1789, the French Assembly gave the following definition of liberty :

"Liberty consists in the power of doing whatever does not injure another. Accordingly, the exercise of the natural rights of every man has no other limits than those which are necessary to secure to every other man the free exercise of the same rights; and these limits are determinable only by the law."

It is submitted that this definition of liberty could be accepted as a valid one for the purpose of interpreting the scope of the expression employed by our Constitution: "Reasonable restrictions imposed by law."

The common good thus can only be realised by imposing limits on individual liberty.

How and where this line is to be drawn just to be able to confine the conflicting individual interests and desires to the sphere of their legitimate expression, is a matter of practical politics, and the trouble with our Constitution is that this duty has now been transferred to the judiciary of the country to discharge.

140. Individual liberty and social control—in the United States

In the United States, the constitutionally guaranteed rights like that of life, liberty and property have no express limitations imposed on them by the Constitution, but the American Courts have evolved the doctrine of 'police power', 'eminent domain', and 'taxation power' as limiting the application of 'due process' clause. The two important aspects of the interpretation of the 'due process' clause are: (1) that it operates as a limitation upon the legislature as also upon the Executive branch of the Government, and (2) that it is applicable to substantive as well as to the procedural rights. (See Willoughby's Constitutional Law of the United States, Second Edition p. 726.) 'Police power', power of 'eminent domain', 'taxation power' are those powers the Individual liberty guaranteed by law.

Definition of Liberty.

exercise of which whether by the Government of the Federation or the states is not held to be in conflict with the due maintenance of the protection of the 'due process of law' which is given to the individual by the United States Constitution in its 5th and 14th Amendments.

Due Process clause.

The 5th and the 14th Amendments of the U.S. Constitution guarantee that right to life, liberty, and property will not be interfered with except by recourse to the due process of the law. It is the interpretation of the 'due process of law' clause given by the Supreme Court which has served the purpose of bringing into the forefront practically the same limitation on the rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution as are involved in the expression, 'reasonable restrictions' employed by our Constitution.

In itself, the phrase 'due process of law' does not convey anything specific and for that reason it has been denounced by Fred Rodell as that "lovely limpid legalism" (See his Woe unto you, lawyers—New York, Reynal and Hitchcock 1939—p 77). And Justice Frankfurter has had no hesitation in saying of it that it has been cast in words so undefined, either by their intrinsic meaning, or by history, or by tradition that they leave the individual justice free; if indeed they do not actually compel him to fill in the vacuum with his own controlling notions of economic, social and industrial facts with reference to which they are invoked.

It is the requirement of the 'due process' clause that the fundamental ideas of justice should be respected, and it has been ruled by the United States Supreme Court that fundamental regulations for public welfare which trench upon these rights, that is rights affecting life, liberty and property, are not prohibited by the 'due process' clause. The essential thing is not that any one of these fundamental rights is abridged or taken away by process of law, but whether the process of law by which this is sought to be achieved is such as can validly be called the 'due' process of law.

Police Power

All regulations that are reasonably necessary to secure the health, safety, public order, comfort or general welfare of the community can be made by the States in pursuance of its police power. 'Police power' of a State in America is not susceptible of any precise definition but speaking very generally, all activities of the State which are calculated to promote 'public safety, health, morals, or to the suppression of what is evidently disorderly and unruly conduct, (in short, all steps necessary to secure the greatest welfare of the State) come within its fold. (See the case of Bacon v. Walker, (1907) 204 U.S. 311 : 51 Law Ed. 499; and Noble State Bank v. Haskell, (1911) 219 U.S. 104 : 55 Law Ed. 112).

In the exercise of its police power the State cannot resort to arbitrary or oppressive means to pursue its ends or objectives but anything that it may do should be shown to bear a real and substantial relation to the pursuit of general welfare. (See Erie R. Co. v. Williams (1914) 233 U.S. 685: 58 Law Ed. 1155.)

Eminent domain and Taxation Power

We may next consider the American doctrine of 'eminent domain' and 'taxation power'. 'Eminent domain' was first used by Grotius and denotes the power of the sovereign compulsorily to acquire the property of the subjects. As understood by him the right was limited morally, if not legally, to acquisition 'for ends of public utility' and was subject to the liability to make good the loss to the dispossessed owner. (See R.W. Barker's Compulsory Acquisition Powers of the Commonwealth).

"The power of taxation may be defined", says Willis, "as the legal capacity of Government to impose charges upon persons or their property to raise revenue for governmental purposes. Police power is the legal capacity of the Government to control the personal liberty of the individuals for the protection of social interests (or common good) of the people who establish such government.

The power of the eminent domain is the legal capacity of Government to take the private property of individuals for public use upon the payment of just compensation. Eminent domain is the superior domain of the State over all property within the State. It is not an incident of tenure but an offspring of political necessity. It differs from taxation in that taxation is a contribution levied on people whereas eminent domain is compulsory sale of property to Government, although both involve taking of property. Eminent domain differs from police power in that police power is not a taking of any rights whether of property or a person from people, but a limitation on the exercise of such rights by people, although the police power may also result in making people lose their property." (Willis Constitutional Law, 1936 Ed. pp. 224-225).

141. Individual liberty and Social Control—in England

It is a cardinal principle of the English Constitution that a subject may say or do what he pleases or to move about anywhere he likes and form associations and act in concert with his fellow-men provided he does not transgress the substantive law or do acts which invade the legal rights of others. Similarly, the authorities charged with the duty of maintaining public order or performing any other governmental duties cannot do anything to the prejudice of these individual rights unless they can show that they were authorised to do that act by some rule of common law or some provision made by a statute. (See Entick v. Carrington (1765) 19 St. Tr. 1030; E.R. Vol. 95 page 807).

The Legal Position under the English Constitution

The position under the English Constitution is often summed up by the employment of a phrase which has acquired a well known connotation: there is, it is said, in England, 'the rule of law.' By that phrase is meant the idea that the existence or non-existence of a justification to do anything by a public authority is a matter that can be decided solely by appeal to law: it is not, negatively stated, a question of fact and it can only be determined by appeal to some statute or some judicially decided principle. Even the existence of a necessity does not constitute any sufficient justification for resort to the exercise of a power or fulfilment of a duty which cannot, strictly speaking, be said to flow either from a statute or precedent. In the case of extreme urgency, however, when the ordinary law of the land cannot function, there is the common law right in the public authority to repel force by force and to do all acts necessary to bring back order to prevail in the country and thus secure normal functioning of government machinery. We will deal with this aspect of the matter later when we consider the constitutional basis of the existence of Martial Law in England. But it should be carefully borne in view that the concept of the rule of law is one of the foundations of the English Constitution. Dicey in his 'Law of the Constitution' stated the doctrine of the rule of law to be one of the distinguishing features of the English Constitution. He described the three different senses in which that doctrine could be looked at. In his words:

"When we say that the supremacy or the rule of law is a characteristic of the English Constitution, we generally include under one expression at least three distinct though kindred conceptions.

(a) We mean, in the first place, that no man is punishable or can be lawfully made to suffer in body or goods except for a distinct breach of law established in the ordinary legal manner before the ordinary courts of the land. In this sense the rule of law is contrasted with every system of government based on the exercise by persons in authority of wide, arbitrary, or discretionary powers of constraint . . . we mean

Entick v. Carrington

Meaning of Rule of Law

Concept of the Rule of law—Dicey quoted

(b) in the second place, . . . not only that with us no man is above the law, but (what is a different thing) that here every man, whatever be his rank or condition, is subject to the ordinary law of the realm and amenable to the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals . . . There remains yet a third and a different sense in which the 'rule of law' or the predominance of the legal spirit may be described as a special attribute of the English Institutions. We may say that—

(c) the Constitution is pervaded by the rule of law on the ground that the general principles of the Constitution, (as for example, the right of personal liberty or the right to public meeting) are with us the result of judicial decisions determining the rights of private person in particular cases brought before the courts; whereas under many foreign Constitutions the security (such as it is) given to the rights of individual results, or appears to result, from the general principles of the Constitution." (See p. 187 of his Law of Constitution, IX Ed.)

In the third and the last sense of the rule of law stated by Dicey, is to be found a clue to the comprehension of the essential distinction between the English constitutional approach to the problem of personal liberties of the subject, on the one hand, and that of our Constitution, on the other.

In paragraph 437 of the VI Volume of Halsbury's Laws of England, it is stated that the most important liberties of the English subjects are the following:

- "(1) The right of personal freedom, or immunity from wrongful detention or confinement, which is ensured by the action of false imprisonment and by the writ of habeas corpus, reinforced by the Habeas Corpus Acts, under which, upon probable cause being shown by an affidavit, either of the prisoner himself, or of some other person on his behalf, a writ may be obtained directing the person having charge of the prisoner to produce his body before the King's Bench Division, in order that the reason of his detention may be inquired into.
- (2) The right of property, which is protected by various proprietary and delictual actions, in particular the actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, and of trespass de bonis asportatis.
- (3) The right to freedom of speech or discussion, which means that any person may write or say what he pleases, so long as he does not infringe the law relating to libel or slander, or to blasphemous, obscene, or seditious words or writings. This right is closely connected with and covers that of freedom of conscience.
- (4) The right of public meeting, which means that any persons may meet together, so long as they do not thereby trespass upon private rights of property, or commit a nuisance, or infringe the law relating to public meetings or unlawful assemblies.
- (5) The right of association, which arises from the fewness of the restrictions on the making of contracts and the constitution of trusts, from the ease with which companies can be formed under the Companies Act, and trade unions under the Trade Union Acts, and from the laxity of the law of conspiracy.

"It seems that there should be added to this list the following rights, which appear to have become well-established:—

- (6) The right of the subject to have any case affecting him tried in accordance with the principles of natural justice, particularly the principles that a man may not be a judge in his own cause, and that no party ought to be condemned unheard, or to have a decision given against him unless he has been given a reasonable opportunity of putting forward his case.

(7) The right to strike, or the right of the subject to withhold his labour, so long as he commits no breach of contract, or tort, or crime."

These rights are protected in England by:—

- (a) the high development of the action of trespass in its various forms, by resort to higher prerogative writs;
- (b) by the right of the subject to insist upon having common law action affecting his most treasured rights, as well as all accusations of serious crime, tried by gentlemen of the Jury, and
- (c) by resort to a rule of construction which is invariably followed in England, namely that statutes and other legislative Acts are, so far as possible, to be interpreted so as not to cause any interference with the vested rights of the subjects. (See paragraph 436 of Halsbury's Laws of England Vol. VI).

It would be noticed that the foregoing rights are not Fundamental Rights: they are not constitutionally guaranteed and can be taken away by an Act of Parliament.

142. The individual liberty and Social Control—Position under our Constitution.

The rights guaranteed in ARTs 8 to 12, under our Constitution represent in their totality the legal status and capacity of a free citizen, and ART. 4 prevents the State from interfering in any manner with these rights save in accordance with the limitations imposed upon those rights by the Constitution itself.

The court's power to adjudicate upon the reasonableness of the restriction imposed by law is practically unfettered. In the case of Jeshingbhai v. Emperor, AIR (1950) Bombay 363, Chief Justice Chagla of the Bombay High Court stated:

"It is not for the Legislature to determine whether the restrictions are reasonable or not. It is for the Court of law to consider the reasonableness of the restrictions imposed upon the rights. 'Reasonable' is an objective expression and its objectivity is to be determined judicially by the Court of law. There is no limit placed upon the power of the Court to consider the nature of restrictions. The Court must look upon the restrictions from every point of view. It being the duty of the Court to safeguard fundamental rights, the greater is the obligation upon the Court to scrutinize the restrictions placed by the legislature as carefully as possible."

Similarly, it was observed by Meredith C. J. in the case of Brajnandan Sharma v. State of Bihar AIR (1950) Patna 322:

"The learned Advocate-General has argued that it is not open to the Courts to consider the reasonableness or otherwise of the provision. The Legislature itself is the sole Judge of reasonableness, and if the Legislature makes a provision, the Courts must accept it as reasonable. I find it difficult to follow that argument. If this is correct, the word 'reasonable' in cl. (5) is rendered completely nugatory. The Constitution says the restrictions must be reasonable. Obviously, it is for the Courts to decide whether restrictive provisions are reasonable or not. But then, says the Advocate-General, this amounts to substituting one subjective test for another, namely, the satisfaction of the Court hearing the case for the satisfaction of the executive official who makes the order. That argument, in my opinion, is also incorrect. The Courts do not apply any subjective test. It is well settled that there can be an objective test of reasonableness, and that is what the Courts apply. They do not ask themselves, do we, as individuals, feel satisfied that the restrictions are reasonable? But, would that fictitious individual, 'the reasonable man', that is to say, the normal average man, regard them as reasonable? That is a well recognised legal means of examining the question of reasonableness, and it is essentially an objective test. If we hold that no normally constitu-

What is and what is not reasonable restriction is for court to decide.
*Jeshingbhai
v. Emperor*

*Brajnandan
Sharma v.
State of Bihar*

ted person of average intelligence could possibly regard the provision as reasonable, then our decision would be that it is an unreasonable provision, but not otherwise. For an authority for this proposition it is sufficient to cite one Privy Council decision, Emperor v. Vimlabai Deshpande, 73 I.A. 144: AIR (33) 1946 P.C. 123: 47 Cr. L.J. 831.)"

What is meant by 'standard of judgment' being an 'objective' standard and not a 'subjective' one? The courts have to be, by a notional fiction, satisfied whether or not the restriction imposed by law on the exercise of the right by citizen is one which a normal, average man would regard as reasonable. In the case of N.B. Khare v. State of Delhi, AIR (1950) S.C. 211, Mukherjea J. declared his inability to formulate an effective test in this behalf (at p. 217) :

"It is not possible to formulate an effective test which would enable us to pronounce any particular restriction to be reasonable or unreasonable per se. All the attendant circumstances must be taken into consideration and one cannot dissociate the actual contents of the restrictions from the manner of their imposition or the mode of putting them into practice. The question of reasonableness of the restrictions imposed by a law may arise as much from the substantive part of the law as from its procedural portion . . . Under clause (5) of Article 19, the reasonableness of a challenged legislation has to be determined by a Court and the Court decides such matters by applying some objective standard which is said to be the standard of an average prudent man. Judged by such standard which is sometimes described as an external yard-stick, the vesting of authority in particular officers to take prompt action under emergent circumstances, entirely on their own responsibility or personal satisfaction, is not necessarily unreasonable. One has to take into account the whole scheme of the legislation and the circumstances under which the restrictive orders could be made."

(On the question of 'subjective' and 'objective' standards of judgment much will be said when we deal with the question of certiorari jurisdiction of the Supreme court and High Courts in our country, but the student who is interested in pursuing the problem may be well advised to read carefully two English cases which represent to some extent the extreme views in either direction in regard to what the requirements of subjective and objective standards of judgment are. (a) Liversidge v. Anderson, (1942) A.C. 206; (b) Nakuda Ali v. Jayarante, (1951) A.C. 66).

Now, although it is no doubt true that the question, whether or not a given restriction is a reasonable restriction, should be determined, is a matter which is incapable of any precise formulation, but the following observations of Pastanji Sastri in the case of State of Madras v. V. G. Row, AIR (1952) S.C. 196, are opposite in this context, and are offered as representing, in the present author's opinion, the best that has been said in India on that topic at p. 200) :

"It is important in this context to bear in mind that the test of reasonableness, wherever prescribed, should be applied to each individual statute impugned, and no abstract standard, or general pattern of reasonableness can be laid down as applicable to all cases. The nature of the right alleged to have been infringed, the underlying purpose of the restrictions imposed, the extent and urgency of the evils sought to be remedied thereby, the disproportion of the imposition, the prevailing conditions at the time, should all enter into the judicial verdict. In evaluating such elusive factors and forming their own conception of what is reasonable, in all the circumstances of a given case, it is inevitable that the social philosophy and the scale of values of the Judges participating in the decision should play an important part, and the limit to their interference with legislative judgment in such cases can only be dictated by their sense of responsibility and self-restraint and the sobering reflection that the Constitution is meant not only for people of their way of thinking but for all, and that the majority of the elected representatives of the people have, in authorising the imposition of the restrictions, considered them to be reasonable."

In the case of Chintamanrao v. The State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR (1951) S.C. 118, the expression 'reasonable restriction' was interpreted by Mahajan J. of the Supreme Court of India as implying—

"that the limitation imposed on a person in enjoyment of the right should not be arbitrary or of an excessive nature, beyond what is required in the interests of the public. The word 'reasonable' implies intelligent care and deliberation, that is the choice of a course which reason dictates." (p. 119)

This case has been referred to and its principle re-affirmed by the Supreme Court of India in the case of M/S Dwarka Prasad Laxmi Narain v. the State of Uttar Pradesh, A.I.R. (1954) S.C. 224, where the constitutionality of the Uttar Pradesh Coal Control Order, 1953, was considered. Under the impugned Order the licensing authority was given absolute power to grant or withhold the grant of licence, to renew or refuse to renew, suspend, cancel or modify any licence: under that Order the authority competent to do any one of these things was required to give reasons in support of the action that he took. The Supreme Court adjudged the order as being violative of ART. 19 and remarked that these restrictions on the right to do trade were unreasonable. It said:

"No rules have been framed and no directions given on these matters to regulate or guide the discretion of the Licensing Officer. Practically the Order commits to the unrestrained will of a single individual the power to grant, withhold or cancel licences in any way he chooses and there is nothing in the Order which could ensure a proper execution of the power or operate as a check upon injustice that might result from improper execution of the same." (p. 227)

As to the safeguard, namely, that the licensing authority was to record his reasons in support of the action he took, the Court remarked that the alleged safeguard was not effective,

"for there is no higher authority prescribed in the Order who could examine the propriety of these reasons and revise or review the decision of the subordinate officer. The reasons, therefore, which are required to be recorded are only for the personal or subjective satisfaction of the licensing authority and not for furnishing any remedy to the aggrieved person".

(See also West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal Bose A.I.R. (1954) S.C. 92 and Raghbir Singh v. the Court of Wards, Ajmer, A.I.R. (1953) S.C. 373).

In each case, therefore, the claims of individual rights have to be viewed in the context of an over-all combined welfare of the rest of the members composing society, and the judgment of the courts to that extent would necessarily be influenced not so much by considerations of abstract justice, as by the appreciation of the political and economic situation which at the relevant time might be confronting the society as a whole. A proper balance is expected to be struck between the claims of individual freedom and the necessity of imposing some measure of social control which may be demanded by the general public interests.

The doctrine that a Court of Law should assess the constitutionality of law under challenge, on the ground that the restrictions it imposes are not reasonable having regard to the prevailing conditions, does not necessarily involve the risk of importing any relativity in the making of judicial determinations and taken by itself is a well established mode of proceeding which is not unknown even to the practitioners of English Common Law. For instance, it was in deference to this very principle that in the case of King v. Governor of Brixton Prison Ex Parte Sarno, (1916) 2 K.B. 742, Lord Reading Chief Justice said:—

"I can conceive that an act which in time of peace could not fairly be described as a danger to the safety of the realm might fairly be so described in time of war, as for instance if a person commits, or even if he is merely suspected of committing, a crime. Although his actual offence may be merely the commission of a crime, nevertheless in time of war, when all the activities of persons engaged in police protection and in bringing criminals to justice must necessarily be restricted because of the demand that has been made upon persons of military age, the commission of crime may contribute to endanger the safety of the realm, and in time of war suspicion may justify action which could not be justified in time of peace It is unavoidable that incidents should happen in time of war which would, in truth, shock the majority of persons in this country in time of peace."

Some suggested tests of Reasonable Restriction

In considering whether or not restrictions imposed by law on the freedoms guaranteed by ARTs. 8 to 12 are reasonable, it is perfectly permissible to a court to enquire into the provisions of the impugned law with a view to seeing whether principles of natural justice, like the right of audience being given to the party to whose prejudice an order is being passed etc. have been incorporated by the legislature. (See AIR (1956) Allahabad 571, State v. Babulsl and others; AIR (1951) Calcutta 322, Tozammal v. Joint Secretary to Government of West Bengal; AIR (1952) S.C. 196, State of Madras v. V. G. Row; AIR (1954) Allahabad 562, Rama Shankar Tewari v. The State). Every thing will depend on the objects of the legislation and no hard and fast rule can be laid down about the extent to which requirements of natural justice should be taken care of by the legislature at the time when it imposes restrictions on the freedoms preserved by the Constitution. Similarly, the Court is entitled to see whether or not any absolute unqualified and unguided discretion has been conferred by the legislature on the executive in the matter of enforcing reasonable restrictions. Thus it has been held, as for instance in India, in the case of Raghbir Singh v. Court of Wards, Ajmer, AIR (1953) S.C. 373, that omission to provide for adequate machinery for the purpose of determining, whether a certain person was habitually infringing the rights of his tenants so as to be within the mischief of the law for being treated as incapable of managing his property, is by itself an adequate basis for declaring the law to be unreasonable. It has also been held that a provision enabling authority being delegated to an officer of a very low rank to exercise powers under the West Bengal Security Act XIX (19) of 1950 is unreasonable legislation (Jatish Chandra v. B. K. Sinha, AIR (1951) Calcutta, 404). But it has also been held that the fact that the law though reasonable in itself has not provided for adequate safeguard against the abuse of executive authority to administer the law is not by itself sufficient for denouncing that law as imposing unreasonable restriction within the meaning of Art. 19 (See the case of N. B. Khare v. State of Delhi AIR (1950) S.C. 211).

Restriction vs. Regulation

The word 'restriction' appearing in the Constitution in relation to the freedoms that have been guaranteed has been interpreted in India to mean a term that is wider than the term 'regulation'. Even a total prohibition in Loknath Misra v.

State of Orissa, AIR (1952) Orissa 42, has been considered as reasonable. It has been held in that case that expression 'restriction' in Art. 19(6) is not synonymous with 'regulation'. Restriction may be complete or partial and where it is complete it would imply absolute prohibition. The Court went on the dictionary meaning of the word 'restriction' which includes prohibition also. (See however the case of Municipal Corporation of City of Toronto v. Virgo (1896) A.C. 88, where it has been ruled that a power to regulate and govern seems to imply the continued existence of that which is to be regulated or governed; and the case of Commonwealth of Australia v. The Bank of New South Wales (1949) 2 All E.R. 755: (1950) A.C. 235, where it has been held that the power of regulation in some cases would include power of prohibition although normally that would not be so. In this last mentioned case the question was whether S. 46 of the Commonwealth Banking Act of 1947 was invalid on account of its being inconsistent with freedom of inter-State trade guaranteed by S. 92 of the Australian Constitution). In Saghir Ahmad's case of the Supreme Court of India reported in A.I.R. (1954) S.C. 728, at 737: PLD (1956) S.C. (India) 148, Mukherjea J. at page 160 left the question whether or not the term 'restriction' included the idea of total prohibition, open. His Lordship remarked:

"Be that as it may, although in our opinion the normal use of the word 'restriction' seems to be in the sense of 'limitation' and not 'extinction', we would on this occasion prefer not to express any final opinion on this matter."

In the case of Hughes and Vale Proprietary Ltd. v. State of New South Wales, the Privy Council have laid down that a regulation which reserved to the licensing authority the absolute right to refuse the grant of licence in his discretion for whatever reason he liked, amounted to a prohibition and interfered with the freedom of inter-State trade guaranteed by S. 92 of the Australian Constitution. [See (1954) 3 All E.R.p. 607: (1955) A.C. 241: (1954) 3 W.L.R. 824].

The argument of their Lordships was that as a simple prohibition of the trade of an individual or such a prohibition subject to a discretionary exemption was not merely regulatory of the trade (and, not being regulatory, would offend against S. 92 of the Constitution within the principle stated in Commonwealth of Australia v. Bank of New South Wales, (1949) 2 All. E.R. 755) because the individual was thereby not allowed in effect to carry on his trade at all, so also the prohibition in the Transport Act of the operation of transport unless authorised by licence which might be granted or withheld at the discretion of State authority was not merely regulatory of trade, commerce and intercourse among the States; accordingly the licensing provisions of the Transport Act contravened S. 92 of the Constitution and were invalid as regards the inter-State transport.

(See also Motor Transport Commissioners v. Antill Ranger & Co. Proprietary Ltd., State of New South Wales and Edmund T. Lennon Pty Ltd. J.C. (1956) A.C. 527; (1956) 3 W.L.R. p. 497: (1956) 3 All E. R. 106).

We may now consider the several freedoms guaranteed in ARTs. 8 to 12 of our constitution.

143. Various 'Freedoms' considered

The freedom of speech and expression is an essential pre-requisite for the purpose of successfully working democratic institutions. If democracy refers to a form of government which is to be conducted by means of an organised public opinion, any clog or fetter that may be imposed on the citizens' right to express themselves freely on public questions, virtually would amount to preventing effectively the formation of that very opinion which is the admitted basis for the working of a democratic government. But Vale Proprietary Ltd. v. New South Wales.

(a) Freedom of Speech and Expression

although the freedom to express oneself ought to be freely granted, care has also to be taken at the same time to see that this freedom is not abused. In this modern age of ours, when the means available for dissemination of information and opinion are so widespread and effective that one can, in the course of a brief hour or so, by means of telephone, radio or telegraph contrivances transmit from one end of the country to the other any idea, opinion or information—or even publicise same on an extensive scale through the medium of the daily Press—which is prejudicial or harmful to the interests of society, the need does arise of safeguarding not only the interests of other citizens in so far as their right to reputation is concerned but also of ensuring that the freedom of speech shall not be used by scheming ruffians as a licence for the purpose of subverting the organised civil government of the day. That then is the reason why ART. 8 enables legislature to impose “reasonable restrictions” on this freedom “in the interest of the security of Pakistan, friendly relations with foreign States, public order, decency or morality or in relation to the contempt of court, defamation or incitement of offence.” The framers of our Constitution have taken advantage of the Indian experience of the working of their Constitution in relation to the right of freedom of speech. They, that is the Indians, have amended the second clause of Art. 19: this change was brought in by way of amendment by the ‘First Amendment Act 1951, dated 18th June 1951 [Section 3 (1)(a)]. The statement of objects and reasons, in the light of which the amendment was passed and ultimately accepted appeared in the Gazette of India, 1951, Part II, Section II, page 357, and it was pointed out that:

“During the last fifteen months of the working of the Constitution certain difficulties have been brought to light by judicial decisions and pronouncements, especially in regard to the Chapter on Fundamental Rights. A citizen’s right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Article 19(1) (a) have been held by Supreme Court to be so comprehensive as not to render a person culpable even if he advocates murder and other crimes of violence.”

In the Constitution of the United States of America in its very First Amendment we have the following provided:

“Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peacefully to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.”

The American Courts, while interpreting the freedom of speech and the press enjoined by the First Amendment, have evolved a doctrine which is known as the ‘rule of clear and present danger.’

The Fourteenth Amendment which enjoins that no one shall be deprived of his life, liberty and property without the due process of law, has also been invoked (in cases where the express provision mentioned in the First Amendment does not apply) as furnishing a basis for the recognition of the freedom of speech and press in the States.

The Founding Fathers knew only too well the state of the common law that had a reference to the freedom of the speech and of the press. According to Blackstone:

“The liberty of the Press is indeed essential to the nature of a free State; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every free man has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public: to forbid this, is to destroy the freedom of the press: but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequence of his own temerity. To subject the press to the restrictive power of a licenser, as was formerly done, both before and since the Revolution, is to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion and government. But to punish (as the law does at present) any dangerous or offensive writings, which, when published, shall on a fair and impartial trial be adjudged of a pernicious tendency, is necessary for the preservation of peace and good order, of government and religion, the only solid foundations of civil liberty. Thus the will of individuals is still left free; the abuse only of that free will is the object of legal punishment.” (See his Commentaries Vol. IV p. 145).

Legal Position in America.

They, that is the American people, however, wanted to ensure by means of an express constitutional guarantee that the freedom of speech and press shall not be at the mercy of ordinary legislative process.

The ‘clear and present danger’ doctrine, referred to earlier, as evolved and applied by the Courts in America, refers to the requirement of law that before the Government can penalise any utterance it must show that it occurred “in such circumstances or has been of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger”, and further that it constitutes “a substantive evil”, which Government is entitled to prevent. Whether or not this is made out, is a question of law, and its enforcement by the Courts has reference to the provisions of First Amendment and the Fourteenth Amendment of the American Constitution. In the case of Schenck v. United States, (1919) 249 U.S. 47: 63 Law Ed. 470, (a case where this doctrine received its formulation,) Justice Holmes (at p. 52): observed:

“We admit that in many places and in ordinary times the defendants, in saying all that was said in the circular, would have been within their constitutional rights. But the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done . . . The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theater, and causing a panic. It does not even protect a man from an injunction against uttering words that may have all the effect of force . . . The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree.”

In a recent case American Communications Association v. Douds (1950) 339 U.S. 382: 94 Law Ed. 925 at p. 927, the Supreme Court of America has observed:

“Freedom of speech, press, and assembly are dependent upon the power of constitutional government to survive. If it is to survive it must have power to protect itself against unlawful conduct and, under some circumstances, against incitements to commit unlawful acts. Freedom of speech does not comprehend the right to speak on any subject at any time.”

(See also the case of Niemotko v. Maryland (1951) 340 U.S. 268 : 95 Law Ed. 267, particularly the opinion of Justice Frankfurter for a scholarly analysis and classification of the different types of free speech cases considered by the United States Supreme Court).

Under our Constitution freedom of the press has not been separately mentioned, but it would seem that the freedom of the Press would flow logically from the citizen’s right to freedom of speech and expression—for, after all, freedom of the Press means nothing more than one’s ability to express oneself in print. Press is thus under our Constitution in much the same position as the ordinary citizen; it has no special privileges. This is also true under the English Law (See Arnold v. King (1914) 41 I.A 149).

“Liberty of the Press”, said Lord Mansfield, “consists in printing without any previous licence subject to the consequences of the law.” (The King v. Dean of Saint Asaph (1784) 3 TR 428 at 431).

Clear and present danger rule.

Freedom of the press.

Fundamental Rights

Pre-censorship and the Freedom of Expression.

It would appear that under our Constitution all laws that permit the imposition of pre-censorship, which is not related to any of the purposes mentioned in ART. 8, may have to be regarded as being opposed to the guarantee contained in ART. 8, and therefore void and of no effect whatever. In a case decided by the Supreme Court of India (Brij Bhushan and another v. The State of Delhi, AIR (1950) S.C. 129), it has been ruled that the imposition of pre-censorship unconnected with the purposes mentioned in Art. 19 (2) of the Indian Constitution is void. Fazl Ali J., while conceding in his dissenting judgment that pre-censorship on a journal did tantamount to a restriction on the liberty of the press (which is included in the right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Art. 19 of the Indian Constitution) proceeded to examine the further question whether the imposition of such a restriction was covered or saved by clause (2) of Art. 19, which had said,

"Nothing in sub-clause (a) of clause (1) shall affect the operation of any existing law, in so far as it relates to, or prevent, the State from making any law relating to, libel, slander, defamation, contempt of Court or any matter which offends against decency or morality or which undermines the security of, or tends to overthrow, the State" and came to the conclusion that the law which was impeached before the Court was fully saved by Art. 19(2).

Under our ART. 8, there is no saying of "the existing laws" and the only question to be considered by a Court is whether the right of freedom of speech and expression has been subjected to reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interests of the security of State etc. It would thus appear that the principle of the decision recorded by Fazl Ali J., in his dissenting judgment would apply to the interpretation of ART. 8 also to the extent indicated earlier.

A similar argument would apply for holding that laws enabling the executive to demand security from the Press also violate guarantee contained in ART. 8, provided it be held that that restriction was not imposed in the interest of security of State etc. In the case of Bharati Press v. The Chief Secretary of the Government of Bihar, AIR (1951) Patna 12, the Special Bench of three Judges of the Patna High Court have held that:

"An order demanding security under S. 3(3), Press Act for violation of S. 4(1) (a) of that Act is void and must be quashed."

This was a case of a pamphlet entitled 'Sangram' written in Bengali, which contained a clear invocation to the readers to join a total and deadly struggle to bring about a revolution by violence resulting in complete annihilation of those whom the writer considered as 'oppressors', or who were directors of wrong and injustice, or who took part in parochial national politics or who brought into disgrace the mother tongue. Relying on the decision of the Supreme Court in Romesh Thapar v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 124, and Brij Bhushan and another v. State of Delhi, AIR (1950) S.C. 129, their Lordships of the Patna High Court held that:

"Clauses (a) and (b) of S. 4(1), Press Act are void being inconsistent with the fundamental right given under Art. 19(1) of the Constitution, and that these provisions are not saved under cl. (2) of the said Article. As the demand for security in the case has been made for violation of S. 4(1) (a) of the Act, the order demanding security is void and must be quashed."

It is largely as a result of these decisions that the original provision in sub-clause (2) of Art. 19 was amended in India and given its present shape—and our ART. 8 corresponds to the present Indian formulation in Art. 19(2) of that Constitution. The original provision was, as follows:

Various Freedoms considered.

"Nothing in sub-clause (a) of clause (1) shall affect the operation of any existing law, in so far as it relates to, or prevent, the State from making any law relating to, libel, slander, defamation, contempt of Court or any matter which offends against decency or morality or which undermines the security of, or tends to overthrow, the State."

The law relating to contempt of Court in our country is the same as it is known to the English Law. There is no precise definition given in any of our statutes, as to what constitutes contempt of court. In the Contempt of Court Act (Act XII of 1926) all that was done was to define and limit the power of certain courts in the matter of punishing contempts of court. In Section 2, it was laid down:—

- (1) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (3), the High Courts of Judicature established by Letters Patent shall have, and exercise the same jurisdiction, powers and authority, in accordance with the same procedure and practice, in respect of contempts of courts subordinate to them as they have and exercise in respect of contempts of themselves.
- (2) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (3), a Chief Court shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction, powers and authority, in accordance with the same procedure and practice, in respect of contempt of itself as a High Court referred to in sub-section (1).
- (3) No High Court shall take cognizance of a contempt alleged to have been committed in respect of a Court subordinate to it where such contempt is an offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code."

There are of course various classes and kinds of contempts known to English law: in the words of Lord Russell of Killowen, uttered by him in the case of Reg. v. Gray, (1900) 2 QB 36 (at p. 40) some of them are as follows:

"Any act done or writing published calculated to bring a Court or a Judge of the Court into contempt, or to lower its or his authority, is a contempt of Court. That is one class of contempt. Further, any act done or writing published calculated to obstruct or interfere with the due course of justice or the lawful process of the Courts, is a contempt of Court. The former class belongs to the category which Lord Hardwicke L. C. characterised as scandalising a Court or a Judge (In re Read and Huggonson (1742) 2 Atk 469). That description of that class of contempt is to be taken subject to one and an important qualification. Judges and Courts are alike open to criticism, and if reasonable argument or expostulation is offered against any judicial act as contrary to law or the public good, no Court could or would treat that as contempt of Court. The law ought not to be astute in such cases to criticise adversely what under such circumstances and with such an object is published, but it is to be remembered that in this matter the liberty of the press is no greater and no less, than the liberty of every subject of the Queen."

In this case the Editor of Birmingham Press had attacked Darling J. who was holding the Local Assizes. The offender apologised and was fined £ 100 with £ 25 as costs. The language used by the offender has been reproduced in the report of the case in 69 L.J. Q.B. 502: 82 L.J. 534 and is as follows:

"If any one can imagine little titch upholding his dignity upon a point of honour in a public-house he has a very clear conception of what Mr. Justice Darling looked like in warning the press against the printing of indecent evidence. His Diminutive Lordship positively glowed with judicial self-consciousness . . . No newspaper can exist except upon its merits, a condition from which, the Bench, happily for Mr.

Contempt of Court

Justice Darling is exempt. There is not a journalist in Birmingham who has anything to learn from the imprudent little man in horsehair, a microcosm of conceit and empty headedness . . . One is almost sorry that the Lord Chancellor had not another relative to provide for on the day that he seated a new judge from among the larrikins of the law. One of Justice Darling's biographers states that an eccentric relative left him much money. That misguided testator spoiled a successful bus conductor."

So far as the statutory provisions of law of contempt are concerned, reference may be made to Section 228 of the Penal Code, and S. 480 of the Criminal Procedure Code: the former defines the nature of the offence created by the statute, and the latter gives summary powers to a Court to punish a person guilty of contempt of its authority, "when any such offence is committed in the view or presence of any civil or criminal court . . ."

The two High Courts of our country, as also the Supreme Court, are described by the Constitution as being Courts of record and their powers for punishing contempt are mentioned in the Constitution itself. (See ART. 176). As far as comments critical of Bench are concerned Lord Atkin stated the principle thus in Ambard v. Attorney-General for Trinidad and Tobago, (1936) AC 322 at p. 335:

"Justice is not a cloistered virtue; she must be allowed to suffer the scrutiny and respectful, even though outspoken, comments of ordinary men."..

In the case of Israr Hussain v. The Crown, (1954) F.C.R. (Pak) p.7,: P.L.D. (1954) F.C. 313, the question relating to the contempt of the Judge of a Superior Court has been elaborately considered by the Full Bench of the Federal Court of Pakistan. This was a case in which an advocate, in his capacity as a private litigant, had in an affidavit scandalised a Judge of the former Sind Chief Court. Chief Justice Munir ruled that it was not a good defence to the proceedings for contempt that the advocate's intention was not to scandalise or that the allegation was true, because the essential question in such a case was the tendency of the allegation to lower the authority of the Judge by bringing him into disgrace and not the intention underlying the allegations or the truth thereof. In the words of the learned Chief Justice:

"The contention that the allegations were justified and the complaint that the appellant was not given an opportunity to substantiate them assume that in summary proceedings for contempt where such contempt consists in scandalising a Judge truth is a valid answer. But neither before the Chief Court nor before us was cited any authority or opinion that where proceedings in contempt are initiated against a person who has scandalised a Judge of a Superior Court, truth can be successfully set up as a defence. The whole principle of the Law of Contempt is against any such defence, and if the law were as contended for, the whole administration of justice would be brought into disrepute because in that case the honour of the Judges would be at the mercy of disgruntled litigants who might with impunity attack the judges and when proceedings in contempt were taken against them, bring them into further contempt by pleading truth and offering to prove it. Judges would thus be constantly engaged in defending their own personal honour against the onslaughts of persons who are parties to causes pending in their own Courts. And where a judge has thus been dragged into a forensic arena, public confidence in the administration of justice by him would be completely gone and a few such instances would be sufficient to expose the whole system to public ridicule." (p. 21)

The law relating to defamation may be divided into two parts:

(a) Criminal liability for the offence of defamation which is punishable under S. 500 of the Penal Code.

(b) Civil liability which is enforceable by an action in damages for compensation to the person who has been subjected to libel or slander. Here the principles of the English Common Law in regard to the tort of libel and slander would apply.

S. 499 of the Penal Code defines offence of defamation as follows:

"499. Defamation.—Whoever by words either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representation: makes or publishes any imputation concerning any person intend to harm, or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation will harm, the reputation of such person, is said, except in the cases hereinafter excepted, to defame that person.

"Explanation 1.—It may amount to defamation to impute anything to a deceased person, if the imputation would harm the reputation of that person if living, and is intended to be hurtful to the feelings of his family or other near relatives.

Explanation 2.—It may amount to a defamation to make an imputation concerning a company or an association or collection of persons as such.

Explanation 3.—An imputation in the form of an alternative or expressed ironically, may amount to defamation.

Explanation 4.—No imputation is said to harm a person's reputation, unless that imputation directly or indirectly, in the estimation of others, lowers the moral or intellectual character of that person, or lowers the character of that person in respect of his caste or of his calling, or lowers the credit of that person, or causes it to be believed that the body of that person is in a loathsome state, or in a state generally considered as disgraceful."

There are ten exceptions mentioned in the section which it is not necessary to reproduce for the purpose of the present statement of law relating to defamation.

Incitement to offence is itself an offence under the Penal Code. S. 107 of the Pakistan Penal Code defines what is abetment of an offence and in its very first clause in effect says that a person may abet the doing of a thing when he instigates a person to do that thing. S. 108 defines an abettor, and S. 109 prescribes punishment for abetment, "if the act abetted is committed in consequence of abetment, and where no express provision is made for its punishment." Under S. 117 of the Penal Code there is a provision for the punishment of abetting the commission of an offence by the public or by more than ten persons.

The expressions 'decency' and 'morality' occurring in Art. 8 are too vague to admit of any precise juridical connotation. Obviously, the words are calculated to hit obscene and paronographic expressions in writing or in speech.

S. 292 of the Pakistan Penal Code penalises the sale, letting on hire, distribution, public exhibition or circulation of any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing, painting, representation of figure or any other obscene object whatsoever. This Section was incorporated along with S. 293 which punishes sale of obscene books to young persons by Obscene Publication Act (Act VIII of 1925) for the purpose of giving effect to the international convention for the suppression of the circulation of, and traffic in, obscenity publications, signed at Geneva on behalf of the Governor-General-in-Council of India on September 12, 1923. S. 294 punishes any person who to the annoyance of others does any obscene act in a public place or sings, recites or utters any obscene songs, ballad or words, language or song in public place. It would be noticed that in none of these three Sections has any attempt been made to offer a statutory definition of obscenity. There have been judicial pronouncements, however, which throw a great deal of light on the legal notion of obscenity. As per Cockburn C. J. in The Queen v. Benjamin Hicklin, (1868) L.R. 3 Q.B.D. 360, the test of obscenity is this: whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscene is so to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands the publication of this sort may fall. (See also Lord Goddard's remarks approving this statement of law by Cockburn C. J. in a recent case Regina v. Reiter, (1954) 2 Q.B. 16 at p. 19, as also the case of Sreeram Sakseena v. Emperor, ILR (1940) 1 Cal. 581 : AIR (1940) Calcutta 290. If the publication is detrimental to public morals and calculated to produce a pernicious effect in depraving and debauching the minds of the persons into whose hands it may come, it will be an obscene publication which it is the intention of law to suppress. (See Emperor v. Hari Singh (1905) ILR 28 Allahabad 100).

Export evidence inadmissible for determining the obscene character of publication.

It is submitted that in the determination of the question whether or not a publication charged as obscene is one which is likely to corrupt or deprave those into whose hands it is likely to fall is one for the Court to decide, and it is not a matter on which expert evidence could be allowed to be led. In an English trial relating to the offence (misdemeanour) of obscenity, presided over by Sir Chartres Biron, the conversation in court reported to have taken place between the Magistrate and Norman Birkett, (the latter appearing for the defence) is instructive on the point:

"Norman Birkett: I want to call evidence from every conceivable walk of life which bears on the test whether the tendency of this book was to deprave and corrupt. A more distinguished body of witnesses has never before been called in a court of justice.

The Magistrate: I have the greatest doubt whether the evidence is admissible.

Norman Birkett: If I am not allowed to call evidence it means that a Magistrate is virtually a censor of literature.

The Magistrate: I don't think people are entitled to express an opinion upon a matter which is for the decision of the court."

Mr. Desmond McCarthy, then Editor of 'Life and Letters', went into the box and replying to Mr. Birkett said he had read the book.

"Norman Birkett: In your view is it obscene?

The Magistrate: No I shall disallow that. It is quite clear that the evidence is not admissible. A book may be a fine piece of literature and yet obscene. Art and Obscenity are not disassociated at all. There is a room at Naples to which visitors are not admitted as a rule, which contains fine bronzes and statues, all admirable works of Art, but all grossly obscene. It does not follow that because a book is a work of art it is not obscene. I shall not admit the evidence.

Norman Birkett: I formally tender thirty-nine other witnesses. The evidence which a number of them would have given is identical with that of Mr. McCarthy. In a second category are distinguished authors and authoresses who would have said that they had read the book and in their view it was not obscene. Other witnesses include booksellers, ministers of religion, social workers, magistrates, biologists, including Professor Julian Huxley, educationalists, including the Registrar of Durham University, medical men and representatives of the London Libraries.

The Magistrate: I reject them all."

The best that has been said on the subject of obscenity is to be found in the summing up by Mr. Justice Stable in a trial, the subject-matter of the accusation being the publication of "Philanderer", published by Secker and Warburg in April, 1953:

"Remember the charge is a charge that the tendency of the book is to corrupt and deprave. The charge is not that the tendency of the book is either to shock or to disgust. That is not a criminal offence. Then you say: 'Well, corrupt or deprave whom?' and again the test: those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall. What exactly does that mean? Are we to take our literary standards as being the level of something that is suitable for a fourteen-year-old school girl? Or do we go even further back than that, and are we to be reduced to the sort of books that one reads as a child in the nursery? The answer to that is: Of course not. A mass of literature, great literature, from many angles is wholly unsuitable for reading by the adolescent, but that does not mean that the publisher is guilty of a criminal offence for making those works available to the general public.

"You have heard a good deal about the putting of ideas into young heads. But is it really books that put ideas into young heads, or is it nature? When a child, be it boy or girl, passing from a state of blissful ignorance, reaches that most perilous part of life's journey which we call 'adolescence', and finds itself traversing an unknown country without a map, without a compass, and sometimes, I am afraid, from a bad home, without a guide, it is this natural change from childhood to maturity, that puts ideas into its young head. It is the business of parents and the teachers and the environment of society, so far as is possible, to see that those ideas are wisely and naturally directed to the ultimate fulfilment of a balanced individual life"

"This is an American novel written by an American, published originally in New York and purporting to depict the lives of people living today in New York, to portray their speech and attitude in general towards this particular aspect of life. If we are going to read novels about how things go on in New York, it would not be of much assistance, would it, if, contrary to the fact, we were led to suppose that in New York no unmarried woman of teenage has disabused her mind of the idea that babies are brought by storks or are sometimes found in cabbage plots or under gooseberry bushes?

"You may think that this is a very crude work; but that it is not, perhaps altogether an exaggerated picture of the approach that is being made in America towards this great problem of sex. You may think that if this does reflect the approach on that side of the Atlantic towards this great question, it is just as well that we should know it and that we must not close our eyes or our minds to the truth because it might conceivably corrupt or deprave any somewhat puerile young mind."

The Judge then gave an outline of the plot and continued:

"So far as his amatory adventures are concerned, the book does, with candour or, if you prefer it, crudity, deal with the realities of human love and intercourse. There is no getting away from that, and the Crown say: 'well, that is sheer filth.' Is the act of sexual passion sheer filth? It may be an error of taste to write about it. It may be a matter in which some, perhaps old fashioned, people would prefer that reticence continued to be observed as it was yesterday. But is it sheer filth? That is a matter which you have to consider and ultimately to decide.

"I do not suppose there is a decent man or woman in this court who does not whole-heartedly believe that pornography, the filthy bawdy muck that is just filth for filth's sake, ought to be stamped out and suppressed. Such books are not literature. They have got no message; they have got no inspiration; they have got no thought. They have got nothing. They are just filth and ought to be stamped out. But in our desire for a healthy society, if we drive the criminal law too far, further than it ought to go, is there not a risk that there will be a revolt, a demand for a change in the law, and that the pendulum may swing too far the other way and allow to creep in things that at the moment we can exclude and keep out?"

The meaning of expressions 'public order' appearing in ARTs. 8, 9, 10 and 'public interest' appearing in ART. 11, may now be considered. The expression 'public order' has reference to the maintenance of conditions whereunder the orderly functioning of government can be carried on. It is the duty of Government to see that the lives, properties and liberties of the citizens are not thrown in jeopardy. 'Public order' is wider than 'public safety', and implies absence of internal disorder, rebellion, lack of interference with or obstruction to the supply or distribution of essential commodities or services. Security of State involves something more than maintenance of public order, the latter term having exclusive reference to the creation of internal conditions within a State which make it possible for the State to carry on its duties, and discharge its functions. Security of State implies also an external reference, such as immunity from war of external aggression, avoidance of unfriendly relations with the neighbouring States etc. It must, however, be admitted that these terms have not been precisely defined anywhere and even the judicial pronouncements in India as well as in our country which have a bearing on the interpretation of these terms do not seem to proceed on any well accepted basis or approach for the comprehension of these vague words. Security of the State could be achieved by preventing the recrudescence of all the prejudicial acts which bring about its political or economic stability. In relation to the conduct of its external affairs the security of the State can be exposed to grave risk in case friendly relations with the neighbouring States are disturbed by well calculated attempts on the part of pestiferous provocateurs to precipitate crisis etc. The Supreme Court of India in a case referred to earlier (Romesh Thappar v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 124), did not give any definition of the expression 'Security of State', but indicated that it connoted something more than mere breaches of public safety or public order which do not constitute any danger to the State itself. In the words of Patanjali Sastri:

"The Constitution thus requires a line to be drawn in the field of public order or tranquillity marking off, more or less roughly, the boundary between those serious and aggravated forms of public disorder which are calculated to endanger the security of the State and the relatively minor breaches of the peace of a purely local significance treating for this purpose differences in degree as if they were differences in kind." (p. 128)

The meaning of 'public safety' and 'public order' was adverted to by Fazl Ali J. in his dissenting judgment in the case of Brij Bhushan v. State of Delhi, AIR (1950) S.C. 129. He felt that the expression 'public safety'

"has now acquired a well-recognized meaning in relation to an Act like the impugned Act, (East Punjab Public Safety Act, 1949) as a result of a long course of legislative practice, and may be taken to denote safety or security of the State. In this sense, it was used in the Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Act, 1914, as well as the Defence of India Act, and this is how it was judicially interpreted in Rex. v. Governor of Wormwood Scrubs Prison, (1920) 2 K.B. 305". (p. 130)

The learned Judge further went on to remark:

"Thus 'public order' and 'public safety' are allied matters, but in order to appreciate how they stand in relation to each other, it seems best to direct our attention to the opposite concepts which we may, for convenience of reference, respectively label as 'public disorder' and 'public unsafety'. If 'public safety' is, as we have seen, equivalent to 'security of the State', what I have designated as public unsafety may be regarded as equivalent to 'insecurity of the State'. When we approach the matter in this way, we find that while 'public disorder' is wide enough to cover a small riot or an affray and other cases where peace is disturbed by or affects a small group of persons, 'public unsafety' (or 'insecurity of the State') will usually be connected with serious internal disorders and such disturbances of public tranquillity as jeopardize the security of the State."

Several Freedoms considered

It would thus appear from the foregoing extract taken from the judgment of Fazl Ali J. that that learned Judge regarded 'public safety' as an all-inclusive concept and 'public order' was merely represented as connoting a variegated aspect on a small scale of that very idea which was inherent in the expression 'public safety'. Thus 'public safety' would cover serious cases of public disorder.

Here, as elsewhere, definitions can only serve to fix dominant ideas underlying the terms they define, but in their application to the facts of each particular case, the Court will have to consider numerous attendant circumstances. It is hard to expect any unanimity of approach in the application of these ill-defined juristic ideas.

The prejudicial activities such as attempts to overthrow the government or the making of war or precipitating border incidents with a view to provoking the hostility of neighbouring States, would necessarily fall within the mischief of the expression, 'Prejudicial acts threatening the security of the State'.

The expression 'public interest' is, however, wide enough to cover every and any conceivable act which has reference to 'public interest' generally. Anything which tends to promote common good would be deemed to be in the public interest and would afford a justification for restrictions being imposed by law in that behalf. (See the case of Krishnamurthy v. Venkateswaran AIR (1952) Madras 11 at p. 16).

144. Several Freedoms considered (Continued) (ARTs: 10, 11, 18, 16).

(b) Freedom of Movement

Under ART. 11 of our constitution freedom of movement is guaranteed subject to reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the public interest. Every citizen of Pakistan is free to move to and settle in any part of Pakistan subject to any law providing for reasonable restrictions in the public interest. Although the right has been guaranteed to every citizen to freely move about, there must emerge, as a result of every citizen exercising this right, what might be characterised as a collective right of a group of people to move about, or to take out a procession. If, however, more persons than one manifestly get together to engage themselves in a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence or to facilitate the commission of an offence, their right of movement will come in conflict with the limitation of 'reasonable restrictions' imposed by law in public interest. The actual content of this right is thus practically negligible because restrictions to any extent can be imposed by law provided they can be shown to be reasonably demanded in the public interest.

But, be it noted, the reasonableness of restriction is to be judged by both the nature and extent of restriction as well as by the procedure prescribed relevant to the imposition of a given restriction. The Division Bench of West Pakistan High Court consisting of Rahman C.J. and Yakub Ali J. thus, in the case of Rao Mahroz Akhtar v. District Magistrate, Dera Ghazi Khan, PLD (1957) Lahore 676, declared S. 5 of the Punjab Safety Act (XVIII of 1949) void for the reason that the Court considered the restriction imposed by the impugned Act unreasonable in that it did not provide for an opportunity to make a representation against the order of internment. (See further Bazal Ahmad Ayyubi v. West Pakistan Province, PLD (1957) Lahore, 388, Abdul Quddos Bihari v. Chief Commissioner, Karachi, PLD (1956) Karachi 533.

In this context it is necessary to make a few general observations on the juristic implications of what are known as "group rights"—as opposed to individual rights.

Rights of Groups under the U.S.
Constitution.

The battle for human rights and the ultimate victory that was won in its name was fought against authoritarian order in favour of the concept of liberal rule. That is why it was in the era of individualism of the eighteenth century that mankind saw the dawn of the establishment of liberal rule. The constitutional liberties were conceived of even by those responsible for the incorporation of Bill of Rights in the United States Constitution, on the premises of individual rights: the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States that guarantees "Congress shall make no law respecting any establishment of religion or prohibiting free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press: or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for the redress of grievances" was primarily designed to consecrate the rights of the individuals and the rights of the groups which the United States Supreme Court has since protected, whether that has been done in the name of First Amendment or the Fifth or the Fourteenth Amendment, have been derived by a process of artificiality of construction. The derivation of "groups-rights" from the guarantees of individual rights, have brought about a crop of manifest anomalies in the American jurisprudence, anomalies which attest the truth of these observations. In the case of Gitlow v. New York, (1925) 268 U.S. 652 :69 Law. Ed. 1138 the United States Supreme Court has upheld the contention of the 'associations' to lay claim to free speech, press and assembly against legislation of the States. As opposed to this it has long been held that 'corporations' cannot claim the right against self-incrimination which is limited to natural persons and so the officers of the corporation must give evidence when called upon to do so regarding corporation affairs even though it implicates them personally. This rule has been extended even to the officers of unincorporated voluntary associations (see United States v. White (1944) 322 U.S. 694: 88 Law. Ed. 1542) Thus, for certain purposes, the associations are treated as individuals, for others, not. These inconsistencies arise because law of associations has been evolved under the impact of modern conditions. As Mr. Horn put it:

"The rights of associations have been raised upon the rights of individuals to associate. Indeed, it is a rare thing to find in the judicial opinions with which we shall be concerned any overt discussion of the nature of groups or the rights of groups. The court's rhetoric is still the rhetoric of individualism, but its logic is the logic of the collectivity of our own time. The Justices focus the light of their learning upon the individual before the bar, but if one looks back at the rear wall of the court room, one can see, large and distinct, the shadow of the group for whom the individual litigant stands. But this will not seem strange to any one familiar with the ways of the law. Novel questions are answered in familiar words, and almost unconsciously, absent-mindedly—or with the art that conceals art—the judge refashions old ideas to fit new problems. On the technical level, for example, the Court sometimes treats an association as a legal entity and sometimes not." (See p. 16 of his "Groups and the Constitution" Stanford University Press 1956).

The United States Constitution does not speak of the freedom of association. The student of American Constitutional Law has to do a lot of clear thinking and research before he can successfully track down the sources whence the freedom of association, guaranteed to groups like the political parties, labour and industrial classes, etc., could be said to have been derived. Is the group whose rights are constitutionally guaranteed a mere sum or collection of its individual members' liberties or is it something more than all this? The answer to this question raises many metaphysical questions of the kind with which the students of Company Law are so familiar. The rights that are guaranteed to an association cannot be claimed by an individual in his own right as an individual but only as a member of the group.

The political pluralists, for instance, strenuously argue that since a group is as real as a human being it is entitled to be treated by law as though it were an individual. The development of the civil liberty of association in the United States presents peculiar complexities, and it is not the aim of the present writer to embark upon an examination of the course which that history has taken. "The rights of association", says Mr. Horn (at pp. 14-15) "like the right of property, is a bundle of rights. The right to assemble and the right to communicate by speech and writing are parts of the broader right of association. These the First Amendment of the Constitution specifically guarantees. But what of the rights to admit, to discipline, and even to expel members? What of the rights to enact constitutions, by-laws, and regulations of the association, to choose officers, and, more than that, to determine how they shall be chosen and what their powers shall be? What of the rights to acquire, to hold, and to expend funds, and to enter into legal relations with individuals and groups outside the association? All these rights go to make up the power of an association to govern itself and are in some degree also indispensable to effective association. The exercise of many of them also involves, it is important to observe, the interests of others outside the group. Whatever protection for these rights the Constitution of the United States affords must be drawn from the broad language of the due process clauses that no person shall be deprived of his liberty or property without due process of law. Under the traditional interpretation of these clauses, rights are not protected by them absolutely, but if any governmental limitation upon these rights is challenged, the question is whether or not the limitation is a reasonable one. Such a standard requires that the interests of the group be compared with interests asserted by the law in question. In short, our constitutional system recognizes that freedom to exercise these rights is the rule, and that exceptions must have a rational justification acceptable to the courts."

So far as our own Constitution is concerned, the right to form associations or unions is expressly provided, and before a comment is made on ART. 10, it is necessary to reproduce the following five principles of the law of association which have been formulated by the author from whose book "Groups and the Constitution" the extracts just cited have been quoted. First: The rights of individuals to associate must be protected from unlawful governmental infringement. Second: Government may promote the opportunities of individuals to associate by appropriate means, and may grant appropriate privileges and powers to associations when the public interest will be fostered by doing so. Third: Government may when the public interest requires it forbid private persons to interfere with the rights of individuals to associate and may even require private persons to enter into legal relations with associations. Fourth: An association must not without adequate reason infringe upon the rights of other persons; and government must define the interests entitled to legal protection of these other individuals and groups, whether they are members or non-members of the association. Fifth: Government may prevent the use of the rights of association to do serious injury to society as a whole or to the organized political institutions of the society.

ART. 10 guarantees the right to form associations or unions subject, of course, to restrictions imposed by law in the interest of morality or public order. In the Labour and Trade Union legislation are set forth the limits within which the right of the employees to engage themselves in collective bargaining is to be given effect to. An undue restriction of the right of employees to form unions being unreasonable would be unconstitutional. In the case of Ramakrishnaiah v. President, District Board Nellore, AIR

Position under our & Indian Constitutions

ART. 10 of our Constitution.
Ramakrishna-iah v.
President,
District Board
Nellore

(1952) Madras, 253, it was held that any interference with the right conferred by Art. (19)(1)(c) to prohibit teachers from forming unions other than joining officially approved teachers union was unconstitutional. Their Lordships of the Madras High Court observed (at p. 254):

"It is well established that the exercise of any of the fundamental rights like the right of free speech, right of freedom of religion or the right of freedom of association cannot be made subject to the discretionary control of administrative or executive authority which can grant or withhold permission to exercise such right at its discretion. It is equally well established that there cannot be any restriction on the exercise of such a right which consists in a previous restraint on such exercise and which is (in) the nature of administrative censorship. The guaranteed freedoms cannot be abridged or abrogated by the exercise of official discretion."

This case contains comprehensive discussion of some of the American cases and could be read with profit as its principle would apply to the interpretation of ART. 10 of our Constitution. (See Whitney v. California (1927) 274 U.S. 357: 71 Law Ed. 1095; New York Ex. Rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman (1928) 278 U.S. 63:73 Law Ed. 184; Lovell v. Griffin (1938) 303 U.S. 444 : 82 Law Ed. 949; Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization (1939) 307 U.S. 496 : 83 Law Ed. 1423; Schneider v. Irvington (1939) 308 U.S. 147: 84 Law Ed. 155; Largent v. Texas (1943) 318 U.S. 418 : 87 Law Ed. 873, United Public Workers v. Mitchell (1947) 330 U.S. 75 : 91 Law Ed. 754)

(c) Comment on ART. 18.
Right to Profess,
Practise and Propagate Religion etc.

ART. 18 of our Constitution guarantees certain rights—(Right to profess, practise, and propagate any religion and right to establish, maintain and manage religious institutions)—subject to 'law', 'public order' and 'morality'. What is the nature of the limitation that has been imposed upon the enjoyment of this right? On the face of it, it would appear that the 'rights' guaranteed are available only against administrative action. The legislature is not precluded from taking away these rights, in other words the content of the right is contingent upon there being no law taking it away and stands on the same footing as the right to life or liberty or property which too is subject to law. This interpretation is further re-inforced by the consideration that the legislature has used, in several other Articles, the expression 'subject to reasonable restrictions imposed by law'. Why did not the Constitution-makers use the same expression in ART. 18 if the idea was to make the content of the right subject not to every and any law but only to a law of a particular kind, a law regulating the exercise of the right and not a law that abrogates the right.

ART. 18 of the Constitution of Pakistan came up for a comment in the case of Jibendra Kishore and others v. The Province of East Pakistan, PLD (1957) S.C. 9. It was contended that the Government of East Bengal could not exterminate the wakfs and the debutters if they were religious institutions, and the acquisition of the properties of wakfs and debutter properties by the State virtually meant the annihilation of these religious institutions. The objection was sustained on the premises of following reasoning (at pp. 41 to 43):

"There can be no doubt that these drastic provisions of the Act (the impugned Act) strike religious institutions at their very root, and the question is whether, that being the effect of the provisions, they constitute an infringement of the fundamental right guaranteed by Article 18 of the Constitution? In the High Court, Mr. Brohi's bold and categorical assertion that the rights referred to in Article 18 are 'Subject to law' and may therefore be taken away by the law, succeeded. That assertion has been repeated before us, but I have not the slightest hesitation in rejecting it. The very conception of a fundamental right is that it being a right guaranteed by the Constitution cannot be taken away by the law, and it is not only technically inartistic but a fraud on the citizens for the makers of a Constitution to say that a right is fundamental but that it may be taken away by the law. I am unable to attribute any such intent to the makers of the Constitution who in their anxiety to regulate the lives of the Muslims of Pakistan in accordance with the Holy Quran and Sunnah could not possibly have intended to empower the legislature to take away from the Muslims the right to profess, practise and propagate their religion and to establish, maintain and manage their religious institutions, and who in their conception of the ideal of a free, tolerant and democratic society could not have denied a similar right to the non-Muslim citizens of the State. If the argument of Mr. Brohi is sound, it would follow, and he admitted that it would, that the legislature may today interdict the profession of Islam by the citizens because the right to profess, practise and propagate religion is under the Article as much subject to law as the right to establish, maintain and manage religious institutions. I refuse to be a party to any such pedantic, technical and narrow construction of the Article in question, for I consider it to be a fundamental canon of construction that a Constitution should receive a liberal interpretation in favour of the citizen, especially with respect to those provisions which were designed to safeguard the freedom of conscience and worship. Consistently with the language used, constitutional instruments should receive a broader and more liberal construction than statutes, for the power dealt with in the former case is original and unlimited and in the latter case limited, and constitutional rights should not be permitted to be nullified or evaded by astute verbal criticism, without regard to the fundamental aim and object of the instrument and the principles on which it is based. If the language is not explicit, or admits of doubt, it should be presumed that the provision was intended to be in accordance with the acknowledged principles of justice and liberty. Accordingly, in doubtful cases that particular construction should be preferred which does not violate those principles. In the light of these rules of construction of constitutional instruments it seems to me that what Article 18 means is that every citizen has the right to profess, practise and propagate his religion and every sect of a religious denomination has the right to establish, maintain and manage its religious institutions, though the law may regulate the manner in which religion is to be professed, practised and propagated and religious institutions are to be established, maintained and managed. The words 'the right to establish, subject to law, religious institutions' cannot and do not mean that such institutions may be abolished altogether by the law. Speaking of the right of political franchise, Chief Justice Shaw of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts remarked in Copen v. Foster (12 Pick 485 —488):

"That in all cases where the Constitution has conferred a political right or privilege, and where the Constitution has not particularly designated the manner in which that right is to be exercised, it is clearly within the just and constitutional limits of the legislative power, to adopt any reasonable and uniform regulations, in regard to the time and mode of exercising that right, which are designed to secure and facilitate the exercise of such right, in a prompt, orderly and convenient manner Nevertheless, such a construction would afford no warrant for such an exercise of legislative power, as under the pretence and colour of regulating, should subvert or injuriously restrain the right itself".

"This principle is, in my opinion, fully applicable to the interpretation of the extent of religious freedom recognised by Article 18 of our Constitution. That Article inter alia guarantees the right to establish, maintain and manage religious institutions, but concedes to the legislature the power to regulate the manner in which such institutions may be established, maintained and managed. It does not, however, empower the legislature to make a law that hereafter no institutions of a religious character shall be established, maintained or managed or that an existing religious institution shall be abolished. The Article appears to me to proceed on the well-known principle that while legislature may not interfere with mere profession or belief, law may step in when professions break out in open practices inviting breaches of peace or when belief, whether in publicly practising a religion or running a religious institution, leads to overt acts against public order. In the present case no question of law and order being involved, I am constrained to differ from the view taken of this fundamental right by the High Court."

It is submitted with respect that (a) the notion that the content of fundamental right cannot be made dependent upon law taking it away is contradicted by the text of ART. 15(1) and ART. 5(2), and further that (b) to confine the interpretation of the term 'law' occurring in Art. 18 only to a law of certain type would appear to be unwarranted. The intention behind the formulation may well have been to take the right away from the range of administrative interference and thus make it the exclusive preserve of legislative action to interdict it. The plain language of the Article seems to suggest a different intention on the part of the framers of the Constitution from the one that has been imputed to them. If this view is not accepted almost every change sought to be made by the legislature in the religious institution of any given section of the people of our country would be denounced as ultra vires and if wakfs and debutters are religious institutions so is also almost every phase of the Muslim and Hindu personal law.

Analysis of the content of ART. 18 would show that in its clause (a) what is guaranteed is a qualified right of the citizen to profess, practice and propagate any religion and in its clause (b) what is protected is the right of 'every religious denomination' and 'every sect' to establish, maintain and manage religious institutions. These guarantees roughly correspond to those mentioned in Arts. 25(1) and 26(a) (b) of the Indian Constitution. Chagla C. J. of the Bombay High Court in the case of Ratilal v. State of Bombay, AIR (1953) Bombay 242, rightly remarked at p. 244 that what Art. 25 guaranteed was right of persons to have religious freedom and what Art. 26 protected was the right of "every religious denomination and every sect thereof" to establish and maintain institutions for religious and charitable purposes "and also to manage its own affairs in matters of religion." Perception of this distinction between the right of persons and right of every religious denomination or sect as two distinct aspects of religious freedom guaranteed by the Constitution is essential to the proper understanding of the meaning of 'religious institutions' appearing in ART. 18 (b) of our Constitution as even of that term as it pre-figures in Art. 26 of the Indian Constitution. It is suggested that 'religious institution' does not mean the same thing as legal institution even though under the personal law of the Hindus and Muslims, as even under the personal laws of the Christians, Zoroastrians and Budhists, 'Law' has a religious source and sanction. 'Religious institutions' must have a public aspect about them as distinguished from the profession of religious belief which is a matter of inward realization and subjective conviction and feeling. Only that is a 'religious institution' which is capable of being established as an organisation in which a religious denomination or sect is interested as an essential part of its fundamental religious practice.

The word 'institution' is not a term of any well defined or unequivocal meaning and is used to mean different things in different contexts. For instance, it sometimes is used to mean 'established law, custom or practice' as when we say 'Institutes of Justinian' or 'Institutes of Roman Law'. But the word is also used to mean 'Organisation for the promotion of some public object' and, having regard to the context in which the term religious institution is used in ART. 18 of our Constitution, it would appear that it is in its latter of the two foregoing meanings that it has been used—or else the right which is affirmed with respect to it in favour of a "religious denomination" or "every sect thereof" would not become intelligible at all.

It is essential that this distinction should be clearly borne in mind. ART. 18 cannot be construed to protect the personal law of the Muslims, Hindus, Budhists and Christians. It only protects their well-recognised religious institutions like the Mosques or Khankas of the Muslims, Temples and Maths of the Hindus, Pagodas and Monasteries of the Budhists and the Churches etc. of the Christians. The enumeration set forth here is of course illustrative and not exhaustive of the cases falling under the category of "religious institutions" protected by ART. 18.

Nor again is it true, as is commonly believed, that the religious foundation of the law of Muslims is anything especial about that faith—the same is true about the law of any other religious denomination. Says Tyabji,

"That religion has a paramount influence on Muhammadan law is not a point in which that system differs from the systems of law governing the nations of the West. The Greeks spoke of law 'as a discovery and gift of God'. The priestly colleges moulded the Roman law. In 1456, Chief Justice Prisot declared, in England, that 'Scripture was the Common Law on which all classes of Laws were founded.' And it would probably be difficult to produce anything in the texts of Muslim law equaling the following dialogue in quaintness or the power and confidence with which religious sanctions are wielded. Argument of Counsel: 'There is the law of the land for many things, and many things are tried in Chancery which are not remediable in the common law, and some things are only a matter of conscience between a man and his confessor.' The Chancellor answers: 'I know that every law is, or ought to be, according to the law of God. And the law of God is, that an executor who is badly disposed shall not waste all the goods, &c; and I know well, that if he does so, and does not make amends, if he has the power, unless he repents, he shall be damned in hell.' As late as in 1857, Chief Baron Kelly and the Court of Exchequer laid down that 'Christianity is part and parcel of the law of the land.' This decision was overruled only in 1917, and then not without the dissent of the Lord Chancellor." (Tyabji's 'Muhammadan Law' 3rd Ed. page 23).

ART. 16 of our Constitution consists of two parts: the first relates to the general injunction that no person shall be held in slavery, and the second prohibits all forms of forced labour, subject of course to the power of State to acquire 'compulsory service for public purposes'.

The 13th Amendment of the Constitution of United States which deals with practically the same subject-matter is as follows:

"Section 1.—Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction".

(d) Comment on ART. 16—injunction against slavery and forced labour.

13th Amendment
of the U.S.
Constitution

It would be noticed that in the United States formulation the cases of punishment for crimes, that involve deprivation of freedom of movement and of choice not to sell one's labour, are expressly excluded from receiving recognition as constituting violation of this guarantee. The Indian Art. 23 which corresponds roughly to our ART. 16 falls in a section of the Chapter on 'Fundamental Rights' headed 'Right against Exploitation' and is couched in the following terms:

"(1) Traffic in human beings and begar and other similar forms of forced labour are prohibited and any contravention of this provision shall be an offence punishable in accordance with law.

(2) Nothing in this Article shall prevent the State from imposing compulsory service for public purposes, and in imposing such service the State shall not make any discrimination on grounds only of religion, race, caste or class or any of them."

It would be appreciated that the Indian Article does not prohibit all forms of forced labour as does our Article, but only "other similar forms of forced labour" which would be read in the context in which it occurs, eiusdem generis with "traffic in human beings and begar." It is doubtful if, on the plain interpretation of our ART. 16, it would be possible to sustain the legality of imposing compulsory labour upon convicted offenders who have been sentenced to hard labour. In America, by virtue of an express exception enacted, compulsory work as a punishment for crime is not prohibited (see Ex Parte Karstendick (1876) 93 U.S. 396: 23 Law Ed. 889). Compulsory military service is not prohibited by the 13th Amendment as it has been interpreted by the United States Supreme Court and, in fact, there the right of the State to compel performance of involuntary military service has been regarded as stemming from the sovereign character of the State and justifiable on the premises of historical experience (see Robert Robertson v. Barry Baldwin (1897) 165 U.S. 275: 41 Law Ed. 715).

Slavery and Peonage

Prohibition against forced labour may also be regarded as one extreme form in which personal liberty of the individual is protected by means of a constitutional guarantee. Slavery results from the total denial to the individual of his status as a free subject and, in fact, in such a state the human being becomes indistinguishable from a chattel since he is virtually delivered to the master "having unlimited control over his life, liberty and everything that constitutes him as a free subject". Slavery is a sort of servitude in which man's condition of helplessness lasts for the whole length of his life. The conception of forced labour in the case of a slave is meaningless, for the simple reason that the initial postulated condition in terms of which his right to refuse his labour to another could be said to accrue to him, does not so much as exist. Involuntary servitude may take several forms: Peonage, for instance, which means compulsory exaction of labour from a person in lieu of the non-payment by him of any debts he may have contracted, resulting from a breach of contract involving obligation of rendering personal service, would amount to the exaction of compulsory labour and would be a form of forced labour within the prohibition of ART. 16 of our Constitution. The old sections of the Penal Code that were subsequently repealed, like Ss. 490, 491, 492, if they had been available on the Statute Book on the day the Constitution came into force, would have become void as being repugnant to the present guarantee, in that they had declared as punishable breaches of contracts of service in certain circumstances.

The question whether a contract freely entered into by a person involving his obligation to do what is called "overtime" work against payment stands upon a different footing and cannot be construed as being a form of forced labour within the general prohibition of ART. 16 of our Constitution. The argument in support of this view is that no idea of coercion is involved in exacting overtime work from an employee since that is an obligation he freely contracted to impose upon himself. In the case of Dubar Goala v. Union of India, AIR (1952) Calcutta 496, the case presented to the Court had reference to the constitutionality or otherwise of the petitioners' doing overtime work: they were licensed porters at a railway station and had, under a contract freely entered into by them, to do two hours extra work for some nominal payment. Bose J. declined jurisdiction to declare the relevant clauses of the contract as being repugnant to Art. 23 observing (at p. 498):

"The very idea that the petitioners had voluntarily agreed to do this extra work by entering into a contract to that effect repels the idea of their work being a forced labour."

In yet another Indian case State v. Jorawar, AIR (1953) Himachal Pradesh 18, the Chamba Paid Forced Labour Act was declared invalid as violating the constitutional prohibition against forced labour.

In the case of Bailey v. Alabama, (1911) 219 U.S. 219: 55 Law Ed. 191, the case presented to the Court involved interpretation of 13th Amendment of the United States Constitution with reference to a situation in which under a State-statute, a debtor was liable to be punished for his failure to perform the work he had engaged himself to do. Justice Mr. Hughes declared the statute unconstitutional remarking (at pp. 242-244):

"The fact that the debtor contracted to perform the labor which is sought to be compelled does not withdraw the attempted enforcement from the condemnation of the statute. The full intent of the constitutional provision could be defeated with obvious facility if, through the guise of contracts under which advances had been made, debtors could be held to compulsory service. It is the compulsion of the service that the statute inhibits, for when that occurs, the condition of servitude is created, which would be not less involuntary because of the original agreement to work out the indebtedness. The contract exposes the debtor to liability for the loss due to the breach, but not to enforced labor . . . The 13th Amendment prohibits involuntary servitude except as punishment for crime. But the exception, allowing full latitude for the enforcement of penal laws, does not destroy the prohibition. It does not permit slavery or involuntary servitude to be established or maintained through the operation of the criminal law by making it a crime to refuse to submit to the one or to render the service which would constitute the other. The state may impose involuntary servitude as a punishment for crime, but it may not compel one man to labour for another in payment of a debt, by punishing him as a criminal if he does not perform the service or pay the debt."

"If the statute in this case had authorized the employing company to seize the debtor, and hold him to the service until he paid $ 15, or had furnished the equivalent in labor, its invalidity would not be questioned. It would be equally clear that the state could not authorize its constabulary to prevent the servant from escaping, and to force him to work out his debt. But the state could not avail itself of the sanction of the criminal law to supply the compulsion any more than it could use or authorize the use of physical force. 'In contemplation of the law, the compulsion to such service by the fear of punishment under a criminal statute is more powerful than any guard which the employer could station.' [Ex parte Hollman, 79 S.C. 22] What the state may not do directly it may not do indirectly. If it cannot punish the servant as a criminal

Bailey v. Alabama

Fundamental Rights

for the mere failure or refusal to serve without paying his debt, it is not permitted to accomplish the same result by creating a statutory presumption which, upon proof of no other fact, exposes him to conviction and punishment."

Justice Holmes entered a note of dissent but the reasoning upon which he decided the case had no bearing on the interpretation of the 13th Amendment. His conclusion was (at p. 249):

"I think that obtaining money by fraud may be made a crime as well as murder or theft; that a false representation, expressed or implied, at the time of making a contract of labour, that one intends to perform it, and thereby obtaining an advance, may be declared a case of fraudulently obtaining money as well as any other; that if made a crime it may be punished like any other crime; and that an unjustified departure from the promised service without repayment may be declared a sufficient case to go to the jury for their judgment; all without in any way infringing the 13th Amendment or the statutes of the United States".

It would appear that the basic difference between the minority and the majority viewpoint in the opinions rendered in the above case had more to do with the question of the presumptive proof which was the rule of evidence enforced by the Court of Alabama, namely that the accused, for the purpose of rebutting the statutory presumption, shall not be allowed to testify "as to his uncommunicated motives, purpose, or intention." For the purpose of a careful study of this case it is necessary that the student should know the actual language of the statute of Alabama which was struck down as being unconstitutional. The section ran as follows:

"Any person who, with intent to injure or defraud his employer, enters into a contract in writing for the performance of any act of service, and thereby obtains money or other personal property from such employer, and with like intent, and without just cause, and without refunding such money, or paying for such property, refuses or fails to perform such act or service, must on conviction be punished by a fine in double the damage suffered by the injured party, but not more than $ 300, one half of said fine to go to the country and one half to the party injured;"

(See also the case of Robert Robertson v. Barry Baldwin (1897) U.S. 275 : 41 Law Ed. 715, which takes a slightly different view of the scope of the 13th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. That was a case of deserter Seaman and the conclusion reached there was that the legislation upon the subject of desertion and absence without leave which was in force in the United States for more than sixty years before the 13th Amendment was adopted and similar legislation abroad from time immemorial, could not be open to doubt on the ground that the provision against involuntary servitude under the 13th Amendment could not be intended to apply to their contract.)

Point of time when the labor exacted becomes forced

S. 374 of the Penal Code

The expression "forced labour" connotes the idea of a man being forced to do labour against his will. The question that arises is: At what point of time is the idea of some one being forced to do labour relevant? If a man who is engaged to do 8 hours work, during the course of work were to say that he would not continue doing the work because he finds that the work exacted from him is hard, or unpalatable, could he be heard to plead that he be relieved of his obligation to continue to work?

S. 374 of the Pakistan Penal Code makes it penal for anyone unlawfully to compel any person to labour against the will of that person and the ingredients of this offence have been judicially interpreted in the case of Madan Mohan Biswas v. Queen-Empress (1892) 19 Calcutta 572. In order to appreciate the point of the decision it is necessary to advert to the facts of the case. The accused in that case had induced the complainants (who he alleged were indebted to him in various sums of money) to consent to live on his premises and to work off their debts. The complainants were to, and did in fact, receive no pay but were fed by the accused as his servants. He insisted on their working for him and used to punish them by beating them if they did not do so. Chief Justice Petheram, who made the majority judgment held that:

Several Freedoms considered

"A person who insists that another, who has consented to serve him, shall perform his work, does not unlawfully compel such person to labour against his will within the meaning of section 374 of the Penal Code, because it is a thing which such person has agreed to do; but if he assaults such person for not working to his satisfaction, he commits an offence punishable under section 352".

Norris J. who made a minority judgment came to the conclusion on the facts of that case that the complainants never gave their full and free consent to work and labour for the accused, and that therefore the conviction was right.

The important question in the interpretation of this section, as also that of ART. 16 of our Constitution, is the following: Is the unlawfully compelling of any person to labour against the will of that person to be confined to the initial phase of a transaction or is it some thing that can come up for consideration during the course of an engagement which has been freely entered into but which later on the person engaged to do labour, has denounced? Does the expression 'whoever unlawfully compels any person' merely imply the initial act of entering into an obligation to labour for another at the inception of the engagement or is it that it makes illegal any service which becomes involuntary at any time during its existence? These considerations do not appear to have been present to the minds of the Judges who decided the Calcutta case.

SECTION (iii) Rule of Law.

145. A general comment on Right to the Rule of Law

Clauses (2) of ART. 5, and (1) of ART. 15, guarantee that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or his property save in accordance with law. "Life", "Liberty" and "property" are the most valued rights of man and our Constitution enjoins that a person cannot be deprived of these, "save in accordance with law".

ARTs. 5(2)
and 15 (1) of the Constitution.

Restraint on Executive Power.

The executive thus cannot deprive a person of his life, liberty and property without successfully pleading the existence of a constitutionally valid law enabling it so to do. Even the legislature, while passing law which has the effect in it of depriving a person of any of these rights, has to function within certain constitutional limits. For instance, a law relating to the deprivation of property must comply with the requirements of ART. 15, which enjoins that no property shall be compulsorily acquired or taken possession of save for a public purpose, and save by the authority of law which provides for compensation therefor and either fixes the amount of compensation or specifies the principles on which and the manner in which the compensation is to be determined and given. Similarly, a law relating to deprivation of man's liberty, like the law which enables the executive to order the preventive detention of a person, must be a law which should conform to the requirements of ART. 7, clauses (2), (4) and (5). In other words, there is no absolute and unfettered power reserved to the Legislature to make any law it likes in regard to the deprivation of these rights. This law-making activity by the Legislature must strictly fulfil the requirements of those Articles that set forth the constitutional limits within which those laws have to be passed.

It is in this perspective that the question which has arisen in India about the relationship of Art. 21 (No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law) to Art. 19, clause (1) (d) read with clause (5) may be examined. The problem of the conflict between these two Articles was posed in the case of A. K. Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) S. C. 27 as follows:

The petitioner in that case was detained under the Preventive Detention Order and it was contended on his behalf that by reason of such a detention several of the rights specified in Art. 19 had been infringed, and since the State had invaded the detenu's right to freedom, the question that had to be determined was whether the action complained of came within the scope of reasonable restrictions visualised by Art. 19. In other words, it was argued that the law relating to the deprivation of personal liberty must necessarily be subject to the limitations prescribed by Art. 19, for, deprivation of personal liberty was necessarily a clog on the citizen's freedom of speech and expression, on his freedom to move about freely in the territories of India, etc. etc. Personal liberty must at least mean freedom of movement, and when a person was ordered to be detained under a law relating to preventive detention his right of locomotion was curtailed and, therefore, it became a matter for judicial determination to see if the law relating to preventive detention itself was also not subject to the requirements of reasonable restrictions mentioned under Art. 19. The majority judgment of the Supreme Court rejected this approach to the interpretation of Arts. 21 and 19 of the Indian Constitution, and the ground of their Lordship's decision may be stated in the words of Kania C. J. as follows (at p. 35):—

"The Article (i.e. Art. 19) has to be read without any pre-conceived notions. So read, it clearly means that the legislation to be examined must be directly in respect of one of the rights mentioned in the sub-clauses. If there is a legislation directly attempting to control a citizen's freedom of speech or expression, or his right to assemble peaceably and without arms, etc., the question whether that legislation is saved by the relevant saving clause of Art. 19 will arise. If, however, the legislation is not directly in respect of any of these subjects, but as a result of the operation of other legislation, for instance for punitive or preventive detention, his right under any of these sub-clauses is abridged, the question of the application of Art. 19 does not arise. The true approach is only to consider the directness of the legislation and not what will be the result of the detention otherwise valid, on the mode of the detenu's life. On that short ground, in my opinion, this argument about the infringement of the rights mentioned in Art. 19(1) generally must fail. Any other construction put on the Article, it seems to me, will be unreasonable."

To the contention that Arts. 19 and 21 should be read together as supplementing each other, Art. 19 giving substantive rights to citizens, while Art. 21 prescribing that no person can be deprived of his life or personal liberty except by the procedure established by law, Kania C. J. made the following answer (at p. 37):

"Deprivation (total loss) of personal liberty, which inter alia includes the right to eat or sleep when one likes or to work or not work as and when one pleases and several such rights sought to be protected by the expression 'personal liberty' in Article 21, is quite different from restriction (which is only a partial control) of the right to move freely (which is relatively a minor right of a citizen) as safeguarded by Article 19 (1) (d). Deprivation of personal liberty has not the same meaning as restriction of free movement in the territory of India.

This is made clear when the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code in Chapter VIII relating to security of peace or maintenance of public order are read. Therefore, Article 19(5) cannot apply to a substantive law depriving a citizen of personal liberty. I am unable to accept the contention that the word 'deprivation' includes within its scope 'restriction' when interpreting Article 21.

'Personal liberty' would primarily mean liberty of the physical body. The rights given under Art. 19(1) do not directly come under that description. They are rights which accompany the freedom or liberty of the person. By their very nature they are freedoms of a person assumed to be in full possession of his personal liberty. If Art. 19 is considered to be the only Article safeguarding personal liberty several well-recognised rights, as for instance, the right to eat or drink, the right to work, play, swim and numerous other rights and activities and even the right to life will not be deemed protected under the Constitution. I do not think, that is the intention. It seems to me improper to read Art. 19 as dealing with the same subject as Art. 21."

It is needless to add that our Art. 5 (2) corresponds to Art. 21 of the Indian Constitution and our Arts. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12 correspond with minor differences to Art. 19 of the Indian Constitution. (For the text of Indian Art. 19 see the appendix)

U.S. Supreme Court's view

146. Concept of "Liberty" and "Personal liberty"

Clause (2) of ART. 5 mentions 'liberty', and not 'personal liberty' as has been mentioned in the Indian Art. 21. The word 'liberty' standing by itself is capable of receiving a very wide meaning and in fact the United States Supreme Court has so construed it: it does not only mean personal freedom, that is, freedom of the person from any kind of restraint but also it includes the right to the free use of one's own property, and also the freedom to enter into contractual obligations. In the case of Allgeyer v. State of Louisiana (1897), 165 U.S. 578 : 41 Law Ed. 832, the United States Supreme Court commented on the scope of the word 'liberty' occurring in 14th Amendment as follows (at p. 589):

"The liberty mentioned in that amendment means, not only the right of the citizen to be free from the mere physical restraint of his person, as by incarceration, but the term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes above-mentioned".

See also the case of Meyer v. Nebraska, (1923) 262 U.S. 390 : 67 Law Ed. 1042, where Mr. Justice McReynolds has given a wider meaning to 'liberty'—as including the right (at p. 399)

"... to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and, generally, to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men."

The original draft proposals of the Indian Constitution used the word 'liberty' but the Drafting Committee deliberately inserted the word 'personal' before it, so as to limit it: they wanted to distinguish it from the broad and sweeping concept of liberty. They had already in Art. 19 dealt with the problem of 'liberty of the individual' in several ways. They were anxious to avoid giving an impression that the word 'liberty' used by them in Art. 21 had any reference to the same subject matter as they had provided for in Art. 19.

Allgeyer v.
Louisiana

Meyer v.
Nebraska

Indian draft
constitution
"Liberty" changed into "Personal liberty".

Meaning of liberty—
Blackstone
quoted.

Would the use of term 'liberty'—as opposed to 'personal liberty'—appearing in clause (2) of our ART. 5 make any difference? Would that term as contrasted from 'personal liberty' receive from our Courts a wider interpretation? It is doubtful if the term 'liberty' would receive the sort of wide meaning as it admittedly has received in America and this, for the simple reason, that the liberties in general, have, in our Constitution, been separately dealt with from ARTs. 8 to 12 much in the same manner in which they have been dealt with in Art. 19 of the Indian Constitution. It is submitted that the word 'liberty' used in ART. 5 means 'personal liberty'. According to Blackstone:

"Personal liberty consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, or moving one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct; without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law." (Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, 4th Ed. Vol. I, page 134).

Under the theory of the English Constitution, as has been pointed out earlier, 'personal liberty' means merely a negative right in favour of an individual—that is, a right not to be subjected to imprisonment or other forms of physical coercion in any manner that does not admit of legal justification.

Now, although it is true that in our Constitution the words used in ART. 5(2) are not 'personal liberty' but only 'liberty', and instead of the expression in the Indian Constitution "except according to procedure established by law" we have, in Arts. 5(2) and 15(1) the expression "save in accordance with law", it is submitted, that these are not to be construed as those significant textual changes that will radically alter the interpretation of these Articles when an effort is made to read them in conjunction with ARTs 8 to 12. As has been remarked earlier, the constitutional provisions contained in ARTs. 8 to 12 are parallel to those provided in Art. 19 of the Indian Constitution. It becomes necessary, therefore, to analyse the reasoning of the majority decision of the Supreme Court in the case of A. K. Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 27, in an effort to discover the proper mode of construing these Articles.

The majority view has already been indicated in the judgment of Kania C. J. and it would be instructive to turn to some of the observations of Fazl Ali J., who took a contrary view, and held that the contention of the detenu be accepted:

"It is also argued that since preventive detention amounts to a total deprivation of freedom of movement, it is not a violation of the right granted under Art. 19 (1) (d) in regard to which the word 'restriction' and not 'deprivation' has been used in clause (5). This argument also does not appeal to me. There are really two questions which fall to be decided in this case, viz., (a) Does preventive detention take away the right guaranteed by Art. 19(1) (d)? and (b) if so, what are the consequences, if any? It seems obvious to me that preventive detention amounts to a complete deprivation of the right guaranteed by Art. 19(1) (d). The meaning of the word 'restriction' is to be considered with reference to the second question and I think that it will be highly technical to argue that deprivation of a right cannot be said to involve restriction on the exercise of the right. In my opinion, having regard to the context in which the word 'restriction' has been used, there is no antithesis between that word and the word 'deprivation'. As I have already stated, restraint on the right to move can assume a variety of forms and restriction would be the most appropriate expression to be used in clause (5) so as to cover all those forms ranging from total to various kinds of partial deprivation of freedom of movement." (p. 51)

The learned Judge then proceeded to say that the juristic conception of

"Except in accordance with the procedure authorised by Law" and,
"save in accordance with law".

Fazl Ali's views—minority judgment in
*A. K.
Gopalan's
Case*

'personal liberty' would include the right of freedom of movement to which Art. 19 (1) (d) refers. Even on the assumption that the two conceptions, namely, that of personal liberty and freedom of movement had nothing to do with one another even then according to the learned Judge the conclusion would be the same.

"There can be no doubt", says the learned Judge, "that preventive detention does take away even this limited freedom of movement directly and substantially, and, if so, I do not see how it can be argued that the right under Art. 19 (1) (d) is not infringed if the alternative interpretation is accepted. We have only to ask ourselves: Does a person who is detained retain even a fraction of his freedom of movement in howsoever restricted sense the term may be used and does he not lose his right to move freely from one place to another or visit any locality he likes as a necessary result of his detention?" (p. 55)

To the argument that Art. 22 is a complete code by itself and regulates the entire law relating to preventive detention, the learned Judge answered as follows (at p. 66):

"I cannot, however, easily subscribe to this sweeping statement. The Article does provide for some matters of procedure, but it does not exhaustively provide for them. It is said that it provides for notice, an opportunity to the detenu to represent his case, an advisory board which may deal with his case, and for the maximum period beyond which a person cannot be detained. These points have undoubtedly been touched, but it cannot be said that they have been exhaustively treated. The right to represent is given, but it is left to the legislature to provide the machinery for dealing with the representation. The advisory board has been mentioned, but it is only to safeguard detention for a period longer than three months. There is ample latitude still left to the Parliament and if the Parliament makes use of that latitude unreasonably, Art. 19(5) may enable the Court to see whether it has transgressed the limits of reasonableness."

If the reasoning of Fazl Ali J. is correct and can be accepted, the effect would be that the right to the rule of law in respect of deprivation of liberty would be further controlled by the limitation visualised by ARTs. 8 to 12 of our Constitution, and it will be a matter for anxious consideration for the Courts to see that the laws passed by the legislature, which curtail or restrict these freedoms, are reasonable and are within the permissible range of legislation contemplated by those Articles.

Fazl Ali J. is virtually endeavouring to read the 'due process clause' of the 5th and 14th Amendments to the American Constitution as an integral part of Art. 21, and the short ground on which the view he takes can be shown to be untenable is to say that if that was the intention of the framers of the Indian Constitution they would have said so and in fact the splitting of the content of Arts. 19 and 21 could only be due to this anxiety to avoid the necessity of introducing the idea of the 'due process clause'. It would have been the simplest thing to do (if the intention imputed by Fazl Ali J. was a fact), to draft an Article somewhat on the following lines: "No one shall be deprived of his life, liberty and property without due process of law" Had this formulation been adopted the whole unwieldy chapter on Fundamental Rights would have shrunk to one-tenth of its present magnitude—and what is more it would have spared every one the need of speculating about the meaning of this clause since the precedents of the U.S. Supreme Court would in that case have become of immense practical importance.

We might illustrate a further aspect of the same situation which results from the combined operation of the right relating to the rule of law in the sphere of

Interpretation
of the combined effect of
ART. 5 (2)
and ARTs. 8
to 12—Resting implications of Fazl Ali's views.
Due Process and our Constitution

ARTs. 15(1)
and 11.
Rule of law

in its application to the sphere of Property Rights.

property rights. It must have been noticed that our ART. 15(1) provides that no person shall be deprived of his property save in accordance with law, and ART. 11 provides the right of citizens to acquire, hold and dispose of property subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the public interests. It is obvious that the two Articles are to some extent antithetical, in that, a citizen can be deprived of the whole of the property under ART. 15 (1) provided, of course, the law depriving him of his property conforms to the requirements of ART. 15 (2) thereof, whereas ART. 11 (b) gives him the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law. The Indian Constitution also mentions in Art. 19(1) (f) the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property subject to reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right in the interest of general public etc. This right is subject to a judicial review by the Court on the ground of its reasonableness whereas under ART. 15(1), deprivation can take place by law which may not be reasonable so long as it conforms to the pattern of law visualised by clause (2). After all clause (2) of ART. 15 merely confines itself to law relating to deprivation of immovable property whereas clause (1) of ART. 15 talks of property in general which means both movable and immovable property. (See Art. 15(4) of our Constitution).

The right which is preserved by ART. 11 (b) is broadly affirmed whereas what is mentioned in ART. 15 is a specific provision in regard to certain aspects of that right viz. acquisition of property for public purpose. Now, following the well-known principle of generalia specialibus non derogant it can be argued that where a question of the acquisition of property for public purpose becomes a fact in issue, it is ART. 15 and not ART. 11(b) that will come into play. Hence, the situation, in which a person is deprived of his property in its entirety, must be treated as being controlled by ART. 15 and not by ART. 11(b). This principle of interpretation has been followed in India (See (a) Suryapalsing v. U.P. Government, AIR (1951) Allahabad 674 (FB), (b) Charanjit Lal v. Union of India, AIR (1951) S.C. 41, as also (c) A. K. Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 27). In the language of American jurisprudence ART. 11 (b) does not deal with power of 'eminent domain', but only gives 'police power' to the State to regulate, subject to reasonable restrictions, the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property. If the deprivation of property does not fall within the ambit of ART. 15 the question whether or not the right guaranteed by ART. 11(b) can certainly be enquired into. (See the case of Mahendra Bahadur Singh v. State of Madhya Bharat, AIR (1953) Madh. B. 236).

"Eminent Domain"

In America, the power which the Government exerts when it takes property for public use is described as the power of 'eminent domain' and the Government can take private property by resort to this power whenever it thinks it necessary and proper so to do in order to carry out any of the duties imposed on the national Government. In the 5th Amendment of the Constitution it has been provided that private property shall not be taken for public use without giving just compensation. Similarly, the 14th Amendment prevents the State from taking private property of persons without due process of law. The power of 'eminent domain' in the theory of American constitutional law, exists in every sovereignty to control and regulate those rights of a public nature which appertain to its citizens in common and to appropriate individual property for the public benefit such as the interests of public safety, necessity, convenience and welfare would demand. This power, which is inherent in the idea of sovereignty, can only be exercised by means of a legislation which defines the occasion, method, condition and agency under and by means of which it would be exercised. The State has to carry out the duties of constructing public places such as light-houses, docks etc., and for those purposes it may require land or material, which the owner may refuse to sell or for which he may demand extraordinary compensation.

There may, however, be cases in which State can order the destruction of property in the public interest. A building which is dilapidated, or which may be adjudged as being in such a dangerous condition that its being allowed to remain undisturbed might constitute a grave source of danger to the public: such a building could be ordered to be demolished. In such a case the question of reasonable restrictions on the enjoyment of property cannot be said to protect the right of the person to insist that he be allowed to have his property kept intact.

In the case of A. K. Gopalan v. The State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 27, Justice Mr. Das considered the combined effect of the Art. 19 (1) (f) and Art. 31(1) (2), and came to the conclusion that when property was compulsorily acquired under Art. 31 (1) (2) the question of the exercise of the right under Art. 19 (1) (f) did not so much as arise. The result of this view would be that where the State acts under ART. 15 of our Constitution it can deprive a man of the whole of his property even to the prejudice of such rights of owning property as he may have under ART. 11 (b). In other words, a law passed under ART. 15 need not submit to the test of reasonable restrictions on the citizen's right to hold and dispose of property. Similarly, in the case of Charanjit Lal v. Union of India AIR (1951) S.C. 41, the same learned Judge observed that Art. 19(1) (f) would continue to be available until the owner was under Art. 31 deprived of such property. In the words of the learned Judge (Mr. Das).

"The fundamental rights said to have been infringed are the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property guaranteed to every citizen by Article 19(1) (f) and the right to property secured by Article 31. In Gopalan's case, AIR 1950 S.C. 27, I pointed out that the rights conferred by Article 19(1)(a) to (e) and (g) would be available to the citizen until he was, under Article 21, deprived of his life or personal liberty according to procedure established by law and that the right to property guaranteed by Article 19 (1) (f) would likewise continue until the owner was, under Article 31, deprived of such property by authority of law."

In other words, the learned Judge far from construing the right of a person not to be deprived of property, life and liberty, save in accordance with law, being subject to reasonable restrictions contemplated by Article 19, regarded this Article itself as being subservient to Arts 21 and 31 (1) of the Indian Constitution.

If there is a law which permits the taking of any of these property rights and also enjoins a particular procedure to be followed then the failure to follow strictly the procedure for the exercise of such power of deprivation must be regarded as a violation of a fundamental right recognised in his favour by Part II of our Constitution. There is hardly any distinction between the expression 'according to procedure established by law' used by the Indian Constitution and the expression 'save in accordance with law', used by our Constitution'.

Does the word 'law' appearing in our Constitution and the expression 'according to procedure established by law', appearing in the Indian Constitution, refer to the law established and enacted by legislature, or does it include also the law which is recognised by Courts in the shape of those principles which must be followed in order that justice may be done to persons whose vested rights are being affected. In other words, must the law be read as being equivalent to the American expression 'due process of law' clause, appearing in the 5th and 14th Amendments of United States Constitution?

Meaning of the term 'Law'— appearing in ARTS. 15(1) and 5(2)
Does it mean statute law or does it include "General Law of the Land."

"The word 'law' ", said Mr. Fazl Ali J., in a minority judgment in the case of A. K. Gopalan v. State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 27, at 58 "may be used in an abstract or concrete sense. Sometimes, it is preceded by an article such as 'a' or 'the' or by such words as 'any', 'all' etc., and sometimes it is used without any such prefix. But, generally, the word 'law' has a wider meaning when used in the abstract sense without being preceded by an article. The question to be decided is whether the word 'law' means nothing more than statute law. Now what is the meaning of the expression 'due process of law,' the word 'law' ever may be the meaning of the expression as well as 'procedure established by law' and is common to that expression as well as 'due process of law' or 'due process of law' in America, yet since a number of eminent American Judges have devoted much thought to the subject, I am not prepared to hold that we can derive no help from their opinions and we should completely ignore them."

The learned Judge then dealt with the cases of Bardwell v. Collins, 44 Minn. 97 : 9 L.R.A. 152 ; The Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, (1819) 4 Wheaton 518 : 4 Law Ed. 629 ; Hovey v. Elliott, 167 U.S. 409 : 42 Law Ed. 215 ; Gatpin v. Page, (1874) 85 U.S. 18 : 21 Law Ed. 959 , and summed up the position by saying :

"Thus, in America, the word 'law' does not mean merely State-made law or law enacted by the State and does not exclude certain fundamental principles of justice which inhere in every civilized system of law and which are at the root of it. The result of the numerous decisions in America has been summed up by Professor Willis in his book on 'Constitutional Law' at p. 662, in the statement that the essentials of due process are: (1) notice, (2) opportunity to be heard, (3) an impartial tribunal, and (4) orderly course of procedure."

The learned Judge then examined the English cases in an attempt to show that these four elements are really different aspects of the same right i.e. right to be heard before one is condemned, and came to the conclusion that:

"So far as this right is concerned, judicial opinion in England appears to be the same as that in America. In England, it would shock one to be told that a man can be deprived of his personal liberty without a fair trial or hearing. Such a case can happen only if the Parliament expressly takes away the right in question in an emergency as the British Parliament did during the last two world wars in a limited number of cases."

(The cases examined by the learned Judge include Cooper v. The Wandsworth Board of Works, (1863) 14 C.B. (N.S.) 180 : (32 L.J.C.P. 185) ; Smith v. The Queen, (1878) 3 A.C. 614 ; Regina v. The Archbishop of Canterbury (1859) 1 El. & El. 545 at p. 559 ; Labouchere v. Earl of Wharncliffe, (1880) 13 Ch. D. 346 ; Russell v. Russell (1881) 14 Ch. D. 471 ; and Lapointe v. L'Association, etc. de Montreal, (1906) A.C. 535). The learned Judge held that the word 'law' used in Art. 21, does not only mean statute law. But the majority opinion in the case was that principles of natural justice and the procedural due process requirements were not to be read into the expression 'procedure established by law'.

Now, there are two points that are to be noted by way of differentiation between the Indian and our Constitution before deciding the question of the application of the principles of interpretation by resort to which the question whether or not the word 'law' appearing in ARTs. 5(2) and 15 (1) includes not only the enacted law by the legislature but also principles of natural justice which are a part of the common law and have been continued under the present Constitution by its ART. 224. One of these considerations is that the Indian Constituent Assembly discussed the question, viz. whether or not the American concept of the due process of law should be retained in their Constitution, and after a great deal of discussion lasting several days, decided not to retain that concept and deleted the expression 'without due process of law' from the original draft Constitution as presented by the Drafting Committee. (See Art. 15 of the Draft Constitution of India and the footnote to it by the Drafting Committee). The debates in, and the report of the Drafting Committee of, the Indian Constituent Assembly tend to show that it was aware of the expression, 'due process of law', as it was known to exist in the American Constitution, but after a prolonged discussion it decided not to adopt that phrase. Now, whether or not the proceeding of a legislature can be relied upon for the purpose of controlling the meaning of a clause enacted is a question which by itself is a controversial one. It is not even clear if the debates can be looked at even for the purpose of resolving ambiguities. (See Municipal Council of Sydney v. Commonwealth, (1904) 1 C.L.R. 208 ; and United States v. Wong Kim Ark, (1898) 169 U.S. 649 : 42 Law Ed. 890). The authorities tend to show that although it is not proper to take into consideration individual opinions of the legislators for the purpose of construing the meaning of particular clauses, but all the same reference to the debates may be helpful to determine whether or not a certain phrase or expression was at all considered by the House. (See also the case of Administrator-General of Bengal v. Prem Lal Mullick (1895) 22 I.A. 107, where reference to the proceedings which resulted in the passing of an Act by the legislature was not considered a legitimate aid in the construction of a particular section. See also Craies's 'Statute Law' IV Ed. page 122, Maxwell 'Interpretation of Statutes' 9th Ed. pages 28-29, Crawford on 'Statutory Construction' 1940 Ed. 379 Article 214).

Points of difference between the Indian and our Constitution on this subject.

Concept of "Liberty" and "Personal liberty"

The Constituent Assembly of Pakistan did not discuss this phrase and there is no basis, therefore, for the inference which could be drawn in India, namely that the 'due process' clause was deliberately abandoned by it.

The second consideration is that in some sense the Indian formulation contained in the expression, 'except according to procedure established by law', is in a sense limited, if we take 'law' to be synonymous with 'enacted law', for then it can mean only the violation of such rules of procedure as have been prescribed by enacted law as giving rise to a ground of complaint that the rights have been taken away in a way other than that in accordance with the procedure established by law. But the formulation of our Articles tends to show that there are no such words of limitation. The expression 'save in accordance with law' can only mean law in general and must anyhow mean something more than what is meant by enacted law.

Meaning of the term 'law' as used in these Articles can be set forth in two ways: the following observations in Salmond's Jurisprudence 1947 Ed. at page 37, would show that 'law' may be used in the abstract or in the concrete :

"The term law", says he, "is used in two senses, which may be conveniently distinguished as the abstract and the concrete. In its abstract application we speak of the law of England, the law of libel, criminal law, and so forth. Similarly, we use the phrases law and order, law and justice, courts of law. In its concrete application, on the other hand, we say that Parliament has enacted or repealed a law; we speak of the by-laws of a railway company or municipality; we hear of the corn laws or the navigation laws. In the abstract sense we speak of law, or of the law; in the concrete sense we speak of a law, or of laws. The distinction demands attention for this reason, that the concrete term is not co-extensive and coincident with the abstract in its application. Law or the law does not consist of the total number of laws in force. The constituent elements of which the law is made up are not laws, but rules of law or legal principles. That a will requires two witnesses is not rightly spoken of as a law of England; it is a rule of English law. A law means a statute, enactment, ordinance, decree or other exercise of legislative authority. It is one of the sources of law in the abstract sense. A law produces statute law or some other form of enacted law, just as a judicial precedent produces case law. There is much law recognised, applied and enforced in the courts of justice which has not been enacted by any law."

It is submitted that if the distinction between the two meanings of the term 'law', which have been reflected in the extract cited above, is to be imputed to the framers of our Constitution, the term 'law' under ARTs. 15 (1) and 5(2) must be regarded as something wider than what is connoted by statute law or enacted law. The trouble, however, arises when we compare the language of ART. 224, which talks of continuance in force of existing laws, for there the words used are 'all laws'. And if that expression is to be taken in the concrete sense, the words used cannot be deemed to cover such things as law of torts or rules of common law, or doctrines of interpretation of statute etc. Of this more would be said when we deal with that Article in its own place. Suffice it to say, however, that the Indian Independence Act in its 18th Section talks of the continuance of the 'law' of each of the New Dominions and not of the 'laws' of the Dominion.

Any student wishing to pursue the study of the principles relating to the interpretation of the word 'law' appearing in these Articles would do well to read the article contributed by Shwartz to Indian Law Review Vol. IV upon "Comparative view of Gopalan's case" where that learned author has virtually re-examined all these arguments and has registered his disagreement as to the pedantic dictionary meaning of the term 'law' upon which the Supreme Court of India rejected the concept of procedural due process as being connoted by the term 'law' occurring in ARTs. 21 to 22 of the Indian Constitution.

The fundamental right relating to the rule of law that we have been so far considering is itself in certain cases encumbered by certain additional constitutional limitations and these we shall now proceed to consider. These limitations may be broadly categorised as falling within the following descriptions:

- (a) Limitations on the making of law relating to compulsory acquisition or taking of property.
- (b) Limitations on the making of law relating to arrest and detention.
- (c) Limitations on the making of penal laws.

174. Right to Property—A Comment on ART. 15

ART. 15 of our Constitution prohibits the making of a law relating to compulsory acquisition or taking possession of property unless:

- (a) it is for a public purpose,
- (b) it provides for compensation in respect of such compulsory acquisition or taking possession of property, and
- (c) either fixes the amount of compensation or specifies the principles on which and the manner in which compensation is to be determined and given.

The property which is to be the subject-matter of compulsory acquisition or possession whereof is to be taken means "immovable property, or any commercial or industrial undertaking, or any interest in any such undertaking." (See Art. 15(4).)

In clause (3) of ART. 15, we have four categories of laws which are immune from being attacked on the ground that the laws in question do not conform to the limitations mentioned in clause (2).

Our ART. 15 corresponds to the Indian ART. 31, with a few minor differences which are to be carefully noted, if the case-law of that country is at all to be properly appreciated.

(a) The general requirement of the Constitution to the effect that no person shall be deprived of his property save in accordance with law has been mentioned in clause (1) of the Indian ART. 31 as, "No person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law". The word 'property' in this clause, of course, includes both in the case of our Constitution as also in the Indian Constitution, all kinds of property movable and immovable. There is hardly any difference, so far as the effect of this guarantee is concerned, between the expressions used 'save in accordance with law' or 'save by authority of law'.

(b) The constitutional limitations on the making of law authorising the taking possession of property or the acquiring of it for public purpose or the taking of such possession or such acquisition is confined in our Constitution only to immovable property or any commercial or industrial undertaking or any interest in any such undertaking, whereas in the Indian Article the word 'property' has been used in the widest possible sense as including property "movable or immovable, including any interest in, or in any company owning, any commercial or industrial undertaking."

(c) In clauses (2), (3), (4), (5) and (6) of Indian Art. 31 we have the following kinds of savings:

(i) The legislature of the State cannot pass a law authorising the taking possession or acquisition of the kind of property mentioned in clause (2) of the Indian Article unless such law having been reserved for the consideration of the President has received his assent. (We have no such limitation imposed on the law-making power of the Provincial legislatures in our Constitution. They can pass a law on their own and they have not to obtain the assent of the President before such laws can be effective.)

(ii) If a bill pending at the commencement of the Indian Constitution, that is on 26th of January 1950, in the legislature of a State has, after it has been passed by such legislature and having been reserved for the consideration of the President has received his assent, then, such a law so assented cannot be challenged in any court on the ground that it does not conform to the provisions of clause (2) of Art. 31 (We have no provision parallel to this in our Constitution.)

(iii) The existing laws (other than laws enacted by the State not more than 18 months before the commencement of the Indian Constitution which are required under clause (6) within three months from such commencement to be submitted to the President for his certification) are saved under sub-clause (a) of clause (5). In other words if a law of the kind mentioned in clause (6) has been certified by the President it shall not be called into question in any court on the ground that it contravenes the provision of clause (2) of Indian Art. 31 or has contravened the provision of sub-section (2) or S. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935. But if President has not so assented, it is not saved against the challenge based on clause (2) of Art. 31. The effect of the combined operation of clauses (5) and (6) thus is, that all existing laws passed more than 18 months before the commencement of the Constitution are ipso facto saved against a challenge on the ground that they contravene clause (2) of Art. 31. But with regard to laws passed within 18 months before the coming into force of the Constitution, it has been provided that if they have been certified by the President, they will be immune from such a challenge but not otherwise.

(iv) In sub-clause (b) of clause (5), the three categories of cases with respect to provision of any law relating to acquiring or taking property which the State hereafter may make has been saved.

(v) As opposed to clauses (3), (4), (5) and (6) of the Indian Article, we have only clause (3) of ART. 15 which as has been remarked earlier, saves the four kinds of laws from the limitation imposed on the law-making power of the legislature by clause (2).

S. 299 of the Government of India Act
1935.

The legislative predecessor of the Indian Art. 31 and our ART. 15 was Section 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, which was entitled as "Compulsory Acquisition of Land etc." This has already been reproduced at page 319. Certain points of difference between that Section and our Article may be noted, for they are relevant for the purpose of intelligently applying the principles evolved by our courts in regard to the interpretation of that Section.

Sub-section (2) of Section 299 applies to acquisition of property and not to requisition thereof. In its sub-section (3) there was a prohibition to the effect that no bill or amendment making provision for the transference to public ownership of any land or for the extinguishment or modification of rights therein including rights or privileges in respect of land revenue shall be introduced or moved in the legislature without the previous sanction of the Governor-General or the Governor in their discretion. There is no such prohibition now in ART. 15 of our Constitution.

S. 51 of the Australian
Constitution

Section 51 of the Australian Constitution too, in clause (xxxi), has given power to the legislature to acquire property on just terms from any State or person for any purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws. (See page 228).

The position
under the U.S.
Constitution

In the United States the position with regard to the taking of property is controlled by the 5th and the 14th Amendments; the former provides for just compensation being made whenever private property is taken for public use as a limitation on the Federal power and the same limitation is provided for upon the State power under the latter Amendment. It should be noted that the expressions used in the two Amendments are somewhat different (cf. 5th Amendment "Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation"). But then the due process clause is available to do the necessary trick, and the American Courts have read the provision regarding the requirement of just compensation into the 'due process' clause of the fourteenth Amendment.

Relation between the two clauses of
ART. 15 of our
Constitution

The scope of our ART. 15 may now be considered. This Article has two essential parts, the one prohibiting the deprivation of property "except in accordance with law" and the other prescribing that a law which authorises compulsory acquisition of property or the taking of its possession must provide for compensation either by fixing the amount or by specifying the principles on which and the manner in which compensation is to be determined and given.

Broadly considered, the first part corresponds to the power which in American jurisprudence is called the 'police power' of the State and the second, the power of 'eminent domain'. (See for the meaning of these terms p. 365-367).

ART. 11(b) guarantees that citizens shall have right to acquire, hold and dispose of property subject to any reasonable restrictions. When, however, property is taken it must be done in accordance with the requirement of ART. 15. Whether or not a citizen is allowed to exercise his right of acquiring, holding and disposing of property, subject to any reasonable restrictions, is a question that falls to be determined under ART. 11 and has nothing to do with ART. 15.

There has been a difference of opinion in India in regard to interpretation of the requirements of Art. 31(1) and 31(2) which correspond to our ARTs. 15(1) and 15(2) respectively. The earlier view regarded the term "deprivation" as being something wider than acquisition, and considered that in order that a person be deprived of the property it is enough if the source of the authority of the executive to effect such a deprivation is traced to some law authorising some one so to do. But where property is acquired or taken possession of, it must not only be shown to have been done for a public purpose but also by a law which itself provides for compensation etc. In other words, deprivation pure and simple can be effectuated by ordinary law but where deprivation is accompanied by acquisition of property by Government it must be done by the kind of law contemplated by clause(2).

This view, for instance, was taken in the case of Surajmal v. Rajasthan State AIR (1953) Rajasthan 78. This was a case in which the Government of Rajasthan State, (India), took over possession of a Power House belonging to the applicant without providing for compensation. The contention of the applicant was that the action of the State had been such as would virtually amount to depriving him of his property and as the deprivation had taken place without making provision as to the payment of compensation it was contrary to Art. 31(1). The court dealt with the contention as follows (at p. 81):

"In order to understand the full import of the words 'shall be deprived of his property', a comparison may be made between the provisions of Art. 31(1) and Art. 31(2). A question arises whether Art. 31(2) is merely complementary to Art. 31(1) or whether the two deal with somewhat different matters and one is wider than the other. Learned Counsel for the State had argued that Art. 31(1) deals with what is called the 'Police Power' of the State in the United States of America, while Art. 31(2) with what is called the law of 'eminent domain' there. We do not think it necessary to enter into an elaborate discussion of what is meant by 'Police Power' and what is meant by the law of 'eminent domain'. Our Constitution being elaborate and written, it is best to confine ourselves to the plain meaning of words used in it without importing unnecessarily expressions like 'Police Power' and 'eminent domain'. Looking, therefore, at the words of the two articles, it is clear that Art. 31(1) is wider in its application than Art. 31(2). The reason for this is that there might be deprivation of the property of a person without there being acquisition of it or taking possession of it for public purposes. This will be clear if we consider what is the meaning of acquisition or taking possession under Art. 31(2) and then compare it with the meaning of deprivation used in Art. 31(1). Acquisition is clearly acquiring of title to the property and includes taking possession of it by the State. On the other hand, taking possession obviously negatives the idea of acquiring title. But at the same time, the taking of possession under Art. 31(2) for which compensation has to be paid must be for the purpose of beneficial enjoyment by the State or the person taking possession. Thus beneficial enjoyment whether it be merely taking possession or it be taking over title as well as possession is necessary before Art. 31(2) is attracted

*Surajmal v.
Rajasthan
State*

to a case of acquisition or taking possession of property for public purposes. In the present case, the State has neither acquired title to the property nor taken possession of it with the object of beneficial enjoyment of the undertaking by itself and, therefore, the case is not covered by Art. 31(2) and compensation would not in any case be required to be paid. But a person may still be deprived of his property, even though the State may not have acquired or taken possession of it within the meaning of Art. 31(2). For example, the State may order demolition of a certain structure on the ground that it is dangerous to public safety because of its dilapidated condition. In such a case, there has been no acquisition by the State or taking possession of the property but still the person who owned the property has been deprived of it. That is why we said in the beginning that Art. 31(1) was wide in scope than Art. 31(2) and there may be deprivation of a person's property without there being acquisition or taking possession by the State. Many other examples can be thought of where an owner may be deprived of his property without the State acquiring it or taking possession of it. What Art. 31(1) has provided, therefore, is that if a person is deprived of his property without the State acquiring it or taking possession of it by paying compensation under Art. 31(2), there should be authority of law for such deprivation."

Dwarkadas
Shriniwas v.
Sholapur
Spinning and Weaving Co.

Charanjit Lal
v.
Union of India.

Saghir Ahmad's
Case

The meaning of 'deprivation' has also been considered in Dwarkadas Shriniwas v. The Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Co. Ltd. and others, AIR (1951) Bombay 86, where it was held that deprivation was wider in its significance than acquisition or taking possession. It was further held that distinction between Arts. 31(1) and 31(2) was that Art. 31(1) applied to cases where the State had not to pay any compensation, for it was not acquiring or taking possession of the property, while Art. 31(2) applied to those cases where the State was acquiring or taking possession of the property and therefore the law must provide for compensation. This view was also taken in the Supreme Court of India in the Judgment of Das J. in Charanjit Lal Chowdhury v. The Union of India and others, AIR (1951) S.C. 41, at p. 63. That learned Judge remarked:

"On the contrary, the language of clause (1) of Art. 31 is wider than that of clause (2), for deprivation of property may well be brought about otherwise than by acquiring or taking possession of it. I think clause (1) enunciates the general principle that no person shall be deprived of his property except by authority of law, which, put in a positive form, implies that a person may be deprived of his property, provided he is so deprived by authority of law. No question of compensation arises under clause (1). The effect of clause (2) is that only certain kinds of deprivation of property, namely, those brought about by acquisition or taking possession of it will not be permissible under any law, unless such law provides for payment of compensation. If the deprivation of property is brought about by means other than acquisition or taking possession of it, no compensation is required, provided that such deprivation is by authority of law."

Subsequently, however, the Indian Supreme Court has overruled this view and in the case of Saghir Ahmad v. State of U.P. AIR (1954) S.C. 728 : PLD (1956) S.C. (India) 148, it has been held that:

"Clauses (1) and (2) of Article 31 are not mutually exclusive in scope but should be read together as dealing with the same subject, namely, the protection of the right to property by means of limitations on the State's powers, the deprivation contemplated in clause (1) being no other than acquisition or taking possession of the property referred to in clause (2)."

See also State of West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal, AIR (1954) S.C. 92; and Dwarkadas Shriniwas v. Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Co., AIR (1954) S.C. 119, where the same view is taken by the Indian Supreme Court.

It would be for our courts to decide what construction to impose on the two clauses of ART. 15: Are the clauses disjunctive? Does 'deprivation' of property and its acquisition or possession refer to the same universe of discourse? Can the State deprive a person of the property without making a provision in the law for compensation? Does clause (1) of ART. 15 refer to the police power of the State and clause (2) to its power of eminent domain?

It is submitted that if the view of the Supreme Court of India, namely, that 'deprivation' and acquisition mean the same thing were correct, clause (1) of ART. 15 would be redundant—as it would furnish to us no conclusion which is not already contained in clause (2) of ART. 15. It would thus appear that the reasoning contained in Surajmal v. Rajasthan State AIR (1953) Rajasthan 78, has not been effectively dealt with in the later Supreme Court decisions.

It would be useful for the student to study the dissenting opinion of Latham C. J. of the High Court of Australia in The Minister of State for the Army v. Dalziel (1944) 68 C.L.R. 261 in defence of the proposition that temporary acquisition or possession of land by Federal Government of Australia did not constitute acquisition of property within the placitum (xxxii) of S. 51 of the Australian Constitution so as to entitle the person deprived of such possession to claim just terms. After reviewing the definitions offered by some of the leading exponents of the concept of property as it is known to English Common Law, the learned Chief Justice sets forth his opinion as follows :

"Accordingly, in my opinion, the facts that the right to possession is the most valuable attribute of ownership, that possession is prima facie evidence of ownership, and that possession may develop into ownership, do not justify any identification of possession with ownership, but, on the contrary, emphasize the distinction between the two ideas. The fact that the Commonwealth is in possession of land as a result of action under the Regulations does not show that the Commonwealth has become the owner of the land or of any estate in the land. If nothing more were known of the facts than that the Commonwealth was in possession, then, in such an imperfect state of evidence, the presumption would be that the Commonwealth was owner in fee simple. But when possession has been taken of land under the Regulations it is plain that the Commonwealth is not the owner of an estate in fee simple. There is no room for a presumption of ownership based upon possession. The Commonwealth has precisely the rights which the Regulations confer upon it and no more. The only question which arises in the present case is whether those rights, the existence and reality of which are undisputed and not a matter of inference or presumption, are proprietary rights, so that it can be said that the Commonwealth has acquired property . . . That which can be owned in respect of land is, as already stated, an estate . . . The Commonwealth is, in my opinion, in the position of a licensee with rights as stated in the Regulations . . . the rights (created by the Regulations) are . . . inalienable personal rights and Commonwealth is not a grantee of property but a licensee. Such personal rights are not proprietary rights . . . (and do not) bring about an acquisition of property within the meaning of S. 51 (xxxii) of the Constitution." (pp. 277-279).

Minister of State vs.
Dalziel 86.
C.L.R. 261—
meaning of "acquisition of Property"

ART. 15 of our Constitution can best be understood if we could define for ourselves some of the terms and expressions which have been used therein. To begin with we may consider the term 'property' itself.

"Property", says Professor Paton, "is an extremely ambiguous term and the adjective 'proprietary' conveys the same confusion". (See page 227 of "A Text Book of Jurisprudence by G. W. Paton").

The difficulty in the definition of the term 'property' stems from the fact that the term is in common parlance indiscriminately applied either to convey the idea of ownership or title, or the very thing over which such a claim of ownership or title is exercised. A useful distinction, however, to draw in such circumstances is to find out what are rights in rem as contrasted from the rights in personem. The term 'property' may usefully be reserved for covering rights in rem, whereas the term 'obligation' should be applied to convey the idea of rights in personem. A wider term still, however, is 'assets': assets of a person include not only the rights in rem which are vested in such a person but also the rights in personem.

In clause (4) of ART. 15 it has been provided that the property shall in clauses (2) and (3) mean immovable property or any commercial or industrial undertaking or any interest in any such undertaking. The term 'immovable property' has been defined under the General Clauses Act as property including land, benefits to arise out of land, and things attached to the earth, or permanently fastened to earth (See S. 3(24)).

It would seem to follow that 'safeguards' in clause (2) of ART. 15 are not available where the property acquired is movable. Why has this distinction been made between clause (1) which applies to the cases where a person has been deprived of his movable and/or immovable property and clause (2) which excludes movable property is hard to understand. Surely safeguards against the compulsory acquisition of movable property are as very important as they are in the case of immovable property.

The term 'property', as used in ART. 15, includes not only the real estate in personal property but also intangible and incorporeal rights such as patents, copyrights, leases, accounts and choses in action. In short everything which can command an exchangeable value would be designated as property. It is to be noticed that right to vote or right to reputation, although valuable rights in themselves, can hardly be spoken of as the property of a person. Our Constitution does not define what the juristic meaning of the term property is: but if following Austin, ownership were described as the entirety of the powers of use and disposal allowed by law, then, all things over which a man has dominion and disposing power would be his property. Following the Roman lawyers if we were to break up the complex conception of property into several rights like Jus Possessendi, Jus Utendi, Jus Fruendi, Jus Domini etc., each one of these rights taken by itself could be regarded as being a property. Now it is not essential for the principle of ART. 15 to be attracted that the totality of the rights which are vested in a person owning a thing should be divested before there can be either deprivation of property so far as he is concerned or acquisition of property so far as the State is concerned.

Mr. Das J. while delivering his judgment in the case of Charanjit Lal v. Union of India AIR (1951) S.C. 41, adverted to the question of defining the concept of 'property' in order to determine the real scope of Art. 31 of the Indian Constitution and in reaching the conclusion that will presently be stated, he relied on the observations of Rich J. made in an Australian case Minister of State for the Army v. Dalziel (1944) 68

C.L.R. 261—question in that case was whether taking possession of property temporarily for an indefinite period was acquisition for the purposes of placitum (xxxii) of S. 51 of the Australian Constitution,—which are to the following effect (at p. 285):

"Property, in relation to land, is a bundle of rights exercisable with respect to the land. The tenant of an unencumbered estate in fee simple in possession has the largest possible bundle. But there is nothing in the placitum to suggest that the Legislature was intended to be at liberty to free itself from the restrictive provisions of the placitum by taking care to seize something short of the whole bundle owned by the person whom it was expropriating. Possession vaut titre in more senses than one. Not only is a right to possession a right of property, but where the object of proprietary rights is a tangible thing it is the most characteristic and essential of those rights. 'So feeble and precarious was property without possession, or rather without possessory remedies, in the eyes of medieval lawyers, that Possession largely usurped not only the substance but the name of Property; and when distinction became necessary in modern times, the clumsy term 'special property' was employed to denote the rights of a possessor not being owner' (Pollock & Wright, Possession in the Common Law, (1888), p. 5). 'Possession confers more than a personal right to be protected against wrong-doers: it confers a qualified right to possess, a right in the nature of property which is valid against everyone who cannot show a prior and better right.' 'Possession is a root of title' (ibid., p. 22). 'The rule that Possession is a root of Title is not only an actual but a necessary part of our system' (ibid., p. 93). 'The standing proof that English law regards, and has always regarded, Possession as a substantive root of title, is the standing usage of English lawyers and landowners' (ibid. p. 94) It would, in my opinion, be wholly inconsistent with the language of the placitum to hold that, whilst preventing the legislature from authorizing the acquisition of a citizen's full title except upon just terms, it leaves it open to the legislature to seize possession and enjoy the full fruits of possession, indefinitely, on any terms it chooses, or upon no terms at all."

The view of Mr. Das, the learned Judge, was [A.I.R. (1951) S. C. 41, 61] :—

"In my judgment the question whether the Ordinance or the Act has deprived the shareholder of his 'property' must depend, for its answer, on whether it has taken away the substantial bulk of the rights constituting his 'property'. In other words, if the rights taken away by the Ordinance or the Act are such as would render the rights left untouched illusory and practically valueless, then there can be no question that in effect and substance the 'property' of the shareholder has been taken away by the Ordinance or the Act."

Similarly, "Property" says Weaver in his book on Constitutional Law at p. 374, "is ownership. It consists of the free enjoyment of one's acquisition without control or diminution save by the law of the land. It consists not merely of ownership and possession but in the unrestricted right of use and disposal. Anything which destroys any of these elements to that extent destroys the property itself. The right of property is a natural right and neither the Federal Government, nor the State Government can deprive its owners of it or its possession except by the due process of law.

"Property includes not only real estate and personal property, but also incorporeal rights such as patents, copyrights, leases, accounts and choses in action and every other thing of an exchangeable value which one may have."

Indeed deprivation of property does take place when the entire collection of rights is taken away: but what happens if a substantial part of the rights is taken away. Could it be then said that a deprivation of property has taken place within the meaning of ART. 15(1)? The answer to this question must depend upon the nature, degree and extent of the invasion of proprietary rights: if what is left behind is something so illusory and practically useless so far as the enjoyment of the property is concerned, it could hardly be disputed that substantially the victim of this subtle ruse has been deprived of his property.

Fundamental Rights

When rights one by one are detached, that is, they are one by one either extinguished or acquired, the case is to be governed by ART. 11, but right to compensation arises under ART. 15 provided substantial interference with the use of any property has taken place. The distinction between the two Articles, to borrow the felicitous phraseology of a Madras High Court Judge, is the difference between plucking feathers of a bird one by one and killing it. (See Lakshmindra Theertha Swamiar v. Commissioner, Hindu Religious Endowments Madras and others, AIR (1952) Madras 613, where this observation has been made regarding distinction between Arts. 19(1) (f) and 31(1) at p. 634).

(b) Public Purpose
Clause (2) of ART. 15 enjoins that property can only be acquired or taken possession of for a public purpose and that too by means of a law which fixes the compensation payable or settles the principles upon which it is to be paid. This raises the question of the meaning of expression 'public purpose'. The exercise of power relating to 'acquisition of property' under the Fifth Schedule is not fettered in any sense: it is not, for instance, stated therein to be available only in cases where acquisition or requisition takes place in connection with a public purpose. This limitation that acquisition must be for a public purpose, is mentioned in clause (2) of ART. 15 and clearly the intention is to make the issue as to the existence or non-existence of a 'public purpose' to be a justiciable one—it is in fact made a condition precedent to be complied with before power to acquire can at all be exercised. (See Abdul Hamid v. State of West Bengal AIR (1953) Calcutta 223; State of Bihar v. Kameshwar Singh, AIR (1952) S.C. 252).

Public Purpose need not be expressly stated in the Law relating to Acquisition of property.
But this is not to say that the law acquiring property must on its face indicate that the acquisition is in connection with a public purpose. Unlike the question relating to provision about compensation, which has anyhow to be clearly mentioned in the law authorising the acquisition of property, the public purpose need not be expressly mentioned in the statute. A court of law, however, is not prevented, upon an issue being raised that the acquisition was not in fact in connection with a public purpose, from enquiring into the allegation made in that behalf. But at the outset, the court would presume that the acquisition is for a public purpose and would give effect to that presumption unless that presumption be rebutted by the production of proper evidence. It is from the nature of the case an extremely difficult burden to discharge but if it could be proved that the property has been, in fact, acquired by the State, not for a public purpose but for a private one, the law would be declared as invalid as offending against ART. 15(2) of our Constitution.

Any provision of law which is designed to exclude the jurisdiction of courts to enquire into the allegation that the state has acquired property for purposes other than public purposes, would itself be ultra vires of the powers of the legislature and on that account would be ineffective. It is the duty of our courts to denounce as unconstitutional any Act that is calculated to enable the executive to acquire properties of subjects for purposes other than public, and any legislative provision which seeks to oust the jurisdiction of courts to perform this function is itself inoperative for being plainly opposed to the Constitution. (See West Bengal Settlement Kanungoe Co-operative Credit Society Ltd. v. Mrs. Bella Banerjee, AIR (1952) Calcutta 554).

Right to Property—A Comment on Art. 15

We may next consider the meaning of the expression 'acquisition of property': clearly this means the assumption of the dominion over property thus acquired, so that instead of the original owner of the property it is the State that steps in his place. One can acquire property only by acquiring the title; whereas by merely taking possession one only acquires the corpus of the property. When you take possession of a thing you exclude another in whose possession it was before you took over its possession. Another cognate expression is 'requisitioning of property'. Property 'requisitioned' is merely a property in respect of which the acquisition of its temporary use has taken place: as opposed to 'acquisition'; 'requisition' implies temporary occupation.

The Bombay High Court has ruled in Dawarkadas Shrinivas v. Sholapur Spinning & Weaving Company, AIR (1951) Bombay 86 that, "'taking possession' is not synonymous with 'requisitioning', but has a wider connotation." In this case would be found an instructive discussion of the meaning of the term 'property', as it has been held applicable to the provisions of the Indian Constitution. (Arts. 19 and 31).

In the case of Mira Khan and others v. Meharban Husain and others, PLD (1956) Karachi 338, it has been ruled that the term 'acquisition' is a wide concept, meaning procuring or taking property permanently or temporarily and it does not necessarily mean acquisition of legal title by the State in the property taken possession of, and that the word 'acquisition' in item 9 of list 11, of Schedule VII, of the Government of India Act, 1935, includes requisition. The Court declined to impose upon the term 'acquisition' occurring in item 9. List 11 of the 7th Schedule a narrow meaning on the ground that such a construction would introduce a technicality which would unnecessarily curtail the meaning of the expression, with the result that a law enacted to deal with requisition would be valid even if it did not make provision for payment of any compensation—an interpretation which would tantamount to cutting down the beneficial construction of S. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and would adversely affect the interest of the subject. In the words of Rahman C. J. (at. p. 344):

"In the context of immovable property, acquisition may be accepted as transference of the ownership rights to the acquiring authority, as contrasted with requisition which would vest a temporary right of use of the property in that authority. The right of possession is but part of the full right of ownership. Omne majus continet in se minus—the greater contains the less, is a well-known maxim of the law."

The word 'compensation' appearing in clause (2) of ART. 15, may next be considered. Broadly defined, 'compensation' represents the money value of the property acquired. By 'compensation', courts invariably have understood just compensation, i.e. compensation adequate to the person who has been deprived of property to compensate him for the loss. Whether or not compensation is just and adequate is therefore a justiciable matter and one which courts of law in appropriate proceedings are bound to enquire into and determine. To accept any other view of clause (2) of ART. 15 is to rob it of just the one safeguard which it is calculated to provide, namely, the safeguard against arbitrary attempts by the Government to acquire property belonging to private persons. If any other construction were accepted the result would be that it will be perfectly open to the Govern-

(c) Acquisition of Property.

Mira Khan vs.
Meharban and others.

(d)
Compensation

ment to pass a law relating to acquisition of property and provide nominal compensation, that is compensation which is out of all proportion to the value of the property actually acquired. In Weynes' Legislative and Executive Powers in Australia, the expression 'just terms' appearing in S. 51 of Australian Constitution has been interpreted as warranting the view that whether or not compensation is paid on just terms is not a matter for courts of law to go into. The learned author sets forth his opinion as follows:

"It is submitted that the view that Commonwealth Act authorising acquisition of property and fixing a nominal sum for compensation would be a valid enactment is correct. No measure of justice is laid down in the Constitution, and it is not specified that the courts would question the judgment of Parliament on this matter. But if the Commonwealth pass an Act seizing the property without fixing or referring to compensation or terms at all this would undoubtedly be of little force for such an Act could not be described as a law with respect to 'the acquisition of property on just terms' at all; it would require no investigation by the court into question of policy to see that such an enactment was not within the Commonwealth's legislative power." (p. 248)

It is submitted the foregoing extract does not correctly state the law as it obtains at present in Australia. Besides, the view of the learned author is not supported by any authority. On the other hand, in the case of Minister of State for the Army v. Dalziel (1943-44) 68 C.L.R. 261, referred to earlier, the question whether compensation provided for by Regulation 60-H of the National Security (General Regulations) on just terms was considered and answered in the negative by the majority of the Judges who composed the Bench. Consult further—

- (a) Grace Brothers Proprietary Ltd. v. Commonwealth, (1946) 72 C.L.R. 269 at p. 285,
- (b) Andrews v. Howell, (1941) 65 C.L.R. 255 at p. 282,
- (c) The Australian Apple & Pear Marketing Board v. Tonking, (1942) 66 C.L.R. 77 at 106;
- (d) (1951) A.C. 34 (P.C.),
- (e) (1951) A.C. 53 (P.C.),

In our Constitution safeguards against arbitrary acquisition of property are provided for in the chapters relating to fundamental rights, and this of necessity means that these are justiciable matters. One manner of looking at the situation would be to say, in regard to cases where compensation provided for by the law relating to acquisition of property is grossly inadequate, that it is no compensation at all, and that, therefore, the Act in question, in effect, does not provide for compensation. The term "Compensation" has a well-known meaning, and any monetary return which has been declared by the legislature as being admissible to the person whose property has been acquired must be fair enough to correspond to the commonsense notion of compensation.

The principles upon which compensation is assessed in England are summarised by Lord Dunedin in Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power Co. v. Lacoste (1914) A.C. 569, in two simple propositions:

"(1) The value to be paid for is the value to the owner as it existed on the date of taking, not the value to the taker.

(2) The value to the owner consists in all the advantages which the land possesses, present or future, but it is the present value alone of such advantages that he is entitled to.

See also In re Lucas and the Chesterfield Gas and Water Board, (1909) 1 B.K. 16; Fraser v. City of Fraserville, (1917) A.C. 187.

Principles upon which Compensation is paid.
Cedars Rapid Manufacturing Co.
v.
Lacoste

The content of the expression 'just terms' in placitum (xxxii) of S. 51 of the Australian Constitution has been construed by the High Court of Australia somewhat differently than the expression 'just compensation':

"Unlike 'just compensation'", says R. W. Baker, "which, following in the main general Common Law principles has been interpreted to require a full monetary equivalent, the Australian Courts have construed 'just terms' in the light of reasonableness and fairness. If the term may reasonably be regarded by the Court as providing just terms they comply with the placitum (xxxii) even though the Court may be of opinion that other terms might be fairer. Moreover, in considering the question of reasonableness and fairness the Court has regard to the interests of the community as well as those of the person dispossessed." (See further Grace Bros. Proprietary Ltd. v. Commonwealth, (1946) 72 C.L.R. 269 at pp. 280 and 290 and Jhonston Fear v. Commonwealth 67, C.L.R. 314.)

In those constitutions where the word 'just compensation' is used, the idea is not so much to add something to the inherent meaning of the term compensation as to amplify it. The words of Brewer J. in the case of Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, (1893) 148 U.S. 312: 37 Law Ed. 463, are apposite in this context.

"The noun 'compensation'", says he, "standing by itself, carries the idea of an equivalent. Thus we speak of damages by way of compensation or compensatory damages, as distinguished from punitive or exemplary damages, the former being the equivalent for the injury done, and the latter imposed by way of punishment. So that if the adjective 'just' had been omitted, and the provision was simply that property should not be taken without compensation, the natural import of the language would be that the compensation should be the equivalent of the property. And this is made emphatic by the adjective 'just'."

This idea finds support from an authority of the eminence of Mr. Nichols, who in his celebrated work on "Eminent Domain" Vol. 3, at page 29, observes:

"Many of the State Constitutions require that the compensation shall be 'just', 'reasonable' or 'adequate', but these words are mere epithets rather than qualifications and add nothing to the meaning. The phrase 'just compensation' means the value of the land taken and the damage if any to land, not taken. More than this it does not imply. The adjective 'just' only emphasises what would be true if omitted—namely that the compensation should be the equivalent of the property. It has been said in this regard that it is difficult to imagine an unjust compensation. The word 'just' is used evidently to intensify the meaning of the word compensation, to convey the idea that the equivalent to be rendered for property taken shall be real, substantial, full and ample, and that no legislature can diminish by one jot the rotund expression of the constitution. Substantially this same meaning is attributed to the term 'compensation' and 'adequate compensation'."

It is necessary to emphasize that although it is perfectly competent to a court of law to enquire into the adequacy or otherwise of the compensation provided for by the legislature in a law relating to acquisition of property, care must be taken to be vigilant about the exercise of this species of judicial power. This power is not to be utilised to question the propriety of the legislative decision as to the quantum of compensation awarded: the enquiry by the court must be confined to the purpose of merely determining whether the exercise of the power to acquire property has been resorted to in accordance with the constitutional safeguards provided in ART. 15. In other words,

Meaning of
'Just terms' occurring in
S. 51 of
Australian
Constitution

Quotation from Nichols on Eminent Domain.

The principles of "judicial caution" in the matter of accepting challenges against "property Law"

courts are not entitled to substitute, as if by a process of academic consideration, what in their judgment should have been the quantum of compensation which the legislature ought to have fixed. Legislature is presumed to know and has to be credited with the intention of following the constitutional safeguards in regard to the acquisition of property. It is true that here, as elsewhere, a line has to be drawn somewhere. How many grains of sand make a mound of sand, is undoubtedly a question which is incapable of being answered in terms of mathematical notations. But all the same, we do recognise a mound when we see it, although we may not be able to say how many particles of sand must go into it to make a mound. The whole scheme of the impugned Act has to be examined by the courts, its objectives appreciated and effect has to be given to the usual presumption in favour of the constitutionality of legislative action—namely, that the legislature has properly and honestly exercised a power given to it by the Constitution to acquire property. It is only where the court discovers that by no stretch of imagination could, what has been awarded by way of compensation, be regarded as compensation that it would feel impelled to interfere and declare the law to be unconstitutional.

The Attitude of English Courts.

In England the safeguards against arbitrary exercise of power relating to acquisition of property is not a matter of constitutional limits on the exercise of legislative power. In the theory of English Constitutional Law, Parliament can pass a valid law relating to acquisition of property without providing for compensation, and if such a thing were to take place courts of law would be bound to give effect to such a legislation. Property in England can be compulsorily acquired for public purposes only if the statute authorises the executive to do so. It is an established rule of construction that express words must exist in such a statute before the intention to authorise the taking of property without compensation could be given effect to. (See (a) New Castle Breweries v. King (1920) 1 K.B. 854; see also (b) the cases of Hudson Bay Co. v. Marclay, (1920) 36 T.L.R. 469 (c) Robinson v. King, (1921) 3 K.B. 183, where the former decision i.e. the one referred to at (a) has been disapproved although the principle of construction laid down therein has not been departed from.)

Under the theory of the English Constitutional Law there exists prerogative power with the Crown to deprive the subject of the use or possession of any property with a view to securing the defence of the realm in times of emergency. An important case on this subject is De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd. v. The King, (1920) A.C. 508. This was the case which arose out of a petition of right presented by De Keyser's Royal Hotel Ltd., for compensation in respect of compulsory occupation of certain parts of their premises by the War Office, "acting in the name and on behalf of the Crown for purposes connected with the defence of the realm during the Great War." The House of Lords on the facts and circumstances of that case found that as a matter of fact acquisition was not countenanced pursuant to the exercise of prerogative power of the Crown but was under the Defence of Realm Regulations. It was held that—

"The Crown had elected to act under the authority of that statute and that it, like any other person, must take the powers that it thus uses com onere. It cannot take the powers without fulfilling conditions statute imposed on the use of such powers."

Although their Lordships decided the case on a short ground and accepted the case of De Keyser for compensation upon the construction of the Defence Regulations, and the Act under which those regulations had been made, they, having regard to the general importance of the issue raised in that case, proceeded to consider the question "whether apart from the fact that the Crown expressly purported to be acting under powers given to it by statute such a claim could be maintained."

They proceeded to say,—

"To decide this question one must consider the nature and extent of the so-called Royal Prerogative in the matter of taking or occupying land for the better defence of the realm. I have no doubt that in early days, when war was carried on in a simpler fashion and on a smaller scale than is the case in modern times, the Crown, to whom the defence of the realm was entrusted, had wide prerogative powers as to taking or using the lands of its subjects for the defence of the realm when the necessity arose. But such necessity would be in general an actual and immediate necessity arising in face of the enemy and in circumstances where the rule Salus populi suprema lex was clearly applicable. The necessity would in almost all cases be local, and no one could deny the right of the Crown to raise fortifications on or otherwise occupy the land of the subject in the face of the enemy, if it were necessary so to do."

Their Lordships reviewed the constitutional history bearing on the course of 'acquisition legislation' across a period of five centuries and assessed the effect of it on the present legal position in England as follows:

"What effect has this course of legislation upon the Royal Prerogative? I do not think that it can be said to have abrogated that prerogative in any way but it has given to the Crown statutory powers which render the exercise of that prerogative unnecessary, because the statutory powers that have been conferred upon it are wider and more comprehensive than those of the prerogative itself. But it has done more than this. It has indicated unmistakably that it is the intention of the nation that the powers of the Crown in these respects should be exercised in the equitable manner set forth in the statute, so that the burden shall not fall on the individual, but shall be borne by the community.

"This being so, when powers covered by this statute are exercised by the Crown it must be presumed that they are so exercised under the statute, and therefore subject to the equitable provision for compensation which is to be found in it. There can be no excuse for reverting to prerogative powers simpliciter—if indeed they ever did exist in such a form clear in such a case as the present—when the Legislature has given to the Crown statutory powers which are wider even than anyone pretends that it possessed under the prerogative, and which cover all that can be necessary for the defence of the nation, and which are moreover accompanied by safeguards to the individual which are in agreement with the demands of justice. Accordingly, if the commandeering of the buildings in this case had not been expressly done under statutory powers, I should have held that the Crown must be presumed to have acted under these statutory powers, and thus given to the subject the statutory right to compensation."

These extracts from the decision of their Lordships are relevant for us in Pakistan since they are of assistance in the comprehension of the constitutional position in regard to the executive power of our State during times of emergency like war etc. During normal times the fundamental rights guaranteed by Part II of the Constitution are available, but the enforcement of these rights can be suspended upon the declaration by the President of the existence of an emergency. The enforcement of these rights will get revived after the proclamation of emergency has been revoked in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. But, during the emergency, the power of the State to take property without compensation would undoubtedly be there, although the right of the subject to receive compensation in respect of such acquisitions of property as are made by the State during the continuance of emergency will get revived when the period of emergency itself is declared to have been concluded. The important question to determine in such cases would then be, whether courts of law would enforce claims to compensation as against the State in respect of acquisition of property made during the period of emergency. One view would be to say that it is the inherent right of the State to face emergencies by resort to all manner of power it can command, and it is not liable to compensate anyone in respect of such acts. The other view would be that since the remedies to enforce fundamental rights were merely held in abeyance and not that the rights themselves had been abrogated, the right to receive compensation becomes enforceable after the cessation of the period of emergency. And once the remedies to enforce fundamental rights are revived they would be available to the subject to enforce all his claims arising out of acts which impinge upon the fundamental rights of the persons affected thereby. If the latter view be accepted, it would follow that the claim to compensation would be enforceable in respect of acquisitions of property during the period of emergency.

Art. 196

The above statement of the constitutional position has been offered upon the supposition that Parliament does not pass an Act within the scope of the authority reserved to it under ART. 196 which inter alia enables the Legislature to "validate sentence passed, punishment inflicted, forfeiture ordered or other act done under martial law in such area." The powers of the Parliament under ART. 196 are sufficiently wide to preclude the courts from questioning the validity of acts countenanced by the executive including confiscatory deprivations of property ordered by it during the pendency of the state of emergency.

Recent development of Law in England

Even in England, in recent years, the catalogue of restrictions on the enjoyment of the rights over private property, (which the law of England too recognises as sacrosanct) has swelled to unusual dimensions. Socialistic ideas have invaded the economic life of the State even in England and a system of a more or less controlled economy has necessitated a type of interference with the rights of persons to their property which would have been resisted by British citizens two centuries earlier. Statutes like Coal Industry Nationalisation Act of 1946, the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, are instances of the kind of legislation which has become a matter of every day occurrence in England.

Distinction between the constitutional safeguards in U.S.A. and in our country.

One essential distinction between the American concept of safeguards against the taking of private property for public use and the safeguards under ART. 15 of our Constitution should be carefully noted. In America, the law relating to the taking of property need not contain any provision relating to the award of compensation, but with us it is of the essence of the constitutional requirement under ART. 15(2) that the law relating to acquisition of property must itself either fix compensation or settle the principles in terms of which such compensation is to be determined and paid. In America, the right to compensation is an incident of the Constitution and if property is proved to have been taken by the State its liability to compensate flows from the constitutional provisions themselves. With us, the requirement of the Constitution is that the law made by the legislature relating to acquisition of property must itself contain provisions as to the fixing of compensation etc. and if this is not done the law in question would be ex facia bad.

Ss 23 and 24

Under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, in its 23rd and 24th Sections, matters which have to be considered, and the matters that have not to be taken into consideration in determining the amount of compensation payable, are mentioned in meticulous details, and these provisions are reproduced as they, in the opinion of the writer, do furnish a guidance in the matter of fixing principles upon which compensation could be paid in cases where property is acquired by the State. According to their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (Raja Vyricherla Narayana Gajapati Raju v. Revenue Divisional Officer, Vizagapatam, (1939) A.C. 302): A.I.R. (1939) P. C. 98, these principles differ in no material respect from the principles upon which compensation was awarded under the Land Clauses Act, 1945, and

"therefore the compensation must be determined by reference to the price which a willing vendor might reasonably expect to obtain from a willing purchaser."

Sections 23 and 24 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, are in the following words:

"23 (1) In determining the amount of compensation to be awarded for land acquired under this Act, the Court shall take into consideration:—

first, the market value of the land at the date of the publication of the notification under S. 4, sub-section (1); secondly, the damage sustained by the person interested, by reason of the taking of any standing crops or trees which may be on the land at the time of the Collector's taking possession thereof;

thirdly, the damage (if any) sustained by the person interested, at the time of the Collector's taking possession of the land, by reason of severing such land from his other land;

fourthly, the damage (if any) sustained by the person interested, at the time of the Collector's taking possession of the land, by reason of the acquisition injuriously affecting his other property, movable or immovable, in any other manner, of his earnings;

fifthly, if, in consequence of the acquisition of the land by the Collector, the person interested is compelled to change his residence or place of business, the reasonable expenses if any incidental to such change; and sixthly, the damage, if any, bona fide resulting from diminution of the profits of the land between the time of the publication of the declaration under S. 6 and the time of the Collector's taking possession of the land.

(2) In addition to the market-value of the land as above provided, the Court shall in every case award a sum of fifteen per centum on such market-value, in consideration of the compulsory nature of the acquisition."

"24. But the Court shall not take into consideration:—

first, the degree of urgency which has led to the acquisition;

secondly, any disinclination of the person interested to part with the land acquired;

thirdly, any damage sustained by him which, if caused by a private person, would not render such person liable to a suit;

fourthly, any damage which is likely to be caused to the land acquired, after the date of the publication of the declaration under S. 6, by or in consequence of the use to which it will be put;

fifthly, any increase to the value of the land acquired likely to accrue from the use to which it will be put when acquired;

sixthly, any increase to the value of the other land of the person interested likely to accrue from the use to which the land acquired will be put; or, seventhly, any outlay or improvements on, or disposal of, the land acquired, commenced, made or effected without the sanction of the Collector after the date of the publication of the notification under S. 4, sub-section (1)."

148. ART. 15 and Savings in Respect of Existing Law

Clause (3) of ART. 15 says, under four distinct heads, the kinds of legislation in relation to which provisions of clauses (1) and (2) of ART. 15 would not apply. Although a law relating to acquisition of property which answers the description of any of the four categories of cases excepted by clause (3) would survive the limitations imposed by ART. 15, the question that has arisen for solution is: Would the same legislation be deemed to be open to attack under some other Article contained in Chapter II of our Constitution. In particular, we might see the effect of those provisions that guarantee the right to equality upon the validity of that class of expropriatory legislation to which the provisions of ART. 15 would normally apply, but in relation to which, thanks to the saving made in the 3rd clause of ART. 15, they have expressly been declared as not being applicable. This was the problem that arose in the case of East Bengal State Acquisition case before the High Court of Dacca, more popularly known as the East Bengal Zamindari Abolition case. The facts of the case were as follows:—

The East Bengal State Acquisition Act was passed on 16th of July, 1950. This was an Act which provided for the acquisition by the State of the interests of rent-receivers and certain other interests in land in East Bengal, and gave power to the Provincial Government to acquire by notification in the official gazette all interests of such of the rent-receivers as may be specified therein and with effect from the date of the notification all those interests "in the Estates, Taluka or Tenancies specified in the notification, including their interests in all lands in their khas possession etc., would vest absolutely in the Provincial Government free from all incumbrances." Under S. 37 of the East Bengal State Acquisition Act, compensation payable to the rent-receivers in respect of the acquisition of their rent-receiving interests was provided upon a scheme which showed that rate of compensation payable varied in inverse proportion to the ascending scale of the classes of rent-receivers who had been grouped according to the amount of annual net-income which had to be worked out in keeping with the several provisions mentioned in the impugned Act. For instance, if net income from the rents received by a rent-receiver did not exceed Rs. 500/- the rate of compensation payable was 'ten times such net income', and where the net income computed exceeded Rs. 500/- but not Rs. 2000/- it was to be eight times such net income and so on and so forth. In other words the rate of compensation was progressively of the diminutive size in respect of categories of higher groups of income: more particularly, the scheme showed that the rate of compensation varied inversely in respect of groups of income of ascending scale. Higher the income relatively less was the rate of compensation declared payable by S. 37 of the Act.

Now this law being an existing law was saved under clause (3) of ART. 15 from being questioned in relation to the requirements of clause (2) of that Article. To be more concrete, such a law could not be attacked on the ground (say, for instance), that it was not for a public purpose or that it did not provide for compensation etc. But the petitioners in the writ-petitions that they had filed, contended before the High Court that it violated the equal protection of law clause of the 5th Article in that different classes of rent-receivers who had been divided in an artificially conceived income group had been treated, in respect of compensation payable to them, in a manner that violated their right to be treated as equal before law and to be entitled to the equal protection of the law. It was complained that the provisions relating to compensation contained in S. 37 of the impugned Act were arbitrary and discriminatory and unreasonable inasmuch as in accordance with the scheme provided therein, rent-receivers, whose income is low, were given compensation at a higher rate than those given to rent-receivers whose income is higher, irrespective of the value of the land acquired. It was further contended that, although it was open to the State to fix any multiple of income it liked, but once, in the determination of compensation payable to rent-receivers whose interests were acquired, a certain rate of compensation had been fixed, it should be same for every one and should not be made to vary according as the net income of the rent-receiver was more or less. It was pointed out that this was virtually an attempt at classification which was arbitrary and which had no rational relation to the objects of legislation. It was suggested that the value of the land does not vary according to the means of the rent-receivers and if there was one law for A who is rich, and another law for B who is not rich, it amounts to a violation of the guarantee of right to equality before law since the different rates at which compensation had to be given to different persons had no rational connection whatsoever with the objects of legislation.

The case of Kameshwar Singh v. State of Bihar, AIR (1951) Patna 91, was pressed into the service of this argument, a case wherein a similar argument having been raised, the Patna High Court had ruled that the impugned legislation was discriminatory and therefore void, under ART. 14 of the Indian Constitution. And it was pointed out that although the State of Bihar had filed an appeal before the Supreme Court of India, the Constitution of India had itself to be amended by the incorporation of ARTs. 31(a) and 31(b) in order to save the legislation that had been declared void by the Patna High Court.

Two distinct questions arose in this case and they may be formulated as follows:—

(a) Could an 'existing law' (that dealt with the acquisition of property) that had been expressly saved from the operation of constitutional safeguards that are available under clause (2) of ART. 15 be attacked under ART. 5?

It was contended by the Government of East Bengal that ART. 15 being a complete code with regard to the protection given to the property rights of private persons and existing laws having been saved it was not permissible to speculate whether that law came in conflict with any other Article in Part II of the Constitution. The right of equality was a general right, no doubt, but then ART. 15 was a special Article dealing with the specific question of acquisition of property, and if a law had been expressly saved from the operation of a specific Article, was it not permissible to further consider whether it was hit by any other Article? It was also pointed out that the entire argument which was sought to be made at the Bar to bring the case within the mischief of ART. 5, was more or less an attempt to get an adjudication from the court as to the inadequacy of the quantum of compensation which the law relating to acquisition of property had provided, and that this attempt, if successful, would undo the effect of clause (3) of ART. 15, which had expressly saved the existing law. In other words, if the object of clause (3) of ART. 15 was to save the existing laws from being challenged on the ground of adequacy or otherwise of compensation, that protection was in reality being undone by raising the same question in another form so as to bring it within the prohibition against discrimination contained in ART. 5.

(b) The second question was whether the provisions of S. 37 were at all violative of ART. 5?

The position of the East Bengal Government was that the 5th Article of our Constitution was, as compared with ART. 14 of Indian Constitution, somewhat differently worded and the question was—Can there be equal protection of law "where the ideal of equality before law had to be attained in an unequal system of human relations"?

The court held that S. 37 was not discriminatory and held that there was rational classification in respect of compensation that is payable under its scheme to rent-receivers who had been divided into different groups. (See the case in Writ Petition No. 13 of 1956, dated 7.8.1956, delivered by the High Court of Judicature at Dacca, in East Pakistan PLD (1957) Dacca p. 1).

The matter went in appeal to the Supreme Court of Pakistan where the learned Judges of the Supreme Court by a unanimous judgment held that the provisions of S. 37 of the impugned Act were not capable of being successfully attacked as unconstitutional and void in view of the saving contained in the 3rd clause of ART. 15, and they also ruled that quite apart from that saving, the classification attempted by the legislature in S. 37 did not come in conflict with the guarantee of the equal protection of law.

Dealing with the first objection the learned Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment, with which his companion Judges concurred, observed (at pp. 36-37):

" . . . the essential nature of the appellants' objection to the acquisition is the inadequacy of compensation, and this objection seems to me not to be open to persons who have been expropriated under the existing laws. The 'equal protection' clause applies only where unequal treatment has not been recognised by the Constitution. I have given my reasons for the view that the impugned Act is a confiscating enactment inasmuch as it does not provide what is called compensation to the expropriated rent-receivers and is clearly discriminatory in the matter of compensation. This broad feature of the Act must have been fully present to the minds of the Constitution-makers when they inserted in ART. 15 the provision that —

'Nothing in this Article shall affect the validity of any existing law'. If being fully cognizant of this discriminatory character of the Act, they for reasons better known to them decided to protect the Act, they must be deemed to have affirmed its discriminatory provisions. Thus inequality in the matter of compensation having been recognised by Article 15, no equality in that matter can be claimed under the general provisions of Article 5. It is not contended in the present case that the acquisition was not for a public purpose; all that is complained of is that some of the appellants have received less than they should have received if no discrimination had been observed and compensation had been paid in full. The essence of the objection, therefore, is the inadequacy of compensation and this complaint the court is expressly prohibited from entertaining by the Constitution. Mr. Das has urged that in order to bar an objection to the constitutionality of the Act on the ground of inadequacy of compensation, the case contemplated by Article 15 is that of a single person considered by himself, and that an objection to an enactment under Article 5 necessarily proceeds on a comparison of the aggrieved party with other persons in his situation. In my opinion, this is not an invariable distinction between the two Articles; nor is the latter circumstance alone sufficient to cause an objection cease to be an objection to the adequacy of compensation because a person who does not receive due compensation cannot be held not to complain of want or inadequacy of compensation when what he says is 'Others have received more, I have received less', irrespective of whether what others have received is or is not due compensation. I am, therefore, of the view that equality in the matter of compensation having been disallowed by Article 15 to the persons affected by the Act they cannot invoke the 'equal protection of the law' clause in an endeavour to obtain a declaration as to the invalidity of the Act. I recognise that Mr. Das succeeded on this part of the case in the Patna High Court, but I consider that the correct approach to this question is to be found in the decision of the Allahabad High Court in Rajasuryapal Singh v. The U.P. Government, (AIR (1951) Allahabad, 674, decided by a Full Bench of five Judges. There are also certain observations to a similar effect by Das J. in the decision of the Supreme Court of India at p. 980 of the report of Kameswar Singh's case in 1952, S.C.R. 889." (PLD (1957) S.C. 9).

149. A Comment on ART. 7—Limitation on the State-Power of Arrest and Detention.

ART. 7 consists of two parts: (a) general direction in respect of a person who is arrested that he must be informed, as soon as may be, of the grounds for such arrest and that he shall not be denied the right to consult and be defended by a legal practitioner of his choice, and (b) the second part deals with laws relating to preventive detention and the constitutional safeguards within the limits whereof a law relating to preventive detention can be made. Whenever a person is arrested and thus deprived of personal liberty it is his constitutional right that he should be informed of the grounds upon which his arrest has been directed, and, secondly, it is his right to consult and be defended by a legal practitioner of his choice.

Under S. 340 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the right to be defended by a lawyer in a criminal case is affirmed in the following words:

S. 340 of Criminal Procedure
Code.

"Any person accused of an offence before a Criminal Court, or against whom proceedings are instituted under this Code in any such court, may of right be defended by a pleader."

This section does not only contemplate that the accused should be at liberty to be defended by a pleader at the time proceedings are actually going on but also implies that he should have a reasonable opportunity, if in custody of the police, of getting into communication with his legal adviser for the purpose of preparing for his defence. (See the case of Jahangiri Lal V. Emperor, A.I.R. (1935) Lahore p. 230).

It would be noticed that in the present Article this right has been given the status of a fundamental right and to some extent it has been given a more extensive scope. Section 340 of the Criminal Procedure Code gives the right only to an accused person, that is to say one who is accused of an offence before a criminal court, or against whom proceedings are instituted under that Code, but Article 7 confers an absolute right in favour of all persons who are arrested subject only to the exceptions mentioned in clause 3, i.e., a person who for the time being is an enemy alien or who is arrested or detained under any law that provides for preventive detention cannot take advantage of this Article. The right conferred by Article 7 is not only confined to the right of being defended by a legal practitioner but also includes the right to consult such a legal practitioner. The right under Article 7 attaches to a person as soon as he is arrested and continues right up to the conclusion of the period of his confinement. Any provision of law which abridges or curtails this right would, to the extent of its repugnancy with the Constitution, be void. All special or local laws which directly or indirectly impose restrictions on the right of arrested person to be defended by or to consult a legal practitioner of his choice, must, to the extent of their inconsistency, be deemed as void.

The right to be defended merely opens up the question of an option in favour of the arrested person but it does not impose or confer any corresponding duty on the state to engage for the defence of an arrested person a legal practitioner of his choice in order that his right to be defended be availed of by him.

The right to be informed as to the grounds upon which the arrest of a person has been directed is an important right and has its genesis in the practice and procedure of the English Courts that invariably insist that the person arrested should be informed of the grounds upon which his arrest has been directed. In the case of Christie v. Leachinsky reported in (1947) A.C. page 573 : (1947) 1 All E.R. 567 would be found the statement of the English law in regard to the duty of the arresting authority to disclose to the person arrested what the charge against him is and of the desirability of informing such a person, as soon as it be possible, of the facts which are said to constitute a crime on his part. This was a case in which the respondent had been arrested without a warrant and at the time of his arrest the detectives who effected his arrest charged him under Liverpool Corporation Act 1921, with the offence of 'unlawful possession', an offence for which, under the circumstances of that case, arrest without warrant was not allowed by law. The charge was subsequently withdrawn against the respondent who was immediately then arrested on charges of larceny and handed over to the police of another district where the offence was said to have taken place. The respondent was acquitted of larceny charges. He then brought an action against the arresting authorities for false imprisonment. The defence was that the arresting authority reasonably suspected that the respondent was guilty of larceny and this defence was accepted. With regard to the first arrest, however, since the arresting authority had not disclosed to the respondent at the time of the first arrest their suspicion that he had committed larceny, or given him any indication of the nature of evidence on which suspicion was founded, the Court of Appeal as well as the House of Lords held the arrest to be illegal and actionable. Lord Simonds dealt with the case as follows :

"First, I would say that it is the right of every citizen to be free from arrest unless there is in some other citizen, whether a constable or not, the right to arrest him. And I would say next that it is the corollary of the right of every citizen to be thus free from arrest that he should be entitled to resist arrest unless that arrest is lawful. How can these rights be reconciled with the proposition that he may be arrested without knowing why he is arrested? It is to be remembered that the right of the constable in or out of uniform is, except for a circumstance irrelevant to the present discussion, the same as that of every other citizen. Is citizen A bound to submit unresistingly to arrest by citizen B in ignorance of the charge made against him? I think, my Lords, that cannot be the law of England. Blind, unquestioning obedience is the law of tyrants and of slaves: it does not yet flourish on English soil. I would, therefore, submit the general proposition that it is a condition of lawful arrest that the man arrested should be entitled to know why he is arrested, and then, since the affairs of life seldom admit an absolute standard or an unqualified proposition, see whether any qualification is of necessity imposed on it. This approach to the question has, I think, a double support. In the first place, the law requires that, where arrest proceeds on a warrant, the warrant should state the charge on which the arrest is made. I can see no valid reason why this safeguard for the subject should not equally be his when the arrest is made without a warrant. The exigency of the situation, which justifies or demands arrest without a warrant, cannot, as it appears to me, justify or demand either a refusal to state the reason of arrest or a mis-statement of the reason. Arrested with or without a warrant, the subject is entitled to know why he is deprived of his freedom, if only in order that he may, without a moment's delay take such steps as will enable him to regain it. In the second place, I find assistance in the analogous procedure in civil proceedings in olden days and in imprisonment for debt. On the former, the judgment of Scott L.J., in this case is illuminating. The sheriff, who by judicial writ was directed to bring the defendant before the Court, was not left, nor did he leave the defendant, in ignorance of the demand that must be met. Common justice and common sense required that the defendant should know why he should on such and such a day be brought before the King's justices at Westminster or wherever it might be. So also in regard to imprisonment for debt. On this subject much information is to be found in Hooper v. Lane, (1857), 6 H.L.C.

A Comment on ART. 7—Limitation on the State-Power of Arrest and Detention

443. I think it necessary only to cite a single passage from the speech of Lord Cranworth, C., (ibid) 550. 'The sheriff', he said, 'is bound, when he executes the writ, to make known the ground of the arrest, in order, among other reasons, that the person arrested may know whether he is or is not bound to submit to the arrest.' Here is a clear illustration of the principle on which I base this opinion that if a man is to be deprived of his freedom, he is entitled to know the reason why.'

Under clause (2) of ART. 7, authority effecting arrest of any person or detaining him in custody is charged with the duty of producing such a person within the period of 24 hours of such arrest exclusive of the time necessary for the journey from the place of arrest to the court of a magistrate for procuring the magistrate's authority for legalising continued detention of such a person thereafter.

This requirement of the Constitution as to production before a magistrate is to be dispensed with in the case of the person arrested being an enemy agent or one whose arrest and detention has been secured under any law relating to preventive detention. (ART. 7(3)).

Under section 167 of the Code of Criminal Procedure it is provided that whenever any person is arrested and detained in custody and it appears that the investigation cannot be concluded within the period of 24 hours fixed by S.61 and there are grounds for believing that the accusation or information is well founded, the Officer-in-charge of the Police Station, or the Police Officer making the investigation if he is not below the rank of Sub-Inspector, shall forward the accused to a magistrate along with a copy of the entries in the Diary relating to the case and it will be then for the magistrate to authorise, from time to time, the detention of such accused person in custody for a term not exceeding 15 days. This safeguard which has been provided by the Criminal Procedure has been now accorded a constitutional status in ART. 7, and now it is the fundamental right of every person who considers that his arrest and detention beyond first 24 hours has been allowed to stand without any authority of the magistrate to ask for and obtain relief from such arrest and detention by approaching either the High Court or the Supreme Court direct for their intervention in his case.

The 4th and 5th clauses of ART. 7 lay down safeguards in the case of a person who is being detained under a law relating to preventive detention. These are :—

(a) No law that provides for preventive detention can authorise the detention of a person for a period exceeding three months unless the appropriate Advisory Board before the conclusion of the said period of three months reports that in its opinion there is sufficient cause for such detention.

(b) The authority directing the detention of a person under any law relating to preventive detention is required "as soon as may be" to communicate to such person the grounds on which the order has been made, and

(c) He is further required to afford him the earliest opportunity of making a representation against his Detention Order.

The proviso to clause (5) entitles the authority making such an order to refuse to disclose such facts which such authority considers it to be against the public interest to disclose.

Now it should be noted that clause (4) of ART. 7 does not by itself provide for preventive detention. It only enjoins certain safeguards which have to be incorporated in any law that provides for preventive detention.

The legislative competence to make a law relating to preventive detention is derived

ART. 7(2)
Right to be produced before a magistrate

S. 167 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Safeguards against arbitrary
Preventive Detention.

Legislative competence to enact law regarding Preventive Detention.

Preventive
detention

Detention and Externment

Concept of Preventive
Justice. *Rex
v. Halliday.*

Chapter VIII of Criminal Procedure
Code.

from Fifth Schedule (see entry 18 of the Federal List and 5 of the Provincial List) and all that clauses (4) and (5) of Article 7 provide are merely the restraints or limitations on the exercise of this power to legislate in regard to preventive detention by prescribing certain safeguards. A law providing for preventive detention must, on the face of it, show that it conforms to the pattern prescribed in the constitution.

Preventive detention is an abnormal measure in that it authorises the executive to impose restraints upon the liberty of a man who may not have committed a crime but who, it is apprehended, is about to commit acts that are prejudicial to public safety etc. It is only during the periods of emergency that resort to this abnormal power can be justified. During the two world wars in England, for example, powers of preventive detention were exercised in the interest of the security of the realm.

A person is said to be 'detained' when he is not, by reason of what is done to him, at liberty to go anywhere he likes, and in this sense, that term must be distinguished from 'externment' of such a person which merely involves his being made to leave a particular well defined place for another. A law that imposes restrictions on any person's movements is not necessarily achieving the same thing as does the law relating to preventive detention. It is on this account that the conditions that regulate the exercise of power relating to preventive detention do not apply to laws that merely impose restraints like 'externment' or 'banishment'. This principle has been accepted by the Indian Courts. (See Amrit Bhattacharyya v. The State, AIR (1953) Assam 77). A law relating to externment, for instance, is subject to the reasonable restrictions clause appearing in ART. 8, whereas preventive detention will be dealt with only under the terms of ART. 7.

The word 'preventive' appearing in the expression "preventive detention" is used to indicate an idea which may not be grasped by merely contrasting it from the one conveyed by the word 'punitive'. Preventive detention does not thus amount to subjecting a man to punishment but it merely creates a situation in which he may be prevented from doing some thing which it is apprehended he is likely to do and which act law forbids him to do. Lord Atkinson in the case of The King (on the prosecution of Arthur Lading) v. Halliday, reported in 1917 Appeal Cases page 260, gave a rational of the existence of such an abnormal measure as preventive detention which sometimes is sanctioned by law. His Lordship said:

"... Where preventive justice is put in force some suffering and inconvenience may be caused to the suspected person. This is inevitable. But the suffering is, under this statute, inflicted for something much more important than his liberty or convenience, namely, for securing the public safety and the defence of the realm." (p. 273).

And a little later, at p. 275, His Lordship observed:

"And as preventive justice proceeds upon the principle that a person should be restrained from doing something which if free and unfettered, it is reasonably probable he would do, it must necessarily proceed in all cases, to some extent, on suspicion or anticipation as distinct from proof."

In the Criminal Procedure Code also we have provisions that are calculated to achieve the prevention of crime. These provisions are contained in Chapter VIII, where, inter alia it is provided that upon the Magistrate being satisfied that it is necessary so to do, security for keeping public peace or for keeping good behaviour can be taken from a person. There is also a power to take emergency action before the conclusion of any enquiry that might have been directed for the magistrate being satisfied whether security should be demanded from a particular person who is about to commit breach of peace etc. (See sections 107, 108, 109, 110 and 117 of the Criminal Procedure Code).

The effect of ART. 7 is to regulate any law that may be made relating to preventive detention. Preventive detention being in the nature of an abnormal power has to be vigilantly and jealously guarded and our Constitution has prescribed the safeguards which have been referred to above in order to mitigate the rigour of this measure. If a law relating to preventive detention is enacted which is not in conformity with the requirements of ART. 7, it would be declared as void.

In Pakistan, before the coming into force of the Constitution, we had the Pakistan Security Act of 1952 as also several provincial enactments providing for preventive detention. This class of legislation is a legacy from the War days, and has been retained on our Statute Book even after the conclusion of the War, as it was felt desirable to continue these laws as a matter of painful necessity to combat certain types of situations with which the country was continually being confronted.

The question of a person being detained under these laws is invariably left to be determined upon the basis of satisfaction of the detaining authority, and our courts have repeatedly held that this satisfaction is a matter into the existence of which they will not institute any enquiry unless it be alleged that the order passed by the detaining authority is a mala fide one—that is, one which has been passed not for the purpose of promoting the objects of the Act but is one in the nature of a fraud on power.

Under the Evidence Act (section 114) our courts are directed to hold that prima facie all official acts are presumed to have been done properly, and whenever a detention order is challenged in a court of law there is, to begin with, a presumption in favour of the legality of the order passed by the detaining authority due to its character as an "official act", and the burden of proof is cast on the person disputing its validity to prove that in fact it was a mala fide order.

The principles upon which our courts act while examining the legality of the orders of detention are in accord with those laid down in the case of Liversidge v. Sir John Anderson and another, (1941) 3 All England Reports page 338: 1942 A.C. page 206. This was a case which involved interpretation of Regulation 18-B of the (Defence) General Regulations, 1939, which said, "If the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe any person to be of hostile origin or associations or to have been recently concerned in acts prejudicial to public safety or the defence of the realm or in the preparation or instigation of such acts and that by reason thereof it is necessary to exercise control over him, he may make an order against that person directing that he be detained". The facts of the case were that in May 1940, Sir John Anderson, the Home Secretary, made an order for a detention of one Robert Liversidge. Liversidge applied for particulars of the grounds which had led the Home Secretary to entertain the belief that he was of hostile associations. This request was refused by the King's Bench Division and the refusal was sustained by the Court of Appeal and Lord Viscount Maugham in his speech in the House of Lords dealt with the question of construction of the words in the Regulation, "If the Secretary of State has reasonable cause to believe", and in particular "the question whether the words required that there must be an external fact as to reasonable cause for belief and one therefore capable of being challenged in a court of law, or whether the words in the context in which they are found point simply to the belief of the Secretary of State founded on his view of their being reasonable cause for the belief he entertains." He observed:

"... My Lords, I am not disposed to deny that, in the absence of a context, the prima facie meaning of such a phrase as 'if A.B. has reasonable cause to believe' a certain circumstance or thing should be construed as 'if there is in fact reasonable cause for believing' that thing, and if A.B. believes it. However, I am quite unable to take the view that the words can only have that meaning. It seems to me reasonably clear that, if the thing to be believed is something which is essentially one within the knowledge of A.B. or one for the exercise of his exclusive discretion, the words may

Judicial
Control—"Satisfaction of Detaining Authority"

*Liversidge v.
Sir John Anderson*

well mean, 'if A.B. acting on what he thinks is reasonable cause (and, of course, acting in good faith) believes' the thing in question." (p. 219-220).

Lord Atkin, however, took a different view of the question. He was of the opinion that:

"'Reasonable cause' for an action or a belief is just as much a positive fact capable of determination by a third party as is a broken ankle or a legal right. If its meaning is the subject of dispute as to legal rights, then ordinarily the reasonableness of the cause, and even the existence of any cause, is in our law to be determined by the judge, and not by the tribunal of fact, if the functions deciding law and fact are divided. Thus, having established, as I hope, that the plain and natural meaning of the words 'having reasonable cause' imports the existence of a fact or state of facts, and not the mere belief by the person challenged that the fact or state of facts exists, I proceed to show that this meaning of the words has been accepted in innumerable legal decisions for many generations and that 'reasonable cause' for a belief, when the subject of legal dispute, has always been treated as an objective fact, to be proved by one or other party and to be determined by the appropriate tribunal."

His Lordship went on further to say :

" . . . No one doubts that the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, empowers His Majesty in Council to vest any minister with unlimited power over the person and property of the subject. The only question is whether in this regulation they have done so."

" . . . It is said that it could never have been intended to substitute the decision of judges for the decision of the minister, or, as has been said, to give an appeal from the minister to the courts. No one, however, proposes either a substitution or an appeal. A judge's decision is not substituted for the constable's on the question of unlawful arrest, nor does he sit on appeal from the constable. The Judge has to bear in mind that the constable's authority is limited, and that he can arrest only on reasonable suspicion, and the judge has the duty to say whether the conditions of the power are fulfilled. If there are reasonable grounds, the judge has no further duty of deciding whether he would have formed the same belief, any more than, if there is reasonable evidence to go to a jury, the judge is concerned with whether he would have come to the same verdict. . . .

"I view with apprehension the attitude of judges who, on a mere question of construction, when face to face with claims involving the liberty of the subject, show themselves more executive minded than the executive. Their function is to give words their natural meaning, not, perhaps, in war time, leaning towards liberty, but following the dictum of Pollock, C. B., in Bowditch v. Balchin, (1850) 5 Ex. 378, cited with approval by my noble and learned friend Lord Wright in Barnard v. Gorman, (1941) A.C. 378, 393; 'In a case in which the liberty of the subject is concerned, we cannot go beyond the natural construction of the statute'. In this country, amid the clash of arms, the laws are not silent. They may be changed, but they speak the same language in war as in peace. It has always been one of the pillars of freedom, 'one of the principles of liberty for which, on recent authority, we are now fighting, that the judges are no respecters of persons, and stand between the subject and any attempted encroachments on his liberty by the executive, alert to see that any coercive action is justified in law. In this case, I have listened to arguments which might have been addressed acceptably to the Court of King's Bench in the time of Charles I.'

Lord Macmillan, Lord Wright and Lord Romer agreed with the view of Viscount Maugham and concurred with him in dismissing the appeal.

The court when confronted with the problem of adjudging the legality of detention, however, has to consider whether the executive authority was really satisfied at all upon the question that the order of detention be made. The onus of proof of satisfaction ordinarily would lie on the Government but if an order duly authenticated by a competent authority is produced which contains a statement that the authority was satisfied that a particular person be detained, it would be sufficient for the purpose of putting the detenu on his defence. It is then for such a detenu to discharge the onus that thus shifts on to him of showing that the executive authority was in reality not satisfied at all. If it could be proved that such satisfaction did not, in fact, exist or that it is not the kind of satisfaction required by law, the order would be declared to be a nullity upon the doctrine that the detaining Authority having acted in violation of the condition-precedent laid down by law for the valid exercise of power, or having indulged in a colourable exercise of the power with a view to advancing ends that are extraneous to the purposes of the law that has conferred this power on the executive, his order should be regarded as inoperative and ineffective. (In re Narahari Balaji Parkhi, AIR (1949) Madras 438).

The grounds that have to be supplied to the detine by the detaining authority could be looked at by the courts with a view to seeing whether they are relevant for the purposes for which the legislature has sanctioned the preventive detention.

Whenever a question of the mala fide character of the order of detention comes to be determined by a court of law, it would be for the detenu to place proper material on the record of the case with a view to substantiating his contention that the order is in fact a mala fide one. A mala fide order does not mean necessarily that there was dishonest motive that prompted the detaining authority to pass the order in question. The order would be denounced as mala fide even without any such motive being alleged and proved, if upon examination of the case it turns out to be one where the Authority has acted without due care and caution or where the order manifestly appears to be for purposes other than those stated in the order or for purposes other than those that have any rational connection with the objects for which preventive detention has been sanctioned by law. (See Dayanand Modi v. State of Bihar, AIR (1951) Patna 47). Every thing thus, in effect, depends upon circumstances of each case, and there can be no abstract statement of a principle which can at all assist the court in coming to the conclusion whether or not an order is a mala fide one.

From the foregoing analysis it would appear that a detenu in order to succeed must establish any of the following contentions in a court of law where the legality of his detention comes to be considered:

(1) That the law relating to preventive detention does not conform to the requirements of clauses (4) and/or (5) of ART. 7.

(2) That although the law is valid, the detaining Authority has not followed in fact the procedure prescribed by the law relating to preventive detention. When a person is deprived of his liberty otherwise than in strict conformity with the requirements of the law relating to preventive detention, it would be declared that he has been deprived of his liberty otherwise than "in accordance with law" under ART. 5(2).

And finally,

(3) that although the law relating to preventive detention has been followed in the sense that the steps required to be taken before the executive can under the law direct detention of a person have been taken, nevertheless if in fact there is a fraud on the statute committed by the detaining authority who has acted mala fide or for purposes other than those for which preventive detention has been sanctioned by law the court will order the detenu to be released forthwith.

Mala fides of Detention
Order: Burden of proof.

A summing up of the Law
re. Preventive Detention.

Grounds to be Communicated
"as soon as may be."

Some cases
reviewed.
Atmaram
Shridhar Vaidya.

Thus, if the grounds on which the order of detention has been made are shown not to have been communicated to the detenu "as soon as may be", or that the grounds mentioned are vague or deemed to be thoroughly irrelevant to the question of his detention, or that no "earliest opportunity" has been afforded to the detenu of making a representation the detention would be illegal.

In re Atmaram Shridhar Vaidya, AIR (1951) Bombay 266, it was ruled that if the grounds furnished to the detenu were not such as to give him a real and effective opportunity to make a representation the detention would be denounced as being unconstitutional. The court also ruled that these grounds could not be suffered to be supplemented after they were duly delivered to the detenu.

This case went up in appeal at the instance of the State of Bombay to the Supreme Court of India where the 'adequacy' of grounds were viewed from two points of view: (1) 'adequacy' of grounds for the detaining authority to be satisfied that a person be detained, and (2) the 'adequacy' of grounds as stated in the notice to be given to the detenu to make a representation. The Supreme Court observed these two questions have to be kept distinct.

It further said that a detenu has two rights, (a) to receive the grounds of his detention as soon as may be, and (b) he has also right of making a representation. When grounds which have a rational connection with the ends mentioned in S. 3 of the Act are supplied the first condition is satisfied. If the grounds are not sufficient to enable the detenu to make a representation the detenu can rely on his second right and, if he likes, he may ask for particulars which would enable him to make a representation. And the detaining authority that has conveyed the grounds can furnish additional facts after he has supplied the grounds so as to enable the detenu to make a proper representation. And to that extent, according to the Supreme Court, the views of the Bombay High Court that "it is not permissible to the detaining authority to justify the detention by amplifying and improving the grounds originally furnished", and that, "the point of time Court had to consider is when the grounds were furnished and when an opportunity was given to the detenu to make a representation", were not to be considered as sound. (See State of Bombay v. Atma Ram AIR (1951) S.C. 157).

With all respect to the Supreme Court Judges who decided the above case, it is difficult to understand the legal reason that prompted them to distinguish between the two facets of the problem involved in saying that "sufficiency of grounds of detention" in so far as they contribute to the 'satisfaction' of detaining authority is not justiciable in that it is for that authority—and not for the court—to be satisfied and the issue of "grounds being sufficient to enable the detenu to make a representation against his detention" being a justiciable one. One detects a hopeless attempt in this forensic casuistry to get over the effect of the determination reached by that Court in the case of A. K. Gopalan v. The State of Madras, AIR (1950) S.C. 27, namely, that "the mere subjective satisfaction of the detaining authority" upon which the legality of preventive detention could be defended, precludes the Court from saying that the law which authorises the detention merely upon the subjective satisfaction of any authority was unconstitutional. If the 'sufficiency of grounds for detention' is not a justiciable issue, one fails to see how the same issue can be raised under the garb of regarding that sufficiency from the point of view of the "opportunity which the Constitution gives to the person detained to make a representation."

"When a thing is required to be done by law in a particular manner it has to be done in that manner or not at all" is the principle that will apply in all cases where it can be shown to the satisfaction of the superior court that the detention has been directed otherwise than in accordance with law. (See the cases of (1) Asha Ram v. State, AIR (1950)

Allahabad 709; (2) Machindar Shivaji v. The King, AIR (1950) F.C. 129; (3) Shamrao v. District Magistrate, Thana, AIR (1952) S.C. 324.

It must be carefully noted that what is to be communicated to the detenu are grounds of his detention and these must be distinguished from the mere data or evidence upon which those grounds are themselves based. The detaining authority is thus not to convey, for instance, the source of his information or the actual information received by him concerning the detenu's present or projected activities (T. V. Narasimhamurty v. The State, AIR (1951) Orissa 251). The essential question in all such cases is whether such grounds as have been communicated, if true, would warrant the action by the detaining authority. Of course the 'satisfaction' of detaining authority itself being incapable of being objectively tested (that is, of being tested on the footing of any objective standard that could be improvised) is hardly a matter that can be invoked in the determination of cases involving interpretation of the word 'satisfaction', which often is to be found in the Public Safety laws. The courts of law will not ordinarily sit as courts of appeal from what is manifestly an issue of fact, namely, whether or not the detaining authority was at all satisfied on the basis of the grounds of detention mentioned in the memorandum they have conveyed to the detenu. (See State of Bombay v. Atma Ram, AIR (1951) S.C. 157). Undoubtedly, the satisfaction of the detaining authority is a condition precedent before such authority can exercise the power to detain, but all the same, except where allegations of mala fides have been made and substantiated, it is not ordinarily possible to go behind the order passed by such authority in which he affirms that he has been satisfied that circumstances exist that warrant the action that a particular person be detained.

If the grounds are vague they may incline the court to hold that, in fact, there was no such satisfaction, but then, the vagueness of the grounds in such a case can only be determined by the perusal of the order itself which contains the grounds conveyed to the detenu. If the object of requiring the grounds to be communicated to the detenu be to enable him to make a representation it must follow that the grounds to be stated ought to be drawn up with sufficient degree of precision and particularity that they would, in the opinion of the Court, constitute adequate information or notice to the detenu for making an effective representation. (See Ram Krishan v. State of Delhi, AIR (1953) S.C. 318). It is no defence in such proceedings by the detaining authority to plead that the detenu could have applied for clarification of the grounds conveyed to him; for upon the court reaching the conclusion that the grounds have as a matter of fact been vaguely stated, the detention automatically becomes in the eye of law illegal and his order cannot be allowed to deprive a person of his liberty any further (Durgadas v. Rex, AIR (1949) Allahabad 148 (FB)). Similarly, it has also been held in this very case that any attempt by the Government to supply further particulars after the detenu has raised the contention in a court of law with regard to the vagueness of the grounds furnished to him is not to be encouraged and would not save the detention from being considered as illegal. When a number of grounds are mentioned in the communication addressed to the detenu, if it should turn out that any one of those grounds is vague the detention would be, as from that date, deemed to be illegal for the reason that a representation cannot then be effectively made by a detenu to rebut those grounds that are made the basis of his order, and the possibility of the Advisory Board or the court being prejudicially influenced by the absence of explanation in regard to any ground which is vaguely worded cannot be ruled out (See Ram Krishan v. State of Delhi, AIR (1953) S.C. 318).

Sufficiency of the grounds, as has been remarked earlier, cannot be enquired into by a court of law, but their relevance and the manner of their formulation in the notice served on the detenu can be gone into for the purpose of seeing whether or not an honest attempt has been made to comply with the requirements of law relating to preventive detention. (See A. K. Gopalan v. The State of Madras, (1950) S.C. 27; Machindar Shivaji v. The King, AIR (1950) F.C. 129; State of Bombay v. Atma Ram, AIR (1951) S.C. 157).

Whether or not the grounds have been communicated "as soon as may be" being a question of fact, it is for the court of law before which that question comes to be raised to say, on the facts and circumstances of such case, whether an unreasonable amount of delay has intervened between the date on which the detenu has been detained and the date on which the grounds have been communicated. (Ujagar Singh v. The State of Punjab, AIR (1952) S.C. 350). In short, if the court of law comes to the conclusion that the detaining authority has done something to side-track the intention of the law (which is to afford to the detenu an opportunity with reasonable practicable speed to make a representation against the orders of his detention) it would not hesitate to declare detention illegal and order the release of the detenu. Any unnecessary obscurity on the part of the detaining authority in stating the grounds of the order would be construed as an attempt to side-track the intention of the law which expressly provides for enabling the detenu to make a representation against his detention and is bound to incline the court to declare his detention illegal (See State of Bombay v. Atma Ram, AIR (1951) S.C. 157).

150. Comment on ART. 6—Prohibition against Ex post facto penal laws

ART. 6 of our Constitution prohibits what in the language of American jurisprudence is known as the making of ex post facto laws. It also prevents the State from subjecting any person to a punishment greater than that prescribed by law for an offence at the time when the offence was committed.

It should be the requirement of any system of civilised law that retrospective effect ought not to be given to penal legislation. Normally, the State acting through its legislatures has the power to make laws having retrospective operation. The effect of the present Article is to confine the sphere of retrospective legislation only to non-penal laws. Any law which makes of certain acts and omissions a crime or an offence punishable as such, would offend against the prohibition contained in ART. 6 and would to that extent be void, if it is shown to have been enacted after the acts and omissions in question took place.

The Constitution of Brazil (September 24, 1946) has guaranteed that no ex post facto laws would be passed in terms that can hardly be improved upon:

"ART. 141. The Constitution assures Brazilians and foreigners residing in the country the inviolability of the rights respecting life, liberty, individual security, and property in the following terms:

- (1)
- (2) No one may be obliged to do or refrain from doing anything except by virtue of law.
- (3) The law shall not prejudice any vested right, any juridical act accomplished, or any adjudicated matter.
- (4) The law shall not exclude any injury to individual rights from consideration by the judicial power."

And in clause (29) it has been provided:

"Penal law shall determine the individualization of the punishment and shall only be retroactive when it shall so benefit the accused."

In American Constitution, in ART. 1, Section 9, clause (3) it is provided:

"No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

Similarly, in section 9(1), the same Article provides:

"No State shall . . . pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law".

There is yet a third restriction contained in the Fifth Amendment of the Federal Constitution which also prohibits the making of laws that are calculated to subject a person for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb but it would be noticed that, in our Constitution, there is no such parallel rule against double jeopardy. Under the General Clauses Act, however, we have in S. 26 a provision as to the liability of an offender in respect of acts and omissions that are offences punishable under two or more enactments. The Section reads :—

"When an act or omission constitutes an offence under two or more enactments then the offender shall be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of those enactments but shall not be liable to punishment twice for the same offence."

In view of this provision an express mention against rule of double jeopardy was not at all necessary unless, of course, the intention was to raise the rule contained in S. 26 of the General Clauses Act to the status of a constitutional prohibition. Then, there is S. 403 of the Criminal Procedure Code which also prevents any person from being subjected to a second trial in case he has already been punished by a court of competent jurisdiction.

The rule against the making of ex post facto laws has been interpreted in America in the case of Calder v. Bull, (1798) 1 Law. Ed. 648, as being confined to securing a safeguard in the favour of personal security of the subject, "to protect his person from punishment by legislative Acts having a retrospective operation". The distinction between ex post facto laws and laws having retrospective operation was explained in that case by Mr. Justice Chase as follows (at p. 650) :

"I will state what laws I consider ex post facto laws, within the words and the intent of the prohibition. 1st. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law; and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punishes such action. 2nd. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was, when committed. 3rd. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment, than the law annexed to the crime, when committed. 4th. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less, or different, testimony, than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender. All these, and similar laws, are manifestly unjust and oppressive. In my opinion, the true distinction is between ex post facto laws, and retrospective laws. Every ex post facto law must necessarily be retrospective; but every retrospective law is not an ex post facto law: The former, only, are prohibited. Every law that takes away, or impairs, rights vested, agreeably to existing laws, is retrospective, and is generally unjust, and may be oppressive; and it is a good general rule, that a law should have no retrospect: but there are cases in which laws may justly, and for the benefit of the community, and also of individuals, relate to a time antecedent to their commencement; as statutes of oblivion, or of pardon. They are certainly retrospective, and literally both concerning, and after, the facts committed. But I do not consider any law ex post facto, within the prohibition, that mollifies the rigor of the criminal law; but only those that create, or aggravate, the crime; or increase the punishment, or change the rules of evidence, for the purpose of conviction. Every law that is to have an operation before the making thereof, as to commence at an antecedent time; or to save time from the statute of limitations; or to excuse acts which were unlawful, and before committed, and the like; is retrospective. But such laws may be proper or necessary, as the case may be. There is a great and apparent difference between making an unlawful act lawful; and the making an innocent action criminal, and punishing it as a crime. The expressions "ex post facto laws," are technical, they had been in use long before the Revolution, and had acquired an appropriate meaning, by legislators, lawyers, and authors. The celebrated and judicious Sir William Blackstone in his commentaries, considers an ex post facto law precisely in the same light I have done. His opinion is confirmed by his successor, Mr Wooddeson; and by the author of the Federalist, who I esteem superior to both, for his extensive and accurate knowledge of the true principles of government."

Even in England the rule of construction in respect of any substantive law is that it is presumed to be prospective. It is only in respect of procedural or adjectival laws that the presumption is that they are retrospective and this, on the theory that nobody has a vested right in procedure and can be heard to say that any procedural provisions have been altered or omitted to his prejudice. (See page 220, (supra))

A Bill of Attainder is a legislative Act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. If the punishment be less than death, the Act is termed a Bill of Pains and Penalties.

Ex post facto laws, in the words of Justice Blackstone, are those laws which; "after an action, indifferent in itself, is committed, the Legislature, then, for the first time, declares it to have been a crime, and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it. Here it is impossible, that the party could foresee that an action, innocent when it was done, should be afterwards converted to guilt by a subsequent law; he had, therefore, no cause to abstain from it; and all punishment for not abstaining, must of consequence be cruel and unjust." (See Phillips v. Eyre (1870) 6 Q.B. 1. at p. 25).

The English criminal law did not recognise the maxim expressed in the Latin tag "mett a pena sine lege" i.e. there must be no punishment inflicted unless a previous law provided for it. But there can be no doubt that although the maxim was strictly speaking no part of the law of the land, it constituted a political ideal and the Judges in England converted the substance of the principle of prohibition against penal retro-active legislation into a rule of interpretation. The English court "will not ascribe retrospective force to new laws affecting rights unless by express words or necessary implication it appears that such was the intention of the legislature". (See Phillips v. Eyre (1870-1) 6 Q.B. 1). In the same case it was emphasized, "But to affirm it is naturally and necessarily unjust; to take away a vested right of action by Act subsequent is inconsistent both with the common law of England and the constant practice of legislation (see p. 23) In fine, allowing the general inexpediency of retrospective legislation, it cannot be pronounced naturally or necessarily unjust. There may be occasions and circumstances involving the safety of the State or even the conduct of individual subjects the justice of which, prospective laws made for ordinary occasions and the usual exigencies of society for want of precision fail to meet and in which the execution of the law as it stood at the time may involve practical public inconvenience and wrong, summum jus summum injuria. Whether the circumstances of the particular case involve matter of policy and discretion fit for debate and decision in Parliament which would have had jurisdiction to deal with the subject-matter by preliminary legislation, and as to which ordinary municipal law is not commissioned to inquire or adjudicate". (See p. 27).

It should be carefully noted that what the Constitution prohibits under ART. 6 is the creation of an offence out of acts and omissions which were committed at a time when such an offence had not been in existence. But this will not prevent the Legislature from making laws prohibiting the doing of, say, certain kinds of business, that is, laws affecting even a particular business which might have been commenced before the prohibitory legislation came into force: such a legislation cannot conceivably be construed as traving ART. 6 for the simple reason that what that Article prohibits is merely the creation of an offence by means of an ex post facto legislation out of acts and omissions that have been countenanced before the coming into force of such an ex post facto legislation. Similarly, if the prosecution for an offence could not be commenced without the happening of a condition precedent, as when a "sanction to prosecute" an offender is required by the provisions of some law, the passing of a law which has the effect in it of dispensing with the necessity of complying with such a requirement would not offend against ART. 6—and this for the simple reason that what would be done in such a situation would not amount to the creation of an offence but only the removal of an impediment to the prosecution of an offender.

The second part of the 6th Article prohibits the legislature from enhancing the punishment that has been previously prescribed in respect of a given offence. Whenever any such attempt is made to impose punishment which is greater than the one originally prescribed by law, the person who is affected thereby would be entitled to claim relief against such enhanced punishment. It may be a somewhat difficult question for a court to resolve if in a given case what is shown is that the quality of punishment has been changed, as for instance, in cases where punishment for a term of imprisonment is converted into a solitary confinement or an offender is subjected to whipping. The severity of the punishment cannot be judged from the view-point of the sufferer, but it will be for the court to see in each case whether a punishment greater than that prescribed by law has been inflicted. Care must be taken to distinguish the expression "a punishment greater than that prescribed" from "a punishment different than that prescribed." It is only the former which is within the prohibition contained in ART. 6.

CHAPTER VI
INDIVIDUAL AND THE STATE
(CONSTITUTIONAL REMEDIES)

INDIVIDUAL AND THE STATE—CONSTITUTIONAL REMEDIES

151. Introductory statement—Arts. 22 & 170

ART. 22 of our Constitution has virtually made the Supreme Court of our country the custodian of peoples' fundamental rights guaranteed in Part II, and has made the very right to move the Supreme Court by means of appropriate proceedings commenced for the enforcement of these rights, itself a fundamental right. Any legislation that directly or indirectly takes away this right would, to the extent of its derogation, be void.

Normally, the subject matter of ART. 22 should have been dealt with in the chapter relating to the 'Nature, Structure and Reach of Judicial Power' where jurisdictional aspects of the authority of the Supreme Court have been dealt with, but in the opinion of the present writer it is more in keeping with the scheme of the present work that analysis of the present Article should be separately presented as an independent subject-matter along with a treatment of the powers of the High Courts under ART. 170 of our Constitution. After all, we cannot be oblivious of the fact that, although right to these remedies under ART. 22 is, itself, a fundamental right of considerable constitutional significance, the constitutional remedies sanctioned by ART. 170 are equally important and deserve our careful attention and consideration when we are studying the principle of ART. 22.

Our ART. 22 corresponds to ART. 32 of the Indian Constitution even as our ART. 170, which defines the jurisdiction of the High Court in relation to its power to issue prerogative writs, corresponds to ART. 226 of the Indian Constitution. In fact, the language used in these Articles is practically the same in both the Constitutions. The jurisdiction affirmed by these Articles, is analogous to the one which the Court of the Queen's Bench Division exercises in England, that is, the jurisdiction which is described as "Proceedings on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench Division". Before the First of January, 1939, the means by which this jurisdiction was exercised were "Prerogative Writs", so called because under the Common Law of England, King being regarded as a source or fountain of justice, the resort by the Judges of the Court of the Queen's Bench to give effect to extra-ordinary remedial measures and processes was justified in the name of the Sovereign who was always present in the contemplation of Law. Now the same jurisdiction is conferred by statute on the High Court. (See Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938). Sections 7, 8, and 9 of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938, are as follows :

"7.—(1) The prerogative writs of mandamus, prohibition and certiorari shall no longer be issued by the High Court.

(2) In any case where the High Court would, but for the provisions of the last foregoing subsection, have had jurisdiction to order the issue of a writ of mandamus requiring any act to be done, or a writ of prohibition prohibiting any proceedings or matter, or a writ of certiorari removing any proceedings or matter into the High Court or any division thereof for any purpose, the Court may make an order requiring the act to be done, or prohibiting or removing the proceedings or matter, as the case may be.

(3) The said orders shall be called respectively an order of mandamus, an order of prohibition and an order of certiorari.

(4) No return shall be made to any such order and no pleadings in prohibition shall be allowed, but the order shall be final, subject to any right of appeal therefrom.

Justice is the earnest and constant will to render to every man his due.

Institutes of Justinian, 533 A.D.

I know of no duty of the Court which is more important to observe and no power of the Court which is more important to enforce than its power of keeping public bodies within their rights. The moment public bodies exceed their rights they do so to the injury and oppression of private individuals, and those persons are entitled to be protected from injury arising from such operations of public bodies.

per Justice Lindley
(in Roberts v. Gwyrfa District Council, 1899.)

A country whose administration of justice did not afford redress in a case of the present description would not be in a state of civilization.

per Night Bruce, L. J.
(in Slim v. Croacher, 45 E.R. 462;)
2 L.T. 103.

What is the argument on the other side? Only this that no case has been found in which it has been done before. The argument does not appeal to me in the least. If we never do anything which has not been done before we shall never get anywhere. The law will stand still while the rest of the world goes on; and that would be bad for both.

per Denning, L. J.
(in Packer v. Packer (C.A.) 1953,)
2 All E.R. 127.

They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety.

per Benjamin Franklin
(Historical Review of Pennsylvania, 1759)

1 and 2
Geo. 6,
c.63.

(5) In any enactment references to any writ of mandamus, prohibitions or certiorari shall be construed as references to the corresponding order and references to the issue or award of any such writ shall be construed as reference to the making of the corresponding order.

8. The power of the High Court under any enactment to require justices of the peace or a judge or officer of a county court to do any act relating to the duties of their respective offices, or to require any court of summary jurisdiction or court of quarter sessions to state a case for the opinion of the Court, in any case where immediately before the commencement of this Act the Court had by virtue of any enactment jurisdiction to make a rule absolute or to make an order, as the case may be, for any of those purposes, shall be exercisable by order of mandamus.

9.—(1) Informations in the nature of quo warranto are hereby abolished.

(2) In any case where any person acts in an office in which he is not entitled to act and an information in the nature of quo warranto would, but for the provisions of the last foregoing subsection, have lain against him, the High Court may grant an injunction restraining him from so acting and may (if the case so requires) declare the office to be vacant.

(3) No proceedings for an injunction under this section shall be taken by a person who would not immediately before the commencement of this Act have been entitled to apply for an information in the nature of quo warranto.¹

Language of Article 22 is very wide.

The language used in ART. 22(2) is sufficiently wide to cover within its protective wings any case that may arise from the violation of any of the fundamental rights: the Supreme Court has not only the jurisdiction to issue writs mentioned therein but also to issue directions and orders; the writs that it can issue are not limited to the five kinds of writs that have been specifically mentioned therein but the power extends to the issuance of any other writs which are known to the common law of England and could have been issued on the date of the coming into force of our Constitution. These writs can be issued to any person or authority and in appropriate cases to any Government—which term would include the Provincial or the Federal Government.

Our Supreme Court has, in the case of Fazal Ahmad v. The State, (1956) PLD S. C. p. 306) declined to affirm that ART. 170 of our Constitution could be justifiably invoked for issuing an old, obsolete and unpractical writ of coram nobis the object of which was to secure a review of a considered decision of a High Court on grounds entirely "abstract and unpractical" in character.

Analogous Pre-Constitutional Power. S.491, Cr.P.C., and 45 of the Specific Relief Act.

It is necessary to bear in mind the scope of the power that has been reserved to the Supreme Court under ART. 22. And here it would be instructive to compare and contrast the language of S.491 of the Criminal Procedure Code and of S.45 of the Specific Relief Act where a cognate power to issue orders to public authorities has been mentioned, with the language employed in ART. 22, just to be able to appreciate the direction in which the power of the Supreme Court to issue orders, directions or writs, has been rendered more effective.

S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act as adapted in Pakistan is as follows:

"45.—Power to order public servants and others to do certain specific acts.—

The High Court of East Bengal may make an order requiring any specific act to be done or forborne, within the local limits of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction, by any person holding a public office, whether of a permanent or a temporary nature, or by any corporation or inferior Court of Judicature:

Provided—

- (a) that an application for such order be made by some person whose property, franchise or personal right would be injured by the forbearing or doing (as the case may be) of the said specific act;
- (b) that such doing or forbearing is, under any law for the time being in force, clearly incumbent on such person or Court in his or its public character, or on such corporation in its corporate character;
- (c) that in the opinion of the High Court such doing or forbearing is consonant to right and justice;
- (d) that the applicant has no other specific and adequate legal remedy; and
- (e) that the remedy given by the order applied for will be complete.

Exemptions from such power.

Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize the High Court—

- (f) to make any order binding on the Central Government or any Provincial Government;
- (g) to make any order on any other servant of the Crown, as such, merely to enforce the satisfaction of a claim upon the Crown; or
- (h) to make any order which is otherwise expressly excluded by any law for the time being in force."

It would be noticed that the power under S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act, as originally enacted, to begin with, was conferred on the 3 Presidency High Courts (Calcutta, Madras and Bombay) for being exercised within the limits of the Presidency Towns only. S. 50 of the Specific Relief Act puts a ban on the issue of writ of mandamus in the future. The High Court had also no power to issue writs of certiorari or prohibition to any body of persons exercising quasi-judicial functions in respect of land situate outside its original jurisdiction.

The power of issuing directions in the nature of habeas corpus is provided for in S. 491 Criminal Procedure Code and this power was available for being exercised to all High Courts, i.e. irrespective of the fact whether that High Court was the Presidency High Court or not.

S. 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code is in the following terms:

- "491. (1) Any High Court may, whenever it thinks fit, direct—
- (a) that a person within the limits of its appellate criminal jurisdiction be brought up before the Court to be dealt with according to law;
 - (b) that a person illegally or improperly detained in public or private custody within such limits be set at liberty;
 - (c) that a prisoner detained in any jail situate within such limits be brought before the Court to be there examined as a witness in any matter pending or to be inquired into in such Court;
 - (d) that a prisoner detained as aforesaid be brought before a Court-martial or any Commissioners for trial or to be examined touching any matter pending before such Court-martial or Commissioners respectively;
 - (e) that a prisoner within such limits be removed from one custody to another for the purpose of trial; and
 - (f) that the body of a defendant within such limits be brought in on the Sheriff's return of cepit corpus to a writ of attachment.

Section 45 of the Specific Relief Act conferred Power only on the three Presidency Courts.

Jurisdiction under S.45 is a limited one.

(2) The High Court may, from time to time, frame rules to regulate the procedure in cases under this section.

(3) Nothing in this section applies to persons detained under the Bengal State Prisoners Regulation, 1818, Madras Regulation II of 1819, or Bombay Regulation XXV of 1827, or the State Prisoners Act, 1850, or the State Prisoners Act, 1858."

Under S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act the jurisdiction conferred is clearly of a very special kind and the conditions which must pre-exist before any relief could be granted under S. 45, are the following:

(1) That the application for the order could only be made by the person whose property, franchise or personal right would be affected or jeopardised by the forbearing or doing of the act in question.

(2) That there exists an obligation upon any public officer or any corporation or any inferior court under a law for the time being in force to do such a thing or to forbear to do such an act.

(3) A finding by the High Court that the order prayed for is in consonance with right and justice.

(4) That the applicant has no other specific and adequate legal remedy for securing that which he has prayed for in his petition.

(5) That the remedy given by the order applied for will be complete in itself.

Then there are three additional limitations on the power of the High Court to act under S. 45 :—

(a) It cannot issue any order which is binding on Government.

(b) It cannot issue any order binding on any servant of the Government as such, merely to enforce the satisfaction of a claim upon the Government, or,

(c) To make any order which is otherwise expressly excluded by any law for the time being in force.

When Pakistan was established, East Bengal High Court at Dacca was constituted under G.G's High Courts (Bengal) Order, 1947, dated 11th August 1947, and its jurisdiction was defined to be the same as that which at the relevant time was being enjoyed by the High Court of Calcutta (see S. 5 of the Order), and thus, in effect, it became the only court which, until the time when S. 223-A was brought in by way of Amendment to the Government of India Act, 1935 (as adapted in Pakistan), could exercise the power under S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act. Every other High Court in Pakistan, not being the kind of the High Court for which power under S. 45 was available, could not give any relief under that section.

Pre-
Constitution
East Bengal
High Court in Pakistan alone could act under
S.45 of the Specific Relief Act.

Scope of ARTS. 22
and 170 compared with S.45,
S.R. Act.

A comparison of the terms of ARTs. 22 and 170 of our Constitution with S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act would show that the present constitutional power that has been reserved to the Supreme Court and the High Courts for the enforcement of fundamental rights, is wider in scope than the one vested by S. 45 in the Presidency High Courts. In particular, it would be noticed that the power is not confined to the issue of prerogative writs of Mandamus, Certiorari, Prohibition, Habeas Corpus, Quo Warranto, but can go much beyond the scope of such writs in proper cases. Neither the Supreme Court nor the High Court in the exercise of its constitutional jurisdiction is any more restricted by any of those statutory limitations mentioned in clauses (f), (g) and (h) of S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act. Nor again does the statutory limit of S. 45, which provides that an order under that section can be issued only when property, franchise or personal right is likely to be injured, in any sense qualifies, or limits the power of the Supreme Court or the High Court to act in appropriate cases for the enforcement of the Fundamental Rights, and what is more, in the case of the High Court in addition there is under ART. 170 the power to issue "orders, directions or writs", "for any other purpose"—an expression which would at least include the purposes enumerated in S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act.

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to issue the writs, considered from the point of view of territorial extent, is practically unlimited: it comprises of the entire territory of the two Provinces in which the two High Courts have been established and the Federal Capital. The High Courts however can exercise their powers under ART. 170 only within the territorial limits of their appellate jurisdiction. But care should be taken to remember that neither the Supreme Court nor the High Court can exercise their powers under ARTs. 22 and 170 respectively in relation to Special Areas (See ARTs 22(4) and 178).

In the case of A.K.M. Fazlul Qader Chowdhury v. Government of Pakistan, PLD (1957) Dacca, 342, the East Pakistan High Court considered the contention put forward by the Attorney-General to the effect that as the respondents impleaded in the petition were outside the territorial jurisdiction, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the request for the issue of writs under ART. 170. The respondents in the case before the East Pakistan High Court were the Government of Pakistan and Secretary to the Ministry of Law, and the relief sought was that the Electoral Act (36 of 1956) being unconstitutional the Government be restrained from giving any effect to it by way of securing the delimitation of constituencies or the preparation of electoral rolls etc. It was contended that since ART. 170 was expressly limited to conferring power upon the High Court to issue to any person or authority including in appropriate cases any Government, directions, orders and writs "throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction", the Court could not exercise that power to issue writs etc. to Government of Pakistan or to the Secretary, Ministry of Law, because they were not within the territories in which High Court of East Pakistan exercises its jurisdiction. After considering some of the Indian cases like (1) Ramesh Chandra Chatterjee v. Director-General of Observatories, AIR (1953) Calcutta 767, (2) Krishna Khandelwal v. Director of Lands, Hirings and Disposals and others, 56 C.W.N. 306, (3) Election Commission, India v. Saka Venkata Rao, AIR (1953) S.C. 210, (4) K. S. Rashid & Son v. Income-tax Investigation Commission, AIR (1954) S.C. 207, (5) A. Thangal Kunju Musaliar v. M. Venkatachalam Potti and another, PLD (1956) S.C. (India) 291, the Division Bench of the High Court came to the conclusion that the contention of the Attorney-General be accepted and the jurisdiction to issue writs to the two respondents be declined.

It is submitted with respect, that the Indian decisions had to reckon with words of limitation viz., "within those territories" occurring after the word "Government" and before the words "directions, orders, or writs etc." in ART. 226 of the Indian Constitution and as these words are conspicuous by their absence in ART. 170, the principle of the cases decided in India is not attracted to the situation created by the language of ART. 170 of our Constitution. The Court, no doubt, noticed this difference in the language between the two Articles but felt that the existence of these additional words did not materially alter the scope of ART. 226 from the one which could be affirmed in respect of ART. 170 of our Constitution, and observed (at p. 357) :

"In spite of the omission of those words, the other condition remains, namely, that the power of the High Court is to be exercised throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction, that is to say, writs issued by the court cannot run beyond the territories subject to its jurisdiction. We are unable to accede to the argument that because the cause of action, so to say, arose within this Province, this High Court can issue a writ against the respondents. The rule that cause of action attracts jurisdiction in suits is based on statutory enactment and does not apply to writs which are issued under ART. 170, which makes no reference to any cause of action or where it arises. It is impossible to uphold the contention put forward on behalf of the petitioner that by the deletion of the words 'within those territories' it was the intention to get rid of the condition of residence. If a writ is issued against a person or authority or any Government outside the territorial jurisdiction of the High Court, there is nothing to prevent such person, authority or any Government, to flout the order of the High Court as it is not amenable to its territorial jurisdiction. The Government of Pakistan is situated in Karachi and the office of the Secretary to the Government of Pakistan, Ministry of Law, is also located there. It does not follow that because the Central Government has authority all over the country, it can be said that it carries out all its normal functions throughout the country though some branches of the Central Government such as the Income Tax Department, Customs, Radio Pakistan, Posts and Telegraphs Department, etc., are located in this Province and this distinction cannot be ignored. If the Government of Pakistan or the Secretary, Ministry of Law, had its branch office in this Province, a writ against them could be issued in fit cases as they would not be outside the territorial jurisdiction of this Court. In that event, issuing a writ to any person, authority or any Government outside the territorial jurisdiction would not arise."

Territorial Extent

1957 PLD
Dacca, 342

The reasoning of the Court, it is pointed out with respect, is open to the objection that the power to issue writ to any person or authority throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises its jurisdiction is artificially being confined by it to those persons or authorities that are situate within those territories. Assuming the Government of Pakistan is to be regarded as being situate only at Karachi, by reason of the fact that its offices are at Karachi, the point of difference between the Indian formulation in ART. 226 as contrasted from the formulation in ART. 170, namely that these persons or authorities must be within those territories, has not been given their due and full effect. The idea that the Government of Pakistan would ever disobey the mandate issued by the Court having jurisdiction in respect of the cause of action that has emerged within its territorial limits is, it is pointed out with respect, not one that can be seriously taken into account. The Federal Government exercises authority in respect of Federal affairs throughout the territories of Pakistan and if, in the administration of Federal affairs, it should give some cause of action to a party he would be entitled to seek redress in respect of his grievances in all courts, within whose territorial limits that cause of action has arisen, and consequently it would be liable to be sued at the instance of such a person in the court of his choice. What is challenged is the authority of the Government to act or not to act in a certain way and if this is the whole of the subject-matter in respect of which the jurisdiction is to be exercised, it is immaterial for the purpose of application of the principle of ART. 170 that the seat of the Government is outside the territorial limits in relation to which power to issue writs is to be exercised.

Once it can be shown that fundamental rights have been invaded, the Supreme Court and the High Court will not be at a loss to find what 'directions', 'orders' or 'writs' they must issue in order to ensure that the fundamental rights of the subjects are respected by the State. In fact, in regard to the enforcement of fundamental rights, the range and sweep of the power of the Supreme Court and the High Court is enormous indeed. The power to issue writs is not restricted to the 5 prerogative writs mentioned specifically in the two Articles, and what is more, that power is not merely confined to the issue of such writs as have been mentioned, but is sufficiently wide to include the issuance of any directions, orders or writs which the Supreme Court or the High Court may deem fit. As remarked by Mukherjea J. of the Supreme Court of India, ART. 32 gives to the Supreme Court a very wide discretion in the matter of framing of writs to suit the exigencies of particular cases, and the application of a given petitioner cannot be thrown out simply because the proper writ has not been prayed for. [Charanjitlal v. Union of India, A.I.R. (1951) S.C. 41.]

Power under ART. 22 and the Enforcement of Fundamental Rights.

It is submitted that ARTs. 22 and 170 in so far as their application to the question of the enforcement of fundamental rights is concerned, would not be allowed to be encumbered by mere technicalities or suffered to be defeated by recourse to mere procedural manoeuvres. To do that would be virtually going counter to the letter and spirit of the Constitution indeed.

The expression "for any other purpose" appearing at the end of ART. 170 calls for a detailed comment, for upon the meaning that can be given to this expression must depend the extent of the jurisdiction of the High Court to issue directions, orders or writs etc. In order to be able to do so effectively it is necessary to look at the constitutional history of this power.

The constitutional predecessor of the power of our High Courts given to them in ART. 170 was S. 223-A, which had been inserted by the Government of India (Amendment) Act, 1954, but which took effect only from the 2nd of October 1955—being the date of the commencement of that Act. (See the Validation of Laws Act, 1955, S. 3). That section was in the following terms :—

"S. 223-A.—Power of High Courts—Every High Court shall have power throughout the territories in relation to which it exercises jurisdiction to issue to any person or authority including in appropriate cases any government within those territories writs including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari or any of them."

It would be seen that this power was restricted to the issue of writs only—there was no power to issue directions and orders. When under the new Constitution the provisions of this section had to be given due effect, care had to be taken to harmonise its language with that of ART. 22, which had been designed to confer special power upon the Supreme Court to issue writs, orders, directions etc. for the enforcement of any of the fundamental rights guaranteed by Part II of our Constitution. The shape that ART. 170 has acquired in the Constitution is largely due to the intention of the framers of the Constitution to preserve the jurisdiction of the High Court "notwithstanding anything in ART. 22": from this it follows that the High Court too has jurisdiction to enforce fundamental rights by means of the issue of writs, directions, orders, etc.

The expression "for any other purpose" has been, it is submitted, added out of abundant caution to avoid the possibility of construction of ART. 170 as confining the power of the High Court to the issue of writs, orders and directions only in relation to the enforcement of fundamental rights. It would have been better if the language in the ART. 170, instead of "and for any other purpose", had been "and for the enforcement of any other legal rights". But it is submitted that the only rational interpretation of ART. 170 is to construe the expression "for any other purpose" ejusdem generis with the expression "for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by Part II". And so read, the word "purpose" can only be construed to imply the purpose of enforcing any other right. The avowedly clumsy language of ART. 170 can be attributed to the tyranny of a precedent which the language of the Indian ART. 226 has exercised over the minds of the framers of our Constitution. It cannot be denied that that Article has to a considerable extent dominated the adoption of the language of ART. 170. But even ART. 226 has this unsatisfactory feature, namely of employing a somewhat loose language (in as much as it too uses the expression "and for any other purpose"), and the construction of that Article has been a subject of several, by no means unanimous, pronouncements of the various High Courts and the Supreme Court of India. In India, the present view of the scope of ART. 226 is that it confers precisely the same powers that the Indian ART. 32 does upon the Supreme Court,

Meaning of
"For any other purpose."

S. 223-A of the Govt. of India Act.

Language of Article 170 analysed.

Meaning of "Any other purpose" to be restricted to the ejusdem generis, rule.

plus the power that enables the High Court to enforce any other legal right which, having regard to the nature of the contest before the High Court, it might in its discretion, feel inclined to enforce. The expression "any other purpose", it is submitted, should be construed to refer to all purposes for which under the English Common Law the high prerogative writs are issued, that is, all kinds of writs that the Court of the King's Bench Division issues for the protection of the rights of individuals and for checking the excess or abuse of judicial or executive power. (See the observations of Dixit J. in Harendranath Sharma v. The State of Madhya Bharat, AIR (1950) M.B. 46 at p. 50, and in the Full Bench case of Anant Bhaskar v. The State of Madhya Bharat, AIR (1950) M.B. 60, see the remarks of Mehta J.).

Negatively stated, High Court cannot issue writs for any and every purpose it pleases. The foundation for the issue of writs is the right in the petitioner which has been violated and which he seeks to enforce. In the total absence of such a foundation the writ petition to the High Court is incompetent. That is also the view of the Supreme Court of India in the case of State of Orissa v. Madan Gopal, AIR (1952) S.C. 12, where Chief Justice Kania interpreted the scope of ART. 226 of the Indian Constitution as warranting the High Court to issue writs or directions only if, in its opinion, a legal right of the aggrieved party had been violated: the existence of the right, observed the Chief Justice, is the foundation of the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court. (See also the case of Aswini Kumar Ghose v. Arabinda Bose, AIR (1952) S.C. 369; and the case of Election Commission India v. Saka Venkata Rao, AIR (1953) S.C. 210 at p. 212, as also the case of Madhaorao Ramrao v. State of Madhya Bharat, AIR (1953) M.B. 257, at 261). Similarly, it was observed in the case of Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Andrew W. Mellon, (1923) 262 U.S. 447: 67 Lawyers Edition 1078 by Sutherland, J. (at p. 484).

"It is only where the rights of persons or property are involved, and when such rights can be presented under some judicial form of proceedings, that Courts of justice can interpose relief".

These remarks were made with reference to a suit but the principle of the case applies with greater force to proceedings under ART. 170 of our Constitution.

The courts of law are concerned only with legal rights, and unless an aggrieved person makes out a case that his legal rights have been infringed, he cannot ask any relief from any court. There must be an actual infringement of a right for the High Court to be able to acquire jurisdiction to deal with the situation; but whether it will actually interfere or not is a matter which depends on numerous considerations such as whether or not any other expeditious alternative remedy is available, whether the applicant has come to the court with clean hands, etc.

The Supreme Court and the High Courts have thus these paramount powers to deal with all those cases where fundamental rights have been abridged or taken away, but the exercise of those powers will always be controlled by certain well established principles and they will not be suffered to be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously.

ARTS. 22 and 170 thus bestow concurrent jurisdiction in relation to the enforcement of the fundamental rights on the Supreme Court and the High Courts. Two questions of procedure, however, arise. They are:

(1) Would the usual principle, namely that where there is a concurrent jurisdiction vested in two courts it is proper in the first instance to approach the court of inferior jurisdiction for relief before applying to the higher Court, apply in the matter of securing enforcement of fundamental rights? In other words, must a person who wishes to have his fundamental rights enforced necessarily petition the High Court first under ART. 170 before approaching the Supreme Court?

(2) Assuming that a person applies to the High Court in the first instance and is not able to get the relief he wants, is he to take the matter by way of appeal to the Supreme

ARTS. 22 &
170 confer
Concurrent Jurisdiction in respect of the enforcement
of Fundamental Rights.

Court or can he directly apply to the Supreme Court in the exercise of his fundamental right under ART. 22 and invoke its primary jurisdiction?

Our Supreme Court in the exercise of its rule-making power has not indicated the precise answers that must be given to these questions. For instance, in Part III, Order XXV, Rules 1 and 6 of the Supreme Court Rules, 1956, prescribe the procedure in accordance with which, applications for writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, certiorari and quo warrantum etc. have to be made. It is provided that the person making application for all or any of the writs shall also state whether the applicant has moved the High Court for the same relief and, if so, with what result. There is no requirement in the rules that a person must apply to the High Court in the first instance or that he is bound to apply only by way of appeal to the Supreme Court in case his motion is not entertained by the High Court.

It would thus appear that there is an independent Constitutional right to approach the Supreme Court under ART. 22, regardless of the existence of a procedural right that a person may have to approach the High Court direct. It has been held in India, in the case of In re Prohalad Krishna, AIR (1951) Bombay 25, that notwithstanding the rejection by the High Court of the prayer for the enforcement of fundamental rights, a person aggrieved is entitled to approach the Supreme Court in the exercise of his constitutional right under ART. 32 and the Supreme Court can entertain the petition in the exercise of its primary jurisdiction. The Supreme Court of India, however, has not, as yet expressed itself on this question, and there are some dicta in the case of Janardhan Reddy v. State of Hyderabad, AIR (1951) S.C. 217, as even in Aswini Kumar Ghose v. Arabinda Bose, AIR (1952) S.C. 369, referred to earlier, which tend to show that the question, whether in the event of a relief relating to fundamental right that has been declined by the High Court, a direct application is maintainable before the Supreme Court under ART. 32 has been expressly reserved. But the Supreme Court of India, in the case of M. K. Gopalan v. State of Madhya Pradesh, AIR (1954) S.C. 362, has deprecated the practice of a direct approach to it under ART. 32, except when there are good reasons for so doing. In this case the petitioner having failed to get the relief under ART. 226 had approached the Supreme Court under ART. 32 and not by way of appeal. The Supreme Court heard this petition but observed that it would not encourage direct approach except for good reasons in matters which have been taken to the High Court and found against, without first obtaining leave to appeal therefrom.

It must be realised that whereas the right to constitutional remedy under ART. 22 is itself a fundamental right, the right to constitutional remedy under ART. 170 has not been declared as a fundamental right and the Supreme Court cannot, in principle, refuse to entertain an application under ART. 22 made to it for the enforcement of fundamental right either direct in the first instance or after the relief asked for by an aggrieved person under Art. 170 has been declined by the High Court. All it can legitimately insist upon is compliance with the direction contained in the Rules that information be made available to it upon the question whether any petition direct has been made to the High Court, and if so, then with what result. The order of the High Court disposing of a direct petition to it would be of assistance to the Supreme Court and it is proper that it should be made available to that court at the time it is moved under ART. 22 to enforce a given petitioner's Fundamental Rights. In the case of a High Court it should be remembered that the exercise of jurisdiction to enforce fundamental rights under ART. 170 involves (despite the doctrine that words "shall have power" in suitable cases imply a duty), the exercise of its own discretion, but this cannot be said to be true in respect of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The latter court has a jurisdiction which a subject can as of right invoke in the exercise of his fundamental right under ART. 22. For instance, the jurisdiction of the High Court to act under ART. 170 to a considerable extent is controlled by considerations such as the existence of an alternative

Supreme Court Rules,
1956.

Is there a right vested in a subject to ask for the enforcement of the Constitutional mandates?

remedy etc. But no such consideration can be validly pleaded before the Supreme Court; once it is shown that a right guaranteed by Part II of the Constitution has been abridged or taken away, the Supreme Court has no option but to enforce it under ART. 22 of our Constitution. Besides all this, from the point of view of procedure, it is advantageous to apply to the High Court for the enforcement of fundamental rights in the first instance and this for the simple reason that whereas the High Court can, the Supreme Court cannot, issue writs, orders, directions for "any other purpose". If the petitioner has also some rights other than the fundamental rights to enforce, he would find the High Court forum more appropriate for his purposes than the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court finds that no fundamental rights is proved to have been infringed, it must stay its hands and the petitioner might then have to go to the High Court to obtain relief in respect of the violation of his ordinary rights.

Has a subject of the State of Pakistan a right to insist upon the High Court to enforce a provision of the Constitution which has been violated? Is it a sufficient basis for a petitioner to say that since the Constitution has been violated the court ought to command the organ or agent charged with the duty of performing it or his duty to obey the mandate of the Constitution? Would the right to the enforcement of the Constitution not be embraced by the expression "for any other purpose" appearing in ART. 170 of the Constitution. (See Ahmed Saeed Kirmani's case at p. 152 supra)

These appear to be vital questions to which answers have yet to be given by our courts.

152. The Nature of Writ Jurisdiction

Writ jurisdiction for want of better expression should be characterised as "constitutional" jurisdiction so as to distinguish it from any other form of proceedings known to our courts of law. In the first place, it should be distinguished from a suit which is the form that an action normally takes when instituted in the ordinary courts of civil jurisdiction; and in the second place, it should be distinguished from "civil" and "criminal" proceedings of which several of our statutory enactments speak.

The observations of various judges of the Indian and Pakistan High Courts who have characterised writ jurisdiction as being in the nature of either "civil" or "criminal" proceedings have reference to the question of determining the appropriate provision of the Constitution under which the matter by way of appeal can be taken to the Supreme Court [see, for instance the case of Collector of Monghyr v. Mahargja Pratap Singh, AIR (1957) Patna 102]. Such a question is also important for the purpose of determining the question of costs to be paid by the defeated party. In the latter mode of regarding the situation, for instance, a writ of certiorari arising out of criminal proceedings, that is proceedings of a criminal nature instituted before inferior tribunal, would itself be deemed to be a criminal proceedings. So also a writ of habeas corpus arising out of a sentence passed by a criminal court would become, for the purposes of determining the question of costs, a criminal matter. But both of these species of writs, if issued in connection with adjudications by inferior tribunals upon the civil rights of the parties agitated in civil proceedings, would themselves be characterised as "civil" proceedings.

Nor, again, is writ jurisdiction a "proceedings" stricto sensu. This question came up for consideration in connection with a writ petition lodged in the Calcutta High Court against adjudication made by the Collector under the Sea Customs Act. The objection to the jurisdiction of the High Court under ART. 226 was taken on the premises of S. 198 of the Sea Customs Act which provides:

Can the exercise of writ jurisdiction be regarded as a "proceeding"

"No proceeding other than a suit shall be commenced against any person for anything purporting to be done in pursuance of this Act without giving to such person a month's previous notice in writing of the intended proceeding and of the cause thereof; or after the expiration of three months from the accrual of such cause".

It was first contended that no notice of the kind mentioned in the section having been given, no proceeding could be validly commenced and therefore the writ jurisdiction could not be successfully invoked as that jurisdiction necessarily involved the taking of a proceeding. Repelling this contention, Harries C. J., in the case of Assistant Collector of Customs v. Soorajmull Nagarmull and others, AIR (1952) Calcutta 656, observed at p. 662 as follows:

"English courts have held that applications for prerogative writs are not 'proceedings' within the meaning of that word as used in the Public Authorities Protection Act. In the case of Rex v. Port of London Authority; Ex Parte Kynoch, Ltd., (1919) 1 KB 176, the question arose as to whether an application for a prerogative writ was a proceeding within the meaning of the word as used in the Public Authorities Protection Act. Bankes, L. J. at page 186 observed:

"As to the effect of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, I express no confident opinion without further considering the dicta cited, but my present impression is that the language of that Act does not extend to proceedings of this class. The essence of the prerogative writ of mandamus is a command to a tribunal to do something which it has omitted or refused to do, and an application for the writ is not an action, prosecution, or other proceeding for any act done in pursuance of execution or intended execution, nor, as I think, for any neglect or default in the execution, of any Act of Parliament or public duty or authority".

"Warrington L. J. appears to have agreed with that view. Scrutton L. J. observed:

"As to the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, the writ of mandamus, like that of certiorari and prohibition, is a high prerogative writ, and, a very valuable right in the Crown for keeping subordinate tribunals within their jurisdiction. Clear words are necessary to impair such a right, and the words of this Act, 'action, prosecution, or other proceedings against any person', are no such clear words as to have that effect. There is less inconvenience in coming to this decision because the Court has always a discretion to refuse the writ of mandamus after an undue lapse of time."

"The same view was taken by a Divisional Court consisting of Lord Hewart, C.J. and Avory and Swift JJ., in the case of Rex v. London County Council (1929), 141 LT 590 in which they held that an application for certiorari was not a proceeding within the meaning of that word as used in the Public Authorities Protection Act. At page 591 Lord Hewart C. J. observed :

"We have come to the conclusion that the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 does not extend to certiorari. Our attention has been directed to a number of cases in which observations have been made upon this point and particularly to Rex v. Port of London Authority; Ex Parte Kynoch Limited, (1919) 1 KB 176; Rex v. Marshland Smeth and Fen District Commrs. (1920), 1 KB 155; Rex v. Kensington Income Tax Commissioners, (1913) 3 KB 870; Rex v. Carter, (1904) 68 J P 466; Roberts v. Battersea, Metropolitan Borough, (1914), 110 L T 566; 'Rex v. Hereford Union, Ex Parte Pollard', (1914), 111 L T 716.. No doubt the observations in these cases are in some degree of the nature of obiter dicta. But all the dicta point in one direction, and though there appear to be passages in text-books which indicate a contrary view, I am satisfied that the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 which provides by S. 1, that an 'action, prosecution or other proceeding' against a public authority must be begun within six months after the act complained of does not extend so as to include 'certiorari' in the word 'proceeding'."

Assistant Collector of Customs v. Soorajmull quoted.

"On the other hand, the learned Solicitor-General relied on a decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council Annie Besant v. Advocate General of Madras, 43 Mad. 146 (PC), where the question arose whether the words 'criminal proceeding' excluded high prerogative writs. Their Lordships had to consider whether S. 22 of the Indian Press Act, 1910 excluded an application for a high prerogative writ to the High Court of Madras. The section was in these terms:

'Every declaration of forfeiture purporting to be made under this Act shall, against all persons, be conclusive evidence that the forfeiture therein referred to has taken place, and no proceeding purporting to be taken under this Act shall be called in question by any Court, except the High Court on such application as aforesaid and no civil or criminal proceeding, except as provided by this Act, shall be instituted against any person for anything done or in good faith intended to be done under this Act'.

"Lord Phillimore who delivered the judgment of the Board observed at page 160 as follows :

'As to this section it was contended on behalf of the appellant that as the writ of certiorari was not in terms said to be taken away, the right to it remained notwithstanding the very express but still general words of this section.'

However that might be, according to English Law, where there is no such revision procedure as in India, their Lordships see no reason for narrowing the express words of the Indian Act. Certiorari, according to the English rule, is only to be granted where no other suitable remedy exists. If the order of the magistrate were a judicial order, it would have been made in the exercise either of his civil or of his criminal jurisdiction, and procedure by way of revision would have been open.

Even were it to be said that the order was of that quasi-judicial kind to which certiorari has sometimes been applied in England or in India, the Press Act may quite reasonably have intended to take it away, and there is no reason why full effect should not be given to its language.

It was contended in the High Court and before this Board, that it was beyond the competency of the Indian Legislature to enact section 22 and possibly even to enact the Press Act. This argument which was mainly founded upon the language of Norman J., in 'In re 'Ameer Khan' (1870), 6 Beng. L. R. 392 at p. 451, received some encouragement from the Officiating Chief Justice. But their Lordships find themselves unable to appreciate it.'

"There can be no doubt that this case does support the contention of the appellants. But it must be remembered that when that case was decided there was no written Constitution in India and there was nothing to prevent the legislature taking away the right to apply for a prerogative writ. As Lord Phillimore observed, they could not appreciate an argument to the contrary.

"The circumstances however are different today. The right to apply to the High Court for a prerogative writ is given by Art. 226 of the Constitution, and it appears to me that that right cannot be taken away by any statute because if it was, the courts would be bound to hold such a statute to be ultra vires Art. 226. Further, it might well be contended that no statute could impose any restriction on the right to ask the High Court for a prerogative writ. The right to apply for high prerogative writs is now granted by the Constitution and the position in India today is stronger than the position in England where the law of that country gives the right to apply for a high

"prerogative writ though such can be repealed or altered by Parliament. In England, however, it has always been held that to take away the right to a certiorari, express words must be used, as was held in the cases to which I have already referred and it may well be that if the right to apply for a certiorari can be taken away at all, the English rule should now be applied to India having regard to the changed circumstances. In Besant's case, 43 Mad 146 PC, the right to a prerogative writ was not expressly given in a written constitution and their Lordships held that the right could be taken away by a statute though no express words to that effect were used. I think the decision might well have been different had the right to a certiorari been expressly granted by the terms of a written constitution. In any event, it appears to me that to curb or fetter that right or to restrict it would be contrary to Art. 226 and might be held to be ultra vires that Article. However, the courts might consider whether or not they should issue a writ if no notice of the intended proceedings had been given. That however would be a matter of discretion dependent upon the facts of the case. This point is not free from difficulty, but on the whole I am inclined to hold that S. 198 is not a bar to these proceedings."

It is submitted with respect that on the premisses of the above reasoning it would not be incorrect to categorise the exercise of writ jurisdiction under an altogether different nomenclature—and the one suggested here is "constitutional jurisdiction"—different from the one that is commonly applied to forms of action with which under the Codes of Civil and Criminal Procedure we are familiar in this country.

Being a constitutional jurisdiction, the writ jurisdiction is paramount and every form of limitation which normally fetters the exercise of other remedies, as they are reflected in the pre-existing state of law of our country, does not in any manner control or delimit its scope.

In a case reported in PLD (1955) Lahore 215 (Lal Khan v. The Crown), the Full Bench of the late Lahore High Court ruled that exercise of the writ jurisdiction under S. 223-A of the Government of India Act (a Section, which, as has been pointed out earlier, may be regarded as the constitutional predecessor of ART. 170), was of a high and transcendental character and any limiting provisions contained in any law before the enactment of S. 223-A must yield place to the constitutional provision and would, on that account, be deemed to be of no effect thereafter. This was a case which involved the interpretation of the combined effect of S. 10(1) of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance, 1944, (No. 3 of 1944) which had expressly taken away the jurisdiction of the High Court to make orders under S. 491 of the Code of Criminal Procedure "in respect of any orders made under or having the effect under this Ordinance." The learned Chief Justice, Rahman, relying on "the well settled proposition that an Act which contained a provision offending against the constitutional provision would be ultra vires" gave full effect to the argument that any repugnancy between the constitutional provision and the provision of any non-constitutional law would have to be resolved in favour of the prevailing power of the constitutional provision. In his words, "The limiting provisions of S. 10 of the Ordinance that existed at the time of the enactment of S. 223-A of the Constitution Act, in so far as they are repugnant to S. 223-A, stand abrogated and can no longer be given effect to". This view of the law was affirmed in a later Full Bench case Haji Mehrban Ahmad v. Commissioner, Rawalpindi Division, PLD (1955) Lahore 263. It must however be remembered that both of these decisions were rendered before the passing of the Validation Laws Act which restored life to S. 223-A with effect from 2nd of October 1955, that Section having been declared inoperative in the case of Federation of Pakistan v. Moulvi Tamizuddin Khan, PLD (1955) F.C. 240 by the Federal Court of Pakistan on the ground that it was not a valid piece of legislation

Writ-Jurisdiction is "Paramount"

The scope of interference in the exercise of writ-jurisdiction is wider than that warranted by ordinary remedies.

Writ-Jurisdiction A Summing-up.

in view of the fact that the Governor General had not assented to its being enacted as the law under S. 6 of the Indian Independence Act, 1947. Therefore, technically considered, these decisions have not the force in them of a "precedent". But notwithstanding all that, the reasoning contained therein is of considerable assistance in the determination of the present question.

Nor again would it be correct to say that the writ jurisdiction merely provides a speedy and effective remedy in respect of the enforcement of rights which have been conferred by the pre-existing state of the law only to the extent to which pre-existing remedies could have been invoked in the ordinary way to enforce those rights in the courts of law. In one sense ART. 170 no doubt embodies a procedural power. But there are some procedural rights that are not merely of procedural character but their content is something more than those of the mere procedural rights; as for instance is the right of appeal [see Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Irving, (1905) A.C. 369]. There would be certain grounds upon which the High Court in the exercise of its writ jurisdiction would be entitled to interfere although it would not be able to do so by resort to the content of its normal power assigned to it under the state of the pre-existing ordinary law. For example, no suit or any other form of proceeding, would ordinarily have lain in the civil courts, for questioning the orders, decrees or adjudications made by inferior tribunals created by special Acts on the ground that they exhibited error apparent on the face of the record or that in the exercise of their jurisdiction they have misconstrued a provision of law or violated some fundamental requirements of judicial procedure. But, nevertheless, by means of certiorari writ, the scope of enquiry in such cases by the High Court has been widened and now it will be possible for High Courts to give relief in respect of complaints made by aggrieved persons as to the misconstruction of law or misapplication of law by the inferior bodies or tribunals, provided of course other circumstances do not hamper such an interference. Writ jurisdiction is therefore not strictly confined to questioning determinations of inferior tribunals or securing compliance with forms of law and procedure to grounds under which under the pre-existing law their determinations could have been quashed or compliance with their statutory duties could have been brought about. [See also the observations of Akhlaque Husain J. in 1957. PLD. W.P. (Lahore) 487 the case of Md. Ayub vs. Government of West Pakistan at p. 493].

The writ jurisdiction being transcendent in character is of an extensive remedial potency: but on this account alone, its exercise by the High Courts should be resorted to in appropriate cases to maintain the rule of law and give guidance to all the authorities functioning under the Constitution or set up under any of its provisions in the matter of enforcing rights ordinary or fundamental, of persons who, by means of appropriate proceedings, are able to invoke the aid of this benign jurisdiction. It cannot be emphasised too often that although the jurisdiction of High Court to interfere under ART. 170 with the inferior tribunals is practically unfettered, the writ-jurisdiction is not intended to provide an alternate method of redress. The powers conferred by ART. 170 should be sparingly exercised in the clearest of cases involving serious infringement of a person's rights and when there are no other specific, speedy and adequate remedies available. [See Indian Sugar Mills Association v. Secretary to Government of U.P. AIR (1951) Allahabad 1 (FB); Asiatic Engineering Co. v. Achhu Ram, AIR (1951) Simla 171; Veerappa Pillai v. Raman and Raman Ltd., AIR (1952) S.C. 192; Sangram Singh v. Election Tribunal Kotah, AIR (1955) S.C. 425].

153. Are Constitutional Remedies Retrospective?

The general principle is that Constitution cannot be given retrospective effect and the validity of past transactions, that is, transactions which took place before the commencement of the Constitution, is not affected by the coming into force of the Constitution. But the question relating to the enforcement of the constitutional remedies in relation to past transactions raises some really important issues which require a careful legal appraisal.

If a person is convicted and sentenced before the coming into force of the Constitution, the sentence undoubtedly has become final. But what happens if the law, under which the person had been sentenced, after the commencement of the Constitution, becomes void, because of its inconsistency with what is contained in Part II of our Constitution? The answer to this would be that the constitutional remedies are not available to undo the effect of a sentence which has become final before the coming into force of the Constitution. [See Keshavan v. State of Bombay, (1951) S.C.R. 228; AIR (1951) S.C. 128; Janardhan Reddy v. State of Hyderabad, (1951) S.C.R. 344; AIR (1951) S.C. 217]. But if the sentence itself, although seemingly final, can be shown to have been passed under a pre-Constitution void law, the remedies under the Constitution would be available for the purpose of annulling the effect of such a sentence.

The essential thing to remember is that if there is a pre-Constitution order which is void, having regard to the state of the law as it was in force before the coming into being of the Constitution, the procedural remedies provided for by the Constitution would be available for giving relief to any person who wants to get rid of prejudicial effects of that order [see Calcutta Pinjrapole Society v. S. Banerjee, AIR (1952) Calcutta 891; as also Harendranath Sharma v. State of Madhya Bharat, AIR (1950) Madhya Bharat 46]. If a certain proceeding is ultra vires under the state of law as it existed before the coming into force of the Constitution, its existence as an obstacle in the way of the rights of a person furnishes to him a recurring cause of action and resort by him to the remedies provided for in the Constitution is perfectly in order. In fact, such a use of ART. 170 or ART. 22 is not retrospective but prospective.

In the Full Bench case of Jeshingbhai v. The Emperor, AIR (1950) Bombay 363, Chief Justice Chagla dealt with a case in which the application of constitutional remedies arose on the following facts. The order that was challenged in this case was passed by the District Magistrate of Ahmedabad to the effect that the petitioner should not remain in any area in the district of Ahmedabad except with the permission of the District Magistrate of that district. Now this was admittedly a pre-Constitution order and it was challenged by resort to ART. 226 of the Indian Constitution as being in violation of fundamental right guaranteed to the citizen under ART. 19(1) (d) and (e). It was contended by the State that the order had become final by virtue of S. 6 of the General Clauses Act. The counsel for the petitioner, on the other hand, contended that he was not so much concerned with challenging the order as it stood in the pre-Constitution period as with the assertion of a fundamental right which has come into existence after the Constitution day. And the court remarked in relation to these rival contentions as follows:

"If we are satisfied that today when we are hearing this petition, the petitioner is deprived of his fundamental right of movement and of residence, then we can undoubtedly interfere. The saving of the order under S. 6 does not mean that the State is entitled after 26th January to deprive a citizen of a fundamental right which is guaranteed to him. These fundamental rights have come into existence after 26th January. Our Constituent Assembly has provided remedies for safeguarding these rights. These rights have been made justiciable and therefore even though the operation of the order may have been saved by S. 6, General Clauses Act, as I said before, we are not so much concerned with the validity of the order as the violation of the fundamental rights which have come into existence after 26th January 1950".

The principle involved in this and several other cognate decisions may be stated as follows: There are certain orders that are validly passed under certain laws; but they are orders which themselves become void after the parent Act under which they have been passed becomes void. For instance, the life of an order directing detention of a person under the Preventive Detention Act cannot, in the absence of an interpretative clause providing to the contrary, be prolonged beyond the life of the parent Act itself. Its continuance as a valid order, in the absence of an express provision to the contrary, depends on the continuance of the Act under which it has been passed. It dies with the death of the Act under which it has been passed. And when that happens to be the case, as when the parent Act becomes void as contravening a fundamental right on the date of the coming into force of the Constitution, the order itself becomes void and in relation to such an order the cause of action accrues to a person who is affected by it and the matter can be settled by appeal to the constitutional remedies provided for in the Constitution [see kindred observations in Brahmeshwar Prasad v. State of Bihar, AIR (1950) Patna 265]. Besides the interpretation of section 6 of General Clauses Act is somewhat misconceived if it is construed to mean that it can save the operation of orders after they become void by reason of the parent Act becoming void. The language of section 6 clearly shows that what the section is calculated to preserve is merely the previous operation of such an order—but not the future operation of the enactment or order that is void.

Jeshingbhai vs. Emperor

154. Writ of Habeas Corpus

The writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum et recipiendum (that you have the body for submitting to and receiving) is undoubtedly a remedy of far reaching importance. It is a remedy which the law allows for the enforcement of the right to personal liberty.

The origin of this writ has been traced to the earliest phases of the history of "Common Law of England", and its origins are shrouded in the mist of antiquity, if not completely lost in obscurity. We are not concerned in this work with the history of the development of this writ, but the student wishing to pursue studies in this field is referred to the speeches of Lord Wright in the case of Greene v. Home Secretary, (1941) 3 All E. R. 388 at pp. 399 to 401, and of Lord Hailsham L. C. in the case of Eshugbayi vs. Government of Nigeria, (1928), A. C. p. 459, as an introduction to the study of the development of the scope of this ancient common law-writ which was designed "to secure the subject's immunity from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment save by due process of law." Their Lordships have recapitulated the history of this legal institution and shown how the later development of statutory law (like the Habeas Corpus Acts of 1640, 1679 and 1816) relating to the subject has influenced this type of common law jurisdiction. For our present purposes, it would suffice to say that the role that this writ has played in the constitutional history of England has been of immense service and importance to the growth of law in all the Commonwealth countries. [See further Holdsworth's History of English Law, Vol. I, pp. 227—228 (7th Edition) and Vol. IX (pp. 108-125).]

The position under U.S.A. Constitution.

The Constitution of the United States in the 2nd clause of the 9th Section of ART. I provides that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless, when in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it. This provision is also to be found in the several Constitutions of the States composing the United States. And the study of the case-law of that country shows that although the writ of habeas corpus is a part of the statutory law, its scope has not been construed as in any manner delimiting or diminishing the common law jurisdiction of the court to issue this writ. While the writ may not be used as a substitute for appeal, it provides a quick and expeditious remedy for securing correction of jurisdictional or constitutional errors without limit as to time. (United States v. Smith, (1947) 331 U.S. 469: 91 Law Ed. 1610, and Gusik v. Schilder, (1950) 339 U.S. 977: 94 Law Ed. 1382).

The object of the writ is to secure the liberty of the subject by means of a summary adjudication of the legality of his detention. It is immaterial whether the person applying has been detained in private or public custody. The writ is available in all cases where any illegal and improper deprivation of personal liberty of the subject has taken place.

Viscount Maugham in the case of Greene v. Home Secretary (1941) 3 All E. R. 388 has set forth the scope of this writ as follows:

"My Lords, I am certain that this House would be very unwilling to curtail or diminish the rights of an applicant for a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, but we are, of course, sitting in a judicial capacity, and are bound by the law as it exists. It is inaccurate to say, as some have said, that the writ is applicable as a remedy in all cases of wrongful deprivation of personal liberty. What the judges of the High Court can do at the instance of the imprisoned person is to command the production of the person and to inquire into the cause of his imprisonment. If there is no legal justification for the detention, the party is ordered to be released. However, there are many cases, and in particular those of a criminal, or supposed criminal, character, in which a return to the writ (to use the old-fashioned phrase) cannot be traversed or impeached by affidavit: Carus Wilson's case, (1845) 7 Q.B. 984; 16 Digest 260, 650; 14 L.J.Q.B. 105, 201; 4 L.T.O.S. 311, 353, 373; 5 L.T.O.S. 52, Ex p. Lees (1858), E.B. & E. 828; 16 Digest 251, 517; 31 L.T.O.S. 247; sub nom. R. v. Lees, 27, L.J.Q.B. 403 and Re Newton (1855), 16 C.B. 97; 16 Digest 254, 550; 24 L.J.C.P. 148; 25 L.T.O.S. 99. On the other hand, in cases other than for some criminal, or supposed criminal, matter, and except cases of imprisonment for debt or by process in any civil suit, the judge is empowered by the Habeas Corpus Act, 1816, s. 3, although the return to the writ be sufficient in law, to examine into the truth of the facts therein set-forth by affidavit or by affirmation, and, if the truth of the facts returned appears to him doubtful, he may bail the party and transmit the writ, return, etc., to the court of which he is a judge, whereupon:

... it shall be lawful for the said court to proceed to examine into the truth of the facts set-forth in the return, in a summary way by affidavit . . . and to order and determine touching the discharging . . ."

It would be noticed that Viscount Maugham is giving effect to the procedural provisions of section 3 of the Habeas Corpus Act of 1816 which says that the Judge in certain cases is empowered, although the return to the writ be sufficient in law, to inquire into the truth of the facts therein set-forth by affidavit or by affirmation.

In a case where the writ with the return on its face is found to be legal and there is no question that it relates to a person who has actually been detained, the scope of enquiry by the court gets narrowed down to answering one and one question only, namely whether or not the power has been exercised bona fide by the authority who has directed the detention or imprisonment of the person applying for a writ of habeas corpus. The facts leading to this finding of fact must be related by the detenu and the court must be invited to determine whether or not a proper exercise of power to detain has taken place. The remedy by way of writ of habeas corpus must not be allowed to be encumbered by technicalities, and even in the days in which technicalities were generally favoured, this particular remedy, in the words of Lord Wright, "was kept as 'simple and expeditious' as possible". And in these more practicable times the need to do so is all the greater.

Lord Wright in the case referred to above stated the scope of the enquiry on facts which is admissible to courts of law in the following words:—

" . . . The only possible enquiry of facts, once the authenticity of the order and its application to the appellant are conceded or established, is as to whether the Home Secretary had in his own mind what appeared to his mind to be reasonable cause. It is true that, in the words of Lord Bowen, 'the state of a man's mind is as much a fact as the state of his digestion'. If the Home Secretary were to misrepresent the state of his mind, that would be fraud, but that is out of the question here, and need not be considered.

"It would be superfluous to point out that the basis of the conclusion here adopted is that the order and statement are good on their face—that is, that they show a competent exercise of a lawful authority. If an order or warrant is bad on its face, it can give no legal justification for the imprisonment."

The writ of habeas corpus has now been given a constitutional status in our Constitution and when asked for in relation to the enforcement of fundamental rights, it would be regarded by the Supreme Court, as even by the High Court, as a writ of right. In England, too, it is regarded as a writ of right but not of course. In the United States it is regarded as an extraordinary legal remedy and when properly issued it supersedes all other writs (Peo v. Zimer 252 I.L.L. 9 and 13) and in times of peace "every human power must give way to it and no prison door is stout enough to stand in its way." (See State ex el Evans v. Boaddus, 245 Mo. 123, 140, 149, SW. 473). It is a writ of remedial nature and its only purpose is to secure the release of the person who has been illegally and improperly detained.

But it cannot be applied for after the illegal detention has ceased. [See the case of Barnado v. Ford Gossage's case (1822) A.C. 326; and Rex. v. Crewe (1910) 2 K.B. 576].

Scope of the writ under
S. 491.
Cr. P.C.

The Privy Council in the case of C. P. Matthen v. The District Magistrate of Trivandrum A.I.R. (1939) P.C. 213, observed that the High Courts in India could only act under the provisions of S. 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code for issuing directions in the nature of habeas corpus and that they had no power to issue the common law writ of habeas corpus in matters covered and contemplated by that section.

Now S. 491 which uses the words "Whoever is improperly or illegally detained" very clearly shows that it is open to the High Court not merely to determine the legality of the order depriving a person of his personal liberty but also its propriety. The latter is a question of fact and can only be answered by appeal to evidence.

Thus the resulting position, with regard to the scope of a writ of habeas corpus, as it is visualised by ARTS. 22 and 170, is practically the same whether we adopt the rule of English law on this subject as prevailing in England at the time the Constitution came into force or we apply the principles that have governed the interpretation of S. 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code in the pre-Constitution days. The English Habeas Corpus Act of 1816, as has been stated earlier, itself, in several ways, has relaxed the rigour of the common law restrictions relating to writ of habeas corpus and the existing legal position in England is different from what strictly it would be if the Habeas Corpus Act, 1816, had not intervened.

It is true that the courts in the exercise of their jurisdiction to issue writs of habeas corpus will not go into questions relating to legality or otherwise of a conviction recorded by a court of law and would be contented to limit these powers of interference to merely scrutinising the warrant of imprisonment in the light of what appears on its face. But instances such as these are however only exceptions to the rule of common law engrafted in England by a statute (see S. 2 Habeas Corpus Act, 1679, see also Ex Parte Lees (102) E. Reports p. 718 (1858) E. B. & E 828, where Lord Campbell, C. J., refused the writ of certiorari or error to issue to the Supreme Court of St. Helena to bring before the Queen's Bench in England the record of a case alleged to be erroneous. As to the propriety of issuing a writ of Habeas Corpus, His Lordship remarked, "It is not grantable in general where the party is detained in execution of a sentence on a criminal charge, after judgment, in an indictment according to the course of Common Law". But the High Court under S. 491 Cr. P.C. cannot interfere if the Court-Martial, who are the sole Judges of both Law and Fact, make a mistake of law as when they convict on no evidence. It would be different, if the Court-Martial convicts an accused person without hearing any evidence. The High Court can, in such a case hold that the detention of such a person was illegal because the proceedings of the Court-Martial would be irregular on the face of them. If on the other hand, evidence was taken which in view of the Court-Martial was sufficient to maintain a conviction then the proceedings would be regular and the mistake, if any, would be a mistake of law. [See the Full Bench case of Kartarsing v. Imperator, AIR (1946) Lahore p. 103, which refers to the cases of (a) Rex v. John Sudhi 1801, 1 East 306; (b) King v. Governor of Brixton Prison (1914) 1 K.B. 77 etc. etc.). See also Janardhan Reddy & others v. The State of Hyderabad, AIR (1951) S.C. p. 217.]

But in cases where actions taken under laws enabling the executive to deprive subjects of their personal liberty are performed mala fide or for a collateral purpose, it will be for the Supreme Court and our High Court to enquire into the allegations of facts which are calculated to prove that the order passed by the executive is contrary to the purposes of the Act and has been passed mala fide. In the case of Rex v. Home Secretary ex parte Greene, the Court of Appeal [See (1941) 3 All E.R. page 104] laid down the rule on the footing of which interference would be warranted by courts exercising jurisdiction in habeas corpus proceedings:

"The question in such cases is", said Scott L. J., "whether the subject is lawfully detained. If he is, the writ cannot issue. If he is not, it must issue."

In the same case Lord Goddard, while dealing with the question of the alleged necessity for the Secretary of State to have made an affidavit, stated:

"If it were possible to say that under the regulation he had to act in a judicial capacity, the matter would, I think, be clear. If a person committed by order of a court applies for a writ, and on a return, or, in accordance with the modern practice, by an affidavit showing cause, the gaoler produces an order of commitment regular on its face, and showing that the prisoner was committed for matter within the authority of the court, the court to which application for the writ is made, not being a court of error or of appeal, cannot entertain the question whether or not the authority has been properly exercised; per Patterson, J., in Stockdale v. Hansard (1839), 9 Ad. & El. 1; 36 Digest 289, 377; 8 L.J.Q.B. 294; and Lord Denman, C. J., in Middlesex Sheriff's Case (1840), 11 Ad. & El. 273; 36 Digest 293, 438; sub nom. R. v. Evans, 9 L.J.Q.B. 82. However, there can, I think, be no doubt that the Secretary of State, in making these orders, acts wholly in an executive, and not in a judicial, capacity. Counsel for the appellant accordingly relies on the advice of the Judicial Committee, delivered by Lord Atkin, in Eshugbayi Eeko v. Nigeria Government (Administering Officer), (1931) A.C. 662; Digest Supp.; 100 L.J.P.C. 152; 145 L.T. 297; at page 670. In my opinion, however, that passage does not mean that, where the executive has detained a person under statutory authority (and the regulations have the force of statute), he can, merely by saying, "I don't know why I have been detained," oblige the executive to prove that every condition necessary to the making of the order has been fulfilled. In my opinion, once it is shown that he is detained under a warrant or order which the executive has power to make, it is for the applicant for the writ to show that the necessary conditions for the making of the warrant or order do not exist. The matter can be tested, I think, by considering the former procedure, largely superseded by Crown Office Rules now embodied in R.S.C., Ord. 59, which, while altering the practice, retain the substance of the older procedure. Formerly, on a suggestion supported by affidavit that a subject was unlawfully detained, the court issued the writ of habeas corpus. It was directed to the gaoler, or whoever had the actual custody of the applicant, and the court might, and frequently did, cause notice to be given to the person alleged to be responsible for the imprisonment. The writ directed the gaoler to have the body of the prisoner before the court, and directed him to return also the cause of the imprisonment. The gaoler would, in the ordinary course, return the warrant or order which committed the prisoner to his custody, and the court would then examine it. It is not without significance that in the first instance the return had not to be verified by affidavit, for, until impeached, it was to be regarded as true: Watson's Case (1839), 9 Ad. & El. 731; 16 Digest 256, 585; sub nom. R. v. Wixon 8 L.J.Q.B. 129. The prisoner was then allowed, if he could, to controvert the return, and this right is expressly preserved by the Habeas Corpus Act, 1816, S. 4. By sect. 3, the court is given power to inquire into the truth of the return by affidavit. In Middlesex Sheriff's case, Lord Denman, C.J., speaking of that section said, at pp. 291, 292:

(1941) 3
A.E.R. p. 104

'On the motion for a habeas corpus, there must be an affidavit from the party applying; but the return, if it discloses a sufficient answer, puts an end to the case: and I think the production of a good warrant is a sufficient answer. Seeing that, we cannot go into the question of contempt on affidavit, nor discuss the motives which may be alleged.'

"There was no question in that case as to the warrant of imprisonment being anything but good, and, in my opinion, all that the court can do under sect. 3, where the justification in the return is a warrant or order regular on its face and showing a good cause of commitment, is to inquire if in fact it is a true warrant, and if it is in truth the warrant of the committing authority, and if it is under that warrant that the prisoner is in fact detained. However, this still leaves it open to the subject, under sect. 4, to controvert the return, in which case the onus is upon him."

If the recitals do not disclose sufficient answer to the rule nisi on the face of the return, or show facts that are incomplete or incorrect, the burden is on the detaining authority to show by adducing proper evidence what those facts are and in that case of course affidavit would become not only desirable but necessary. But if the return is lawful on its face, it is for the detenu to contradict the statement of facts appearing therein.

In a case of Harkishan Das v. Emperor, AIR (1944) Lahore 33, the return to be valid should have stated "The Provincial Governor was personally satisfied", but in fact the recital was "The Governor of the Punjab is satisfied". The court refused, on the circumstances of that case, to act on the presumption in favour of the regularity of governmental acts and since no evidence had been adduced on behalf of the Crown to fill in this deficiency which was apparent on the face of the return, the court proceeded to declare those orders as not having been properly made.

Reference has already been made to the legal effect of mala fide orders passed by the executive directing the detention of persons. It is only necessary at this stage, to refer to the principle upon which the courts act in declaring those orders as void. That principle was very clearly stated in the case of Vimlabai Deshpande v. Emperor, AIR (1945) Nagpore 8. The rule of law there stated was that a court is bound to enquire into the truth of an allegation in respect of an order having been passed in bad faith or for collateral purpose, whenever such an issue is raised before it. And this it would do because a power exercised in bad faith or for a collateral purpose amounts to the abuse of power and the action of the executive on that account would be wholly outside the Act under which it purports or pretends to act. (See further discussion on ART. 149 at p. 421).

Habeas Corpus and mala fide order of detention.

The power of the court in relation to its controlling jurisdiction in respect of those acts of executive that deprive subjects of their personal liberty as it is exercised in the habeas corpus proceedings has been stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd Ed. Vol. 9 page 703 as follows:

"1202.—In any matter involving the liberty of the subject the action of the Crown or its ministers or officials is subject to the supervision and control of the judges on habeas corpus. The judges owe a duty to safeguard the liberty of the subject not only to the subjects of the Crown, but also to all persons within the realm who are under the protection of the Crown and entitled to resort to the Courts to secure any rights which they may have, and this whether they are alien friends or alien enemies. It is this fact which makes the prerogative writ of the highest constitutional importance, it being a remedy available to the meanest subject against the most powerful. No peer or lord of Parliament has privilege of peerage or Parliament against being compelled to render obedience to a writ of habeas corpus directed to him."

When a rule nisi issues to a respondent for showing cause why a writ of habeas corpus be not issued there is always a direction addressed to the authority having custody of the person detained to make a return, and in compliance with this direction the public or private authority having custody of the person by whom or on whose behalf the application has been made, has clearly to state facts and grounds on the basis of which his detention has been directed. The return must be drawn up with sufficient particularity and must be cast in an unambiguous language. Failure to make a return in these terms would ordinarily result in the discharge of the person detained; but an insufficient return may be amended or supplemented by the leave of the court. Although the rules of our Supreme Court are silent on some of these matters, the practice of the King's Bench Division of the High Court in England in relation to the proceedings on its Crown side would ordinarily be followed in this country.

Habeas corpus application can either be made by the person who has been deprived of his personal liberty or it can be made by some one who is interested in the detenu. In this particular, at least, the habeas corpus proceedings differ from other writs. [See rule 1 of Order (XXV) of the Rules of the Supreme Court where it has been expressly provided that if the person restrained is unable, owing to the restraint, to make the affidavit, which must accompany the application for a writ of habeas corpus, the application shall be accompanied by an affidavit to the like effect made by some other person who shall state the reason why the person restrained is unable to make the affidavit himself]. In the case of an application being moved for the release of a minor who has been illegally or improperly detained, ordinarily it is the person entitled to the custody of such a minor or to represent such a minor legally who should make an application to the Court. But if it could be shown that such a person, is incapable of making the application, it would be for the court to consider whether another person, who is proved to be interested in the welfare of the minor, be allowed to move the Court. [Raj Bahadur v. Legal Remembrancer, to the Government of West Bengal AIR (1953) Calcutta 522].

In proceedings under habeas corpus, the legality of the detention is to be judged at the time of the return as distinguished from the date of the institution of proceedings in court or the date of the detention. If a valid order in support of detention could be produced, the court will not have the power to direct the release of the prisoner merely because it thinks the original order under which he was initially detained was illegal. [See

Failure to make a return or to make a proper return Consequences

Who can make an application for the Writ of Habeas Corpus.

Legality of detention to be determined at the time of return.

Are proceedings for a writ of Habeas Corpus civil or criminal.

Basanta Chandra v. Emperor, AIR (1945) F.C. 18 : (1945) F.L.J. 40 and Ram Narayan Singh v. State of Delhi, AIR (1953) S.C. 277.

There is no unanimity in the decisions of various courts with regard to the nature of habeas corpus proceedings. Are the proceedings civil or criminal? According to Calcutta and Bombay High Courts they are civil [see Niharenddu Dutta Mazumdar and others v. A.E. Porter and Others, AIR (1945) Calcutta 107; I.L.R. (1944) Cal. 489 and Mahomedalli Allabux v. Ismailji Abdulali, AIR (1926) Bombay 332; I.L.R. 50 Bom. 616] but the preponderating view seems to be that they are criminal. That is the view taken by Madras, Nagpur, Allahabad and Lahore High Courts [See In re. Venkatachala Thevar, (1928) 2 M.L.J. 76; Haridas v. Provincial Government, A.I.R. (1949) Nagpur 201; Haidari v. Jawad Ali, A.I.R. (1934) Allahabad 22 and on Appeal A.I.R. (1934) Allahabad 606 and 702; Kishore Lall v. Crown, I.L.R. (1945) Lahore 573.] In England the question is settled in ex parte Amand, (1943) A.C. 147 at 156, and the answer is stated to depend upon the nature of the proceedings in each case.

(a) Halsbury:

'Mandamus' as the word indicates, is the command which is issued from a court to any person, authority or inferior court requiring them to perform the specific act which they are under a statutory obligation to do, but which they have either failed or refused to do. It is a form of writ which is issued in England from the High Court of Justice to the end that justice may be done "in all cases where there is a specific legal right and no specific legal remedy for enforcing such right, and it may issue in cases where, although there is an alternative legal remedy yet such mode of redress is less convenient, beneficial and effectual." (See Halsbury's Law of England, Vol 9, p. 744).

The prerogative writ of mandamus is not granted to enforce a mere private right but is in the nature of a discretionary remedy to be granted in appropriate cases to enforce the performance of public duties for which law prescribes no other effective remedy. In the words of Lord Mansfield, Chief Justice:

"A mandamus is a prerogative writ, to the aid of which the subject is entitled upon a proper case previously shown to the satisfaction of the court. The original nature of the writ and the end for which it was framed, direct upon what occasions it should be used. It was introduced to prevent disorder from a failure of justice and defect of policy. Therefore, it ought to be used upon all occasions where the law has provided no specific remedy and where justice and good government are to be done."

"Within the last century it has been liberally interposed for the benefit of the subject for the advancement of justice.

"The value of the matter or the degree of its importance to the public policy is not scrupulously weighed; if there be a right and no other specific remedy this should not be denied." [See Rex v. Barker (1762) 3 Burr 1265; (1907) E.R. 823].

So also in Rex v. Wheeler, Cas. temp. Hardwicke, 99 Lord Hardwicke, C. J. said, "the reason why we grant these writs (mandamus) is to prevent a failure of justice, and for the execution of the common law, or of some statute, or of the King's Charter, and never as a private remedy to the party."

(c) Reg.
v.
Lambourn:

Similarly, Pollock, B. in the case of Reg. v. Lambourn Valley Railway Company, (1888) 22 Q.B.D. 463 (at p. 466) observed:

"There is no doubt that the granting of a prerogative writ of mandamus is discretionary, and the rule by which we ought to be governed is well established. In Blackstone's Commentaries, Vol. III, p. 110, it is stated that a mandamus is "a high prerogative writ, of a most remedial nature", and "issues in all cases where the party hath a right to have anything done, and hath no other specific means of compelling its performance". In Rex v. Bank of England, 2 Doug. 534, at p. 526, Lord Mansfield said: "When there is no specific remedy the Court will grant a mandamus that justice may be done." These words were amplified by Lord Esher, M. R., in the recent case of In re Nathan, 12 Q.B.D. 461 at p. 473, where he said that they meant, "Where there is no specific remedy, and by reason of the want of that specific remedy justice cannot be done unless a mandamus is to go, then a mandamus will go."

In re Nathan 12 Q.B.D. p. 461 where it was ruled that the mandamus ought not to issue, for the statute created no duty between the Commissioner and the Applicant, whose remedy, if the decision of the Commissioner could be reviewed was by petition of right, Lord Bowen L. J., at page 478 said:

(d) In Re
Nathan.

"A writ of mandamus, as everybody knows, is a high prerogative writ, invented for the purpose of supplying defects of justice. By Magna Charta the Crown is bound neither to deny justice to anybody, nor to delay anybody in obtaining justice. If, therefore, there is no other means of obtaining justice, the writ of mandamus is granted to enable justice to be done. The proceedings, however, by mandamus, is most cumbersome and most expensive; and from time immemorial, accordingly the Courts have never granted a writ of mandamus where there was another more convenient or feasible remedy within the reach of the subject."

A mandamus does not give any right but it is designed to restore the party who has been denied his right to the enjoyment of such a right (Basset v. Barnestable Corporation, 82 E.R. 1109 the original judgment is in French). The foundation of mandamus is the existence of right (Ex-parte Napier (1852) 18 Q.B. 692 per Lord Campbell C. J. at 695).

If a statute enjoins a clear duty of a ministerial character to be performed by a public functionary the problem is a simple one indeed: such a duty can be directed by means of a mandamus, to be performed. But there are cases when the problem is not so very simple as all that: there are statutes that confer a mere power to do certain things as opposed to enjoining a mere duty to be performed.

Nature of Public Duty for the Enforcement of which Mandamus
will issue.

Whenever the statute uses words, "it shall be lawful", it merely prescribes the power or the authority in favour of a public functionary: what it achieves by the use of this expression is to say that certain acts can be legally done by such an authority. The natural meaning of the words used is to make it appear that the thing to be done is permissive, and the provision enabling. But there may be circumstances in which the court may come to the conclusion that the conferment of power by the use of these words also involves a duty to exercise such a power, in which case, of course, it being a case of 'power coupled with duty' a mandamus will lie if there is a failure or refusal to perform such a duty. In the case of Julius v. Oxford, 42 L.T. p. 546; (1880) 5 A.C. 214, it was said:

Julius v.
Oxford.

"Where a power is deposited with a public officer for the purpose of being used for the benefit of persons who are specifically pointed out and with regard to whom a definition is supplied by the legislature of the conditions upon which they are entitled to call for its exercise, that power ought to be exercised and the Court will require it to be exercised".

Concept of Power coupled with duty.

When the thing that may be lawfully done is for public benefit or for the advancement of public interest, the words used may be construed as having a compulsory force, that is, as importing duty as opposed to merely conferring power of an enabling or permissive character. In the case of Reg. v. Tithe Commissioners 19 L. J. Q.B. p. 177; (1849) 14 Q.B. 459, Lord Coleridge remarked:

"The words undoubtedly are only 'empowering' but it has so often been decided as to have become an opinion that in public statutes words only directory, or permissive, or enabling may have a compulsory force where the thing to be done is for the public benefit or in advancement of public justice".

[See also the Privy Council case on the interpretation of S.51 of the Indian Income Tax Act, 1918, Alcock Ashdown and Co. v. Chief Revenue Authority, Bombay, 50 I.A. 227: A.I.R. (1923) P.C. 138 where the word 'may' was construed as importing a duty. As to the doctrine of power coupled with duty the student would do well to read the speeches of the Law Lords in the case of Julius v. Bishop of Oxford (1880) 5 A.C. 214, decided by House of Lords referred to above].

Writers on Jurisprudence are not agreed as to the precise meaning which is to be assigned to the terms with which Science of Law in the main is concerned. 'Right', 'Duty', 'Power', 'Privilege', 'Liberty', 'disability' etc., are some of the terms that Lawyers have to use frequently and it is upon proper use of these terms, in fact, that the systematic character of the Science of law, in the last resort, depends. In order to appreciate the problems that arise in connection with the enforcement of rights and duties by means of the writs of Mandamus, it is necessary that we review briefly some of these terms and see what are we understand by them. In presenting the following analysis the present writer is following the scheme outlined in "Jurisprudence" by Hughes and Dias.

When I have a right it implies that there is some one who owes a corresponding duty to me, so that I can in law say to such a person "You must". But I may have freedom to do something in relation to another person and then I can say to such a one "I may". When I have the ability to alter another's legal condition or position I say in relation to such a situation "I can", and when I cannot alter his legal position I will say "I cannot". Now when I say to another "you must" I am asserting a right and putting him to the obligation of doing his duty. But when I say 'I may', I have only the liberty or privilege to do a certain thing. When I am in a position to alter the legal position of another by saying 'I can', I am indicating that I am possessed of power and when I cannot do this, I am suggesting that I am suffering from a disability.

Difference between Right and Power may now be seen. 'Right' in law implies that its owner can compel another to do corresponding duty, but power is a mere ability to produce certain result. I have a right to receive the amount you owe to me and I can compel you to fulfil your duty and conform to the conduct enjoined on you by law. But when I appoint another to be my agent, I am exercising a power to confer upon him the capacity to act on my behalf as effectively as I would be able to do myself. Power itself, strictly speaking, has no duty correlative to it. There may be certain rights that may appear as such, but nevertheless are in fact, powers coupled with the option or privilege as to the exercise or non-exercise of them—as for example the right to vote is really a power coupled with the privilege of its exercise.

Distinction between duty and liability is easily drawn: when I deposit money with the bank, there is no duty upon the bank to restore it to me until I ask for its return. Until then the bank is only under a liability to be placed under duty to return the money—but is at no point of time, until I ask for the return of my deposit, under a liability to return it to me. And when I ask the Bank to return the amount I am exercising power; before I exercise the power to demand the return of my deposit I have a right to ask for its return—by exercising power I have altered the position of the Bank in that it is now under a liability to account for my deposit. Right is really power in motion. A privilege is a form of right which inheres, in a defined class of persons, to be able to do something e.g. the Parliamentary or Judicial privilege to do certain acts without being called upon to face the ordinary consequences of these acts. Sometimes there is a power coupled with the privilege to exercise it or not to exercise it and at other times it may be coupled with the duty to exercise it. The distinction between 'private' and 'public' powers is invariably drawn with a view to seeing whether the power in question carries with it the attribute of optional or compulsory exercise.

Where there is power coupled with duty to exercise it, a remedy would lie for the breach of that duty. "Subject to certain other limits—broadly if there is no other more appropriate remedy: Pasmore v. Oswaldwistle U.D.C. 1898 A.C. 387; R. v. Dunsheath, Ex. p. Meredith (1950) 2 All E.R. 741; (1951) 1 K.B. 127—mandamus generally lies", say Messrs. Dias and Hughes, the authors of "Jurisprudence", "where duty is a public duty". It is not easy to say what public duty is. A difficult case to understand is Western India Match Co. v. Lock (1946) 2 All E.R. 227: (1946) K.B. 601. The Minister of War Transport had requisitioned a ship under the Defence (General) Regulation 1939 and, space permitting, had it loaded with the plaintiffs' commercial cargo. The cargo was destroyed through the negligence of the Minister's representative. It was held that for the purpose of Limitation Act, 1939, the damage had been inflicted while the Minister was acting in pursuance of a "public duty or authority". Now the Minister had a power coupled with privilege to requisition the ship. Once he had exercised that power, the Court held that he was under a duty to use the ship for public benefit and, therefore, the duty was a public duty. If we insist that every duty must be correlative to a right, the Minister could not be under a duty since it is impossible to find the correlative right. If, on the other hand, we say that there is no reason why every duty should correspond to a right, then this could be a duty, and indeed the Court held that it was.

"Even so there is a difficulty. In the action of the plaintiff against the Minister, it was the duty owing to the plaintiff that came under consideration and that duty, one would have thought, whether it arose under the contract or in tort, was a purely private one. The plaintiff sued for the duty in tort, and the question is how this duty came to be a public duty, or what relevance the Minister's general duty to use the ship and its cargo in the public interest had to the duty owed to the plaintiff." (See page 270 of 'Jurisprudence' Butterworths' publication, 1957).

It follows from what has been said above that the kind of duty which would be enforced by a mandamus must be an absolute or unqualified one and it must not partake of the character of the exercise of a power in the discretion of a public officer. Where the grant of a request to state the case by the Quarter Session was a matter within the discretion of the Quarter Session, no mandamus was held to lie to them in that respect, but it was observed that if the Quarter Session, after having granted the request to state the case for some reason, subsequently refuse to state the case, they may be compelled to do so by a mandamus. Rex v. Somerset Justices Ex parte Ernest J. Cole etc. (1950) 1 All E.R. 264. In a Canadian case reported in the year 1946 in respect of an official who was required to issue a building permit "when he is of opinion that the work proposed to be done is in accordance with the provisions of this and other bye-laws" having refused to issue the permit, not on the ground that rules had not been observed by the plaintiff but because there were orders of his superiors to refuse the permit, the Court granted mandamus on the ground that in the circumstances of the case the discretion of the officer was exhausted and there only remained the duty to grant permit which could be enforced. (See The Murray Co. Ltd. v. District of Burnaby (2) D.L.R. p. 541. Writ of mandamus will also lie if the discretion conferred has been abused. [See the case of Re ex rel Lee v. Workmen's Compensation Board (1942) W.W.R. 129].

Must the specific act, with reference to which mandamus is to issue be one which is enjoined by statute law, or would it be enough if that duty, the performance of which is sought to be enforced, stems from the general or common law of the land? Conflicting views appear to have been taken as to this requirement in cases decided by courts when exercising as opposed to General Law.

Tan Bug Taim versus Collector of Bombay.

power under S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act. In the case of Tan Bug Taim v. Collector of Bombay AIR (1946) Bombay 216, Bhagwati J. has ruled that the words "any law for the time being in force" occurring in S. 45(b) do not mean statute law only but include "Royal Charter, Statute or Common Law" as known in England, i.e. not only the statutes or enactments of Indian Legislature but also the Common Law of the land which is being administered by the Courts in British India." He also referred to S. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, which had enjoined that no body was to be deprived of his property except by the authority of law and felt that there was a general statutory duty on all public authorities not to act contrary to this constitutional mandate. (See however remarks of Chagla C. J. in the case of Lady Dinbai Petit v. M. S. Noronha, AIR (1946) Bombay 407, at p. 421, for a slightly different view. In this case the prayer was that a certain arbitrator appointed under a 'void reference' be restrained from determining the amount of compensation payable to him on the ground that the acquisition of land under the Defence of India Rules was illegal and ultra vires. The court held that since the very foundation of authority of the arbitrator did not exist there could not be, in his case, any question regarding "the doing or the forbearing of any act incumbent upon him in his public character", and the order prayed for could not be issued under S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act). The Supreme Court of India in the case of Commissioner of Police, Bombay v. Gordhandas Bhanji AIR (1952) S.C. 16, at p. 21 have settled the controversy and have ruled that mandamus will issue to enforce not only the statute law but also the general law of the land. "We can see no reason", observed Bose, J. "why statutory duties should be placed on any different plane from other duties enjoined by any other kind of law, especially as some statutory duties are slight or trivial when compared to certain other kinds of duties which are not referable to a statutory provision. In our opinion, the words 'any law' are wide enough to embrace all kinds of law and we so hold".

A writ of mandamus is, as has been remarked above, a prerogative writ and not a writ of right and the granting of it is controlled by the discretion of the court. [See Rex v. The Church Wardens of All Saints Wigan, (1876) 1 A.C. 611].

Relevance of the Principles of English Law relating to the exercise of writ-jurisdiction
and the interpretation of ARTS. 22
and 170.

Relevance of case law on the interpretation of S.45 & 46 of Specific Relief Act.

P.K. Banerjee versus
L.J. Simonds.

Under ARTs. 22 and 170 of our Constitution the principles of English Law in so far as they throw a light upon the purpose for which a writ of mandamus is issued in England as also the conditions that regulate the exercise of Court's discretion in issuing it, would no doubt guide the Supreme Court and the High Court in the performance of their judicial duties. But it cannot be emphasized too often that the powers conferred upon our superior courts have to be exercised somewhat liberally when it comes to the question of enforcing fundamental rights.

The provisions of Ss. 45 and 46 of the Specific Relief Act would also furnish guidance to our courts in the matter of correctly exercising their jurisdiction under these two Articles; but even here care must be taken to realise that the jurisdiction of our superior courts is practically unfettered by any of the limitations to which exercise of power under Ss. 45 and 46 of the Act is necessarily subjected.

The principles that govern the exercise of jurisdiction in regard to the issue of mandamus were stated in the case of P. K. Banerjee v. L. J. Simonds, AIR (1947) Calcutta 307. These principles were no doubt laid down in regard to the interpretation of Ss. 45 and 46 of the Specific Relief Act but they are nevertheless applicable to the exercise of jurisdiction to issue the writ of mandamus under ARTs. 22 and 170 of our Constitution. It was observed in that case (at p. 313):

"Section 45 can be invoked against a person holding a public office only when the doing or forbearing of an act is clearly incumbent upon him in his public character, as required by proviso (b) of the section. There must be a duty or an obligation, in his public character, on the part of the person against whom an order is sought, to do or to forbear from doing an act in favour of the applicant. The remedy under the section is in substitution for the high prerogative writ of mandamus, which, by S. 50 of the Act, is no longer available; but the provisions of S. 45, in substance, give statutory effect to the principles governing mandamus. The decisions of the Courts in England, reference to some of which will be made, relate to mandamus and are applicable to S. 45".

The learned Judge in that case has also dealt with the question whether rights under the common law and under a Royal Warrant are such as can be enforced by means of a writ of mandamus and has referred to the decision on that point of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Commissioner of Income Tax, Bombay v. Bombay Trust Corp., 63 Indian Appeal page 408: AIR (1936) P.C. 269, where it was clearly laid down that:

"Before mandamus can issue to a public servant it must therefore be shown that a duty towards the applicant has been imposed upon the public servant by statute so that he can be charged thereon, and independently of any duty which as servant he may owe to the Crown, his principal."

J. P. Mitter, J. in the case of Carlsbad Mineral Water Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. H.M. Jagtiani, AIR (1952) Calcutta 315, referred to the conditions precedent to the issue of mandamus in the following terms:

"Some of the conditions precedent to the issue of mandamus are:

- (i) the applicant for a writ of mandamus must show that there resides in him a legal right to the performance of a legal duty by the party against whom the mandamus is sought;
- (ii) the Court will not interfere to enforce the law of the land by the extraordinary remedy of a writ of mandamus in cases where an action at law will lie for complete satisfaction. In order, therefore, that a mandamus may issue to compel something to be done, it must be shown that the statute imposes a legal duty;
- (iii) the writ is only granted to compel the performance of duties of a public nature;
- (iv) the Court will, as a general rule, and in the exercise of its discretion, refuse a writ of mandamus when there is an alternative specific remedy at law which is not less convenient, beneficial and effective;
- (v) when mandamus is refused on the ground that there is another special remedy, it is a remedy at law that is referred to."

In S. 46 of the Specific Relief Act the procedure of making application has been prescribed and inter alia it is stated therein that the application must be founded on an affidavit of the person injured stating his right in the matter in question, his demand for justice and the denial thereof. In the rules framed by our Supreme Court, however, the only requirement prescribed for the making of an application for the grant of a writ of mandamus for the enforcement of a fundamental right is that it shall set out the name and description of the applicant, the relief sought, the grounds on which it is sought and shall be accompanied by an affidavit verifying the facts relied on. It shall state "whether the applicant has moved the High Court concerned for the same relief, and if so, with what result." Despite the fact that the above quoted rule (Rule No. 6 of Order XXV of the Supreme Court Rules 1956) does not in terms require a statement to be made in the petition, namely, that a demand for justice has been made by the petitioner and has been denied by the respondent, it is submitted that such a state of facts should be pleaded in an application for mandamus whether it is made to the Supreme Court under ART. 22 or to the High Court under ART. 170, for it constitutes an essential condition precedent for the issue of writ of mandamus. In the case referred to earlier [P. K. Banerjee v. L. J. Simonds, AIR

Procedural requirements in the case of petitions for mandamus.

(1947), Calcutta 307] Mr. Justice Gentle deprecated the practice of affidavits being sworn by persons other than those applying for orders under S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act.

Relief to be accurately stated in writ petition.

The precise nature of the relief must be accurately set forth and vague and alternative prayers should be avoided as they are likely to come in for judicial condemnation. A clear mention should also be made in the petition of "the demand and refusal of the relief by the respondent" for this is a question of substance and not merely that of form: of course, there would be cases in which this requirement of the procedure, namely that there should be a previous demand for justice and its refusal by the respondent may not be insisted upon by a Court as when from the facts of the case it might be obvious that the respondent had no intention of complying with the demand of justice or where the time within which this could have happened as prescribed by the law has itself passed. [See Rex v. Hanley Revising Barrister, (1912) 3 K.B. 518. This was a case in which there was an inadvertent failure by the clerk who had omitted to strike off the lists of the names of some persons who had been successfully objected to and whose names had been ordered by the revising barrister to be expunged. The rule prayed for was "to obtain on the register of electors for the parliamentary borough the lists of voters as they were in fact revised by the revising barrister." It was objected that mandamus should not issue as no demand to that effect had been made upon the Barrister. The court held that it was futile for the petitioner to make a demand requiring the Barrister to do that which he could not do unless there was an order of the court to that effect "for the mere purpose of obtaining his refusal to do that which he is willing to do if so ordered and which, in fact, he did in the exercise of his judicial discretion when he originally revised the lists"].

Mandamus and discretionary orders.

A writ of mandamus, as we have seen, lies to compel the public officer or body to perform statutory duty of a ministerial nature. Ordinarily mandamus will not issue to compel a public officer to exercise his discretion in a certain way. (See the case of "The King on the prosecution of John Whittome v. Marshland Smeeth and Fen District commissioners (1920) 1 K.B. 155.)

But in cases where it is shown that a duty has been imposed upon a public authority to do certain things, in a prescribed way, mandamus will lie to compel the authority concerned to follow the steps that have been prescribed by law for reaching that result. (See Rex vs. Shoreditch Assessment Committee, (1910) 2 K.B. p. 859.)

A mandamus however will not lie to question the decision of the executive upon matters which they are empowered to decide in their absolute subjective discretion. In the case of Mayor of Westminster v. London and North Railway Company Ltd. (1905) A.C. 426, Earl of Halsbury observed:

"Where the Legislature has confided the power to a particular body with a discretion how it is to be used it is beyond the power of any Court to contest that discretion. Of course this assumes that the thing done is a thing which the Legislature has authorised": (See London Briton and South Coast Railway Company Ltd. v. Truman 1885, 11 Appeal Cases page 45.)

But it is entirely a different matter if it can be shown that the public authority has not exercised its discretion bona fide for the purposes contemplated by law or that it has been influenced by irrelevant or extraneous considerations. [See Rex v. Bowman (1898) 1 Q.B. 663; Rex v. Bishop of London (1889) 24 Q.B.D. 213; Rex v. Paddington Rent Tribunal (1949) 1 All E.R. 720; see also the case of Rex v. London County Council (1915) 2 K.B. 466]. All statutory powers must be exercised reasonably and with due care (Sanitary Commissioners of Gibraltar v. Orfila (1890) 15 A.C. 400; see also Robest v. Hopwood (1925) A.C. 578; Rex v. Bishop of London (1889) 24 Q.B.D. 213].

Similarly, where some conditions precedent for the exercise of a power have been prescribed, the Court of law empowered to issue a writ of mandamus will inquire into those collateral, or what the American jurists characterise as, "Jurisdictional facts" to see if the exercise of power by a public functionary is in accordance with law. If the 'named conditions' upon which the exercise of power conferred upon a public officer itself is made contingent, is not complied with, the power has not been exercised in accordance with law. In an inquiry of that kind, the Court is not really questioning the discretion of the officer at all; it is only examining the foundation of the exercise of power. In the case of State of Bombay v. Laxmidas, AIR (1952) Bombay 468, the Court observed that the principal object of the writ of mandamus is to compel Government and its officers to carry out their statutory obligations. (p. 471)

"If the Legislature lays down that the power cannot be exercised except on the satisfaction of certain conditions and the officer exercises the power although the conditions are not satisfied, the Court will intervene and prevent the officer from acting contrary to the statute. The Court will pull up the Government or the officer and compel them to obey the mandate which the legislature has issued." [See also the case of Adams v. Nagle (1938) 303 U.S. 532: 82 Law. Ed. 999].

A court of law "will not interfere with or revise the opinion of an administrative public body if there is anything on which that body could reasonably have come to its conclusion. But the discretion should be exercised in a judicial spirit, not allowing extraneous considerations to affect their decisions."

[See the case of S. K. Ghosh and others v. Vice Chancellor of Utkal University, AIR (1952) Orissa 1]. In this very case it was observed (at p. 11):

"A writ of mandamus cannot, in any event, be used as a substitute for an appeal or a writ of error to revise or correct the alleged errors by a public body in the proper exercise of its lawful jurisdiction, however inequitable and inconsistent its decision may be. We should not interfere if the errors of law or wrongful conclusion of fact result from a mistaken judgment. A line of distinction, however fine, should, however, always be drawn between a mistaken judgment and misguided judgment. Where a tribunal, whether administrative or judicial, allows its judgment to be vitiated by lack of reasonableness and care, the decision shall be subject to the superintendence and control by mandamus."

This case was upset in appeal by the Supreme Court of India [See Vice Chancellor, Utkal University v. S. K. Ghosh, AIR (1954) S.C. p. 217] where Bose J. remarked (at p. 219):

"The learned Judges (of the High Court of Orissa) rightly hold that in a mandamus petition the High Court cannot constitute itself into a Court of appeal from the authority against which the appeal is sought, but having said that they went on to do just what they said they could not. The learned Judges appeared to consider that it is not enough to have facts established from which a leakage can legitimately be inferred by reasonable minds but that there must in addition be proof of its quantum and amplitude though they do not indicate what the yardstick of measurement should be. That is a proposition to which we are not able to assent."

These observations are in line with what Lord Mansfield said in a case known as Dr. Askew's case (Rex v. Askew (1768) 4 Burr 2186: 98 English Reports p. 139). This was a case in which a rule had been obtained upon the application of Dr. Letch for the College of Physicians to show cause why a mandamus should not be directed to them commanding them to admit Dr. Letch to be a member of the College. Lord Mansfield, while observing that although in the case of a party who has a right but has no other specific remedy the Observations of Lord Mansfield in Dr. Askew's case.

Court will assist him by issuing this prerogative writ in order to his enforcing such right, proceeded however to add:

"It is true, that the judgment and discretion of determining upon this skill, ability, learning, and sufficiency to exercise and practise this profession is trusted to the College of Physicians; and this Court will not take it from them, nor interrupt them in the due and proper exercise of it. But their conduct in the exercise of this trust thus committed to them ought to be fair, candid, and unprejudiced; not arbitrary, capricious or biased; much less, warped by resentment or personal dislike.

"Cases indeed may happen, where the rejection may be founded upon other grounds than insufficiency in point of skill and ability or knowledge: it is possible that other causes of rejection may occur; as badness of morals, for instance.

"But in the present case, they seem to have acted with candour and caution. Some of the gentlemen even make oath of their reasons against admitting this candidate for a license. Objections to persons applying for licenses to practise physic may be grounded on a variety of reasons: and the Courts are to judge of such objections and the reasons of them. If they are insufficient, the Court may grant a mandamus. If they should refuse to examine the candidate at all, the Court would oblige them to do it. In a manuscript book of reports which I have seen, the reporter cites (in reporting Dr. Bonham's Case) a mandamus in the time of Edward III directed to the University of Oxford, commanding them to restore a man that was bannitus; which shews both the antiquity and extent of this remedy by mandamus. But the Court ought to be satisfied that they have ground to grant a mandamus: it is not a writ that is to issue of course, or to be granted merely for the asking."

It would thus appear that a mandamus is used not merely to enforce the performance of a ministerial duty, nor merely to correct irresponsible official inaction but is a writ of a far wider scope.

It is true that when the judicial and quasi-judicial officers have a discretion in the exercise of the powers conferred on them, their discretion cannot be interfered with by mandamus. But it is also true that such officers are under a ministerial duty once they have taken a decision in the exercise of their discretion to carry their decision into effect. In such a case their discretion gets merged in a duty and a mandamus can lie compelling them to give effect to their decision [see the observations of Farwell L. J. in the case Burr v. Smith (1909) 2 K.B. 306 at 313, as also the remarks of Lord Halsbury in the case of Ex-Parte Barnes, (1896), A.C. 146.]

In the case of Reg. v. Boteler (1864) 4 B. & S. 959, 122 E. Rep. 718, Cockburn C.J. stated the principle in terms of which a judicial officer can be compelled by mandamus to issue a warrant when all the conditions for the issue of it existed before him. It should be remembered that under the relevant statute the Justices were empowered to issue warrant for levying the amount if they "shall think fit" at the hearing, but the only ground which was urged against the issuing of warrant was, that as the parish of Nash had not at that time any pauper chargeable to it, it was unjust and unreasonable that the rate-payers thereof should be called upon to pay anything towards the expenses of the Union. The learned Chief Justice was not impressed by this contention and observed:

"I do not intend in the slightest degree to encroach upon the doctrine that, where magistrates have a discretionary power to decide whether they will do an act or not, this Court will not order them to do it when they have exercised their discretion upon the merits of the matter. But it is clear, upon the facts of the present case, that they have not exercised that discretion which in law they would have been justified in

Observations
of Cockburn
C.J. Reg. v.
Boteler
quoted.

Writ of Mandamus—Introductory observations:

exercising. This extra-parochial place, having been made part of a Union, became liable by law to contribute its share to the general expenses of the Union; and the magistrates, having that fact established before them, ought to have issued their warrant. It is equally clear that the reason why they did not do so was because they were invited to exercise their discretion on a matter which was not within it. They proceeded upon the ground that the annexation of this extra-parochial place to the Union was unjust, in other words, that the operation of the Act of Parliament under which that was effected was unjust. Their decision virtually amounts to this, 'We know that upon all other grounds we ought to issue our warrant, but we will take upon ourselves to say that the law is unjust, and therefore we will not issue it.' That is not tenable ground on which this Court can allow magistrates to decline to exercise their discretion according to law. It would be an evil example if we held that they might thus arbitrarily and illegally exercise their discretion; and therefore this rule must be made absolute, with costs."

The purposes for which mandamus will lie are very many indeed but they can be seen as variations on one and the same theme, namely, the enforcement by the court of a statutory duty that is imposed on a public functionary. Mandamus lies, as has been remarked earlier, to compel performance of a public duty when there is no other equally adequate and expedient remedy at law by recourse to which the performance of that public duty can be secured. The court of law will not sit as a court of appeal to review or revise decisions taken by public officers in relation to matters which are in their discretion; but if in the performance of those duties they are clearly shown to have travelled outside the scope of the power which law has vested in them, or they are found conducting themselves not in accordance with the conditions prescribed for the exercise of the power vested in, and the performance of duties assigned to, them by law, the court will interfere by means of this type of writ. The court, however, cannot substitute its own judgment for any view, however erroneous or unjust, that many have been taken by a public officer in regard to the exercise of his discretion. But if the discretion has been prescribed by law to be exercised in a particular way, and if it is shown as not having been exercised in that way, the decision having been reached by the exercise of such a discretion being no decision as required by law, would be interfered with (see Veerappa v. Raman & Raman Ltd., AIR (1952) S.C. 192; Vice Chancellor Utkal University v. S. K. Ghosh, AIR (1954) Supreme Court, p. 217; Julius v. Bishop of Oxford (1880) 5 A.C. 214; Westminster Corporation v. London and N.W. Railway (1905) A.C. 426).

Mandamus also lies to compel the holding of an election required by law to be held, to compel the restoration to a public office or franchise to a person who has been wrongfully deprived of the enjoyment of those rights (Rex v. Blooer (1760) 97 E.R. p. 697, 2 Burr. 1043). Similarly, mandamus lies to compel delivery or production and inspection of documents, provided the party asking for the relief has a direct and well defined interest in the documents. (See the case of S. V. Ganapathy and others v. Tiffin's Barytes, Asbestos and Paints Ltd. and others, AIR (1953) Madras 556, where prayer was made under section 45 of the Specific Relief Act but was rejected; but see also the case of Bank of Bombay v. Suleman Somji (1908) 35 Indian Appeals 130). It also lies against inferior courts and quasi-judicial tribunals commanding them to adjudicate questions in accordance with the provisions of law provided they are shown to have refused to exercise such jurisdiction. This is so because if a statutory body refuses to carry out its duty of deciding question, the only way whereby it could be asked to perform its duties, there being no other remedy, is by means of a writ of mandamus. [See the remarks of Mahajan J., in the case of Bharat Bank v. Employees of Bharat Bank, AIR (1950) S.C. 188 at p. 199. It should, however, be noticed that this case was one under ART. 136 which is analogous to our ART. 160].

Purposes for which mandamus will lie.

ART. 170
confers extraordinary power which has to be used cautiously—
so as not to prejudice the normal system of Administration of Justice.

Principles governing the grant of Discretionary Remedies—King versus Stafford.

ART. 170 was not intended to dislocate the pre-existing system of subordinate courts and the procedure governing the conduct of normal litigation in the country, and the powers under this Article particularly in respect of issuing writs of mandamus have to be sparingly exercised. It is only in those rare cases where rights of persons have been infringed and there is no other equally convenient, adequate and specific remedy available that this kind of writ would issue. The High Court would allow resort to constitutional remedies only when it finds that unless the remedy prayed for is granted to the person aggrieved he will suffer irreparable loss or damage.

In the case of The King v. Stafford Justices Ex parte Stafford Corporation, (1940) 2 K.B. 33, the following general observations, concerning the grant of discretionary remedies, would appear to be instructive in the context of the present discussion:

"In all discretionary remedies it is well known and settled law that in certain circumstances, I will not say in all of them but in a great many of them, the court although nominally it has a discretion, if it is to act according to the ordinary principles upon which judicial discretion is exercised must exercise the discretion in a particular way, and if a Judge at a trial refuses to do so, then the court of appeal will set the matter right. But when once it is established that in deciding whether or not a particular remedy shall be granted the court is entitled to enquire into the conduct of the applicant and the circumstances of the case in order to ascertain whether it is proper or not proper to grant the remedy sought, the case in my judgment must be one of discretion." This was a case relating to a prayer for the order of certiorari and the court declined to exercise its discretion on the ground that there had been undue delay in bringing up the proceedings. Similarly it has been held that the writ of mandamus is not a writ of right and the granting of it is, in that sense, discretionary. See also the case of Rex v. All Saints Wigton 1876, 1 A.C. 611."

It is true that the existence of alternative remedy does not constitute an insuperable bar in the way of invoking constitutional remedies, but it is certainly a matter which ought seriously to weigh with every High Court before relief under ART. 170 could at all be granted.

In the case of writ of prohibition or certiorari the existence of alternative remedy will not be given that much weight which is to be given in those cases where writs of mandamus and quo warrantum are asked for. In Halsbury's Law of England, 2nd Edition, Vol. 9, Para 1397, this much has been said on the subject:

"The Court, in deciding whether or not to grant a writ of prohibition, will not be fettered by the fact that an alternative remedy exists to correct the absence or excess of jurisdiction, (see Channel Coalings Co. v. Ross (1907), 1 K.B. 145) or an appeal lies against such an absence or excess. Similarly the fact that an appeal on the merits of the case has already failed, or that the party applying for prohibition has himself initiated the proceedings in the inferior court, is not material to the decision of the court to grant or to refuse the writ."

[See further per Lord Halsbury (1) Pasmore's case (Pasmore & others versus The Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council) (1898) A.C. 387 (H.L.) at 394 where the importance of the principle, namely 'where a specific remedy is given by statute, it thereby deprives the person who insists upon a remedy of any other form than that given by statute' in relation to its application to the exercise of discretion to issue writs of mandamus has been lucidly stated; and (2) Rex v. Wandsworth, JJ. Ex parte Read (1942) 1 All E.R. 56, where in relation to the contention that the applicant had a remedy by way of appeal the court remarked that where there has been a denial of natural justice, the applicant is entitled to an order of certiorari even though another remedy be available to him].

In the case of The King v. North Ex parte Oakey, (1927) 1 K.B. 491, the Court of Appeal consisting of Bankes, Scrutton and Atkin, L.J.J. reversed the decision of the Divisional Court refusing prohibition on the ground that appeal lay. Atkin L.J. felt that it is "quite plain that the fact of there being a remedy by way of appeal is no answer to a writ of prohibition where the want of jurisdiction complained of is based upon the breach of a fundamental principle of justice, such as I conceive to have been the case here".

In this case no notice had been issued to the applicant before issuing the order with which he was aggrieved.

A mandamus cannot issue to restrain legislature from the performance of its legislative business or to interrupt the progress of a bill. [See the case of Chotey Lal v. State of Uttar Pradesh, AIR (1951) Allahabad 228. See also Legislative Committee of Church Assembly Ex parte Haynes-Smith, (1928) 1 K.B. 141, where an application made to restrain by prohibition together with certiorari the National Assembly of the Church of England from proceedings with prayer-book measure was unsuccessful on the ground that neither the National Assembly nor its legislative Committee was empowered to act, or did in fact act, judicially.]

156. Writs of "Certiorari" and "Prohibition"

The writs of certiorari and of prohibition are writs of great antiquity and lie in cases where the Court of King's Bench Division in England is invited, on the basis of certain well defined grounds, to exercise its controlling jurisdiction over the acts of judicial and quasi-judicial bodies of inferior jurisdiction.

Writ of certiorari is so called because the record of the lower tribunals under the rule issued by the court of King's Bench Division is to be "certified" and sent up for the purpose of being investigated by that court. By means of certiorari the records and proceedings are called for by the High Court with a view to examining their legality, and if the High court comes to the conclusion that the inferior tribunal has acted in excess of its jurisdiction or in a manner which is opposed to the principles of natural justice or that there is an error apparent on the face of the record, the impugned orders are quashed by it and put out of the way.

A writ of Prohibition, as its name indicates, is issued to prohibit an inferior body or tribunal from continuing to act in relation to a matter which is beyond its authority or jurisdiction. Certiorari proceedings are commenced with a view to quashing orders passed by inferior bodies or tribunals, and prohibition will go to stop them from going on further with proceedings that are adjudged to be without foundation.

Lord Atkin, in the case of Rex v. Electricity Commissioners Ex parte London E.J. Co. (1924) 1 K.B. 171 C.A. remarked:

"I can see no difference in principle between certiorari and prohibition except that the latter may be invoked at an earlier stage. If the proceedings establish that the body complained of is exercising its jurisdiction by entertaining matters which would result in its final decision being subject to being brought up and quashed on certiorari, I think the prohibition will lie to restrain it from so exceeding its jurisdiction."

"The object of the writ was to protect the jurisdiction of Common Law Courts from being usurped and the writ could reach any tribunal with limited jurisdiction that was exercising a jurisdiction that belonged to Common Law Courts or was found exceeding the jurisdiction conferred upon it by law. The writ could issue from the Court of King's Bench Division in England even to Privy Council while exercising appellate jurisdiction from ecclesiastical courts. (See Halsbury's Laws of England 2nd Ed. Vol. 9, 1408th para.)"

Difference between certiorari and prohibition.

Rex versus Electricity Commissioners.

Remarks of Shah J., in Hong Kong
and Shanghai Banking Corporation's case.

In the case of Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation versus Bhaidas Pranjivandas, AIR (1951), Bombay 158, Shah J. of the Bombay High Court also remarked that the difference between certiorari and prohibition was one merely of the stage at which the writ might be effected; writ of prohibition is designed to prohibit inferior tribunal from proceeding any further if it can be shown that it was assuming a jurisdiction that was not vested in it by law, but the writ of certiorari lies to remove the decision or the order recorded by such a tribunal with a view to having it quashed. The learned Judge remarked:

"A writ of Prohibition and a writ of certiorari are two complementary writs. A writ of certiorari is issued requiring that the record of proceedings in some cause or matter pending before an inferior court be transmitted to the superior court to be dealt with, for rectifying an order or proceeding. The writ is issued where an order has been passed by a tribunal having judicial or quasi-judicial authority but the tribunal had no jurisdiction to pass the order or to hold the proceeding complained of. A writ of prohibition is issued for preventing a tribunal from continuing a proceeding pending in it on the ground that it has no jurisdiction to hold the proceedings. A writ of certiorari is remedial, whereas a writ of prohibition is preventive."

Difference between Prohibition and injunction

The difference between writ of prohibition and relief by way of injunction as set forth at p. 70 in Short and Mellor's Practice on the Crown Side is:

"... remedy by injunction is issued out of the Courts of Chancery or Common Law against proceeding at law. Both (that is prohibition and injunction) have the same object, but the difference between them is, that an injunction is directed against the parties litigant, while a prohibition is directed to the Court itself. An injunction recognises the jurisdiction of the court in which the proceedings are pending, but a prohibition strikes at once at its jurisdiction."

King
v.
Paddington

The writ of certiorari is available only in specified contingencies as when there is either excess or absence of jurisdiction and the authority or the tribunal is under a duty to act judicially. (See the case of King v. Paddington, (1949) All E.R. 720; and Rex v. Chancellor and another, (1947) 2 All E.R. 170). In the last mentioned case Wrottesley, L.J. has traced the history of the writ of prohibition and certiorari with reference to the jurisdiction of the Divisional Court of King's Bench to issue these writs to an ecclesiastical court. The learned Judge has quoted extensively from the text book writers to show the nature of jurisdiction that was sought to be exercised in those proceedings. The following passage from Blackstone quoted in the judgment is instructive (at p. 175):

"The other injury, which is that of encroachment of jurisdiction, or calling one coram non judice, to answer in a court that has no legal cognizance of the cause, is also a grievance, for which the common law has provided a remedy by the writ of prohibition. A prohibition is a writ issuing properly only out of the Court of King's Bench, being the King's prerogative writ; but, for the furtherance of justice, it may now also be had in some cases out of the Court of Chancery, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, directed to the judge and parties of a suit in any inferior court, commanding them to cease from the prosecution thereof, upon a suggestion that either the cause originally, or some collateral matter arising therein, does not belong to that jurisdiction, but to the cognizance of some other court. This writ may issue either to inferior courts of common law; as, to the courts of the counties palatine or principality of Wales, if they hold plea of land or other matters not lying within their respective franchises; to the county courts or courts-baron, where they attempt to hold plea to any matter of the value of forty shillings; or it may be directed to the courts christian, the university courts, the court of chivalry, or the court of admiralty, where they concern themselves with any matter not within their jurisdiction; as if the first should attempt to try the validity of a custom pleaded, or the latter a contract made or to be executed within this kingdom. Or, if, in handling of matters clearly within their cognizance, they transgress the bounds prescribed to them by the laws of England; as where they require two witnesses to prove the payment of a legacy, a release of tithes, or the like; in such cases also a prohibition will be awarded. For, as the fact of signing a release, or of actual payment, is not properly a spiritual question, but only allowed to be decided in those courts, because incident or accessory to some original question clearly within their jurisdiction; it ought therefore, where the two laws differ, to be decided not according to the spiritual, but the temporal law, else the same question might be determined different ways, according to the court in which the suit is depending: an impropriety, which no wise government can or ought to endure, and which is, therefore, a ground of prohibition. And, if either the judge or the party shall proceed after such prohibition, an attachment may be had against them, to punish them for the contempt, at the discretion of the court that awarded it; and an action will lie against them, to repair the partly injured in damages."

Estate and Trust
Agencies v.
Singapore Improvement
Trust.

In the case of Estate and Trust Agencies v. Singapore Improvement Trust, AIR (1937) P.C., 265: (1937) A.C. 898: 3 All E.R. 324, their Lordships of the Privy Council dealt with the propriety of issuing writ of prohibition in a case where the steps that exhibited the quasi-judicial character of the proceedings had been gone through and all that remained to be done was to get the approval of the declaration made under S. 57 of the Singapore Improvement Ordinance, 1927. Their Lordships examined the case with a great deal of thoroughness with a view to seeing whether the 'Declaration' made by the Board was grounded on the purposes outlined in the Ordinance. The respondent's powers, observed their Lordships, were strictly limited by the terms of the Ordinance. Within these powers they can determine questions gravely affecting the property rights of the inhabitants, but if they step in any degree beyond the limits imposed, any aggrieved person is at liberty to invoke the assistance of the Law. Their Lordships came to the conclusion that the grounds on which the respondents made the declaration, as explained by the affidavit of their Chairman, were grounds which did not justify the declaration. In other words, the respondents were applying a wrong and inadmissible test in making the declaration and in deciding to submit it to the Governor-General-in-Council. They were, therefore, acting beyond their powers and the declaration was not enforceable.

As to the propriety of exercising their discretion to issue the writ after the quasi-judicial body had rendered a decision, and all that remained to be done was to approve and give effect to it, their Lordships observed (at p. 270):

"The respondents have thus been enabled to agree that as a Board they are functus officio, that there is nothing left to be done by them as a quasi-judicial body, nothing on which the writ of prohibition could operate, and that the application, not having been made before the declaration was submitted to the Governor-in-Council, is too late. It is not in dispute that the fact that the declaration has been submitted to the Governor-in-Council is in itself no reason against the issue of the writ. A proceeding is nonetheless a judicial proceeding subject to prohibition or certiorari because it is subject to confirmation or approval by some other authority (see Rex v. Electricity Commissioners 1924, 1 K.B. 171). On the other hand, there must remain something to which prohibition can apply, some act which the respondents if not prohibited may do in excess of their jurisdiction, including any act, not merely ministerial, which may be done by them in carrying into effect any quasi-judicial order which they have wrongly made. Their Lordships don't doubt correctness of the view expressed by R. S. Wright, J. in 63 L.J.Q.B. 112. (In re. London Scottish Permanent Building Society) at p. 113 namely that:

'An application for prohibition is never too late as long as there is something left for it to operate upon.'

In the case of 1927, 1 K.B. 491 (Rex v. North) Scrutton L.J. after expressly approving this dictum as that of a Judge who had great familiarity with this subject, remarked at p. 503: 'When the sentence is unexecuted statement of intention to execute it may be followed by a writ or prohibition, however long a time may have elapsed since the original sentence was pronounced.'

Their Lordships in issuing the writ took into consideration the fact that the respondents gave the appellants no opportunity of applying for prohibition or certiorari before they sent the declaration to the Governor-in-Council. The difficulty in the case was that the Governor-in-Council was not a party to the proceedings and the originating summons, as framed, was limited to prohibition and there was no claim founded on certiorari. All the same, their Lordships issued the writ of prohibition to the respondents not to require the appellants to demolish the building under S. 61 which was a discretionary power to be exercised by the respondent after the approval by the Governor-in-Council. Their Lordships concluded the consideration of this question by a significant remark (at p. 271) :

"It must not be forgotten" observed their Lordships, "in considering the technical aspect of the case that, on the conclusion at which their Lordships have arrived, their declaration was ultra vires and that if the respondents were to attempt to exercise their powers under S. 61 they would be relying on an order which, if challenged in time by suitable proceedings, could not have been made."

In the case of King v. The Electricity Commissioners, (1924) 1 K.B. 171, said Atkin L.J.:

"Whenever any body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting rights of subjects and having the duty to act judicially act in excess of their legal authority they are subject to the controlling jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division exercised in these writs."

In an earlier case, May, C. J. drew the distinction between the classes of cases in which certiorari would lie and those in which it would not, in the following terms:

"It is established that the writ of certiorari does not lie to remove an order merely ministerial, such as a warrant, but it lies to remove and adjudicate upon the validity of acts judicial. In this connection, the term 'judicial' does not necessarily mean acts of a judge or legal tribunal sitting for the determination of matters of law, but for the purpose of this question a judicial act seems to be an act done by competent authority, under consideration of facts and circumstances, and imposing liability or affecting the rights of others, and if there be a body empowered by law to inquire into facts, make estimates to impose a rate on a district it would seem to me that the acts of such a body involving such consequences would be judicial acts." [See in Regina (John M'Evo) v. Dublin Corporation (1879) 2 L. R. Ir. 371].

This dictum has been approved by Lord Atkinson as "one of the best definitions of a judicial act as distinguished from an administrative act" in Forme United Brewery Co. Ltd. v. Bath Justices (1926) A.C. 586 at p. 602. The distinction between judicial and quasi-judicial acts on the one hand and merely ministerial acts on the other has been more fully examined in the case of The King v. London County Council, (1931) 2 K.B. 215, and the observations of Scrutton L. J. at p. 233 are often cited as representing the best that has been said on the subject.

"It is not necessary that it should be a Court in the sense in which this Court is a Court; it is enough if it is exercising, after hearing evidence, judicial functions in the

When would writ of Certiorari lie.

King vs. The Electricity Commissioners

The King v.
London
County Council.

sense that it has to decide on evidence between a proposal and an opposition; and it is not necessary to be strictly a Court; if it is a tribunal which has to decide rights after hearing evidence and opposition, it is amenable to the writ of certiorari; and I do not discuss further the nature of the writ, because very elaborate discussion of it will be found in the recent cases of Rex. vs. Electricity Commissioners, (1924) 1 K.B. p. 171, and Rex vs. Minister of Health, (1929) 1 K.B. p. 619".

Again in the case of Ryots of Garabandho v. Zamindar of Parlakimedi, 70 Indian Appeal 129: (1943) P.C. 164, Viscount Simon, L.C. laid down the following test as to the existence of those conditions which must subsist before the nature of the act can be deemed to be within the scope of the writ of certiorari.

"This writ does not issue to correct purely executive acts but, on the other hand, its application is not narrowly limited to inferior 'Courts' in the strictest sense. Broadly speaking, it may be said that if the act done by the inferior body is a judicial act, as distinguished from being a ministerial act, certiorari will lie. The remedy, in point of principle, is derived from the superintending authority which the Sovereign's superior Courts, and in particular the Court of King's Bench, possess and exercise over inferior jurisdictions. This principle has been transplanted to other parts of the King's dominions, and operates, within certain limits, in British India."

Enough has been said to determine the province of the writ of certiorari and it would be useful at this stage to compare and contrast the scope of this writ from that of mandamus.

Following points may help the comprehension of the scope of the two writs:—

(1) The range of the writ of mandamus is, comparatively speaking, wider than that of certiorari: it can be issued to any public officer, tribunal of inferior jurisdiction or a corporation whereas certiorari can issue only to a judicial or quasi-judicial body. [See Union of India v. Elbridge Watson, AIR (1952) Calcutta 601].

(2) Certiorari and prohibition are very nearly writs of rights and would issue ex debito justitiae upon the application of party aggrieved, whereas mandamus is a discretionary writ and one of the most important condition precedent for its issue is the consideration whether or not there is equally effective alternative remedy to secure that which the writ of mandamus is designed to achieve. [See Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Ed., Vol. 9, p. 130, as also the case of Rex v. Post Master-General Ex parte Carmichael, (1928) 1 K.B. 291 at 299].

(3) The scope of certiorari is from another point of view somewhat wider than that of mandamus and this can be seen if a comparison is made from the point of view of the extent to which powers of superintendence over inferior tribunals can be exercised under both the writs. A mandamus may issue where an inferior tribunal or authority has either failed to exercise or refused to exercise its jurisdiction. Certiorari lies to quash the decision itself in case it be shown that the tribunal in reaching the decision has either acted in excess of its jurisdiction or has acted in a manner which is plainly opposed to the principles of natural justice or its decisions bear the imprint of "an error apparent on the face of the record." An erroneous decision is quashed by certiorari, but when there is failure to hear and decide the case, mandamus may be issued to get the Tribunal to move further in accordance with law [Rex v. Woodhouse (1906) 2 K.B. 501]. When the decision is based only on material which cannot be considered as proper basis for decision, certiorari lies to quash such a decision and mandamus would be issued to direct the authority to hear and decide the application according to law. The case Reg v. Cotham (1898) 1 Q.B. 802, presents this principle in a clearcut way: This was a case in which the licensing Justices were clearly shown to have acted outside the law

Ryots of Garabandho
v. Zamindar
of Parlakimedi.

Certiorari
and Mandamus—compared and contrasted.

and did some thing which was beyond their jurisdiction. But since under the authority of Reg. v. Sharman, (1898) 1 Q.B. 578, application of the rule of correction by certiorari was out of question, the question arose regarding the application of the writ of mandamus: Willis J. as to this said:

"We have next to consider whether the case is one in which a mandamus ought to be granted directing the justices to hear and determine the matter according to law. It is obvious that the distinction between an erroneous decision and a failure to hear and determine according to law may be fine, and the cases on the subject and law say that it is so. I take the governing principle to be that if the justices have applied themselves to the consideration of a Section of an Act of Parliament, and have, no matter how erroneously, determined the question which arises upon it before them these decisions cannot be reviewed by mandamus. That is so whether there is appeal or not. If there is appeal, mandamus will not lie; if their is not, then decision is final. But when it appears that they have taken into consideration matters which are absolutely outside the ambit of their jurisdiction, and absolutely apart from the matters by law ought to be taken into consideration, then they have not heard and determined the matter according to law. Certiorari has to get rid of impugned order of a Tribunal, while mandamus has to compel it to proceed further to a decision which may be required in the interests of the petitioner."

(4) Mandamus lies to compel a public officer to do something or to omit the doing of that which it is directed by law that he should do or, as the case may be, not do. Certiorari, however, is a mere ex post facto relief in that, it lies only to get rid of orders passed by judicial and quasi-judicial bodies upon certain well defined grounds. And what is more, even a superior court in certiorari proceedings cannot convert itself into a court of appeal and do that which the inferior tribunal ought to have done and it would interfere with the orders of subordinate tribunals as will be indicated later only on certain well defined principles.

Certiorari and the Power to summon record.

Power to summon record by the High Court or the Supreme Court is unqualified and unlimited and whenever a rule nisi is issued summoning the record, the authority to whom the rule is addressed is bound to submit the record to the Court concerned, and if he has any objection as to the disclosure of any part of the record a separate prayer has to be made and the Court would then dispose of the matter in accordance with what it considers is reasonable and right.

"The proper return", it was observed in a Full Bench case of P. Joseph John v. The State AIR (1953) Travancore Cochin 363 by Travancore Cochin High Court of India "to an order issuing notice upon an application (for a writ of certiorari to bring up the proceedings)... should be a return producing the records forming the subject matter of the proceedings in certiorari . . . Every document in the Secretariat file (from the beginning) and terminating in the orders sought to be quashed must necessarily form part of the proceedings . . . It is not competent for the State to take objection for production of any of the documents forming part of the record, based on sections 123, 124 and 162, Evidence Act."

It was also observed that "if any document not expressly excluded heretofore forming part of the said proceedings is apprehended to be injurious to public interest if disclosed, liberty is given to the respondent to produce the same in Court in a sealed cover with an explanatory note and the said document will be dealt with by the Court appropriately."

The record could be summoned from the person having legal custody of it, should the tribunal whose determination is sought to be corrected has become functus officio. [See the case of Hari Vishnu Kamath v. Ahmad Ishaque, AIR (1955) S.C 233].

Under the Codes of Criminal and Civil Procedure of our country the High Court has the power of revision and in the exercise of that power has also the power of summoning the records and proceedings of the courts subject to its appellate jurisdiction for the purpose of satisfying itself as to their "legality," and "propriety". S. 435 of the Code of Criminal Procedure gives to the High Court (even as it does to the Sessions Judge or District Magistrate or any Sub Divisional Magistrate empowered by the Provincial Government in that behalf) the power to call for and examine the record of any proceeding before any inferior criminal court situate within its appellate jurisdiction and S. 439 sets forth the kind of orders that can be passed by the High Court while exercising its revisional jurisdiction. Similarly S. 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains provisions that define the power of the High Court while exercising its revisional jurisdiction. This section says:

"The High Court may call for the record of any case which has been decided by any court subordinate to such High Court and in which no appeal lies thereto, and if such subordinate court appears:

- (a) to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by law, or,
- (b) to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested, or,
- (c) to have acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity, the High Court may make such order in the case as it thinks fit."

But whereas this power of revision is exercisable only in respect of courts that are subordinate to the High Court the powers to issue writs of certiorari and prohibition are available in respect of all the inferior bodies exercising judicial and quasi-judicial functions. The extent of the power to interfere with the determination of these inferior judicial and quasi-judicial tribunals is, of course, comparatively speaking, of a limited kind and is not as wide as it would be when the High Court is exercising its revisional jurisdiction.

157. Bodies or Authorities to whom Certiorari will lie

What are the bodies and authorities to which writ of certiorari could be addressed, is a question which bristles with difficulties: in particular, the answer to it depends on the distinction between judicial and quasi-judicial bodies, on the one hand, and the merely ministerial bodies, on the other. Any student of jurisprudence who sets out to discover some useful principle from his browsing in the "immense pasture" of legal literature on that subject would not be able to find any such principle much less a useful practical test by resort to which in a vast majority of cases this distinction without difference, can be properly drawn by him. All he would be told would be somewhat on the following lines: a writ of certiorari lies in respect of tribunals that are required to follow, in the determination of the causes before them, the principles of natural justice. And when he further asks "How best can one find out, what bodies or tribunals are required to follow principles of natural justice", the answer will be "only those bodies that are required to follow principles of natural justice in respect of which writ of certiorari lies."

Professor Robson, for instance, after a laborious, careful and thorough examination of all the relevant cases that may be said to have a bearing on the question of formulating a test for distinguishing between 'Judicial', and 'quasi-judicial' bodies on the one hand, and purely administrative ones, on the other; with a sigh of weariness, confesses that "these decisions disclose no coherent principle, and the reported cases throw no light on the question from the wider point of view from which we are now discussing it save to demonstrate, by the very confusion of thought which they present, the difficulty of arriving at a clear basis of distinction." (Justice and Administrative Law p. 5).

A difficult question to answer.

Prof.
Robson's views on the impossibility of formulating a test on this matter.

In the report of the Committee appointed by the Lord Chancellor on 30th October, 1929, "to consider the powers exercised by or under the direction or by persons or bodies appointed especially by Ministers of the Crown by way of: (a) delegated legislation, and (b) judicial and quasi-judicial decisions, and to report what safeguards are desirable or necessary to secure the constitutional principles of the sovereignty of the Parliament and the supremacy of the law," we find the following stated in the third section of that report:

"... A 'quasi-judicial' decision is . . . one which has some of the attributes of a judicial decision, but not all . . . A true judicial decision presupposes an existing dispute between two or more parties and involves four requisites:

(1) the presentation (not necessarily orally) of their case by the parties to the dispute;

(2) if the dispute between them is a question of fact by means of evidence . . .;

(3) if the dispute between them is a question of law, the submission of legal argument by the parties; and

(4) a decision which disposes of the whole matter by a finding upon the facts in dispute and an application of the law of the land to the facts so found, including where required a ruling upon any disputed question of law. A quasi-judicial decision equally presupposes an existing dispute between two or more parties and involves (1) and (2) but does not necessarily involve (3) and never involves (4).

The place of (4) is in fact taken by administrative action, the character of which is determined by the Minister's free choice . . ."

The Committee further observed that the distinction between purely administrative decisions, on the one hand, and the judicial and quasi-judicial decisions, on the other, consists in the fact that there is, according to them, no legal obligation in the matter of reaching administrative decisions to consider and weigh submissions or arguments or to take any evidence or to entertain any objections that may be raised. This is so because the grounds upon which the person deciding acts, and the steps which he takes to inform himself before acting, are left entirely to his discretion.

To the question: "What then is 'administrative decision?", the Committee returned the following answer:

"In the case of administrative decisions, there is no legal obligation upon the person charged with the duty of making the decision to consider and weigh submissions and arguments, or to collate any evidence or solve any issue. The grounds upon which he acts, and the means which he takes to inform himself before acting are left entirely to his discretion."

But they nevertheless are cautious enough to add: "But even large number of administrative decisions may and do involve in greater or lesser degree at some stage in the procedure which eventuates in administrative action, a certain of the attributes of a judicial decision. Indeed, generally speaking, a quasi-judicial decision is only an administrative decision, some stage or element of which possess judicial characteristics."

(See further C. K. Allen's observations on this nebulous concept of 'quasi' under the caption "The Ghost-Land of the 'Quasi'" in the Second Edition of his "Law and Orders" (1956) at p. 389 and in particular the remarks of Cohen, L. J. in Johnson & Co. v. Minister of Health (1947) 2 All England Reports, 395, at p. 405: "Counsel for the Respondent would seek to make him (Minister) not only a quasi-judge, but a quasi-litigant, bound to give quasi-discovery to each of the parties to the quasi-lis. Logically, on this kind of argument he would be bound to supply copies of all relevant documents and to answer quasi-interrogatories."

In the case of Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas S. Advani, A.I.R. (1950) S.C. 222, the nature and scope of the writ of certiorari as it could issue under S. 45 of the Specific Relief Act was fully examined.

This case was brought to the Supreme Court by way of appeal from the decision of the Bombay High Court reported in AIR (1949) Bombay 277 (P. V. Rao v. Khushaldas), and the latter case is important because of the scholarly discussion therein of the pre-existing limits of the jurisdiction of that Court to issue writs before the advent of the Constitution—the cases reviewed being (1) Venkataraman v. Secretary of State for India, AIR (1930) Mad. 896: 53 Madras 979; (2) Thyagarajan v. Government of Madras, I.L.R. (1940) 53 Madras 204; (3) In re Banwarilal Roy, (1943) 48 C.W.N. 766; (4) Lady Dinbai Petit v. Noronha, AIR (1946) Bombay 407: 48 Bombay L.R. 255 and (5) Kandaswami Mudaliar v. Province of Madras, AIR (1947) Madras 444.

Now a word about the decision of the Supreme Court in Khushaldas case, AIR (1950) S.C. 222 at p. 231.

"A petition for a writ of certiorari", observed Fazl Ali J., of the Supreme Court, in Khushaldas case "can succeed only if two conditions are fulfilled: firstly, the order to be quashed is passed by an inferior Court or a person or authority exercising a judicial or quasi-judicial function, and secondly, such Court or quasi-judicial body has acted in excess of its legal authority."

Thus, at least this much is clear, that certiorari is not available for quashing merely administrative, ministerial or executive orders. It lies only in cases where the inferior tribunals are required to act judicially.

As to the question, when can a person or body be said to have a duty cast upon it to act judicially, the majority view in Khushaldas case is reflected in the following observation of Kania C.J. (at p. 226):

"It seems to me that the true position is that when the law under which the authority is making a decision itself requires a judicial approach, the decision will be quasi-judicial. Prescribed forms of procedure are not necessary to make an enquiry judicial, provided in coming to the decision the well recognized principles of approach are required to be followed."

In each case, therefore, the question as to whether there is imposed upon the tribunal the duty to act judicially is to be answered by attempting an analysis of the provisions of the statute creating the tribunal. If by an appreciation of all the relevant provisions in the statute it could be said, that the authority is required to hear evidence, to entertain the objections and then decide the question submitted for its adjudication, it could fairly be presumed that the authority is charged with the duty of acting judicially and is amenable to be controlled in certiorari proceedings.

But even this test is not an absolute one, for cases are known in which its application would appear to be clearly one of doubtful validity. As observed in Rex v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee (1952) 1 All E.R. 480,

"The true view as it seems to us is that the duty to act judicially may arise in widely different circumstances which it would be impossible and indeed inadvisable to attempt to define exhaustively."

As an illustration of the difficulty involved in formulating any universally valid test for the demarcation of the boundary line between the two provinces, that is between (a) merely ministerial acts on the one hand, and (b) the judicial and quasi-judicial acts on the other, reference should be made to the case of (i) Franklin v. Minister of Town and Country Planning, (1948) A.C. 87, and (ii) the case of King v. Postmaster General (1928) 1.K.B. 291. The former

(a) Franklin
v. Minister of Town Planning.

was a case which involved appreciation of the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act and New Towns Act of 1946 with a view to determining the question whether under that Act the functions of the Minister, who was required to pass an order after following the prescribed procedure, could be regarded as being of judicial or quasi-judicial character. The requirements of the procedure prescribed was that Minister was to cause to make a public enquiry before passing the order: in the words of the Rules mentioned in the Schedule to the Act.

"(3) If any objection is duly made to the proposed order and is not withdrawn, the Minister shall, before making the order, cause a public local enquiry to be held with respect thereto, and shall consider the report of the person by whom the enquiry was held.

(4) Subject to the provision of the last foregoing paragraph, the Minister may make the order in terms of the draft or subject to such modification as he thinks fit. . . ."
Despite these provisions Lord Thankerton held that the functions of the Minister were not judicial but merely ministerial. He observed:

"In my opinion, no judicial, or quasi-judicial, duty was imposed on the respondent, and any reference to judicial duty, or bias, is irrelevant in the present case. The respondent's duties under S. 1 of the Act and Schedule-I thereto are, in my opinion, purely administrative, but the Act prescribes certain methods of, or steps in, the discharge of that duty. It is obvious that, before making the draft order, which must contain a definite proposal to designate the area concerned as the site of a new town, the respondent must have made elaborate inquiry into the matter, and have consulted any local authorities who appear to him to be concerned, and, obviously, other departments of the government, such as the Ministry of Health, would naturally require to be consulted. It would seem, accordingly, that the respondent was required to satisfy himself that it was a sound scheme before he took the serious step of issuing a draft order. It seems clear also, that the purpose of inviting objections, and, where they are not withdrawn, of having a public inquiry, to be held by someone other than the respondent, to whom that person reports, was for the further information of the respondent, in order to the final consideration of the soundness of the scheme of the designation, and it is important to note that the development of the site, after the order is made, is primarily the duty of the development corporation established under s. 2 of the Act. I am of opinion that no judicial duty is laid on the respondent in discharge of these statutory duties, and that the only question is whether he has complied with the statutory directions to appoint a person to hold the public inquiry, and to consider that person's report."

The only way to understand the ratio decidendi of the above case is to say that the enquiry which the statute required the Minister to make was merely for the purpose of helping the Minister himself to reach a correct conclusion but this requirement of the law could not be regarded as providing a basis for anyone saying that the Minister's decision itself or the act of deciding by the Minister was a quasi-judicial one so as to make it amenable to be quashed by a writ of certiorari. It is true that in that case the power of the Court to question the order of the Minister was provided for by sub-section (1) (b) of S. 16 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1944: it was provided that the Court if satisfied that the order or any provision therein is not within the powers conferred by the Act or that the interest of the applicant having been substantially prejudiced by any requirement of the Act or of any Regulation made thereunder not having been complied with, may quash the order or any provision contained therein either generally or as it affects any property of the applicant. The point whether there was a duty on the Minister to decide the question judicially arose in relation to the contention of the applicant that the order had been vitiated by the bias of the Minister. The question of bias would have been material if upon the construction of the provisions of the statute it would be established that the Minister was required to act judicially. Lord Thankerton referred to the forensic meaning of the word 'bias' and observed:

"Its proper significance, in my opinion, is to denote a departure from the standard of even-handed justice which the law requires from those who occupy judicial office, or those who are commonly regarded as holding a quasi-judicial office, such as an arbitrator. The reason for this clearly is that, having to adjudicate as between two or more parties, he must come to his adjudication with an independent mind, without any inclination or bias towards one side or other in the dispute."

Upon the facts of that case it was held that the speeches made by the Minister were of a political nature and were not inconsistent with the intention on his part to carry out the statutory duty imposed upon him by the Parliament, and since the functions to be discharged by the Minister were not quasi-judicial, the question of bias was not of much relevance: the only question that was relevant was whether the Minister had done his statutory duty of considering any genuine objections. On the materials before them, the House of Lords, came to the conclusion that there was nothing to show that the issue in the mind of the Minister had been foreclosed or that there was not that consideration shown by him to the report which was required of him under the law.

But the principal point of interest in the above case is to grasp precisely the legal reason that prompted their Lordships to say that the Minister was not required by the statute to act judicially. Here was a case in which under the statute (a) the objections had to be invited to the proposed scheme, (b) a local enquiry had to be held and (c) a report by the officer concerned had to be considered. All these steps were to be taken before the Minister could make the order. Surely, one way of looking at the matter was to say that all these provisions clearly showed that the Minister was required to weigh and consider the objection in a judicial spirit. Nevertheless, we find the House of Lords taking a different view of the matter, and holding his duty to be merely ministerial in character.

(b) The case of King v. Postmaster General, (1928) 1 K.B. 291, may be regarded as representing an extreme view on the side opposite to the view taken in Franklin v. Minister of Town and Country Planning, (1948) A.C. 87. In this case, under the workmen's Compensation Act, compensation was payable to an employee if the workman obtained a certificate of the Certifying Surgeon to the effect that he was suffering from 'telegraphists' cramp'. A medical practitioner was appointed by the Secretary of State with powers and duties of a "certifying" Surgeon under Sec. 4 of the Act. It was further provided that in so far as the Post Office employees were concerned, the Post Office Medical Officer was to exercise the duties of the "certifying" Surgeon provided he was authorised so to do. The practice that prevailed in the Post Office was to refer all cases of such kind to the Chief Medical Officer of the Post Office and this practice was relied on as constituting him a substitute for the certifying Surgeon under the Act. The applicant who was suffering from telegraphists' cramp was on the capitation list of the local medical officer of the Post Office but in fact had never consulted him. On her claiming compensation for the disability resulting from telegraphists' cramp, the case was referred to the Chief Medical Officer who certified that the applicant was not suffering from such cramp. The question before the court was whether under these circumstances, the giving or withholding of a certificate by such a Medical Officer could be appropriately regarded as being a matter that was amenable to being tested by a writ of Certiorari. Lord Hewart C. J. rejected the contention viz. that the giving or withholding of a certificate did not in any manner proceed from a duty to act judicially that could be said to have devolved on a Medical Officer. He observed:

(b) King v.
Postmaster
General.

"I do not think that it was contemplated at all that the judgment of the Medical Referee should in the smallest degree be influenced by the certifying Surgeon by a wholly unauthorised person and I do not think Mrs. Carmichael would be in the same position before the Medical Referee as that in which she would have been if there had been a refusal on the part of proper officer to give her any certificate at all".

Similarly, Salter J. regarded that the certificate was invalid and he held that "it is a judicial decision, to which a proceeding by way of certiorari would apply", and Avory J. did not "differ from the view that the certificate being a condition precedent to the right of the workman to claim compensation may be a proper subject for a writ of certiorari...."

In this case it would appear that the certificate of the Surgeon gave or deprived a person of right to compensation and the giving or withholding of such a certificate was thus considered a judicial act and if the person had no jurisdiction to give such a certificate, a writ of Certiorari was considered a proper remedy. But why must the act be considered "Judicial" merely because of the part which the certificate must play in the making "of any claim for compensation"? Is duty to act judicially a necessary adjunct of the sort of effect a given order would have upon the rights of a third person?

On comparing this case with the case of Franklin v. The Minister of Town and Country Planning (1948) A.C. 87, it is difficult to understand the principle in terms of which both the decisions could be said to be consistent with each other. In both the cases it would be noticed that an enquiry had been provided for and in both the cases the ultimate orders that were to be passed on the footing of those enquiries and the results did involve interference with rights of third persons. Why should the action of the Minister in the latter case be not regarded as falling in the same species of acts in which the action of the Surgeon who gave or withheld the required certificate should fall? It is impossible to reconcile the two decisions.

There is no universally valid test that has been evolved which is capable of being applied to all the cases that might arise for the solution of the problem, namely, whether in a given case the Public Officer who is charged with a duty of taking decision is required to act judicially. Mr. Justice Amir Ali remarked in the case of In re Banwarilal Roy, (1943) 48 C.W.N. 766, in regard to the difficulty of accurately distinguishing betwixt the class of cases where the writ of Certiorari would be available and the class of cases where it would not, in words that could hardly be improved upon:

"The law however recognizes that there are two classes of decisions, one to which the writ of Certiorari applies and the other to which it does not. Decisions of class I are generally referred to as judicial acts or described by some phrase in which the word 'judicial' finds a place: decisions of class II by some phrase in which 'Executive' or 'administrative' is the adjective. That there is no clear intervening gap between the two classes, that it is a matter of two ends of a scale or perhaps, different places in spectrum may be supposed. In certain cases, therefore, the question whether a particular decision or opinion formed is of one class or the other, is itself a question of opinion, of colour. To find out whether the opinion is of one class or the other, we must first of all observe the man (or men) making the decisions and then what the man is trying to decide then consider upon what materials he can decide and then ourselves decide whether it is opinion class I or opinion class II."

But despite these difficulties of which Amir Ali J. justifiably complains, it is necessary to formulate some adequate working tests. It is, to begin with, always useful in all these cases to raise the following question: Are the conditions prescribed by the statute for the exercise of power such as may properly be regarded as evidence of an intention on the part of the Legislature to impose on the officer concerned, duty to act judicially? If in the determination of the existence or non-existence of these conditions themselves the officer has been

Justice Amir
Ali's views in the case of
In re Banwarilal".

An Attempt at formulating a test.

constituted as the sole judge of the situation then, so long as he says that those conditions are fulfilled, there is an end of the matter and the Superior Courts cannot interfere with such decisions. But if the existence of these conditions has itself to be determined by an appeal to some "objective" standard, then they become "conditions precedent" to the exercise of power and it is for a Superior Court, in each case, to find whether the exercise of the power by the subordinate tribunal is in accordance with law.

In other words, if the law permits a subjective approach to the determination of the conditions limiting the exercise of power, and constitutes the officer exercising the power as a sole judge as to their existence, writ of Certiorari will not lie; but if, on the other hand, those conditions have themselves to be determined objectively then they become 'conditions-precedent' to the exercise of the power and their existence cannot be said to be conclusively demonstrated merely because the officer exercising the power says that such conditions exist. In the latter case the court can go behind the declaration that such "conditions" have been found to exist".

It would be apparent, however, that this test (though to all intents and purposes it has an appearance of finality) is more easily formulated than applied: for precisely the question 'what is objective approach and how its existence is to be spelled out from the nature of power vested in an officer or Tribunal' is in practice the most difficult one to answer—and it is from the answer that one can give to this question that the further point, namely whether there is imposed upon the officer concerned a duty to act judicially, can be resolved successfully.

To illustrate this, let us recall the approach of one of the Judges of the Indian Supreme Court in the case of Province of Bombay v. Khushaldas Advani, AIR (1950) S.C. 222, referred to earlier. Das J., it will be remembered, in the case reported in (1943) 48 C.W.N. 766 (in re Banwari Lal Roy) stated his conclusion on the mode of differentiating between two classes of acts as follows:

"The two kinds of acts (that is quasi-judicial act as opposed to an administrative act) have many common features. Thus a person entrusted to do an administrative act has often to determine questions of fact to enable him to exercise his power. He has to consider facts and circumstances and to weigh pros and cons in his mind before he makes up his mind to exercise his power just as a person exercising a judicial or quasi-judicial function has to do. Both have to act in good faith. A good and valid administrative or executive act binds the subject and affects his rights or imposes liability on him just as effectively as a quasi-judicial act does. The exercise of an administrative or executive act may well be and is frequently made dependent by the legislature upon a condition or contingency which may involve a question of fact, but the question of fulfilment of which may, nevertheless be left to the subjective opinion or satisfaction of the executive authority, as was done in the several ordinances, regulations and enactments considered and construed in the several cases referred to above. The first two items of the definition given by Atkin L.J. (Rex v. Electricity Commissioners, 1924 1 K.B. 171) may be equally applicable to an administrative act. The real test which distinguishes a quasi-judicial act from an administrative act is the 3rd item in Atkin, L.J.'s definition, namely the duty to act judicially". (P. 257)

Having gone so far as to merely affirm what Lord Atkin had already stated in the case of Rex v. Electricity Commissioners, (1924) 1 K.B. 171, Das, J. proceeded to summarise the principles deducible from the two kind of cases referred to by him in an earlier part of the judgment as follows (at p. 260) :—

"(i) that if a statute empowers an authority, not being a Court in the ordinary sense, to decide disputes arising out of a claim made by one party under the statute

Remarks of Das, J. in Khushaldas' case are not helpful.

which claim is opposed by another party and to determine the respective rights of the contesting parties who are opposed to each other there is a lis and prima facie, and in the absence of anything in the statute to the contrary it is the duty of the authority to act judicially and the decision of the authority is a quasi-judicial act; and

"(ii) that if a statutory authority has power to do any act which will prejudicially affect the subject, then, although there are not two parties apart from the authority and the contest is between the authority proposing to do the act and the subject opposing it, the final determination of the authority will yet be a quasi-judicial act provided the authority is required by the statute to act judicially."

As to the validity of the first principle something would be found said in the remarks that follow, but the reference to the second principle mentioned by Das, J., is hardly a source of enlightenment to the student who wishes to know precisely how to determine whether a statute imposes a duty upon the authority to act judicially.

Additional tests suggested—but none is decisive.

(a) D.M. Gordon.

Some additional tests for distinguishing between judicial and administrative acts could be suggested, although in the opinion of the present writer none of them is a decisive one.

(a) Mr. D. M. Gordon in an article contributed to 49 L.Q.R. at p. 107 formulates the distinction between judicial and quasi-judicial bodies as follows:

"Judicial Tribunals must treat legal rights and liabilities as pre-existing, because such tribunals declare themselves bound by a fixed objective standard; they profess not to confer rights or impose liabilities themselves but only to do what is dictated by law. But administrative tribunals which act upon policy and expediency, themselves dictate what is politic and expedient; they are not concerned with pre-existing rights and liabilities but themselves create rights and liabilities that they enforce."

The foregoing formulation of the suggested test may also be spelled out of certain observations of Lord Loreburn contained in his speech in the House of Lords reported in 1907 A.C. 420 (at p. 423-4) in Lord Mayor of Leeds v. Ryder & others, a case that reached that forum by way of appeal from R. v. Woodhouse (1906) 2 K.B. (C.A.) 501. It was said:

"The justices acting under S.I. Sub-section 2 of the Act of 1904 act administratively for they are exercising a discretion which may depend upon considerations of policy and practical good sense—and they must, of course, act honestly. That is the total of their duty."

It is true that in this case the learned Law-Lord was dealing with an argument from the bar viz., that some atleast of these Justices were biased by their having previously taken part in certain arrangements when the Corporation offered that these public houses should be suppressed and compensation paid", but it is also clear that, the "body" in question was held to be an administrative body because it was for them to exercise a discretion which may depend upon consideration of policy and practical good sense'."

This dictum has been commented upon by Mr. D. M. Gordon in the Canadian Bar Review for 1932 at p. 198 as follows :

".....Any Tribunal is administrative if its duty is to make decisions according to policy and practical good sense; but a tribunal is judicial if its duty is to render decision according to legal rights. If an individual can come before a Tribunal and say: the facts are so-and-so, which gives me a legal right to so-and-so, then the Tribunal must be a judicial tribunal. But if a Tribunal's functions are such that a suppliant must, in effect, say: 'the facts are so-and-so which makes it policy and practical good sense for you to grant me certain privileges', then that tribunal is merely an administrative Tribunal.

Into which class do licensing tribunals fall? Obviously for the most part their functions are administrative, for by statute justices grant licence to such persons as they, in the exercise of their discretion, deem fit and proper. There is no question of legal right; an applicant for a new licence has no right."

"After he gets the licence he has a legal right because the Tribunal has created it. But a judicial tribunal does not create legal rights, it hears a claim that a legal right exists, it investigates a claim, and pronounces whether the claim is true or not. It confers nothing, it merely gives effect to the pre-existing rights of the parties—creation is not a judicial function."

(b) Dr. D.C. Holland in his scholarly paper on "The High Court Control Of Inferior Tribunals" [See Current Legal Problems, (1952)] states his conclusion on the question of formulating a test for drawing a distinction between quasi-judicial and administrative function as follows:

"To sum up, my conclusion is that where the case is triangular involving two parties and a third person as judge between them, the courts will always regard the function as quasi-judicial in nature. Where, however, the statutory power does not involve a triangular situation analogous to that before a court of law, whether the function is regarded as judicial or not depends upon the Court's view of the nature of the function. If they regard it as analogous to functions conferred upon the Courts, involving, for example, the condemnation of an offence and the punishment of an offender, then they will hold it to be judicial in nature. It may be well, of course, that in the latter case changing times mean that the Courts are now less ready to regard a function as analogous to a judicial function."

In so far as this 'test' has reference to the existence of a lis inter partes it is reminiscent of the observations of Lord Herschell in the case of Boulter v. Kent Justices, (1897) A.C. 556) where what he said, in effect, was that a tribunal is judicial if its business is to deal with lis inter partes.

"When proceedings are taken by way of information or complaint which end or may end in conviction or order, there are always two parties—the person initiating the proceedings and the person against whom the proceedings are taken."

But in the case of licensing Justices, said his Lordship, it could not be said that there is any lis inter partes for the simple reason that the grant of licence is for all practical purposes the conferment of a privilege and the power is to be exercised in the interests of the public. The applicant before the Licensing Justices seeks a privilege, and a member of the public who objects merely informs the mind of the Authority to enable it rightly to exercise its discretion whether to grant that privilege or not.

"A decision that license should not be granted is a decision that it would not be for the public benefit to grant it. It is not a decision that the objector has a right to have it refused. It is properly speaking a determination in his favour. It is, I think, a fallacy to treat the refusal as necessarily induced by a particular objector. Every member of the local community might object. Would they all then become the other party? There is in truth no lis, no controversy inter partes and no decision in favour of one of them and against the other, unless, indeed the entire public are regarded as the other party for if a license be refused on the ground that it was not needed to supply the legitimate wants of the public at large, the decision is really in favour of public at large."

Thus there is a lis when "A" says: "B owes me Rs. 500/-" and when "B" appears he says: "I don't owe the amount claimed to "A". But there is no lis when "A" says: facts are such-and-such and you ought to be persuaded into giving me a license. If "B", as an objector, turns up, denies the facts or brings forward new facts, he is merely satisfying the Justices to determine what it is for them to do in the public interest. A judgment or decision against "A" is not really in favour of "B" at all. The Tribunal is not interested in the rival claims of the individuals, but in the result to the public of granting what is asked.

(b) Dr. D.C. Holland.

It is necessary for us, therefore, each time, to discriminate between the appearance of a pseudo-lis from the existence of a real lis before applying the above test.

Roscoe Pound.

(c) Roscoe Pound states the position, upon the general question under examination, somewhat succinctly in his "An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law" at pp. 52-53 as follows :

"Typically judicial treatment of a controversy is a measuring of it by a rule in order to read a universal solution for a class of causes of which the cause in hand is but an example. Typically administrative treatment of a situation is a disposition of it as a unique occurrence, an individualisation whereby effect is given to its special rather than to its general features. But administration cannot ignore the universal aspects of situations without endangering the general security. Nor may judicial decision ignore this special aspect and exclude all individualisation in application without sacrificing the social interest in the individual life through making justice too wooden and mechanical."

The difference between the two then is not one of kind so much as it is of degree: that is, a preponderance of judicial characteristics may characterise the total process as being judicial in nature and vice versa: further that this would seem to be a question, not one of absolute compartmentalisation but merely of "a more or a less".

Exercise of discretion judicial or administrative.

(d) The administrative bodies exercise discretion in reaching the results of the administrative process, creatively; they are not bound by a pre-existing frame-work of rights and liabilities within which the judicial tribunals as a rule must work to administer justice,

The Law Officers of the Government, for instance, exercise their statutory functions of advising Government on legal questions, e.g. commencing prosecutions, filing acquittal appeals (S. 417 Cr. P.C.), giving consent to the institution of a certain type of suits (S. 92 Civil Procedure Code) etc.—but it cannot be said that they are, while so engaged, acting judicially, or quasi-judicially so as to be amenable to the writ of Certiorari. These actions are administrative. (See however contrary views in the case of Abu Bakr v. Advocate-General of Travancore Cochin State AIR (1954) Travancore Cochin 331 at p. 336).

158. Discretionary Powers and the Fundamental Rules of Judicial Procedure

"In giving judicial powers to affect prejudicially the rights of person or property, a statute is understood as silently implying, when it does not expressly provide, the condition or qualification that the power is to be exercised in accordance with the fundamental rules of judicial procedure, such, for instance, as that which requires that, before its exercise the person sought to be prejudicially affected shall have an opportunity of defending himself. (Bagg's case (1616) 11 Rep. 99, R. vs. University of Cambridge (1722) Stra. 557. Emerson v. Newfoundland (1854) 8 Moo. P.C. 157. Ex Parte Ramshay (1852) 21 L.T.Q.B. 238, Thorburn v. Barnes (1867), L.R. 2 C.P. 384; Re. Pollard (1886) L.R. 2 P.C. 106. Quoted from Maxwell on 'Interpretation of Statutes' p. 368, 9th Ed.)

To the same effect are the words of W. A. Robson (See his 'Justice and Administrative Law, p. 400, 3rd Ed.)

"The idea of a discretion which is to be exercised, not in a capricious and impetuous way, but in a disciplined and responsible manner, is a conception which has had a wide application in English Law and Politics. It really represents a compromise between the idea that people who possess power should be trusted with a free hand, and not tied down by narrow formulae, and the competing notion that some contingent control must be retained over them in case they act in an unreasonable way. Discretion in public affairs is seldom absolute; it is usually qualified. It must be used 'judiciously,' and hence we often hear the expression 'a judicial discretion'." (See further (1) R. vs. Electricity Commissioners (1924) 1 K.B. 171 and (2) R. v. Manchester Legal Aid Committee, (1952) 2 Q.B. 413: (1952 All E.R. 480).

159. Certiorari—and correction of erroneous determination of jurisdictional facts.

Having reviewed some of the tests or criteria by resort to which it is possible to discriminate between the Judicial and Quasi-judicial acts, on the one hand, and merely ministerial acts on the other, it is necessary to advert to an important aspect of the problem connected with the exercise of Certiorari Jurisdiction by the Superior Courts. The question to be considered is: How far can the exercise of power by inferior tribunals be questioned by means of certiorari proceedings in cases where they have determined "collateral" or "Jurisdictional facts" erroneously and have thus conferred upon themselves the authority to exercise power, that is power which, under the law, had to be exercised by them only upon the occurrence or happening or fulfilment of certain well-defined contingencies or conditions. The very approach which the statute prescribes for the determination of this question of finding Jurisdictional facts may itself suggest to the Superior Court the character of the inferior tribunal—that is, whether it is a judicial or merely an administrative tribunal. Whatever might be the state of law in England in regard to the scope of the controlling jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division, in the matter of issuing writs of certiorari for giving relief to persons aggrieved by determinations of inferior tribunal that are not under a duty to act judicially but which have been shown to have acted without jurisdiction, the position under the Pakistan and the Indian Constitutions can hardly admit of any dispute.

In this connection we might notice the decision in the case of the State of Bombay v. Laxmidas, AIR (1952) Bombay 468. This was a case in which the provisions of Bombay Land Requisition Act, 1948, came in for consideration. Under that Act, the Bombay Government requisitioned a flat situated in a trust property of which the petitioners were the trustees. Under sub-section (4) of Section 6 of the Act, the State Government had the power to requisition premises which were vacant, provided they were of the kind defined in the Act and were required "for the purpose of State or any other public purpose". The question that arose was whether it is possible for a court of law to go behind the declaration made in the order of the Government that the premises were vacant and that they were the premises of the kind defined in the statute. The answer that the Bombay High Court gave was that the Court had the power to go behind such a declaration in certain specified category of cases. The reasoning in support of this decision was that the power of the Government to requisition vacant premises under Section 6 is not in the nature of an unlimited and uncontrolled power. This is a power which is conditioned by the limitation laid down in the Act itself, and before any valid order under S. 6(4) can at all be made, certain conditions are to be satisfied which are "conditions precedent" to the exercise of the power by the State. And these conditions are (a) that the requisition must be for a public purpose (b) that only those premises can be requisitioned to which the Act applies and (c) that the premises must be vacant. No enquiry can be held under S. 6(4) except with regard to the premises which are premises according to the definition contained in the statute and no declaration can be made except in respect of premises which are premises defined by the statute and finally no order of requisition can be made unless it is an order relating to the premises defined by the statute.

State of Bombay v.
Laxmidas.

Certiorari and the disregard of the conditions precedent for the exercise of power.

With regard to the jurisdiction of court in certiorari proceedings commenced under S.45 of the Specific Relief Act to question the validity of the governmental acts performed in disregard of the conditions precedent prescribed by law for the due exercise of the power, the Bombay High court observed (at p. 471) :

"A writ of certiorari, it need hardly be stated, is issued only to persons or bodies discharging judicial or quasi-judicial functions and it is issued when the person or the tribunal acts in excess of its jurisdiction or fails to exercise jurisdiction which is conferred upon it or in the exercise of its jurisdiction contravenes the principles of natural justice. Mr. Seervai has rightly conceded that if a tribunal wrongly decides what might be called collateral or jurisdictional facts, the existence of which alone confers jurisdiction upon the tribunal, a Superior Court would interfere and correct the tribunal exercising judicial powers. On the other hand, if the tribunal is deciding facts in issue or facts the decision of which is within its jurisdiction and for the purpose of which it has been created, then however wrong the decision on the facts may be, because the decision is within jurisdiction of the tribunal the Superior Court will not interfere. Therefore, a clear line of demarcation is drawn, as far as writs of certiorari are concerned, between cases where the Court will interfere and cases where the Court will not interfere. Now, we fail to see what is there in principle, and we think there is none in authority either, why the same principle should not be applied to officers exercising the power conferred upon them by statute. If the power is unlimited, the court undoubtedly cannot interfere. If certain matters are left to the discretion of the officer, the Court cannot control that discretion unless the discretion is arrived at mala fide or is not a proper exercise of discretion." But if the power is not unlimited, but is a power conditioned by limitations, then, in our opinion, the limitations or the conditions precedent occupy the same position as collateral facts in the case of a tribunal exercising judicial or quasi-judicial functions. Just as the Court will interfere to correct collateral facts wrongly decided, the Court will also interfere when the officer exercises his power without satisfying the conditions precedent and thereby violates the mandate of the Legislature."

Take the case of those statutes which make the exercise of power contingent upon, and subject to, the satisfaction of the person charged with the duty of exercising the power in question. In the case of such a statute, expressions like "if satisfied" appearing therein no doubt are to be construed as prescribing a condition which, in effect, limits the exercise of the power conferred, and in the absence of such a condition having been complied with there would be no legal basis for the exercise of what otherwise might be regarded as an absolute and unqualified power. But it is also true that such expressions unmistakably constitute the donee of the power the sole judge as to the existence or the non-existence of the prescribed state of mind requisite for the due exercise of that power, and in all these cases, in the absence of evidence showing that the public functionary has acted fraudulently or mala fide, it would be difficult to say whether or not such a condition of mind at all existed. It is on this account that several judicial pronouncements have declared that when a matter is left to the subjective discretion of the authority or tribunal, it is not a matter which is amenable to being corrected by means of certiorari proceedings.

Khushaldas Advani's case.

This in fact seems to be the principle in terms of which the majority decision in Khushaldas Advani's case (AIR 1950 S.C. 222) referred to earlier could be explained. It would be recalled that in that case too, merely on the plain construction of statute, the principal question of fact to resolve was, "Whether in the opinion of Provincial Govern-

